

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF THE JEWISH DIASPORA

ORIGINS, EXPERIENCES, AND CULTURE

M. AVRUM EIRLICH, EDITOR

Encyclopedia of the Jewish Diaspora

Encyclopedia of the Jewish Diaspora

Origins, Experiences, and Culture

---

Themes and Phenomena of the Jewish Diaspora

M. AVRUM EHRLICH

Editor

A B C  C L I O

SANTA BARBARA, CALIFORNIA    DENVER, COLORADO    OXFORD, ENGLAND

Copyright 2009 by ABC-CLIO, LLC

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, except for the inclusion of brief quotations in a review, without prior permission in writing from the publishers.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data
Encyclopedia of the Jewish diaspora : origins, experiences, and culture / M. Avrum Ehrlich, editor.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 978-1-85109-873-6 (hard copy : alk. paper)

ISBN 978-1-85109-874-3 (ebook)

1. Jews--History--Encyclopedias. 2. Jewish diaspora--Encyclopedias.
3. Jews--Asia--History--Encyclopedias. 4. Jews--Europe--History--Encyclopedias.
5. Jews--America--History--Encyclopedias. 6. Jews--Africa--History--Encyclopedias.

I. Ehrlich, M. Avrum

DS115.E47 2009

909'.04924003-dc22

2008032565

12 11 10 09 1 2 3 4 5

This book is also available on the World Wide Web as an ebook. Visit abc-clio.com for details.

ABC-CLIO, LLC

130 Cremona Drive, P.O. Box 1911

Santa Barbara, California 93116-1911

Production Editor: Anna A. Moore

Production Manager: Don Schmidt

Media Manager: Caroline Price

Media Editor: Ellen Rasmussen

File Management Coordinator: Paula Gerard

This book is printed on acid-free paper. ∞

Manufactured in the United States of America

Contents in Brief

Themes and Phenomena of the Jewish Diaspora

- Diaspora Themes
- History of the Diaspora
- Persecution of Diaspora Jews
- Religious Fusion and Interaction in the Diaspora
- Languages of the Diaspora
- Music and Culture of the Diaspora
- Women in the Diaspora
- Genetics, Medicine, and Genealogy
- Sephardi, Oriental, and Ashkenazi Ethnicities and Culture
- Israel and the Diaspora
- Migration and Wanderings of Diaspora Jews
- Contemporary Diaspora

Countries, Regions, and Communities

- Africa
- Australasia
- North America
- Latin America and the Caribbean
- Middle East
- Western Europe
- Central and Eastern Europe and Russia
- Baltic States
- Scandinavia
- Caucasus and Central Asia
- East Asia
- India and Pakistan
- Southeast Asia

Contents

Editorial Board and Staff xvii

Contributors xix

Preface xxi

Maps xxiii

Introduction

xxv The Need and Usefulness of Diaspora Studies Gabriel
(Gabi) Sheffer

Diaspora Themes

- 1 The Concept of Diaspora in Biblical Literature
Carl D. Evans
- 4 The Concept of Diaspora in Talmudic Thought
Eliezer Segal
- 8 Diaspora in the Hellenistic Period
Edrel Arie
- 17 Symbols of the Diaspora
Ellen Frankel
- 23 Liturgy in the Diaspora
Raymond Apple
- 31 The Concept of Exile and Diaspora in Sephardi Thought
Marc D. Angel
- 34 Lurianic Kabbalah and the Idea of the Diaspora
Shaul Magid
- 38 Communication in the Premodern
Jewish Diaspora Sophia Menache

42 The Concept of Diaspora and Exile in German-Jewish Literature and Art

Mark H. Gelber

48 The Concept of Sephardi and the Ashkenazi in German-Jewish and German Anti-Semitic Thought

Mark H. Gelber

52 The Concept of Diaspora in the Thought of Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik

Marc D. Angel

54 Jewry as an Archetypical Diaspora
Gabriel Sheffer

57 Jewish Self-Hatred
Ritchie Robertson

61 Diaspora, Exile, and Jewish Identity

Howard K. Wettstein

History of the Diaspora

64 Jews and Judaism in Ancient World Literature

Timothy Andrew McCaffrey

72 History of Jews as a Minority
Robert M. Seltzer

78 The Lost Tribes of Israel
Amotz Asa-El

87 The Samaritan Diaspora
Alan D. Crown

90 History of the Karaite Diaspora
Fred Astren

- Persecution of Diaspora Jews
- 95 History of Jewish Persecution and Expulsion
Frederick Schweitzer
- 103 Varieties of Anti-Semitism
Ritchie Robertson
- 107 Literary Anti-Semitism
Mark H. Gelber
- 112 Western Democracies and the Holocaust
William D. Rubinstein
- 115 Euro-Arab Anti-Semitism
Bat Ye'or
- 118 The New Anti-Semitism
Danny Ben-Moshe
- 123 The Dissemination of Early Christianity beyond the Jewish Diaspora
Marianne Dacy
- Religious Fusion and Interaction in the Diaspora
- 126 Jewish Diaspora and the Spreading of Christianity
Edward Kessler
- 132 Jewish Influence on the Formation of the Christian Scriptures
Alison Salvesen
- 136 History of Judeo-Christian Communities in the Jewish Diaspora
David J. Rudolph
- 139 Islamization and Jews in the Medieval Middle East
Fred Astren
- 141 Christian–Jewish Dialogue: 18th Century
Klaus L. Berghahn
- 146 Contemporary Judeo-Christian Communities in the Jewish Diaspora
David J. Rudolph
- 150 Jewish–Islamic Mutual Influences
Esperanza Alfonso
- 156 The Widespread Phenomena of Marranism and Hidden Jews
Gloria Mound
- 160 Brazilian Marranism
Anita Waingort Novinsky
Translation by Mike Boyington
- Languages of the Diaspora
- 167 Characteristics of Jewish Languages
David M. Bunis
- 171 Varieties of Diaspora Languages
John Myhill
- 180 Judeo-Spanish in the Turkish Social Context
Mary Altabev
- 184 Two-Tiered Relexification in Yiddish: Jews, Sorbs, Khazars, and the Kiev-Polesian Dialect
Paul Wexler
- 187 A Perspective on Judeo-Ibero-Romance, Yiddish, and Rotwelsch
Paul Wexler
- 191 The Yiddish-German Irony
Frank Heynick
- 193 Yiddish as a Diaspora Language and Its Future
Dovid Katz
- 197 The Integration of Yiddish into English
Arnie Keogh
- 200 Diaspora Influences on Modern Hebrew (“Israeli”)
Ghilad Zuckermann
- Music and Culture of the Diaspora
- 206 Overview of Diaspora Jewish Music
Marsha Bryan Edelman

- 214 Liturgical Music of Sephardi Jews
Mark Kligman
- 218 Liturgy and Music of Syrian Jews
Mark Kligman
- 220 Humor and Satire in Judeo-Spanish Song
Judith R. Cohen
- 222 Music and the Reconstruction of Iberian Crypto-Jewish Identity
Judith R. Cohen
- 225 Contemporary Jewish Music in America
Mark Kligman
- 229 Rescue and Virtual Preservation of Diaspora Cultural Heritage by the Center for Jewish Art
Aliza Cohen-Mushlin
- 233 Jewish Contributions to the Arts
Sylvia Barack Fishman
- Women in the Diaspora
- 251 The Jewish Diaspora and the Role of Women
Judith R. Baskin
- 255 Sephardi Women, Marriage, and Family: 16th–17th Centuries
Ruth Lamdan
- 260 Jewish Women in Central Europe:
19th–20th Centuries
Dieter J. Hecht
- 264 Women, Family, and Identity in Imperial Germany (1871–1918)
Marion Kaplan
- 267 Jewish Women in Yemen
Yael Katzir
- 271 Women and Egalitarianism in American Judaism
Shaul Magid
- Genetics, Medicine, and Genealogy
- 275 Jewish Genetic Diseases
Edwin H. Kolodny
- 287 Genetic Diseases and the Diaspora
Joel Zlotogora
- 292 Evolution of Jewish Genealogic Studies
Sallyann Sack
- 294 Jews, Diaspora, and Medicine
Frank Heynick
- 301 Freud, Judaism, and the Emergence of Psychoanalysis
Frank Heynick
- Sephardi, Oriental, and Ashkenazi Ethnicities and Culture
- 305 Jews under Muslim Rule
Frederick Schweitzer
- 309 History of the Religious Leadership of Oriental Jewry
Menachem Ben-Sasson
- 315 Insights into Sephardic Intellectual History
Marc D. Angel
- 320 Jewish Enlightenment and Its Impact on the Diaspora
Shmuel Feiner
- 325 Beginning of Hasidism in Eastern Europe
M. Avrum Ehrlich
- Israel and the Diaspora
- 328 Jewish Immigration to Pre-State and Modern Israel
Danny Ben-Moshe
- 333 Diaspora Anti-Zionism
Thomas A. Kolsky
- 340 Jewish Diaspora Engagement with Israel
Danny Ben-Moshe
- 345 Education in Israel about
the Diaspora
Matt Silver and Aliza Shenhar

- Migration and Wanderings of Diaspora Jews
- 351 A Chronology of Jewish Travelers and Explorers
M. Avrum Ehrlich and Steve Hall
- 354 Migration Patterns of Iraqi Jews
Myer Samra
- 361 Westward Migration Routes of Sephardi Jews
Julia R. Lieberman
- 364 Population Transfer of the Jews of Thessaloniki
Yitzchak Kerem
- 369 Migration Routes of Rhodian Jews of the Ottoman Empire and the Mediterranean Basin
Yitzchak Kerem
- 375 Migration Routes of Egyptian Jews
Racheline Barda
- 378 Why the Majority of the Jews of Iraq Emigrated to Israel in Operation Ezra and Nehemya, as Viewed by Jewish Memoirs
Daphne Tsimhoni
- 382 Modern Jewish Refugees from Arab Countries
David G. Littman
- 386 Contemporary Migration Patterns of Russian Jews to Germany
Barbara Dietz
- Contemporary Diaspora
- 392 The Demography of Modern Diaspora Jewry
Sergio Della-Pergola
- 402 Self-Revitalization of Diaspora Life
Martina Urban
- 407 Jewish Values and Diaspora Philanthropy
Gary A. Tobin
- 412 Contemporary Responses to Inter marriage
Gerald Cromer
- 416 A Rabbi's Reflections on the Modern Rabbinate and the Jewish Community
Marc D. Angel
- 419 Insight into the Workings of a Diaspora Beth Din
Raymond Apple
- 421 Contemporary Conversion Patterns into Orthodox Judaism
Marc D. Angel
- 424 Jewish Day School Education in French-Speaking Europe
Zehavit Gross
- 427 The International Network of Religious Zionist Kollels
Yael Ehrenpreis Meyer
- 430 The Habad Movement, Its Organizations, and Its Influence in the Diaspora
M. Avrum Ehrlich
- Africa
- 449 Jews in Africa
Saul Issroff with the assistance of Moshe Silberhaft
- 453 Migrations of Jews into West Africa
Ehav Eliyahu
- 455 Jews in Algeria
Saul Issroff
- 459 Jews in Cape Verde
Carol S. Castiel
- 461 Jewish Community of the Democratic Republic of Congo
Moïse Rahmani
Translated by R. George Anticoni
- 463 Jewish Community in Egypt
Jeffrey S. Malka
- 467 Jews in Ethiopia
Shalva Weil
- 475 Jews in Kenya
Saul Issroff
- 477 Jews in Libya
Vivienne Roumani-Denn

- 481 Jewish Community in Morocco
Richard Gold
- 487 The Sephardi Jewish Community in North Morocco
Tito Benady
- 490 Jewish Community of Namibia
Richard Newman
- 492 Jews in Nigeria
Remy Ilona
- 493 Jews in South Africa
Saul Issroff
- 503 Jewish Community in Sudan
Jeffrey S. Malka
- 505 The Sudan Jewish Community According to the Community Register
Nahem Ilan
- 509 Jews in Tunisia
Judith Roumani
- 515 Jews in Uganda
Saul Issroff
- 516 Jews in Zambia
Saul Issroff
- 518 Jews in Zimbabwe
Saul Issroff with the assistance of Dave Bloom
- Australasia
- 521 Jews in Australia
Suzanne D. Rutland and Gary Eckstein
- 526 Sephardi Jews in Australia
Myer Samra
- 531 Conversion to Judaism in the Sydney Jewish Community
Raymond Apple
- 532 Jews in Fiji
Steve Hall
- 533 Jews in French Polynesia
Stephen Levine
- 534 Jews in New Zealand
Stephen Levine
- 542 Contributions of Jewish Individuals in New Zealand: 1840s to the Present
Leonard Bell
- North America
- 546 Jews in North America
M. Avrum Ehrlich
- 548 Jews in Canada
Avi Goldberg, Randal F. Schnoor, and Morton Weinfeld
- 553 Judeo-Portuguese in the Anglo-American Colonies
Joseph Abraham Levi
- 560 Sephardi and Middle Eastern Jews in the United States
Marc D. Angel
- 563 Jewish Women of the Early American West
Jeanee Abrams
- 566 Great American Jewish Thinkers and Their Attitudes toward Diaspora
S. Daniel Breslauer
- 571 The Jewish Diaspora in America: Social Integration, Political Liberalism, and Attachment to Homeland
Uzi Rebhun
- 592 American Jews and Radicalism
Gerald Sorin
- 597 American Jewry's Response to the Holocaust
Rafael Medoff
- 602 History of the Habad Movement in the United States
M. Avrum Ehrlich
- 608 Modern Jewish Orthodoxy in America
Chaim I. Waxman
- 613 Denomination and Jewish Identity in America
Chaim I. Waxman
- 615 Syrian Jews in New York
Sarina Roffé

- 620 Jewish Women's Contributions to Contemporary American and Jewish Life
Sylvia Barack Fishman
- 624 Jewish Renewal in America
Shaul Magid
- 629 Jewish Studies in American Universities
Judith R. Baskin
- 632 American Christian Attitudes to the Jewish Diaspora
Yaakov Ariel
- 635 American Zionist Activities and Organizations
Matt Silver
- 642 American Jews and the State of Israel
Chaim I. Waxman
- 645 The Portrayal of American Jews in Israeli Literature
Matt Silver
- Latin America and the Caribbean
- 650 Jews in the Caribbean and the Guianas
Mordechai Arbell
- 667 Jews in Central America
Mordechai Arbell
- 673 Jews in Mexico
Mauricio Lulka Pipco and Reneé Dayán-Shabot
- 682 History of Jewish Migration to Mexico
Adina Cimet
- 685 Contemporary Jewish Identity in Mexico
Adina Cimet
- 688 Jews in Latin America
Gilbert W. Merkx
- 695 Jewish Identity in Latin American Fiction
Lois Barr
- 700 Jewish Identity in Latin American Jewish Cinema
Darrell B. Lockhart
- 703 Jewish Studies as a Subject of Latin American Studies
Gilbert W. Merkx
- 705 Latin American Jewish Literature
Stephen A. Sadow
- 710 Jews in Argentina
M. Avrum Ehrlich
- 716 Jews in Brazil
Jeffrey Lesser
- 723 Brazil, Jews, and Transatlantic Trade
Joseph Abraham Levi
- 728 Jews in Peru
Carolyn Wolfenzon
- 735 Concept of the Jew in Peruvian Literature
Carolyn Wolfenzon
- 738 Jews in Suriname
Wieke Vink
- 741 Jews in Uruguay
Avram Hein
- 745 Jews in Venezuela
Carlos Colina
- Middle East
- 751 Jews in the Middle East
M. Avrum Ehrlich and David Straub
- 754 Israelites and Judeans in Assyria in Ancient Times
Ran Zadok
- 757 Judeans in Babylonia in Ancient Times
Ran Zadok
- 762 Jewish Leadership in the Babylonian Diaspora: Second–Sixth Centuries
Geoffrey Herman

- 767 Jews in Iran
Irena Vladimírsky
- 771 Jews in Iraq and Zionism
Esther Meir-Glitzenstein
- 776 Jews in the Ottoman Empire
Marc D. Angel
- 779 The Sabbatean Movement in the Ottoman Empire
M. Avrum Ehrlich
- 786 History of Jews in Syria
Sarina Roffé
- 793 Jews in Yemen
Barak Barfi and Yael Katzir
- Western Europe
- 801 Jews in Europe
M. Avrum Ehrlich
- 805 Jews in Austria
Shoshannah Zirkin
- 809 Overrepresentation of Jews in Vienna's Gymnasien
Steven Beller
- 812 Jews in Belgium
Shoshannah Zirkin
- 815 Holocaust Art in Belgium
Daniel Potteau
- 820 Jews in France
Ronald Schechter and Shoshannah Zirkin
- 832 Jewish Day School Education in French-Speaking Europe
Zehavit Gross
- 835 Jewish Identity in French Literature and Society in the Twentieth Century
Alan Astro
- 840 Jews in Germany
Frederick Ehrlich
- 844 Jews in Germany: 1848–1933
Peter Pulzer
- 848 Jews in Gibraltar
Tito Benady
- 851 The Jews of Gibraltar and the Development of Medical Practices
Lawrence Sawchuk
- 855 Jews in Greece
Frederick Ehrlich
- 857 History of the Jews of the Island of Rhodes
Marc D. Angel
- 860 Jewish Commerce in Salonica: 1881–1912
Orly C. Meron
- 865 Jews in Italy
Steve Hall and Shoshannah Zirkin
- 870 Jews in Milan: 1535–1597
Orly C. Meron
- 875 Portuguese Jews of the Diaspora: Italy and Beyond
Joseph Abraham Levi
- 883 Jews in Luxembourg
Shoshannah Zirkin
- 886 Jews in Malta
Tito Benady
- 887 Jews in the Netherlands
Shoshannah Zirkin
- 892 Jews in Portugal
Shoshannah Zirkin
- 895 Jews in Scotland
Nathan Abrams
- 900 Jews in Spain
Shoshannah Zirkin
- 905 Jews and Jewish Communities in Medieval Spain
Norman Roth
- 913 Relations between Jews and Muslims in Medieval Spain
Norman Roth
- 916 Jews in Minorca: 18th Century
Tito Benady

- 918 Jews in Switzerland
Avram Hein
- 922 Jews in the United Kingdom
William D. Rubinstein and
Avram Hein
- 930 History of Jewish Wealth in Britain
William D. Rubinstein
- 933 The British Chief Rabbinate
Raymond Apple
- 936 Influence of British Jewry on World Jewry Raymond Apple
- Central and Eastern Europe and Russia
- 938 Jews in Central Europe,
Eastern Europe, and Russia
M. Avrum Ehrlich
- 942 Jews in Albania
David Straub
- 946 Jews in Belarus
Alexander Friedman
- 953 Jews in Bulgaria
Frederick B. Chary, Emil Kalo,
Julina Dadova, and Robert Levi
- 968 Jews in the Czech Republic
Cooper Childers
- 971 Jews in Hungary
Jordan Auslander and
Frederick Ehrlich
- 979 Jews in the Republic of Macedonia
Scott Meadows
- 982 Jews in Poland
Vladimir Levin and Piotr Goldstein
- 988 Jews in Romania and Moldova
Frederick Ehrlich
- 992 Jews in Russia
Avram Hein
- 998 The Unique Relationship between Habad Hasidism and Russia
M. Avrum Ehrlich
- 1001 Jews in Slovakia
Norris Thigpen
- 1004 Jews in Slovenia
David Straub
- 1007 Jews in the Ukraine
Samuel Barnai
- Baltic States
- 1017 Jews in the Baltic States
David Straub
- 1019 Jews and Anti-Semitism in the Baltic States
Dov Levin
- 1025 Jews in Estonia
David Straub
- 1028 Jews in Latvia
David Straub
- 1034 Jews in Lithuania
Saul Issroff and Aubrey Newman
- 1040 History of Lithuanian Jewish Culture
Dovid Katz
- 1046 Vilnius as a Jewish City
Mordechai Zalkin
- Scandinavia
- 1050 Jews in Scandinavia
Mikael Tossavainen
- 1057 Intermarriage in Scandinavia
Lars Dencik
- 1062 Jews in Denmark
Bent Blüdnikow
- 1071 Jews in Finland
Svante Lundgren
- 1077 Jews in Iceland
Snorri G. Bergsson
- 1082 Jews in Norway
Irene Levin
- 1087 Jews in Sweden
Mikael Tossavainen
- Caucasus and Central Asia
- 1093 Jews in the Caucasus
Irena Vladimírsky

- 1097 Jews in Khazaria
Dan D. Y. Shapira
- 1104 Jews in Armenia
Irena Vladimirsky
- 1108 Jews in Ancient Armenia:
First Century BCE to Fifth Century CE
Aram Topchyan
- 1113 Jews in Medieval Armenia
Kevin A. Brook
- 1114 Jews in Azerbaijan
David Straub
- 1119 Jews in Georgia
Alex Mikaberidze
- 1122 Jews in Central Asia
David Straub
- 1129 Jews in Afghanistan
Irena Vladimirsky
- 1132 Jews in Kazakhstan
Irena Vladimirsky
- 1136 Jews in Kyrgyzstan
Irena Vladimirsky
- 1142 Jews in Tajikistan
David Straub
- 1146 Jews in Turkmenistan
Irena Vladimirsky
- 1149 Jews in Uzbekistan
David Straub and
Irena Vladimirsky
- East Asia
- 1155 Jews in China
M. Avrum Ehrlich
- 1160 Jews of Kaifeng, China
Noam Urbach
- 1167 Survey of Historical Jewish Personalities in China
M. Avrum Ehrlich
- 1172 Jews in Shanghai
Carl Hoffman and
M. Avrum Ehrlich
- 1176 Jews in Major Chinese Cities;
Beijing, Guangzhou, Shenzhen,
Macau, Jinan, Qingdao
M. Avrum Ehrlich
- 1182 Jews in Harbin
Jonathan Goldstein
- 1186 Jews in Hong Kong
Judy Green and Judy Diestal
- 1193 Jews in Taiwan
Don Shapiro
- 1196 Jews in Japan
Marvin Tokayer and Steve Hall
- India and Pakistan
- 1204 Jews in India
Shalva Weil
- 1213 Jewish–Indian Contacts over the Ages
Nathan Katz
- 1216 Bene-Israel and Baghdadi Jews
in India: Early 20th Century
Yulia Egorova
- 1218 The Benei Menashe of India
Myer Samra
- 1223 Jewish Parsis Relations in India and Pakistan
Rashna Singh
- 1225 Jews in Indian Public Life
Rashna Singh
- 1228 Jews in Pakistan
Shalva Weil
- 1230 The Pathans of Pakistan and
Afghanistan and Their
Israelite Status
Shalva Weil
- Southeast Asia
- 1232 Jews in Southeast Asia
Jonathan Goldstein
- 1235 Jews in Indonesia
Jonathan Goldstein
- 1240 Jews in Malaysia
Jonathan Goldstein
- 1240 Jews in Myanmar
Jonathan Goldstein
- 1243 Jews in the Philippines
Jonathan Goldstein
- 1247 Jews in Singapore
Jonathan Goldstein

1250 Jews in Thailand
Jonathan Goldstein

Glossary

Index

About the Editor

Editorial Board and Staff

Editor

Professor M. Avrum Ehrlich
Centre for Judaic and Inter-Religious Studies
School of Philosophy and Sociology
Shandong University, Jinan, China

Editorial Advisory Board

Mr. Amotz Asa-El
Professor Alan Crown, AM
Professor Sergio Della-Pergola
Professor Frederick Ehrlich, OAM
Sir Martin Gilbert
Mr. Isi Leibler
Dr. Uzi Rebhun
Professor Jehuda Reinharz
Professor Jonathan Sarna
Mr. Nathan Sharansky
Professor Gabriel Sheffer
Professor Fu Youde

Regional Coordinators

Professor Jonathan Goldstein
(Southeast Asia)
Dr. Saul Issroff (Africa)
Professor Suzanne Rutland
(Australia)
David Straub (Central Asia, the Caucasus, and the Baltic States)

Editorial Staff

Liora Zhangcan
David Straub
Steve Hall

Research Assistants

Steve Hall
Benjamin Libin
Sarah Liyating
Sun Chaoying

Contributors

Jeanee Abrams	Aliza Cohen-Mushlin	Saul Issroff
Nathan Abrams	Carlos Colina	Emil Kalo
Esperanza Alfonso	Gerald Cromer	Marion Kaplan
Mary Altabev	Alan D. Crown	Dovid Katz
Marc D. Angel	Marianne Dacy	Nathan Katz
R. George Anticoni	Julina Dadova	Yael Katzir
Raymond Apple	Reneé Dayán-Shabot	Arnie Keogh
Mordechai Arbell	Sergio Della-Pergola	Yitzchak Kerem
Edrel Arie	Lars Dencik	Edward Kessler
Yaakov Ariel	Judy Diestal	Mark Kligman
Amotz Asa-El	Barbara Dietz	Edwin H. Kolodny
Fred Astren	Gary Eckstein	Thomas A. Kolsky
Alan Astro	Marsha Bryan Edelman	Ruth Lamdan
Jordan Auslander	Yulia Egorova	Jeffrey Lesser
Racheline Barda	Frederick Ehrlich	Joseph Abraham Levi
Barak Barfi	M. Avrum Ehrlich	Robert Levi
Samuel Barnai	Ehav Eliyahu	Dov Levin
Lois Barr	Carl D. Evans	Irene Levin
Judith R. Baskin	Shmuel Feiner	Vladimir Levin
Leonard Bell	Sylvia Barack Fishman	Stephen Levine
Steven Beller	Ellen Frankel	Julia R. Lieberman
Tito Benady	Alexander Friedman	David G. Littman
Danny Ben-Moshe	Mark H. Gelber	Darrell B. Lockhart
Menachem Ben-Sasson	Richard Gold	Svante Lundgren
Klaus L. Berghahn	Avi Goldberg	Shaul Magid
Snorri G. Bergsson	Jonathan Goldstein	Jeffrey S. Malka
Dave Bloom	Piotr Goldstein	Timothy Andrew McCaffrey
Bent Blüdnikow	Judy Green	Scott Meadows
Mike Boyington	Zehavit Gross	Rafael Medoff
S. Daniel Breslauer	Steve Hall	Esther Meir-Glitzenstein
Kevin A. Brook	Dieter J. Hecht	Sophia Menache
David M. Bunis	Avram Hein	Gilbert W. Merx
Carol S. Castiel	Geoffrey Herman	Orly C. Meron
Frederick B. Chary	Frank Heynick	Yael Ehrenpreis Meyer
Cooper Childers	Carl Hoffman	Alex Mikaberidze
Adina Cimet	Nahem Ilan	Gloria Mound
Judith R. Cohen	Remy Ilona	John Myhill

Aubrey Newman	Myer Samra	Aram Topchyan
Richard Newman	Lawrence Sawchuk	Mikael Tossavainen
Anita Waingort Novinsky	Ronald Schechter	Daphne Tsimhoni
Mauricio Lulka Pipco	Randal F. Schnoor	Noam Urbach
Daniel Potteau	Frederick Schweitzer	Martina Urban
Peter Pulzer	Eliezer Segal	Wieke Vink
Moïse Rahmani	Robert M. Seltzer	Irena Vladimirsky
Uzi Rebhun	Dan D. Y. Shapira	Chaim I. Waxman
Ritchie Robertson	Don Shapiro	Shalva Weil
Sarina Roffé	Gabriel Sheffer	Morton Weinfeld
Norman Roth	Aliza Shenhar	Howard K. Wettstein
Judith Roumani	Moshe Silberhaft	Paul Wexler
Vivienne Roumani-Denn	Matt Silver	Carolyn Wolfenzon
William D. Rubinstein	Rashna Singh	Bat Ye'or
David J. Rudolph	Gerald Sorin	Ran Zadok
Suzanne D. Rutland	David Straub	Mordechai Zalkin
Sallyann Sack	Norris Thigpen	Shoshannah Zirkin
Stephen A. Sadow	Gary A. Tobin	Joel Zlotogora
Alison Salvesen	Marvin Tokayer	Ghilad Zuckermann

Preface

Accounting for the remarkable sojourning of the Jews far and wide to distant countries and islands and through countless transformations, incarnations, and ordeals over 2,500 years is not simple. It constitutes an awesome responsibility, invariably leading any editor to fall short of his duties. This Encyclopedia of the Jewish Diaspora brings together a broad range of material from many disciplines that should be highly informative to students and scholars alike.

The encyclopedia is structured in a twofold way. On the one hand, it provides general overviews of regions and communities of Jews around the world, with historical chronologies, major events, community organizations, and statistics; but it also provides a second layer of in-depth analysis and focused articles on interesting themes and phenomena related to specific regions and interesting themes ranging from music to language, fused religious identities, sociology, science, humanities, history, theology, politics, and so on.

The first volume brings together basic themes and phenomena in Jewish life as well as some of the foremost scholars in their fields to address them. This invaluable collection of essays provides enough diversity and depth to endow student and scholar alike with enough material to grasp the complexity of the Jewish Diaspora.

The second and third volumes contain surveys of many of the Jewish communities that have existed or that do exist in the world today. Many of the authors are the leading scholars on these regions and communities, and although some of the entries provide only superficial overviews, they present an important basic picture of a region's Jewry. Yet some of the lesser-known regions are covered more thoroughly, and in some cases this work brings together original and otherwise unpublished material. The bibliographies refer interested readers to more sources.

The editorial policy was to avoid duplication with other encyclopedias and avoid rehashing the mass of existing literature on well-researched and readily available subjects relating to Diaspora regions and communities. Hence, Western and Eastern European Jewish communities were given fewer words than regions in the Caucasus or Southeast Asia. Our policy was to provide briefer overviews and references where the literature was easily available, while covering subjects in more detail where the literature was harder to access and more esoteric. Scattered communities in East, Southeast, and Central Asia; India; Caucasus; Africa; Scandinavia; and Latin America, as well as obscure phenomena relating to the Jewish Diaspora, mixed Jewish identities, and enigmatic themes, have been more enthusiastically covered to illuminate the rare and eclectic elements of exilic existence. However, the more mainstay Jewish communities have also been covered to ensure uniformity and consistency.

It is my wish through this work to relay the almost surreal and fantastic journeys of the Jewish people winding through time and over distances and how, without their understanding, they became a beacon for so many experiences and a microcosm of so much to be understood. It is my hope that these articles and ideas serve as a core collection for those seeking insight into the dynamics of the Diaspora. It is my wish for this collection to serve as a yavneaic foundation for the future of Jewish studies and thought. I apologize to the reader and to the memory of such places for the many regions and communities in the past and present that were not mentioned in this work. I eagerly invite readers to share with me their insights and knowledge of Diaspora regions and events, ideas, and insights in preparation for future editions.

M. AVRUM EHRLICH, Editor
Professor of Jewish Thought, Texts, and Culture
Centre for Judaic and Inter-Religious Studies
School of Philosophy and Sociology
Shandong University, Jinan, China

Immigration from Eastern Europe to the United States, 1881–1910

Between 1881 and 1910, a total of 1,562,800 Jews entered the United States from Eastern Europe.

- Principal pogroms, 1881–1883 ●
- Principal pogroms, 1902–1905 ○
- Regions of highest emigration ▨
- Main ports of departure ■
- European frontiers, 1900 - - -

Jews Murdered between 1 September 1939 and 7 May 1945

Introduction

The Need and Usefulness of Diaspora Studies

Gabriel (Gabi) Sheffer

---

The study of the diaspora phenomenon in general, and of specific diasporas, including the Jewish Diaspora, in particular, is needed and useful for a number of closely intertwined reasons. (For a comprehensive discussion of this and other related issues, see Sheffer 2006.) Among the more pertinent reasons for studying the phenomenon and its usefulness are the following: first, the ongoing growth of the number and size of such entities; second, the almost mind-boggling capability of these inherently endangered entities to overcome tremendous hardships; third, the historical and current impressive cultural, social, political, and economic significance and contributions of these entities to homelands, host lands, and the international system; fourth, the great complexity of this human phenomenon, the comprehension of which can contribute to a better understanding of past and current intricate experiences of large groups of “others”; fifth, the growing impact of diasporas on both peaceful and turbulent processes, including terrorism, all over the world; and sixth, the contribution a better understanding of the diasporic phenomenon might make to the prevention of holocausts and disasters that again may be inflicted on such entities, on the one hand, and to the greater appreciation of these entities, on the other hand.

Until the late 20th century, wherever possible, and particularly whenever their physical appearance, mores, habits, and linguistic proficiency permitted, many members of such entities did not identify as belonging to diasporas. They tried hard to minimize the importance of their contacts with their countries of origin/homelands, and they did not publicize their membership in organizations serving these entities and homelands. Such patterns of behavior were related to a widespread prevalent desire among members of these groups to assimilate, acculturate, or fully integrate into their host societies.

At the same time, whether deliberately or not, both democratic and non-democratic host societies and governments largely ignored most of these diasporas. In certain cases, such host societies and governments doubted the endurance capability of diasporas in general and of the diasporic entities that resided within their boundaries in particular. These societies and governments minimized the cultural, social, political, and economic vitality, endurance, and significance of the diasporas. Similarly, they ignored the various roles these diasporas played in host societies and their contributions to the host societies. The host societies, again either consciously or unconsciously, also overlooked the wider domestic, regional, and global political implications of the existence of such diasporas in their midst. Yet, although various host societies and governments viewed ethnonational diasporas as a marginal and temporary phenomenon, they regarded them as actually and potentially menacing and therefore undesirable. Consequently, host societies and governments applied social, political, and economic pressures on immigrants who were allowed to permanently settle in these countries. The purposes of those pressures were to drive immigrants to assimilate; to fully accept all prevailing social, political, and economic norms; to completely integrate into these host societies; or to leave.

Not only did host societies and governments hold such diminutive views about the endurance of diasporas and demonstrate such rancorous attitudes toward them, but homeland societies and governments also demonstrated either indifferent or ambiguous attitudes toward “their” diasporas. Because social and political research usually follows “real world” developments, it was not entirely surprising that until the 1970s many academics also ignored the diasporic phenomenon, with the exception of a few focused studies, mainly on the identity of specific diasporas, lobbying on behalf of their homelands and on their successful or failed attempts at assimilation and integration in host countries .

Most observers were inclined to equate ethnic diasporism only with the Jewish dispersal and, in line with Jewish tradition, saw it as a state of exile. In this vein, they regarded the Jewish Diaspora either as sui generis, that is, a marginal and a disappearing social phenomenon, or as a model for all other diasporas. These views were so common that they were reflected in the diaspora entries in most important dictionaries, encyclopedias, and scholarly works in this field. Consequently, until the late 1980s, only scant attention was given to the fact that dispersed ethnonational communities constitute an indubitable reality. In fact, like other issues pertaining to ethnicity and ethnic groups, ethnonational diasporism was regarded unworthy of serious consideration and in-depth study (Armstrong 1976). Moreover, certain analyses of the phenomenon were predicated on normative assumptions based on nationalist, liberal, socialist, and Marxist ideologies. The result was that some observers not only predicted the unavoidable gradual disappearance of such groups but also went as far as prescribing either the assimilation of their members or the return to their homelands. Basing themselves on the results of purportedly sound theoretical, analytical, and empirical grounds, other scholars considered the issue of ethnonational diasporism as uninteresting.

These analyses, predictions, and prescriptions notwithstanding, as already noted, over the past two decades the total number of established diasporas and their members have increased conspicuously. Moreover, individuals and families belonging to these ethnonational entities have altered their previous assimilationist, full integrationist, or acculturationist proclivities. Increasingly, Palestinians, Kurds, Turks, Moroccans, Croats, Poles, and many others who permanently reside outside their homelands do not conceal their ethnonational origins and affiliations. And because of their growing self-confidence and assertiveness, many diasporans, not only first, second, and third generations, proudly maintain their ethnonational identity, uphold their homeland citizenship, openly identify as members of diasporic organizations, and are far from being reluctant to publicly act on behalf of their homelands and dispersed kinsmen.

Again, not entirely surprisingly in view of these developments, more intellectuals, writers, journalists, and politicians have also become aware of the phenomenon and acknowledge the permanency of diasporic phenomenon. Some observers even admit the positive cultural and economic contributions diasporas make to host societies. In any case, these new dispositions further enhance processes whereby analysts of such developments are becoming more aware of the enormous ethnic pluralism and of the existence of diasporas. In short, diasporas are increasingly included in the pluralist or multicultural conceptual analytical frameworks intended to deal with this phenomenon and its various implications. It is important to note that to an extent diaspora members contribute to these new trends.

The newly found confidence and assertiveness among members of diasporas, on the one hand, and greater recognition of the phenomenon and tolerance toward diaspora members on the part of host governments and society, on the other, have generated animated discussions among politicians, laypeople, and, particularly, academics. These debates have been conducted in the context of the general deliberations about transnationalism, nationalism, and ethnicity, or in the context of specific diasporism and diasporas.

Thus, as previously mentioned, although until the mid-1980s only a few analytical and theoretical publications focused on the diasporic phenomenon, since then, the study of ethnic diasporism and diasporas has spectacularly proliferated. Now books, articles, and studies on this and related issues are abundant. The numerous references to “diasporism” and “diasporas” in recent publications on ethnography, anthropology, ethnicity, sociology, political theory, comparative politics, international relations, globalization, and transnationalism, as well as the numerous seminars, conferences, study groups, and grants offered by governments, municipalities, universities, and research institutes, all attest to the fact that the interest in these groups is growing.

Nevertheless, despite the current increased attention given to ethnonational diasporas, the study of these groups is still in its early stages. In this vein, the dramatic growth of diasporas and the intensity of their activities within the context of the current chaotic world order—which has been partly attributed to ethnic and diasporic unrest (Brown 1996; Gurr 2000)—warrants additional theoretical and comparative investigation as well as explication, clarification, and explanation.

The need for further in-depth studies of diasporism and diasporas is also underlined by the attitudinal and practical change toward diaspora politics. This is coupled by new perspectives on certain interrelated issues that substantially affect diasporas. Among these are the simultaneous processes of globalization, regionalization, localization, dissipation of nationalism, the weakening of both the “nation-state” and the “state,” increasing international migration, migration cycles, and the role of religion and religious fundamentalism in the survival and revival of ethnic minorities and diasporas (Smith 1999).

These new trends have resulted in the recognized need for a strong emphasis on the study of the anthropological, cultural, social, and economic aspects of ethnicity in general and diasporas in particular. However, as noted, there is a noticeable deficit of in-depth and comprehensive theoretical and comparative studies and discussion of various dimensions of the diasporic phenomenon.

The fact that ethnonational diasporas exist and function in highly intricate environments raises multiple questions, some of which are discussed in the relevant literature: Is the ethnonational diasporic phenomenon perennial or modern? Has the nature of ethnonational diasporas changed over the last two centuries? Is the identity of diaspora members of an essentialist, instrumental, or constructed nature? What are the roles of collectives, individuals, and environmental factors in the formation, persistence, and behavior of diasporas? What are the main characteristics of contemporary ethnonational diasporas? Are all diasporas of the same type? Are these stable and homogenous or unsteady and hybrid formations? What are the organizational structures of diasporas, and what strategies and tactics do they use? What are the functions of these organizations and their contributions to homelands, host countries, and the emerging global society? Can diasporas inflict substantial damages on their hosts and homelands? And finally, are these groups precursors of postmodern, postnational, and transstate social and political systems?

Some authors have argued that short definitions are not sufficient (Cohen 1997; Vertovec 1997; Safran 1999; Braziel and Mannur 2003) and some writers agree about the need for profiles of diasporas. The main elements of such a profile, which would provide some answers to the aforementioned questions, are specified here. Ethnonational diasporism and diasporas do not constitute a recent modern phenomenon. Rather, as the Jewish, Indian, Chinese, and Armenian diasporas demonstrate, diasporism is a perennial phenomenon. An essential aspect of this phenomenon is the endless cultural, social, economic, and especially political struggles of these dispersed ethnic groups and connections with their homelands and other dispersed groups of the same nation. Though there is an ongoing debate about the nature of these entities, partly because of recent developments in the study of the sociobiological origins of ethnic groups, there is a renewed awareness and understanding that these are neither purely imagined nor utterly constructed communities. This is due to the fact that their identities are intricate combinations of primordial, psychological/mythical, and instrumental elements. It is a fact that over time the cultural and social identities of these entities undergo certain adaptations to changing circumstances in both their host lands and homelands, but basic elements in their ethnonational identity remain intact. Diasporas struggle to survive while they do their utmost to feel at home in their host countries, which in many instances demonstrate hostility toward them. And in fact, they survive despite an inherent ambiguity shown toward them by their homelands, also. To survive, diasporas must organize and conduct activities on a number of levels. Such organization raises questions about their loyalties, especially vis-à-vis their homeland.

Taking all these characteristics together, it seems that ethnonational diasporas, including the Jewish Diaspora, which fits the profile, are indeed the precursors of postmodern transstate and transnational social and political entities. In this respect, though they use advanced modes of communications, they are far from being virtual transnational communities. Any attempt to portray them as such is missing the point. Ethnonational diasporas are bona fide entities, as viable as other ethnic minorities.

However, because ethnonational diasporas find themselves living under social and political conditions that are more hostile and difficult than those faced by some other ethnic minorities, theoretically, they represent the extreme cases of the entire ethnic phenomenon. Hence, their systematic study can and should provide answers to some vexing general questions, such as whether ethnicity is an invented or authentic phenomenon, whether ethnic identity is inherent or conditional on environmental factors, whether or not it is a permanent feature of postmodern life, and whether or not adequate strategies exist that could reduce the tensions and conflicts associated with these groups.

To provide even more insightful answers to both the analytical and practical questions regarding the future of diasporism and diasporas, some additional issues must be studied. These studies should be conducted within the clusters set forth as follows.

The first cluster of future studies should begin by reexamining the explanatory power of the basic distinctions between the various types of diasporas, that is, transnational and transstate (Miles and Sheffer 1998); stateless and state-linked; and historical, modern, and incipient. Because the number of diasporas is still growing, and because they develop gradually, special attention should be given to incipient diasporas. Monitoring the development of these groups systematically may produce significant information about ethnicity in general.

The second cluster should focus on the contradictory demographic trends—that is, on the growing size and numbers of diasporas on the one hand, and assimilation and integration trends on the other hand. In this context, there is a need not only for studies of specific ethnic diasporas but also for further comparative studies. This is because the comparative study of the phenomenon is still in its initial phase. As in other fields of academic studies, without the development of such a perspective it will be hard to construct a sound theory of diasporic existence.

It should be added that the definitional borderline between, on the one hand, individuals and groups of tourists, international migrants, guest workers, asylum seekers, and refugees who reside in host countries for long periods and, on the other hand, permanent diasporas, is still blurred. This ambiguity should be clarified for the sake of comparative studies of diaspora formation. When this is done it should be remembered that, for profound emotional, political, and legal reasons, the duration that transient individuals and groups can and wish to remain in host countries before they finally make a choice about their future, or are actually allowed to settle down, is variable and depends on both the host governments and the migrants.

The third cluster of future research should tackle the question of the point at which migrants form new diasporas or join existing ones. Again, the main reason for the ambiguity in this respect is connected to other sensitive issues pertaining to the migration and settlement of ethnic groups. The need to clarify this aspect has not only major theoretical but also practical implications—conceptual and empirical work in this direction will generate a better understanding, especially, of the motivations of individuals and groups to undertake the heavy burdens of diasporic existence. Such studies are also necessary to facilitate assessments of the potential for further ongoing development of diasporas. But, rather than using legal definitions, such as the date of application for or attainment of citizenship, or using psychological tests, one should apply individual and collective choice models to this crucial issue in the life cycle of every migrant, as well as in the development and survival of diaspora communities.

More particularly, this is needed because in the debate over the origins and nature of ethnicity in general, and of ethnonational diasporas in particular, the element of autonomous choice by individuals, families, and groups has largely been overlooked. It is suggested that the working hypothesis here should be that, while in certain pluralist societies it is relatively easy to defect from ethnonational diasporas, to integrate, and sometimes to assimilate, it is almost impossible for outsiders to fully assimilate into such societies, especially when these diasporans maintain special physical markers and behavioral patterns.

The fourth cluster of research and studies should deal with the main theoretical issue that still requires further exploration. The question is why—despite individual and collective hardships, multiple crosscutting and frequently contradictory forces, such as culturally assimilationist versus tolerant-pluralist, socially absorptive versus xenophobic, politically conflictual versus accommodationist, economically equalizing versus discriminatory, as well as the effects of modernization, mass communication, demographic inferiority, and territorial concentration or dispersal, which are at work in the international arena as well as in host countries' domestic affairs—members of ethnic diasporas maintain their identity, connections with their homelands, patterns of organization, and determination to maintain a certain degree of freedom of collective action?

Here, the applicability of available theoretical explanations about the elusive issue of ethnogenesis and the revival of ethnic minorities, namely, the primordialist, cultural/ideological conflict, economic modernization, rational choice, conflict migration, migration orders and crises, and imagined communities, all should be reconsidered and reevaluated. For it seems that none of such explanations per se are sufficient to unravel the vexing riddles of the revival of historical diasporas, the reorganization of modern diasporas, the awakening of dormant diasporas, and the establishment of new diasporas. It appears that the most promising avenue toward a theory is to combine the cultural-symbolic and personal and collective choice approaches with a focus on elite/grassroots interactive behavior.

The fifth cluster should include further analyses of the fundamental reasons for the adoption of and changes in the main strategies diaspora communities pursue in their host countries to ensure their continued existence. These can be arranged on a spectrum that includes assimilation, integration, communalism, corporatism, autonomism, separation, and irredentism. A better understanding of the reasons for their adoption is significant because the type of strategy adopted by a diaspora indicates how it perceives its environments and, in turn, its relations not only with host society and government but also with homeland and other dispersed segments of the same nation. In this context, it should be ascertained if indeed the strategy of full assimilation into their respective host societies has become less fashionable among both older and newer diasporas. A reexamination of this factor should begin with the working hypothesis that the motivations and reasons for migrating out of the homeland are not decisive in determining the nature of the community that is later established in the host country. It should also be considered further whether the tendencies to preserve the ethnonational identity and form organized entities that maintain close ties with the homeland do indeed stem from growing realization among migrants that ethnic pluralism is a given; that an increased tolerance toward more moderate forms of ethnic existence and organization has recently emerged, especially in some Western countries; and that a continued separation between host societies and diasporas still prevails in non-democratic countries.

The critical question in this respect is whether, indeed, most diasporas rationally choose communalism or corporatism as their preferred strategy. The assumption that should be tested here is that the choice of communalism as the main strategy has become almost universal among state-linked diasporas.

The sixth cluster of studies should be devoted to the question regarding diasporas' adoption and change of strategy, which has been almost totally ignored. It concerns the contagion factor, which is caused by global and international trends among other ethnic minorities, or ethnonational diasporas, or by influences originating in the homeland. It should be seen to what extent the intricate relations between diasporas, host countries, homelands, and other international actors affect the choices of these strategies.

This observation raises some further profound theoretical questions: Do these trilateral and sometimes four- and five-sided networks create transstate political systems that exist alongside and complement transnational organizations, such as regional trading blocs, international defense organizations, and so on? And, even more important, what is the relationship between the growing weakness of the nation-state and room for political maneuvering by the diaspora?

The final cluster of studies should pertain to diaspora-homeland relations. The assumption that should be reexamined is that whereas in the relations between host countries and diasporas tension and conflict are more frequently caused by the attitudes and actions of the latter, in diaspora-homeland relations the former are usually responsible for friction. Even though the basic mutual wish of the homeland and its diaspora to maintain close relations is a sine qua non, the actual situation should be thoroughly reexamined, because it is often far from idyllic. In fact, considerable tensions are common here, caused by perceptions held by most homeland leaders that the raison d'être of their diasporas is to maintain constant contact with the old country, express their unswerving loyalty, and provide the homeland with services in host countries, particularly regarding issues of defense.

Scholarly work on these various aspects is in progress. Clearly, those who study diasporas will be challenged by the still-existing and very long and rich agenda of definitional, theoretical, analytical, and comparative issues that were only partly mentioned here. But a more profound exploration of these issues will result in a better conception of the place and role of ethnonational diasporas as precursors of globalized political systems that are likely to occupy a central place in the 21st century.

Selected Bibliography

- Armstrong, J. 1976. "Mobilized and Proletarian Diasporas." American Political Science Review 70 (2): 393–408.
- Brazier, J., and A. Mannur, eds. 2003. Theorizing Diasporas. A Reader. Oxford, UK: Blackwell Publishing.
- Brown, M. 1996. The International Dimensions of Internal Conflict. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press.
- Cohen, R. 1997. Global Diasporas. London: University College London Press.
- Gurr, T. 2000. Peoples Versus States. Minorities at Risk in the New Century. Washington, DC: The United States Institute of Peace Press.
- Miles, W., and G. Sheffer. 1998. "Francophone and Zionism: A Comparative Study of Transnationalism and Trans-statism." Diaspora 7 (2): 119–148.
- Safran, W. 1999. "Comparing Diasporas: A Review Essay." Diaspora 8 (3): 255–292.
- Sheffer, G., ed. 2006. Diaspora Politics: At Home Abroad. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Smith, A. 1999. "Ethnic Elections and National Destiny: Some Religious Origins of Nationalist Ideals." Nations and Nationalism 5 (3): 331–356.
- Vertovec, S. 1997. "Three Meanings of Diaspora." Diaspora 6 (3): 277–297.

Diaspora Themes

The Concept of Diaspora in Biblical Literature

Carl D. Evans

---

The deportations of Jews to Babylonia at the beginning of the sixth century BCE created the Diaspora that defines much of the Biblical story. Biblical writers and prophets expressed a variety of views as they struggled to come to terms with the events that divided the Jewish people between those in the homeland and those in exile. They agreed, however, that the exile did not break the bond of the Diaspora Jews to the homeland.

The word “diaspora” enters the Jewish lexicon for the first time in the Septuagint (the Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible) where it is used to translate a variety of Hebrew terms. The Septuagint’s translators used the term without giving an explicit historical reference, but it is clear they had the Babylonian exile in mind.

The Bible’s ideas about Diaspora are framed by the familiar pattern of exile and return. In fact, the only two occurrences of “diaspora” in the Septuagint’s version of the Torah conform to this pattern: in Deuteronomy 28:25 the Israelites are warned that if they do not observe the commandments given by God, “the Lord will give them up . . . and they will be a ‘diaspora’ in all the kingdoms of the earth”; and in Deuteronomy 30:4 they are promised that the Lord will gather them from their “diaspora” if they return to the Lord.

The Babylonian conquest and related deportations created a major crisis for the Jews. For centuries, from the time of Abraham, they believed their homeland had been promised to them by God (Genesis 12:1–4). The Babylonian capture of their land and the deportations left them wondering what had gone wrong.

The dominant Biblical view is that the catastrophe was God’s judgment on the sins of the people. Jeremiah, Ezekiel, writers of the Torah, and others followed this line of interpretation, although they did not always agree on the nature of the sins that had provoked the divine wrath.

There were alternative interpretations, however. The author of Psalm 44 describes a situation of dispersion (vv. 10–17, esp. v. 12) and charges: “All this has come upon us, yet we have not forgotten You, or been false to Your covenant. . . . It is for Your sake that we are slain all day long, that we are regarded as sheep to be slaughtered” (vv. 18, 23). The Jewish refugees in Egypt, who fled their homeland at the time of the Babylonian invasions, had still another interpretation: the catastrophe had come about because they had stopped making offerings to the Queen of Heaven (Jeremiah 44:15–19), apparently an allusion to Josiah’s religious reform that occurred in the late monarchic period.

The exilic redactor of 2 Kings attributes the catastrophe to the sins of Manasseh, claiming that Manasseh was one of the worst kings ever to rule Judah. “All this befell Judah at the command of the Lord, who banished [them] from His presence because of all the sins that Manasseh had committed” (2 Kings 24:3–4).

The Chronicler gives another explanation. He attributes the exile to the nonobservance of the Sabbath year (see Leviticus 25:2–6) and anticipates a 70-year period of exile “until the land paid back its sabbaths” (2 Chronicles 36:21).

Despite the deportations to Babylonia and emigration to Egypt, a significant population remained in the homeland. One of their communal laments is preserved in the book of Lamentations: “our heritage has passed to aliens, our homes to strangers” (5:2). The lament ends with the plea: “Take us back, O Lord, to Yourself, and let us come back; renew our days as of old!” (5:21).

Both Jeremiah and Ezekiel believed the future lay with those in exile. To Jeremiah the Diaspora Jews were the “good figs” and those left in the land were the “bad figs” (Jeremiah 24). Ezekiel maintained that because of religious apostasy at the Jerusalem temple the glory of the Lord had left the temple and the homeland to be with the exiles in Babylonia. The belief that God was present with the exiles was shared by Ezekiel, Jeremiah, and other prophets and writers. It was also shared by the exiles, even though many still longed for the homeland and asked: “How can we sing a song of the Lord on alien soil?” (Psalm 137:4).

Around 540 BCE, an anonymous prophet of the exile announced that a new day had dawned. This prophet, whose words are preserved in chapters 40–55 of the book of Isaiah and often referred to as Deutero-Isaiah, declared that Jerusalem’s “term of service is over, that her iniquity is expiated; for she has received at the hand of the Lord double for all her sins” (Isaiah 40:2). The occasion for the announcement was the rise to power of the Persian king Cyrus. Cyrus gained control of the Babylonian empire, captured Babylon itself, and issued a decree that allowed the Diaspora Jews to return home and rebuild the temple. According to the book of Ezra, Jews who chose to stay in Babylonia could support the project financially (Ezra 1:2–4). Some Jews did repatriate, but many chose to remain in the Diaspora.

Over the next century repatriated Jews rebuilt the Temple and eventually restored the city of Jerusalem. Their work of restoration was slowed, however, by the devastation wrought by the Babylonians and by depressed economic conditions in the homeland. Another version of Cyrus’s decree, purportedly recovered some years later during Darius’s reign, states that the expenses of rebuilding the Temple would be paid by the Persian palace (Ezra 6:1–5).

A generation passed before the repatriated Jews completed work on the temple. Sheshbazzar, one of the earliest returnees, whom Cyrus had appointed governor, laid the foundations of the temple but further construction was delayed (Ezra 5:16). The prophets Haggai and Zechariah were successful in encouraging the people, and their generation’s leaders, Zerubbabel and Joshua, the son of Jehozadak, to complete the work. It was done during the years 520–515 BCE.

The restoration was also hindered by division within the community. The returnees attributed their difficulty to “fear of the peoples of the land” (Ezra 3:3) and “adversaries of Judah and Benjamin” (Ezra 4:1). The latter group claimed to be descendants of peoples brought into the region by the Assyrian king Esharhaddon.

The book of Ezra also claims that others were brought into the region by “Osnappar” (Ezra 4:10; probably Assurbanipal). According to 2 Kings, an Assyrian king, probably Sargon II, had settled non-Israelites in “the towns of Samaria” (17:24–26). The descendants of the resettled people claimed the right to help with the reconstruction because “we too worship your God,” but their offer of assistance was rejected by the returnees (Ezra 4:3).

Many of the tensions between the returned exiles and the peoples of the land were based on conflicting notions of Jewish identity. Ezra’s officials charged that the returnees had not separated themselves from the peoples of the land whose “abhorrent” practices they likened to those of the indigenous peoples (Ezra 9:1). The returnees had taken “foreign” wives from among the peoples of the land, a practice that Ezra portrayed as a continuation of the “iniquities” that had led to the exile in the first place (Ezra 9:7). Ezra ordered the men to divorce their foreign wives and the women and their children were expelled from the community. For Ezra, the true Israel was identified with the repatriated community.

The views set forth in Isaiah 56 provide a sharp contrast. This text, which probably comes from the same period as Ezra, affirms that Sabbath observance and covenant fidelity are sufficient to form Jewish identity. “As for the foreigners who attach themselves to the Lord, to minister to Him, and to love the name of the Lord, to be His servants—all who keep the Sabbath and do not profane it, and who hold fast My covenant—I will bring them to My sacred mount and let them rejoice in My house of prayer. Their burnt offerings and sacrifices shall be welcome on My altar; for My House shall be called a house of prayer for all peoples” (vv. 6–7). The welcome to foreigners in Isaiah 56 contrasts also with Deuteronomy’s exclusion of Ammonites and Moabites from the congregation of the Lord (23:4–7).

Thus, struggles over how Jewish identity should be defined, over who was a member of the community and who was not, and over the terms, if any, by which the outsider could become an insider caused divisions within the postexilic community. Different individuals and groups espoused a variety of views as they tried to come to terms with the demographic and religious changes that the exile and return had created.

The biblical writings give little insight into the situation of Jews who chose to remain in the Diaspora. Most of them may have fared well. Jeremiah, after all, had urged the exiles to put down roots: “Build houses and live in them, plant gardens and eat their fruit. Take wives and beget sons and daughters; and take wives for your sons, and give your daughters to husbands, that they may bear sons and daughters. Multiply there, do not decrease. And seek the welfare of the city to which I have exiled you and pray to the Lord in its behalf; for in its prosperity you shall prosper” (Jeremiah 29:5–7).

Many Jews heeded Jeremiah’s advice and chose to stay in Babylonia when the opportunity came to return home. The Murashu archive, found at the Babylonian city of Nippur, gives a glimpse into the successful banking enterprise of one Jewish family. The personal names in the archive show that the Murashu family had extensive dealings with both Jews and non-Jews, and that the Jews had become well integrated into Babylonian society by the fifth century BCE.

Jeremiah mentions several communities of Jews living in Egypt in the sixth century BCE (Jeremiah 44:1), which would have been in addition to the community at Elephantine on the upper Nile. The Jews at Elephantine had their own temple and followed syncretistic worship practices. Jeremiah probably had the former communities in mind when he lumped together “those who are living in the land of Egypt” and those remaining in the homeland, including Zedekiah, the last Judean king, and likened them all to bad figs (Jeremiah 24:8).

Intellectual wrestling with the circumstances that created the Diaspora had produced an array of theological responses, but biblical prophets and writers held fast to the notion that the homeland was central to Jewish identity and destiny for Jews everywhere. Diaspora Jews, no less than Jews in the homeland, maintained close ties to the Land of Israel, a relationship expressed in the Bible’s concluding exhortation: “Any one of you of all His people, the Lord his God be with him and let him go up [to Jerusalem]” (2 Chronicles 36:23).

Selected Bibliography

- Ackroyd, Peter R. 1968. Exile and Restoration: A Study of Hebrew Thought of the Sixth Century B.C. Philadelphia: Westminster Press.
- Albertz, Rainer. 2003. Israel in Exile: The History and Literature of the Sixth Century B.C.E. Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature.
- Baron, Salo W. 1958. A Social and Religious History of the Jews. Vol. 1, 2nd ed. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Oded, Bustenay. 1977. “Judah and the Exile.” In Israelite and Judean History, edited by John H. Hayes and J. Maxwell Miller, 435–488. Philadelphia: Westminster Press.
- Smith, Daniel L. 1989. The Religion of the Landless: The Social Context of the Babylonian Exile. Bloomington, IN: Meyer-Stone Books.

The Concept of Diaspora in Talmudic Thought

Eliezer Segal

---

The Talmuds and related works recognized that many Jews in their time were in the Diaspora—or as they saw it, in a state of exile (galut). The discussions often took the form of biblical exegesis. Therefore, their comments relate to biblical exiles more than to their contemporary situation. Although the existence of a Diaspora was generally considered a deplorable situation to be remedied in the messianic redemption, some rabbis, especially in Babylonia, found positive features in the situation.

In keeping with biblical teaching, the sages of the Talmud and midrash believed Israel was scattered as punishment for her sins. The correspondence between crime and punishment was a stock theme of rabbinic preaching. Accordingly, exile was blamed on Israel’s commission of the gravest cardinal sins and sacrileges. In TB

Menahot 53b, God informed Abraham that his children would be exiled for their sins, and these sins would be deliberate and prevalent and would be committed despite ample opportunities offered to them for repentance. Rabban Yohanan ben Zakkai compared Israel's exile to Babylon, Abraham's birthplace, to an adulteress being sent back to her father's house (Tosefta Baba Kamma 7:3; cf. TB Pesahim 87a). "Exile comes to the world on account of idol-worship, sexual crimes, and bloodshed" (M Avot 5:9; see also TB Shabbat 33a). Lamentations Rabbah 1:1: ". . . Israel were not exiled until they denied the one God of the universe, the decalogue, circumcision . . . , and the five books of the Torah . . . Said Rabbi Levi: Israel were not exiled until they had transgressed the thirty-six prohibitions whose punishment is karet [excision]."

Occasionally, the rabbis identified lesser sins and transgressions as the causes of Israel's exiles. In most cases, this homiletic trope, though supported by scriptural proof-texts, was used by rabbis to chastise their contemporaries for laxity in the observance of specific precepts. The catalogue of violations and transgressions that provoked the exile included sabbatical years (M Avot 5:9), heave-offerings and tithes (Avot de-Rabbi Natan A 20), circumcision (TJ Sanhedrin 10:5 [29c]), procreation of illegitimate offspring (mamzerim), heresy, drunkenness (Genesis Rabbah 36:4), and accepting the hospitality of the government (TB Pesahim 49a). According to Lamentations Rabbah 1:28–29, "they ate leaven on Passover . . . they seized the pledge of the poor within their houses . . . they withheld the wages of a hired servant . . . they robbed the poor of their portions . . . they consumed the poor tithe . . . they worshipped idols . . . because they held the Hebrew bondman in servitude . . ."

According to rabbinic teaching, Israel's dispersions were thematically prefigured in earlier generations of the Bible. Genesis Rabbah 19:9 depicts Adam's banishment from paradise as the archetype for Israel's eviction from the Land of Israel for transgressing commandments. The dove sent out by Noah prefigured Israel's homelessness among hostile nations (Genesis Rabbah 33:6). In Genesis Rabbah 36:4, developing a wordplay on the Hebrew of Genesis 9:21, the rabbis interpreted it in the sense of "he was exiled," implying that Noah was the origin of exile for subsequent generations. In TB Menahot 53b; Exodus Rabbah 51:7, and elsewhere, Abraham is informed of the future exiles of his descendants—Babylon, Media, Greece, Rome—and he pleads on their behalf. He is allowed to choose whether his children will be punished by Gehinnom or exile and is induced to choose the latter. "Because Isaac saw through the holy spirit that his children were destined to be exiled, he said to [Jacob]: Come, and I shall give you a blessing fitting for the exile" (Genesis Rabbah 75:8). Because Jacob foresaw that the exiles would pass by the Ephrath road, he buried Rachel there so that she might pray for mercy on their behalf" (Genesis Rabbah 82:10). Rabbi Joshua ben Levi interpreted Jacob's instructions to his sons in Genesis 43:14 as a portent about their future exiles (Genesis Rabbah 92:3). The Israelites' enslavement in Egypt was a prototype for subsequent exiles, and the divine descent into the burning bush prefigures God's participation in their sufferings (Mekhilta de-Rabbi Simeon ben Yohai pp. 1–2; TB Berakhot 9b; and elsewhere, see below). The Israelites' needless weeping in the desert provoked God to scatter them in the future (TB Ta'anit 29a). In Deuteronomy Rabbah 2:22, "Moses instructed Israel that if they sinned, they would one day be exiled, how they would repent, and how they would be redeemed."

Many sources stress the severity of exile as a harsh and humiliating punishment. "After all the torments that I inflict upon you, I will send you into exile. Exile is difficult, since it is weighed against them all" (Sifré Deuteronomy 43). "Said Rabbi Joshua ben Levi: When the wicked Nebuchadnezzar sent Israel into exile to Babylon, their hands were bound behind them in iron chains, and they led them naked like beasts" (Tanhuma Yitro 5). The dispersion pollutes Jews with sin (Midrash Shir Ha-Shirim 8:19). "Even though the nations of the world go into exile, their exile is not true exile. Since the nations of the world may eat their bread and drink of their wine, their exile is not true exile. However, for Israel, who may not eat of their bread and may not drink of their wine, their exile is exile . . . For Israel, who walk barefooted, their exile is exile. . . . When they were exiled their strength was enfeebled like a woman's" (Lamentations Rabbah 1:28).

Several rabbinic homilies describe with touching pathos God's anguish that his justice compelled him to exile his children. "Three times every night the Holy One sits and roars like a lion [or coos like a dove], saying: Woe to my children, because on account of their sins I destroyed my house and burnt down my sanctuary and I have sent my children into exile among the nations of the world" (TB Berakhot 3a; cf. TB Sukkah 52b).

Basing themselves on biblical sources such as Isaiah 43:14, "For your sake I was sent to Babylon," or Isaiah 63:9, "In all their affliction he was afflicted," rabbinic traditions relate how God himself participates and suffers in Israel's exiles. "Rabbi Simeon ben Yohai said: Come and see how beloved are Israel in the sight of God! Every place to which they were exiled the divine presence accompanied them. They were exiled to Egypt and . . . to Babylon, and the divine presence accompanied them . . . And when they will be redeemed in the future, the divine presence will be with them" (TB Megillah 29a; Mekhilta de-Rabbi Simeon ben Yohai pp. 1–2; Lamentations Rabbah 1:32, Exodus Rabbah 23; cf. Pesikta de-Rav Kahana 13:9).

Nevertheless, some traditions found positive aspects to the situation. God's love for his children caused him to punish them in ways that would minimize the harm and increase the benefits of their predicament. Sifra Behukkotai 6:5 observes that the devastation of the land is actually a blessing in that it prevents Israel's enemies from establishing a foothold. The hostility of their neighbors prevents Jews from assimilating to paganism and will facilitate the Jews' eventual repentance (Sifra Behukkotai 8:5; cf. Genesis Rabbah 33:6). By distributing Jews throughout many lands, God was safeguarding them against total destruction in times of local persecutions (TB Pesahim 87b; Genesis Rabbah 41:9; Seder Eliyahu Rabbah 11:4). Exile possesses an atoning power (TB Ta'anit 16a). According to Rabbi Eleazar (TB Pesahim 87a), "the only reason why Israel was exiled among the heathens was so that proselytes might be joined to them." It is praiseworthy that Israel continued to observe and study Torah in their dispersion (TB Yoma 9b, etc.).

Although some rabbis maintained that "the subjection to Babylon was harsher than the subjection to Egypt" (TJ Sukkah 4:3), a widespread view in the Babylonian

Talmud held that the Babylonian Diaspora was especially benign and compassionate. “Rav Huna said: The exiles in Babylon are at ease like sons and the exiles in other lands are uneasy, like daughters” (TB Menahot 110a, expounding Isaiah 43:6). “Rabbi Hiyya taught . . . The Holy One knows that Israel is incapable of withstanding the edicts of Esau or of Ishmael. Therefore he sent them as exiles to Babylonia . . . Rabbi Hanina says: Because [Babylonian Aramaic] is akin to the language of the Torah. Rabbi Yohanan says: Because he sent them to their mother’s house . . . Ulla said: In order that they might eat dates and occupy themselves with the Torah” (TB Pesahim 87a). Babylonian sages interpreted 2 Kings 24:16, describing the captivity of “the craftsmen and the smiths” as an allusion to an early wave of rabbinic scholars who established Torah learning and institutions in Babylonia (TB Pesahim 88a).

TB Ketubbot 110b–111a relates an exchange between two third-century Babylonian scholars: “Rabbi Zera used to avoid Rav Judah, because he wished to immigrate to the Land of Israel, but Rav Judah maintained: Anyone who emigrates from Babylonia to the Land of Israel is violating a positive commandment, since it says (Jeremiah 27:22): ‘They shall be carried to Babylon and remain there until the day when I give attention to them, says the Lord.’” Judah was likely fearful for the adverse impact on the Babylonian academies and on the social fabric of the local communities. In the Talmud’s expansion of the dispute, the three occurrences in Song of Songs of “I have charged you . . . that you do not rouse or wake my love” (2:7, etc.) are interpreted in accordance with a teaching of Rabbi Yosé bar Hanina (cf. Song of Songs Rabbah 2:20): “Why was there a need for those three oaths? One was so that Israel should not go up en masse [‘in a wall’]; one indicates that the Holy One charged Israel that they should not rebel against the nations of the world; and one indicates that the Holy One charged the nations of the world that they should not oppress Israel excessively.” In other traditions (e.g., Song of Songs Rabbah 8:9; TB Yoma 9b), the failure of the Babylonian exiles to return to Zion “in a wall” is regarded as a fundamental national failure: “If Israel had brought up a wall from Babylon, then the holy Temple would not have been destroyed a second time.”

Rabbinic teachings and prayers speak in glowing terms of the final ingathering of Israel’s exiles in the messianic redemption. TJ Sanhedrin 10:5 (29c): “Rabbi Berekhiah and Rabbi Halabo in the name of Rabbi Samuel bar Nahman: Israel were exiled to three captivities . . . And when they return, they will return from three captivities” Tanhuma Noah 12: “Said Rabbi Samuel bar Nahmani: There is a haggadic tradition to the effect that Jerusalem will not be rebuilt until all the exiles have been gathered. And if a person should tell you that all the exiles have been gathered, but Jerusalem has not been rebuilt, do not believe them. Why?—Because thus is it written (Psalm 147:3): ‘The Lord builds up Jerusalem’; and afterward: ‘he gathers the outcasts of Israel.’”

Selected Bibliography

- Gross, Moses David. 1960. “Galut” [Exile]. In Otsar ha-’agadah [Thesaurus of Aggadah], edited by M. D. Gross. Jerusalem: Mossad Harav Kook.
- Krauss, Samuel. 1947. Paras ve-Romi ba-Talmud uva-Midrashim [Persia and Rome in the Talmud and Midrash]. Jerusalem: Mossad Harav Kook.

- Stern, M. 1974. "The Jewish Diaspora." In The Jewish People in the First Century: Historical Geography, Political History, Social, Cultural and Religious Life and Institutions, edited by S. Safrai and M. Stern, 117–183. Assen, Netherlands: Van Gorcum.
- Urbach, E. 1987. The Sages: Their Concepts and Beliefs. Translated by I. Abrahams. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Yankelovich, Raphael. 1990. "Mashma'ut ha-galut ba-mahshavah ha-yehudit ba-tequfah habatar miqra'it" [The Concept of Exile in Post-Biblical Jewish Thought]. Proceedings of the World Congress of Jewish Studies 10 (3): 69–76.

Diaspora in the Hellenistic Period

Edrel Arie

---

A considerable amount of evidence is available for a Diasporic existence outside the Land of Israel as of the late Persian period and early Hellenistic era (Katz 2006). We know of the Jewish community in Elephantine, Egypt, and of many additional Jews who arrived in Egypt at the beginning of the Hellenistic period (Bar-Kochva 1996). Thus, a growing Jewish existence is found in Alexandria, the Fayum, and, to a lesser extent, in other places in Egypt. The literary evidence emanating from the Jewish Diaspora in Egypt is relatively rich (Holladay 1989). In Egypt, the Jews became more and more visible as a significant ethnic group—as is clear from the remnants of the anti-Jewish literature that emanated from there (Manethon as well as all other authors that Josephus mentions in the Book of 3 Maccabees, etc.). In the third and second centuries BCE, a growing Jewish existence is evident in the Mediterranean Greco-Roman world (for instance, Jewish communities can be found in Rhodes, other Aegean islands, Greece, Asia Minor, Cyrenaica, Rome, and other cities in Italy). Our evidence comes from archaeological material, literary sources such as the Pseudepigrapha and Apocrypha, historiography, and so on (Katz 2006).

Much can be deduced about Jewish life in the Hellenistic Diaspora and its ideas and ideologies through the writings of Philo the Alexandrian as well as from the translation of the Bible into Greek (the Septuagint), which took place for centuries during the Hellenistic period (Dines 2004). In the first century CE, two sources stand out for their importance: first, the Jewish Antiquities of Josephus, which occasionally describes—in particular in Books 13ff—the situation in the Mediterranean Jewish Diaspora; and second, the excellent overview of the Jewish Diaspora found in the Book of Acts and Paul's letters (Mendels 1998). We also have some evidence from the Hellenistic era of a Diasporic existence in the east, early on, from Josephus, the Book of Tobit, and early rabbinic literature (Gafni 1997).

Jewish communities outside the Land of Israel could be traced first and foremost by their communal life, their adherence to Jewish law and beliefs, and their adherence to Jewish Scripture, examples being the Hebrew Bible and the synagogue, an institution that became central to the communities in the Diaspora (Levina 2000). A further strong common denominator was the linkage to the Holy Land and to the Temple and its institutions. The Jewish Diaspora in whatever place outside the Holy Land never gave up the longing (even if just sentimental and theoretical) to become again a reassembled national entity in the Land of Israel. This is a central element in Jewish theology in the Diaspora in antiquity, which does not necessarily contradict the extent to which Jews were syncretistic in their organizational systems and spiritual life. Recently, it has been argued that the Jews in the Hellenistic Diaspora (e.g., Greek-speaking Jews) had no desire to return to the Holy Land and gradually lost touch emotionally and physically with it and its Jews as well as with their Holy Bible (Gruen 2002). Moreover, the Jews in the Hellenistic Diaspora, according to this view, lived safely and in relative security, and they did not suffer attacks from their Gentile neighbors. This claim cannot be accepted because, in the first place, there is clear evidence for sporadic attacks against Jews, physical as well as verbal; second, the Jews were always attached in one way or another to their Bible and via the Bible, as well as other traditions, to their land (Mendels 2005). In many other regions of the Diaspora, as well, the Jews kept a very strong Jewish identity—a matter that can be deduced from the writings of Gentiles about them (Stern 1980).

The Jewish world during the Hellenistic period was noticeably dispersed. Most of the scholars who have dealt with the Jewish Diaspora during this period have blurred the distinction between the eastern and western Jewish Diasporas, explicitly or implicitly assuming that knowledge about one Diaspora could inform the other. However, the distinction between the two Diasporas was not only geographic, but it also reflected a much more substantive split. The centrality of Jerusalem and the Land of Israel as a unifying force was a significant factor in the Jewish world before the destruction of the Temple. But this was much less so after the destruction. After the destruction, and the split that grew in its wake, the language difference between east and west strengthened this divide. In the west—namely, the Greek-speaking Mediterranean world—the Jews wrote and spoke only Greek, whereas in the east (Palestine and eastward), Hebrew and Aramaic prevailed—although even there some communities wrote and spoke Greek. The Land of Israel served as the border between the two Diasporas. The language gap between these two Diasporas led to a much deeper cultural gap, which in turn led also in practice to a normative gap. In fact, the accepted scholarly claim that the rabbis in the center, that is, the Land of Israel, maintained contact with the entire Jewish Diaspora, including its Hellenistic part, should be refuted as a consequence of recent research (Edrei and Mendels 2006). There are clear and unequivocal proofs that this connection existed with the eastern Aramaic-speaking Diaspora, but with regard to the western Diaspora a deafening silence on this issue prevails in Jewish sources. This gap can be explained by the widening abyss between the eastern and western Jewish Diasporas.

Diaspora communities naturally vacillate between the desire to preserve all three: their unique identity, their connection to their cultural center, and their desire to integrate into the broader cultural context in which they live (Barclay 1996, Rajak 2001). The destruction of the Temple in 70 CE, by its very nature, upset the balance between these three aspirations, as the physical connection to the center became an unclear, and even irrelevant, concept. A strong center controls a defined network of communication, and the loss of the center has far-reaching implications for communication systems. The Temple constituted a clear and unequivocal center for the entire Jewish world (Mendels 1997). Its status derived from both its imposing physical symbolism and its recognized functions, as well as from a long supportive tradition. When the Temple disappeared in 70 CE, an alternative center was established in the Land of Israel, a center that in due course created much of the so-called rabbinic literature. However, this center was inaccessible to the Greek Jewish Diaspora (except for those—like the apostle Paul—who made the effort to leave their Greek-speaking abode and come and learn in the Land of Israel). The messages that emanated from this center were essentially different from those that emanated from the previous center, the Temple being basically a place of ritual, and therefore indecipherable for the Hellenistic Greek-speaking Jewish Diaspora. Thus, in looking at the Jewish Diaspora at that time the focus should be on the loss of communication and the clear gap in Jewish practice that developed in the aftermath of the destruction of the Temple.

A fresco titled The Expulsion of Heliodorus from the Temple, painted by Raphael (1511–1512), depicts the Maccabees driving the Greek priest from the Temple of Jerusalem. The Maccabees were a group of Jewish rebels who coordinated the liberation of Jerusalem from the Seleucid Empire. (Alinari Archives/Corbis)

This viewpoint is better understood when contrasted with the situation in the Middle Ages, in which the Mishnah and the Talmud, which had already been committed to writing, served as the basis for both a common learning curriculum and a common normative practice. These works were both accessible and studied extensively during this period. Scholars throughout the Middle Ages wrote about the Talmud. Their works were written exclusively in Hebrew, with some intermittent Aramaic, the language of the Talmud that everyone knew. As a result, in spite of the development of different academic approaches and different customs, everything flowed from community to community because there was no language barrier. This was not the case in the aftermath of the destruction of the Temple, when a hierarchical system of communication emerged in the Aramaic-speaking Jewish Diaspora that included a leadership, institutions, a bureaucracy, and a clear new message. This communicative system did not incorporate the western Jewish Diaspora, where a flat system of communication emerged because institutions that paralleled those in the Land of Israel were lacking.

The distinction between the eastern and western Jewish Diasporas is reflected in the Jewish literature that prevailed in each community. The Bible was the common literature of the entire Jewish community, and each separate community maintained access to it in its own language. Yet in the Land of Israel, a new Jewish literature developed during this period—the Mishnah, the Midrash, and, subsequently, the Talmud. This literature spread eastward, and the Babylonian Jewish community became full partners in its development. It could not, however, reach the west because the Jews of the western Diaspora were unable to decode it. Simultaneously, the western Diaspora adopted a very different corpus of literature—the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha—which was rejected in its entirety by the sages of the east.

A comparison of the two different and separate corpora preserved in the two Diasporas strongly supports the claim regarding the isolation of the western Diaspora. The Halachic and Aggadic corpus built on Hebrew and Aramaic was preserved as an oral tradition in the eastern Diaspora (Sussmann, concerning the Mishnah). In contrast, the corpus preserved in the west was a written tradition. The eastern corpus was not translated into Greek, and there seems to have been no attempt to translate it into Greek or Latin. This fact reinforces the hypothesis that the vast majority of Jews in the western Diaspora had no access to this literature. The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, which developed in the early Hellenistic period, were fundamentally different from the eastern literature in both content and genre. Some of this literature was originally written in Greek (such as 2 Maccabees), and other parts of it were written in Hebrew and subsequently translated into Greek (such as 1 Maccabees, for which the Hebrew original no longer exists) and distributed in the Greek-speaking community. Just as the Halachic and Haggadic literature preserved in the east was not made accessible by translation in the west, most of the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha did not continue to be preserved in the Hebrew/Aramaic-speaking eastern Diaspora (some exceptions are the Aramaic Testament of Levi, Tobit, Ben Sira, and Jubilees in Hebrew; but they were in any case not formally accepted by the rabbis). It is clear that in Babylonia the Jews were similarly unable to access the literature written in Greek. This literature is practically not mentioned in the rabbinic literature, and when it is, it is referred to as “external” literature to distinguish it from the biblical canon. One thus gets the sense of two very different communities on either side of the Mediterranean Sea, serviced by two bodies of literature that were distinct in terms of content, genre, language, worldview, and normative practice. On one side, the Bible and rabbinic literature (the latter still transmitted orally), on the other side, the Greek translation of the Bible and the “external” literature (which was committed to writing). This situation led to a reality characterized by two distinct universes of discourse, two different systems of communication, and the different ideologies that developed as a result.

Even before the destruction of the Temple, the normative system in force in the western Diaspora differed from the practices that prevailed in the Land of Israel. For example, there were areas of practice that were relevant to Jewish life in the Land of Israel but were irrelevant in the Diaspora, such as laws relating to agriculture and working the land (Seder Zeraim) or laws relating to purity and impurity and the Temple service. There is no doubt that before the destruction of the Temple, these laws constituted a majority of the normative Jewish legal system. This fact accentuates the gap between the Land of Israel and the western Diaspora, and the benefit that the sages saw in living in the Land of Israel: the opportunity to fulfill the entire Torah. This gap should have narrowed after the destruction of the Temple, but in reality the opposite occurred—many normative areas that had previously been identical became different. Thus, for example, laws relating to the holidays and prayer were transformed after the destruction because of the circumstances of the period. Due to an extensive leadership of the rabbis in the Land, Judaism after the destruction became a religion of a text, probably orally preserved by the communities. Hence, new prayers were developed, and the entire structure of the synagogue was reorganized. These innovations could not reach the Hellenistic Greek-speaking Diaspora. Another important example is the Jewish festivals, which before the destruction were constructed around the temple worship. After the destruction, the rabbis transformed the customs to new ones in the synagogue. The family customs that were text based, such as the Passover Haggadah, could therefore not reach the Hellenistic Jewry. It is specifically this area of the normative system, which was adopted in the eastern Diaspora, as in the Land of Israel, that could not reach the western Jewish Diaspora because of the communication and language barrier. After the destruction, when the leaders of the Jewish community in the Land of Israel were struggling for their future survival, the normative gap between the community in the Land of Israel and the community in the western Greek-speaking Diaspora developed into an almost ideological gap, just because the Jews in the west remained strictly biblical in their Halachic behavior.

In spite of attempts to show that the Jews in the western Diaspora knew Hebrew, it is common knowledge that basically they knew only Greek. The Jews of the west knew neither Hebrew nor Aramaic, and their religious lives, including the reading of the Torah and prayer, were conducted solely in Greek (Tov 2003). The Torah was translated into Greek in the third century BCE (and there were attempts at translation even before that); in subsequent centuries the rest of the Hebrew Bible was translated as well (Dines 2004). It should be pointed out that in certain rabbinic circles, the translation into Greek was viewed as a necessity of the times; the sages recognized that there were entire Diaspora communities that spoke only Greek, and that these would be lost to the Jewish people in the absence of an authentic translation. While the sages struggled to preserve Hebrew as the sole language for religious activity (that is, prayer and Torah study) they simultaneously provided for an authorized translation of Scripture for the Greek-speaking communities. A conspicuous example is the biblical translation of Aquila, the student of R. Akiva, who modified the Septuagint according to the unique approach of R. Akiva, which attributed importance to every letter and word. The sages generally approved of this translation. Nevertheless, the rabbinic literature of the time, that is, the Midrash and the Mishnah, whether preserved orally or in written form, was not translated. Therefore, as the years progressed, these works remained inaccessible to the Greek-speaking Jews. Although scholars agree that the sages in Israel knew Greek to varying degrees (Lieberman 1962), one cannot conclude from this that Jews in the Greek Diaspora knew Hebrew.

Research regarding inscriptions found in synagogues in Israel and in the Greek Diaspora lends support to the latter view. These discoveries led to dramatic conclusions about the differences between the Jewish communities of Israel and the Diaspora, differences that derive primarily from the language barrier. Approximately 100 synagogue inscriptions were found in the Greek Diaspora. These finds have greatly enriched knowledge about the Greek-speaking Diaspora, largely because of the discovery of communities that had previously been unknown. All of the inscriptions are in Greek, in contrast to the findings in synagogues in the Land of Israel, which include inscriptions in Greek, Aramaic, and Hebrew. Of greater significance, however, are the differences in the content of the inscriptions found in the Land of Israel and those found in the Greek Diaspora. For instance, the Greek concept of soteria (salvation) is found notably in the inscriptions of the Greek Diaspora and at times in the Greek inscriptions in the Land of Israel, but never in Hebrew and Aramaic inscriptions. Similarly, the Greek inscriptions tend to emphasize the Hellenistic focus on the individual donor, while the Aramaic and Hebrew inscriptions reflect a worldview that places the community at the center. Also, contributors are praised differently in the inscriptions from the Land of Israel than they are in the inscriptions in the Greek Diaspora. The Greek inscriptions in the Land of Israel state: "He should be remembered for good and for blessing," which is a direct translation of the Hebrew and Aramaic terminology. In contrast, the Greek Diaspora inscriptions use the term eulogia (blessing), but not in the context that it is used in the Land of Israel (Roth-Gerson 1987). These examples indicate three facts. First, there was a difference between the character of the synagogues of the Land of Israel and those of the Greek-speaking Diaspora as expressed in the synagogue inscriptions. Second, and even more important, whereas in the Land of Israel there was a strong influence of the rabbinic worldview, the western Diaspora was noticeably influenced by Hellenistic culture. Moreover, synagogues in the Holy Land were actually influenced by both cultures, drawing from both the Hebrew and Greek concepts. The western synagogue, however, did not draw at all from the synagogue model of the Land of Israel. Third, even in the Greek Jewish world, influence went from west to east and not vice versa—a fact that is astonishing. The Greek inscriptions in the Land of Israel reflect motifs from the inscriptions in the western Diaspora, whereas the Greek inscriptions in the western Diaspora were not influenced by the Greek inscriptions in the Land of Israel. Thus, components of the Greek inscriptions in the Land of Israel that were clearly translations from the Hebrew and Aramaic inscriptions did not find their way to the west. Greek inscriptions from the west, however, did influence Greek inscriptions in Israel.

Rabbinic literature points as well to the dichotomy between the Jews in the west and those in the east. The rabbis did not view the western communities as an integral part of the Diaspora as they defined it. The following points, out of many others, can be brought forward (Edrei and Mendels 2006).

First, it is important to note that the evidence from rabbinic literature would indicate that the western Diaspora developed no spiritual centers dedicated to the study of the Oral Law, no yeshivas (academies), and no Torah centers. (This becomes even more apparent when viewed against the background of the Christian schools that were created in many places in the Greek-speaking Mediterranean basin.) There are practically no laws or sayings attributed to sages from the western Diaspora in the entire corpus of the Oral Law (Mishnah, Tosefta, both versions of the Talmud, and the Midrash). It is not surprising that no literature parallel to the Talmud, encompassing the Oral Law, developed in the west. Matya ben Harash is known to have gone from the Land of Israel to Rome to establish a yeshiva, but there are hardly any references to his Torah teachings in the rabbinic corpus. Apparently, he did not foster protégés, and we know nothing about the proceedings of his academy or its fate. Furthermore, according to the testimony of the sages themselves, there were no yeshivas in the Greek-speaking communities. For example, Sifrei Deuteronomy 344 401F (and parallels) tells of two agents who were sent by the Roman authorities to learn the Oral Law; they went to Usha in the Land of Israel for that purpose.

Second, sources relating to rabbinic (nonpolitical) visits to the western Diaspora are sparse and questionable, particularly in contrast to the number of sources that deal with contacts between the center in Israel and the eastern Jewish Diaspora. Also, the places in the western Diaspora mentioned in rabbinic literature are severely limited in number. Rabbinic literature almost totally ignores the vast western Diaspora that existed at the time. This is particularly noticeable compared with the relatively large number of places in this Diaspora mentioned in chapter 2 of Acts, and in the chapters describing the journeys of Paul (Acts 13 ff.) as well as in the Pauline epistles, which give a comprehensive picture of the geography of the western Jewish Greek-speaking Diaspora in the first century CE. The rabbinic corpus testifies that the western Diaspora was not consistently connected to the system of communication or the rabbinic authority in the east. The Sages admit and mention this (Edrei and Mendels 2006).

Given the aforementioned considerations, and many others, one can argue against the view that Judaism disappeared as a religion of the masses after the destruction (Schwartz 2001), that two distinct “Judaisms” arose, with an ever-growing gap developing between them. As a generalization, they could be labeled the western “written Torah Judaism” and the eastern “Oral Law Judaism.” Whereas in the east a new normative standard, the Oral Law, developed, in the west the Jewish communities remained biblical, maintaining the tradition as it existed before the rise of the rabbis and their teachings. Hence it is no coincidence that in the west it was “biblical” Jews who emerged in the Middle Ages in Germany and France.

The Jewish world during the period under discussion began to separate into two worlds with an ever-widening gap between them. This becomes even more visible in contrast to the elements that were common to the Jews in the east and in the west (e.g., synagogue, purity customs, the Bible). This gap was the result of a geographical divide as well as a language barrier: Hebrew and Aramaic versus Greek. In the course of time, two different knowledge bases and two distinct literatures were created: in the west, the Bible in its Greek translation, along with the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha; in the east, rabbinic literature. This gap naturally led to a normative gap of distinct diasporas. While the east developed a normative standard posited by the rabbis, the west maintained a biblical normative standard based on the Septuagint. This gap was apparent particularly in the areas of prayer, synagogue life (reading of the Torah in Greek), and festival celebration. The scholarly claim of an ongoing connection between the Greek-speaking Diaspora in the west and the center in Israel has been challenged.

In contrast, Talmudic sources point to a strong and clear connection between the center in the Land of Israel and the eastern Aramaic-speaking Diaspora. The Jewish communities that were isolated from the rabbinic network served as a receptive basis for the development of an alternative Christian network by Paul and his successors, which enabled it to spread throughout the Mediterranean basin (Mendels 1999). An oral law did not develop in the western Diaspora, and western Jews contributed nothing to the development of the Oral Law in the east. The codex of Roman laws dealing with Jews confirms in a variety of places the gap between the eastern and western Diasporas (Linder 1987; Edrei and Mendels 2006). Sources that discuss rabbinic travels to communities of the western Diaspora for Halachic purposes point out that these visits were chance occurrences. Whereas the Catholic Church at that time tried to create a communication network, a bureaucratic unity, and a church law in order to impose uniform standards in every place (and apostles traveled to many places to preach), such an approach did not exist among the Jews in the west, which fostered only a flat system of communication. Moreover, there was no bureaucratic system to impose, or even transmit, information about the Halacha. No emissaries went out to preach (inter alia because the notion of mission was not inherent in Judaism; Mendels 1998). In contrast, it is clear that the eastern Diaspora did create a communication system that transmitted laws systematically. The Talmud contains stories of sages who traveled between Israel and Babylonia, carrying with them laws and traditions. The Mishnah itself was transferred from Israel to Babylonia and there became the cornerstone of Torah study. The comments of well-known scholars from the Land of Israel are quoted frequently in the Babylonian Talmud and vice versa. No such thing is recorded in the western Diaspora. The few sources that do exist demonstrate that the connection was sporadic. Also, literature written by Gentiles paints a picture of Jews who live according to the Torah and not according to the Oral Law (Stern 1980). The roots of this phenomenon of dichotomy are not entirely clear unless one accepts the view that the language barrier could cause it. It still remains an enigma: Why did the rabbinic leadership allow this fissure to develop and grow? Did this leadership relinquish the western Diaspora intentionally, and if so, why? On the other hand, why did the western Jews forfeit their connection with the center in Israel? Perhaps the language barrier described here was not a cause but a symptom, reflecting a cultural divide that severed the relationship between the two communities. Or perhaps the divide simply became so great in reality that it could not be bridged. Also, the problem of the consequences of the situation described remains open: What became of the Greek Diaspora? Did it simply assimilate into the Christian community that captured Roman society? Or did it remain an isolated and distinct community, a type of biblical community that later influenced the development of Karaism? These questions remain open for future research.

Selected Bibliography

- Barclay, J. M. G. 1996. Jews in the Mediterranean Diaspora. From Alexander to Trajan (323 BCE–117 CE). Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark.
- Bar-Kochva, B. 1996. Pseudo-Hecataeus, "On the Jews." Legitimizing the Jewish Diaspora. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Dines, J. M. 2004. The Septuagint. London: T & T Clarke.
- Edrei, A., and D. Mendels. 2006. "A Split Jewish Diaspora: Its Dramatic Consequences." Journal for the Study of the Pseudepigrapha 16 (1): 91–137.
- Gafni, I. M. 1997. Land Center and Diaspora. Jewish Constructs in Late Antiquity. Sheffield, UK: Sheffield Academic Press.
- Gruen, E. S. 2002. Diaspora, Jews amidst Greeks and Romans. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Holladay, C. R. 1983. Fragments from Hellenistic Jewish Authors, vol. 1. Atlanta: Scholars Press.
- Holladay, C. R. 1989. Fragments from Hellenistic Jewish Authors, vol. 2. Atlanta: Scholars Press.
- Katz, S. T., ed. 2006. The Cambridge History of Judaism, vol. 4. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Levine, L. I. 2000. The Ancient Synagogue. The First Thousand Years. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Linder, A. 1987. The Jews in Roman Imperial Legislation. Detroit: Wayne State University Press.
- Mendels, D. 1997. The Rise and Fall of Jewish Nationalism. 2nd ed. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.
- Mendels, D. 1998. "Pagan or Jewish? The Presentation of Paul's Mission in the Book of Acts." In Identity, Religion and Historiography, edited by D. Mendels, 394–419. Sheffield, UK: Sheffield Academic Press.
- Mendels, D. 1999. The Media Revolution of Early Christianity. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.
- Mendels, D. 2005. "Ancient or American Diaspora?" A review of Guren's Diaspora [Hebrew]. Katharsis 3: 38–47.
- Rajak, T. 2001. "The Jewish Community and Its Boundaries." In The Jewish Dialogue with Greece and Rome, edited by T. Rajak, 335–354. Leiden-Koeln, the Netherlands: Brill.
- Roth-Gerson, L. 1987. "Similarities and Differences in Greek Synagogue Inscriptions of Eretz Israel and the Diaspora." In Synagogues in Antiquity [Hebrew], edited by A. A. Kasher, A. Oppenheimer, U. Rappaport, 133–146. Jerusalem.
- Sanders, E. P. 1990. Jewish Law from Jesus to the Mishnah. London: Trinity Press International.
- Schwartz, S. 2001. Imperialism and Jewish Society. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

- Stern, M. 1976. Greek and Latin Authors on Jews and Judaism, vol. 1. Jerusalem: Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities.
- Stern, M. 1980. Greek and Latin Authors on Jews and Judaism, vol. 2. Jerusalem: Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities.
- Sussmann, Y. 2005. "Torah she-Beal Peh Peshutah ke-Mashma" [Hebrew]. Mehqerei Talmud 3: 209–305.
- Tov, E. 2003. "The Text of the Hebrew/Aramaic and Greek Bible used in the Ancient Synagogue." In The Ancient Synagogue from Its Origin until 200 C.E., edited by B. Olsson and M. Zetterholm, 237–259. Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell.
- Trebilco, P. 1991. Jewish Communities in Asia Minor. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Symbols of the Diaspora

Ellen Frankel

---

Jewish tradition has derived symbols of the Jewish Diaspora from the Hebrew Bible, especially from the foundational stories in the Torah; from rabbinic literature; and from folklore—and has embroidered these symbols over the centuries. Central motifs of exile—God’s protective presence among Diaspora Jewry, nostalgia for the Jewish homeland, the hope of redemption and return to Israel—have been incorporated into the observance of Jewish holidays, the liturgy, folk art, and synagogue architecture. Even after the establishment of the State of Israel, these reminders of exile remain deeply embedded in Jewish life.

Symbols of Diaspora in the Biblical Prehistory of Israel

In the Jewish imagination, the human condition is fundamentally defined by the experience of exile and the longing for home. Four biblical stories that are set in the prehistory of Israel symbolize this idea: the Garden of Eden (Genesis 2:8–3:24), Cain’s murder of Abel (Genesis 4:1–16), Noah’s ark (Genesis 6:9–9:29), and the Tower of Babel (Genesis 11:1–9). Each of these stories responds to the question: Why was I forced to leave home? Each explains why human beings live separated from one another.

As recounted in the second chapter of Genesis, God intends that the first two human beings, Adam and Eve, inhabit a garden “in the east” (Genesis 2:8). But when they prove disobedient, God banishes them to the west, stationing at Eden’s eastern boundary “the cherubim and the fiery ever-turning sword, to guard the way to the tree of life” (Genesis 3:24). Eden thus becomes a symbol of a lost home and of death in exile.

In the next generation, Adam and Eve’s elder son, Cain, murders his brother Abel in a jealous rage and, like his parents, is punished by exile. God decrees: “You shall become a ceaseless wanderer on earth” (Genesis 4:12). Then, in an act of compassion, God swears to protect Cain by putting a mark on him so that he will not be killed as he wanders the earth. In contrast to his parents, Cain heads “east of Eden,” settling in the land of Nod, whose Hebrew root means “to wander.” The “mark of Cain” thus serves as a symbol of the curse of exile.

Several generations later, Noah and his family become the ultimate nomads when they abandon dry land in an ark, accompanied by representatives of all the animals on earth. This ark thus becomes a second cradle of life, repopulating the earth after the flood. For centuries, Noah’s ark has symbolized divine salvation, the hope of renewal, and the ideal of universal peace—for on the ark human beings and wild beasts, predators and prey, coexisted under the same roof.

The fourth narrative in this prehistory tells of a mass migration “from the east” to the land of Shinar, where the new settlers set to work building a great tower reaching to heaven. United by a single language, the builders declare that they intend to “make a name for ourselves; else we shall be scattered all over the world” (Genesis 11:4). God foils their plans by confounding their speech, so that they are “scattered over the face of the whole earth” (Genesis 11:9). This story offers an alternative to the Noah narrative, which likewise ends with a universal dispersion. But whereas Noah’s ark symbolizes God’s redemption of the righteous few, the Tower of Babel represents God’s punishment of the rebellious multitude.

Symbols of Jewish Diaspora in the Bible and Rabbinic Legend

In the Genesis narratives about the founding patriarchal families (Genesis 12–50), the themes of homeland and exile exist in dialectical tension. Abraham and Sarah leave their birthplace of Haran (also called Ur; modern-day Iraq) and travel to the new homeland God promises them and their descendants. Soon after arriving, they voluntarily go into exile, traveling to Egypt to escape famine in Canaan, returning once the famine ends.

When it comes time to marry off his son Isaac, Abraham dispatches his servant Eliezer “to the land of my birth” to bring back a suitable wife. In turn, when Isaac and Rebecca’s son Jacob steals his twin brother Esau’s birthright and then fears for his life, he flees to his grandparents’ birthplace, Haran, where he marries his cousins Leah and Rachel. Twenty years later, Jacob’s family—two wives, two concubines, 12 sons, and a daughter—returns to Canaan. But some years later, Jacob’s sons sell their brother Joseph into exile. Initially enslaved in Egypt, Joseph rises from lowly prisoner to the exalted position of pharaoh’s viceroy. Eventually, Joseph brings his father Jacob, his siblings, and their families down to Egypt, where they settle and multiply. And so begins the first major Jewish Diaspora, lasting four centuries. With the exception of Isaac, who never travels far from his birthplace in Canaan, the other six Jewish forebears—Abraham, Sarah, Rebecca, Jacob, Rachel, and Leah—spend a significant portion of their lives outside the Land of Israel. Jacob’s children and grandchildren end their lives in Diaspora, although Jacob and, centuries later, Joseph, are buried in Israel.

Rachel and Joseph in particular are associated with exile in Jewish tradition. Giving birth to her second son Benjamin, Rachel dies on the road back from Haran and is buried by the roadside, the only one of the matriarchs and patriarchs not to be interred in the cave of Machpelah in Bethlehem. Centuries later, when the Jews are exiled to Babylonia after the destruction of the First Temple, the prophet Jeremiah laments, “A cry is heard in Ramah—wailing, bitter weeping—Rachel weeping for her children. She refuses to be comforted for her children, who are gone” (Jeremiah 31:15). In later rabbinic lore and in the Jewish liturgy, Mother Rachel serves as a symbol of compassion, comforting Jews in exile. Throughout the centuries, pictures of the Tomb of Rachel were hung in Jewish homes as symbols of messianic hope as well as mourning for the lost Temple and Jerusalem.

Because he spends most of his adulthood in pharaoh’s palace, Joseph is often taken as a symbol of the “court Jew,” an outsider who has assumed a position of influence among the ruling powers of his adopted country. So assimilated into Egyptian culture is Joseph that his brothers do not even recognize him when they come to beg for food in a time of famine. To honor Joseph, pharaoh gives him an Egyptian name, Zaphenath-paneah (“God speaks; he lives”) and an Egyptian wife, Asenath, daughter of Poti-phaera, priest of On.

Several other biblical characters are also associated with exile. Both Daniel and Esther, each the subject of a biblical book bearing their name, live in Persia among a Jewish Diaspora community. Like Joseph in Egypt, Daniel is a gifted dream interpreter, who uses this talent to become a court Jew, that is, to draw close to the ruling power and thereby improve the lot of his fellow Jews. As a woman, Esther’s options are more limited than Daniel’s but no less critical in aiding her people. Keeping her identity secret, she foils a plot laid by the anti-Semitic minister Haman and so saves the Persian Jews from wholesale destruction. Esther is the only biblical woman to play such a key leadership role in Diaspora. As such, she symbolizes the triumph of the powerless over powerful enemies.

Perhaps the most popular biblical symbol of the Jewish Diaspora is Elijah. Initially depicted in the book of Kings as a fiery prophet of vengeance, Elijah’s character is utterly transformed through the folklore process, especially after the destruction of the Second Temple. In rabbinic lore and folk legend, Elijah becomes the wandering Jew, appearing suddenly in a myriad of disguises—as slave, beggar, Arab, old man, wonder-worker. Most often, he aids Jews in dire need by granting wishes, bestowing treasure, revealing secrets, or dispensing wisdom. He also humbles the powerful and arrogant and teaches them lessons in basic human decency and compassion. He is the harbinger of the messianic age and, as such, symbolizes the eventual ingathering of Jewish exiles to the Land of Israel.

One relatively unfamiliar Jewish legend tells of a faraway land beyond the Sambatyon River, somewhere in the east, where the exiled 10 tribes live. Six days of the week the river boils with turbulence and churning rocks, so that no one can cross. And on the Sabbath, when the river rests, the Jews still remain trapped on the other side, for they are forbidden by Jewish law to travel on this day. A mirror image of the Garden of Eden story, this legend is a fantasy of a different kind of Jewish Diaspora, where Jews dwell in safety but are cut off from the world.

Certain foreign nations have traditionally symbolized various aspects of Jewish Diaspora. Although Babylonia destroyed the First Temple and exiled the Jewish population in the sixth century BCE, it later became a center of Jewish scholarship, the site of the major Talmudic academies of Sura and Pumpedita. As such, Babylonia came to symbolize the flourishing of Jewish learning in Diaspora, overshadowing Israel's own rabbinic institutions. The Babylonian edition of the Talmud has become standard in Jewish tradition, eclipsing its Palestinian counterpart.

In rabbinic literature, ancient Greece represents the temptations and dangers of assimilation. The Hellenistic Diaspora introduced Jews to Greek literature, aesthetics, lifestyle, sports, and thought, sometimes even seducing them into pagan belief and practice.

Unlike Greek civilization, which not only threatened but also enriched rabbinic culture, the Roman Empire was single-mindedly bent on destroying Jewish civilization. Rome was the engine of irreversible exile, the power that destroyed the Jewish homeland and scattered the Jewish people throughout the empire. In Jewish legend, liturgy, and art, Rome is a symbol of Israel's implacable enemy. To escape censorship and arrest by the non-Jewish authorities, rabbinic sages often referred to Rome euphemistically, using the names of biblical enemies such as Esau, Edom, and Amalek. The Arch of Titus, depicting triumphant Romans bringing captive Jews to Rome in chains, has also come to symbolize the curse of exile. To this day, traditional Jews refuse to walk under the arch, symbolizing their enduring animus against Rome.

Jewish theology reflects this long history of Diaspora. One classic designation for God is hamakom, "The Place," indicating that an omnipresent God, not a geographic location, is Israel's true home. In the Torah, the foundational text and national saga of Judaism, most of the events take place outside of Israel, in Egypt or in the no-man's-land of the wilderness. In the Torah, God's presence is sometimes symbolized by a pillar of fire and a pillar of cloud, which accompany the people as they journey through the desert. The biblical verb shohen (to dwell) is repeatedly applied to God's presence among the people, often within the Tabernacle (which itself contains the root, shohen). Eventually, this verb evolved into one of the divine names, Shekhinah (she who dwells), the most intimate aspect of God's manifestation, especially among the Jews in exile. Frequently, the Shekhinah is characterized as having wings, which shelter and carry the Jewish people. God is sometimes compared to an eagle, which bears its young on outspread wings: "You have seen what I did to the Egyptians, how I bore you on eagle's wings and brought you to Me" (Exodus 19:4). Hasidic masters embraced the image of the exiled Shekhinah, finding solace in the notion that God, like the Jews, suffers as an outcast. The Komarner Rebbe, Rabbi Yitzhak Eizik Safrin of Komarno, taught, "He who voluntarily leaves his home and wanders about as a beggar, living a life of discomfort, but trusting always in the Lord, becomes a partner in the 'Exile of the Shekhinah'" (Newman 1987, 502).

Relief on the Arch of Titus in Rome depicts the triumphant return of the emperor after the sack of the great Temple of Jerusalem in 70 CE. His spoils include the golden candelabra, or menorah. (iStockphoto)

Symbols of Jewish Diaspora in Holidays, Art, and Architecture

Throughout 20 centuries of Diaspora, Jews incorporated motifs of exile—God's protective presence, nostalgia for the Jewish homeland, the hope of redemption and return to Israel—into the observance of holidays, the liturgy, folk art, and synagogue architecture. Even after the State of Israel was established, these reminders of exile remain deeply embedded in Jewish life.

Jerusalem serves not only as a symbol of the Jewish homeland but also as an orientation point for Jews in Diaspora. For Jews living west of Jerusalem, "east" is the direction of prayer. The synagogue ark is traditionally situated on the eastern wall of the sanctuary, and the prayer leader—at least in traditional synagogues—faces east when conducting the service. Two forms of popular folk art—the mizrach (literally "east") and its synagogue counterpart, the shiviti (from the verse, "I have set—shivit—God before me always," Psalm 16:8)—have developed with the express purpose of orienting the onlooker's thoughts and prayers toward Jerusalem, similar in function to the Hindu mandala.

The Western Wall in Jerusalem, also known as the Wailing Wall, is the only extant architectural feature dating back to Second Temple times. Even though it was only a section of the western supporting wall of the Temple Mount and was built by Herod, not by the original Jewish builders, the wall has become one of the most widely displayed Jewish symbols, found in Jewish homes throughout the world, symbolizing the memory of the Temple's destruction and Diaspora Jews' enduring connection to the Jewish homeland.

Another embodiment of these memories is the fast day of Tisha B'Av, the ninth day of the Jewish month of Av, which commemorates the destruction of the First and Second Temples in Jerusalem (586 BCE and 70 CE), the expulsion from Spain (1492), and various other calamities in Jewish history. The Tisha B'Av evening service centers on the chanting of the biblical book of Lamentations, a graphically horrific portrait of the destruction of the Temple and Jerusalem, and the people's exile from the land. Early on in this mournful account, the narrator cries: "Judah has gone into exile" (Lamentations 1:3). The scripture read the next morning contains Moses' dire prophecies about the future of wayward Israel: "God will scatter you among the peoples, and only a scant few of you will be left among the nations to which God will drive you" (Deuteronomy 4:27). The additional prophetic reading for this day, Jeremiah 8:13–9:23, similarly foretells the destruction of the Temple and Jerusalem, and the people's exile. Numerous dirges (kinot) sung during the fast period echo these themes.

A partially assembled sukkah (booth or hut), built for the festival of Sukkoth, on a balcony in Jerusalem. (Yehuda Boltshauser)

In contradistinction to Tisha B'Av, the fall holiday of Sukkoth celebrates the miracle of Jewish survival in Diaspora. The sukkah, a flimsy dwelling made of wood and tree branches, represents the portable shelters that housed the children of Israel as they wandered in the desert toward the Promised Land. On a theological level, the sukkah symbolizes the fragility of human security, rootedness, and life itself. The 16th-century kabbalists of Safed introduced the custom of inviting to the sukkah seven biblical personalities called ushpizin (Aramaic for "guests," derived from the Latin, hospes), each of whom represents a mystical aspect of God. An Italian kabbalist, Menahem Azariah de Fano, enumerated seven female counterparts to the male guests (Sefer Asarah Ma'amarot, part 2, section 1). Like the prophet Elijah who visits every seder table throughout the Jewish world on the night of Passover, so, too, the ushpizin wander the Diaspora visiting each sukkah during the festival, thereby serving as bivalent symbols of both exile and sanctuary.

Selected Bibliography

- Davis, Eli, and Elise Davis. 1977. Jewish Folk Art Over the Ages. Jerusalem: Rubin Mass.
- Frankel, Ellen, and Betsy Teutsch. 1992. The Encyclopedia of Jewish Symbols. Northvale, NJ: Jason Aronson.
- Gaster, Theodore. 1980. The Holy and the Profane: Evolution of Jewish Folkways. Rev. ed. New York: William Morrow.
- Ginzberg, Louis. 1939. Legends of the Jews. 7 vols. Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society.
- Goodenough, Erwin R. 1988. Jewish Symbols in the Greco-Roman Period, edited and abridged by Jacob Neusner. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Guttman, Joseph, ed. 1970. Beauty in Holiness. New York: Ktav.
- Heschel, Abraham Joshua. 1954. Man's Quest for God: Studies in Prayer and Symbolism. New York: Scribners.
- Hirsch, Samson Raphael. 1957. "A Basic Outline of Jewish Symbolism." In Timeless Torah, edited by Jacob Breuer, 303–419. New York: Philip Feldheim.
- JPS TANAKH: The Holy Scriptures*. 1982. Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society.
- Newman, Louis. 1987. The Hasidic Anthology. Rev. ed. Northvale, NJ: Jason Aronson.
- Roth, Cecil, and Bezalel Narkiss. 1971. Jewish Art. Rev. ed. Greenwich, CT: New York Graphic Society.
- Scholem, Gershom. 1965. On the Kabbalah and Its Symbolism. New York: Schocken.
- Ungerleider-Mayerson, Joy. 1986. Jewish Folk Art from Biblical Days to Modern Times. New York: Summit Books.
- Vilnay, Zev. 1978. Legends of Jerusalem. Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society.
- Waskow, Arthur. 1982. Seasons of Our Joy. New York: Bantam.

Liturgy in the Diaspora

Raymond Apple

---

The Judaism of the early Diaspora, including its liturgy, took its cue from Eretz Israel. Jews living outside the Land paid national and spiritual homage to Jerusalem, depended on its determination of the religious calendar, and went on Temple pilgrimages. Worship centers created in places of Jewish population were not fully fledged temples; the Temple was in Jerusalem. Unusually, the Jewish colony at Elephantine in Egypt built an independent temple in the late seventh or early sixth century BCE—an “altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt” (Isaiah 19:19). Other Diaspora communities in Egypt, Syria, and other regions of the Greek and Roman empires accepted that sacrifices could not be offered outside the Jerusalem Temple but other liturgical practices were possible. At the same time, a standard prayer liturgy utilizing psalm and other texts was developing in Jerusalem, and a large number (said to be 400) of synagogues existed side by side with the Temple. In Herod’s time there was even a synagogue within the Temple precincts; it must be presumed that here and in synagogues elsewhere in Palestine and in Diaspora countries worshippers read or chanted psalms, recited the Shema and Ten Commandments, and read passages from the Torah on Sabbaths and festivals.

Moses, considered the greatest of all the Hebrew prophets, led the Israelites from Egypt to Israel around 1250 BCE and founded the legal and ethical principles of the Israelite nation. He is depicted here holding the Ten Commandments. (Library of Congress)

The liturgy remembered from Jerusalem was maintained by the exiles in Babylon, with the addition of prophetic homilies from Ezekiel and others, though this type of worship was regarded as inferior to the sacrificial ritual. After the return from exile and the erection of the Second Temple, the sizable community remaining outside the Land had private as well as community places of worship, including the grand synagogues in Alexandria and Antioch. When the Second Temple was destroyed in 70 CE the nonsacrificial liturgy of the synagogue became the standard mode of worship, though the hope remained that the sanctuary would be rebuilt and sacrifices reinstated.

Roman rule was resented, and there was even liturgical resistance, for example, to the words, “Our Father, our King, we have no King but You” in the Avinu Malkenu prayer. After the Jewish revolt was crushed, prayers for the restoration of Zion and the Temple and the coming of the “kingdom of Heaven” were maintained, but Diaspora Jews tried to adapt to their new circumstances and obey the law of the land, and they found it expedient to pray for their Gentile overlords. There were, however, constant reminders of Jewish insecurity and in time great occasions such as Passover and Yom Kippur concluded with the cry, “Next year in Jerusalem!”

In Talmudic times, the development of a set liturgy was hampered by the paucity of manuscript prayer books; prayers were recited by heart and prayer leaders resorted to improvisation. Divergent prayer texts grew, especially between Palestinian and Babylonian rites. Travelers from one center to the other brought their own customs and liturgical emphases with them. Babylon, for example, placed more emphasis on public prayer than did Palestine. Differences included variants in the concluding phrases of certain benedictions and the preference for one version of a prayer over another (e.g., Ahavat Olam is used in the morning service in Babylon versus Ahavah Rabbah in Palestine).

In time, the two communities developed different Hebrew pronunciations, systems of vocalization and accentuation, and even divergent scriptural texts. Torah readings in Babylon were on an annual cycle versus the triennial (or three and a half year) cycle in Eretz Israel and parts of Egypt. Maimonides (12th century) calls the annual cycle the universal practice even in Palestine, though traces of the triennial cycle lingered on and the haftarot (prophetical portions) read in some places (e.g., the Roman usage in Corfu) reflect that cycle. Almost every sizable community in Asia Minor and Mediterranean lands had separate Babylonian and Palestinian synagogues.

The Babylonian center was on strained terms with Eretz Israel. Babylon claimed that Palestinian customs were based on heresy and ignorance, though these allegations may have arisen out of unfamiliarity with the Jerusalem Talmud and the history of Palestinian Halacha. The Crusader invasion meant the decline of the authentic Palestinian tradition, though its features have now become known from genizah material. Because the annual cycle prolonged the Sabbath service, some modern congregations attempted to reinstate the triennial cycle, but had little success. After World War I, when an influenza pandemic made it advisable to curtail public gatherings, a few synagogues resorted to a form of triennial cycle, but later returned to the annual cycle.

The diverging liturgies alarmed the geonim to the extent that Sa'adia Gaon (10th century) feared that Jewish worship would become fragmented and forgotten and Judaism itself would disintegrate. Jewish scholars in Spain asked Amram, gaon of Sura (ninth century), for a guide to the order of the prayers. His response was in effect the first complete Jewish prayer book and laid the foundations for Jewish prayer literature. The second such work was by Sa'adia Gaon (10th century), who addressed himself not only to scholars but also to the ordinary Jew for whom he provided a commentary in Arabic. The basis of the Ashkenazi liturgy was laid in Vitry, in northern France, where Simhah ben Samuel, a contemporary of Rashi (11th century) compiled the Mahzor Vitry. The liturgy of medieval Anglo-Jewry was recorded in the Etz Hayyim, produced ca. 1286 by Jacob ben Judah, hazzan of London.

The Babylonian/Palestinian dichotomy did not affect every part of the Jewish world. Ethiopian Jewry, which was unaware of Talmudic Judaism and remained apart from the Jewish mainstream, developed its own liturgy using local languages instead of Hebrew, read the Bible in book form instead of a scroll, and used prayers that made no reference to broader Jewish national events. In Israel, some Ethiopians now study the Talmud, but their community is determined to maintain its own traditions. Ethiopians who attend mainstream synagogues tend to follow the oriental Sephardi pattern.

In time, a link was suggested between the Babylonian/Palestinian dichotomy and the Ashkenazi ("German")/Sephardi ("Spanish") rift. Though "Ashkenaz" (Genesis 10:3) had come to be identified with Germany and "Sephard" (Obadiah 1:20) with Spain, the two groupings roughly denoted the Jews of Christian Europe and those of Mediterranean countries. Their different traditions led in the 19th century to Leopold Zunz, Solomon J. L. Rapoport, and others arguing that the Palestinian usage in liturgy, religious practice, Hebrew pronunciation, and hymnody survived in Italy and migrated across Europe to become the Ashkenazi tradition, whereas the Babylonian usage, dominant around the Mediterranean, became the Sephardi rite. This explains why some groups (e.g., Egypt, Syria, Iran, Iraq, and Yemen) who adopted a Sephardi form of liturgy had no intrinsic connection with Spain. Spanish connections are more evident in Turkey, Greece, Holland, England, and their derivatives. The Chinese Jews of Kaifeng, claiming a lineage from early in the common era, used a rite similar to that of Yemen.

Differences between the traditions appeared in many areas but particularly in liturgy. According to H. J. Zimmels, “There is hardly any prayer in which the Ashkenazim and the Sephardim do not deviate from each other” (1958, 99). There are varying attitudes toward incorporating piyyutim (liturgical hymns) in the prayer book, the Ashkenazim being more in favor and the Sephardim less so. Ashkenazim were originally more particular about covering the head during worship and standing during the Torah reading. Prayer melodies also diverged noticeably, often reflecting the style of the local environment. Festival customs differed, especially on Passover.

Questions arose as to whether a congregation or individual might move from one affiliation to another or adopt the alternative Hebrew pronunciation. On both issues, rabbinic opinion was cautious but, on an ad hoc basis, a Sephardi was allowed to officiate in an Ashkenazi synagogue and vice versa. There is debate concerning the liturgical tradition (Nussah Ari) of Isaac Luria (HaAri is derived from the initials of the Hebrew, “The godly Rabbi Isaac”). If Luria was an Ashkenazi, why did he adopt Sephardi patterns? If he was always a Sephardi, he was maintaining the family tradition. One view is that his father was Ashkenazi and his mother Sephardi, and by upbringing and personal preference he followed Sephardi customs, though his siddur incorporates elements of both, which renders dubious the term applied to his rite, Nussah S’farad. Luria was not alone in preferring elements of the Sephardi liturgy; Ashkenazim occasionally became “naturalized” Sephardim, feeling that the Sephardi ritual was more precise.

Sephardi and Ashkenazi traditions both had many subgroups, which were all adamant that theirs was the authentic usage. Ashkenazim had Western and Eastern European variants with their own further divisions; the Sephardim had the North African and Spanish/Portuguese rites and their variants. All (often with manuals recording their particular tradition) accompanied their adherents on their migrations. Other rites, independent of both, include the proudly maintained Italian traditions, which have ancient antecedents—probably from the time of the Second Temple—that predate the Ashkenazi/Sephardi division. Isaac Luria’s followers liken what they claim to be 12 rites to the 12 tribes of Israel: all are windows opened to God, but the 13th, superior to all, is Nussah Ari.

The various rites differed in style more than substance and often echoed the musical and even pietistic idioms of their environment. Thus, German Judaism was known for punctuality, precision, and decorum. Hasidic practice, with the same liturgical core, was more passionate and spontaneous. Western Europe adopted stately musical modes, whereas in Eastern Europe the music was more emotional and less formalized. Hebrew prayer remained the core of the liturgy but some more acculturated communities allowed the vernacular on some occasions and used vernacular nomenclature for their officials and rituals. Many of these developments arose out of social history, including the fear of Gentile disapproval at a time when Jews were seeking social and political emancipation. In England, there were fears that Jewish respectability would suffer if synagogues were indecorous, services were undignified, and Jews lacked cultured preachers.

All groups responded to both external and internal influences. External influences included historical events, especially persecution, both of a general Jewish and a localized kind. Deliverances from calamity were acknowledged by means of special Purims with their own forms of worship. Christianity and Islam influenced and were influenced by Jewish worship; there was no cross-fertilization with eastern religions, though in recent times some Jews have become acquainted with Buddhism and even Hinduism in a search for personal spirituality. Current communities in the Far East, mostly of recent origin, brought traditions from elsewhere and have little connection with local non-Jewish faiths.

Medieval Christian pietistic practices, particularly in commemoration of the dead, came into Judaism in modified form in Germany and moved into most sections of the Jewish world. There were significant Jewish liturgical responses to Christian claims. Apart from abandoning kneeling as a common Jewish practice, the liturgy engaged in subtle polemics upholding the pure monotheism of Jewish belief. More openly, the medieval sixth stanza of the Hanukkah hymn “Ma’oz Tzur” referred to persecution by the Roman church “in the shadow of the cross.” Christian censorship of Jewish worship in Ashkenazi countries included attacks on the Alenu because it cited the scriptural verses “they worship vanity and emptiness and worship a god that cannot save” (Isaiah 30:7, 45:20), which were taken as offensive to Christianity. In 1703, the Prussian government ordered these words to be deleted. Christianity also entered the synagogue through christological sermons that Jews were compelled to attend. In Rome, the installation of a new pope entailed Jewish obeisance in the form of bringing a Torah scroll to the Vatican.

Islamic influence included pietistic practices such as washing both feet and hands before prayer, though washing the feet did not become widespread among Jews; prayer customs and posture; and the poetical style of some piyyutim. Islamic monotheism, being closer to Judaism, did not require extensive liturgical polemics as occurred with Christianity. Islamic fatalism did however affect the High Holiday hymn “Unetanneh Tokef,” dating from the time of 11th-century Christian persecution. A Jewish response comes in the last line, asserting that human penitence, prayer, and charity “avert the evil decree.”

Persecution constantly affected both the Sephardi and, more visibly, the Ashkenazi liturgy. In the resultant passages, the suffering is not blamed entirely on the enemy’s wickedness but at least partly on Jewish sinfulness (“because of our sins we were exiled from our land”). Martyrologies appear in particular in the Tisha B’Av prayers, which now often include kinoth (dirges) reflecting the Holocaust.

Geographical and climatic influences include prayers for dew and rain (v’ten tal umatar), which commence in the Diaspora later in the year than in Eretz Israel. In the antipodes some rabbis (e.g., Francis Lyon Cohen in Australia) changed the order of the prayers for dew (Tal) and rain (Geshem), inserting Tal on Sh'mini Atzeret instead of Pesah and Geshem on Pesah instead of Sh'mini Atzeret, in the belief that these prayers were for the whole world, not only Eretz Israel. Such modifications have now been abandoned.

Political issues included the prayers to be said for rulers and how to word such prayers in an anti-Semitic country. In Nazi Germany, many congregations omitted the prayers for the government, though they were retained in the Soviet Union in the communist period by the few synagogues that remained open. English-speaking countries, where Jewish communities have enjoyed great stability, have always made a feature of prayers for the regime. In recent years many communities have introduced prayers for the Israel Defence Forces.

Every Halachic scholar participated in debates across the centuries as to when and how to say various prayers or whether to preface major prayers and observances with meditations (kavvanot). Poetical accretions were strictly maintained by some communities, especially those that followed Moses Sofer (the Hatam Sofer) of Pressburg (late 18th to early 19th centuries), but were abandoned or modified by others such as Nathan Marcus Adler and his son Hermann, chief rabbis of England, who modified the Anglo-Jewish minhag by liturgical concessions in the late 19th century.

Despite the emphasis on worshipping with a congregation, personal spirituality expressed itself in private prayer, and examples from Talmudic sources were inserted in the siddurim of all rites. Various places in the Amidah were recommended for the insertion of individual prayers, such as prayers for the sick. Introductory reflections on the themes of various prayers and practices were largely the work of Nathan Hannover (17th century), whose Sha'arei Zion brought kabbalistic themes into the standard liturgy. Mediterranean communities said bakkashot (petitions) in the early hours of Sabbath morning. Women, who often lacked Hebrew knowledge and did not regularly attend synagogue services, had their devotional books (tehinnoth), generally in Yiddish or another Jewish vernacular, and women's groups met to pray and weep together and hear stories from the Bible and Midrash. Meditation, though known already in Second Temple times, returned to Jewish practice under kabbalistic influence. Jewish meditation techniques have been adopted by some contemporary groups, even in mainstream congregations.

Hasidic prayer played a role in the controversies with the movement's opponents. The latter objected to the unpunctuality and imprecision of Hasidic worship and its innovations, for example, the formula "For the sake of the unification of the Holy One blessed be He and His Shekhinah," which they saw as theologically suspect, tending toward Sabbateanism and a prejudgment of the issue of whether the precepts require kavvanah (intention). Nonetheless the emotionalism of Hasidic worship had a wide influence. Since the modern revival of interest in the movement, outsiders, regardless of the doctrines of the movement, have come under the sway of Hasidic practices. Habad rabbis in particular have attracted many who found establishment Judaism cold and predictable.

Diaspora communities, though not in classical Reform, always prayed for the restoration of Eretz Israel. Even in Israel, the traditional references to living in exile persist, and there has been resistance to liturgical changes to reflect the new situation, such as Rabbi Shlomo Goren's modernization of the Nahem prayer on Tisha B'Av afternoon. There are differing views as to the religious significance of the state. Some versions of the Prayer for Israel use a text by Chief Rabbi Isaac HaLevy Herzog, referring to "the first flowering of our redemption—reshit tzemihat ge'ulatenu" whilst others pray merely for "ahenu b'Eretz Yisrael—our brethren in the Land of Israel" and others do not recite any such prayer at all. The Diaspora usage of two days of festivals (yomtov sheni shel galuyyot) where Israel observes only one (except for Rosh Hashanah, which lasts two days even in Israel, and Yom Kippur, which is only one day everywhere) required the development of second-day liturgies and readings, allowing Diaspora communities, for example, a separate day for Simhath Torah where Israel combines Shemini Atzeret and Simhath Torah. Diaspora Jews who celebrate the festivals in Israel follow a range of practices on the second days; some rabbis insist that congregants who intend to return to the Diaspora continue to observe two days while other rabbis give more lenient advice.

In the Diaspora, there have always been migrations from one land to another, either forced or voluntary. As a result the whole range of traditions—and siddurim—has been carried around the world, and immigrants have clung to their ancestral practices in their new milieus. Ashkenazim who came to London in the late 17th and early 18th centuries brought with them the ways of Hamburg, and the "English" rite they established was described as "the Polish minhag (custom) as used in Hamburg." In larger communities there were several synagogues each following its own ritual; some smaller communities had more than one group praying in different parts of the one building. Newcomers were often highly suspicious of the validity of the minhag and the competence of the rabbis in their new locale. Issues still arise when a new rabbi changes the established pattern or congregants insist on using their own nussah when saying Kaddish or leading services.

There are also problems as to the production of standard prayer books. Even where there is relative liturgical homogeneity, as in Britain, there are calls for variant practices to be acknowledged in the Singer ("authorized") Daily Prayer Book, though the original compiler in the late 19th century based himself on the rule books of the founding congregations of the London United Synagogue. In the United States, the Rabbinical Council of America did not entirely succeed in creating a unified liturgy for Modern Orthodox congregations. Though there was high respect for the editorial skills and English style of Rabbi David de Sola Pool, other groups continued to prefer different siddurim.

Non-Orthodox movements often began with liturgical modifications. In the early 19th century, battle was joined on issues such as worship in Hebrew; prayers for the restoration of sacrifices, the return to Zion, and rebuilding of the Temple; and references to a personal Messiah and the resurrection of the dead. The acceptance of instrumental music on Sabbath, mixed choirs of men and women, Gentile singers, and worship with uncovered heads and without tallithim (prayer shawls), also provoked controversy. Separate seating for men and women was not originally an issue, though mixed seating, egalitarian services including female officiants, and calling women to the Torah, later became normative. Non-Orthodox movements formulated their own prayer books, which incorporated modern material from non-Jewish as well as Jewish sources. How traditional a service should be is regularly debated in Reform, Conservative, Reconstructionist, and other non-Orthodox groups. Some compromise by retaining the original Hebrew text while adding an interpretive translation, thus sidestepping major theological questions but keeping the emotional flavor of the familiar words. An example is the Reconstructionist use of Hebrew names for God while the word “God” is reinterpreted as process, not person. The German Orthodox leader David Hoffmann objected to innovations being “hidden or obscured by paraphrases.”

Hoffmann was a powerful champion of tradition and persuaded some German communities to retain the Orthodox siddur and reject a new liturgy that allegorized doctrines such as messianism, the resurrection of the dead, and the rebuilding of the Temple. In the modern period, however, congregations have moved from one category to another, with the consequent changes in liturgy and ritual practice.

Selected Bibliography

- Abrahams, I. 1914. Companion to the Authorised Daily Prayer Book. London: Eyre & Spottiswoode.
- Baer, S. 1868. Seder Avodat Yisrael. Berlin: Schocken.
- Brodie, I., ed. 1962–1967. The Etz Hayyim of R. Jacob ben Jehuda of London. Jerusalem: Mossad HaRav Kook.
- Cohen, J. M. 1993. Blessed Are You: A Comprehensive Guide to Jewish Prayer. Northvale, NJ: Jason Aronson.
- Elbogen, I. 1967. Der Juedische Gottesdienst. Hildesheim: Olms.
- Encyclopedia Judaica*. 1972. S.V. “Liturgy.” Jerusalem: Keter.
- Idelsohn, A. Z. 1932. Jewish Liturgy and Its Development. New York: Sacred Music Press.
- Jacobs, L. 1972. Hasidic Prayer. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul.
- Jacobson, B. S. 1966. Meditations on the Siddur. Tel Aviv: Sinai.
- Levy, I. 1963. The Synagogue: Its History and Function. London: Vallentine Mitchell.
- Petuchowski, J. J. 1970. Contributions to the Scientific Study of Jewish Liturgy. New York: Ktav.
- Wieder, N. 1947. Islamic Influences on Jewish Worship. London: Oxford University Press.
- Zimmels, H. J. 1958. Ashkenazim and Sephardim. London: Oxford University Press.
- Zunz, L. 1859. Die Ritus des Synagogalen Gottesdienst. Berlin: Springer.

The Concept of Exile and Diaspora in Sephardi Thought

Marc D. Angel

---

During their many centuries in exile, Jews tried to understand the meaning of their predicament. The prevalent religious explanation was “because of our sins we have been exiled from our land” (from the holiday musaf prayer). The exile is a punishment of temporary duration. Ultimately, God will send the Messiah to redeem the Jews and return them to their Land of Israel, where they will live in peace, prosperity, and spiritual fulfillment. Maimonides believed the messianic age would be preceded by sincere repentance among the Jews (Mishneh Torah, Laws of Repentance, 9:2). When God accepts this repentance, he will end Israel’s exile.

The 11th-century Sephardic poet, Judah Halevi, captured the Jewish feeling of exile in his poem “Libi bemizrah”: “My heart is in the east [Israel] but I am in the furthest west [Spain].” He would gladly forfeit the comforts in his land of exile, if only he could return to the homeland of his people. Throughout the centuries, Jews longed for the coming of the Messiah, the ingathering of Jews in the Land of Israel, and the end of the exile.

Although exile was generally understood as punishment, positive value was also attributed to it. The Talmud (Pesachim 87b) records the opinion of Rabbi Eliezer that Jews were exiled so they could gather converts in the lands of their dispersion. The Sephardic biblical commentator Rabbi Yitzhak Abravanel suggested that the sufferings of exile were a means of spiritual purification, a necessary evil on the road to messianic times (commentary on Bereishith, chapter 15).

Among the Sephardic kabbalists of 16th-century Safed, the exile of Israel was viewed as the earthly manifestation of the symbolic exile of the Divine Presence. Just as Jews mourned their own state of exile, they were also to mourn for God’s exile, that is, his distancing himself from Israel and humanity. The earthly and metaphysical exiles reflected a spiritual breakdown in the relationship between God and Israel, indicating a deeper universal alienation between God and humanity. Redemption of Israel will signify a restoration of the spiritual harmony that was supposed to prevail between God and his creations.

Some Safed kabbalists thought human action could hasten the arrival of the Messiah. Rabbi Yaacov Berav, who settled in Safed about 1535, restored the ancient practice of granting semikah (rabbinic ordination). This form of ordination had ceased with the exile of Jews from Israel during Roman times. Reinstating semikah in the Land of Israel, Rabbi Berav thought, was a step toward reestablishing the Sanhedrin, the authoritative judicial body of Judaism. It was generally believed the Sanhedrin would only be restored in messianic times.

Yosef Nasi, one of the most prominent Jews of the 16th-century Ottoman Empire, sought to establish a Jewish settlement in the vicinity of Tiberias. By creating industry there, he hoped Jews would be attracted to return to their ancestral land.

This would hasten the ingathering of exiles to Israel—and help induce the coming of the Messiah.

Messianic longings came to a head during the 17th century, with the emergence of the pseudo-messiah Sabbatai Zevi. Born in Izmir, Sabbatai Zevi was a charismatic mystic who succeeded in convincing much of world Jewry that he was the long-awaited Messiah. He was expected to usher in the redemption in 1666. When he accepted Islam under threat of death by the sultan, the messianic bubble burst. Although some fervent followers retained faith that Sabbatai Zevi would reemerge as the Messiah, most Jews recognized that he had perpetrated a cruel fraud. A deep despondency afflicted much of world Jewry. A pervasive feeling emerged that Jews should accept their fate in exile and wait patiently—and passively—for the Almighty to redeem them when he was ready to do so.

However, some believed it possible to force God's hand and hasten the coming of the Messiah through human efforts. Rabbi Hayyim Abulafia (ca. 1660–1744), an erudite and saintly sage who grew up in Jerusalem, was among those who expected the arrival of the Messiah in 1740. The Talmud indicated that the future redemption of Israel would manifest itself in Tiberias (Rosh Hashanah 31); so Rabbi Abulafia decided to reestablish a Jewish community there. Although the Messiah did not appear in 1740, Rabbi Abulafia continued his efforts to rebuild the city. In 1742, Rabbi Hayyim Benattar (1696–1743), a great sage born in Sale, Morocco, visited Rabbi Abulafia in Tiberias. Some thought the meeting of these two saintly personalities in the holy city of Tiberias would bring on the messianic era. According to a traditional story, though, the two sages realized redemption was not imminent. They embraced, wept, and foretold each other's deaths. Rabbi Benattar died in the summer of 1743, and Rabbi Abulafia died in the spring of 1744.

View of the Sea of Galilee from the ancient, and modern, city of Tiberias, Israel. (Gilad Levy)

The Safed kabbalists, Rabbi Abulafia, and others undertook specific actions to hasten the coming of the Messiah, but their activism was rooted in a mystical worldview. They believed their deeds would not in themselves lead to redemption, but would trigger a response from God so that he would send the Messiah and end Israel's exile. In the 19th century, though, Rabbi Yehuda Alkalai (1798–1879) called for a practical, this-worldly activism aimed at restoring Jewish sovereignty in the Jews' ancestral homeland.

Born in Sarajevo, Rabbi Alkalai published his first work, Shema Yisrael, in 1834. He called on rabbis to inspire members of their communities to migrate to the Land of Israel. In this and later writings, he stressed the need for Jews to take the initiative in ending their position of political powerlessness. The key to ending the exile was for Jews to move to the Land of Israel, build a sound economy, and learn to govern themselves. Rabbi Alkalai argued that the Jewish tradition recognized two phases in the ultimate redemption of the Jews. The first was a natural, gradual return to the Land of Israel; the second was a miraculous redemption led by the Messiah. He believed the Jews of his generation should undertake the first phase of the redemption by taking practical measures to restore Jewish life in the Holy Land.

Rabbi Alkalai was pragmatic in his analysis. He favored a gradual—not massive—immigration to Israel, so that the economy and government there could grow organically and slowly. Those who went there first would lay the groundwork for others who would come later. He thought Jews in Israel should work in a variety of commercial activities, including agriculture. To ensure the stability of the Jewish enterprise, he called on Jewish leaders throughout the Diaspora to seek the support of the heads of state of the nations of the world. He also undertook to create a charitable mechanism among world Jewry, whereby the Jewish settlements in Israel could be supported until they were self-sufficient.

Rabbi Alkalai, a prolific author, traveled far and wide preaching his message that true repentance entailed a return to the Land of Israel. To end the exile, Jews needed to shed their passivity and dependence on miracles; they had to exert their energies to bring on their own redemption. Once the Jews did their part, only then will the Almighty complete the process of redemption by sending the Messiah.

Although Rabbi Alkalai's view found few supporters during his lifetime, his teachings took root in subsequent generations, leading to a more practical and activist approach to Jewish redemption. Yet even during the modern period, not all Jews shared Rabbi Alkalai's vision. Some retained their traditional passivity, patiently awaiting miraculous intervention; others were moving in another spiritual direction altogether.

When Jews were gaining political rights in Europe during the 19th century, many no longer felt as though they were in "exile," but rather that they were part of a Jewish Diaspora, that is, a religious group whose members willingly lived in different countries. The Reform movement, which arose in Germany, eschewed the notion that Jews yearned to return to the Land of Israel. Rather, it stressed, Jews were members of a religion and not a nation; they were “Germans of the Mosaic persuasion.” While Reform took this attitude to the extreme, other westernized Jews also thought of themselves more as citizens of their countries of residence than as members of an exiled Jewish people awaiting return to Israel.

Most Sephardic Jews lived in Muslim countries and were less prone to the westernized view of exile and Diaspora. Sephardim, even those who were relatively comfortable in their societies, still saw themselves as members of the Jewish nation in exile. With the rise of the State of Israel in 1948, the majority of Jews in Muslim countries migrated to Israel, often with a sense of fulfillment of a pre-Messianic redemption. The long exile was finally ending.

Selected Bibliography

- Angel, Marc D. 1991. Voices in Exile: A Study in Sephardic Intellectual History. Hoboken, NJ: Ktav Publishing House.
- Angel, Marc D. 2006. Foundations of Sephardic Spirituality: The Inner Life of Jews of the Ottoman Empire. Woodstock, VT: Jewish Lights.

Lurianic Kabbalah and the Idea of the Diaspora

Shaul Magid

---

The 16th century was a century of great Jewish intellectual activity, especially in the area of Kabbalah. It was also a time of great Jewish migration eastward from the Iberian Peninsula to Jewish centers in Amsterdam, Italy, Greece, Poland, and particularly Eretz Israel (the Land of Israel). Eretz Israel was conquered by the Ottomans in 1516, and Sultan Bayezid II embarked on a modernization project in which the Jews from Spain and Portugal played a constructive role. He invited many exiles to immigrate to his empire. Many who settled in Eretz Israel did so for religious reasons, as Eretz Israel was still the backwater of the empire and held little economic opportunities. This was arguably the first sustained and systematic repopulation of Eretz Israel since the destruction of the second Commonwealth in 70 CE. The cities of Acre, Tiberias, Gaza, Jerusalem, and Safed were all sites of Jewish immigration in this period and subsequently became centers of Jewish intellectual life.

Safed already had a small yet stable Jewish community by the beginning of the 16th century. Its Jewish population increased dramatically after 1516 until the latter third of that century when it began a steady decline due to periods of harsh plague, conflict with the Arab population, and other maladies. During the short period from the 1530s until the late 1570s Safed had a robust kabbalistic community led by the renowned kabbalist Moses Cordovero (d. 1570). By 1570, it was the global center of Kabbalah. In that year, a young and virtually unknown aspiring kabbalist, Isaac Luria Ashkenazi (d. 1572), arrived in Safed from Egypt with the expressed intent of studying with Cordovero. Luria was born in Jerusalem to a Sephardic mother and Ashkenazic father, who died when he was a small child. He was raised by a wealthy maternal uncle in Egypt, where he also studied with the well-known Talmudists Bezalel Ashkenazi (no relation) and David ibn Zamra (who also immigrated to Safed around this time). As far as historians know (there is little data that is not hagiographic) he was an autodidact in the Jewish mystical tradition.

Prayers and petitions made at the grave of Rabbi Isaac Luria in the ancient cemetery in Safed, the city where the Kabbalah, Judaism's foremost body of mystical texts, celebrated its most significant development in the 16th century. (Richard T. Nowitz/Corbis)

Raised in the comfort of privilege, Luria was quite precocious and apparently very charismatic. After a few short months Luria parted with the kabbalistic master Cordovero—disagreeing with his rendering of certain passages from the medieval classic of Kabbalah, the Zohar—and began teaching a group of students that soon included the long-time disciple of Cordovero, Hayyim Vital. Vital quickly became Luria's primary disciple, and much of Luria's teaching that has survived (he wrote little) was filtered to some degree through Vital and Vital's son Samuel.

This period in Safed was full of messianic anticipation. Although there were some tragic false messianic figures in the generation before Luria, such as David Reubeni and Abraham Halevi, the demographic shift from Iberia to Eretz Israel was interpreted by many kabbalists as a sign of the impending redemption. There was even a failed attempt in Safed by the rabbinic leader Jacob Berab to reinstitute official ordination (semikha) in preparation for what many hoped would be a renewed Sanhedrin or high rabbinic court in the Third Temple in Jerusalem. This is all to say that Eretz Israel played a major role in this kabbalistic school. One example of the centrality of Eretz Israel among these kabbalists is the short monograph published by a disciple of Cordovero and Luria, Nathan Shapira, entitled Tuv ha-Aret, first published in 1616, which was devoted entirely to the mystical dimensions of the Land of Israel according to the kabbalistic teachings of Cordovero and Luria. Cordovero, who spent most of his life in Safed, stressed the metaphysical and ontological difference between Eretz Israel and the Diaspora, which kabbalists refer to simply as huz la-aretz (outside the land). Cordovero's focus on Eretz Israel was more conventional than Luria's (Luria grew up in Egypt and only lived in Eretz Israel for a short 18 months before dying of a plague in the summer of 1572).

Given its location in Safed, it is somewhat surprising that not only does the Lurianic circle acknowledge the Diaspora, but it also views the Diaspora as an essential dimension of its messianic vision. In the minds of these mystics, these physical locations (Israel/outside Israel) are reified into metaphysical constructs. The sanctity of Eretz Israel is attributable to the unique divine effluence that descends to its very soil. This dimension of Lurianic teaching becomes essential for the mystical Zionism of Abraham Isaac Kook in the early 20th century. The Talmudic sages remark that "the air of Erez Yisrael makes one wise." Although these kabbalists surely agree and offer innovative rendering of this passage, there is still a notion that huz la-aretz plays a central role in the final chapter of Jewish exile and should not be negated or abandoned before the end-time.

Lurianic cosmology is founded on the notion that during creation a tumultuous rupture resulted in the descent of shards of cosmic vessels that contained sparks of divinity into the netherworld. These shards descended into what became the realm of the demonic, trapping them in this dark space ostensibly void of God. Exile is a state whereby Israel is commissioned by God, via the covenant (Torah), to weaken the demonic and liberate these sparks from their imprisoned state, enabling them to return to the (broken) God above and resulting in redemption of the world. In the Lurianic imagination, redemption is the transformation and culmination of the world as we know it. This process, generically called tikkun, or reparation, was completed through a combination of Jews fulfilling mitzvah (divine commandments) and proper meditative practices accompanying these mitzvot (known in Lurianic nomenclature as kavvanah) performed by the kabbalistic elite. Included in this process of tikkun were ascetic practices of penance and visiting the graves of past righteous men in order to strengthen individual souls to achieve a state of completion.

The details of Lurianic cosmology are far beyond the scope of this short entry. For these limited purposes, it is important to note that many of the imprisoned sparks exist in geographical areas where the demonic is most dominant, that is, outside Eretz Israel. Thus, although these kabbalists remained ensconced in Safed (after Luria's death many in his circle dispersed to parts of Italy, Syria, and Poland), they stressed that there were many divine sparks embedded in the lands outside Israel that needed liberation. In some cases, Luria was able to accomplish this feat of tikkun without the need to relocate. However, abandoning the Diaspora before the final sparks were redeemed was viewed by some as an act of forcing the end and was prohibited by the rabbinic sages.

The relationship between the Land of Israel, the Diaspora, and redemption is a complex one in Kabbalah more generally and Lurianic Kabbalah in particular. According to rabbinic Judaism, Eretz Israel is the locale of the fulfillment of God's promise and thus its holiness, even in exile, remains intact. According to most medieval codes, living in Eretz Israel fulfills a positive commandment and, in some opinions, is an obligation. In post-rabbinic Judaism this idea is perhaps articulated most strongly by the 11th-century philosopher, mystic, and poet Judah Halevi (who lived in Spain) and the kabbalist and jurist Moses Nahmanides, who immigrated to Eretz Israel from Barcelona in the late 13th century. One of the main criteria of Messiah in rabbinic texts later codified by Moses Maimonides was the "gathering of the exiles from the four corners of the earth," that is, a massive demographic shift from the Diaspora to Eretz Israel. Such a dictum came alive among early traditional proto-Zionists and Zionists, such as Abraham Kalisher and Yehuda Alkalai, and its secularized version led to the Zionist notion of "negating the exile," which was common in the labor Zionism of David Ben-Gurion, among others.

Some kabbalists had a more creative and, one might say, daring view of the notion of the ingathering. One early kabbalist, Abraham bar Hiyya (d. ca. 1136), made the audacious claim that in the future the entire world will be called Eretz Israel (Megillat ha-Megillot, Scroll of the Revealer, 110). While this is surely a marginal position (he was addressing a certain issue regarding the resurrection of the dead) it is one that emerges among some Lurianic kabbalists and was perhaps even advocated by Luria himself. Moshe Idel notes that there is an important distinction between Bar Hiyya and the Lurianic position. Bar Hiyya argues that the transformation of the Diaspora into Eretz Israel will result from resurrection, that is, it will indicate the final end of exile. Exile is understood here as the distinction between the holy and profane and not simply one of Jewish geographic and even existential existence. For Luria, it seems, it is precisely the act of performing mitzvah in this world that erases the boundaries separating the holy from the profane and separating the land outside Eretz Israel from Eretz Israel itself.

This idea is more common among kabbalists living in the Diaspora, such as Naphtali Hertz Bacharach (who lived in Poland), author of Emek ha-Melekh, whereas the Lurianic circle that remained in Eretz Israel seemed to harbor the idea that the demonic realm (the Diaspora) would be destroyed and not transformed in the future. In either case, however, it is quite clear that the Lurianic position was not to reject the Diaspora/exile/land outside Eretz Israel. Quite the opposite, his metaphysics requires engagement with this land and its metaphysical correlate in order to redeem the trapped sparks, liberating God from self-imposed exile and redeeming the world. One could argue that according to Luria, Jews should not abandon the Diaspora before they are no longer needed there. When that is, is anyone's guess. It is not insignificant, however, that many in Luria's circle emigrated from Eretz Israel to Italy and other parts of Europe and the Levant after his death when the messianic hope that captured the imagination of his generation went unfulfilled. Perhaps they believed they still had a mystical role to play in the Diaspora.

Many stayed in Eretz Israel and thus the importance of Eretz Israel continued to play a role in kabbalistic thinking. But the Diaspora remained a live and necessary category for Lurianic kabbalists and thus an important dimension of Jewish habitation and piety in post-Lurianic mysticism.

Selected Bibliography

- Fine, Lawrence. 2003. Physician of the Soul, Healer of the Cosmos: Isaac Luria and His Kabbalistic Fraternity. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.
- Idel, Moshe. 1980. "Some Conceptions of the Land of Israel in Medieval Jewish Thought." In A Straight Path: Studies in Medieval Philosophy and Culture, Essays in Honor of Arthur Hyman, edited by Ruth Link-Salinger, 124–141. Washington, DC: The Catholic University of America Press.
- Idel, Moshe. 1986. "The Land of Israel in Medieval Kabbalah." In The Land of Israel: Jewish Perspectives, Lawrence A. Hoffman, 170–187. South Bend, IN: Notre Dame University Press.
- Rosenberg, Shalom. 1983. "Exile and Redemption in Jewish Thought in the Sixteenth Century." In Jewish Thought in the Sixteenth Century, edited by Bernard Cooperman, 399–430. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Communication in the Premodern Jewish Diaspora

Sophia Menache

---

Like any other human activity, communication is the product of space and time; its means, scope, and content are critically influenced by the particular socioeconomic and political framework. Different societies develop their own language and customs, thus forming their own communication framework. These two premises left their mark on the development of communication worldwide and, more specifically, in the Jewish Diaspora. Still, the Jewish Diaspora represents a sui generis phenomenon, because of the global dispersion of Jews and the lack of a political framework that could provide a supporting communication network. The intercommunity communication network served to turn the otherwise abstract concept of "Jewish people" into a living reality and delineated the boundaries of the Jewish Diaspora. The diffusion of print and the emergence of Jewish journals marked a watershed dividing the two main stages in the development of communication in the Jewish Diaspora, which for purposes of analysis may be defined as the premodern and the modern period.

The Premodern Period

Two main factors informed the communication nature of the Jewish Diaspora: religion and trade. From the destruction of the Second Temple onward, the Jewish religion underwent tremendous changes as the continuous exegesis of holy texts (Halacha) replaced the crucial role of the Temple in Jewish ritual. The textual essence of the Jewish collective encouraged the high literacy rate of Jews—per se, a rare phenomenon in medieval times. In complete contradiction to the oral character of other traditional societies, communication in the Jewish Diaspora thus combined written and oral messages. Jewish literacy, however, was not the outcome of the Mosaic faith alone; it was also fostered by the involvement of Jews in trade on both a local and an international scale. Trade—with its rhythm, routes, seasonal fairs, and written contracts—further played a crucial role in fostering the reception and transmission of reliable information in the shortest period of time and broadening the scope of communication. The many regulations concerning trade and all kinds of contracts in Talmudic literature hint at the close relationship between the faith and the occupation of Jews. Jewish languages—first, Aramaic and Hebrew, and at later periods, jargons like Ladino and Yiddish—defined the audience of communication as well as the subject and content of messages.

The communication network in the Jewish Diaspora was based on the community (kehillah), which represented its most basic cell. The communal leadership—religious and lay—developed the central means of communication and bestowed on them a hierarchical-normative character. Eastern Jewish communities advanced centralizing organization patterns, which were legitimized and fostered in the framework of the Islamic world. As an intrinsic part of their office, the heads of the leading centers of study, as well as the political leaders (exilarchs), were responsible for fostering a fluent communication exchange with the different communities under their rule. The prevalence of correspondence among Jews in the Islamic world was probably due to the fact that many Jews served as scribes (kātibs) in governmental offices so they were able to introduce Arabic epistolary practices in the communities of North Africa and Andalusia.

The fall of the Roman Empire in 476 and the emergence of the Germanic kingdoms all over Europe created the mosaic background that was to characterize Western Jewry. The development of feudalism and the crystallization of an autarkic economy left their mark on the emergence of autonomous Jewish communities—a fact corroborated time and again by prominent Talmudic scholars. Like many other corporations at the time, the autonomous Jewish community enjoyed royal license to develop its own regulations, which had force of law over its members. The autonomous community, as a result, may have posed an obstacle to the development of an intercommunity communication network. Though Christian kings favored the appointment of a supreme Jewish leader from time to time, such as the archpresbyters of Anglo-Jewry or the chief rabbi in Aragon, the royal nominees were actually treasury agents and could not be regarded as real factors in the communication network.

Intermittent links between scattered communities thus characterized the communication network among Jewish communities as a whole. From the 11th century onward, rabbinical synods were expected to strengthen intercommunity links. At first, the initiative came from the “three communities” (Worms, Speyer, and Mainz), which were later joined by others. In the absence of a regular schedule, the initiative for such meetings usually came from an outstanding scholar whose authority was widely recognized. Synods were usually conducted in trading centers, such as Troyes or Mainz, or during trade fairs. The Bologna Synod (1416) also encouraged the emergence of a political alliance among Jewish communities in different districts of Italy. However, it was not until the second half of the 16th century that intercommunal networks appeared in Europe, in Poland and Lithuania (the Council of the Four Lands), and in Moravia and Western Hungary. All were promoted by contemporary rulers to rationalize fiscal practices and augment the taxes collected from Jews.

The communication network among Jewish communities was, therefore, influenced by external factors—first and foremost by the political elite, whose patronage conditioned Jewish life. Still, the aspiration to develop communication links between different communities was first and foremost the outcome of a sense of solidarity among Jews. The idea of the “Chosen People” embodied the most essential sense of Jewish solidarity and bestowed on it divine legitimacy. Especially in times of crises, Jewish solidarity visibly crystallized, revealing the existence of an efficient communication network along trade routes. Letter exchanges before the First Crusade provide a case in point. In early December 1095, the Jewish leaders of northern France warned their coreligionists in the Rhine area about the approaching crusade. The Mainz community acknowledged receipt of this information only one month later, revealing the high efficacy and speed of information transmission.

Centers of study and outstanding or itinerant scholars provide an additional aspect of the communication network in the Jewish Diaspora. The yeshivas present a suitable example of the first category, with Jewish scholars from faraway areas coming to leading centers of study (like those of Sura and Pumbedita in Babylon). By means of their responsa (written answers covering a most rich spectrum of subjects), outstanding scholars provided an additional communication channel of great efficacy. Rabbenu Gershom’s sanction of monogamy, for example, was respected across large areas of Western and Central Europe; Maimonides’s codification was also implemented near and far, while his philosophical treatises provided food for hard debate across the Pyrenees. His missive to the Yemenite Jews (1172) further points to the existence of communication links among scattered communities. Additionally, whether as casual visitors or in their capacity as preachers, itinerant scholars acted as communication channels among different communities.

The Modern Period

Modern communication, especially print, left its mark on the development of society as a whole and of the Jewish Diaspora, in particular. In contrast to the corporative essence of medieval society—of which the Jewish community was an integral part—the modernization process brought about the gradual alienation of the individual from society. Communication became a very important tool in the emergence of an imagined collectivity; as such, it was not further led by the traditional leadership but by professional communicators, who did not always act in accordance with traditional norms; indeed, they often challenged them. The efforts of the rabbinical leadership to regulate the use of print while avoiding the uncontrolled diffusion of books and new ideas (Synod of Ferrara 1554) were, therefore, part of the unavoidable struggle between traditional and modern values. But attempts at regulation were condemned to failure. Though at first print allowed a better diffusion of religious books, it gradually paved the way for the dissemination of heterodox and heretical ideas. The printed text did not, therefore, define Jewish Orthodoxy any further; rather, it actually challenged it. Print spread very fast in the Jewish Diaspora as a whole. In the Ottoman Empire, for example, Jewish print anteceded by about 200 years analogous developments in the surrounding society. The itinerant nature of press artisans brought about the rapid spread of the new technology and explains the diffusion of Lurian ideas as well as the success and scope of the messianic movement of Sabbatai Zevi in the 16th and 17th century, respectively.

The interaction between Jews and the surrounding society, accelerated by the modernization process, facilitated the emergence of a Jewish secular press. Jewish newspapers played a very important role in defining the identity of the emerging Jewish bourgeoisie, while dealing with the many challenges posed by modernization. They were no longer limited to the Jewish languages, but incorporated the vernacular of the surrounding intellectual elites. Jewish newspapers thus reflected the gradual disintegration of the traditional community and the integration of its members into the market society. They addressed Jews as private individuals and created an illusory community, thus offering a means for practicing Judaism on an individual basis. Earlier 18th-century journals, such as Koheleth Mussar and Measeff, were written in Hebrew and tried to bring Jewish audiences closer to European culture. But Shulamit was written in German; it accepted contributions by non-Jews and tried to widen its circle of readers while adapting its messages to the values of the German bourgeoisie. The number of subscribers to these journals hint at their crucial role in strengthening a sense of identity among the Jewish bourgeoisie, with its growing weight in communal affairs.

The beginning of the 19th century heralded two main changes in Jewish communication, while revealing a split along the lines of language and state allegiance. As an outcome of the integration of Jews into European society, the formerly united Diaspora—of an international nature and, as such, over political entities—changed its essence and meaning. Hebrew and other Jewish languages were gradually replaced by the national languages of those countries in which the Jews lived and of which they sought to become active and equal citizens. Publications like The Jewish Chronicle in England, Archives Juives in France, and Allgemeine Zeitung des Judentums in Germany were the most faithful reflection of the integration process of Jews into the emerging national states. The appearance of these publications further hints at two different but complementary processes. They voiced the struggle for the emancipation of Jews, but they also revealed a growing interest in the development and well-being of Jewish communities worldwide, mainly in distressed communities, such as those in the Ottoman and Russian Empires.

By the second half of the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th, the waves of Jewish emigration and the development of the Jewish national movement heralded further changes in the communication network. The emigration of 2.5 million Yiddish-speaking Jews from Eastern Europe fostered the emergence of a united cultural framework of unprecedented scope that was essentially different from the premodern framework. Jewish journalists became active professionals in their new homes while at the same time integrating into the flourishing cultural Yiddish framework. On the other hand, the development of the Jewish national movement provided an additional catalyst for new arenas of discussion and the diffusion of ideological tenets. The prosperous communication network in the Jewish Diaspora provided food for anti-Semitic stereotypes, such as those promulgated by the Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

The Holocaust and the concentration of the Jewish people in Israel in the 20th century fostered further significant changes in the communication network. The disappearance of Eastern European Jewry brought about the gradual decline of Yiddish journals and their eventual collapse. On the other hand, the establishment of the State of Israel facilitated the renaissance of a new type of Hebrew journalism, in parallel with the continuous development of newspapers in English, and to a lesser degree, in French and Spanish, and much later in Russian, for different linguistic Diasporas. The development of electronic media—radio, television, and Internet—further met the needs of the Jewish intercommunal network while allowing its extension worldwide.

Selected Bibliography

- Cesarini, D. 1994. The Jewish Chronicle and Anglo-Jewry, 1841–1991. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Menache, Sophia, ed. 1996. Communication in the Jewish Diaspora: The Pre-Modern World. Leiden, Netherlands: E. J. Brill.

The Concept of Diaspora and Exile in German-Jewish Literature and Art

Mark H. Gelber

---

Numerous German-Jewish (or Austrian-Jewish) literary and cultural figures, as well as their achievements, have been lauded as integral to Western culture in general, and they have been widely viewed as representative of some of the most impressive intellectual and artistic accomplishments in human civilization. Several names may be mentioned to emphasize this point, including Sigmund Freud, Karl Marx (who was converted to Christianity by his parents), Albert Einstein, Franz Kafka, Walter Benjamin, Else Lasker-Schüler, Franz Rosenzweig, Martin Buber, Gerschom Scholem, Paul Celan, Ludwig Wittgenstein, Hannah Arendt, and many others. However, recent reevaluations of the cultural productivity of Jews in Central European culture have departed from the model or very idea of a Jewish contribution to German literature and culture. It may be that this idea has come to appear unseemly or untenable after the Nazi attempt to erase Jewish literature and culture from the German national tradition, in addition to eliminating Jews physically in the genocide that came to be known as the Holocaust. As an alternative to the idea of a Jewish contribution, the idea of a Diasporic Jewish voice or a Jewish literature in exile in this German-language cultural space has been developed. It has tended to emphasize the Jewish aspects of this cultural production, while minimizing or marginalizing the Germanic aspects. Another related model is based on the notion of a unique German-Jewish culture, functioning throughout Central Europe and beyond, which could be viewed sui generis. Accordingly, this hybrid German-Jewish culture, sometimes but not always called a symbiosis, would in theory belong neither to German nor to Jewish culture alone. But, by partaking of both, it could be seen to belong to both at the same time it created something entirely new. The problem of classification has perplexed many observers, but it is almost always admitted that the particular cultural milieu of Central Europe normally lends the literary and artistic productivity of the Jews who live in the Diaspora communities in this part of the world a specifically Germanic or Austrian quality. One may speak in this sense of influences, intertextuality, and intercultural exchanges, which inform the diasporic consciousness of the literature and culture of Central Europe.

In 1929, Walter Benjamin wrote an article entitled "Jews in German Culture" for the major German-language Encyclopedia Judaica project, edited by Jacob Klatzkin. This encyclopedia project ended with the rise of Nazism, and it remained fragmentary; the last volume to be published contained the entries beginning with the letter "K." Benjamin's initials appear at the end of his article, signifying authorship, although next to them may be found the initials of Nahum Goldman and Benno Jakob, who apparently edited the entry. There is some evidence that Benjamin was not at all happy with their intervention and changes. In any case, his contribution is divided into two parts. The first considered German Jews in the Geisteswissenschaften (that is, broadly conceived, the humanities), but in this article it especially referred to philosophy, including Jewish thought, political philosophy, and psychoanalysis. Here, Benjamin surveyed the Jewish presence within these fields in German culture from Moses Mendelssohn to Karl Marx and Moses Hess, and from Hermann Cohen to Otto Weininger and Sigmund Freud. In the second section of his essay entitled "Dichtung," which denotes creative literature and belles lettres in the broadest sense, Benjamin considered Jews to be participants in the project of creating German national literature, from the time of the 13th-century medieval Jewish Minnesänger (troubadour) Süsskind von Trimberg to the outstanding Jewish writers and expressionist poets of the 1920s, including Franz Kafka, Else Lasker-Schüler, Alfred Döblin, Arnold Zweig, and Lion Feuchtwanger. Although Benjamin usually viewed Jewish writers as being heavily dependent on German models, he also seemed to consider them sometimes as full and independent partners in the literary and cultural endeavors that constituted German culture. Sometimes they even played very important roles in this regard. For example, Benjamin credited Heinrich Heine and Ludwig Boerne with the innovative creation of the German feuilleton, which eventually became an important German literary-journalistic genre, although it must be admitted that their accomplishment was rooted in their exposure to French journalistic writing during their long sojourns in exile in Paris.

Also, Benjamin cited Berthold Auerbach, Leopold Kompert, and Karl Emil Franzos as the initiators of the German literary genre known as “ghetto literature.”

In both sections of Benjamin’s article there is no unifying thesis or underlying structure. Sometimes, as in the case of Georg Simmel, he will comment on “the Jewish element” in his philosophizing or attempt to categorize Weininger’s work in terms of “Jewish resentment.” Normally, however, he is content to point to the Germanic context of Jewish writing, for example, the role of Hegel in the development of the “Science of Judaism” (Wissenschaft des Judentums) or Max Nordau’s relationship to German romanticism and German naturalism. If, for Benjamin, there is one unifying aspect to the productivity of the figures he presents in his article, it is perhaps the implicit criterion of German language productivity by Jews. This criterion is not at all obvious. At the end of the 20th century, Sander Gilman and Jack Zipes edited an ambitiously conceived English-language compendium of Jewish Writing and Thought in German Culture (1096–1996), in which they included, in addition to writers who lived in Central Europe and worked in German, several writers who produced texts in Hebrew or in Yiddish. Although not at the center of their project, Jewish literary and cultural projects that were generated in languages other than German—usually Jewish languages—were of definite interest to Gilman and Zipes, as long as they were carried out or came to fruition within the ambience of, or in contact with, Central European culture. For example, they included an article about the earliest extant Yiddish purimspil, which was traced to Leipzig. An essay on the Hebrew-language periodical HaMe’asef is included in their compendium (it was one of the centerpieces of the Hebrew Haskalah movement from the 1790s); and it published odes in Hebrew in honor of political leaders like Frederick the Great of Prussia or Joseph II of Austria alongside Hebrew translations of important 18th-century German literary figures, such as the dramatist, critic, and theoretician G. E. Lessing, the writer and playwright C. F. Gellert, or the poet J.W.L. Gleim. The impact and adoption of German literary models, for example, the ode, as well as the Jewish fascination with Central European political leaders are important aspects of this Jewish literary production. At the same time, one can sense the pertinence and value of the discrimination already articulated: namely, the difference in focus between a view that is concerned with a Jewish contribution to German culture as a possible sign of the Jewish attempt to integrate or assimilate into it, versus one that is devoted to recording and understanding a Jewish voice in this particular cultural space, as an attempt to maintain cultural integrity despite acculturation.

Benjamin viewed Mendelssohn’s Bible translation as the gate through which Jewry entered German cultural space. In fact, learning German and aiming to become masters of the language were revolutionary acts within Jewry and had far-reaching consequences regarding Jewish integration into German culture. Despite a scurrilous refrain in German anti-Semitic writing to the effect that Jews as others, that is, other than truly German, were inherently unsuitable or racially incapable of writing pure or paradigmatic German, Jewish writers consistently refuted this claim by the plain virtue of their stylistic virtuosity and significant literary achievements. In 1939, shortly before the outbreak of World War II, the popular German-Jewish novelist and art critic Georg Hermann claimed that it was precisely the German-language authors of Jewish origin who had become the truly towering figures in modern German literature. In this regard, he mentioned Hugo von Hofmannsthal, Richard Beer-Hofmann, Arthur Schnitzler, Peter Altenberg, Rudolf Borchardt, and others. One piece of evidence he submitted to bolster his claim was that German literature was known or renowned internationally owing primarily to the German-language literature produced by German and Austrian Jews, especially Arthur Schnitzler, Franz Werfel, Lion Feuchtwanger, Jakob Wassermann, Stefan Zweig, and Arnold Zweig. Georg Hermann emphasized that Central European theater was deeply indebted to Jewish input—to talented dramatists, directors, and actors of Jewish origin. But theater criticism was especially dominated by Jews. The same was true, according to Hermann, regarding literary scholarship and criticism. He argued that virtually all of the significant research and publications about Goethe, the central figure of German classical literature, were written by Jewish scholars writing in German. Whether or not there was a specifically Jewish reading of Goethe, though, is a topic he does not consider.

This viewpoint is no doubt related to the famous and controversial debate about the Jewish role in German culture, which had been initiated by Moritz Goldstein in a provocative polemic written in 1912 entitled “Deutsch-jüdischer Parnass.” He claimed rather boldly that the Jews in Germany had become the custodians and arbiters of the spiritual—specifically, the literary and cultural—treasures of German society, while at the same time it denied them the very right and capability to fulfill this role. Goldstein cited the power of the Jews in the German press and celebrated their dominance in the world of music and public concerts, noting their monopoly in the venerable and prestigious German theater. In his estimation, theater audiences in Central Europe were overwhelmingly Jewish in their composition. He opined that Jews were also on the verge of taking undisputed control of German literature and literary studies, as many Jews were to be found among the ranks of Germany’s best poets and writers. Perhaps even more astounding, the leading minds in the Germanic seminars at the universities were, according to his view, Jewish. This claim of a Jewish domination in Central European literary and cultural life appears to have established itself in diverse quarters. In this context, one may think of a subsequent comment by Stefan Zweig, a very successful and popular Austrian-Jewish cultural mediator, translator, writer, and poet of the first half of the 20th century. He remarked in his memoirs, The World of Yesterday, written very late in his career and shortly before his suicide in exile in 1942, that “9/10ths of what the world celebrated as Viennese culture . . . was either promoted, nourished, or even created by Viennese Jewry.”

The issue of the Central European or Germanic element in, or influence on, German/Austrian-Jewish creativity is thus placed within a radically different framework, if one argues, as Goldstein did, that Central European literature and culture were largely Jewish. Nevertheless, this viewpoint seems to have had no measurable resonance or real reception. In fact, with the advent of modern Jewish nationalism and Zionism in Central European culture toward the end of the 19th century, and the continuing tenacity of various strains of anti-Semitic writings that were becoming ever more pernicious and threatening, certain emphasis was placed on the incompatibility and unbridgeable abyss that ostensibly existed between Germanic culture and Jewish culture, even if these ideas were not embraced by a majority of Central European Jewry before the rise of Nazism.

Within the framework of cultural Zionism and the modern Jewish Renaissance, the idea of a German-language Jewish national literature and culture was presented as an alternative in its own right, even if according to some it was destined to be part of a transitional phase in Jewish cultural history. Concrete steps were taken to bring this Jewish national literature and culture in German into existence. These included the following: (1) a new cultural orientation in the Zionist press; for example, at the turn of the century its primary journalistic instrument, Die Welt (Vienna), dramatically expanded the amount of space it devoted to literature written in German in the spirit of Jewish nationalism and Zionism; (2) the founding of a Jewish national publishing company in Berlin, the Jüdischer Verlag, which sought to establish itself as the center of the Jewish national literate cultural enterprise in German; and (3) the publication of ambitiously conceived literary and artistic anthologies, like the Jüdischer Almanach (1902) or Jüdische Künstler (1903), which attempted to delimit a Jewish national canon in literature and the arts, while focusing on German language authors and emphasizing the role of Central European Jewry in the Jewish national literary and artistic productions. Dynamic intellectuals and artists, including Nathan Birnbaum, Martin Buber, Berthold Feiwel, and Efraim Moses Lilien spearheaded this movement, but a long list of German-Jewish and Austrian-Jewish writers and poets were brought into their orbit.

The leaders of this trend conceived of the exciting possibility of producing and packaging outstanding and significant Jewish literature and art in the Diaspora, as a prelude to or preparation for the true or full blossoming of Jewish art and literature, which would eventually take place in the Land of Israel and in Hebrew. The diasporic legacy in the Jewish Renaissance was considered to be a definite drawback or flaw in the artistic authenticity of these Central European/Jewish texts and artworks, measured according to neoromantic, nationalistic, evaluative criteria. German cultural Zionism sought to include in its cultural projects a substantial number and wide variety of German-language Jewish writers, poets, and critics of diverse backgrounds and orientations, as well as artists and musicians. While accepting to a large degree the inevitability of various Diasporic influences and aesthetic features associated with Central Europe, they nevertheless encouraged the production of literature and art that focused on Jewish figures and themes from the Bible or Talmud, or which gave expression to Jewish suffering in exile, other Jewish spiritual and religious experiences, and Jewish identity concerns in the Diaspora. These tended to argue explicitly or implicitly for Jewish difference and separate consideration from the Central European Germanic cultural milieu. Not all of the contributors included within the parameters of this enterprise subscribed to the idea of an exclusionary or independent Jewish national poetics, but at the least (by virtual of their consent regarding publication) all were evidently willing to have their work read in this light. Some names not normally associated with a Jewish national literature in German or with Jewish art in Germany and Austria appear in cultural Zionist anthologies and related publications, including Karl Wolfskehl, Efraim Frisch, Max Liebermann, and Stefan Zweig. It is fair to say that each one of them changed their views over time concerning Zionism and their own relationships to Jewish culture and Central European culture. Eventually, they all experienced the rise of Nazism first hand. Wolfskehl, Frisch, and Zweig sought to escape Europe in exile far away from Central Europe. Liebermann, who served as president of the Prussian Academy of the Arts, had to resign from his position in 1933 after the Nazis came to power. He died in Berlin in 1935, finally realizing the cogency of Jewish nationalism and Zionism, after having mostly distanced himself from these ideas and movements for almost his entire life.

German-Jewish literature and culture does not end with the Nazi period, despite the deep rupture caused by Nazi persecution and displacement of Central European Jewish writers. Whereas most Central European Jewish writers who managed to survive in exile continued to live and write (mostly in German) outside of Germany and Austria after World War II, some, including Alfred Döblin and Hilda Domin, returned to continue their lives and writing careers in Central Europe. Some very prominent Jewish writers, including Arnold Zweig, Stephan Hermlin, and Anna Seghers, returned to communist East Germany or they grew up there (Jurek Becker, Chaim Noll). Their writings and careers need to be evaluated in terms of providing a perspective or commentary on Jewish-related issues in Germany.

Some observers have claimed that a resurgence or even a renaissance in German-Jewish and Austrian-Jewish letters has been underway at least since the 1990s, and perhaps beginning even earlier. Writers, journalists, and cultural critics, such as Marcel Reich-Ranicki, Ralph Giordano, Henryk Broder, and others have played major roles in German culture; and perhaps some Jewish-related issues they raised in their writings and public appearances encouraged new Jewish writers in German to find innovative ways to probe contemporary issues related to Jewish identity in post-Holocaust Central Europe. Germany (East, West, and now united Germany) and Austria have typically been perceived as a special category as a landscape for Jewish life and culture after the Holocaust. Nevertheless, writers and poets, including Rafael Seligmann, Maxim Biller, Barbara Honigman, and an Austrian contingent including Robert Menasse, Robert Schindel, and Doron Rabinovici, may be considered to belong to this group. Recent immigrants to Central Europe from the former Soviet Union who write in German, including Vladimir Vertlib and Wladimir Kaminer, also belong in this context. Their works are infused with Diasporic consciousness and a new sense that Central Europe may provide, at the present time and for the foreseeable future, a very good alternative for Jewish identity construction and a dialogue about it, despite the Holocaust and Zionism, or even in face of both.

Selected Bibliography

- Albanis, Elisabeth. 2002. German-Jewish Cultural Identity from 1900 to the Aftermath of the First World War. Tübingen, Germany: Niemeyer.
- Elon, Amos. 2002. The Pity of It All: A Portrait of the German-Jewish Epoch 1743–1933. New York: Picador.
- Gelber, Mark H. 2000. Melancholy Pride: Nation, Race, and Gender in the German Literature of Cultural Zionism. Tübingen, Germany: Niemeyer.

Gilman, Sander L., and Jack Zipes, eds. 1997. The Yale Companion to Jewish Writing and Thought in German Culture 1096–1996. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Robertson, Ritchie. 1999. The Jewish Question in German Literature 1749–1939. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

The Concept of Sephardi and the Ashkenazi in German-Jewish and German Anti-Semitic Thought

Mark H. Gelber

---

In the critical discourse concerning European Jewry, some attention has been paid to the myth and mystique of Sephardi superiority among Ashkenazim, specifically among Central European, German-speaking Jewry. Numerous examples show that by the late 18th century and into the 19th century, the Sephardim were regularly celebrated and idealized in diverse writings authored by Central European Jews. The Sephardi case appeared to provide some observers with an alternative model to the difficult political, economic, and social reality of the Ashkenazim, as they negotiated survival during times of restrictions, oppression, and political turmoil, which also included periods of toleration, emancipation, retrogressive loss of rights, and an ongoing battle for civic enfranchisement and equality.

The model that is alluded to in this discourse is the model of the Sephardi golden age, which came to an abrupt end by the start of the 16th century. Although set somewhat remotely in the distant past, the glory of Sephardi Jewry in the mind of the Ashkenazim was based on the ostensibly easy integration and demonstrable public success of Sephardim in Iberian Islamic society. That success was economic, political, military, social, and cultural; and it also included impressive literary, philosophical, scientific, and poetic accomplishments. In contrast, Ashkenazi Jewry, on the threshold of the 19th century, had precious little to boast of in these same categories. Thus, the allure of the Sephardi model, as it was developed in Ashkenazi writing and consciousness, proved to be quite strong. What is interesting in this same context—although not well known at all—is that German anti-Semitic writing also tended to differentiate clearly between Sephardim and Ashkenazim. This literature often constructs a positive, mostly idealized image of the Sephardi in contradistinction to a negative image of the degenerate Ashkenazi. One acts as the other's foil. It has been suggested that one of the overarching purposes or consequences of this construction is to render the anti-Semitic polemics against the Ashkenazi Jews more reasonable, owing to plain differentiation between Ashkenazim and Sephardim. Nevertheless, the similarities and differences between German-Jewish (Central European Jewish) and anti-Semitic German discourses in this regard are of certain interest.

The writings of Heinrich Heine, one of the towering poetic figures in Western literary history, provide a good example of the idealization of the Sephardim among Ashkenazim in German-Jewish literature. He and his poetic personae identified repeatedly with Spanish or Portuguese Jews. Positively depicted Sephardi characters appear in his literary works from the very beginning of his career. Heine repeatedly identified his poetic and literary voice with that of the aristocratic Spanish or Portuguese Jew, and his preoccupation with positively depicted Sephardi characters in his literary works until the very end of his life is an important feature of his literary-historical legacy. In his early drama, Almansor, written when he was a 23-year-old student in 1820, is one of the first indications of his youthful fascination with medieval Spain and the tragic fate of its Moorish and Jewish populations. Jeffrey Sammons and other commentators have viewed the Moors in the play as an allegorical figuration of oppressed German Jewry. In this sense, Almansor may be read as a protest against the wretched treatment of Jews in German lands after the “Hep! Hep!” riots of 1819. In this play are the often-quoted and arresting lines: “where books/are burned, in the end people will be burned as well.”

In 1824, Heine began to write his romantic novel, The Rabbi of Bacherach, which is also pertinent to the Sephardi-Ashkenazi issue. Following upon his short-lived but active association with the Association for Culture and Science of the Jews (Verein für Kultur und Wissenschaft der Juden) in Berlin, Heine worked intensively on this novel, which, however, remained a fragment and was only published much later in his career. The Berlin Verein, whose activities signaled the beginning of the movement called Wissenschaft des Judentums (science of Judaism), devoted a good amount of serious attention to the literary and cultural productions of Sephardi

Heinrich Heine, early 19th-century
German poet and intellectual.
(Library of Congress)

Jewry, with a view to presenting a paradigmatic model of integration that might be applicable to German Jewry. Leopold Zunz and Abraham Geiger, for example, were especially enchanted by Sephardi culture, and they immersed themselves in its literature. Heine was certainly exposed to and perhaps also infected, to a degree, by this tendency; in any case, it would have served to strengthen a predisposition in this direction that was already securely in place. The novel, although set in Ashkenaz, focusing on the Rhine Valley, and moving along to Frankfurt, incorporates a substantial amount of literary material drawn from the time when Spanish Jewry was nearing its catastrophic end. The novel is based partially on the confrontation of two separate cultural traditions, the Ashkenazi and the Sephardi: Spanish Jewish culture presents a paragon of elegance, urbanity, and dynamic secularization in contrast to the provincial pettiness, comic vulgarity, and backwardness of the Ashkenazim. The worldly Sephardi knight, Don Isaak, even if in actuality an apostate, appears dramatically in the third and last chapter of the fragment, and he dominates the ending, which was written many years later. He seems to provide the most attractive modern possibility for the Jews, taking all of the options presented in the novel into account. According to this reading, Heine uses the Sephardi case from the past as a paradigm to comment on the present reality of the Jews in German lands, while allowing him to give subtle voice to his own social and political concerns regarding contemporary Ashkenazi Jewry.

A final example is Heine's late poetry collection, Romanzero (1851), the title of which recalls the Judeo-Spanish literary genre. In the "Hebrew Melodies" section of the book, two ambitiously conceived poems focus on Sephardi Jewry. One, "Jehuda ben Halevy," contains more than 800 lines of verse and is regularly cited as one of the most extraordinary poetic creations in Heine's entire career. In addition to Halevi, Ibn Gabirol and Ibn Ezra are also mentioned. The venerable background of Sephardi Jewry as developed in the poetry seems to lend credibility to Heine's image of poetic genius as a figure of virtually royal dignity. It may be that late in his life the Sephardi world came to dominate the Ashkenazi, in terms of Heine's Jewish interests, perhaps even displacing it almost completely. Also, the impressive Sephardi poetic accomplishments may have provided Heine with an alluring model, in terms of setting a permanently high literary standard for his own verse.

Heine's interest in and literary incorporation of Sephardim within the Jewish context may be measured against his differentiation of humanity into two types, the "Hellene" and the "Nazarene," which he formulated in the 1830s. These are ahistorical anthropological categories representing human types. "Hellenism" is Heine's term for a sensual and materialistic orientation to the world, which he normally champions in his writings, while "Nazarenism" is the spiritual and debilitatingly ascetic, spiritual-religious orientation to the world, characteristic of traditional Judaism and Christianity. Don Isaak, the Jewish apostate in The Rabbi of Bacherach, falls into the Hellene category, despite his attachment to aspects of Jewish identity. In this sense, the Sephardi fictional character becomes an embodiment of the "Super-Jew," or the "Trans-Jewish Jew," who points the way out or in a direction beyond the boundaries of traditional Jewish religious affiliation and identification. Thus, Heine uses the Sephardi/Ashkenazi differentiation to transcend the normative categories related to Jewish belonging. He replaces them with different identity criteria, rendering Jewishness itself antiquated or no longer essentially relevant in a new configuration of modern identity. One implication of this new individual classification would be that anti-Semitism becomes totally irrelevant, because Jews or Christians or others might be, on an individual basis, either Hellenes or Nazarenes, and this new categorization would be primary.

Interestingly, the tendency to use a positive valuation of Sephardi experience, in contrast to Ashkenazi failings and degeneracy, established itself to a degree in varieties of völkisch, racial and racist rhetoric characteristic of mid-to-late 19th-century German anti-Semitic writing. Julius Langbehn, the author of the stupendous bestseller Rembrandt der Erzieher (Rembrandt the Educator, 1890) provides a good example in this regard. Fritz Stern called Langbehn the father of German völkisch thought, who formulated a primitivistic and rear-guard attack on modernity, emphasizing the creative release of elemental passions and energies in order to envision a new Germanic society based on art, genius, and power. He believed that every Volk (nation) comprised an honorable and a dishonorable element. He claimed that Jews who affirmed their Jewishness proudly were authentic and pure, the aristocrats of their people. In fact, Rembrandt had memorialized this type in his paintings of Dutch (Sephardi) Jewry. Unfortunately, most modern Jews were not in this category, and they were reprehensible types. Still, the Sephardi essence is not by itself the exclusive or decisive factor that renders an individual Jew honorable, according to Langbehn, as other criteria play important roles in this regard.

The rise of racial anthropology and racial science in the second part of the 19th century appeared to lend a certain pseudoscientific legitimacy to the intuitive differentiations and valorizations propounded by Langbehn and others. Already in the 1860s, anthropologists like Carl Vogt had claimed that the Sephardim were the true descendents of the original Semitic race, and that the Ashkenazim were in fact a different racial group. He also cited Rembrandt in his arguments. Another view was advanced that there had always been two antagonistic Jewish races going back to Biblical times; they were easily identifiable by skin color. Influenced no doubt by the new higher biblical criticism, which at the time was very much in vogue in Germany, some claimed that the Sephardim originally worshipped "Elohim," while the Ashkenazim worshipped "Jahwe."

Racial science attempted to document the two Jewish racial types: the honorable Sephardi, characterized by a fine nose, bright black or dark eyes, and delicate limbs; and the ignoble, degenerate Ashkenazi, characterized by a large mouth, thick nose, and curly hair. Craniometric studies, which were widely considered scientifically objective, tended to corroborate these discriminations. Many racial studies focused on the issue of racial admixture, and sometimes the Sephardim were presented as the unadulterated Jewish race, which had preserved its racial purity going back to ancient times. The Ashkenazim were the unfortunate product of insidious racial admixture with highly negative consequences. Houston Stewart Chamberlain, one of the most celebrated and popular racial anti-Semites, claimed that early racial admixture of inferior racial material, followed by negative crossbreeding between widely dissimilar racial types and periods of isolation and endogamy, yielded the most degenerate and contaminated mongrel racial strain possible: modern Jewry. Yet even Chamberlain admitted the existence of honorable Jews and a noble Jewish racial type, singling out the accomplishments of Spanish Jewry in this connection. Not all racial anti-Semites or racial thinkers did so, however; many eschewed words of praise for the Sephardim, and in many racial studies they are not mentioned as an exception to the rule of Jewish racial deterioration and degeneration.

It is important to remember that the Nazis made no allowance for Sephardi difference as they conducted their war against Jewry during World War II. Their encounter with Sephardim, not only in Germany but also in the Balkans, North Africa, France, Italy, Holland, and elsewhere ignored the theoretical framework for excluding Sephardim from the fate of genocide. That framework was securely in place well before the Holocaust in the very corpus of anti-Semitic writings, which were a prelude to the genocide.

Selected Bibliography

- Efron, John M. 1989. "Scientific Racism and the Mystique of Sephardic Racial Superiority." Yearbook of the Leo Baeck Institute 34: 75–96.
- Gelber, Mark H. 2004. "The Noble Sephardi and the Degenerate Ashkenazi in German-Jewish and German-Anti-Semitic Consciousness: Heine, Langbehn, Chamberlain." In Confrontations/Accommodations. German-Jewish Literary and Cultural Relations from Heine to Wassermann, edited by Mark H. Gelber, 45–56. Tübingen, Germany: Niemeyer.
- Schorsch, Ismar. 1989. "The Myth of Sephardic Supremacy." Yearbook of the Leo Baeck Institute 34: 47–66.

The Concept of Diaspora in the Thought of Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik

Marc D. Angel

---

Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik (1903–1993) was the most influential rabbinic sage of Modern Orthodoxy during the 20th century. A renowned Talmudic scholar, he was also a profound philosopher, an eloquent orator, and an engaging teacher. For many years he was the towering rabbinic figure of Yeshiva University in New York, the Rabbinical Council of America, and the Religious Zionists of America (or Miz-rachi). He was the spiritual head of the Orthodox community in Boston, where he resided.

Soloveitchik was a preeminent Diaspora rabbinic sage, whose love of Israel was integral to his religious worldview. He was part of a family whose love of Israel was based on the age-old religious traditions of Judaism. He broke new ground, though, by identifying with the Zionist enterprise, even though many of its leaders were non-Orthodox. Although he believed Jews should be motivated by Torah ideals and a sense of destiny, he recognized that many Jews were Jewish by fate; this latter group included nonreligious Jews who identified with the Jewish nation and were prepared to defend it. The task of Mizrachi was to work with Zionist leadership so as to gain wider appreciation of Torah values and observances within Israel.

Soloveitchik's attachment to the land and state of Israel was balanced by his commitment to the Jews in the Diaspora. Although he was the spiritual head of Mizrachi, he only visited Israel once, in 1935. He remained a quintessential Diaspora Jew, with a religious longing for the Holy Land. In a sense, he was in self-imposed exile; he could have visited (or emigrated to) Israel but consciously chose to remain in the United States.

Soloveitchik was fully cognizant of the traditional religious view that Diaspora—that is, exile—is punishment for one's sins. It is a temporary condition (however long it may endure), to be terminated by the arrival of the Messianic Era. At that time, Jews will return to the Land of Israel, and the teachings of Torah will be universally accepted.

Yet for Soloveitchik, the real center of the Jewish people was not a land but the Torah. The land was a means to an end, a physical space for the spiritual flowering of the Jewish people in the ways of Torah. Those in the Diaspora who lived according to Torah were thereby living a meaningful religious life. Those in the Land of Israel who did not do so were not being true to Judaism. Soloveitchik believed the urgency of confronting the reality of modern Zionism—joining in the rebuilding of a Jewish state—but his primary concern was to promote religious life in the new state.

The unity of the Jewish people depended on a mutual sense of kinship and destiny between Diaspora and Israeli Jews. "The Jews of America are forbidden to be quiet or to relax as long as the danger confronting the State of Israel persists. Nor can the inhabitants of the Holy Land prattle on about such nonsense as 'the new type of Jew' being created there who has nothing in common with the diaspora Jew" (Soloveitchik 2000, 69). Soloveitchik was particularly critical of those nonreligious/antireligious Israeli leaders who sought to divorce the Jewish state from its religious foundations.

He was also worried that the love of Israel would decline in the Diaspora as Jews continued to assimilate and move away from traditional religious patterns. "The Torah has engendered an everlasting bond between the Jew and the Land of Israel. The stress in Torah and tradition on the primacy of the Land of Israel must be the basis of Zionist education in the United States" (Soloveitchik 1999, 98).

Soloveitchik viewed the Jewish people as an ontological entity—Kenesset Israel, congregation of Israel.

The community is not just an assembly of people who work together for their mutual benefit, but a metaphysical entity, an individuality; I might say, a living whole . . . We, for instance, lay claim to Eretz Israel. God granted the land to us as a gift. To whom did He pledge the land? Neither to an individual, nor to a partnership consisting of millions of people. He gave it to the Kenesset Israel, to the community as an independent unity, as a distinct juridic metaphysical person. . . . The owner of the Promised Land is the Kenesset Israel, which is a community persona. (Soloveitchik 1978, 9)

It is this overarching persona of Kenesset Israel that links individual Jews to their people.

The Jew who believes in Kenesset Israel is the Jew who lives with Kenesset Israel where she may be and is prepared to die for her, who hurts with her pain and rejoices in her joy, who fights her wars, suffers in her defeats, and celebrates her victories. The Jew who believes in Kenesset Israel is the Jew who joins himself as an indestructible link not only to the Jewish people of this generation but to Kenesset Israel of all generations. How? Through Torah, which is and creates the continuity of all the generations of Israel for all time. (Soloveitchik 1974a, 98)

For Rabbi Soloveitchik, then, the essential unity of the Jewish people is attained through commitment to Torah. Over the generations, the Diaspora has produced magnificent Torah communities and outstanding Torah scholars. Although in the ideal world Judaism can find its best expression in the Land of Israel, the world is not yet ideal. Meanwhile, the task is to ensure that Torah study and observance can thrive in Israel—and the Diaspora.

Selected Bibliography

- Soloveitchik, Joseph B. 1974a. Al ha-Teshuvah, edited by Pinchas Peli. Jerusalem: Education Department of World Zionist Organization.
- Soloveitchik, Joseph B. 1974b. Hamesh Derashot. Jerusalem: Machon Tal Orot.
- Soloveitchik, Joseph B. 1978. "Community." Tradition 17 (2): 7–24.
- Soloveitchik, Joseph B. 1999. The Rav: The World of Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik. Vol. 2, edited by Aaron Rakeffet-Rothkoff. Hoboken, NJ: Ktav Publishing House.
- Soloveitchik, Joseph B. 2000. Fate and Destiny [Kol Dodi Dofek]. Hoboken, NJ: Ktav Publishing House.

Jewry as an Archetypical Diaspora

Gabriel Sheffer

---

Most observers still regard world Jewry, including Israel, as an utterly unique phenomenon, yet the Jewish Diaspora can and should be regarded as an archetypical ethno-national-religious historical diaspora. It is true that each nation and each diaspora, including Jewry and the Jewish Diaspora, is unique in a sense. In this vein, the proponents of the view of world Jewry's uniqueness stress a number of factors that purportedly have determined and perpetuated the unique features and status of the Jewish Diaspora and its relations with its homeland—Eretz Israel. These unique features are the extraordinary and unmatched historical persistence of the Jewish Diaspora; its admirable ability to overcome social, political, and economic calamities inflicted on it since the very earliest times of its historical existence, including the major exiles, the Shoah, and numerous pogroms; the outstanding Jewish contributions to the development of the monotheistic universal religions—Christianity and Islam—and particularly the Jews' shared paternity of the Judeo-Christian tradition; world Jewry's other various contributions to the cultural, economic, and scientific development of Western civilization; the purported extraordinary influence the Jewish Diaspora is capable of exerting on various host societies and governments; the recent revival of some defunct Diasporic communities in Western and Central Europe; and the unparalleled continuous political, diplomatic, and economic assistance that certain groups and organizations extended to the Yishuv (the pre-Israel Jewish community in Palestine) and later to the Jewish state.

Nevertheless, when the history and current position of the Jewish Diaspora is succinctly examined, similarities to other diasporic entities also become evident. Thus, although the aforementioned unique features are characteristic of the Jewish Diaspora, in themselves they mean neither that it is an exceptional nor a deviant diaspora, nor that its relations with its homeland are incomparable. Thus, even a very fast and sketchy examination would show that some of its features are shared by other ethno-national-religious diasporas that emerged in antiquity and still exist. Such an examination would show that other diasporas have also experienced probably not all, but at the least similar, historical developments and that consequently those diasporas exhibit analogous traits and patterns of behavior to those of the Jews. In the same vein, in the religious sphere, other diasporas contributed to the emergence and spread of universal religions; not only the Jews but various other diasporas significantly contributed to human culture; and they helped shape economic and commercial practices that still persist. In the sphere of diaspora-homeland relations, most ethno-national diasporas extend assistance to their homelands. Hence, it would become clear that in all these, as well as in other, respects the Jewish Diaspora has not been unique.

Yet because of its age, endurance, cultural-religious contributions, transformation from a stateless into a state-linked diaspora with a role in establishing the State of Israel in parts of its historical homeland, support of Israel and Jewish communities in distress, organization, and other characteristics—in fact, the Jewish Diaspora is an archetypical historical diaspora that still exists today. Although it is facing some critical dilemmas and problems, its core membership remains solid and active (Cohen 1997; Sheffer 2005; Safran 2005). Accordingly, and as agreed upon by some observers of the general diasporic phenomenon, various features of the archetypical Jewish Diaspora can serve as a basis for a general profile that fits most ethno-national-religious diasporas and has explicit implications for the continued existence of such diasporas in general and of the Jewish Diaspora in particular (Sheffer 2003a; 2005).

The following is the profile that characterizes World Jewry and turns it into an archetypical diaspora: Originally, the Jewish Diaspora was created by both expulsion from Eretz Israel and voluntary migration from that homeland. Throughout its history, the Diaspora's organized communities in host lands have voluntarily and autonomously been established, but only after Jewish migrants decided or were permitted to permanently settle in host countries. In most cases, the decision to permanently settle in a host country has been taken by individuals, families, and small groups after an initial period of learning about and adjusting to life patterns in the host country. In all its host countries, the Jewish Diaspora has remained a minority group.

In its host countries, the Diaspora has preserved its ethno-national-religious identity. Following what has been called the “integrated theory” to the sources of ethnic identity and existence (Kellas 1991), it can be said that the Jewish identity and identification of core members of the Diaspora, which are based on a combination of primordial psychological/mythical and instrumental-constructed factors, serve as the bases for maintaining their affinities and ability to work together. On this basis core members of the Diaspora have maintained a great degree of solidarity and cohesion. Constant contacts among the Diaspora’s elites and activist grassroots individuals and groups are avowedly maintained. These contacts have cultural, social, economic, and especially political significance for the Diaspora members, for their host countries, for their homelands, for other diasporic communities of the same origin, and for other interested actors.

This is the essential basis for all organized activities of the Diaspora. One of the purposes of these activities is to create and increase its readiness and ability to preserve a continuous interest in and cultural, economic, and political exchanges with its nation-state. This highly organized Diaspora deals with various aspects of its cultural, social, economic, and political needs in a way that usually complements, but at times also clashes with host societies and governments’ needs. The Diaspora communities in various host lands adopt and try to implement coherent strategies: in most cases that is the communalist strategy (Sheffer 2000, 2003b).

The emergence of diasporic organizations creates the potential for the development of multiple authority and loyalty patterns. To avoid undesirable conflicts with the norms and laws established by the dominant group in its host countries, the Diaspora accepts certain social and political rules of the game of these countries. At certain periods in its history, however, real or alleged dual, divided, and ambiguous loyalties, which are generated by the dual or multiple authority patterns, may create tension between various social and political groups in the host country and the Diaspora. On certain occasions, such confrontations lead to the intervention of Israel on behalf of its Diaspora or to Israeli intervention in the affairs of the Diaspora itself.

Finally, and most importantly, the capability of the Diaspora to mobilize its members to promote or defend their own or their nation-state’s interests in their host countries will result in the formation of either conflictual or cooperative triadic or four-sided relationships and exchanges involving homeland, diaspora, host country, and other interested actors. Now these relations constitute an inherent part of international politics and influence the behavior of all parties involved.

In conclusion, neither some current bleak predictions concerning future demographic trends, which cause a depressive mood among lay and religious activists, nor the ingrained belief in Jewish power characterizing the thinking of other observers, accurately predicts the Jewish Diaspora’s future. Because the Jewish Diaspora can and should be viewed as such an archetypical entity, the same applies to other, similar diasporas. Their autonomous choices and actions will also determine their survival, continuity, and revival. In turn, these depend on a realistic analysis of the current situation, which must be done within the general theoretical and comparative framework of diaspora studies.

Selected Bibliography

- Cohen, Robin. 1997. Global Diasporas: An Introduction. London: UCL Press.
- Kellas, James. 1991. The Politics of Nationalism. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Safran, William. 2005. "The Jewish Diaspora in a Comparative and Theoretical Perspective." Israel Studies 10 (1, Spring): 36–60.
- Sheffer, Gabriel. 2000. "The Loyalties of Ethno-National Diasporas and the Case of the Jewish Diaspora." In Still Moving: Recent Jewish Migration in Comparative Perspective, edited by Daniel Elazar and Mark Weinfeld, 311–336. New Brunswick, NJ: Transactions.
- Sheffer, Gabriel. 2003a. Diaspora Politics: At Home Abroad. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Sheffer, Gabriel. 2003b. "Is the Jewish Diaspora Unique?" In Contemporary Jewries: Convergence and Divergence, edited by Eliezer Ben-Rafael, Yosef Gorny, and Yaacov Ro'I, 23–44. Boston: Brill.
- Sheffer, Gabriel. 2005. "Is the Jewish Diaspora Unique? Reflections on the Diaspora's Current Situation." Israel Studies 10 (1, Spring): 1–35.

Jewish Self-Hatred

Ritchie Robertson

---

The very term "Jewish self-hatred" is controversial and perhaps objectionable. Is it to be understood as denoting a pathological condition peculiar to Jews? Or does it just describe some of the negative feelings that may arise in social interaction and that may have been experienced with particular intensity by Jews in a predominantly Gentile society?

The term was popularized by the eccentric critic and polemicist Theodor Lessing (1872–1933) in his book Der jüdische Selbsthaß (1930). Lessing's word Selbsthaß, awkwardly translated as "self-hatred," has been relatively common in German since the 18th century to describe morbidly self-critical emotions associated with depression: thus, Goethe applies it to Byron's self-tormenting poetry. For Lessing, "self-hatred" is explicitly a "pathology," a "sickness," which may afflict anyone, but which is most strikingly illustrated by the psychopathology of the Jewish people. History, according to Lessing, is a meaningless process, on which one can impose meaning, either by blaming others for one's sufferings or by blaming oneself for them. The Jews, thanks to their powerful ethical will, blamed themselves for falling short of the highest ethical standards. Their repeated misfortunes—invasion, exile, oppression—strengthened not their anger against their enemies, but their dissatisfaction with themselves. Thus, Jews hate themselves precisely because their ethical ideals are so lofty. In modern times, assimilation to Western culture means betraying the Jews' ethical and prophetic heritage. Racial anti-Semitism is therefore welcome because it forces Jews to rediscover this ambivalent identity.

Lessing's book must be understood as a product of its age. In the 1920s, increased anti-Semitism made many German Jews skeptical about assimilation and anxious to rebuild a distinctive Jewish identity. As his autobiography reveals, Lessing himself had earlier experienced an extreme, even masochistic identification with Germany, as embodied in his youthful friend Ludwig Klages, who eventually rejected him by saying, "You are a loathsome, pushy Jew!" (Lessing 1935, 363–364). For giving a disparaging and ill-informed account of Jewish communities in Galicia, he had himself been attacked by Benjamin Segel (who later helped expose the Protocols of the Elders of Zion as an anti-Semitic fabrication) as a "Jewish anti-Semite." Lessing's account of Jewish self-hatred should therefore be read not as the analysis of a phenomenon, but as a symptom of Lessing's own tendency to swing between emotional extremes. More generally, it typifies a widespread tendency among German Jews in the 1920s, disturbed by the anti-Semitism that had become increasingly vocal during and after World War I, to distance themselves from German culture and reconstruct their Jewish identities—sometimes with the aid of Zionism, sometimes with a nostalgic attraction to the Jewish communities of Eastern Europe.

The Viennese journalist Anton Kuh (1890–1941), rejecting both these alternatives, asserted in Juden und Deutsche (1921) that all German Jews suffered from self-hatred, because their religion and their characteristic upbringing imposed the authority of a patriarchal God and the patriarchal family. Kuh extended the argument by claiming that Germans, too, suffered from self-hatred, which is shown in their deference to patriarchal authority, ready acceptance of foreign fashions, and unease as newcomers to the community of nations. This affinity between Germans and Jews, he argued, only strengthened their antagonism.

Caution should be applied not only to the sweeping claims made by Lessing and Kuh, but also to the alleged self-hating Jews of whom Lessing offers case studies. All are Jews who denied their Jewishness and/or sharply criticized aspects of Jewish behavior. The most clearly pathological, Arthur Trebitsch, undoubtedly suffered from paranoid delusions. Otto Weininger (1880–1903) is a more difficult case. His doctoral dissertation, Geschlecht und Charakter (Sex and Character, 1903), notoriously argues that the male principle is intellectually and ethically far superior to the female principle, and that the latter predominates in Jews, who therefore are sensual, amoral, unintellectual (their supposed intelligence is really mere watchfulness), inwardly empty, and adaptable. And although women are passively pliable, Jews are active and aggressive in their drive to assimilate. Hence, modernity is dominated by Jewish and feminine values. In a footnote, Weininger added that he, the author, was himself "of Jewish descent." Soon after his book's publication, Weininger dramatically committed suicide. Though his account of Jewish psychology is antithetical to Lessing's, his biography reveals a similar identification with supposed German ideals, embodied this time in his father, an anti-Semite who loved Richard Wagner's music.

Another of Lessing's case studies is the once-famous journalist Maximilian Harden (1861–1927), founder and editor of the monthly Die Zukunft (The Future). Harden fiercely attacked Jewish influence in journalism, commerce, and politics. He anticipated Weininger by ascribing a feminine character to all Jews, in contrast to the masculine German. He published a notorious article by his friend, the industrialist Walther Rathenau (also of Jewish descent), entitled “Höre, Israel!” (Hear, O Israel!) which enjoined the Jews of Prussia to abandon the vulgar language and clumsy, slouching posture that made them obviously different from Germans. In politics, Harden was an authoritarian and militarist, who on the outbreak of war in 1914 published bloodthirsty editorials calling on German troops to act like barbarians. Ironically, in 1922 he was attacked and severely injured by German nationalists, who were given a light sentence after a biased trial.

Harden was initially the mentor for another Jewish journalist often charged with Jewish self-hatred, the Austrian Karl Kraus (1874–1936). In his magazine Die Fackel (The Torch), Kraus constantly attacks journalism for debasing language, falsifying facts, and destroying the world through the “black magic” of printer’s ink. Many of his antagonists were Jews, notably Moriz Benedikt, editor of the Viennese liberal newspaper the Neue Freie Presse. Yet, though Kraus also attacks Zionism, denounces the pretensions of over-keen assimilationists, and, in his great drama of World War I, Die letzten Tage der Menschheit (The Last Days of Mankind), makes his spokesman mutter about “Jewish-capitalist world-destruction,” the charge of Jewish anti-Semitism cannot be sustained.

These cases, insofar as they demand explanation, suggest a complex social analysis rather than a psychopathological inquiry. By the late 19th century, Jewish belief and practice had virtually vanished from many Western Jewish households. Jewish identity was almost without content, yet the rise of anti-Semitism, signaled by Wilhelm Marr’s founding of the Anti-Semitic League in Germany in 1879, made it hard to shake off. A passionate identification with Germany, especially as a militarist power, accompanied an equally passionate rejection of Jewishness, imagined with the aid of gender stereotypes.

This implies that Jewish self-hatred is best approached through social psychology. In 1941, Kurt Lewin, a former professor of psychology at the University of Berlin who pioneered the study of group dynamics in the United States, explained it as typifying the behavior of members of underprivileged groups. They want to identify with the attractive community outside, but that community insists on identifying them, in turn, with the group they unwillingly belong to. Frustrated self-haters turn their aggression not on the attractive community (in which they can see no wrong), but on themselves and/or their own group. Another possibility is “identification with the aggressor,” described by Bruno Bettelheim in a controversial essay. From his own observation, he maintains that some Jews in concentration camps coped by imagining their guards to be all-powerful and superhuman, so they could submit to their power without being degraded. Bettelheim explains this as narcissistic identification with the all-powerful enemy, onto whom Jewish captives projected their own undesired emotions. Hence, self-hatred and anti-Semitism, even in less extreme conditions, reinforce each other: the anti-Semite projects his or her hatred onto the Jews, imagining them as powerful, and the Jew compensates for feelings of inferiority by identifying with the aggressor.

More recently, Sander L. Gilman has developed this approach in terms of otherness and stereotyping. “Self-hatred results from outsiders’ acceptance of the mirage of themselves generated by their reference group—that group in society which they see as defining them—as a reality” (Gilman 1986, 2). This “mirage” is composed of stereotypes that can easily be confused with realities within the world. Hence, physical appearance, bodily comportment, clothing, and language can all form part of stereotypes. Stereotypes in turn can be imagined as part of ethnic, religious, or class identities that are imagined in mythic terms as being unchangeable. Therefore they survive independently of empirical reality.

Gilman focuses especially on the stereotype of the Jew’s hidden language. Throughout modern German history, assimilation has required adoption above all of proper German. The bad Jew speaks a distinctively “Jewish” German (often stigmatized as Mauscheln). If no fault could be found with the Jew’s use of German, it was denounced for irony or for journalistic dishonesty (as in attacks on Heinrich Heine). Wagner deepened the attack by claiming, in “Das Judentum in der Musik” (Jewishness in Music, 1850), that the Jew, being estranged from nature and community, could not sing or compose music. Racial theorists then gave such claims the seeming authority of science. Thus, as Jews approached their goal of assimilation, it kept being withdrawn and declared impossible on grounds that were increasingly tenuous and increasingly hard to oppose. This situation could easily generate insecurity about oneself and discomfort with conspicuously unassimilated Jews. Rather than label these feelings “Jewish self-hatred” and “Jewish anti-Semitism,” however, it would be better to see them as painful but not exceptional effects of group dynamics.

Selected Bibliography

- Bettelheim, Bruno. 1947. “The Dynamism of Anti-Semitism in Gentile and Jew.” Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology 42: 153–168.
- Gilman, Sander L. 1986. Jewish Self-Hatred: Anti-Semitism and the Hidden Language of the Jews. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Kuh, Anton. 1921. Juden und Deutsche. Berlin: Reiss.
- Lessing, Theodor. 1930. Der jüdische Selbsthaß. Repr. Munich: Matthes & Seitz, 1984.
- Lessing, Theodor. 1935. Einmal und nie wieder. Repr. Gütersloh, Germany: Bertelsmann, 1969.
- Lewin, Kurt. 1948. “Self-hatred among Jews.” In Resolving Social Conflicts, 186–200. New York: Harper.
- Rathenau, Walther. 1897. “Höre, Israel!” Die Zukunft 18 (6 March): 454–462.
- Segel, Benjamin. 1910. Die Entdeckungsreise des Herrn Dr. Theodor Lessing zu den Ostjuden. Lemberg: Hatikwa.
- Weininger, Otto. 1903. Geschlecht und Charakter. Eine prinzipielle Untersuchung. Repr. Munich: Matthes & Seitz, 1980.

Diaspora, Exile, and Jewish Identity

Howard K. Wettstein

---

“Diaspora” is a relatively new English word and has no traditional Hebrew equivalent. According to the Oxford English Dictionary, the term first appears in English usage in 1876, and in 1881 it is used by Wellhausen, in the Encyclopedia Britannica, in connection with Jewish dispersion. But the term seems closely related to the more traditional galut (exile). Nevertheless, reflection reveals crucial differences.

Diaspora is a political notion; it suggests geopolitical dispersion, perhaps non-voluntary. However, with changed circumstances, a population may come to see virtue in diasporic life. Diaspora—as opposed to galut—may thus acquire a positive charge. Galut rings of teleology, not politics. It suggests dislocation, a sense of being uprooted, in the wrong place. Perhaps the community has been punished; perhaps awful things happen in our world.

Galut is a pervasive theme—perhaps even the dominant motif—in Jewish history. From the perspective of the Hebrew Bible and Jewish religious tradition, history is virtually a study in exile. The original exile is the expulsion from the Garden (Eisen 1986). Before the expulsion, Adam and Eve were in harmony with their world. Afterward, they experience life as we know it, an uncanny constellation of richness, even exquisite beauty, along with all manner of awfulness.

The story suggests that the human plight, the human condition, is a consequence of bad choices. Its more subtle suggestion is that such choices are themselves paradigmatically human. Our plight, our condition of galut, is a consequence of being human in the world in which we live, no formula for bliss. It is only in the Edenic mythological past and the messianic mythological future that human existence is not radically troubled and confused. To apply the notion of exile to the human condition is thus to allude to the Eden story, but more importantly, it is to call attention to such “normal dislocation.”

A central facet of the religious impulse is the drive to find meaning in such exilic existence. Even without the well-known horrors of Jewish history, the religious impulse would have an abundance of raw materials. Skipping ahead to what is, until the 20th century, the catastrophe of catastrophes: the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE, the subsequent defeat of Bar Kochba in 135 CE, and the dispersion of Israel. The destruction of the First Temple—in 587 BCE—and the subsequent Babylonian Exile was calamitous. But that exile lasted only half a century; exile could still seem an exception. Exile becomes the rule after Bar Kochba and the second expulsion from Jerusalem, this time with no foreseeable return.

To the exiles, the prospect of living without the foci of national and religious life must have seemed a violation of the cosmic partnership between God and Israel. Temple times—the sacrificial worship practices in place, in the context of something approaching the dignity of sovereignty—were, in retrospect, Eden. The churban (destruction), by contrast with “normal dislocation,” was a cosmic jolt.

Rabbinic Judaism is in part a response, a reconstruction of national and religious life. Continuities between pre- and postdestruction Judaism granted, and taking a bit of dramatic license, one might say that result was nothing less than a religion of galut. And since the attempt to reconstruct was made in keen awareness of the human condition, it is a religion of galut, both normal and catastrophic. Dramatic license aside, there are of course many foci of the Jewish religious outlook, and certainly no adequate single formula, galut included.

Students holding the biblically prescribed lulav palm branch during prayers over the festival of Sukkoth at the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College in Wyncote, Pennsylvania. (Reconstructionist Rabbinical College)

The best-known ways in which the rabbis came to terms with galut are developments in practice, for example, increased emphasis on prayer and the study of the Torah as among the highest forms of religious practice, and a shift in the locus of ritual holiness from the sacrificial altar to the family table. The focus here is on theological developments.

Ways of thinking about divinity are dynamic. Subject a community to great trial or triumph and its way of thinking about God may well alter or enlarge. The Hebrew Bible is characterized by anthropomorphic depiction of God. But post-churban rabbinic literature—specifically, Midrash Rabbah on Lamentations—reveals a new level of divine affective engagement and self-awareness. God has become almost one of us in affect. He suffers, weeps, and even mourns. “Woe is Me!” he cries in Proem 24, “What have I done?” Sometimes the Midrash sees God in maternal terms: Proem 22 compares God to a mother sparrow whose nest has been destroyed. Proem 24 sees God in a paternal role, speaking of himself as a king who drove away his sons, who were in any case badly raised.

Strikingly, such radical imagery is developing simultaneously with the Christian emphasis on (and very different interpretation of) divine vulnerability. These developments are heightened when the Talmud speaks of God himself, after the churban, as living in exile. This is no doubt in part a matter of empathy that He is with us, He feels for us. But it is equally an expression of divine dislocation. Here we approach discontinuity with what we know of God from the Bible, an anthropomorphic quantum leap.

Such superanthropomorphism yields new possibilities of relationship. With the more remote Divine Presence of Genesis, for example, relationships are quite limited—for the people, if not for the privileged few. Quite another matter is a God who is vulnerable in the ways explored, whose range of affective response is not unlike our own, whose self-perception is of one whose fate is tied up with that of the community. Such a God can function as life partner, as it were, of the community and, derivatively, of the individual.

Selected Bibliography

Eisen, Arnold. 1986. Galut: Modern Jewish Reflection on Homelessness and Homecoming. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

History of the Diaspora

Jews and Judaism in Ancient World Literature

Timothy Andrew McCaffrey

---

Ancient literary references to the Jews in Greek and Latin literature date back as far as the fifth century BCE and appear in the work of authors such as Herodotus and Aristotle. Works alluding specifically to the Jews dwelling outside of Judea are also common. Although a significant amount of pagan literature discussing the Jews is concerned with the geographical features of Judea, the quality of various local produce, and narratives of military clashes between the Jews and their conquerors, the following authors specifically discuss the Jewish presence beyond the borders of Israel.

Hecataeus of Abdera (fourth century BCE)

Hecataeus is the first major Greek scholar to mention the Jews outside of Judea. He relates, in his Aegyptiaca, the oldest account of Jewish origins in Greek literature. Living in the Hellenistic Eastern Mediterranean, Hecataeus wrote an adaptation of the biblical Exodus. In it, he states that the Jews were expelled from Egypt after a pestilence and that the Egyptians presumed the Jews were responsible for the disease. The Jews were forced out in two groups. The smaller of the two, led by Danas and Cadmus, whom Hecataeus characterizes as the most outstanding of their tribe, eventually landed on the shores of Greece. The larger group followed Moses into the land that became Judea. Hecataeus' description of Moses as lawgiver and account of the establishment of Jewish tradition may be the first Gentile investigation into the origins of Jewish custom. Various adaptations of this account (see Diodorus and Strabo) came to be repeated and refashioned throughout the Greek and Latin literary tradition.

Diodorus Siculus (late first century BCE)

Diodorus, a Sicilian Greek, wrote an account of the Egyptian origins of the Jewish people. Diodorus viewed the Jews as part of an early wave of colonists sent out from Egypt, and the Exodus narrative in his Bibliotheca Historica specifically names the area around Argos as the part of Greece where some of the Jews landed after their departure from Egypt (see Hecataeus). The historian Herodotus had already noted three centuries before that the Syrians (Jews) of Palestine practiced circumcision, but to Diodorus, circumcision is proof of the Jews' Egyptian origins.

Cicero (106–43 BCE)

Cicero, the Roman statesman and rhetorician, in his Pro Flacco, makes anti-Semitic allusions to the Jews living at Rome. Defending Flaccus, who, as governor of Asia, was tried at Rome on charges of confiscating Jewish gold sent to the Temple at Jerusalem, Cicero feigns fear of the Jewish mob at Rome, whose numbers and solidarity made them a formidable risk to anyone who might offend them. Stereotypes characterizing the Jews as a large, insular, and irascible mob were common anti-Semitic tropes.

Strabo (63 BCE–24 CE)

Although Strabo, a Greek of Asia Minor, seems not to have even visited Judea, he exhibits a not insignificant interest in relating the history and customs of the region's inhabitants. Similar to other accounts (see Diodorus and Hecataeus), Strabo's Geographica offers circumcision as proof of the Jews' Egyptian origin, and relates another account of Moses and the emergence of Jewish tradition.

Tibullus (ca. 54–ca. 18 BCE)

Tibullus, an Augustan poet of Rome, in his Carmina I, composed during a visit to the East, longs for his beloved Delia. Searching for reasons he might have remained with her at Rome, he cites the accursed day of Saturn as a possible excuse to tarry. This reference to the Sabbath (see Ovid) may also refer to the Roman view that Saturdays were inauspicious for transactions in general.

Ovid (43 BCE–17 CE)

In his Remedia Amoris, Ovid, an Augustan poet of Rome, mentions the Jewish day of rest. He warns against allowing a foreign Sabbath to stay one's feet. Book I of Ovid's Ars Amatoria includes further reference to the Jews. One urges the reader not to miss out on an opportunity to witness the seventh-day rites of the Syrian Jews. Another suggests courting a girl on the Sabbath because shops will be closed and a lover might avoid having to buy gifts, a reference to the popularity of the day of rest at Rome (see Tibullus).

Horace (65–8 BCE)

Horace, the Roman satirical poet, states, in Satire I.4, that he amuses himself with the trivialities of verse, and, if a reader objects to this playfulness, he will be forced by a mass of poets, acting as Jews, into their throng. Here, Horace speaks both to the number of Jews at Rome and the extent of their missionary activity. The status of Horace as a libertini (freedman) is well known. Libertini was also the class of many Jews at Rome, and some have suggested that Horace was a Jew. This assertion is challenged by the occurrence of common anti-Semitic tropes in his satires. At one point in Satire I.5, Horace remarks on the credulity of Apella the Jew. Accusations of gullibility were standard, jocular invective aimed at the Jews of Roman society. Fear of the Jewish mob, found elsewhere in Latin literature (see Cicero), emerges also in Horace's Satire I.9, in which a friend warns Horace not to offend the circumcised Jew.

Seneca the Younger (ca. 4 BCE–65 CE)

A Roman philosopher born in Roman Spain, Seneca's is the first example of a Roman's expression of anger at the impact of Jewish religion and rites on Roman culture. In a few lines of Seneca's De Superstitione, the philosopher declares the Jews a most filthy race, and he decries the effect they have had on Rome, that the conquered have given their laws to their conquerors—an allusion to Rome's occupation of the Jewish homeland.

Valerius Maximus (early first century CE)

Most details about Valerius Maximus are unknown, but he wrote the first account of actual events involving Jews in ancient Italy. His work, Facta et Dicta, was widely popular as a source for writer and orators. One preserved portion of his work records events taking place in 139 BCE, when the Jews, accused of transmitting their rites to the people of Rome, were expelled from the city by Cornelius Hispalus.

Petronius (first century CE)

Who Petronius actually was is unclear, but the one work attributed to him is regarded as a huge contribution to world literature. In his Satyricon, a narrative set in what is modern-day France, references to Jews appear at several points. In one instance, Petronius introduces a circumcised slave and his attempt to recite from Virgil, Rome's poet laureate. The Jewish slave's master goes on to discuss the slave's battery of talents, from cobbler to confectioner, mentioning only two flaws: he is circumcised and he snores. Circumcision and Judaism appear again in a later passage. The story's protagonists, attempting to elude capture, entertain the notion of disguising themselves with paint and propose circumcising themselves in order to appear as Jews. Further discussion of Jewish custom appears in some fragments of the text. Jewish worship of a pig god explains their abstention from pork, they pray to the sky (see Plutarch), and the Sabbath is observed by fasting (see Martial).

Quintilian (late first century CE)

Quintilian, a Roman rhetorician from Spain, accuses Moses of being an instigator of malice in his Institutio Oratoria. In the same work, he mentions that he acted as the attorney of Queen Bernice (see Suetonius, Dio), the daughter of Agrippa I, and bride of Herod. Bernice spent much time at Rome.

Martial (late first century CE)

Martial, a poet of Spanish origin, lists, in Epigram IV, the stink of women fasting on the Sabbath (see Petronius) among other odors still preferable to the stench of the Bassa area of Rome. Martial targets a woman named Caelia in Epigram VII, accusing her of readily accepting any lover of any nation, even the circumcised Jewish groin, before choosing a Roman lover. A few lines later, Martial mentions his own circumcised Jewish slave. Martial also relates an anecdote about Menophilus, an actor, whom he had often seen at the baths. Martial notes that this man wore a large buckle over his genitals, even while bathing, as a chastity belt to preserve the quality of his voice. During exercises in the palaestra, a public place for athletics performed in the nude, Martial saw Menophilus training in his buckle, which suddenly became loose and fell, revealing a circumcised Jew. Several lines of Epigram XI are addressed to an unnamed, but circumcised, poet. Martial forgives the Jewish poet for envying, disparaging, and plundering his work but attacks him for his romance with Martial's own beloved boy. Finally, a portion of Epigram XII mentions Jews at Rome. Martial explains his preference to remain at Bellona in Spain rather than live at Rome, citing the fact that Bellona has none of the Jewish beggars so numerous at Rome. The Jewish beggar is a standard characterization and was closely associated with synagogues and the activities of synagogues.

Plutarch (ca. 46–ca. 120 CE)

A Greek historian and commentator, Plutarch bemoans the Sabbath custom in his De Superstitione, as it is one of many foreign evils adopted by the Greeks of his day. In his Questiones Conviviales, Plutarch debates the origins of their abstention from pork. Worship of pigs (see Petronius) is introduced as a possible explanation for the Jewish aversion to pork. Later, Jewish custom is equated with the rites performed in honor of the pagan deity Dionysus (see Tacitus). Confusing the Day of Atonement with Sukkoth, the discussion cites commonalities between the Jewish rites performed on that day and various Dionysian customs. The parading about with lulav is associated with similar use of the thyrsus in Dionysian rituals. Jewish indulgence in wine and the pouring of libations during the Sabbath, a possible reference to the benedictions over a cup of wine, are also noted for their similarity to Dionysian rites. The text also seems to indicate that the descriptions of Jewish custom were based on actual events observed at Athens.

Tacitus (56–ca. 120 CE)

Tacitus, a Roman rhetorician and historian, dismisses the notion that the Jews worshipped Dionysus (see Plutarch). In Book V of the Historiae, Tacitus states that there is no relationship between the deity worshipped by the Jews and the god Dionysus, because the gaiety of the worship of Dionysus is in stark contrast to the worthless and filthy Jewish customs. This opinion comes at the end of an exposition on various theories concerning the origin of the Jewish people (see Hecataeus, Diodorus, Strabo). Tacitus notes that there is evidence that the Jews originated in the Greek island of Crete, because a mountain there possesses the name Ida, and the people dwelling around this mountain were called Idaei, a name that could have been barbarized to produce Iudaei (Judeans). Tacitus discusses the possibility that population pressures during the reign of Isis forced a group out of Egypt under the leadership of Hierosolymas and Juda, emptying into the neighboring regions. Tacitus then remarks that some commentators believe Jews to be Ethiopians, and others attribute to them Solymi ancestry, a race sung of by Homer. This then would explain the name Solyma, letters found in Hierosolyma, the word for Jerusalem. After discussing the various theories, Tacitus seems to agree with the consensus that the Jews were a group of Egyptians forced out because of plague and led by a man named Moses. In discussing the Jews dwelling among the Gentiles, Tacitus declares that what is profane to the Jews is sacred to his own Roman people; that Jewish rites and customs are base, mean, and ugly; that the Jews display goodwill among themselves but open hostility and hatred to all others; and that it is their tributes heaped up to the Temple at Jerusalem that is the source of their wealth. Another account of Jews at Rome comes in a statement by Tacitus in his Annales, in which he records the proscription of Jewish rites at Rome and a senatorial edict directing the conscription and stationing at Sardinia of 4,000 men of military age tainted with the Jewish superstition. The remaining Jews at Rome were to leave Italy if they did not renounce their profane rites. This account appears among the events of 19 CE. The same events are recorded elsewhere (see Suetonius, Dio)—though there is some disagreement as to the source of the edict.

Suetonius (second century CE)

Suetonius, a Roman who chronicled the lives of Caesars in his Lives of the Twelve Caesars, provides insight into the Roman nobility's personal feelings toward and interactions with the Jews. Suetonius describes the Jewish reaction at Rome after the death of the Julius Caesar. He writes that many foreigners grieved at Caesar's death, especially the Jews, who flocked to his pyre through continuous nights. Jewish affinity for Julius Caesar originated in his feud with Pompey, whom Caesar defeated in war, and who was the first Roman to conquer Judea, at which time Pompey entered the Holiest of Holies.

Suetonius specifies Emperor Tiberius as the source of the edict of 19 CE, which expelled the Jews from Rome (see Tacitus, Dio). Suetonius does not mention Sardinia specifically as the destination selected for the conscripted Jews (see Tacitus), but he does write of the mandated burning of all clothes and implements associated with Judaism at Rome. He also notes that the threatened punishment for those not renouncing their Jewish faith was perpetual servitude. Suetonius also narrates an account of Tiberius on a sojourn to Rhodes. During his visit, Tiberius sought out Diogenes, a Jew called a grammarian by Suetonius, who gave popular lectures every Sabbath. Upon Tiberius' request for a meeting, Diogenes ordered his slave to defer the future emperor's visit for seven days, until the following Sabbath. When the same Diogenes sought an audience with Tiberius at Rome, Tiberius ordered that Diogenes be put off for seven years, indicating awareness, either on the part of Tiberius or Suetonius, of the Jewish sabbatical year.

The Emperor Claudius, by some accounts, seems to have maintained rather amiable relations with Jews (see Dio), but Suetonius writes that Claudius also expelled the Roman Jews. As for Titus, Suetonius writes that he carried on a love affair with Queen Bernice (see Quintilian, Dio). The daughter of Agrippa I and sister of Agrippa II, Bernice had been married to Herod until his death. After coming to Rome, Suetonius reports that she lived as if married to Titus, while rumors of their engagement circulated Rome. Eventually, Titus gave in to public and political pressure and sent Bernice from Rome. The final mention of Jews by Suetonius appears in his Life of Domitian, who levied a particularly harsh tribute on the Jews of the empire (see Dio). Events associated with the tax left an impression on the young Suetonius. He remarks that as a young boy he saw a man of 90 years physically examined for circumcision in a crowded courtroom.

Juvenal (ca. 60–ca. 130 CE)

A Roman whose poetry offers a street-level view of Rome, Juvenal’s resentment of the Jews is displayed often in his satires. In Saturae III, Juvenal presents Umbricius standing before the Porta Capena, the start of the Appian Way, noting that the gardens and sanctuaries surrounding this area are now all leased to Jews, whose entire furnishings consisted of a basket and hay, an allusion to the Jewish method of keeping food warm on the Sabbath. Juvenal continues by stating that the Muses who once inhabited the fount have been evicted, that the trees pay tolls, and that the woods engage in begging. The grove, portrayed as a beggar, has taken on the very characteristics of its new tenants, a use of the common indigent Jew motif (see Martial, Artemidorus). In the same poem, Juvenal reuses this stereotype, describing Umbricius in the midst of an argument, during which he asks a Jew the whereabouts of his stand for begging and the location of the synagogue at which he might be found (see Artemidorus). A beggar Jew appears in Saturae VI with a basket and hay. She claims to be an interpreter of the laws of Jerusalem, a great priestess, and a faithful mediator of the heavens, a sky-worshipping allusion (see Petronius). Juvenal burnishes his vitriolic commentary of the Jewess by spitefully remarking that in the end she only takes a small amount of coin for payment, because Jews will say anything for very little compensation.

Illuminated manuscript page from a 15th-century edition of Satires by Juvenal. (The Schøyen Collection MS 2047)

Artemidorus (late second century CE)

Writing in Greek, Artemidorus lists, in his Onirocritica, synagogues and beggars among other apparitions in dreams that foretell grief, suffering, and general decline to all men and women (see Juvenal). He remarks that no one hastens to a synagogue without worries and that beggars, here Jews, are generally odious, have no possessions, and hinder all plans. A second reference to Diaspora Jews by Artemidorus in the same work notes a Jewish revolt in Cyrene, modern-day Libya, during the time of Trajan (see Dio). Artemidorus relates an anecdote involving a man who saw letters written on his sword, which later proved harbingers of the Jewish revolt and his own actions in suppressing it, but he gives no other details of this uprising.

Dio (160–230 CE)

Dio was from Greek Asia Minor, an area that had long maintained contact with Jews, and his History of Rome offers interesting details on Jews in this region and elsewhere. Dio mentions that Herod of Palestine, accused by his brothers of some crime, was banished beyond the Alps. Dio also tells of the expulsion of the Jews from Rome in 19 CE (see Tacitus, Suetonius). Dio attributes the Jewish expulsion not only to the success of their proselytizing but also to the great number of them flocking to the capital. He mentions Tiberius as having issued the edict (see Suetonius) and notes that by the time of Claudius' rule, Jewish numbers had recovered to such an extent that the emperor was constrained from driving them out for fear of conflict. Instead, says Dio, Claudius forbade their assembling, but he allowed them to continue living according to their traditions. Elsewhere, Dio provides evidence of Claudius' good relationships with Jewish nobility. Agrippa, living at Rome, actually helped Claudius gain the principate, and in so doing secured for himself an enlarged domain and the rank of consul from a grateful new emperor. Agrippa, as well as Mithridates and Polemon, both of whom received honors similar to those of Agrippa, were all granted permission to enter the senate house at Rome and express their thanks in Greek.

Other accounts of Jewish nobility at Rome that are recorded elsewhere emerge in fuller detail in Dio's work. Queen Bernice, at the height of her power in 75 CE, arrived at Rome with Agrippa. While her brother was busy securing the rank of praetor, she took up cohabitation with Titus at the palace, expecting to be married to him and acting as his wife, but eventually being banished because of popular displeasure (see Suetonius). Not recorded elsewhere is Bernice's eventual return to Rome, which Dio states occurred after Titus acquired power. The emperor Domitian is not portrayed as being so well disposed to Judaism. Dio's account of the emperor reports that Domitian executed Flavius Clemens and Flavius Domitilla, his relatives, along with many others, on charges of atheism. Apparently, they had been perceived as drifting toward Judaism. Dio asserts that similar punishments were given to many individuals corrupted by this religion.

One description of events taking place in Jerusalem discusses Jews not living in the Roman Empire at all. In relating Titus' activity suppressing a rebellion of the Jews in Judea, Dio remarks that the rebels were assisted by many men that professed the same religion, but who brought succor from as far away as the Euphrates. Dio also provides details of the uprising at Cyrene, Libya, during the reign of Trajan (see Artemidorus). He reports that the Jews slaughtered Greeks and Romans, ate their flesh, and bound themselves with their entrails. The Jews, according to Dio, even smeared themselves with the blood of their victims and wore their skin as clothing. Finally, the Jewish rebels began sawing Gentiles in half from head to toe, killing 200,000 people. Similar uprisings are noted at Egypt and at Cyprus, on which island no Jew was thereafter permitted to set foot.

Libanius (fourth century CE)

Libanius, a rhetorician in Rome's Greek east, delivers antiquity's final noteworthy description of Jews of the Diaspora by a pagan author. A native of Antioch, Libanius is remarkable for his close relationship with the Jewish patriarchs at Jerusalem. The nature of their interactions is on display in several of his letters addressed to them, and it seems to be one of mutual affinity. In view of this relationship, Libanius' discussion of Jews at Antioch in his Oratio de Patrociniis becomes a bit abstruse. Recording the events of a dispute between himself and his Jewish tenants, Libanius calls them typical Jews who had left their positions and were intent on imposing their own condition on the future of their employment. Libanius characterizes his employees as drunkenly insolent and expresses displeasure at the Jews' decision to approach the commander of the army stationed there. This commander then ordered the judge deciding the case to pardon the Jews. Libanius notes, however, that initially, before the commander's intervention, he had already lost favor with the judge by requesting his tenants' release from prison pending the outcome of the lawsuit.

Selected Bibliography

- Gruen, Erich S. 2002. Diaspora: Jews amidst Greeks and Romans. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Menahem, Stern. 1974–1984. Greek and Latin Authors on Jews and Judaism. Vols. 1–3. Jerusalem: Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities.
- Williams, Margaret. 1998. The Jews among the Greeks and Romans: A Diasporan Sourcebook. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

History of Jews as a Minority

Robert M. Seltzer

---

This essay delineates and summarizes the positive and negative features of the Jewish experience as a minority in lands of its ever-changing Diaspora from ancient to modern times. Being a minority posed immense challenges for Jewish survival but in the long run contributed the flexibility of the Jewish tradition. Differences between the context in premodern and modern times are stark, but there are continuities that merit analysis.

A Jewish Diaspora existed since the Babylonian Exile of 586 BCE in the sense of a network of permanent settlements of a people outside its original homeland that maintained its ancestral legacy. Even though Jews were a majority within the Land of Israel at least until the Bar Kokhba revolt against Rome (132–135 CE), the greater part of the Jewish people may have lived in Diaspora conditions as a semiautonomous group with its own social institutions in a Gentile environment for several hundred years. The first-century CE historian Josephus quotes the Greek geographer Strabo to the effect that there was hardly any place in the inhabited world without the presence of the Jews (Antiquities XIV, 115). The New Testament remarks that in the time of Jesus and his apostles, “there were devout Jews from every nation under heaven living in Jerusalem, . . . Parthians, Medes, Elamites, and residents of Mesopotamia, Judaea, Cappadocia, Pontus and Asia, Phrygia and Pamphylia, Egypt and the parts of Libya belonging to Cyrene, and visitors from Rome, both Jews and proselytes, Cretans and Arabs” (Acts 2:5–11). Even though the densest Jewish population was in the Galilee region of the Land of Israel and in the Mesopotamian region of the Persia Empire until these areas were conquered by the Arabs in the seventh century, there is ample evidence of long-standing Jewish settlements by then, ranging from settlements on the Rhine River to the northern shore of the Black Sea and the Caucasus Mountains, from the Iberian peninsula across both shores of the Mediterranean Sea to the Roman Middle East and Sassanian Iran, and south to the Arabian peninsula.

Although the liberties and limitations defining the status of the Jews in premodern times differed from land to land and era to era, everywhere Jews were excluded from the ruling elite (except for a very few instances, such as the Khazar kingdom of the steppes and a short time in Yemen where there were Jewish kings, or notable Jewish courtiers in Islamic and Christian Spain). Jews were not part of the military or feudal hierarchy. The Jewish community had its own courts to handle disputes according to Jewish law, although arrangements concerning transfer of property and contracts posed no problem because of the Talmudic dictum dina demalkhuta dina (the law of the kingdom is the law). Special taxes and other financial exactions were applied to the Jews. In some situations the number that could marry annually was limited. In addition, Jews were specifically excluded from many businesses and professions, prohibited from owning land, and segregated as to residence (although Jews preferred to live in proximity to their religious institutions and each other). If they resided in a locality, that meant they had the right to practice Judaism as they saw fit; if Jews were not allowed to worship in their own way, rear their children in their own religious tradition, observe the laws of kashruth, bury their dead according to Jewish practice, and so forth, they could not live as a community in that place.

By 1000 CE, the center of gravity in the Diaspora was shifting westward to Europe from the Middle East, but its scope was even greater than before, from Kievan Rus to the cities of Central Asia and on to Kaifeng, the capital of Sung China, from Yemen to Cochin on the Malabar Coast of India and the African highlands of Ethiopia. Some communities flourished for a while (for example, southern Italy in the early Middle Ages) and then disappeared, whereas other formerly outlying regions surged ahead in Jewish population and cultural hegemony (Poland after the Black Death). In modern times, there is almost no region on any continent in the Old or New Worlds that has not possessed a Jewish minority.

Even though considered galut (exile) in the Jewish theology of the traditional prayer book and other classical works, the Diaspora condition can in retrospect be seen to have been an impetus for the continued vitality of Judaism as an intellectual tradition. Not only did Jews borrow extensively from the popular cultures in their multiple environments, but in certain challenging eras they interacted with the high civilizations in times of their greatest flourishing. Jewish communities existed in Egypt during the Achaemenid Empire of the fifth and fourth century BCE, but when the Ptolemaic dynasty occupied that land after the conquests of Alexander the Great, the burgeoning Jewish community of Alexandria gave rise to a Hellenistic Judaism of vast historical importance, a Judaism without which there would have been no Christian Church. The Jews of the region that was called "Babylonia" (central Iraq) long after the disappearance of the ancient Babylonian Empire, in the third century CE, developed its own rigorous version of rabbinic discourse, eventuating in the Babylonian Talmud. Without the presence of Judaism in sixth-century Arabia, there might have been no Islam. During the Abbasid caliphate, the yeshiva of Baghdad were the most important centers of Jewish religious law for most of the Diaspora, except for the dissident Karaites who, rejecting rabbinic authority and the Talmud, also flourished in that region. Similar accounts could be given for Jews in other arenas of intense cultural creativity: the Maghreb, Andalusia, and Provence, as well as the cities of the Rhineland in the Middle Ages; northern Italy during the Renaissance; and the Commonwealth of Poland-Lithuania and the Ottoman Empire in the early modern period.

Semiautonomous minority status did not prevent premodern Jewry from interacting with the surrounding population and culture. Jews spoke the vernacular language of their neighbors, sometimes developing a Jewish dialect of it such as Judeo-Persian, Ladino, or Yiddish. They borrowed customs and symbols from their neighbors and reworked them to fit the Jewish religious context. Premodern Jewish theological speculation drew on the high scientific and philosophical traditions derived from Plato and Aristotle. Modern scholars have noted the influence of the Franciscan system of penances on the Hasidei Ashkenaz (the pietists of the Crusade era), and of neo-Platonism on the Kabbalah (the Jewish mystics of 13th- to 15th-century southern France and northern Spain).

Had the vast bulk of the Jewish people remained in an increasingly stagnant Middle East after 1200, the Jewish tradition would have found itself isolated from those regions where dynamic intellectual and economic developments were taking place.

The critical difference between being a premodern minority and a modern minority lay in the sweeping transformation of the entire historical context. Premodern societies were characterized by some form of social and legal segmentation, such as the division into polis-citizens, slaves, and resident aliens of classical Greece; the dhimmi of the Islamic realm, the millets of the Ottoman Empire; or the aristocracy, clergy, bourgeoisie, and peasantry of ancien régime Europe. “Modernity,” a long, contradictory, and apparently unending series of drastic social, cultural, and political transformations that began in 17th- and 18th-century Europe and some of its overseas possessions, gradually but inexorably demolished those circumscribed social units, each with its with different privileges and obligations to the ruling elite. Of all the characteristic features of modernity—such as the emergence of a class of entrepreneurial capitalists more daring and independent than any before, a greatly increased secular sphere of life, a heightened sense of individual autonomy over against traditional religious imperatives, the ascendancy of scientific and pragmatic modes of explanation and planning—the most decisive for the Jews was the modern justification of sovereignty as grounded in the “people” rather than in a divinely appointed monarch.

The modern Jewish communities that gradually took shape in Western Europe and North America in the 18th century, in Central Europe during the 19th century, and in Eastern Europe and elsewhere in the 20th century, each had to respond to this new polity as it worked itself out unevenly in one country after another. Earlier the absolutist regimes of the early modern period had sought greater direct control over the Jews. The full-fledged nation-state after the era of the French Revolution dismantled the legal basis of premodern estate-system and other internal social divisions, erasing the privileges and disabilities attached to each of them. In theory, every citizen (a term that acquired broad new meaning) was to be equal before the law—though there remained a considerable gap between theory and practice. In the 1820s, this process came to be called Jewish “emancipation.” Jews no longer paid their taxes as a group but as individuals. Jewish religious courts lost their quasi-political authority. Jews were emancipated as individuals, not as a group. The ideological force that shaped the new political order in Europe and the United States was the Enlightenment and its continuation in classical liberalism. Jews were not emancipated by a movement specifically directed to them alone; on the contrary, they were conceded to deserve equal status before the law to other citizens because they were subsumed under the universal category of human beings as such.

Emancipation forced a reconfiguration of Jewish institutions because of the transformed legal status of the Jews and the Jewish community, increasingly a voluntary association of religionists. At the same time a different Jewish economic profile was emerging as old occupations closed down and new educational and career opportunities opened up, as a result of the spread of capitalism, the growth of modern schools and universities, the Industrial Revolution, and such notable inventions as the railroad and the steamship (which made possible mass migration) and the popular press (which made possible greater contact between Jews). Furthermore, Enlightenment and its successor movements, such as romanticism and nationalism, posed an exacting challenge to Jewish philosophies and ideologies. As the most conspicuous diaspora people in Europe, Jews were one of the earliest of minorities to undergo the transition from the old to the new context of liberation and enfranchisement—pioneers in modernizing a traditional culture in order to cope with a new era of world history.

Modernization of the Jews has its special complications because the Jews are in some sense a group with an ethnic culture, albeit one with distinct subcultures, and as the followers of a religious tradition that embodies a distinctive worldview (the radical monotheism of not only the multiple varieties of historic Judaism but also the font of Christianity and Islam), an elite literary and sophisticated intellectual heritage that values learning as an end in itself, and a literature shot through with the imperative of justice in the community, nation, and world and committed to the sanctity of human beings created in “the image of God.” Therefore, the modernization of Judaism took place on both social and the ideological levels. In the nation-states of the West, the definition of Jews as a religious identity predominated, so that in Germany Jewish thought was shaped by the Enlightenment, romanticism, philosophical idealism, and academic Wissenschaft. In Eastern Europe, by the end of the 19th century, other models of modern Jewish communal life took center stage in response to growing political ferment between competing nationalities. The vision of emancipation held by most liberal and socialist ideologists was that the collective legal standing of ethnic minorities was to be constitutionally guaranteed. At the Versailles Peace Conference after World War I, the successor states to Austria-Hungary and Czarist Russia were forced to sign treaties formally confirming the legal and cultural rights of their respective minorities. This arrangement did not enjoy much success in the interwar years, nor did the total emancipation promised by radical socialism. Zionism, for a long time a minority movement within the Jewish minority, did find fruition after World War II.

As a project of modern Jewish social reintegration, the Zionist movement was predicated on the principle that so long as the Jews remained everywhere a minority, they would remain vulnerable to the forces of persecution and loss of identity. Only in their own land (and, according to political Zionism, in a sovereign Jewish nation-state) could Jews find a solution to the difficulties a minority faced in coping with pressures that the hegemonic culture could bring to bear. Cultural Zionists held that in a “spiritual” center a vibrant modern Hebraic culture would vitalize the Diaspora. Since 1948, the State of Israel provided the Jewish people a recognized voice in the international arena and an effective means of rescuing threatened branches of the Diaspora. Ironically, some of the problems of Jews being a minority have been transferred to the State of Israel, which has had to withstand a prolonged state of siege, fight four wars in its defense, and be smeared by allegations akin to anti-Semitism in Europe before the Holocaust. Like Diaspora Jewry, Israel had to react creatively and energetically to these challenges.

In premodern times the Jews, as a minority everywhere, found it difficult to protect themselves effectively against the onslaught of military or paramilitary forces, leaving a heritage of persecution and expulsion that resonated with the biblical theme of exile. The upsurge of anti-Semitism in Europe and elsewhere between the 1880s and the 1940s demonstrated that modern Jew hatred can be just as murderous or more so than those of the First Crusade (1095), the Black Death (1348–1349), and the Chmielnicki massacres (1648–1649) because of the devastating technology that can be used against the victims. The rationale for premodern persecutions was usually religious, but historians detect economic and political reasons that made persecution tempting and convenient: to confiscate the Jewish wealth and eliminate economic competitors, because certain rulers appeared to side with the mob in times of violent social tensions. In modern persecutions the rationale has often been overtly political and economic: Jews had acquired too much power; they were arrogant and dominating; there was no defense against their malevolent cunning but to destroy them root and branch. Singling out a minority to blame gave the illusion of doing something for the insulted and injured. Under such secular arguments, however, often lay Manichean or apocalyptic notions of a quasi-religious nature.

Another dilemma experienced by modern Diaspora Jewry (including secular Israelis who settle there) is loss of members through assimilation. The creation of a so-called “neutral society” (the term is used by social historian Jacob Katz for a zone neutral to specific religious identity) made it easier for individual Jews to pull away from the Jewish community and be absorbed into the majority. To be sure, Jews have always been, in a biblical phrase from 1 Chronicles 4:43, she'erit ha-peletah, a “remnant that escaped.” Although the vast majority of Jews are Jews by birth, there have always been converts to Judaism (“Jews by choice” in the current terminology). In modern Europe and the United States, Jews by birth increasingly resemble Jews by choice because they voluntarily chose to take their Jewish faith seriously and actualize it in their lives.

In premodern Judaism, Jews were a minority in fact but not in their own eyes. While the traditional Christian replacement theology held that the Old Israel, the Jewish people, was superseded by the Church as the New Israel, Jews viewed themselves as God’s beloved, a people chosen by the Eternal to provide God’s only Torah with a dwelling place on earth. Jews were the people who assumed the “yoke of the commandments” and the privilege of demonstrating that they were obedient to the covenant with God to which their ancestors had subscribed at Mount Sinai. There was a range of theological explanations for the persecutions Jews were forced to undergo besides that of punishment for the sins of the fathers as articulated in Deuteronomy. These disasters could be understood as echoing the Akedah (binding of Isaac) of Genesis 22; they were yisurin shel ahavah (chastisements of love) from a God who inordinately cared for them; they were a witness of the faithfulness of the people of Israel to its God, so that persecutions seldom ruptured Jewish faith and sometimes strengthened it.

The difference between premodern and modern experience of living as a vulnerable minority is captured in the words of Labor Zionist and intellectual Hayim Greenberg:

Until recent times we were . . . a minority statistically only, but not psychologically. . . . Jews survived as a numerical and persecuted minority in an alien world not because they were a separate tribe, a distinct people (in the modern, nationalist sense) or a different race. Tribes, peoples, racial groups disappeared many times when they mingled with others more numerous and stronger than they. . . . We were . . . the Congregation of Israel. This is much more than a group sharing common memories (time and environment frequently eradicate group memories and eliminate them as influencing factors); it is more than blood kinship. . . . During many centuries Jews were aware that, in addition to being a people like any other, a collective physical entity, they were also . . . a group of “conspirators” against the forces of darkness and uncleanness in the world, and that this “conspiracy” was part of Providence’s plan leading to the “end of days” which would come about sooner or later—time was not a factor and it was not desirable to hasten the end. (Greenberg 1955, 65f.)

Modern Jewish theology has had to reinterpret the uniqueness of the people of Israel in line with new assumptions and methodologies. One of the greatest differences modernity brought was the realization that Jews were “just a minority.” To be sure, modern learning made educated Jews much more aware of the impact that Jews and Judaism have had on human history. Historical consciousness enables a minority to gain a more nuanced and more complete comprehension of its total heritage against the background of world history. Many Jews are now aware of the remarkable varieties of long-forgotten Jewish cultures and “the Jewish contribution to civilization.” But modern Jewish self-awareness drove home how feared, despised, and hated Jews were and how helpless they could be when attacked. The new communal agencies and structures turned out to have no effective power when confronted by the Nazis and their cohorts. The Holocaust intensified immensely a sense of powerlessness, indicating that the Jews could count on few friends.

Modern minorities have come to think they have human rights. Perhaps the greatest ignominy is to be stripped of these rights in an attempt to force them back into subordinate status—or, worse, to dehumanize them. Certainly one of the motives for Jewish memorialization of the Holocaust is to exorcise the anger and guilt brought on by feelings of powerlessness resulting from it, as well as to derive some lessons about modes of self-protection in the future.

For all the problematic minority status of Diaspora existence, there can arise unprecedented opportunities. Thus, in premodern times the Jews could do little as a subjugated minority to further tikkun ha-olam (“repair of the world”). Now there are some opportunities to do so. Moreover, an openness to the other to an extent not conceivable in premodern times can enable the spiritual leaders of a minority, such as the Jews, to perceive elements of their heritage that have been forgotten, obscured, or eclipsed, and enter productive dialogue with other faiths, so that each interacting tradition may gain in knowledge, wisdom, and mutual understanding.

Selected Bibliography

- Biale, David. 1986. Power and Powerlessness in Jewish History. New York: Schocken Books.
 Funkenstein, Amos. 1993. Perceptions of Jewish History. Berkeley: University of California Press.

- Graetz, Heinrich. 1975. The Structure of Jewish History and Other Essays, edited by Ismar Schorsch. New York: Jewish Theological Seminary of America.
- Greenberg, Hayim. 1955. The Inner Eye I, New York: Jewish Frontier Association.
- Katz, Jacob. 1972. Emancipation and Assimilation: Studies in Modern Jewish History. Westmead, England: Gregg International Publishers.
- Katz, Jacob. 1986. Jewish Emancipation and Self-Emancipation. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society.
- Levine, Etan, ed. 1983. Diaspora: Exile and the Jewish Condition. New York: Jason Aronson.
- Myers, David N. 1995. Re-Inventing the Jewish Past: European Jewish Intellectuals and the Zionist Return to History. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Pinson, Koppel S., ed. 1958. Nationalism and History: Essays on Old and New Judaism by Simon Dubnow. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society.
- Rawidowicz, Simon. 1986. Israel: The Ever-Dying People and Other Essays, edited by Benjamin C. I. Ravid, 13–50. Rutherford, NJ: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press.
- Rivkin, Ellis. 1967. “The Diaspora: Its Historical Significance.” In Studies of the Leo Baeck Institute, edited by Max Kreutzberger, 265–318. New York: Leo Baeck Institute.
- Rotenstreich, Nathan. 1972. Tradition and Reality: The Impact of History on Modern Jewish Thought. New York: Random House.
- Schorsch, Ismar. 1994. From Text to Context: The Turn to History in Modern Judaism. Hanover, NH: Brandeis University Press.
- Seltzer, Robert. 1986. “The Experience of Being a Minority: The Jewish Experience: Ghetto, Assimilation, or . . .” In People of God, Peoples of God: A Jewish-Christian Conversation in Asia, edited by Hans Ucko, 2–12. Geneva: World Council of Churches.
- Yerushalmi, Yosef Hayim. 1982. Zakhor: Jewish History and Jewish Memory. Seattle: University of Washington Press.

The Lost Tribes of Israel

Amotz Asa-El

---

Historically, the lost tribes of Israel refers to the expelled and disappeared inhabitants of the biblical Kingdom of Israel that was conquered and destroyed by Assyria in 722 BCE, but mythologically they are a constant component in Judaism’s yearnings of national restoration and visions of redemption in the days to come.

The Emergence and Disappearance of the Israelite Kingdom

The 10 lost tribes constitute a collective reference to the Israelites who did not survive the First Temple’s destruction in 587 BCE, as opposed to the tribes of Judah, Levi, and Benjamin, who then forged what became the Jewish people, as evidenced in the book of Esther’s reference to Mordechai as “the Jew” (Esther 2:5), the first such reference in any known literature. This post-Israelite identity became known universally as “Jewish” after the disappearance of the tribes that inhabited the Israelite kingdom.

For its part, the Israelite kingdom—which was dominated by Ephraim and joined by all tribes except Judah and Benjamin as well as Levi, which did not possess a specific region, and Simon, which passively merged into Judah—seceded in 928 BCE from the kingdom Solomon bequeathed to his son Rehoboam. That kingdom, in its turn, was first established in 1025 BCE by Saul, who hailed from Benjamin, and in 1006 BCE was restored by David, who belonged to Judah.

The tribes that descended from Jacob the Patriarch—Reuben, Simon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, Dan, Naphtali, Gad, Asher, Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin—were never tightly united. Even under David's and Solomon's united kingdoms there were intra-Israelite tensions, particularly between the two largest tribes, Judah and Ephraim, but also between the smallest tribe, Benjamin, and its large neighbor to the south, Judah. The tension with Benjamin resulted in repeated civil wars, most notably the one described at length in Judges 20, when "all the Israelites came out, from Dan to Beersheba, including the land of the Gilead," to wage war on Benjamin because of the rape and murder of a woman in the town of Gibeah. Similarly, the rivalry between David and Saul concealed the historic friction between Judah and Benjamin. After Saul's death this tension also produced a violent clash between the soldiers of Joab and Abner, who were, respectively, David's and Saul's military commanders.

Still, the main tension was between Ephraim and Judah, and it surfaced soon after the death of Moses, when the former protested to Joshua (who was himself a member of their tribe) that the region carved out for them in the Promised Land was too forested and hilly. Similar tensions emerged subsequently during the pre-royal period, when the people of Ephraim challenged Gideon the judge for allegedly not deploying them in his successful attack on the kingdom of Ammon.

The tribes' disjointedness owed not only to genealogy but also to geography. Even before they entered the Promised Land, the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half of Manasseh asked Moses to stay put in Transjordan, whose grasslands they found suitable for their sheep and cattle. Moses reluctantly agreed, but only after receiving a promise that the soldiers of the two and a half tribes would not only join the conquest of the Promised Land but would also in fact lead it. Still, the consequent spread of the 12 tribes on both sides of the arid and inhospitable Jordan Valley could only intensify the seclusion in which the Transjordanian tribes dwelled, and further weaken pan-Israelite solidarity and cohesion. Thus, when Deborah the prophetess summed up the battle in which Sisera the Canaanite was defeated, she scolded Reuben: "Why did you tarry among the sheepfolds, to hear the piping of the flocks? Among the clans of Reuben there were great searchings of heart" (Judges 5:16).

The northern tribes' battle with the Canaanites was shunned not only by Reuben and Gad of the east but also by Asher and Dan of the north. Even more curiously, the southern tribes of Judah and Simon are not mentioned for better or for worse by Deborah, apparently indicating her own realization that their location was too far even in her demanding eyes for them to travel through the Samaritan Mountains to join the battle that took place east of Mount Carmel.

Other Israelite figures, most notably Samson, who belonged to the tribe of Dan, did not quarrel with other tribes, but their careers did not break through the confines of their immediate tribal settings. In fact, the Bible generally leaves the impression that the Israelite leaders before King Saul were hardly concerned about the other tribes' travails. In Gideon's case the refusal to weld the Israelites into a functioning polity was even ideological. When, after his impressive military victories, the "men of Israel" implored him to become their king, he replied, "I will not rule over you, neither shall my son rule over you; the Lord shall rule over you" (Judges 8:23). This attitude led philosopher Martin Buber to portray the tribes' existence before the rise of the Israelite kingdom as an idyll. The way he saw it, theirs was a society of farmers who combined political anarchy with religious piety and industrious husbandry. Either way, behind the passage that appears repeatedly in the book of Judges—"In those days there was no king in Israel; every man did that which was right in his own eyes"—lurked a failure to confront invasions from without and crime from within. This pervasive lack of security ultimately produced the popular demand for political power and national unity, which eventually gave rise to the Israelite monarchies.

Yet even when the Israelite kingdom was established, its limbs were never been connected by an efficient highway system. It seems that well before its destruction the Israelite kingdom was mainly what immediately surrounded Samaria, while its links to Transjordan and the Galilee remained weak.

Culturally, the Israelites appear to have been less committed to the Torah and more open to foreign influences, apparently owing to their proximity to the Mediterranean and the coastal plain, which was part of the international highway connecting Egypt with Phoenicia, Syria, and Mesopotamia. The Israelite tolerance of foreign culture even included the acceptance of a Gentile, Isabel, as its queen.

The Kingdom of Judah, by contrast, identified with the Temple at Jerusalem and remained less alien to the Mosaic tradition and more mentally distant from the outer world. It was also more marginal from the viewpoint of foreign invaders, whose main strategic focus was traditionally the coastal plain and those more immediately connected to it, like the Israelite kingdom.

The rivalry between Judah and Ephraim was foretold in Genesis, where the two tribes' founders square off, first when Joseph shares with his older brothers his dreams of dominating them, and in turn is sold by them to slavery, and then, after Joseph's rise to prominence as pharaoh's deputy and his dramatic encounter with his brothers, when Judah confronts Joseph on behalf of all their brothers.

The strife between Judah and Israel not only resulted in the failure to remain politically united, but it also made them more vulnerable to external pressure and occasionally even led to wars between them. Soon after Israel's secession, the Transjordanian kingdoms of Ammon, Moab, and Edom, which had previously been subjugated by the Israelites, restored their independence. Then Egypt and the Philistines attacked Israel. Eventually, Judah, too, attacked Israel and took lands in southern Ephraim, capitalizing on Israel's evident weakness after its debilitation by Egypt. During the reign of King Asa (908–867 BCE), Judah even called on a foreign power, Aram, to take sides in its conflict with Israel.

Although there were also periods of harmony between the two kingdoms, most notably in the times of kings Jehoshaphat of Judah and Ahab and Omri of Israel, when the kingdoms fought mutual enemies jointly and Judah did not interfere while Israel built Samaria as its new capital city, the separation of the two in their lives and deaths emerged as a defining trauma in Jewish history.

The Israelite kingdom was ultimately defeated in 722–720 BCE by Assyria, led successively by kings Shalmaneser V and Sargon II, whose policy was to exile the nations they conquered to distant lands. Judah, at the same time, was spared Assyria's assault thanks to King Hezekiah's shrewd maneuvering among regional powers. At the same time, Hezekiah consolidated his kingdom's bonds to the Temple and the Torah and "sent to all Israel and Judah, and wrote letters also to Ephraim and Manasseh, that they should come to the house of the Lord at Jerusalem, to keep the Passover unto the Lord, the God of Israel" (2 Chronicles 30:1). At that point, effectively, Israelite history ended and Jewish history began. After the Assyrian conquest, there no longer were Israelites, only Judeans, who eventually became known as Jews.

The Bible points to the exiled Israelites' initial locations: "In the ninth year of Hoshea, the king of Assyria took Samaria, and carried Israel away unto Assyria, and placed them in Halah, and in Habor, on the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes" (2 Kings 17:5). These places are between today's northeastern Syria and northwestern Iran. In those areas archaeology has found evidence of Israelite names like Hilkiyahu, Paltiyahu, and Neriyahu, but research has no answer for the Israelites' whereabouts since their initial relocation. Apparently, the historic disappearance of the Israelite tribes had more to do with culture than with geography, as they proved to lack the Judeans' determination to cling to their nationality and heritage.

The Emotional Effect of Disappearance

The disappearance of the 10 tribes troubled both Jeremiah, who ended up in Egypt, and Ezekiel, who was among the Judeans exiled to Babylon after Jerusalem's destruction in 583 BCE. Jeremiah said the lost tribes "shall come with weeping, and with supplications will I lead them; I will cause them to walk by rivers of waters, in a straight way wherein they shall not stumble; for I am become a father to Israel, and Ephraim is My first-born. Hear the word of the Lord, O ye nations, and declare it in the isles afar off, and say: 'He that scattered Israel doth gather him, and keep him, as a shepherd doth his flock'" (Jeremiah 31:6–9).

Ezekiel said: "I will take the children of Israel from among the nations, whither they are gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land; and I will make them one nation in the land, upon the mountains of Israel, and one king shall be king to them all; and they shall be no more two nations" (Ezekiel 37:21–22).

Yet when Persia's King Cyrus mandated the restoration of Jerusalem's Temple, some two generations after Jeremiah's time, his call was heeded by "the heads of fathers' houses of Judah and Benjamin, and the priests, and the Levites" (Ezra 1:5). The Israelites had vanished by then. In fact, throughout the Second Temple era there is no indication that the 10 tribes were actively sought. Some even ceased to expect them altogether. Rabbi Akiba, for instance, said, "The Ten Tribes shall not return again, for it is written (in Deuteronomy 29:28): 'And he cast then into another land like this day.' Like this day goes and does not return, so do they go and not return" (Mishna Sanhedrin, 10, 3).

Others, like Rabbi Eliezer, disagreed: "Just like the day first grows dark and then grows light, so also after darkness falls upon the 10 tribes light shall eventually shine upon them."

Indeed, the quest to restore the lost tribes would turn on imaginations for centuries both within and beyond the Jewish people, and remains potent until today. Allusions to the mystery of the lost tribes appeared already before the Second Temple's destruction. Flavius Josephus, for instance, mentioned the tribes' survival beyond the River Sambatyon, which he believed was beyond the Lebanon Mountains. The Sambatyon was mentioned also in rabbinic sources, from Genesis Rabba 73:6 to the Jerusalem Talmud (Sanhedrin 10:6), all of which agreed that it was an unnatural river that was impassable throughout the week, and only on Saturdays it would rest, when the observance of the day would prevent its passage. Josephus said the river flows on Saturdays and dries up on weekdays. Either way, the river's existence, and the lost tribes' presence beyond it, was universally accepted by Jews throughout the Diaspora.

Rabbi Akiva mentioned the Sambatyon's unnatural behavior as proof of the Sabbath's divinity, and 17th-century scholar Manasseh ben Israel said the Sambatyon's sand, even when placed in a bottle, would rattle throughout the week and rest on the Sabbath. Roman historian Pliny the Elder also mentioned as fact the existence of a river called Sambatyon, which stops flowing on Saturdays.

In 880 CE, the myth of the lost tribes took a new turn with the arrival in Kairouan, North Africa, of a tall, dark-skinned traveler who presented himself as Eldad of the tribe of Dan, or Hadani. The myth he created was later further bolstered by reports that claimed to speak no language other than Hebrew.

Hadani impressed Jews of all walks with tales about the lost tribes that were as rich with detail as they were fantastic. The tribes of Naphtali, Gad, Dan, and Asher, he reported, lived in East Africa near the biblical land of Havilah, which is rich with gold. These four tribes live as nomads under King Addiel. Although they were frequently fighting wars, they made good use of the presence of Samson's and Delilah's descendants in their midst. The only thing that separated them from the "sons of Moses" was the River Sambatyon, which was vicious during the weekdays and would only calm on the Sabbath, when it would become shrouded in fog or wrapped in flames. In that area, the lost tribes would alternately study and fight, rotating among them every three months.

In Central Asia lived the tribes of Simon and half of Manasseh, taxing 25 Gentile kingdoms. Zevulun, Issachar, and Reuben lived between today's northern Iran and Turkey, while Ephraim dwelled in the Arabian Peninsula. Hadani agreed that the Jews of the Muslim and Christian spheres were descendants of Judah and Benjamin.

Hadani's audience's simple belief in the existence of the lost tribes persisted uninterrupted, and in 1524 played a role in a bizarre episode involving the Vatican and the pope himself. It began when David Reubeni, apparently an Ethiopian Jew sold to slavery and redeemed by Jews in Alexandria, arrived in Ssfed, claiming to be on an official mission on behalf of the king of the 10 tribes. Reubeni said he had been ordered to return to the king of the 10 tribes with a stone from the Western Wall in Jerusalem. Claiming that he commanded an army and that the people of Israel's redemption was imminent, Reubeni took his message to the Vatican, after entering Rome riding a white horse. Although most local Jews were skeptical about his stories, Reubeni was granted an audience with Pope Clement VII in 1524. In the meeting, he tried to convince the pope to create a Jewish-Christian alliance against the Ottoman Empire. Two years later, Reubeni met also with Portugal's King John III in Lisbon. There he sparked a messianic storm among the local Marranos and was joined by Solomon Molcho, a Marrano who declared his Jewishness and claimed to be the Messiah. Eventually, the two were arrested. Molcho was burned at the stake and Reubeni died in jail.

Both Hadani and Reubeni's tales were fraught with fantasies that each of them evidently invented. Still, the audiences they received attested to the enduring power of the quest to locate the lost tribes and the universal agreement that the lost tribes existed.

Similarly, when the Mongols were approaching eastern Europe in the 13th century, both Christians and Jews often associated the invaders with the 10 tribes. Contemporary German and French chronicles claimed that some Jews contended that Genghis Khan's armies descended from the lost tribes and that once he redeemed the Jews from Christianity's rule he would make them rule the world.

The lost tribes also figured prominently in the redemptive designs of messianic imposture Sabbatai Zevi, who was active in the 17th century in Asia Minor, Palestine, and today's Greece. In the letters he sent to the Diaspora after proclaiming Zevi the Messiah, Nathan of Gaza promised that within a few years, besides unseating the Ottoman sultan and marrying the soon-to-be-resurrected biblical Moses' daughter, Rebecca, Zevi would redeem the 10 tribes. As news of the Messiah's arrival spread, rumors abounded, and one of them was that the lost tribes had been found.

Zevi's eventual arrest and conversion to Islam did not dent the faith in the existence of the lost tribes or in their future restoration. After Zevi's death, some of his followers claimed that he had crossed the Sambatyon and would remain with the 10 tribes until he will choose to return.

The survival of the lost tribes was accepted as truth until the modern era, not because of any empirical evidence but because of sacred scripture. If anything, a factual discovery that would disprove the existence of the Diaspora's 10 missing pieces would be perplexing. To contemporary Jews, Hadani's stories were novel mainly in the encounter they suggested with a reality that was only supposed to be unveiled once redemption actually dawned. Beyond that, the stories also excited Jews in their implicit refutation of Christian dogma, which contended that the Jews' dispersal was part of a humiliating plan whereby they could not be politically independent and militarily successful.

Indeed, even more potent than the pervasive belief that the lost tribes still existed was the faith that they would play a major role in the redemption, based on explicit prophecies like this one in Jeremiah (29:13): "And I will turn your captivity, and gather you from all the nations, and from all the places whither I have driven you, says the Lord; and I will bring you back unto the place whence I caused you to be carried away captive.”

Searching for the Lost Tribes

Spanish-born Kabbalist Abraham Abulafya set out to locate the Sambatyon in the Land of Israel, though he never got past Crusader-ruled Acre, where he landed in 1260. Twelfth-century traveler Benjamin of Tudela mentioned stories about the tribes of Dan, Asher, Zebulun, and Naphtali dwelling in a place called Nisaphur, where they were ruled by a Levite prince. The Spanish-Jewish merchant added that the tribes of Gad, Reuben, and half of Manasseh lived in the Arabian Peninsula. In the middle of the 17th century, Manasseh ben Israel, while seeking England’s agreement to the Jews’ readmission into England, said the ingathering of the lost Israelites was possible logistically and imperative religiously.

In recent times, the quest to find the lost tribes has only intensified and was joined by Jews motivated by modern nationalist ideas and Christians motivated by a theology that sees in the restoration of the lost tribes a vital stage on the way to the Second Coming. The quest to locate the tribes has sometimes produced theories that linked an assortment of ethnicities—from the British to the Japanese, American Indians, and even the Eskimos—to the lost tribes of Israel.

However, the most historically logical direction in which the 10 tribes were sought was Central Asia. The first to suggest that general direction was Benjamin of Tudela, who wrote:

There are men of Israel in Persia who say that in the mountains of Nishapur four of the tribes of Israel dwell, namely, the tribe of Dan, the tribe of Zebulun, the tribe of Asher, and the tribe of Naphtali, who were included in the first captivity of Shlamane-ser King of Assyria, as it is written (Kings II 18:11): “And he put them in Halah and in Habor by the River of Gozan and in the cities of the Medes.” The extent of their land is twenty days’ journey, and they have cities and large villages in the mountains; the River Gozan forms the boundary on the one side. They are not under the rule of the Gentiles, but they have a prince of their own, whose name is Rabbi Joseph Amarkala the Levite. There are scholars among them. And they sow and reap and go forth to war as far as the land of Cush by way of the desert. (Adler 1987, 53–54)

Benjamin of Tudela did not personally visit these sites and conceded he was merely conveying what he heard from others. Modern scholars, adventurers, and believers embarked on expeditions aimed at finding the lost tribes in Asia and Africa.

In Central Asia various ethnicities were explored as descendants of the 10 tribes. Names such as Gadoon, Ephtalite, and Amnasa—arguably reminiscent of Gad, Naphtali, and Manasseh—as well as the embrace of Islam in areas generally dominated by polytheistic religions, led some to see in various Central Asian groups descendants of the 10 tribes. The Jews of Bukhara, in today’s Uzbekistan, have been speculated as hailing from the tribe of Issachar because the name Issachcaroff is common among them.

The Pathans, who control the famous Khyber Pass between Pakistan and India, have been traced this way to the tribe of Gad. A local river, Gazni, resembles the name Gozan that the Bible cites as the exiled tribes' original destination. According to oral traditions that were put in writing already in the Persian chronicle of 1612 Makhsan I-Afghani, the Dorani and Yosofzai tribes of the Khayber area are descendants of the 10 tribes. Members of a large tribe nearby, Afridi, whose name reminds some of Ephraim, light candles on Saturday and wear a garment decorated with black stripes reminiscent of a Jewish prayer shawl.

The largest Afghan tribe, the Pashtun, has an ancient tradition tracing its origins to King Saul. According to local oral traditions the Afghans' forefathers were two of Saul's sons who after his death served King David. Local tales reveal an awareness of Solomon's Temple, as well as its destruction by the Babylonians and the exile that followed it. The trek to Afghanistan, according to these traditions, followed a revolt against the Babylonians that compelled its perpetrators to hide in a remote and difficult-to-access area, which the Afghan mountains clearly are.

In 1891, H. W. Bellew, a senior British colonial official in Afghanistan, presented a paper in London where he described the Pashtuns' belief that they descend from the 10 tribes, though he stressed that as devout Muslims it is for them but an explanation of their pre-Muslim roots. This was possibly the first secular, public discussion of the lost tribes based on relatively impartial and firsthand observation. At the same time, Jewish scholar Adolf Neubauer argued that the Samaritans—of whom a small community survives outside today's Nablus—descended from the 10 tribes.

Such secular interest in the lost tribes has increased in recent decades. Biblical scholar Allen Godbey argued that the more worldly northern tribes knowingly went with their faith to various parts of Africa and Asia, where some of them later joined the rising monotheistic religions that competed with Judaism.

Recent research, based on Assyrian inscriptions, among other things, concludes that the Israelites' deportations were incomplete and left behind at least some of them in the northern parts of the Land of Israel. As for the expellees' destinations mentioned in the Bible, which are generally between Iran's Zagros Mountains in the east and the sources of the Euphrates River in the west, archaeology has indeed unearthed in these locations Assyrian-era documents containing Israelite names as already mentioned.

The search for the lost tribes remained focused on central and southern Asia. Beyond Afghanistan, on the Indian-Burmese border, there are tribes that have been suggested to descend from the lost tribe of Manasseh. In recent years, some of their members have officially converted to Judaism and moved to Israel. Some Burmese tribes, who eventually became Christian, preserved ancient sacrificial rituals—which the surrounding Confucian and Buddhist faiths reject—as well as tales of the deliverance from slavery in ancient Egypt. Some see these as proof of their Israelite ancestry. Though they eat pork and use it in their rituals, they are said to do so to commemorate and atone for the original sin for which they were originally exiled.

Israeli author Hillel Halkin, generally a skeptic about the searches for the 10 tribes, recently followed Israeli rabbi Eliyahu Avichail, who has spent decades tracking down the lost tribes, for a journey to alleged lost tribe communities in China, Thailand, and the Indian-Burmese border. Halkin tells of an ancient song among the Mizos of northeastern India about the crossing of the Red Sea; another tradition that says the Mizos' ancestors worshipped a god named Yah; that centuries ago their ancestors used to circumcise their boys; that old Mizo texts mention the Israelite patriarchs; and that during a spring holiday celebrated in their region, the Mizos eat unleavened bread, much like the Jews do on Passover. Based on these and other findings, Halkin concluded that, in the provinces of Mizoram and Manipur in northeastern India, there is a population whose claim to have descended from the tribe of Manasseh is valid, despite its modern-era conversion to Christianity by European missionaries.

In Africa, genetic tests have traced to ancient Israel the origins of the Lemba tribe of southern Africa, which observes dietary and purity laws reminiscent of Judaism's. As for Ethiopian Jewry, the Israeli Chief Rabbinate's ruling that its members are Jewish explained that this community descended from the tribe of Dan.

The Beta Israel (House of Israel) communities, who lived in various locations across Ethiopia for centuries, were pejoratively called by their neighbors Falashas, or foreigners, and were discriminated against. According to some traditions, the Beta Israel, whose complexion resembles that of their black neighbors, originated with King Solomon's entourage to the queen of Sheba. Others attributed their roots to the lost Israelites. However, scholars tend to dismiss that possibility as well as the Israelite roots of various other African tribes (most notably the Lemba of southern Africa) as the Israelite exiles seem to have been led north rather than south. The more accepted theory locates the Beta Israel's ancestry in Yemen, which is relatively close and whose Jews are also dark skinned.

Selected Bibliography

- Adler, Elkan Nathan, ed. 1987. Jewish Travellers in the Middle Ages: 19 Firsthand Accounts. New York: Dover Publications.
- Becking, Bob. 1992. The Fall of Samaria: An Historical and Archaeological Study. Leiden, Netherlands: E. J. Brill.
- Bellew, H. W. 1977. An Inquiry Into the Ethnography of Afghanistan. Karachi, Pakistan: Indus Publication.
- Bustenay, Oded. 1979. Mass Deportations and Deportees in the Neo-Assyrian Empire. Wiesbaden, Germany: Ludwig Reipert.
- Godbey, Alan. 1930. The Lost Tribes: A Myth. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Halkin, Hillel. 2003. Across the Sabbath River. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.
- Harel-Hoshen, Sarah, ed. 1991. Beyond the Sambatyon: The Myth of the Ten Lost Tribes. Tel Aviv, Israel: The Diaspora Museum.
- Katz, Nathan. 2000. Who Are the Jews of India? Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Quirin, James. 1992. The Evolution of the Ethiopian Jews: A History of the Beta Israel (Falasha) to 1920. Philadelphia: University Press of Pennsylvania.

The Samaritan Diaspora

Alan D. Crown

---

An extensive Samaritan Diaspora in time as well as space is attested by inscriptions; archaeological evidence; legislation in various places; references in Greek, Arabic, and Syriac writings; and, of course, domiciliary details in the scholia of manuscripts. Samaritan envoys, merchants, civil servants, soldiers, and settlers were likely to be found wherever there was a Jewish Diaspora in the Mediterranean basin. However, northward, in Spain, France, and toward the Danube frontier, there is no evidence of any Samaritan community or legislation aimed at them.

There are ample testimonies as to the date of the final contraction of Samaritan settlement but it is uncertain when the Diaspora began. Alexander the Great is said to have taken Samaritan conscripts to Egypt and settled them as district guards on land allotments in the Thebaid. The Samaritan book of Joshua, supported by the Kitab al-Tarikh of Abu'l Fath, relates that Samaritans were living on the Tyrian littoral at the time of Alexander's invasion and gives the impression that there were Samaritans in Egypt, in some sort of organized community, at the time of his death.

In 331 BCE, Samaritans fled to escape the king's wrath after they burned alive Andromachus, the prefect of Syria. The papyri from Wadi Daliyeh relate to the aftermath of this affair. Apart from those who died at Daliyeh, one may assume that some escaped to the east across the Jordan, though there is nothing to connect them at this time with the Samaritan settlements at Siyagha and Nebo.

Ptolemy Lagus carried numerous Samaritans as captives to Egypt where they were settled, and others followed of their own accord as economic and other conditions in Egypt were favorable to them. There was a military settlement in the Fayyum called Samaraeia from Ptolemaic times.

When the Hasmonean renaissance in Palestine was at its height, the Samaritans were at their nadir. The destruction of Shechem at the time of Hyrcanus' campaign against Samaria is recorded archaeologically, and, it seems, the Samaritans of that city were forced to move elsewhere. Some may have left the country.

By the second century, there was a substantial Diaspora throughout the Mediterranean islands. A permanent trading colony of Samaritans with its own synagogue, on the isle of Delos, shows that there were Samaritans in Thasos, in a community that had a life of at least five centuries; likewise there was a community at Rhodes. Inscriptions from Athens indicate that the Samaritans were not restricted only to the islands. One of these inscriptions indicated that a Samaritan woman married a man from Antioch. Perhaps the latter was also a Samaritan. An inscription from Piraeus indicates a community there in the third century CE. At Thessalonica, the community was sufficiently large to have maintained a synagogue, one portion of which was named "the Tower of the Samaritans."

Samaritan sources bespeak a widespread emigration in reaction to Judean hegemony undertaken, apparently, in groups. Abu'l Fath gives details of sailing away in ships to the “ends of the earth,” that is, to points west in the Mediterranean basin, certainly to Sicily where there was a community and synagogue in Syracuse, by land to Babylon or to the northern frontiers of the empire inside the Fertile Crescent, and some to the eastern regions beyond the Jordan, presumably to the Hellenized cities of the Decapolis. The account is clearly exaggerated but indicates the capacity of the Samaritan community to react on a community basis in a manner no longer possible after the Romano-Byzantine period.

In the second century CE, the Samaritans appear to have been located in every major coastal city in Palestine, and they were to be found in Italy and throughout Asia Minor. Roman destruction of the Phoenician and Greek maritime empires had left a vacuum that had been partially filled by Judean shipping. The new port of Caesarea, in which the Samaritans were a sizable group, was a base for extensive seafaring activities. By the beginning of the Byzantine era the Samaritans made up about one third of the population of Caesarea. Doubtless, they were among those involved in the shipping ventures.

Frequent references to the Egypt Diaspora in the early Christian world show that the Samaritans were administrators, merchants, laborers, and soldier-settlers. The disputed letter of Hadrian Augustus to Servianus, reported in Scriptoriae Historiae Augustae, speaks of both Samaritans and Jews in Egypt: “some are blowers of glass, others makers of paper, others are at least weavers of linen or seem to belong to one craft or another.” Attention is drawn to the Samaritans of Carthage in 632 CE, and it may be assumed that Samaritans were settled on the North African coast.

Justin Martyr’s First Apology (chapter 26) indicates that there was a Samaritan community at Rome with connections to the rest of the Diaspora. There is a dubious tradition that a statue was erected to Simon Magus by his Samaritan compatriots in Rome, which might indicate that the Samaritan community had grown to include a number of wealthy individuals, perhaps even some merchants. Samaritans in imperial service could have been free to visit Rome and settle there, before the operation of the anti-Samaritan legislation.

The fourth century CE saw conflicts between the Church and the Jews and Samaritans at Ravenna and Rome. By the fifth century CE, the Samaritans were scattered throughout Italy. They had a synagogue in Rome at least into the sixth century and were well established in Sicily as merchants, farmers, and slave owners at Syracuse, Catania, Cagliari, Naples, and Palermo. Evidence of a long period of settlement is seen in two inscribed columns that appear to have been part of a Samaritan synagogue in Syracuse.

There are complementary Samaritan and Byzantine references to an influential Samaritan community at Constantinople. Justinian’s edict of 527 CE issued in Constantinople speaks of the Samaritans in the “glorious city.” John of Ephesus, gives the impression of a substantial and troublesome Samaritan community in 579.

The Samaritans made common cause with the Persians in their campaigns against the emperors of Byzantium, and they took refuge from Byzantium in Persia. In 530 CE, 50,000 refugees are alleged to have been taken by Cabades from Persia to work in his silver mines in Armenia, apparently the beginning of an Armenian and Persian Diaspora. There is also some evidence that there was a Samaritan community in Babylon, though the number of Samaritans may have been so small that they were forced into religious symbiosis with the Jews.

Famine, plague, and the devastating earthquakes of 549–550 CE must have seen many Samaritans anxious to leave their homeland, and it is, perhaps, at this time that the Samaritan Diaspora in Arabia expanded, perhaps to include the island known as Samiri in the Red Sea, which is said to have remained the home of a Samaritan group until the 13th century.

The Samaritan Diaspora was lost to sight soon after the Moslem conquest apart from Damascus and Egypt. By the 10th century CE, there were concentrations of population in Alexandria and Cairo where the community had its own rais who was responsible for all the Samaritan synagogues in Egypt. By the 15th century, only 50 Samaritan families seem to have been left in Cairo.

When the community in Egypt came to its close is unknown. The last known Egyptian manuscript seems to have been written in Cairo in 1761. The Egyptian Diaspora must have come to an end at about the same time the community in Gaza was so reduced that the last members returned to Shechem.

Damascus seems to have assumed more the role of a second Samaritan homeland than a diaspora. Refugees and exiles from Shechem increased the community during the heyday of the community, the 12th through the 14th centuries. Their number diminished rapidly by the end of the 17th century when an adjacent Samaritan community in Aleppo ended.

Selected Bibliography

- Avi-Yonah, M. 1972. "The Samaritans in the Roman and Byzantine Periods." In Eretz Shomron, Thirtieth Archaeological Convention, 1972, edited by Joseph Aviram, 34–37. Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society.
- Bruneau, Ph. 1982. "Les Israélites de Délos et la Juiverie Délienne." Bulletin de Correspondance Hellénique 106: 466–504.
- Crown, A. D. 1989. "The Samaritan Diaspora." In The Samaritans, 195–217. Tübingen, Germany: J.C.B. Mohr.
- Finkel, J. 1933. "Jewish, Christian and Samaritan Influences on Arabia." In McDonald Presentation Volume, 147–156. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Kraabel, A. T. 1984. "New Evidence of the Samaritan Diaspora has been Found on Delos." Biblical Archaeologist 47 (1): 44–47.
- Lifshitz, B., and J. Schiby. 1968. "Une Synagogue Samaritaine à Thessalonique." Revue Biblique 75 (3): 368–378.
- Robert, Jean et Louis. 1969. "Bulletin épigraphique no. 369, une synagogue Samaritaine à Thessalonique." Revue des Etudes Grecques 82: 477–478.

History of the Karaite Diaspora

Fred Astren

---

Karaism is a Jewish sect whose teachings recognize only the Hebrew Bible as a divinely revealed authoritative source for law. Consequently, Karaites deny the authority of rabbinic tradition and leadership, rejecting the concept of the Oral Law and its literature, the Mishnah and Talmud. Karaism offered a competitive alternative to rabbinic (Rabbinite) Judaism from the late 9th through 11th centuries, especially in the Islamic Middle East. During this so-called “classical” period, Karaites challenged Rabbinite hegemony, in part, by reinterpreting the meaning of the Exile and proposing new responses to the Diaspora. In the Middle Ages, Karaism flourished in Islamic lands, but during the 11th century, the center began to gravitate to the Byzantine Empire and later to the Crimea. Later, Karaite communities were established in Eastern Europe in Poland-Lithuania. Today, Karaites are found mainly in Israel.

Anan ben David, an unsuccessful eighth-century candidate for the office of exilarch, is often acknowledged in Karaite tradition as its founder. In fact, Anan’s teachings and the movement based on them demonstrate considerable doctrinal and Halachic differences from later Karaism. Salo Baron characterized Anan’s teachings as a metropolitan elitism that attracted a segment of the educated classes to a rigorist movement that challenged many rabbinic legal premises and interpretations (Baron 1957, 210–222). Anan’s emphasis on Jewish particularism led him to demand a complete segregation of Jews from Gentiles and the separation of the literate and pious from the illiterate and impious. This Diaspora-oriented ideology stands in contrast to activist messianic movements of the era.

Karaite origins are more properly dated to the late ninth and early tenth centuries, when a variety of different trends in early medieval Judaism contributed to an identifiable movement characterized by five key features: scripturalism, anti-rabbanism, quasi-ascetic rigor, millennialism, and a view to bring an end to the Diaspora.

The rise of scripturalism among Jews seems to parallel similar concerns developing at that time among Muslims. By focusing on scripture to the exclusion of tradition, Karaites were able to generate a strong anti-rabbinic ideology, claiming that the rabbis had concocted the Mishnah and Talmud for their own benefit. In this context, early Karaite polemics blame the rabbis for the Exile. They maintained that grievous rabbinic error had led Israel to forsake the divine covenant and thus to the misfortune of living scattered across the lands under the dominion of non-Jews.

Building on this critique of rabbinic Judaism, Karaite scripturalism also provided the basis for adhering to a rigorist interpretation of the Law. Early Karaites were known for fasting and night prayers, prohibiting sexual activity on the Sabbath, and shunning the consumption of meat and wine as long as the Temple remained in ruin. For example, the tenth-century Japheth ben ‘Eli prescribes “such super-erogatory acts as fasting, donning coarse clothing, and refraining from permissible delights and celebrations, while praying continually at night” (Frank 2004, 201). Although many Karaites would come to be important merchants in medieval Egypt and elsewhere, early Karaism rejected commerce and the accumulation of wealth, understanding both to be features of life in the Diaspora under the leadership of the rabbis and antithetical to the Karaite legal rigorism. Some of these practices echo the ideology of the early medieval pietistic movement known as the Mourners of Zion, whose ascetic and sorrowful understanding of Jewish life and law stand in contrast to rabbinic notions of joy and a more lenient interpretation of the Law.

Legal rigorism and quasi-ascetic practices thus provided for a way of life in the Diaspora, but they could also be understood to be mechanisms for establishing conditions in preparation of the End of Days. Karaite millennialist anticipation differed from messianic movements of the seventh and eighth centuries in that the awaited messiah of the Karaites was not an identified living individual. The utopianism of messianism was preserved (including expectation of the ingathering of exiles and the end of the Diaspora) while the dangerous militant activism of the earlier movements was avoided by an absence of a messianic leader. Both rabbis and Karaites understood the danger of messianic movements that could lead to death and destruction at the hands of Gentiles. For the rabbis, the messiah would come of his own accord and in God’s time. In the meantime, they formulated a way of life, but in so doing, made accommodation to Exile and life in the Diaspora. The rabbis reinforced their diasporic perspective by prohibiting such matters as working to “hasten the End” and ascetic responses to the destruction of the Temple and the Exile. Both rabbis and Karaites understood that messianism and asceticism were forms of resistance to Exile that if allowed to persist could upset the rabbinic Halachic and hegemonic system.

In contrast to the rabbis, formative Karaism was impelled by a focus on the Land of Israel (called “Palestino-centrism” in Ankori 1959, 22–23) that went beyond conceptual concern for the Temple and the future ingathering of the exiles to a concrete, well-articulated call for the return of Jews to the Holy Land. A figure associated with the late ninth-century origins of Karaism in the Land of Israel is Daniel ben Moses al-Qumisi, who insisted that “it is incumbent upon you who fear the Lord to come to Jerusalem and to dwell in it, in order to hold vigils before the Lord until the day when Jerusalem shall be restored” (Nemoy 1952, 37).

From a millennialist perspective, immigration to the Land of Israel and the consequent eradication of the Exile would be a necessary condition for the coming of the messiah. From a quasi-ascetic perspective, Karaite interpretation and practice would provide the rules for living while millennialist objectives remained unrealized. From an anti-rabbinic perspective, focus on return to the Land of Israel would subvert rabbinic norms of accommodation to diasporic normality.

In this light, the establishment of an active Karaite community in Jerusalem was an important symbolic gesture. In practice, the immigrant Karaite community grew to become the intellectual center for Karaites across the Middle East and Mediterranean. The community was marked by its particular practices, its own synagogues, a calendar distinct from the Rabbinites, and perhaps one or more formal academies whose scholars were known across the Karaite and wider Jewish world. Karaite scholars such as Salmon ben Jeroham, Sahl ben Masliah, and Yusuf al-Basir, focused on Halacha, Bible commentary, and philosophy. The literary output from this community, most often written in Judeo-Arabic (but also Hebrew), and often marked by a lack of consensus on important matters, constitutes the “classical” expression of formative Karaism. The prevalent use of Judeo-Arabic stands as a marker identifying the abiding condition of Exile, which was understood not to have been eradicated through mere immigration and occupation of the center of Jewish space. Correspondingly, the use of the host culture’s language (though not alphabet) marked an enhanced recognition of Hebrew, reserved as the language of sanctification and for use in messianic times.

With the 11th-century decline of Palestine after the Saljuq Turkish and Crusader invasions, the Jerusalem center ceased to exist. In the Middle East, Karaism persisted in Egypt, some of whose prominent families rose to influential government positions under the Fatimids. At the end of the 11th century, Maimonides ruled on Karaite practice in a famous takkanah on ritual purification and in his letters and responsa. As late as the mid-16th century, the Rabbinite Samuel b. Moses ha-Levi ibn Hakim ruled that Karaite-Rabbinite marriages, a long-standing practice in Egypt, were legitimate. Other smaller, less influential Karaite communities were found in Damascus and Iraq. In Europe, there is brief mention by Ibn Daud that Karaism was extirpated in Spain.

During the 12th and 13th centuries, a new center of Karaite communal life and intellectual activity coalesced in the Byzantine Empire. In the linguistic and cultural translation from an Arab-Islamic to Greek-Christian culture and society, Karaites were forced to reassess their Jerusalem and Palestinian inheritance. Obviously, focus on the Land of Israel could no longer be conceived of as a practicable matter. More importantly, while deemphasizing the central tenet of a return to Zion, Karaites correspondingly redefined the other components of their ideological system. Millennialism—the ideological coefficient of a return to Zion—was reframed in a less activist register, not unlike that of the rabbis. Quasi-ascetic rigor was redefined and narrowed, as evidenced in the 15th-century struggle over the use of Sabbath candles. Appositely, vehement anti-rabbanism began to be mitigated on account of the maneuvering for position and competition among Jewish communities and sects in Byzantium, leading Karaites to portray themselves as less threatening to the rabbis than other sects (such as the Mishawites). Clearly, Karaism no longer posed an existential challenge to rabbinic Judaism. These changes eventually opened the door for Karaite accommodation to rabbinic literature, Halacha, and thought. The anti-diasporic stance of “classical” Karaism had given way to an acquiescence to Exile. Important Byzantine Karaite scholars include Judah Hadassi, Aaron ben Joseph, and Aaron ben Elijah.

Fifteenth-century Ottoman Turkish dominance in the Balkans and Anatolia was marked by the 1453 conquest of Constantinople, after which a reinvigorated, although reduced Karaite community emerged in the new imperial capital. There, Karaites studied alongside Rabbinite Jews in rabbinic academies, were exposed to Sephardic Jewish influences and maintained contact with Karaites in other lands.

The Karaite Diaspora echoed the florescence of the Ottoman imperial host culture in an intellectual revival marked by the consolidation of Karaite Halacha and further interest in philosophy under the leadership of Elijah ben Moses Bashyachi and Caleb ben Elijah Afendopolo.

To the north, Karaites are first noted in the Crimea in the 13th century and in Poland-Lithuania in the late 14th century. In both regions, Karaites adopted forms of Turkic languages dominant of the Mongol political sphere. In Eastern Europe, the Karaim language acted as an ethnic marker to further distinguish Karaites from Rabbinites and from the majority Slavic-speaking peoples. Nonetheless, prominent Karaite scholars from the late 17th and early 18th centuries, such as Mordecai ben Nissan of Kokizow, Solomon ben Aaron Troki, and Simha Isaac Lutzki, continued to study and write in Hebrew.

It is important to note that in the modern era Karaism followed divergent paths in the Muslim Middle East and Christian Europe. In Europe, Karaite particularity led to the development of an identity that was purposefully distinct from that of Rabbinites. After the final partition of Poland in 1795, when the vast majority of Eastern European Jews became subjects of Russia, the small community of Karaites was able to obtain exemptions from the Czarist government's anti-Jewish policies. In World War II the anomalous character of Karaite identity led to Nazi policies that treated Karaites differently from other Jews. Under Soviet Russian rule, Karaite religion moved away from Jewish ideological formulations by emphasizing the "Old Testament" basis of the religion and by incorporating some Christian liturgical elements into the prayers. After the fall of the Soviet Union only a few hundred Karaites—lacking strong leadership and a coherent community—remained in Eastern Europe.

From the Middle Ages onward, Karaites in the Muslim Middle East continued to be acknowledged both by Rabbinate Jews and Muslims as part of the recognized Jewish minority. The largest community continued to reside in Egypt, while smaller ones were found in Istanbul, Damascus, and Iraq. In the 20th century, Egyptian Karaites tended to view themselves as indigenous Egyptians, some of whom embraced Egyptian nationalism or communism, while most of whom were resistant to Zionism, at least until after the 1956 and 1967 Arab-Israeli wars when Egyptian domestic policies became increasingly anti-Jewish. Karaites in Egypt and elsewhere in the Arab world experienced hostility and like other Jews dissolved their communities and emigrated to France, Switzerland, the United States, and Canada, but mostly to Israel.

At the beginning of the 21st century, there are approximately 25,000 Karaites in Israel with only smaller communities elsewhere in the world, most notably in California's San Francisco Bay area, where there are approximately 300 families. In both environments, the challenges of minority life and acculturation are generating new notions of Karaite family, religion, community, and identity.

Selected Bibliography

Ankori, Zvi. 1959. The Karaites in Byzantium, The Formative Years, 970–1100. New York and Jerusalem: Columbia University Press and the Weizmann Science Press of Israel.

- Astren, Fred. 2004. Karaite Judaism and Historical Understanding. Columbia: University of South Carolina.
- Baron, Salo W. 1957. "Karaite Schism." In A Social and Religious History of the Jews, Vol. 5, 209–285. New York and Philadelphia: Columbia University Press and The Jewish Publication Society.
- Frank, Daniel. 2004. Search Scripture Well: Karaite Exegetes and the Origins of the Jewish Bible Commentary in the Islamic East. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Gil, Moshe. 1992. A History of Palestine, 634–1099. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press.
- Miller, Philip E. 1993. Karaite Separatism in Nineteenth-Century Russia, Joseph Solomon Lutski's "Epistle of Israel's Deliverance." Cincinnati: Hebrew Union College Press.
- Nemoy, Leon. 1952. Karaite Anthology. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Polliak, Meira, ed. 2003. Karaite Judaism: A Guide to Its History and Literary Sources. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.

Persecution of Diaspora Jews

History of Jewish Persecution and Expulsion

Frederick Schweitzer

---

In the common or Christian era, persecution and expulsion—the threat or actuality—have been constants in Jewish history. The primary motive or rationale has consistently been anti-Semitism, which has taken many forms. Anti-Semitism may be defined basically as fear and hatred of the Jews. It derives from the accusation of Jews as “Christ-killers,” deicides, perpetrators of the inexpiable arch-crime that makes them a criminal people for all time. In committing that arch-crime and all subsequent criminality they presumably engaged in, Jews were seen as the agents of Satan, armed with his superhuman powers and devoted to his service; this demonization was pronounced by Jesus himself, castigating Jews, saying that God is not your father, “your father is the devil and you choose to carry out his desires”; he is a “murderer” and “liar” (John 8:44). The Antichrist is the Jewish leader who will wade through oceans of blood and tears to rule the world and inflict infinite suffering and destruction for three and a half years until Jesus’ second coming and the end of history. Parallel is the notion of Jews as eternal conspirators, bent on taking over the world; destroying Christianity; and fomenting revolutions, wars, epidemics, depressions, and every kinds of calamities. The Shylock image depicts Jews as greedy exploiters guilty of terrible economic depredations; the Jews invented both capitalism and communism, which they, as international bankers and international revolutionaries, deploy to dominate peoples by manipulating governments, controlling the media, and subverting culture. Jewish brainpower augments such threats by using ideas as weapons: “Intelligence—that is the mortal sin of the Jews,” exclaimed one fearful anti-Semite (Perry and Schweitzer 2002, 166). A later addition to this farrago, but with medieval precedents, is that of the “alien” and “foreign” Jews as race defilers and polluters of the nation. Another stereotype is of the Jews as the bearers of disease and plague; poisoners of air, food, wine, and water; and the Jewish physician who poisons his patients as required by the Talmud.

By 1200, two powerful motives to wreak violence on Jews had emerged: the accusation of ritual murder (about 244 are recorded but this is certainly an understatement; 72 such accusations have been documented in the 20th century) and host desecration (a minimum of 100 medieval examples). As putatively ordained by Jewish law, ritual murder is a crime committed to celebrate Passover and requires kidnapping a Christian, usually a boy in the image of the Christ child, and draining away his blood in a replay of the crucifixion for ritual, medicinal, or magical purposes. Some medieval popes resolutely condemned ritual murder as utterly false, but to very little avail, as at Trent in 1475, the site of the shrine (until 1965) of Blessed Simon of Trent, the alleged victim of ritual murder. The cycle at Trent repeated the archetypal pattern that began in 1144 with another alleged victim of ritual murder, St. William the Martyr of Norwich in England: after torture, trials, confessions, and executions of suspects, the remnant was expelled, their property was confiscated, a proclamation barred Jews “forever” from Trent, and a lucrative pilgrims’ shrine was erected. The archetypal pattern of host desecration was similar: the Jews were accused of stealing the consecrated hosts of the body of Christ, whereupon accusers claimed they “tortured Jesus again” by stabbing, beating, boiling, or burning the hosts, which “bled” or cried out, making it impossible to destroy or hide them. The Jews would be caught, tried, confess under duress, and be burnt alive. Their property would be confiscated, and the synagogue would be converted into a church or chapel. Those who escaped burning were massacred, baptized, or expelled. These presumed crimes cost the lives of countless numbers of Jews. Although most Protestant denominations condemned Eucharistic transubstantiation as superstition, and host desecration lapsed in those areas, it persisted long afterward in Catholic lands. Protestantism did not significantly curb accusations of ritual murder, which continued unabated in Central and Eastern Europe, and began to appear in Latin America and later in the Middle East.

Whatever the circumstances or pretext for persecution on a given occasion, it is this body of myths and stereotypes of the Jew as standing menace that causes anti-Semitism to endure and makes it dangerous and often lethal. This web of myths and supporting ideology originated in the New Testament as interpreted by the Church Fathers and elaborated and acted upon in the Christian Middle Ages and, usually in various secular guises, in later periods and the present. Thus, it did not lie at the root of expulsions and persecutions of Jews in the pre-Christian era. The fate of Jews at the hands of the Assyrians (the inventors of mass deportation and resettlement, and thus initiators of the Diaspora), Babylonians, Hellenistic Greeks, and Romans was the usual one of peoples defeated in war, whose territory was conquered and occupied, or whose revolts against foreign occupation and rule failed. Jewish revolts in Judaea against Roman rule in 66–73 and 132–135 resulted in their expulsion from Jerusalem, from which they were barred for centuries; many captives were enslaved and settled permanently in Rome, and other Jewish communities were unmolested. Even the anti-Semitic Voltaire, rebutting the idea that the Diaspora was divine retribution for deicide, explained, “Indeed, if while Jerusalem and its Temple existed, the Jews were sometimes driven from their country by the vicissitudes of empires, they have still more frequently been expelled through a blind zeal from every country in which they have dwelt since the progress of Christianity and Islam” (Perry and Schweitzer 2007, doc. 10).

The prototypical expulsion of Jews by Christian authorities was by Bishop Cyril of Alexandria in 414, the earliest recorded. He assaulted the city’s Jewish quarter, converting synagogues into churches, confiscating property, and expelling survivors who did not accept baptism. His actions violated the Christian belief—one of the few restraints on persecution—that Jews must survive until the end-time and the return of Christ in order to testify to the truth of Christianity. By the 10th century, church policy had been elaborated sufficiently that popes stipulated that Jews were to be preached to “incessantly,” and if they refused baptism, they should be expelled so that the righteous would be uncontaminated by infidels. By then there had been many expulsions, threatened or actual, accompanied by confiscations, forcible conversions (violating church law), and—especially when lay leaders or mobs took part—massacres. Thus, in Spain, before the Muslim conquest of 711, the Jews were twice commanded to be baptized or banished, and the numerous church councils meeting at Toledo issued a series of anti-Jewish edicts that verged on prescribing genocide. In the years 558 to 629, several bishops and kings of Gaul ordered Jews to be baptized or banished. In 629, the Byzantine emperor Heraclius reconquered Judaea from Persia, enslaved and deported many of its Jews, and in subsequent years imposed the choice of baptism or expulsion on all the Jews of the Byzantine Empire; Heraclius probably commanded the kings of the Franks, Burgundians, Lombards, and Visigoths in the west (theoretically his subordinates) to throw down the same gauntlet of baptism or banishment—which, urged by their clergy, they did. Scattered in the chronicles are references to expulsions and forced conversions by the clergy of Sens, France, in 876; Vienna in the 930s; Mainz, Germany, in the 930s and 1012; Orléans, France, in 1007–1010 (where riots and forced baptisms set off similar ravages in Rouen, Limoges, and elsewhere in France); Bologna, Italy, in 1171; and Bury St. Edmunds, England, in 1190.

When Christian scholars and ecclesiastics discovered the Talmud in the 12th century, they concluded that Jews followed it rather than the Bible, that it was heretical and “of earth,” and therefore the criminal Jews forfeited any right to tolerance; this idea exposed Jews increasingly to inquisitorial proceedings, conversionist sermons, and coerced baptism. In the same period, the belief arose, contradicting Christian tradition, that the Jews knew Jesus was divine, but with malice aforethought crucified him anyway, and so revealed their irredeemably evil and satanic nature. In the many anti-Jewish treatises of the 12th and 13th centuries, Jews are equated with sexual depravity, with money as “filthy lucre,” and generally with filth and excrement. Such attitudes and rationales went far to dehumanize Jews—Christian polemic constantly refers to them as dogs, goats, pigs, vermin, and the like—psychologically empowering their tormentors to murder and maim with impunity. Papal policy as set forth in Calixtus II’s Constitutio pro Judeis, issued in 1120 and reissued at least 15 times by 1450, was rarely sufficient to counter angry preaching and incitement. Calixtus condemned forced baptism, assaults on Jews and their property, desecration of synagogues and cemeteries, and acknowledged their right of local self-government and to practice Judaism. Church law forbade forcible baptism and in earlier centuries Jews were permitted to return to their ancestral faith, but in 1201 Pope Innocent III nullified the prohibition, pronouncing that despite torture or intimidation, one who has received “the grace of Baptism . . . might properly be forced to hold to the faith which they had accepted perforce” (Perry and Schweitzer 1994, 137–138).

The Crusades, which represent Christendom’s adaptation of the Muslim idea of holy war and jihad, faced the Jews with the choice of baptism or death. For more than two centuries, crusading ardor caused enormous Jewish casualties, beginning in 1096 in France, the Rhine valley, and the communities (such as Prague) encountered on the trek east, for as one preacher explained, “After traversing great distances, we desire to attack the enemies of God in the East, although the Jews, of all races the worst foes of God, are before our eyes. That's doing our work backwards" (Perry and Schweitzer 1994, 133–134). In Bavaria in 1298, following rumors of host profanation, great bands of people led by one Rintfleisch rampaged over the countryside for most of the summer massacring thousands of Jews. A generation later, from 1337 to 1339, another bloodthirsty mob led by one Armleder ran amok over the same areas and into neighboring lands, seeking revenge on the Jews for host desecration. Massive casualties stemmed from a series of massacres in France by the Pastouraux (shepherds), spontaneous crusading movements of starving flagellants in the 1320s, who accused Jews and lepers of poisoning the wells. More widespread and lethal massacres followed the Black Plague of 1348: the ensuing Judenbrand (Jew-burning) caused huge casualties and blotted out some 300 Jewish communities. Persecution was so prevalent that occasionally Jews expressed thankfulness for expulsion as a lesser evil. After 1400, resort was made more often to expulsion so that by 1541 all of Western and most of Central Europe was devoid of Jews. A great many towns and principalities in politically fragmented Germany executed expulsions in those decades: Augsburg, Brandenburg, Cologne, Constance, Geneva, Nuremberg, Salzburg, to name a very few. The cycle of massacre, arrest/expulsion, readmission (out of financial calculation), and expulsion several times over, was cynically used, as at Mainz in 1420, 1438, 1462, and 1471. For money, monarchs granted municipalities the prerogative—examples appear in England, Germany, Italy, and Poland—de non tolerandis Judaeis, enabling town councils to exclude or expel Jews arbitrarily and without royal permission. Learning from the monarchs, townspeople were fertile in inventing devices to destroy and profit.

The Jewish community of Vienna was extinguished in the 1420s by a process of host desecration allegations; arrests, trials, and burnings at the stake; forced conversions, especially of children; confiscations; and expulsion “forever” from all Austria. In the 17th century, the Habsburg emperor invited Jews back to Vienna, but as the learned anti-Semitic professor Johannes Eisenmenger explained, they had to be re-expelled because they “cruelly murdered” a Christian woman, torturing and lacerating her with many stabbings, and, because this crime was “accompanied by numerous robberies and other ruthless depravities, his imperial majesty, moved by praiseworthy Christian zeal, decreed the expulsion of the evil-doing Jews. In the year 1670 he had proclaimed with trumpet blasts in the public squares of Vienna that all Jews be eternally banned and that none be any more seen, upon pain of life and limb.” The Jews fled to Turkey and Venice (Perry and Schweitzer 2007, doc. 9).

In 1568, Pope St. Pius V expelled the Jews from the Papal States except for Rome and Ancona, thus eradicating numerous small communities, expropriating synagogues and cemeteries for Catholic use, and sweeping those who did not escape abroad into the notorious Roman ghetto (founded in 1555), where they were subjected to tyrannous theocratic rule, policies calculated to impoverish, missionary pressures and compulsory weekly sermons, censorship of their books, and much else intended to crush and humiliate them until the insalubrious, overcrowded, curfew-regimented ghetto's dissolution in 1870. Since Passion plays—Jew-hatred dramatized—often unleashed sack and mayhem, the popes banned performances in Rome, but everywhere else Jews remained subject to that annual danger and to paroxysms sometimes triggered by Antichrist plays. In 1586, the prohibition on Jewish settlement in the Papal States was rescinded, and they became a place of refuge in some measure.

Throughout the two centuries of their presence in England after 1066, the Jews' financial contributions accounted for some 10 percent of royal revenues; thus, the Crown protected them the better to exploit and ultimately kill this golden goose. Riots, arson, and massacre at the time of the Third Crusade and Richard the Lion-Heart's coronation in 1190 may have been the single worst atrocity against Jews in the Middle Ages; John's reign was more notable for extortionate taxation, a prerogative the Magna Carta compelled him to share with the barons. Under the long reign of the pious Henry III, Jews were subject to a range of extortionate taxes, forced loans, fines, confiscations, pogroms, arbitrary arrests to be sold as chattel, and accusations of ritual murder (Chaucer refers to the alleged victim, Little St. Hugh of Lincoln, in his Canterbury Tales) that utterly impoverished them. Henry expressed royal attitudes accurately in stating, "No Jew shall remain in Our realm unless he can serve the king" (Baron 1952–1983, 4:109). Under Edward I, the Jews were unable to "serve the king" and enrich his treasury; he accused them of participating in "a malicious conspiracy, continu[ing] a new form of usury more malicious than the old" (Baron 1952–1983, 4:113). In his 1275 "Statute concerning Jewry," Edward forbade "usury" by anyone and permitted Jews to enter commerce, handicrafts, and agriculture; but—as with later similar efforts—these fields fiercely

A massacre of Jews in York, England, is dramatized in this 19th-century engraving.

During the Third Crusade, there were several anti-Semitic riots in England in which Jews were killed by angry mobs. Religious zealotry and anti-Semitism were widespread in Europe during the Middle Ages. (John Clark Ridpath, Ridpath's History of the World, 1901) resisted new competitors. Edward's halfhearted scheme failed, and in 1290 he expelled the Jews, perhaps 16,000 persons; many Jewish children were prevented from leaving with their families, suggesting that Edward partly implemented the theologian Duns Scotus's prescription to kidnap and baptize children to prevent their parents from killing them.

Philip II Augustus of France initiated drastic changes in royal Jewry policy when he ordered "his Jews" (his chattel) arrested in their synagogues on a Sabbath day, and extracted an enormous fine for the crime, seemingly, of being Jews; he canceled all debts payable to Jews but made one-fifth payable to his treasury. A year later, in 1182, he expelled all the Jews, confiscating their real property and allowing them three months to dispose of other possessions. The king soon ran out of money, however, and recalled the Jews in 1194, establishing a division of the exchequer to manage Jewish revenues. St. Louis IX was less concerned to profit from his Jews than to make them disappear by conversion, to forbid their use of the Talmud—burning so many copies in the 1240s that few survived, and to compel them to renounce "usury" or "leave my land." Philip IV the Fair ruled almost all of France; consequently, his brutal policies affected some 100,000 Jews. Philip's sole concern was to replenish his treasury: in 1306, his agents simultaneously arrested all the Jews, condemned them to exile for some unspecified crime and to depart within a month, forfeit all their property except for a few pennies and the clothes they were wearing, and transfer to the exchequer all loan records so that he could collect every penny of interest and principle. That was essentially the end of France's 1,000-year-old Jewish community. Out of financial desperation, Jews were recalled in 1315 only to be expelled in 1322, recalled again in 1359, and banished "in perpetuity" in 1394 with the usual staggering cruelty and losses.

In the 13th century, Spain was remarkably hospitable to Jewish life, but in the 14th century the violence that was rife elsewhere spilled over into Spain. Accusations of ritual murder and host desecration multiplied. In the 1340s, massacres stimulated by the Black Plague erupted, and dynastic wars also triggered pogroms in the 1360s. In 1391, following a campaign of the most rabid preaching of "holy war" by Archdeacon Ferrand Martínez, brutal riots exploded that resulted in the bloody sacking of the Jewish quarter of Seville, despite the efforts of civil authorities and some clergy to check it. Massacre and rapine swept across Spain, causing as many as 50,000 deaths and forcing Jews to choose baptism or death or, when possible, flight that took many to North Africa and the Ottoman Empire. Perhaps 200,000, the majority of Spanish Jewry, acceded to baptism. Violence increased their number in subsequent decades, and such "new Christians" or Marranos—the term means "pigs" in Castilian—became subject to the Inquisition. Many Marranos, secretly maintaining contact with professing Jews, were Christian in name only. As Christians, however, Marranos could enter the professions and hold office in church and state, until laws requiring limpieza de sangre (purity of blood)—closely paralleling the 1935 Nazi racial laws—disqualified and removed them. The secret allegiance of Marranos to Judaism aroused such anger that the Spanish Inquisition was founded in 1478 to deal with them, but it emerged that the Inquisition must fail—despite autos-da-fé and forced baptisms, growing impoverishment and degradation—in disciplining the Marranos so long as freely practicing Jews remained. In 1492, Ferdinand and Isabella decreed the conversion or expulsion of all Jews within three months from Spain and their other lands, Sardinia and Sicily, and in 1510 from southern Italy, although with the help of the Inquisition it took until 1541 to finish. A contemporary chronicler recorded how the Jews lost everything: “For Christians took their many estates, very many rich houses and landed properties for a few coins. . . . and a vineyard for a small piece of cloth or linen, because they could not take out either gold or silver” (Perry and Schweitzer 2007, doc. 5). Perhaps 150,000 to 200,000 Jews departed, finding refuge in Poland and the Ottoman Empire after experiencing the tribulations of armed attack and robbery on their journey. The Marranos, by contrast, seeking to escape the Inquisition’s torture chambers, could depart only clandestinely.

Portugal’s Jewish population greatly increased with the Spanish expellees of 1492, possibly 120,000. On some technicality, however, John II enslaved many of them. His successor Emmanuel freed them, issued a decree of expulsion for 1497, but instead ordered the baptism of all children aged 4 to 14. In practice, his agents dragged everyone up to 20 and older to the baptismal font, on the assumption that the parents would follow their children, but many of them smothered their children and killed themselves. Emmanuel blocked their departure and forced a “General Conversion,” as the event is called in Portuguese annals, and only a few managed to leave. On Easter 1506 in Lisbon, these New Christians were attacked by Old Christians; they were instigated by rabid monks and driven by envy, fear, and hatred to engage in ferocious massacres in “spontaneous” riots and pillaging that lasted several days and caused 2,000 deaths and the destruction of property. Portugal followed Spanish precedent in founding its own Inquisition in 1540 to track the New Christians or Marranos. The Spanish and Portuguese Inquisitions, in pursuit of Marranos as Judaizers in Iberia and elsewhere, burning books and burning people as late as the 18th century, wrote one of Jewish history’s bleakest chapters, a fusion of religious fanaticism and royal ruthlessness.

The Reformation brought no relief for Europe’s Jews, for in many ways it simply transmitted medieval Catholic anti-Semitism in a more virulent form. This was particularly true of Martin Luther, whose toxic diatribe On the Jews and their Lies (1543) was exploited by the Nazis. He was instrumental in the expulsion of the Jews from Saxony in 1536, and he urged German rulers to set fire to their synagogues and homes, deprive them of prayer books and the Talmud, bar them from money-lending and commandeer all their money, deny them safe-conduct in traveling, execute or maim their rabbis, and, to emulate the wisdom of France and Spain, expel them forever or, he hoped, lynch them. Outrages long persisted in Europe, if less frequently, such as the expulsions—in the course of artisan revolts—of the Jews of Frankfurt in 1614 and Erfurt in 1615. In 1745, the pious Empress Maria Theresa expelled the Jews from Prague as punishment for “treason” committed by the Jews of Alsace.

The Deluge, a period in Polish history lasting from 1648 to 1667, was a cycle of catastrophes and slaughter that befell Jews and Poles in the revolt of the Cossacks and peasantry of Ukraine led by Bogdan Chmielnicki; they decimated hundreds of Riot instigated by Vincent Fettmilch in the Jewish quarter of Frankfurt, Germany, on August 22, 1614. Fettmilch, a Calvinist, petitioned unsuccessfully for the expulsion of the Jews from his native Frankfurt. In response, he gathered a large mob and invaded the Jewish quarter on August 22, 1614. He was hanged in 1616. (Isadore Singer, ed., The Jewish Encyclopedia, 1901)

Jewish communities in a series of appalling massacres that featured every imaginable atrocity. Jewish losses, counting casualties of war, massacre, plague, famine, forced conversions, and captives sold into slavery, were immense. The Haidamak massacres and rapine, lasting from the 1720s to about 1770, a reprise of Cossack and peasant marauding and barbarities, again caused widespread destruction and desolation and resulted in enormous casualties.

Jews were barred from Russia from its beginnings, and there were virtually none under the czars until the Partitions of Poland (1772, 1793, 1795) created a huge area that was organized as the Pale of Settlement, to which Jews were confined until 1917, as in a great ghetto. Jews were excluded from numerous towns and hamlets in the Pale; a blizzard of edicts handicapped them in earning a living and often expelled them from communities by canceling residence and travel rights. Some privileged Jews settled outside the Pale, notably Moscow, from which they were expelled in 1891: the police came at night, smashed down gates and doors, rounded up the hapless Jews, and herded them away, many in chains. After the assassination of the czar, Alexander II, in 1881 (automatically but wrongly blamed on the Jews), waves of pogroms broke out, many of them ignited by accusations of ritual murder—that of Kishinev in 1903 was especially cruel and destructive—and continued intermittently until 1914, by when over a million Jews had fled Russia. The government openly pursued anti-Semitic policies and propaganda, blaming the Jews for the loss of the Russo-Japanese War in 1904–1905 and the ensuing revolution, expelling the Jews of Kiev in 1910, and indicting Mendel Beilis for ritual murder in a notorious case of 1911. During World War I, the high command evacuated several hundred thousand Jews from the war zones of the Baltic region, Poland, Lithuania, and Ukraine, carrying out expulsions in the most brutal, arbitrary way conceivable, causing enormous loss of life and suffering; these were more like pogroms than evacuations. Ferocious massacres and deportations, together with famine and epidemics, prevailed in the course of the 1917 Russian Revolution and prolonged civil war between the Reds and Whites, and in the war and population displacements that accompanied the rebirth of Poland (1918–1923).

That not all Jews were massacred, forcibly baptized, or expelled over these many centuries stems from the influence of the Catholic theology positing that the Jews were to be preserved—albeit humbled and degraded to prove the truth of Christianity—until the end-time and the great ingathering at Jesus' return. That countervailing force faded in modern times under the impact of secularization, "racial science," fanatical nationalism, and totalitarian ideologies, and thus the Holocaust, the unprecedented attempt to annihilate an entire people, as well as the genocidal policies of Stalinist Russia, became possible.

Selected Bibliography

- Baron, Salo Wittmayer. 1952–1983. A Social and Religious History of the Jews. 18 vols. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Cohn, Norman. 1981. Warrant for Genocide. 3rd ed. Chico, CA: Scholars Press.
- Langmuir, Gavin I. 1990. History, Religion, and Antisemitism. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Perry, Marvin, and Frederick M. Schweitzer, eds. 1994. Jewish-Christian Encounters over the Centuries. New York: Peter Lang.
- Perry, Marvin, and Frederick M. Schweitzer. 2002. Antisemitism: Myth and Hate from the Middle Ages to the Present. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Perry, Marvin, and Frederick M. Schweitzer. 2007. Antisemitic Myths: Historic and Contemporary Texts. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Wistrich, Robert S. 1991. Antisemitism: The Longest Hatred. New York: Pantheon.

Varieties of Anti-Semitism

Ritchie Robertson

---

Anti-Semitism is a durable, but not a unitary phenomenon. The persistence of hostility to Jews as such is as remarkable as the variety of justifications given for it. One should therefore distinguish among varieties of anti-Semitism. These are not mutually exclusive: rather, they are emphases that predominate at different periods in anti-Semitic discourse. They find expression in language, imagery, and ideology, but not always in practice. Although anti-Semitic discourse shows much continuity, it can exist without issuing in violence. Thus, in 18th-century England, anti-Semitic caricature was widespread, yet violence against Jews was rare. This does not exonerate anti-Semitism, but it does show that anti-Semitic discourse can exist in some independence from the violence that at other times it sanctions.

Anti-Semitic discourse originates in the Roman Empire. The Jews perplexed the Romans by their strict monotheism and their peculiar customs, such as observing the Sabbath and refraining from eating pork. Cicero, Tacitus, and others charged them with godlessness, unsociability, and misanthropy. It was widely rumored that they had been expelled from Egypt for having leprosy, and that they worshipped an ass's head in their Temple. Some of these charges, especially the image of Jews as sick, resurface in modern anti-Semitism.

It can be argued, however, that classical hostility to Jews was in principle an ordinary example of hostility to minorities, and that anti-Semitism acquired a special character from the emergence of Christianity. What was initially a movement of apocalyptic renewal within Judaism developed, especially under the guidance of Paul, into a distinct religion that defined itself by contrast with Judaism. Its opponents are bluntly described in the New Testament as "the Jews" (e.g., John 8:14–56 and elsewhere). The Gospel accounts transfer the blame for Jesus' death from the Roman authorities to the Jews by exaggerating the influence of the high priest and crediting the Jewish public with demanding that Jesus should be executed rather than the bandit Barabbas (e.g., John 18:40). Paul worked out a theology in which the new law of Jesus superseded the old law of Moses. From a Christian perspective, therefore, Judaism no longer had any reason to exist, and its survival could be attributed to the obstinate blindness of its adherents.

The place of the Jews in the Christian understanding of history was influentially defined by Saint Augustine (354–430). The dispersion of the Jews after the Roman conquest of Jerusalem in 70 CE was a collective punishment for their killing of Jesus and their blindness to his divinity (City of God XVIII, 46). Thus, by their very existence in exile, the Jews confirm the Scriptures' prophecy of the misery of unbelievers (Augustine cites especially Psalm 69).

Christian anti-Semitism had diverse consequences. On one hand, the Jews were often bitterly denounced. The anti-Jewish sermons of Saint John Chrysostom (347–407) have become notorious. On the other hand, the Jews' function as a living witness to Scriptural truth meant that they must be preserved, not exterminated. Hence many popes and princes tried to protect Jews from popular violence.

In the later Middle Ages, however, Jews were being demonized. From the 1150s onward, the blood libel, which alleged that Jews stole Christian children to drink their blood at Passover, became frequent. Jews were popularly associated with the Devil, heretics, and imaginary witches. This development has been ascribed to the expansion of the medieval state, which sought to classify society and define outsiders as objects of persecution. During the Reformation, these demonic images were combined with classical and theological stereotypes to license the persecution of Jews, who easily provided scapegoats for the schisms within Christianity. Martin Luther (1483–1546) notoriously denounced the Jews (especially in Von Jüden und ihren Lügen [Of Jews and Their Lies], 1543) as haters of Christ, as proponents of a theology of works rather than faith, as sick and infecting others, and as unwilling to work.

Luther's charge of idleness announces the rise of economic anti-Semitism. In the Middle Ages, financial dealings, frowned upon by the Church, were entrusted to Jews (though not exclusively: banks developed, especially in Italy), who thus became indispensable but increasingly unpopular. Being forbidden to practice crafts or agriculture, Jews were blamed for concentrating on unproductive work. Many Gentiles encountered Jews as peddlers, supplying goods to isolated communities, or as middlemen buying and selling farm produce. With the growth of an international capitalist economy, and eventually with multinational banks like that of the Rothschilds, Jews were associated with money and, hence, with calculation and excessive rationality.

Within theological anti-Semitism, the Jews' supposed rationality was explained also from their adherence to an essentially intellectual law that was subjected to analysis in the Talmud. Secularization in the Enlightenment period juxtaposed this image of the overly rational Jew with a contradictory image, based on Jewish religious practice, of the Jew as addicted to irrational superstition and therefore unfit to enter enlightened society. Thus, Voltaire (1694–1778) describes the Jews as “always superstitious, always greedy for others' property, always barbarous, servile in misfortune, and insolent in prosperity” (Voltaire 1963, 151). More sympathetic enlighteners thought Jews could enter civilized society by wholly abandoning what had long become a fossil religion: thus, Immanuel Kant (1724–1804) wrote: “The euthanasia of Judaism is the religion of pure morality” (Kant 1964, 320–321). Hence, once theological barriers had fallen, the complete surrender of Judaism might admit Jews to enlightened European society.

Another barrier, however, was already appearing in the form of modern nationalism. A nation (Volk) was defined by its territory, its physical character, and, above all, its language, which was the source of its creativity and the expression of its collective soul. Johann Gottfried Herder (1744–1803), the ideological founder of modern nationalism, judged the Jews by this standard to be merely a parasite on settled nations. Although Jews benefited in the late 18th and the 19th centuries from emancipatory legislation, they also encountered a backlash that denied that they could really become members of national communities. If nationhood was defined by language, then the Jews, it was alleged, could never really master modern European languages. Either a distinctively “Jewish” intonation was always detectable or else Jews, however perfectly and indeed brilliantly they might write, revealed their difference by the sheer brilliance of their writing and by the overly intellectual irony they introduced. These charges were especially leveled at Heinrich Heine (1797–1856) by conservatives irritated by his politically subversive journalism.

This nationalist anti-Semitism was radicalized by Richard Wagner (1813–1883) in his essay “Das Judentum in der Musik” (“Judaism in Music,” 1850), which exercised immense influence, especially after its republication in 1869. Wagner insists that Jews can speak European languages only as foreigners. Their real language, Hebrew, survives only as a dead, liturgical language. Hence they lack the creativity that comes only from a living language spoken by a national community. Their excessive rationality also debars them from song, the language of the emotions. Synagogue music is merely fossilized, like the Jewish religion. Jews can acquire European culture only superficially, by buying into it, thanks to their commercial success, which is bringing about the Judaization (Verjudung) of Europe. The only solution is for Ahasuerus, the Wandering Jew, to be redeemed by perishing (Untergang).

German composer Richard Wagner revolutionized the genre of opera during the 19th century. However, he is also well known for the vicious anti-Semitism he openly displayed throughout his life. (Library of Congress)

This essay owes its power to combining a vast range of stereotypes. Theologically, Wagner typifies the Jews as the Wandering Jew, condemned to nomadism for denying Christ, but he also maintains that as a fossil people—uncreative and dedicated to international commerce—the Jews cannot fit into a national community. By “perishing” he may mean a complete sacrifice of identity (Kant’s “euthanasia”) rather than physical extermination, yet his description of the Jew’s supposedly immutable character makes it obscure how such a change can take place.

These stereotypes required only the spurious authority of “racial science” for full-scale racial anti-Semitism to be born. In the ideological framework of Nazism and its extermination program, radical versions of nationalist anti-Semitism mix with pseudoscientific racism. Nationalism, rather than science, underlies The Foundations of the Nineteenth Century (1899) by Houston Stewart Chamberlain, which evokes an apocalyptic picture of pure, emotionally profound races (like the Germans) beleaguered by swirling masses of mongrels and groups of shallow, hyper-rational Jews. Strictly racial anti-Semitism may be illustrated from the work of Hans F. K. Günther, the Nazis’ chief racial ideologist and the first professor of Rassenkunde (“racial science”). Günther professes to adhere to physical anthropology, distinguishing races by the then standard correlation of physical features such as height and skull measurements. Into a familiar racial taxonomy he incorporates such stereotypes as the Jews' inability to master a language and the feminine character (contrasting them especially with "masculine" Germans) ascribed to Jews most notoriously in Otto Weininger's eccentric Sex and Character (1903). These claims owe their plausibility to the rhetoric of science.

At the present day, anti-Semitism continues to assume new forms. Although the Holocaust has generated shock, soul-searching, and collective penitence, it has also on occasion produced a lingering resentment against the victims, which has led the German-Israeli controversialist Henryk M. Broder (1986, 125) to declare that "Germany will never forgive the Jews for Auschwitz." Further afield, since the Six-Day War of 1967, The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, a fabrication purporting to reveal an international Jewish conspiracy, began to circulate in Arabic translations. Although the Protocols were originally a fantasy generated by nationalist anti-Semitism, their survival may be attributed not only to ongoing conflicts in the Middle East but also, more generally, to the strains arising from an age of globalization and the consequent search for scapegoats.

Select Bibliography

- Broder, Henryk M. 1986. Der ewige Antisemit. Frankfurt, Germany: Fischer.
- Gilman, Sander L., and Steven R. Katz, eds. 1991. Anti-Semitism in Times of Crisis. New York: New York University Press.
- Kant, Immanuel. 1964. "Der Streit der Fakultäten." In Werke, Vol. 6, edited by Wilhelm Weischedel, 320–321. Frankfurt.
- Oberman, Heiko A. 1984. The Roots of Anti-Semitism in the Age of Renaissance and Reformation. Translated by James I. Porter. Philadelphia: Fortress Press.
- Poliakov, Léon. 1974–1977. History of Anti-Semitism, 4 vols. Translated by Miriam Karlin. New York: Vanguard Books.
- Voltaire. 1963. Essai sur les mœurs, edited by René Pomeau. Paris: Garnier Frères.

Literary Anti-Semitism

Mark H. Gelber

---

Although literary anti-Semitism can be documented as far back in time as pre-Christian, Hellenistic antiquity, the precise terminology—"literary anti-Semitism"—is of fairly recent provenance. Apparently, the term is a neologism dating from about 1979 or 1980. Literary anti-Semitism has been defined as the potential or capacity of a text to encourage or positively evaluate anti-Semitic attitudes or behaviors in accordance, generally, with the delineation of such attitudes and behaviors by social scientists and historians. An understanding of literary anti-Semitism proceeds from literature itself, that is, from analyses of how anti-Semitic attitudes manifest themselves in literature and how anti-Semitically charged elements function and interact in texts. Literary anti-Semitism, like anti-Semitism itself, cannot be measured exactly, although it might be said that literary works have an anti-Semitic potential. In any case, literary anti-Semitism is a relative concept because literary works that fall in this category can merely be more or less anti-Semitic than others. To the degree that texts provide more flagrant examples, on one hand, or less obviously objectionable ones, on the other, they can be assessed in general in terms of the degree of literary anti-Semitism they manifest. The purpose of an analysis in this regard is not to rank literary works according to their literary anti-Semitism. Rather, analyses that incorporate a concern for literary anti-Semitism serve to sensitize readers to the dehumanizing aspects of individual works. Texts that contain negative images of Jews together with other relativizing features—possibly positive images of other Jewish characters or formulations that tend to argue for individualization and against stereotyping—counterbalance possible literary anti-Semitism, but do not necessarily succeed in neutralizing it totally. The reason for this is the possible reading of a fictional negative Jewish type and related material as indicative of the true Jew, while a positively drawn Jewish figure and related material may be read as an exception to the rule.

It appears that literary anti-Semitism is as old as anti-Semitism itself. Some scholars have speculated that Manetho, an Alexandrian author who wrote in Greek under the patronage of the Ptolemaic court in the third century BCE, was the first writer to produce a text that may be classified as an example of literary anti-Semitism. However, only a few fragments of the work in question, a history of Egypt entitled Aegyptiaca, have been preserved. As the possible initiator of the anti-Semitic trend in the ancient Hellenistic literature of the Diaspora, Manetho attributed opprobrious origins to the Jewish people, designating Jews as outcasts, lepers, and idolators. And, in his account of the exodus from Egypt, he identified the Jews with the Hyksos, an ignoble, cruel, and barbaric people who had invaded Egypt and ruthlessly dominated the country for an extended period of time. Similarly, in another passage, he calumniated the Jews as lepers and polluted persons, who ravaged Egypt and desecrated its sacred temples.

It is likely that these negative attributes, which were common deprecations in antiquity, were applied in this particular case to the Jewish people, although they were used regularly in vitriolic writings against other human objects of scorn in ancient Egyptian culture. The negative association of the Jews with the lowliest elements of Egyptian society—lepers—and the delineation of their ignoble origins, perfidy, and perniciousness, established a literary precedent only by the novel substitution of the Jewish people for other, older objects of animosity. This pattern continued through the Hellenistic and into the Roman period throughout the Diaspora. Additional examples might include Mnaseas' (ca. 200 BCE) reference to the alleged ass worship of the Jews, a motif Apion, Democritus, and Tacitus also used (first century CE). Apollonius Molon (first century BCE) related the tale of a Greek who was kidnapped, conveyed to the Jewish Temple, and fattened in order to be slaughtered in a yearly Jewish ritual that included cannibalistic rites and oaths of hostility against the Greeks. These examples of pre-Christian, pagan literary anti-Semitism may be categorized according to type, as they manifest different varieties of literary anti-Semitism. Manetho's attempt to discredit the origins of the Jewish people is aimed at their national identity, whereas libelous tales of ass worship or the Jewish ritual sacrifice of foreigners fall within the realm of religious (pagan) anti-Semitism. On one hand, Alexandrian literary anti-Semitism is no doubt related to the special legal status accorded Jews in this Hellenistic city, which provided them with some economic and statutory privileges. On the other hand, religious tensions were probably generated because Jews did not participate in many of the communal (civic) religious activities of the city, whereas some Jewish religious rituals, especially Sabbath observance and the maintenance of strict dietary laws, confirmed an impression of Jewish exclusiveness.

The frequency and the intensity of literary anti-Semitism appear to change drastically with the rise of Christianity in ancient times. It may be said that Christianity canonized literary anti-Semitism. Although Christianity was born of, or derived from, Judaism, it needed to distance itself early on from the mother religion in order to establish itself as a religion in its own right and as a distinct alternative to Judaism. Criticism and attacks against Jews and Judaism became commonplace in Christian literary culture and an important component of the Christian literary canon, beginning with the synoptic Gospels. Often, the Jewish background and milieu of the events at the crucible of the birth of Christianity were blurred or erased in the literary depictions, and Jews were characterized and condemned as nefarious haters of humanity or as pedantic, malicious legalists. Whereas pre-Christian, pagan anti-Semitism originated from a more or less conscious vexation with the legal privileges, exclusiveness, and distinctive religious behavior of the Jews in the Diaspora, Christian anti-Semitism thrived on the fanciful invention of the Jews' collective responsibility for the death of Jesus. In the book of Matthew, the Roman prelate, Pontius Pilate, is exonerated of guilt regarding his role in the crucifixion, whereas the Jews are seen to take on collectively the responsibility for it: "Let his blood be on us, and on our children" (Matthew 27: 22–26). Whether or not this expression was meant originally to be understood literally, or as an assumption of responsibility for all time, and there is good reason to believe it was not intended in these ways, over time and very often it certainly was understood as proof of Jewish guilt. Many Christians held the Jews to be eternally accountable for the crucifixion of the Christian Messiah. They were vilified as the scornful, eternal enemies of Jesus and of all true Christians. As Christian polemics and theology developed, it often appeared that the very validity of Christianity was predicated on the antiquated, no longer pertinent message of Judaism. With the ascendancy of a Christianity bitterly opposed to Jews and Judaism, many examples of literary anti-Semitism became an intrinsic part of the literature of the Christian, Mediterranean-European world and continued to be so even as Western literature gradually emancipated itself from the service of established Christian religion. As Christianity spread throughout Europe and the world, eventually becoming the largest single religious expression (in all of its denominations and variations), literary anti-Semitism became embedded in Christian culture throughout the world.

The events in the life of Jesus immediately before the crucifixion, as depicted in the Gospels, were transformed and incorporated into Christian ritual and eventually found their way into the mystery plays and Passion plays that became popular community events in Christian Europe. To the extent that these plays promoted negative or hateful images of Jews, they served to continue and develop the Christian tradition of literary anti-Semitism, which was already firmly anchored in religious literature and life. In turn, these religious-ritualistic plays had an impact of their own on the school dramas, which taught religious lessons, and Shrovetide plays (Fastnachtspiele), out of which more modern forms of drama gradually evolved. These different dramatic presentations were often vehicles of anti-Semitic prejudice, as they tended to emphasize the collective Jewish guilt in the death of Jesus, denigrated the Jews or the stock Jewish character who emerged as a stage type, and sometimes directly advocated anti-Semitic behaviors or adoption of anti-Semitic opinions.

Despite the eventual emergence of individualized characters in Western drama, Jewish stage characters—which had been traditionally used almost exclusively as reminders of Jewish evilness, actualized concretely in dishonest usury, suspected host desecrations, or alleged murder of innocent Christian children for Jewish ritual purposes—were less successful in breaking out of their customary roles as arch-villains, collaborators with the Devil, embodiments of the Antichrist, or the unsuspecting butts of well-deserved Christian ire or mischievous humor. Positive Jewish characters on stage or in poetical and literary works before the 17th century are virtually unthinkable, given the theological purpose of Christian anti-Semitism and the more violent, oppressive, and brutally predictable course of Christian anti-Semitism in the aftermath of the Crusades. The word “Jew” itself became early on a term of malediction in the European languages. Thus, a mere reference to a Jew or identification of a literary character as a Jew was no neutral designation of a religious preference or national identity, but rather it contained an opprobrious sense, a reprobation, for centuries; in fact, this holds in many places through the present time.

Although no history of literary anti-Semitism of the Diaspora or of specific national literary traditions has been written, the literary history of specific national literatures indicates that core texts in the canon of several Western literatures are primary examples of literary anti-Semitism. Thus, it can be demonstrated that literary anti-Semitism is endemic to Western literary culture. In English literature, for example, works by Geoffrey Chaucer, Christopher Marlowe, William Shakespeare, Charles Dickens, T. S. Eliot, Graham Greene, and others have been regularly cited as examples of literary anti-Semitism. There has been a tendency to relativize the literary anti-Semitism of texts written by canonical authors by suggesting a sharp distinction between the author and the text. In other words, it has been claimed that it is not logical for an author who cannot be labeled fairly as an anti-Semite, given a wide range of evidence in this regard, to have produced a work that nevertheless might be considered an example of literary anti-Semitism. Nevertheless, the standard methodology associated with the study of literary anti-Semitism tends to distinguish between the anti-Semitic author and the anti-Semitic text. In other words, a writer who can be labeled as an anti-Semite need not write a work that can be considered literary anti-Semitism, whereas a writer who cannot be labeled fairly as an anti-Semite might nevertheless produce a text that is an example of literary anti-Semitism.

A question has been raised concerning the possibility of locating literary anti-Semitism in works written by Jewish authors. On one hand, this question has been linked to the issue of Jewish self-hatred, and on the other hand, to the issue of the possibilities and parameters of legitimate Jewish self-criticism, that is, Jewish satire of Jewish behavior. However, concern for literary anti-Semitism focuses on literary texts and therefore the issue of the author is for all intents and purposes neutral to the question of whether or not a specific literary work may be an example of literary anti-Semitism. Literary satire of Jewish behavior may constitute an example of literary anti-Semitism, if no or insufficient counterbalancing features are perceived clearly by the readerships.

In the face of the Shoah, the tragic genocidal attempt to eliminate European and world Jewry, which succeeded in killing millions of innocent Jews, a question has been raised about whether or not literary anti-Semitism in the post-Shoah world, especially in the lands of the perpetrators in Central and Eastern Europe (but elsewhere as well), is especially heinous and reprehensible. The Shoah made perfectly clear, by way of actualization, that the distance between literary anti-Semitism and other varieties of anti-Semitism is not that great, given political power and a willingness to commit crimes against humanity or, in this case, against Jewry. It has been suggested that literary anti-Semitism—Christian and non-Christian—may have contributed to make the Shoah possible. Instances of literary anti-Semitism in German or Austrian literature in post-Shoah European literary culture, or in the Eastern European literatures, have appeared to constitute a special category in light of the past. Some observers have viewed these more recent examples as especially egregious and immoral. In a more general sense, the idea of the continuity of literary anti-Semitism is brought into focus in an interesting way, because certain periods of time in history and certain geographical spaces produced their own particular varieties of literary anti-Semitism. Some periods of time have proven to be very ripe for the expression of literary anti-Semitism. Also, the question should be raised concerning whether or not literature that is anti-Zionist or anti-Israel must of necessity also be anti-Semitic. There appears to be general agreement that this is not necessarily the case, but that the borderline between these expressions and literary anti-Semitism needs to be demarcated carefully in texts that fall into these categories. Recent studies have shown that persons who express strong anti-Israel political opinions are several times (roughly six times) more likely to harbor anti-Semitic opinions than those who do not have these same political opinions. Thus, it is quite probable that a connection or ties between anti-Zionist/anti-Israeli literature and literary anti-Semitism exist, or that some other relationship between these categories can be established.

Selected Bibliography

- Gelber, Mark H. 1985. "What Is Literary Anti-Semitism?" Jewish Social Studies 47 (1): 1–20.
- Katz, Steven T., and Sander Gilman, eds. 1991. Antisemitism in Times of Crisis. New York: New York University Press.
- Perry, Marvin, and Frederick M. Schweitzer, eds. 2002. Anti-Semitism: Myth and Hate from Antiquity to the Present. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.

Western Democracies and the Holocaust

William D. Rubinstein

---

The historiography of the rescue of Jews from the Nazis by the democracies has gone through several phases. Initially, relief at the defeat of Nazi Germany and its allies was so universal among Jews and others that few, and certainly few Jewish survivors, seriously questioned Allied policy. Beginning in the 1960s, in such works as Arthur Morse, While Six Million Died: A Chronicle of American Apathy (New York, 1968), David S. Wyman, Paper Walls: America and the Refugee Crisis, 1938–1941 (Boston, 1968) and The Abandonment of the Jews: America and the Holocaust, 1941–1945 (New York, 1984), and Bernard Wasserstein, Britain and the Jews of Europe (Oxford, 1979), a backlash set in that has led to severe criticism of the attitude and actions of the United States, Britain, and other Western democracies. In particular, the works of David S. Wyman have been especially influential. According to this critique, elite and public opinion in the West was almost invariably hostile to the admission of significant numbers of Jewish refugees to the democracies or to Palestine, while the immigration bureaucracies of the democracies erected significant “paper walls” to even permissible migration. In addition, mass unemployment during the Depression produced widespread hostility to any significant migration. During World War II, even less was done. The Bermuda Conference of 1943, convened to assist Jewish refugees, was an abject failure. Auschwitz was not bombed, and Jewish migration to Palestine was severely curtailed. Policy makers in America, Britain, and other democracies were often demonstrably anti-Semitic and anti-Zionist, if also anti-Nazi.

More recently, in the manner of most historical debates, a reaction to this negative viewpoint has also been voiced and will be summarized here. This revisionist view makes two main points: contrary to the negative view, the record of the democracies in allowing German Jewish refugees to migrate was extremely generous, especially after Kristallnacht in 1938. By 1940–1941, when the emigration of Jews to the West became impossible, nearly three quarters of German Jews had emigrated. After the war began, however, the emigration of Jews became impossible because the Nazis (not the democracies) forbade the emigration of Jews, obviously as a prelude to genocide. The Jews of Nazi-occupied Europe were no longer refugees, as they had been during the 1930s, but the exact opposite, prisoners—prisoners of Hitler and the Nazi death machine. As such, they could not escape from Nazi-occupied Europe. Moreover, the fate of Europe’s Jews was never in the hands of Franklin Roosevelt, Winston Churchill, or the democracies, but of Adolf Hitler and the SS. The Western allies pursued the goal of the total destruction of Nazi Germany with relentless efficiency.

Although the democracies never allowed the unlimited immigration of German Jews, and no country took in more than a share of those seeking to enter, together they offered refuge and a new life to the majority of German and Austrian Jews. Immigration to the United States was determined by national quotas, set by Congress in 1924 and reduced in 1931. Throughout most of the 1930s, the immigration quota for Germany (of Jews and non-Jews) was set at about 26,000 per year, a figure that rose to about 29,000 a year after the Anschluss with Austria. It is impossible to know how many German and Reich Jews actually came to the United States, but 161,051 Jews from all countries migrated to the United States between mid-1933 and mid-1942. This number was 36 percent of all migrants to the United States in this period. Probably well over 100,000 German and Austrian Jews migrated to the United States, out of a total Jewish population of 500,000 in Germany and 185,000 in Austria. There is, moreover, no real evidence that substantial numbers of Reich Jews actually wished to emigrate from Germany until the Anschluss early in 1938 and Kristallnacht later that year. Britain did not have an immigration quota system like America's. Permission to migrate to the country was purely at the discretion of the Home Office (the Justice and Immigration Ministry) and was very difficult; in general, persons outside the British Empire had little chance of success. However, the British government provided an increasing and striking exception to this rule in favor of German Jewish refugees. British public opinion was genuinely moved by their plight, and the Anglo-Jewish community agreed to pay for all Jewish migrants. It is believed that about 75,000 German Jews and "non-Aryan Christians" migrated to Britain, chiefly in 1938–1939. Substantial immigration also took place to other parts of the British Empire. Despite the barriers to unrestricted Jewish immigration to Palestine (a British mandate after 1917–1919), about 63,000 Reich Jews migrated there. Other parts of the Empire (e.g., Canada, Australia) took in about 40,000–45,000. Other German Jews went to Latin America and other parts of

Prayer books and rubble lie scattered on the floor of the choir loft in Zerenerstrasse Synagogue, which the Nazis destroyed during Kristallnacht on November 9, 1938. Kristallnacht represented the first night of organized and concentrated German Nazi terrorism against Jews and Jewish establishments. (United States Holocaust Memorial Museum)

Europe. By September 1939, only 164,000 Jews remained in Germany in its pre-1933 boundaries. Had the outbreak of the war been postponed for another year or two, it is likely that virtually all Jews would have left. About 83 percent of German Jewish children and youth had emigrated from Germany by late 1939. About 68 percent of Austrian Jewry managed to emigrate in 18 months, including an estimated 90 percent of the Austrian middle class.

A number of important points should be made about these statistics. First, no one knew what the fate of the Jews left behind in Nazi Germany was to be: the mass murders did not begin until the invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941, and previous Nazi policy was to brutalize and expel the Jews, not kill them. Second, no other group of refugees of the 1930s received such relatively generous treatment, a product of universal horror in the West at Hitler's demented brutality. Third, 95 percent of Jews murdered in the Holocaust did not live in Germany or the Reich, but in other parts of Europe, especially Poland, the western Soviet Union, and Hungary. These Jews were not subject to Nazi rule before Germany conquered or became hegemonic in these countries after the war began in September 1939. They were not refugees and, unlike the Jews of the Reich, were not compelled to flee. In addition, the Jews of the Soviet Union (numbering about 3 million in 1939 and more than 5 million in mid-1941 after the Soviet annexation of eastern Poland and other areas) could not emigrate under any circumstances: any Jew who expressed the desire to leave Stalin's realms might well have been shot.

The outbreak of World War II fundamentally altered this situation. Instead of being compelled to emigrate from Nazi Germany, the Jews of Germany and other parts of Europe were forbidden to leave any part of Nazi-occupied Europe. Jews were officially forbidden to emigrate from the Polish Government-General (central Poland, including Warsaw) in October 1940. In mid-1941 Jews were forbidden to emigrate from any part of Nazi-occupied Europe.

This order coincided with the start of the actual genocide of the Jews. From that point, Europe's Jews became prisoners awaiting execution. They could not be reached by the Allies, who were at war with Germany, and were in the process of being slaughtered by the Nazi death machine.

Although plans for rescuing Jews were continuously produced by Jewish and pro-refugee groups in America and Britain throughout the war, what they all have in common was their complete inability to rescue anyone. The reason for this was precisely that the Jews were no longer refugees—which these groups failed to understand—but were prisoners of Hitler, whose life's mission was to kill all of them. A perusal of these plans—which are reproduced in the The Myth of Rescue (Rubinstein 1997)—shows their utter futility. The British might have been more generous in allowing Europe's Jews to immigrate to Palestine, but, once again, the central problem was that no Jews could emigrate. Although some Jews who managed to flee were indeed prevented from entering Palestine (usually being interned for the duration of the war in Mauritius), no Jew who escaped from Nazi-occupied Europe was ever sent back by the Western allies. Few historians take seriously such proposals as the "blood-for-trucks" scheme allegedly proposed by Heinrich Himmler to the leaders of Hungarian Jewry in 1944. They continued to be deported to Auschwitz while the scheme was being considered. There is no evidence that Hitler (as opposed to Himmler) knew or approved of the proposal; he would certainly have forbidden it.

Probably the central proposal for rescue not acted upon but well-known today is the bombing of Auschwitz. The main points that should be made here are these. First, no one, anywhere, proposed bombing Auschwitz (or any other concentration camp) before May 1944, when Rabbi Michael Dov Weissmandel, who had jumped from a train on the way to Auschwitz and made his way to Switzerland, first proposed it. Bombing Auschwitz—or any other concentration camp—is not mentioned in any plan for rescue made before this. Second, when the proposal was first made, it was received dubiously by Jewish and pro-refugee groups. It was opposed, for example, by the Executive of the Jewish Agency in Palestine, the Yishuv's government, headed by David Ben-Gurion, on the grounds that Jews would certainly be killed. It was initially opposed by the U.S. War Refugee Board, established in January 1944 and responsible for rescuing Jews, for the same reason; its head, John Pehle, only changed his mind in October 1944 after deportations to Auschwitz had ceased. Logistically, it would have been very difficult to have bombed the gas chamber at Auschwitz (the size of a tennis court) with the aviation and bombing technology that existed in 1944, and prisoners would indeed almost certainly have been killed, probably without stopping the killing process. Proposals to bomb Auschwitz tragically coincided with the preparations for D-Day (June 6, 1944), the Normandy landing, and the liberation of France. It is difficult to imagine the senior leaders of the West agreeing to divert military resources needed for the invasion of Nazi-occupied Europe, or Jewish leaders asking for this diversion. Probably the bombing of Auschwitz should have been tried, but it might well have proven to be a fiasco. Liberation for the 3.5 million Jews of Europe who managed to survive the war came on May 8, 1945, when Nazi Germany was wiped off the earth by the armed forces of the Allied powers.

Selected Bibliography

- Rosen, Robert N. 2006. Saving the Jews: Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Holocaust. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press.
- Rubinstein, William D. 1997. The Myth of Rescue: Why the Democracies Could Not Have Saved More Jews from the Nazis. London: Routledge.
- Shatzkes, Pamela. 2002. Holocaust and Rescue: Impotence or Indifference? Anglo-Jewry 1938–1945. Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave.

Euro-Arab Anti-Semitism

Bat Ye'or

---

Euro-Arab anti-Semitism is closely linked to the strategic, political, and economic constraints of Europe's Arab/Muslim policies; to the changed demographic pattern of Europe due to Muslim immigration; and to the threat of terrorism. Current European Judeophobia intertwines with the European political and cultural Mediterranean/Arab strategy that encompasses all member states of the European Union (EU). The European Commission and the European Common Foreign and Security Policy (ECFSP) coordinate this policy through an elaborate network.

Such a strategy involves comprehensive planning, conceived in the 1960s by the French president, General Charles de Gaulle. In the European Community (EC), he championed a strategic Euro-Arab alliance as a rival pole to America and an instrument for French interests in former Arab colonies (Gaullist Arab policy). French diplomats developed contacts with their Arab counterparts, notably with Haj Amin al-Husseini, former mufti of Jerusalem, whom de Gaulle had saved from the Nuremberg trials in 1945, and with Libyan diplomats. The outbreak of international Palestinian terrorism in Europe, followed by the Yom Kippur War (October 1973) and the Arab oil embargo, allowed France to introduce a common European oil policy and to carry along the EC in the Euro-Arab pact.

In the 1970s, the EC and the Arab League associated with different but converging aims. The EC adopted a pro-Arafat stance and sponsored Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) policy, hoping thereby to protect itself from Arab terrorism, to maintain its energy supplies, and to promote its economic interests. On their side, the PLO and the countries of the Arab League welcomed the Gaullist plan as a means to separate Europe from America, destroy Israel, and achieve technological parity with Europe.

This informal alliance created a framework called the Euro-Arab Dialogue (EAD) between the EC bodies and member states, on the one hand, and the Arab League, the Arab Mediterranean countries, and the PLO, on the other. EAD encompasses the whole Euro-Arab relationship in strategy, business, social and human affairs, immigration, culture, and media. The European Commission promoted associations and common projects between the two parties. It created numerous legal, financial, and economic instruments intended to disseminate and establish the Euro-Arab common strategy (Eurabia) as a domestic and foreign policy binding the member states of the EC through an expanding network of activities and organizations. Canada and other European non-EU countries, as well as bodies like the International Committee of the Red Cross, participated as observers or active delegations in the EAD meetings. Numerous Euro-Arab conferences and EC/EU documents provide information on EAD's unfolding. EAD focused on solidarity with the Palestinians; it triggered European public sympathy for the PLO, while demonizing Israel. Traditional European anti-Semitism and anti-Americanism furthered Arab propaganda.

The European Parliamentary Association for Euro-Arab Cooperation (PAEAC) represents the main instrument of EAD anti-Israeli policy. Its members are parliamentarians from each major European political party. Created in 1974 in Paris and supported by the European Commission, PAEAC fulfils Resolution 15 of the Second International Conference in Support of the Arab People held in Cairo (January 1969). In June 1974, its Arab counterpoint, the Arab Interparliamentary Union (AIPU), was created.

Euro-Arab policy worked for rapprochement and solidarity between the EC and the Arab world at all political and cultural levels, regionally and internationally. It involved the ECFSP, the universities, and the media and aimed to create a strategic Euro-Arab pole. Europe's anti-Israeli strategy results from its planned long-term vision to create a joint society with the Arab Mediterranean countries and the PLO.

After the 1995 Barcelona Declaration, the Mediterranean Partnership enlarged the EAD framework and included Israel, in view of implementing the Oslo agreements. The partnership determines EU strategy toward the United States, Israel, and the Arab states, as well as the domestic policies of EU member states in relation to Muslim immigration to the EU.

The Mediterranean Partnership intends to set up a vast Euro-Arab demographic, political, economic, and cultural zone. Using multiculturalism and immigration, the EAD network introduced Islam and Arab culture as a political force to the European continent. Through the combined effects of demographic and terrorist pressures from within and without, and with oil dependency, Euro-Arab anti-Zionism hardened.

Euro-Arab Judeophobia avoids targeting European Jewry, reduced by the Shoah to demographic and political marginality. Although it professes antiracism, it demonizes the State of Israel, which is accused of being "the root cause" of Islamic terrorism. As a European militant ideal for peace and justice in the Middle East, EU Mediterranean policy promotes Palestinian victimology and Israel's malevolence. The cynical and secretive character of this Judeophobia results from the opacity and impunity of EU collegiality.

The European Council adopted The European Common Strategy in the Mediterranean Region on June 19, 2000. This document charges the European Council, the European Commission, and the EU member states to ensure the consistency, unity, and effectiveness of the common strategy, with special attention to the media and universities. Cultural and media collaboration and solidarity with the Mediterranean (Arab) world are prescribed even more urgently—as a matter of European security—in the report of the European Commission for Culture, Science and Education presented to the European Parliamentary Assembly by Luis Maria de Puig from the Spanish socialist group (November 2002). Euro-Arab anti-Semitism reached a peak with the second intifada (Autumn 2000) and the coalition war against Saddam Hussein (2003) when the EU increased the effectiveness and visibility of its Mediterranean policy at the request of the European Council.

Multiculturalism is a crucial dimension of the Euro-Arab strategic alliance. It fuels the cultural and media jihad waged in Western academia with a Judeophobic, anti-American, and anti-Western character. Euro-Arab anti-Semitism promotes a political, historical, cultural, and theological Palestinian replacement doctrine, whose main themes claim the nonexistence of Judeo-Christian values, the Islamization of Christian theology through the Muslim Jesus, the return to a Christian replacement theology whereby Palestine replaces Israel, the transfer of Jewish history to the Palestinians, the crucifixion of Palestine by an Israel born in blood and sin, and the Nazification of Israel. These themes, taught by the Sabeel Ecumenical Liberation Theology Center in Jerusalem, by European clergy and specialists in interfaith dialogues, are promoted throughout Europe by the EAD network as well as by European and Palestinian nongovernmental organizations funded by the EU. Euro-Arab anti-Semitism belongs to a common Mediterranean strategy that pursues Israel's demise by inciting its constant and universal vilification. Its themes correlate with traditional European Judeophobia but within the militancy and ideology of Islamic jihad against Israel and the West. This context places Israel at the core of a crucial 21st-century conflict.

Select Bibliography

- Al-Mani, Saleh A. 1983. "The New Anti-Semitism." The Euro-Arab Dialogue: A Study in Associative Diplomacy, edited by Salah Al-Shaikhly. London: Frances Pinter.
- Bat Ye'or. 2005. Eurabia: The Euro-Arab Axis. Cranbury, NJ: Associated University Presses.
- Bourrinet, Jacques, ed. 1979. Le Dialogue Euro-Arabe [The Euro-Arab Dialogue]. Paris: Economica.
- Hopwood, Derek, ed. 1983. Euro-Arab Dialogue. The Relations between the Two Cultures. Acts of the Hamburg Symposium, April 11th to 15th, 1983. English version. London: Croom Helm.
- Völker, Edmond, ed. 1976. Euro-Arab Cooperation. Europa Instituut, University of Amsterdam. Leyden: A.W. Sijthoff.

The New Anti-Semitism

Danny Ben-Moshe

---

The new Anti-Semitism is a term that came into use to describe attacks on Jews across the world that erupted in the aftermath of the outbreak of Israeli-Palestinian fighting in September 2000 after the collapse of the Camp David peace talks. The conflict unleashed a wave of suicide bombings in Israel and led to Israel reoccupying Palestinian areas. This fighting triggered an outburst of anti-Semitism not seen since the end of the World War II. Nearly 100 synagogues were attacked across the world in the four weeks from the end of September to October 2000; more were burnt down at any time since Kristallnacht, when Nazis attacked Jewish institutions in Germany in 1938.

The 2002–2003 Anti-Semitism Worldwide Report published by Tel Aviv University identified three waves of anti-Semitism: the first was in October 2000, after the outbreak of the Intifada; the second was triggered by the World Anti-Racism Conference in Durban, where anti-Semitism appeared to get United Nations (UN) sanction, and overt hostility to Israel received international media coverage and intensified as a result of 9/11; and the third related to Operation Defensive Shield, the Israeli military operation against armed Palestinian groups in Jenin in March 2002. Since then, a fourth wave can be identified, related to the U.S. invasion of Iraq in 2003. Different triggers start new waves of anti-Semitism, but the main and fifth one is the anti-Semitism that has erupted since Israel's attack on Lebanon in July 2006.

The new anti-Semitism has been described as “Judeophobia.” This term, coined in the book A New Anti-Semitism? Debating Judeophobia in 21st-Century Britain, refers to anti-Semitism in the United Kingdom, but it can also be applied more broadly. According to the authors, Barry Kosmin and Paul Ignaski (Ha'aretz, June 3, 2003), Judeophobia is,

... a fear of, and hostility toward Jews as a collectivity, rather than the propagation of racial ideologies of the old anti-Semitism. . . . It is a mindset characterized by an obsession with, and vilification of, the State of Israel, and Jews in general, in the case of Britain, as a consequence of their strong sense of attachment to Israel. Today's Judeophobia is an assault on the essence of the Jewish collectivity, both in terms of a Jewish sovereign state in its ancient homeland, and the nature of robust, emancipated, and self-aware Diaspora communities.

Whereas the old anti-Semitism involved attacking Jews for a range of reasons, including raw prejudice and hatred, the new anti-Semitism pertains to attacking Jews because of the perpetrators' opposition to Israel. For the new anti-Semites, anyone who supports Israel is a legitimate target for hatred and vilification.

Kosmin and Ignaski further explain (p. 285) :

The core characteristic of elite Judeophobia involves a campaign of vilification against Israel as a state: evident in an obsessive focus on Israel's culpability for human rights and civil rights abuses in its conflict with the Palestinians. Israel is singled out for opprobrium whilst gross violations of human and civil rights elsewhere—such as Chechnya, Algeria, Sudan, Tibet and Burma, to name just a few—go relatively unnoticed as they are not subject to the same scrutiny. Furthermore, in a particularly spiteful element of the campaign of vilification, Israel is equated to Nazi Germany.

Since the 1974 UN resolution that equated Zionism with racism, delegitimization of Israel has become central to the new wave of anti-Semitism. What is clearly distinct about the current wave of anti-Semitism is that, whereas the old was aimed at individual Jews in the Diaspora, the new is aimed at the collective Jewish state, albeit by using classical anti-Semitic characteristics, which in turn manifests in attacks on the Diaspora. This is indeed one of the unique characteristics of the new anti-Semitism, for while the Diasporas of other countries are not vilified as a result of conflicts in the homeland, such as Hindus in relation to Kashmir, or Buddhists for attacks on Muslims in Thailand, Jews are vilified because of the situation in Israel.

The new anti-Semitism applies against Israel the characteristics traditionally identified with Jews, such as power, greed, and evil. Classical anti-Semitic images customarily directed at Diaspora communities have now, as part of the new anti-Semitism, come to be directed at Israel. Invoking the blood libel, The Independent newspaper in the United Kingdom published in 2003 an editorial cartoon of Ariel Sharon biting the flesh of a Palestinian baby, with Sharon saying, “What's wrong? Have you never seen a politician kissing a baby?” In 2002, the Italian daily La Stampa resorted to traditional Christian anti-Semitism with its cartoon of a baby Jesus surrounded by Israeli tanks saying, “Don't tell me they want to kill me again.”

Jewish leaders at the opening of the executive council of the World Jewish Congress in Paris on November 12, 2006. Anti-Semitism in Europe and the threat posed to Israel by Iran were the main items on the agenda. In the foreground is a poster of a caricature showing former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon published January 27, 2003, in the British daily paper The Independent. (Jack Gueza/AFP/Getty Images)

Distinguishing New Anti-Semitism from Criticism of Israeli Policy

The key issue in the debate about the new anti-Semitism is to identify at what point criticism of Israel moves from being legitimate to anti-Semitic. Natan Sharansky, a former cabinet member of the Israeli government with responsibility for the government's response to anti-Semitism and currently a distinguished fellow at the Shalem Center, the Jerusalem research institute, offers the following three criteria to test the distinction between the new anti-Semitism and legitimate criticism of Israeli policy:

Demonization: This is clear when classically anti-Semitic images portraying Jews as evil are used against Israel, such as the depiction of Sharon as Hitler or refugee camps as Auschwitz. Dehumanizing Israelis is not legitimate criticism.

Double standards: Sharansky says that while it is not acceptable to have double standards against Jews today, it is possible to have them against the Jewish state, such as the UN High Commission for Refugees, which dedicates 35 percent of its annual condemnations against Israel—more than those against the human rights violations of all the world's dictators put together.

Denial of legitimacy: Sharansky identifies this in European intellectual circles “where Israel is presented as the last anachronism of the time of colonialism.” Denial of legitimacy is seen when calls from mosques say death to the Jews, and a columnist in the London Observer says he does not read letters from Jews; and denial of legitimacy is seen in collective punishment, where all Israelis, be they academics or artists, are boycotted and Jews alone are denied the right to exist as a nation.

The European Monitoring Centre on Racism and Xenophobia has offered some criteria to distinguish criticism of Israel from anti-Semitism. They have argued (p. 13), “anti-Israeli or anti-Zionist attitudes and expressions are anti-Semitic in those cases where Israel is seen as being a representative of ‘the Jew’, i.e., as a representative of the traits attributed to the anti-Semitic construction of ‘the Jew’.” By contrast, if Jews are offended or criticized for Israel’s policies or as representatives of Israel based on the above definition, “we would have to qualify hostility towards Jews as ‘Israelis’ only then as anti-Semitic, if it is based on an underlying perception of Israel as ‘the Jew’. If this is not the case, then we would have to consider hostility towards Jews as ‘Israelis’ as not anti-Semitic, because this hostility is not based on the anti-Semitic stereotyping of Jews.”

The Agitators

Traditionally, anti-Semitism has been advanced by the far right, but the difference with the new anti-Semitism is found in the fact that it is being driven by far left and Arab and Islamic groups and individuals. If anti-Semitism has gone through Christian, Nazi, and communist phases it is now in an Islamic phase, as Islamic movements transform the Arab-Israeli conflict from a political to a religious one. The anti-Semitism, which has been imported from Christian Europe to the Middle East, is now being exported back to Europe through Arab and Muslim émigré communities. Although the stereotypes are old, the technology is new: satellite TV beaming the best of Arab anti-Semitism straight into the homes of Muslims in London, Paris, Rome, and Sydney.

The European Union Monitoring Commission on Racism and Xenophobia contracted Berlin’s Technical University to report on the new anti-Semitism, and the report stated that “anti-Semitic incidents were committed above all either by right-wing extremists or young radical Muslims, mostly of Arab descent, who are often themselves potential victims of exclusion and racism” and it added that anti-Semitic statements often come from pro-Palestinian groups. The report also noted that the Arab media calls for attacks not just against Israel, but also against Jews around the world. The Berlin report was controversially not published, some say because the government did not want to offend Europe’s 15 million Muslims, an increasingly important voting block.

New anti-Semitism is widely invoked on the political left. In one of the more blatant examples of the new anti-Semitism, Britain’s New Statesman magazine, on January 14, 2002, had a cover story on the Zionist lobby illustrated on the front page with a large Star of David piercing a much smaller Union Jack, an appropriately anti-Semitic image for an article that described the scheming and wealth of the Jews. Although the article about the Jewish lobby ultimately noted that it was relatively ineffective its imagery was based on and reinforced classical anti-Semitic stereotypes.

The new anti-Semitism involves relativism, a dimension of Holocaust denial traditionally associated with the far right and Arab and Islamic groups, which has now filtered through to the left. Relativism makes the Holocaust relative to other suffering. Thus, not only has the Holocaust not been a barrier to the new anti-Semitism, but it is actively challenged as part of the new anti-Semitism. As the unpublished Berlin University report stated:

Israeli policies toward the Palestinians provide a reason to denounce Jews generally as perpetrators, thereby questioning their moral status as victims that they had assumed as a consequence of the Holocaust. The connection between anti-Semitism and anti-Israeli sentiment lies in this opportunity for a perpetrator-victim role reversal. In particular there is an attempt by the right-wing to compare Israeli policies with the crimes perpetrated against Jews throughout history in order to minimize or even deny the guilt and responsibility of their own nation.

The new anti-Semitism demonstrates how anti-Semitism is a phenomenon with multiple dimensions that can be triggered in different ways for different reasons in different places. Anti-Semitism has become inextricably bound up with the conflict between Israel and her neighbors and is likely to continue in ways that correlate to developments in that conflict. The new anti-Semitism is not as simple to identify and combat as its old form, and efforts to reach agreements on its definition must continue. Anti-Semitism remains a real concern for world Jewry who dedicate significant resources to countering it. This is likely to remain the case for the foreseeable future.

Selected Bibliography

- Chesler, Phyllis. 2003. The New Anti-Semitism: The Current Crisis and What We Must Do about It. Hoboken, NJ: Jossey-Bass.
- European Monitoring Centre on Racism and Xenophobia. 2003. Manifestations of Anti-Semitism in the European Union. Vienna: EUMC.
- Foxman, Abraham. 2003. Never Again? The Threat of the New Anti-Semitism. San Francisco: Harper San Francisco.
- Ignanski, Paul, and Barry Kosmin, eds. 2003. A New Antisemitism? Debating Judeophobia in 21st Century Britain. London: Profile Books.
- Schoenfeld, Gabriel. 2004. The Return of Anti-Semitism. San Francisco: Encounter Books.
- Sharansky, Natan. "On Hating the Jews." Commentary, November 2003.

The Dissemination of Early Christianity beyond the Jewish Diaspora

Marianne Dacy

---

Christianity moved out of the Land of Israel slowly and irregularly; it was successful in some places and made no headway in others. Whether Christianity was rejected or accepted was influenced by the original cultural and religious composition of the population.

In the first century of the common era, there were an estimated 4 or 5 million Jews in all the principal cities of the Greco-Roman world and along the main trade routes. They were especially numerous in the trade city of Alexandria, and there were strong communities in Rome and Antioch, the center where the term “Christian” was first coined. Antioch was the third largest city in the Roman Empire: it had a population of between a quarter and a half million inhabitants and 20,000 to 40,000 Jews.

The Pauline Mission

When the apostle Paul began his outreach to the Gentiles, he often explained the Jewish Scriptures in a way that highlighted the role of Jesus. This often caused friction in the synagogues and riots, but it captured the attention of non-Jews. The effect of the assimilation of Greek language and culture was the creation of a common means of communication with non-Jews. Successful Jewish propaganda, showing the superiority of Judaism as a moral and monotheistic religion over paganism, paved the way for the spread of Christianity.

On his second and third missionary journeys, Paul traveled west to Macedonia and Thrace, which was inhabited by non-Jews. This change in direction from heavily populated Jewish areas, as well as Christianity’s ability to adapt to local cultures, also paved the way for its success.

However, where tannaitic influence was strong in the local Jewish community, as in Nisibis, Christianity was established with more difficulty. In that city, a Christian bishopric was not founded until 300. In Nehardea, another center of Talmudic learning in Babylonia, Christianity also made little progress.

There were other factors as well. Christianity had spread to areas of Western Europe before the reign of Constantine in the first quarter of the fourth century. As early as the late second or early third century, Christian communities in the western part of the empire had attained some geographical independence from Jewish populations. Why was this so?

Part of the answer lies in the spread of influence of the Roman Empire. Where the Romans moved, and where they traded, they brought Christianity, as well as Mithraism and their own pantheon of gods inherited from the Greeks. In parts of Gaul and in areas of Arabia there were no recorded Jewish communities in the first century CE. Yet in the British Isles and Ireland, and in the less densely populated West, Christianity began to spread from the late second century. This may suggest that the Celtic inhabitants were disposed favorably to the new religion brought by the Romans. Mansi's list of bishops attending the Council of Arles in 314 names several areas of Gaul and three places in Britain—Eboracum (York), Lindinonium (Lincoln), and London (Colonia Londinensium—that sent delegates, as well as Basti and Boetica (in present-day Spain), which had Christian populations but apparently no Jews. Another center of Christianity not far from the River Rhine was Agrippina, modern-day Cologne, which is recorded as having no Jewish population either in 314 or at the time of the Council of Nicaea in 325.

Africa sent 12 delegates to the Council of Arles, but only three towns had Jewish populations, which included Carthage. Gaul was divided into several provinces and sent at least 36 delegates. Only five towns represented had Jewish populations.

Christian Populations Indicated by Delegates to the Council of Nicaea

The Church historian Eusebius reports that more than 250 bishops attended the Council of Nicaea in 325 (Eusebius Vita Const. 3.6 and 9), but estimates have been as high as 600. All the Latins and the most famous bishops came from towns with Jewish populations. The number of bishops attending the Council varied with the months.

The more important sees in the Eastern Church, except for Heracleopolis, had Jewish populations. These were Nicomedia, Caesarea, Heraclea (Egypt), Higher Thebes, Cyprus, Neocaesarea, Nisibius, Caesarea, Gangra, and Myra (Asia Minor). In the Provinces of Spain, Rome, Egypt, the Province of Thebes, and Upper Libya, there was an approximately 50 percent correlation with the Jewish population. In these areas, about half the Christian population had spread to areas where there were few Jews.

There was a close geographical association with Jewish communities in the Province of Palestine. On the other hand, Christianization in strong Samaritan areas, such as Neapolis and Sebastae, was sporadic and slow. When the land was reorganized under Diocletian into Palestine Prima, Secunda, and Tertia, this greatly increased the Samaritan Diaspora and possibly made Christianity's progress easier in the wake of a less concentrated Samaritan presence. In the Province of Syria, only 9 of 21 episcopal delegates lived in towns with Jewish populations.

In the Province of Mesopotamia, only Tarsus and Adanu in the Province of Cilicia had Jewish populations from the 11 towns represented by delegates. No Jews were present in the Province of Cappodicia, which sent nine delegates, or in Armenia, represented by six delegates. The Province of Arabia sent six delegates, yet no town represented had a Jewish population. The Province of Phrygia, which sent seven delegates, had Christians who lived in only one Jewish center, Laodicia. The latter city held an ecumenical council in 360, which passed four anti-Jewish canons, including the stipulation that Christians were not to accept festal presents from Jews or to celebrate festivals with them.

Christianity in the more populated areas of the Roman Empire in the east was closely aligned to the Jewish population. In less populated parts of the west, where there were fewer Jews, such as Gaul and Arabia, Christianity had begun to spread to areas without recorded Jewish populations by the end of the second century CE, brought to Gaul by the Romans.

Selected Bibliography

Crown, Alan. 1989. The Samaritans. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr-Paul Siebeck.

Dacy, Marianne. 2001. "The Separation of Early Christianity from Judaism." PhD diss., University of Sydney, Department of Semitic Studies. <http://ses.library.usyd.edu.au/handle/2123/837>.

Hefele, Karle Joseph von. 1883–1896. History of the Councils of the Church from the Original Documents. 5 vols. Translated by William R. Clark. Repr. New York: AMS Press, 1972.

Juster, Jean. 1914. Les Juifs dans l'Empire Romain. 2 vols. New York: Burt Franklin.

Religious Fusion and Interaction in the Diaspora

Jewish Diaspora and the Spreading of Christianity

Edward Kessler

---

Christianity, as one might expect, has had and continues to have a significant impact on Jewish life in the Diaspora. This article will begin with a discussion of the terms galut and diaspora, followed by a brief historical survey, which will include examples of Christian influence on the development of the Jewish Diaspora as well as the impact of Christian attitudes toward Zionism and the State of Israel.

It is necessary first to appreciate the difference between living in the Diaspora, a Greek word meaning “scattering” or in the galut, a Hebrew word meaning exile. There is a tension between the view that Jews outside Israel live in a Diaspora (a voluntary situation desirable to the individual) or in galut (an undesirable situation). Thus, galut may be understood in negative terms whereas Diaspora indicates a more positive role for the Jewish people. Traditionally (and for most of the last two millennia), Jews and Christians have viewed Jewish existence in terms of galut. For Christians, galut represented a divine punishment because the Jewish people rejected Christ, but for Jews it illustrated the suffering of a Chosen People waiting for redemption at a time of God’s choosing through his anointed (Messiah). Of course, this attitude has considerably changed among Christians and Jews today, although strictly observant Jews outside Israel view their existence in terms of galut.

One should realize first that the Jewish Diaspora was not a Christian creation. In fact, well before the destruction of the Second Temple (70 CE), more Jews lived in the Diaspora than in the Land of Israel. The beginnings of the Diaspora can be seen in Assyria’s destruction of the northern kingdom of Israel in 722 BCE, which led to the scattering of the 10 tribes of Israel. Some went to Egypt; but the first major Diaspora community to flourish was in Babylon, shortly before the destruction of the First Temple in 586 BCE.

In the early postbiblical period, the major challenge faced by Jews was the destruction of the Second Temple by the Romans in 70 CE. The Temple at Jerusalem had been the center of Jewish religious life. Its demolition, followed 65 years later by the expulsion of Jews from the city by Emperor Hadrian, was a serious threat to the survival of Judaism. In fact, only two Jewish groups survived its destruction: rabbinic Jews and the Jewish followers of Jesus.

The rabbinic way of life was a new stage in the development of Judaism, and it enabled Jews to survive without a homeland as well as without a Temple. The rabbis’ ability to respond to the new situation enabled them, eventually, to dominate Jewish life for the next 1,800 years.

Coin issued by Roman emperor Hadrian to commemorate the founding of Aelia Capitolina (formerly Jerusalem) after the Romans successfully quelled the second Jewish revolt (also known as the Bar Kokhba Revolt). The coin's reverse depicts a priest plowing with bulls. (Zev Radovan/Land of the Bible Picture Archive)

Unlike the Sadducees, Zealots, monastic groups (such as the Qumran community), and Hellenists, the Jewish followers of Jesus were the only other Jewish sect that survived and flourished. Jesus the Jew followed Jewish customs, such as the dietary laws; prayed in the Temple; and was called a rabbi. Yet the followers of Jesus quickly distanced themselves from Jewish customs and rituals and eventually from Judaism altogether. The date of the split is the subject of much debate, some suggesting it began as early as Paul of Tarsus (around 60 CE), others as late as Constantine (ruled 306–337 CE), or even later. One scholar, James Dunn, has sensibly described the separation in terms of a series of “partings of the ways.”

Yet once Christianity became the religion of the Roman Empire at the conversion of Emperor Constantine in 312 CE, significant numbers of Jews began to live under Christian rule. They maintained a strategy of yielding to political authority, which not only enabled them to survive but also contributed to the success of Jewish life in the Christian world. By relinquishing desire for sovereignty, Jews gained autonomy in regulating their lives. Under the motto dina d'malkulta dina (the law of the land is the law), the Jewish community based its existence on the law of a particular host society, and as a result Christian influence on Jewish life and practice became more common. For example, the banning of polygamy, which is traditionally ascribed to Rabbenu Gershom in the 10th century, was clearly influenced by Christian custom, as was the adoption of wedding rings, a new development from around the seventh century. Judaism clearly had a good digestive system.

Jews who lived in the Diaspora affirmed their connection to the Land of Israel by praying toward Jerusalem. Synagogues in Western Christian lands were designed so that the ark (aron ha-kodesh) was located in the eastern wall, facing Jerusalem. It is worth noting that synagogues, like churches, drew architecturally from Roman civic architecture, particularly the basilica or hall of justice. The synagogue at Sardis, Turkey (third–fourth centuries CE), for example, is basilican in form with a colonnaded forecourt leading to the Jerusalem-facing entry wall.

Those Jews in the Diaspora who flourished still looked forward to a return to the Land of Israel and reflected on biblical texts such as Jeremiah 29:10, “He that scattered Israel will gather him and keep him, as a shepherd his flock.” Those Jews who suffered oppression mourned their land more actively and prayed for the messianic era to be initiated by God, an era that would bring them back to Israel. This is illustrated by the following story in the Talmud:

Wherever Israel went into exile, the Shechina [God's presence] went along into exile. They went to exile to Egypt, the Shechina went with them . . . They went to Babylon in exile and the Shechina went with them . . . And when they will eventually be redeemed, the Shechina will be redeemed along with them. (Megillah 29a)

The name Schechina, or Shekinah, represents the feminine aspect of God and is understood as God's presence. The story indicates that alongside the hope of divine restoration there existed the mystical idea that God was also exiled with his people. This affirmation is a direct response to the Christian adversus iudaeos teaching that Judaism became obsolete with the advent of Christ. Jews responded by suggesting that wherever they lived, God was with them. Just as Jews suffered in exile, so God suffered with them, demonstrating that God still cared for his people.

Jewish responses to Christianity can also be found in rabbinic biblical interpretation, such as interpretations of the Akedah (the Binding of Isaac; Genesis 22), one of the most well-known stories in the Bible. The Akedah is a shocking account of how Abraham's faith in God was demonstrated by a willingness to sacrifice his long-awaited son at God's command. This story has been a source of fascination for Jews and Christians for many centuries, but relatively little attention has been given to the question of the influence of Christianity upon Jewish exegesis.

It is striking that the rabbinic portrayal of Isaac parallels a number of aspects of the Christian understanding of Jesus. Like Jesus, Isaac was willing to give up his life (Lamentations Rabbah Proem 24). Like Jesus, Isaac was not forced to offer himself as a sacrifice but willingly gave himself up to his father (Fragmentary Targum 22:10). Like Jesus, Isaac was described as weeping bitterly when told by Abraham that he was to be sacrificed (Midrash Composed under the Holy Spirit, 65). Like Jesus, Isaac shed blood (Mekhilta de Rabbi Ishmael, Pisha 7). Like Jesus, Isaac is depicted at the gates of Hell (Gehenna; Song of Songs Rabbah 8:9). In a similar way to Paul's assertion concerning baptism (Galatians 3:28), the Akedah is described as atoning for all, Jew and non-Jew (Leviticus Rabbah 2:11). Perhaps most remarkably, Isaac is described as having died and having been resurrected (Pirkei de Rabbi Eliezer 31).

One other example in the rabbinic writings provides evidence that the rabbinic interpretation was influenced by Christian teaching: "And Abraham placed the wood of the burnt-offering on Isaac his son' (Genesis 22:5). Like a man who carries his cross (tzaluv) on his shoulder (Genesis Rabbah 56:3)." The reference to a cross is clearly influenced by the Christian description that Jesus carried his cross to the crucifixion.

Thus, Jewish interpretations of the Akedah illustrate that rabbinic exegesis cannot be understood properly without reference to the Christian context. Indeed, Jewish biblical interpretation may be more easily understood when viewed in terms of exegetical encounter, because the rabbis were not only aware of Christian exegesis but were influenced by it. Jews and Christians lived (and continue to live) in a biblically oriented culture and to a certain extent they are both "bound by the Bible."

The host communities, both Christian and Islamic, had significant impact upon Jews in the Diaspora in other ways. Jews often adopted the languages, dress, customs, names, and even religious styles of the majority population. Examples include the many Orthodox Jews who today wear distinctive clothing similar to that of 18th-century Polish gentry. The Reform Jewish movement based its early worship services on German Lutheranism. Moses Maimonides and other Jewish philosophers wrote in Arabic, and Yiddish is a combination of Hebrew, German, and Polish. Despite living as a vulnerable minority within Christian Europe for centuries, there was extensive cross-fertilization between Diaspora Jews and their host Christian communities. That interplay included the fervent messianic movements that swept Europe in the 16th to 18th centuries, including some Jews who believed the reforms of Martin Luther were a precursor to the messianic era and some Christian millenarians who similarly believed the messianic claims of Sabbatai Zevi.

At the same time, as the power of Christendom increased in Europe, Jewish life became more difficult and violence against Jewish communities became more common. This was epitomized by the Crusades (11th to 16th centuries), which were holy wars preached by the papacy against the enemies of Christ and his Church. The Crusades appealed widely to popular imagination and whipped up Christian emotion against Jews. For example, Urban's call in 1095 led crusaders to depart for the Holy Land but on their way through Germany they encountered prosperous Jewish communities in cities like Worms, Mainz, and Cologne. Although the bishops tried to prevent anti-Jewish violence, many Jews were killed or forcibly baptised. Others died by their own hands as martyrs sanctifying God's holy name (Kiddush ha-Shem). Extensive loss of Jewish life was prevented by Bernard of Clairvaux during the Second Crusade. He stopped anti-Jewish preaching and expected Christians to adhere to traditional church policy protecting Jews. During the Third Crusade, the Jewish community of York was massacred in 1190 in Clifford's Tower, in King Richard I's absence. Narratives of these pogroms entered Jewish folklore and consciousness, contributing to a mindset that Jews were surrounded by (Christian) enemies. For understandable reasons, Christianity was viewed as a constant threat to Jewish life in the Diaspora.

The dislocation in the relationship between Jews and Christian in Christian lands can also be seen in the architectural divergence between synagogue and church, which increased from the seventh century onward. Churches experimented with both centralized and longitudinal forms, although the basilican form remained predominant. Churches grew increasingly articulated on the exterior, taking pride of place as freestanding monuments in the civic realm. Synagogues, aware of their precarious position within the dominant Christian culture, adopted relatively inconspicuous exteriors to blend into the urban fabric.

For the most part, Jews passively accepted that they would suffer expulsions from Christian lands and pogroms at Christian hands, but they believed the Jewish people could live beyond such events. This survival technique is illustrated by the fact that even as the Jewish lights of Western Christian Europe were extinguished one by one—expelled from England (1290), France (1306), and Spain (1492)—new Jewish centers were being established in Eastern Christian Europe as well as in Islamic Turkey and the Middle East. A legacy of the mentality that saw the Jewish community as being utterly engulfed by Christian enemies remains entrenched in the popular imagination. Rabbinic Judaism reinforced a perception among Jews that they were on their own, that no one else shared their vision, and that all outsiders were enemies. For centuries this reflected considerable truth. This mindset was reinforced by Christian inquisitions and pogroms and, in the 20th century, by the Shoah.

A significant change began, however, in the past 100 years when Jews in the Diaspora began to discover that there were Christian communities in the world with which they could share a vision of a decent society. The transformation in relations between Judaism and Christianity is one of the few pieces of good news in modern encounters between religions. In the past 100 years, the need for Christianity to abandon its historical religious animosity and misleading caricature of Judaism has been overwhelming. These views are now generally admitted as being wrong, but their full and public rejection was required before the possibility of rebuilding good relations with Judaism. Thus, what was required was a shift from what was, for the most part, an inherent need to condemn Judaism to the need to condemn Christian anti-Judaism. As far as the Christian contribution to anti-Semitism is concerned, the Protestant Churches and the Roman Catholic Church in particular, instead of being part of the problem, have now become part of the solution.

It was partly for this reason that an English Liberal Jew, Claude Montefiore (1858–1938), called for [Jewish] theologians who shall neither be afraid of Christian doctrine on the one hand, nor be on the constant search for contrasts on the other, who will not wish to impoverish Judaism by insisting on differences and contrasts, but will rather seek to enrich it by finding out what the great minds of other religions have thought and taught, and how much is consistent with Judaism, and valuable and worthy of adoption and incorporation, and how much must be rejected . . . We need theologians who do not want to sit in corners and erect peculiar systems of their own, but who are willing to profit and learn even from those whose traditions and accents are other than their own.” (Montefiore 1923, 560–561)

On the other hand, Joseph Soloveitchik (1903–1993), who was the leading 20th-century Modern Orthodox religious authority in the Diaspora and whose religious opinions and rulings are considered authoritative by many Jews, took a contrasting position. While happy for Jews and Christians to work together in the social and political arenas, his 1964 essay on interreligious dialogue, entitled “Confrontation,” prohibits dialogue with Christians. Although Soloveitchik was influenced by Christian theologians and philosophers such as Soren Kierkegaard, he argues for a rejectionist approach. From his theological understanding of the development of human nature Soloveitchik concludes that the faith experience is private and incommunicable. Building on that argument he determines that interreligious dialogue is intrinsically flawed and should not be undertaken.

Whatever the views of theologians such as Montefiore and Soloveitchik, Christianity continued to have an impact on Jewish life in the Diaspora, including Christian attitudes to Zionism and the State of Israel. Zionism benefited from the Christian West’s rediscovery of the Holy Land in the 19th century, as well as from the climate created by numerous influential Christians, like George Eliot, who advocated the restoration of the Jewish people to the Promised Land. The collapse of the Ottoman Empire in World War I, the capture of Palestine by General Edmund Allenby (1861–1936) and the publication of the Balfour Declaration in 1917, and the decision of the League of Nations to award Great Britain the mandate over Palestine, all facilitated the political and practical progress of the Zionist movement.

In the aftermath of the Holocaust, Zionism became a preeminent part of Jewish identity in the Diaspora. Many major Christian statements on the new relationship of the Church and the Jewish people stammer or even fall silent on the subject of Zionism and the State of Israel. In 1969, Edward Flannery (1912–1998) argued that the Christian psyche is subliminally predisposed to anti-Zionism, which provides an outlet for suppressed or unconscious anti-Semitism.

Roman Catholicism's official attitude toward Zionism changed greatly in the course of the 20th century. In 1904, Pope Pius X rejected Theodor Herzl's plea for support unequivocally: "The Jews have not recognised our Lord, therefore we cannot recognise the Jewish people." Nine decades later, in 1994, the Holy See established official diplomatic relations with the State of Israel, and Pope John Paul II, during his historic visit to Israel in 2000, displayed deep respect for the nation of the Jewish people. The papal visit made a profound impact on Jews both in Israel and the Diaspora. In what has become an iconic image, John Paul II placed a written prayer in a crevice of the Western Wall. The short, typed prayer with an official seal, read: "God of our fathers, you chose Abraham and his descendants to bring your Name to the Nations. We are deeply saddened by the behavior of those who in the course of history have caused these children of yours to suffer, and asking Your forgiveness we wish to commit ourselves to genuine brotherhood with the people of the Covenant." Pope Benedict XVI's moving visit to Auschwitz in 2006 is significant, not least because of his German nationality.

The Protestant churches, although equally vociferous in their condemnation of anti-Semitism, present a greater variety of views toward Israel, which also have an impact on Jews in the Diaspora. For example, Christian Zionists, including fundamentalists and evangelical movements associated with the International Christian Embassy, believe God is working through Zionism to fulfill biblical prophecy and usher in the messianic age. From the 18th century, a steadily growing minority of Protestants in Europe and America argued that a Jewish "restoration" in the Holy Land would accompany the creation of Christian nation states elsewhere, fulfilling one of the "dispensations" leading to the millennial redemption prophesied in the Old and New Testaments.

On the other hand, the restoration of a Jewish state in the Land of Israel and a national renaissance have severely undermined the age-old Christian claim that the "wandering Jew" is divinely doomed to eternal exile and suffering. This view has buttressed replacement theology and the supersessionism inherent in the notion of the Church as the New Israel.

For some of the more radical evangelicals, support for the State of Israel is critical not only in terms of national survival but also, ultimately, to advance the Second Coming of Jesus as the Messiah who will be acknowledged by the whole world. It is not wholly surprising, therefore, that Jews are somewhat ambivalent about their support because Jews become transformed into pawns on the chessboard of history, being used to fulfill the final predetermined game plan.

Most mainline Protestants firmly oppose such prophetic dispensationalism and reject millenarianism, but nonetheless endorse Zionism, as did Paul Tillich (1886–1965) and Reinhold Niebuhr (1892–1971), as a necessary and morally justified response to anti-Semitism. There are also other Protestants who make absolute moral demands on Israel and conclude that Zionism represents a profane corruption of Judaism's true prophetic mission. Naim Ateek, for example, has argued that since the creation of the state, some Jewish and Christian interpreters have read the Old Testament largely as a Zionist text to such an extent that it has become almost repugnant to Palestinian Christians. This has led to discussions by some Protestants in the West about divestment campaigns and other anti-Israeli initiatives, which cause great anguish among Jews in the Diaspora. Although some Jews have consequently questioned the value of dialogue with Christians, these criticisms demonstrate that Christianity continues to have an impact on Jewish Diaspora life, for better and for worse. This serves to show that at the beginning of the 21st century, the State of Israel and the Diaspora are both integral not only to the formation of Jewish identity but also to relations with Christians and Christianity.

Select Bibliography

- Collins, John. J. 1983. Between Athens and Jerusalem: Jewish Identity in the Hellenistic Diaspora. New York: Crossroad.
- Dunn, James D. G. 1991. The Partings of the Ways: Between Christianity and Judaism and Their Significance for the Character of Christianity. Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International.
- Kessler, Edward D., and Neil Wenborn, eds. 2004. A Dictionary of Jewish-Christian Relations. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Montefiore, Claude G. 1923. The Old Testament and After. London: Macmillan.
- Ross, James R. 2000. Fragile Branches: Travels through the Jewish Diaspora. New York: Riverhead.
- Soloveitchik, Joseph B. 1964. "Confrontation." Tradition 6, no. 2.

Jewish Influence on the Formation of the Christian Scriptures

Alison Salvesen

---

It was in all likelihood the needs of the Jewish Diaspora in Egypt that first gave rise to the earliest Greek versions of Scripture collectively known as the version of the Seventy [translators] or Septuagint (LXX). Though the pseudonymous Letter of Aristeas is largely unhistorical, its statement that the Torah was rendered into Greek in Alexandria is corroborated by the vocabulary used in the LXX Pentateuch. Other books, including LXX Isaiah, also appear to originate in Egypt.

As the Hebrew biblical text became both more standardized and more authoritative among Jews in the first century BCE, there was increasing dissatisfaction with the earlier, “Old Greek” translation because it did not always correspond closely to the emerging standard Hebrew text. It is probable that the move to revise the Greek started in Palestine, where Hebrew was best known, and may be reflected in some of the Greek scroll fragments found at Qumran, which contain revisions to improve the literal correspondence with the proto-Masoretic Hebrew text (see Ulrich 2000). In addition, it seems that certain LXX books that were translated later, such as Ecclesiastes and Song of Songs, were rendered more literally in order to match more closely the formal structure of the Hebrew.

Page from the Dead Sea Scrolls, a collection of ancient manuscripts discovered in caves in the Judean desert. Archaeologists believe the scrolls may shed great light on the history of Judaism, early Christianity, and the Bible. (Pictorial Library of Bible Lands)

The process of revision toward the proto-Masoretic Hebrew text continued, through the version of “Theodotion,” who may not have been a single person, and culminated in the literal version of Aquila, a convert to Jerusalem who is said by the Christian writer Epiphanius to have come from Sinope of Pontus. Epiphanius dates Aquila’s revision to ca. 130 CE. Rabbinic sources also say that Aquila was a proselyte, who was influenced by R. Akiva and worked under the authority of Palestinian rabbis Eliezer ben Hyrcanus and Joshua ben Hananiah (Jerusalem Talmud, Meg. i. 71c; Jerusalem Talmud Kid. i. 59a.; Babylonian Talmud Meg 3a). The other named Jewish translator of the second century is Symmachus, who according to Epiphanius was born a Samaritan before converting to Judaism. He produced his revision toward the end of the second century, probably in Palestine. Other early Christian witnesses say Symmachus was a Jewish Christian, an Ebionite, but this is not borne out by the evidence of his translation, which tallies closely with rabbinic midrash and is rather less literal than that of Aquila.

Greek-speaking Christians displayed a preference for the older unrevised LXX, because the Hebrew was of little interest to them, and more importantly the LXX was held to support their belief in Christ as Messiah and Son of God, while they suspected that the new Jewish revisions deliberately set out to undermine such claims. This does not mean they had no contact with the revised versions used by Jews. They were aware of the latter because of their use in debates between Jews and Christians. Sometimes Christians even used such versions unwittingly, as in the case of Justin Martyr (d. ca. 165). In his Dialogue with Trypho the Jew, written in Ephesus, Justin cites Micah 4:3–7 using a form of the Greek text that had undergone a similar revision toward the Hebrew to that witnessed by the text-type of a scroll of the Minor Prophets found at Nahal Hever in the Judean Desert (see Tov 1990). Whether Justin had acquired such a Greek text from Palestine or whether it was in general circulation in Asia Minor is unknown.

On the whole, Christian Greek Scriptures tended to be much less reliably copied than Hebrew scrolls and to be altered consciously or unconsciously in a direction that supported Christian teaching. The classically trained Christian scholar Origen (ca. 185–ca. 254) is the first to remark on textual corruption among Greek witnesses and the discrepancy between the contents of Greek and Hebrew manuscripts (Commentary in Matthew 15:14 and Letter to Africanus 4–5). His goal was to restore what he considered must have been the original text produced by the LXX translators. Since he assumed the Hebrew text had not altered since their time, he used the Hebrew text of his own day alongside the Jewish revisions of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, rather than working solely from the best Greek exemplar. The result was a massive six-columned work known as the Hexapla. Though he carried out most of the work in Caesarea of Palestine, where he settled in 232 CE, he probably began it while he was still living in Alexandria, which would imply that it was contacts with Jews in the Diaspora, as well as their texts and versions, that sowed the seeds of the project. The fifth column of the Hexapla, containing Origen's revised text of the LXX, was copied and circulated separately, at first with his critical markings showing what he had inserted to correspond with material found in the Hebrew and later Jewish versions (asterisks) and what was found in LXX but not in Hebrew (obeli). In time these signs dropped out, with the result that Greek readings conforming to the current Hebrew text were introduced into the stream of Christian manuscript transmission. Some of these additions were quite substantial, especially in Exodus and Job. However, the pluses of the LXX, compared with what was in the Hebrew proto-MT, also tended to be perpetuated. Another effect of Origen's work on the Hexapla was to make available to Christian exegetes the versions of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion. In spite of theological qualms, many scholars found readings from the "Three" to be very useful in elucidating the meaning of obscure words and phrases in Scripture, and some were translated into Syriac, Latin, and Armenian.

For Origen, the original translation of the LXX was inspired, which is why he wished to restore it, to the extent of using Jewish tools but without acknowledging the inspiration of the Hebrew text, at least for the Christian Church. The Latin-speaker Jerome (d. 420 CE) went much further. He began to study Hebrew during a period as a hermit in Syria, from a Jewish convert to Christianity, and continued his studies in the language in Constantinople, Rome, and Bethelhem, with local Jewish teachers who had remained within the fold. His proficiency in the language, his familiarity with the Hexapla, and his strong philological interests led him eventually to consider the Hebrew text the ultimate authority in terms of both text and meaning. When the pope asked him to revise the Old Latin version of the Old Testament, which had been rendered piecemeal from the LXX, and bring it in line with Origen's revised LXX text, Jerome at first complied. But his awareness of the problems of producing a translation of a translation brought him to the point where he realized that only a return to the "original" Hebrew, which he considered the ultimate authority, would suffice. Drawing on Origen's work and using Jewish informants, he embarked on the Iuxta Hebraeos version, or version according to the Hebrews, now commonly known as the Vulgate. This eventually became the authoritative Latin Old Testament for the Roman Catholic Church. In many cases Jerome rejects typical Christian readings of the text if there is no basis for them in the Hebrew text, and he introduces some interpretations from Jewish sources where these do not militate against Christian doctrine. In other places he ingeniously adds Christological elements, as in the Psalms, where the name Jesus appears as a translation for yeshu' (e.g., Psalm 51[50]:14, 79[78]:9 and 85[84]:5). He was also aware that the Hebrew canon was shorter and only translated those books recognized by Palestinian Jews: he did translate Tobit and Judith, but this was under pressure from his patrons, and he warned the parents of a young girl that she should beware of reading apocryphal books.

Though Jerome's translation of the Iuxta Hebraeos version was all carried out in Palestine, the seeds for it must have been sown by Jews in the Diaspora who were prepared to teach and to challenge Jerome. The work of Origen and Jerome effected a partial rapprochement between the Christian Greek and Latin Old Testament texts and the Hebrew Bible as understood by the rabbis of the third and fourth centuries.

Select Bibliography

- Barthélemy, D. 1963. Les devanciers d'Aquila: première publication intégrale du texte des fragments du Dodécaprophète trouvés dans le désert de Juda, précédée d'une étude sur les traductions et recensions grecques de la Bible réalisées au premier siècle de notre ère sous l'influence du rabbinat palestinien. VT Supplements 10. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Kamesar, A. 1993. Jerome, Greek Scholarship, and the Hebrew Bible: A Study of the Quaestiones hebraicae in Genesim. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.
- Kelly, J. N. D. 1975. Jerome: His Life, Writings, and Controversies. London: Duckworth.
- Salvesen, A. 2003. "A Convergence of the Ways? The Judaizing of Christian Scripture by Origen and Jerome." In The Ways that Never Parted, edited by A. Yoshiko Reed and A. Becker, 233–258. Texts and Studies in Ancient Judaism 95. Tübingen, Germany: J.C.B. Mohr.
- Tov, E. with R. A. Kraft and P. Parsons. 1990. The Greek Minor Prophets Scroll from Nahal Hever: 8 Hev XII gr. Discoveries in the Judaean Desert 8. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Trigg, J. W. 1998. Origen. The Early Church Fathers. London: Routledge.
- Ulrich, E. 2000. "Septuagint." In Encyclopedia of the Dead Sea Scrolls, edited by L. Schiffman and G. J. Brooke, vol. II, 863–868. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

History of Judeo-Christian Communities in the Jewish Diaspora

David J. Rudolph

---

Messianic (Judeo-Christian) communities distinguish themselves from other Diaspora Jewish communities in their belief that Jesus is the Messiah. They differ from Christian churches in their synagogue lifestyle and stance that Jewish life is a matter of covenant responsibility and/or national duty for Jews. Messianic (Judeo-Christian) communities are significant to the history of the Jewish Diaspora in part because they represent a bridge between the synagogue and the church. As David Noel Freedman (1969, 86) put it, "Jewish Christians were able to have active and effective relations with Gentile Christians and at the same time retain operating status in the non-Christian Jewish community. Thus a link was forged, however tenuous, between Christianity and Judaism and it persisted as long as the Jewish Christian community continued to exist. This halfway house with conduits to both sides, could serve as meeting place and mediator, communication center and symbol of the continuity to which both enterprises belonged."

The earliest Diaspora Messianic (Judeo-Christian) communities were established in the first century CE by Torah-observant, Jesus-believing Jews from the Land of Israel who "traveled as far as Phoenicia, Cyprus and Antioch, telling the message [that Jesus was the Messiah] only to Jews" (Acts 11:19). These communities were part of a Jewish "sect" called the Natzerim ("Nazarenes," Acts 24:5). Epiphanius, the fourth-century Church Father, describes Nazarene communities of his day:

[They] did not call themselves Christians, but Nazarenes . . . they remained wholly Jewish and nothing else. For they use not only the New Testament but also the Old like the Jews . . . [They] live according to the preaching of the Law as among the Jews . . . They have a good mastery of the Hebrew language. For the entire Law and the Prophets and what is called the Scriptures, I mention the poetical books, Kings, Chronicles and Esther and all the others are read in Hebrew by them as that is the case with the Jews of course. Only in this respect they differ from the Jews and Christians: with the Jews they do not agree because of their belief in Christ, with the Christians because they are trained in the Law, in circumcision, the Sabbath and the other things. (Epiphanius, Panarion 29; trans. Klijn and Reinink 1973, 173)

Direct evidence of Messianic (Judeo-Christian) communities from the 5th through 17th centuries is scanty. This is because, in the post-Nicean church, the catholic view that Jews could not become Christians and remain Jews was backed by canon law and Constantine's sword. Messianic communities in this period were forced to go underground. The Second Council of Nicea in 787 was the first ecumenical council to formally ban Jesus-believing Jews who lived as Jews from the church. Jesus-believing Jews were required to renounce all ties to Judaism through professions of faith like the one from the Church of Constantinople ("I renounce absolutely everything Jewish, every law, rite and custom").

Joseph Rabinowitz established the first Messianic synagogue of modern times in Kishinev, Russia, in 1884. It was called Beney Israel, Beney Brit Chadashah (Israelites of the New Covenant). Neither Rabinowitz nor his synagogue was connected to a Christian denomination; the government of Bessarabia legally designated the Messianic community a distinct Jewish sect (Kjaer-Hansen 1995, 64). Rabinowitz's synagogue considered circumcision, the Sabbath, and festivals incumbent upon Jews as section 6 of the community's Twenty-Four Articles of Faith makes clear:

[As] we are the seed of Abraham according to the flesh, who was the father of all those who were circumcised and believed, we are bound to circumcise every male-child on the eighth day, as God commanded him. And as we are the descendants of those whom the Lord brought out of the land of Egypt, with a stretched out arm, we are bound to keep the Sabbath, the feast of unleavened bread, and the feast of weeks, according as it is written in the law of Moses. (Kjaer-Hansen 1995, 104)

The Messianic community referred to their building (which seated 150–200 people) as a “synagogue,” and they read from a Torah scroll (Kjaer-Hansen 1995, 146). Traditional synagogue prayers were used with Messianic additions, and Jesus was referred to by his original Hebrew name, Yeshua.

Prominent Messianic Jewish leaders in the late 19th and early 20th centuries included Rabbi Isaac Lichtenstein in Hungary, Mark John Levy in the United States, Philip Cohen in South Africa (whose Jewish Messianic Movement published the journal The Messianic Jew) and Hayyim Yedidyah Pollak (Lucky) in Galicia. Other leaders included Paul Levertoff in Germany and England (who held the chair of Hebrew and Rabbinics at the Institutum Judaicum in Leipzig), Alex Waldmann, Israel Pick, Yehiel Tsvi Lichtenstein-Herschensohn, and John Zacker (who founded the Hebrew Christian Synagogue of Philadelphia in 1922). These individuals paved the way for the emergence of the Messianic Jewish community in the second half of the 20th century.

Historically, the earliest opponents of modern Messianic (Judeo-Christian) communities were not traditional Jews but Hebrew Christians with a traditional Christian theology of Judaism and the Torah. In the 1917 issue of The Hebrew Christian Alliance Quarterly, the official journal of the Hebrew Christian Alliance of America (HCAA), Messianic Judaism was labeled a heresy, and followers were banished from the Alliance ranks. The Alliance Quarterly leaves no ambiguity about the HCAA stance on the Messianic community: “We felt it our duty to make it clear that we have nothing to do with this so-called ‘Messianic Judaism,’ in any shape or form, nor have we any faith in it.” The journal goes on to state, “Their grand sounding designation is a misnomer, for it is neither ‘Messianic’ or ‘Judaism.’ It does not describe any movement of Jews in the direction of recognizing our Lord Jesus as the Messiah, but an agitation on the part of some Hebrew Christian brethren, who have much to learn as to the true character of their high calling of God in Christ Jesus.” The editors note that the HCAA stands opposed to the “misguided tendency” of Messianic Judaism and that “we will have none of it!” They conclude with the statement, “We are filled with deep gratitude to God, for the guidance of the Holy Spirit, in enabling the Conference to so effectively banish it [Messianic Judaism] from our midst, and now the Hebrew Christian Alliance has put herself on record to be absolutely free from it, now and forever" ("Messianic Judaism" 1917).

In the decades that followed, Messianic communities receded from attention in Jewish Christian circles as Jewish missionary agencies and Hebrew Christian churches marginalized Messianic Jews. Hebrew Christian ministries like the American Board of Missions to the Jews put on a veneer of Jewishness to draw Jewish people to the gospel; Jewish identity and lifestyle were missiologically motivated and not a matter of covenant or national duty (Cohn-Sherbok 2000, 40–41). It is estimated that more than "230,000 Jews became Christians during the first third of the 20th century" (Glaser 1998, 159). Almost all of these Jewish "converts to Christianity" assimilated into Gentile churches. Their children intermarried and, with rare exception, no longer identified as Jews (Rudolph 2005, 65; Rudolph 2003, 48–50; Cohn-Sherbok 2000, 54). Against this backdrop of indifference to Jewish difference and failure to maintain Jewish continuity, a resurgence of Messianic Jewish communities in the tradition of Rabinowitz occurred in the early 1970s.

Between 1967 and 1974, a large number of Jews in their early 20s became believers in Jesus and maintained their Jewish identity and lifestyle as a matter of covenantal responsibility and/or national duty. These young "Messianic Jews" joined the Hebrew Christian Alliance and, through majority vote, steered the organization in the direction of Messianic Judaism. In 1975, to the chagrin of the Hebrew Christian old guard, they successfully changed the name of the organization to the Messianic Jewish Alliance of America (MJAA). This about-face reflected a sea change in the theological and cultural ethos of the movement, "It signaled a shift in the movement's sense of identity . . . Along with the change in name came a new focus on the development of distinct congregations of Jewish Yeshua-believers" (Kinzer 2005, 291). The Union of Messianic Jewish Congregations (UMJC) was formed in 1979, and the International Association of Messianic Congregations and Synagogues (IAMCS) followed suit in 1986. In 2006, these two umbrella organizations represented more than 200 Messianic congregations in the Diaspora. An additional 200+ congregations around the world remain unaffiliated. The UMJC defines Messianic Judaism as "a movement of Jewish congregations and congregation-like groupings committed to Yeshua the Messiah that embrace the covenantal responsibility of Jewish life and identity rooted in Torah, expressed in tradition, renewed and applied in the context of the New Covenant" (www.umjc.org).

A common misunderstanding about Messianic (Judeo-Christian) communities today is that they are the same as "Jews for Jesus." Most Messianic Jews, however, will deny any connection between the two. Why is this? The terms "Messianic Jew" and "Messianic Judaism" historically represented a commitment to Jewish continuity. In recent years, these terms have been co-opted by Jewish missionary agencies (of the HCAA variety) that maintain the traditional Christian view that the New Testament is ultimately indifferent to Jewish life (Telchin 2004, 21–158; Maoz 2003, 43–258). The prime example of such a group is Jews for Jesus, a Protestant evangelical missionary organization with a staff of more than 200 people (Ariel 2000, 219; www.JewsforJesus.org). Unlike mainstream Messianic synagogues, Jews for Jesus expresses little commitment to Jewish life and Jewish continuity. Most of the converts they make join Protestant churches, and their children assimilate into Gentile Christian culture. The official stance of Jews for Jesus is that all of the distinctively Jewish covenant responsibilities specified in the Torah, including circumcision, are optional for Jews because Christians are “free” from the law (Brickner 2005, 193). By contrast, mainstream Messianic (Judeo-Christian) communities are committed to Jewish continuity independent of their outreach within the Jewish community. They consider Torah observance to be a matter of covenant responsibility for Jews.

Selected Bibliography

- Brickner, David. 2005. “A Final Word from David Brickner, Executive Director of Jews for Jesus.” In The Messianic Movement: A Field Guide for Evangelical Christians, edited by Rich Robinson, 186–198. San Francisco: Jews for Jesus.
- Cohn-Sherbok, Dan. 2000. Messianic Judaism. London: Cassell.
- Freedman, David Noel. 1969. “An Essay on Jewish Christianity.” Journal of Ecumenical Studies 1: 81–86.
- Glaser, Mitchell L. 1998. “A Survey of Missions to the Jews in Continental Europe 1900–1950.” PhD diss., Fuller Theological Seminary, Faculty of the School of World Mission.
- Kinzer, Mark. 2005. Post-Missionary Messianic Judaism: Redefining Christian Engagement with the Jewish People. Grand Rapids, MI: Brazos Press.
- Kjaer-Hansen, Kai. 1995. Joseph Rabinowitz and the Messianic Movement. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.
- Klijn, A. F. J., and G. J. Reinink. 1973. Patristic Evidence for Jewish-Christian Sects. Leiden, Netherlands: E. J. Brill.
- “Messianic Judaism.” 1917. Hebrew Christian Alliance Quarterly 1 (July/October): 85–88.
- Rudolph, David J. 2005. “Messianic Jews and Christian Theology: Restoring an Historical Voice to the Contemporary Discussion.” Pro Ecclesia 14 (1): 58–84.

Islamization and Jews in the Medieval Middle East

Fred Astren

---

Islamization refers to the complex set of religious, social, and cultural changes in the Middle Ages that transformed societies of the Middle East, North Africa, Spain, and parts of Central Asia into Islamic societies. These processes occurred at different rates in different regions and took from two to four centuries, or more in some areas.

The establishment and vast military expansion of the Muslim caliphate, which began in the early seventh century, led to an overwhelming majority of world Jewry becoming subjects of the new empire under conditions that generally permitted (along with Christians) communal autonomy and religious liberty in exchange for subservient social status and discriminatory taxation. Although the history of Jews and Judaism was shaped in many ways through accommodation and resistance to the extensive historical transformations of Islamization, scholars of medieval Jewish history have given little attention to the topic.

The role of Jews in the seventh-century Muslim conquests of the Middle East is difficult to gauge because the Arabic sources offer little specific information on Jews and are problematic in their reliability. Legendary materials explain that as a consequence of Jerusalem's conquest in 638 the caliph, identified as 'Umar ibn al-Khattab, permitted Jews to reside there after centuries of exclusion. Islam had no theological necessity for excluding Jews from occupying the conceptual center of their sacred geography. Other narratives portray Jews of both the Byzantine Empire and later in Visigothic Spain welcoming the invaders in reaction to harsh anti-Jewish policies of their rulers, but such actions cannot be fully corroborated historically.

The policies for communal autonomy and religious liberty, known as dhimma ("protection" or "covenant"), took decades, if not longer, to develop and be institutionalized. The conditions for *dhimmi*s, as the subjects of the policies are called, included the payment of either or both a poll tax (jizya) and a land tax (kharaj) and agreement to certain stipulations that symbolized subservience to Muslim dominance. These conditions, epitomized in a late-circulating document known as the "Pact of 'Umar," included prohibitions against bearing arms or teaching the Koran, as well as sumptuary regulations, regulations limiting construction of new synagogues (and churches), and others. Nonetheless, dhimma benefited Jews by offering religious and social toleration and by encouraging Jewish communities to organize systematic and competent leadership in order to act effectively under the terms of corporate recognition. Rabbinic leadership capitalized on dhimma and the near total unification of world Jewry to advance its version of Judaism to the exclusion of local traditions and other variations in practice and belief.

Although conversion to Islam is a component of Islamization, forced conversion is rare in Islamic history, with a few exceptions proving the rule, most notably under the Almohads in 12th-century Morocco and Spain and the Safavids in 17th-century Persia. In medieval Jewish literary sources, it is uncommon for conversion to Islam to be addressed, perhaps because losses sustained by the community were not as important in terms of the rabbinic worldview as sanctification and upholding the Law. Medieval Arabic sources adopt a Muslim triumphalism that accepts the inevitability and correctness of conversion to Islam without much consideration for process and detail.

At first, Muslim authorities discouraged conversion, but later conversion became attractive for Jews and Christians as political and economic challenges made dhimmi taxes increasingly difficult to bear, especially for farmers. In the Middle East, conversion to Islam took place gradually. Richard Bulliet suggests that it reached a critical mass of 50 percent of the population in many regions in the 9th and 10th centuries, 80 percent at the beginning of the 11th, and approached 100 percent in many regions in the 12th and 13th centuries (Bulliet 1979). The earliest centuries probably produced little Jewish conversion, because on the one hand rabbinic self-governance was consolidating and even spreading, and on the other hand, Islam represented the faith of only a small elite that ruled much larger indigenous populations. At this time, Jews who converted to Islam would have done so for individual reasons, or because their forebears had been enslaved in the great conquests. The descendants of slaves, living in Muslim environments and cut off from family and Jewish community, would have found conversion easy and reasonable.

It is likely that in the 9th and 10th centuries the majority of Jewish conversions to Islam occurred, and the threat to Jewish communities became discernible. By this time, Islam had developed a religious and social system that offered meaning but also social status and financial opportunity. In the second half of the 10th century, the Karaite Japheth ben ‘Eli testifies to Ismaili Muslim efforts at converting Jews (Wasserstrom 1995, 132–133). From the 11th century on, a truly Muslim society existed, when numerical preponderance and the influence of social institutions defined society as a whole. It is likely that by this time fewer Jews were converting because with the elaboration of Muslim law demands made upon Muslims became heavier. It is noteworthy that in the 13th century, when much of the Middle East and North Africa had become fully Islamized, Jews and Christians began to lose social status and economic opportunity as the urban quarter and marketplace became more Muslim.

A component of Islamization in many regions was Arabization, the adoption of Arabic language and customs, which among Jews led to Judeo-Arabic culture. Arabization and Islamization permitted Jews to enjoy a measure of participation in the intellectual and economic life of the Muslim world. Some Jewish historical developments mirrored cognate Muslim phenomena, such as messianic movements, scripturalism, and the linguistic concerns of the Masoretes.

Selected Bibliography

- Bulliet, Richard W. 1979. Conversion to Islam in the Medieval Period, an Essay in Quantitative History. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Gil, Moshe. 1992. A History of Palestine, 634–1099. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Gil, Moshe. 2004. Jews in Islamic Countries in the Middle Ages. Boston: Brill.
- Humphreys, R. Stephen. 1991. Islamic History: A Framework for Inquiry. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Lewis, Bernard. 1984. The Jews of Islam. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Wasserstrom, Steven M. 1995. Between Muslim and Jew: The Problem of Symbiosis under Early Islam. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Christian–Jewish Dialogue: 18th Century

Klaus L. Berghahn

---

When one speaks of the beginnings of a Christian–Jewish dialogue in 18th-century Germany one has also to keep in mind its limitations: the still prevalent anti-Judaism (even among many intellectuals), the extraordinarily restrictive edicts, and the mental reservations of most Jews in their contact with Christians. The century-old Christian hatred of the Jews made such a dialogue almost unimaginable, and Jewish self-isolation made it improbable. The edicts of the 18th century compounded this discrimination and segregation; they regulated and restricted all aspects of Jewish life under Christian governments and discouraged any form of Christian–Jewish dialogue.

Against this backdrop of religious hostility and governmental restrictions, the Enlightenment's philosophy of tolerance, which spread from England (through the writings of John Locke) to the continent, was a glimmer of hope for the Jews. However, the toleration debate was mostly concerned with tolerance among the Christian churches and sects, and only since the middle of century included the Jews. Tolerance was the thin veil of piety over a deep-seated enmity toward the Jews, which was ritually resurrected in the Easter liturgy and the Passion plays. It was merely a sentimental feeling toward the older religion than a civic duty, a gesture that when tested would easily collapse.

In Germany, the first conditional attempts to tolerate at least one exceptional Jew can be found in belles lettres around the middle of the century. In Christian G. Gellert's sentimental novel Das Leben der schwedischen Graefin von G. (The Life of the Swedish Baroness of G., 1747), a rich Polish Jew is introduced, who becomes the benefactor and friend of her husband. Yet the whole episode is still an exercise in tolerance on the lowest level: one noble Jew as the exception to the rule. The same ambivalent model is used in Gotthold E. Lessing's one-act comedy Die Juden (The Jews, 1749), in which a nameless traveler saves a baron from the hands of robbers. When the grateful baron offers his benefactor a lavish reward and on top of it his daughter's hand in marriage, the traveler has to decline: He is a Jew. The play ends in confusion and without a happy end. Tolerance is postulated by the example of one honest Jew who in the end accepts the friendship of the Christian baron. Here, as in Gellert's novel, personal friendship is the first step toward tolerance.

However, Lessing's play had unforeseen consequences for the beginnings of a Christian–Jewish dialogue. When it was published in 1754, Johann D. Michaelis, a famous orientalist at the University of Goettingen, immediately criticized it: Although a noble Jew was not inconceivable, the idea was highly improbable, and this distracted from the pleasure of the comedy. In his rebuttal, Lessing used two arguments, one practical and the other tactical. The improbability would disappear if the living conditions under which the Jews suffered were improved. Why should education and wealth, which the traveler displayed, have less of a cultivating influence on a Jew than on a Christian? To add authenticity to his argument, he quoted from a private letter of a young Jew, Moses Mendelssohn, who was deeply offended by Michaelis's critique. In the years after Lessing introduced Mendelssohn to the literary sphere of the Enlightenment, he became a respected philosopher of the German and Jewish Enlightenment (Haskalah) and the most influential promoter of a Christian–Jewish dialogue.

This was the beginning of a lifelong and consequential friendship between Lessing and Mendelssohn. For friendship was the foundation of tolerance as it was from now on practiced in the philosophical discourse of the Enlightenment. One should, however, not overlook the fact that this dialogue was limited to a small group of intellectuals, of which Lessing and Mendelssohn formed the nucleus. At the end of his life Mendelssohn gratefully acknowledged that he had the good fortune “to have known some excellent men, who were not of my creed, as my friends.” And his correspondence with leading intellectuals of the German Enlightenment—Kant, Lessing, Nicolai, Herder, Abbt, Ramler, Sulzer, Dohm, and even Michaelis and Lavater—supports this statement. Browsing through the letters Mendelssohn exchanged with his Christian friends over 30 years one cannot only admire the openness and trust that bespeaks their friendships, but, even more important, how they transcended the confines of institutionalized religion, sustained toleration on the basis of natural religion, and advanced the cause of Jewish emancipation. Many Jewish intellectuals, maskilim like Gumperts, Herz, Wesseli, Maimon, Friedlaender, Bendavid, Ascher, and more, followed Mendelssohn’s example and enhanced this productive and emancipatory Christian–Jewish dialogue. Or, as George Mosse once observed, “Friendship was no temporary bond, but a solid and durable chain linking Christians and Jews.”

Moses Mendelssohn was a prominent 18th-century philosopher and the founder of modern German Judaism. He became an important voice for Jewish emancipation and for an end to discrimination against Jews. (Library of Congress)

Yet the friendship cult of the 18th century had another restriction that should be noted, if we are not to paint too harmonious a picture of the Christian–Jewish dialogue. One could encounter true, fair-weather, or even false friends. A case in point for this last contingency is Johann C. Lavater, a Swiss theologian and proselyte, who entered Mendelssohn’s life to start an interreligious disputation, first privately when he visited Mendelssohn, and then publicly when he published his translation of Charles Bonnet’s Untersuchung der Beweise fuer das Christentum (Investigation of the Evidence in Favor of Christianity, 1769) with a provocative dedication to Mendelssohn: either to refute Bonnet or convert. With friends like these who needs enemies? Without going into details of this well-known controversy, one can make two significant observations: first of all, Lavater fanatically interrupted the still fragile Christian–Jewish dialogue by dragging a merely tolerated Jew into a religious dispute that Mendelssohn despised, like any pilpul, and that also endangered his very existence in Prussia; second, that Mendelssohn’s Christian friends were appalled by this conversion attempt, agitated against Lavater, and forced him to apologize for his indiscretion.

Berlin, where Gentiles and Jews freely socialized at the end of the 18th century, became center stage for a wide-ranging Christian–Jewish dialogue. When the political climate seemed ripe for public discussions of reforms, Mendelssohn and his friends intensified the toleration debate by intervening on behalf of the Jews. The philosophical dialogue among friends spilled over into the public sphere by discussing the higher concerns of human dignity and rights. This was around 1780, when Lessing’s drama of toleration, Nathan der Weise (Nathan the Wise, 1779) and Christian W. Dohm’s treatise, Ueber die buergerliche Verbesserung der Juden (On the Civil Improvement of the Jews, 1781) were published, and when the Austrian Emperor Joseph II issued the Edict of Tolerance (1782).

Lessing’s play is famous for its centerpiece, Nathan’s Ring Parable, in which he argued in front of the Muslim Saladin that the three monotheistic religions, Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, share the same ethical values and should therefore tolerate each other. Equally important is the plot development of the drama, in which all main characters overcome their prejudices in tense and extensive dialogues, pronounce in the end the virtue of tolerance, and become friends.

Dohm’s discourse on the improvement of the civil status of the Jews, which was inspired by Mendelssohn, went beyond the toleration debate by arguing that the Jews could become useful citizens, as they were already in France and Holland, if the severe restriction of their living conditions was lifted. His reform project anticipated the Prussian Emancipation Edict of 1812, to which Wilhelm von Humboldt contributed an even more radical proposal that—in contrast to Dohm’s—would emancipate the Jews with no restrictions attached. This hopeful period for the Jews culminated in Emperor Joseph II’s Edict of Tolerance, which allowed the Jews of Lower Austria (Vienna) to attend schools and universities, practice all trades and professions, and establish their own businesses. It was praised all over Europe as a quasi-emancipation edict.

Friendship, dialogue, and tolerance laid the foundation for mutual respect and acceptance between Christian and Jewish intellectuals; the capstone, however, was the integration of the Jews into a Christian society, or civil rights for a minority. Nothing less was on Mendelssohn’s mind when he finally entered the toleration and/or emancipation debate. In three important contributions between 1782 and 1784 he developed his political philosophy.

First, he encouraged his friend Marcus Herz to translate Manasseh ben Israel’s message to Cromwell for readmission of the Jews to England (Vindiciae Judaearum, 1656), for which Mendelssohn wrote an introduction that he understood as an “appendix” to Dohm’s memorandum. In the preface of Rettung der Juden (Rescue of the Jews, 1782), Mendelssohn makes a small but significant correction of Dohm’s title page; instead of speaking of a “civil improvement” of the Jews he calls for their “civil acceptance,” which means—ever so cautiously hinted at—nothing less than civil rights and equality for the Jews. He supported Dohm’s assertion that the Jews would be productive citizens, as in Holland, if the edicts would not restrict their industry. However in arguing against excommunication and for freedom of conscience by using arguments of natural religion (“the prayer house of reason which should be open to everyone”), he left himself open to the criticism that soon followed. He had to answer his critics, and he did so in his book Jerusalem: Or on Religious Power and Judaism (1783). Therein his Confessio Judaica is embedded in natural law arguments for the separation of church and state, and it ends with an appeal for the right to be different. Freedom of religion and conscience are intertwined with pleas for toleration and civil rights.

This is also the hidden message of his final contribution to the debate “What is Enlightenment?,” which appeared in the Berlinische Monatsschrift in 1783–1784. After discussing the new concepts of enlightenment, culture, and Bildung (self-cultivation) as “modifications of social life [. . .] and efforts of men to improve their social conditions,” he concentrates on Bildung as the center of humanities destiny. Here he differentiates between the subject of the state as a human being and as a citizen. If these two essential aspects of human life are not in harmony, “the affairs of the state are lamentable.” Here he breaks off the argument and replaces it with a gesture of silencing, if not despair: “In this case philosophy puts a hand over its mouth . . .” Mendelssohn, who had pleaded from the beginning of his intellectual life for toleration and human rights, does not dare demand civil rights also, but the development of the thought and his aposiopese clearly point to what Mendelssohn had hoped for all along: the emancipation of the Jews.

The Christian–Jewish dialogue became a surrogate for the social connectedness of the Jews. As long as governments denied them their basic rights, this circle of friends constituted a utopia of intellectuals (Gelehrtenrepublik) in anticipation of a world without oppression, prejudice, and hatred. Participating in the discourse of the Enlightenment, the Jews could carry their struggle for emancipation into the public arena. They were no longer viewed as useful functionaries of absolutism, but more and more as productive intellectuals who contributed to the philosophical, educational, and literary discourses of the time—and, as George Mosse put it, to the “symbolic process of emancipation.”

Selected Bibliography

- Berghahn, Klaus L., ed. 1996. The German-Jewish Dialogue—Reconsidered. A Symposium in Honor of George L. Mosse. New York: Lang.
- Gilman, Sander, and Jack Zipes. 1997. Yale Companion to Jewish Writing and Thought in German Culture, 1096–1996. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Mendes-Flohr, Paul, and Jehuda Reinharz. 1995. The Jew in the Modern World. A Documentary History. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Mosse, George L. 1985. German Jews beyond Judaism. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Robertson, Ritchie, ed. 1999. The German-Jewish Dialogue. An Anthology of Literary Texts 1749–1993. New York: Oxford University Press.

Contemporary Judeo-Christian Communities in the Jewish Diaspora

David J. Rudolph

---

Messianic (Judeo-Christian) communities in the contemporary Jewish Diaspora are synagogues that believe in Jesus the Messiah and embrace the covenantal responsibility of Jewish life and identity rooted in Torah, expressed in tradition, renewed and applied in the context of the New Covenant. Messianic (Judeo-Christian) communities are significant in the contemporary Jewish Diaspora in part because they serve as a bridge between the synagogue and church and help to meet the unique needs of intermarried (Jewish-Christian) couples and their children. This entry will focus on how Diaspora Messianic Jewish congregations express their Jewishness and Messianic distinctiveness.

The Messianic Shabbat (Sabbath) service is more upbeat than the traditional synagogue service. Modeled after worship described in the Psalms of David, Messianic Jewish services commonly incorporate song, dance, and instrumental music, along with traditional Hebrew liturgy. Readings from the Torah and the New Testament are also typical. "Messianic services are joyful; singing and dancing are part of the experience, and there is an effusive vitality that is rarely felt in mainline synagogues or churches" (Feher 1998, 139). Although the average Messianic synagogue service has exuberant singing and dancing, some Messianic congregations follow a more classic synagogue model, based on the siddur (prayer book). High Holy Day services in Messianic synagogues also tend to be more traditional and replete with Hebrew liturgy.

Messianic (Judeo-Christian) communities observe all of the major Jewish festivals and distinguish themselves from other Diaspora Jewish communities by interpreting festival tradition in light of Yeshua (Jesus) the Messiah. This is in keeping with their philosophy that "Messianic Judaism is Judaism, in all facets of its teaching, worship, and way of life, understood and practiced in the light of Messiah Yeshua" (Kinzer 2001, 11). Rather than creating a new festival tradition, their philosophy is to enter into conversation with the present tradition and adapt it as needed to reflect their distinct Messianic beliefs. On Yom Kippur, liturgy from the mahzor (prayer book for the High Holy Days) is included in their services as well as other prayers that thank God for sending Yeshua (Cohn-Sherbok 2000, 118). The Sukkoth service typically includes the special parashoth (Torah readings) for the festival in addition to readings from the New Testament. Blessings are recited over the lulav (palm leaves as well as other species) and etrog (a citrus fruit), and Yeshua's celebration of Sukkoth is recalled (John 7; Cohn-Sherbok 2000, 110–111). On Hanukkah, Messianic rabbis encourage children to recall the story of the Maccabees and the lesson it holds for resisting assimilation in the present day. It is emphasized that Yeshua also celebrated Hanukkah (John 10:22). Messianic synagogues usually do not celebrate the birth of the Messiah during Christmas time (Harris-Shapiro 1999, 147). More commonly, his birth is remembered as a community event during Sukkoth, when the symbol of the sukkah (booth) reminds Messianic Jews of how God took on human form (as a Jew) and dwelled among his creation. Christmas is a “holiday that is sometimes celebrated at the individual level but is not part of the congregation’s communal festivities” (Feher 1998, 109).

In a Messianic synagogue, Passover is filled with Messianic meaning. Haggadoth (handbooks used at Passover Seders to guide families through the order of the ritual meal) focus on the Exodus of Israel from Egypt as well as the Exodus of humanity from sin and judgment through Yeshua the Messiah. Messianic Haggadoth compare the sacrificial role of the Passover lamb to the sacrificial role of the Messiah, and New Testament references to Yeshua’s celebration of Passover are highlighted. During Passover, Messianic Jews remove all leavened products from their homes and eat matzo (unleavened bread) in keeping with the Torah commandment. During this festival, Messianic Jews recall the words of the shaliach (apostle) Paul, “Don’t you know the saying, ‘It takes only a little hametz (leaven) to leaven a whole batch of dough?’ Get rid of the old hametz, so that you can be a new batch of dough, because in reality you are unleavened. For our Pesach (Passover) lamb, the Messiah, has been sacrificed. So let us celebrate the Seder not with leftover hametz, the hametz of wickedness and evil, but with the matzah of purity and truth” (1 Corinthians 5:6–8 in the Complete Jewish Bible [CJB], a Messianic Jewish Bible translation). Easter Sunday is not celebrated in Messianic synagogues. The Messianic Jewish celebration of Passover emphasizes the death and resurrection of the Messiah.

At Messianic Jewish life cycle events, readings from the New Testament are almost always incorporated. In the b’rit milah (covenant of circumcision) ceremony, reference is made to Yeshua’s b’rit milah on the eighth day (Luke 2:21). At bar/bat mitzvahs, a Messianic rabbi will typically remind the community that when Yeshua was 12, he was brought to the Temple where he amazed Jerusalem’s teachers by the questions he asked (Luke 2:41–47). At Messianic Jewish weddings, marriage under the chuppah (canopy) is often concomitant with an exhortation to Messianic Jewish husbands to selflessly lay down their lives for their wives in the same way the Messiah laid down his life for his congregation (Ephesians 5:25). Messianic Jewish funerals incorporate readings from the New Testament and emphasize the resurrection/eternal life that comes through believing in Yeshua the Messiah.

A common misunderstanding about Messianic (Judeo-Christian) congregations is that they put on a veneer of religious Jewish practice in order to missionize Jews. Although this is largely true of Hebrew Christian missionary organizations such as Jews for Jesus Messianic synagogues regard Torah observance as a matter of covenant responsibility and participate in their traditional Jewish heritage independent of their kiruv (outreach) efforts. Messianic congregations are committed to Jewish continuity because they believe God is committed to Jewish continuity. Contemporary Messianic rabbis, like their mainstream counterparts, recognize the dangers of assimilation and labor to convey Jewish identity to the next generation of Messianic Jewish families.

Messianic Jewish use of Hebrew expressions (even for New Testament terms) is in keeping with this spirit of resisting assimilation pressures in order to preserve Jewish identity. Jesus and the shlichim (apostles) were first-century Jews who taught in Hebrew. New Testament teaching was originally Hebraic. Messianic synagogues, therefore, see the use of Hebraic New Covenant terminology, such as the name “Yeshua” instead of “Jesus,” as the restoration of something that is historically accurate. It links Messianic Jewish families to their first-century roots. In her study of Messianic Judaism, Shoshanah Feher observed that “restoring the original” is a central focus of Messianic (Judeo-Christian) congregations:

Believers use the early church as a governing metaphor to reconcile Jewish and Christian symbols and to create a sense of historical community. Messianic Judaism has combed the past in order to create a new form of tradition . . . They make use of early texts, reading the Gospels and other first-century works, as well as tracing Jewish Christians through the centuries, in order to establish a symbolic social cohesion with roots in antiquity . . . Messianic Jews use ritual to create a sense of continuity. (Feher 1998, 112)

Additionally, like Reform and Reconstructionist communities in the Diaspora, Messianic synagogues engage in ritual formation by inculcating Jewish traditions with New Covenant meaning to express their distinct values:

Messianics are not the only ones to legitimate their Jewishness with religious ritual. Because ethnicity has been wrapped up in a religious container, one of the only ways to express Jewish ethnicity is through religious language . . . This would explain the use of Jewish ritual by groups who transform the meaning of the very rituals they use. The presence of the ritual confirms the Jewish ethnic orientation of the group, but the original meaning of the ritual has been altered to express the core values, not of traditional Judaism, but of the group utilizing the ritual . . . Liberal Jewish seders regularly transform the meaning of the traditional service from emphasizing the saving acts of God to the courage of humanity, as in the Reconstructionist Haggadah, which sharply elevates the role of humanity in the Passover story so too when Messianic believers sought to express ethnic continuity, they chose to infuse forms of Jewish life with new, Christological meaning. (Harris-Shapiro 1999, 174–175)

Many intermarried couples are drawn to Messianic synagogues because the Jewish-Christian gap is bridged (Cohn-Sherbok 2000, xii). Intermarriage tends to blur the traditional boundaries between Judaism and Christianity within the average family so that a quasi-Messianic Jewish religious expression naturally arises. Intermarried couples find common ground in Messianic synagogues. Children of intermarriage find a home where they can integrate their identities (Rudolph 2003, 56–59, 111–114). Messianic synagogues challenge the “law of excluded middle” by asserting that children of Jewish-Christian intermarriage can be simultaneously Jewish and believers in Jesus. For these reasons, Messianic (Judeo-Christian) communities are a very attractive option for intermarried couples and their children.

Today there are between 400 and 500 Messianic synagogues in the Jewish Diaspora. Rabbinic ordination is conferred primarily through two international umbrella organizations: the Union of Messianic Jewish Congregations and the International Association of Messianic Congregations and Synagogues. In addition to Messianic synagogues, there are established Messianic Jewish seminaries, Messianic day schools, Hebrew schools, and summer camps. There are Messianic Halachic councils, mohels (covenant surgeons), and benevolence organizations that work directly with the Israeli Knesset (national parliament). The Messianic (Judeo-Christian) community is one of the fastest-growing segments of the contemporary Jewish Diaspora.

Judeo-Christian Communities as an Internal Church Lobby

Diaspora Jewish leaders have long viewed Messianic (Judeo-Christian) synagogues as a threat to Jewish survival. But a compelling case can be made that Messianic synagogues are the most effective resource Diaspora Jewish communities have to influence Christians toward a love for Jews and Judaism, which indirectly reinforces Jewish continuity. Messianic Jews are regularly invited to teach seminars in the local church about the history of Christian anti-Semitism and the Jewish roots of Christianity. They impress on Christians that Jesus and the apostles were Torah-observant Jews who remained faithful to their people. They remind Christians of the Abrahamic promise that those who bless Israel will be blessed. Messianic synagogues are arguably Diaspora Judaism's front line of defense against church policies that arise from punitive and structural supersessionism. Because Messianic Jews are de facto members of Diaspora Jewish communities and members of the worldwide body of Jesus believers, they have influence and connections in places where non-Christian Jews lack clout. Loyal to the Jewish people and committed to Jewish causes (unlike Jewish converts to Christianity in the Middle Ages), Messianic Jews are the Jewish lobby within the church. Is it not in the interests of Diaspora Judaism to have a Jewish voice within the church? Christian recognition of the validity of Jewish existence within the church paves the way for Christian recognition of the validity of Jewish existence outside the church. Diaspora Jewish communities strengthen their voice within the church when they validate Messianic (Judeo-Christian) synagogues in their midst and weaken their voice within the church when they invalidate Messianic Jewish existence. Members of the Israeli Knesset have begun to work openly with National Messianic Jewish organizations in the recognition that Messianic Jews are a pro-Israel lobby within the church (e.g., the 2006 Knesset Project of the Union of Messianic Jewish Congregations). A day will come when Diaspora Jewish leaders will similarly recognize that Messianic (Judeo-Christian) communities uniquely serve kol Yisrael (all Israel) as the Jewish lobby within the church.

Selected Bibliography

- Cohn-Sherbok, Dan. 2000. Messianic Judaism. London: Cassell.
- Feher, Shoshanah. 1998. Passing over Easter: Constructing the Boundaries of Messianic Judaism. London: AltaMira.
- Harris-Shapiro, Carol. 1999. Messianic Judaism: A Rabbi's Journal through Religious Change in America. Boston: Beacon Press.
- Kinzer, Mark. 2001. The Nature of Messianic Judaism: Judaism as Genus, Messianic as Species. West Hartford, CT: Hashivenu Archives.

- Kollontai, Pauline. 2004. "Messianic Jews and Jewish Identity." Journal of Modern Jewish Studies 3 (2): 195–205.
- Kollontai, Pauline. 2006. "Between Judaism and Christianity: The Case of Messianic Jews." Journal of Religion and Society 8. <http://moses.creighton.edu/JRS/2006/2006-6.html>.
- Rudolph, David J. 2003. Growing Your Olive Tree Marriage: A Guide for Couples from Two Traditions. Baltimore: Lederer Books.

Jewish–Islamic Mutual Influences

Esperanza Alfonso

---

By the time of the rise of Islam in the Arabian Peninsula, the Jews had long been a people in Diaspora. In the 620s and 630s, the Jewish communities living on Arabian soil were firsthand witnesses to Muhammad's activities and to the early success of his supporters. After the Prophet's death in 632, the Islamic conquests would bring about a large-scale encounter between Jews and Muslims. In fact, within a few decades, and as a result of the remarkably speedy success of the Muslim armies far beyond the limits of the former Persian and Byzantine empires, about 90 percent of the Jewish communities in the world, including the most renowned cultural centers in Iraq and Palestine, found themselves under Islamic rule. Since its inception in the early 19th century, critical comparative scholarship in the fields of religion and culture has considered the Judeo-Islamic interaction to be one of the most fascinating instances of cross-cultural fertilization in premodern times.

Given its highly speculative nature, the inquiry into religious and cultural influences between Jews and Muslims is always elusive and at times controversial. Certainly this holds true in the case of the Judeo-Islamic encounter. In matters of religion, today's traditional Muslim scholars, for instance, look at the Koran as containing the original, authentic and uncreated divine revelation, regardless of the temporal precedence of the Bible. In their view, the question of influence is hardly meaningful. With respect to the modern critical study of religion and culture, the difficulty lies, on the one hand, in the scarcity of sources at the scholar's disposal and the quandary posed by those that are extant. In this regard, the problem is particularly acute for the formative period of Islam, as only snippets of information have come down to us from the first century after Muhammad's death. Moreover, authors of early materials, both Jewish and Muslim, were not historically minded and rarely concerned themselves with issues of religious or literary origins.

On the other hand, the difficulty in assessing religious and cultural influences between two or more groups relates to the scholarly understanding of the concept of influence itself. Beginning with Abraham Geiger, 19th-century Western scholars interested in the Judeo-Islamic world put forth a paradigm based on the ideas of "debtor" and "creditor" and the notion of direct influence from Judaism to Islam and vice versa. A first phase was customarily established in which Judaism was said to have exerted a strong influence on the emerging Islamic faith and culture.

After this early period of roughly 200 years, the direction of influence was deemed to have been reversed, as Judaism and Jewish culture fell under the influence of Islam. Without radically challenging this early model, and on the basis of the rich material found in the Cairo Geniza by the mid-20th century, S. D. Goitein began to conceive the Judeo-Islamic relationship in terms of parallels rather than influences. In his magnum opus, A Mediterranean Society, as well as in the numerous books and articles he published from the 1960s onward, Goitein used a term borrowed from biology, “symbiosis,” to describe the distinctive interaction taking place between Judaism and Islam, particularly in its classical period (the 11th to 13th centuries). Although originally used by Goitein in the context of law, the concept of symbiosis, denoting a far-reaching interpenetration between Jewish and Islamic cultures, has proven to be greatly influential in a wide range of comparative fields and to a large extent has not yet been superseded. Today, most scholars engaging in the comparative analysis of the two cultures at hand have moved away from the “borrowing-lending” paradigm. The methods prevalent in literary and historical criticism have contributed to a new understanding of how cross-cultural contact works and have brought fresh insights in many areas. In recent years, the impact of postmodernism in various disciplines has even led to overt questioning of the validity and usefulness of the comparative method itself.

Crucial to the Judeo-Islamic cross-cultural study since its beginnings, the issue of the formative period of Islam remains one of passionate scholarly debate. This interest is not unwarranted, as the contacts Muhammad maintained with Arabian Jews and the latter’s response to the Prophet’s mission actually set the terms for all future interaction between Judaism and Islam. The genesis of the Koran’s contents is to be framed within this context. Until the 1980s, studies abounded that sought to trace many characters, motifs, and themes in the Koranic and early Islamic traditions back to the Bible. The general view was that later materials clearly were indebted to earlier sources, and thus were less original. In the late 20th century, however, attention shifted from the identification of the underlying biblical sources to the specific Koranic development of and engagement with material that was also part of the Bible. Marilyn R. Waldman’s work on the Sūrat Yūsuf, for instance, took in this new approach. The Koranic story of Yūsuf was already known from the Bible. However, in spite of the common plot, Waldman argued that the two stories, biblical and Koranic, were different in style, used different theological and moral concepts, and addressed different audiences (Waldman 1985). Similarly, in a study of Moses as a character both in the Bible and the Koran, David Halperin claimed that divergences in the Koranic account might be well due not to the misunderstanding of the biblical source or to the Islamization of the biblical material, but to a particularly good understanding of it (Halperin 1995). Along the same lines, in his studies on the cycle of the Abraham-Ishmael legends, Reuven Firestone demonstrates that, in spite of the fact that the Koranic story has a precedent in the biblical account, it has a uniquely Islamic character (Firestone 1990). Furthermore, in the episode of the binding of Isaac, Firestone even suggests that the Koran might actually retain ancient material preserved in the isolated environment of the Arabian Peninsula, hence before the biblical account (Firestone 2000).

The question of origins notwithstanding, the fact that Islam, as a political system, created radically new conditions for Jewish economic, social, and intellectual development is undisputed. The new societal framework brought about by Islam was open enough to include a wide range of ethnic groups; moreover, the status of dhimma conferred upon Jews, Christians, and other “scriptural” religious minorities guaranteed them protection and stability while in Islamic territory. The rapid adoption of Arabic by the Jews of Islamic lands was crucial in facilitating communication throughout the Diaspora. Arabic united a wide range of Jewish communities culturally and gave their elites full access to a much larger intellectual world (Wasserstein 2001, 55–56). By the early 10th century, the centralized Jewish cultural hubs in Iraq and the Land of Israel began a progressive and irreversible decline, but new vibrant centers were being established in the East, North Africa, and the Iberian Peninsula. Thus, religious and cultural exchange between Jewish and Islamic societies continued to increase.

It has been argued that Jewish society in Islamic territory, even before the 10th century, was highly pluralistic. Thus, mainstream rabbinic Judaism, as envisioned by the rabbis in the academies of Iraq and the Land of Israel, was only one of several contending and coexisting Judaisms. Likewise, Sunni Islam was only one among several possible Islams. Many scholars concur in stressing that it was first and foremost within a sectarian atmosphere that contacts and cultural exchanges between Islam and Judaism took place. In the late 1970s, John Wansbrough pioneered the hypothesis that Islam emerged within a sectarian Jewish milieu (Wansbrough 1978). Conversely, Islam is thought to have been instrumental in the rise of

This Spanish synagogue in Prague demonstrates Islamic architectural influences. (Robert Lerich)

Karaism, a sectarian Jewish group that emerged by the mid-eighth century in Iraq and Persia. Although some scholars have understood the Karaites to be the continuation of Second Temple Jewish tendencies, the fact remains that they emerged in a specifically Islamic context and that Islam had a crucial impact on their laws and practices, namely, the change in calendar, the ritual of fasting, and the custom of facing a qibla directed toward Jerusalem while in prayer, to cite only a few examples (Lasker 1989). Furthermore, particular closeness has been observed between Karaites and Ismailis, an offshoot of the Shia. In a similar vein, Steven Wasserstrom has argued for a particular proximity between the Isawiyya, a sectarian Jewish group born in ninth-century Iraq and Persia, and the Shia. He contends that Shiite authors were biblicizing in their attitude toward the past, while Jewish authors often portrayed Alī and his followers in a positive way (Wasserstrom 1984). This affinity between sectarian groups in both Judaism and Islam led Wasserstrom to develop Goitein's idea of symbiosis a step further. Borrowing a metaphor from biology, as Goitein did, Wasserstrom speaks of "co-evolution," a model in which changes in species A prepare the field for the natural selection of changes in species B and vice versa. Both religions, in his view, could only define themselves in contrast to each other (Wasserstrom 1995, 10–11).

Within the framework of the comparative study of religion, but moving to a later period, Islamic mysticism, or Sufism, has also proven to have played a seminal role in the development of Jewish spirituality between the 13th and 15th centuries. The work of medieval classical Jewish authors, such as Bahya ibn Paqudah (1040?–1110?), Judah Halevi (ca. 1070–1141), and Abraham Maimonides (1186–1237) has long been studied in the context of a Sufi intellectual background. Moreover, Sufi Jewish circles were well known in North Africa, Egypt, and Palestine until at least the 15th century. As in many other fields, current studies do not seek to identify direct Sufi influences on medieval Judaism, but rather they try to reconstruct how the medieval Jewish religious sensibility developed in Sufi terms and within a Sufi atmosphere, that is, how Sufi language was used to express unmistakably Jewish content (Lobel 2000). Particularly noteworthy in this field is the specifically Shiite and Ismailis origin of concepts found in medieval Jewish sources, such as Judah Halevi's Kuzari (Pines 1980).

Both elements, sectarianism and mysticism, come together in the common interest shared by Jews and Muslims in eschatology and messianic speculation throughout the medieval period. The idea that the concept of redemption was foreign to early Islam, and that it only emerged in later times as a result of contact with Jews and Christians, has long been questioned. In a highly controversial work written in late 1970s, which further elaborates on Wansbrough's thesis, Patricia Crone and Michael Cook claim Islam has been messianic from its earliest times. Likewise, it is known that the Islamic conquest stirred up messianic hopes among the Jews, who predicted Muhammad and his followers would bring about the end of their exile. Political events, such as the Crusades, or the arrival of the Almohads to the Iberian Peninsula, periodically stirred up messianic anxiety among Jews and Muslims (as well as Christians). Hence, it was common for members of the three communities to exchange predictions and calculations for the purportedly imminent advent of the end-times.

Also related to the study of Islam and Judaism as religious traditions, the field of comparative law, traditionally neglected, has received a good deal of attention in recent years. As Gideon Libson explains in the most comprehensive study on Jewish and Islamic custom to date, scholarly attention has focused on the sources of law and the relationships between law and society (Libson 2003, 1–15). Libson rightly points out that Islamic law did not develop in the Arabian Peninsula but in second- and third-century Iraq, which places the Judeo-Islamic encounter closer to the center of Jewish culture, where it was subject to a greater degree of interaction. As in the aforementioned areas, parallel development, indirect influence, and common influence from a third source are also to be taken into consideration in this particular field of study (Libson 2003, 1–15).

Finally, and equally important, the encounter between the Jewish and Islamic civilizations took place in the context of literature and intellectual life. Here again, methodologies of study have changed the perspective on Judeo-Islamic culture in recent years. The initial focus of historians of Jewish literature had been on the literary text itself. In this regard, the adoption of Arabic for literary purposes among the Jews and their use of almost all Islamic literary genres was typically presented as a clear result of Arabo-Islamic influence; similarly, the use of Hebrew for poetry, the rejection of certain literary models, and the content of many works was seen as a sign of reaction, exhibiting a polemical intent. Among the many scholarly statements that have challenged this perspective in recent years, Rina Drory's work is worth noting, as she advocates the study of literature not on the basis of individual literary pieces but as a cultural institution. Instead of tracing specific motifs and literary elements to a given Judeo-Islamic source, as had long been customary, Drory reconstructs how and why the hierarchy of literary genres prevalent in the Judeo-Islamic context was introduced in medieval Jewish literature. It is her contention that Karaites were actually the first to be conversant with and to adapt the Arabic tradition, always in a selective way. Beginning with Sa'adia, the 10th-century gaon of Sura, Rabbinite authors soon followed suit. Drory presents this adoption of Arabo-Islamic literary practice as a solution to internal problems in both Karaite and Rabbinite Jewish cultures and not as a desire to imitate it or to react against it (Drory 2000). Along the same lines, within the specific context of the Medieval Iberian Peninsula, where contact with Arabic literature brought about the so-called golden age of medieval Hebrew literature, Ross Brann has argued that one cannot think of the Judeo-Islamic encounter as the meeting of two separate cultures, but instead one must see it as one in which the participants are members of a shared cultural experience (Brann 1991). In Iberia, Jewish authors adapted the most notable elements of Islamic culture, such as the use of the Koran in poetry and the idea of fasāhā or eloquence, as a literary standard, to rehabilitate Jewish literature and bring it to its highest degree of excellence.

Medieval sources provide evidence for Jews studying poetry with Arabs, for Muslims consulting rabbis on legal issues, and for shared study sessions open to Muslims, Jews, Christians, and other religious groups, where the only requirement was to appeal exclusively to reason (Kraemer 1992). It seems reasonable to suppose, therefore, that although Islam and Judaism might have been two separate yet interconnected religions, Muslims and Jews were active participants in a single common culture. The intellectual pursuits of Jewish scholars were determined largely by the Islamic milieu in which they lived. There is no doubt that these scholars' interest in the universal inquiries central to Greek thought and their fascination with natural sciences and medicine were shared by those of their Muslim (and Christian) peers. It must be emphasized, however, that engagement with the Bible, Rabbinic tradition, theology, and Jewish law was likewise a result of the importance of these categories of study within the Islamic intellectual sphere. Although at some points in history voices spoke out against the pursuit of certain disciplines considered to favor conversion, on the whole medieval Jews were able to use the cultural elements prevalent in the society in which they lived for the benefit of their own distinctive identity.

Selected Bibliography

- Brann, Ross. 1991. The Compunctious Poet: Cultural Ambiguity and Hebrew Poetry in Muslim Spain. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Crone, Patricia, and Michael Cook. 1977. Hagarism: The Making of the Islamic World. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Drory, Rina. 2000. Models and Contacts: Arabic Literature and Its Impact on Medieval Jewish Culture. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Firestone, Reuven. 1990. Journeys in Holy Lands: The Evolution of the Abraham-Ishmael Legends in Islamic Exegesis. Albany, NY: SUNY Press.
- Firestone, Reuven. 2000. "Comparative Studies in Bible and Qur'an: A Fresh Look at Genesis 22 in Light of Sura 37." In Judaism and Islam: Boundaries, Communication, and Interaction; Essays in Honor of William M. Brinner, edited by Benjamin H. Hary et al., 169–184. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Goitein, S. D. 1967–1993. A Mediterranean Society: The Jewish Communities of the Arab World as Portrayed in the Documents of the Cairo Geniza. 6 vols. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Halperin, David. 1995. "The Hidden Made Manifest: Muslim Traditions and the 'Latent Content' of Biblical and Rabbinic Stories." In Pomegranates and Golden Bells: Studies in Biblical, Jewish, and Near Eastern Ritual, Law, and Literature in Honor of Jacob Milgrom, edited by David P. Wright et al., 581–594. Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns.
- Kraemer, Joel L. 1992. "The Andalusian Mystic Ibn Hūd and the Conversion of Jews." In Israel Oriental Studies. Vol. 12, edited by Joel L. Kraemer, 59–73. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Lasker, Daniel L. 1989. "Islamic Influences on Karaite Origins." In Studies in Islamic and Judaic Tradition, vol. 2, edited by William M. Brinner and Stephen D. Ricks, 23–47. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press.
- Libson, Gideon. 2003. Jewish and Islamic Law: A Comparative Study of Custom during the Geonic Period. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Lobel, Diana. 2000. Between Mysticism and Philosophy: Sufi Language of Religious Experience in Juda Ha-Levi's Kuzari. Albany, NY: SUNY Press.
- Pines, Shlomo. 1980. "Shelomoh Shi'ite Terms and Conceptions in Judah Halevi's Kuzari." JSAI 2: 165–251.
- Waldman, Marilyn R. 1985. "New Approaches to 'Biblical' Materials in the Qur'an." MW 75, 1: 1–16.
- Wansbrough, John. 1978. The Sectarian Milieu: Contents and Composition of Islamic Salvation History. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

- Wasserstein, David J. 2001. "Islamization and the Conversion of the Jews." In Islamic Conversions: Religious Identities in Mediterranean Islam, edited by Mercedes García-Arenal, 49–60. Paris: Maisonneuve et Larose.
- Wasserstrom, Steven M. 1994. "'The Šī'īs Are the Jews of Our Community': An Interreligious Comparison within Sunni Thought." In Israel Oriental Studies. Vol. 14, Concepts of Other in Near Eastern Religions, edited by Ilai Alon, Ithamar Gruenwald, and Itamar Singer, 297–324. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Wasserstrom, Steven M. 1995. Between Muslim and Jew: The Problem of Symbiosis under Early Islam. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

The Widespread Phenomena of Marranism and Hidden Jews

Gloria Mound

---

Although largely discounted by historians, during the 19th and early 20th centuries there were numerous reports from travelers finding crypto-Jewish practices. This period followed the 17th and 18th centuries, which had seen the arrival in European Sephardi centers—such as Amsterdam, Livorno (Leghorn), and London—of formerly secret Jews applying to Jewish communities to reclaim their heritage. This occurred in numerous places around the world, such as islands of the Caribbean and Brazil during Dutch rule (1630–1654). This was the origin of the large Marrano presence there today. Secret Jews from Madeira and the Canary Islands started the sugar cane industry that was so long an important segment of its economy. In places like Jamaica, Curaçao, the Bahamas, and New York, these crypto-Jews sought to show that in spite of great dangers Jews had taught their children at least some of the Laws of Moses, in every generation. They wanted their children to marry only those of a similar background. Since most of the recorded instances referred to sparsely populated areas, this led to an erroneous belief that such practices were rare. Even though Marranos-Anusim seem to have been great travelers with widespread commercial ties, they divulged little of the hidden Jewish life continuing in their homelands for fear of discovery by the Inquisition.

Soon after the State of Israel was established in 1948, a sizable devoted Jewish community became known in Meshed, Iran (Persia), when they applied to immigrate to Israel, they were initially refused entry. The Persian Jews thought they were backsliders who had converted to Islam and had no idea that their identity had been kept a secret and that they married only within their community. Meshed is close to Russia, and the Bukharan Jews did what they could to help those in Meshed. Eventually, the Israeli Rabbinate was forced to acknowledge their appeals to immigrate. The rabbis marveled at the level of religious observance among Meshed.

As more information from diverse places became available, it became clear that in many parts of the world there were groups of Jews who had maintained an organized Jewish life throughout the generations. The advent of easier travel, television, and the Internet led to the awakening of the outside world to the continued existence of crypto-Judaism for more than 500 years in many isolated corners of the world. Many thousands of crypto-Jews have had the courage to break with the tradition of never speaking with strangers on the subject. Nevertheless, there is still much reluctance to speaking on the subject with outsiders, even if they are Jewish. They fear that doing so will lead to ostracism by friends and family.

Another factor has been the increasing interest in the subject of genealogy, the formation of Jewish genealogy societies throughout the world, and easier access to the topic on the Internet. Curiosity among those of Marranos-Anusim origin has been aroused. Many suspect they may have Jewish roots and are looking for confirmation. This is especially true among crypto-Jewish families who migrated and whose Jewish customs and traditions were no longer adhered to. Once such identity is established, there is usually a desire to know more about life in Israel.

One section of the converso community that is genealogically Jewish is the chueta of Majorca, in the Balearic Islands of Spain. In 1435, their ancestors were given an ultimatum: convert to Catholicism or depart the island. The majority left, most for North Africa; but 2,000, represented by 15 family names, decided to stay and convert. Nobody believed it was a sincere conversion and for the next 450 years no local priest would marry someone from a chueta family with a non-chueta. In the course of time, many of these conversos did become devout Catholics, but some continued their Jewish practices, many paying for it with their lives. Some converts escaped in the 16th and 17th centuries to safer locations in Europe like Salonika, Greece; Amsterdam; London; and Leghorn, Italy. Those who went to Salonika named their congregation after the place they came from. They held onto their identity and form of worship until the beginning of the 20th century. Jewish religious practices and customs continued in Majorca: 250 years after the forced conversion, in a garden on the outskirts of the capital, Palma de Majorca, the Inquisition found more than 200 chuetas conducting a Yom Kippur service on the correct day. Three of the organizers were burnt alive. Many years later, the editor of the New York Daily Forward, Ezriel Carlebach, who was in Palma on Kol Nidre night in 1930, witnessed such a secret service in the back room of a jeweler's shop in the Calle Plateria.

The chuetas, whether practicing Jews or Christians, were easily identified by their family names: Aguilo, Bonnin, Cortes, Forteza, Fuster, Marti, Miro, Pico, Pina, Pomar, Rey, Segura, Valls, and Vives. They were isolated by other Majorcans, thus remaining halachically Jewish, but half a century ago some intermarriages with Gentile families occurred.

If a stranger has an opportunity to speak to a Marrano, he or she will hear about the family's desire to keep the Sabbath and dietary laws. They also adhere to Sephardic naming customs: the eldest male child is named after the paternal grandfather and the first daughter is named after the paternal grandmother. The pattern is repeated for the second male and female children, who are named after the maternal grandparents. This naming custom was one of the last Judaic vestiges when little else that was Jewish remained. Another custom still practiced is that when sweeping a floor all the dust is swept toward the middle of the room. When asked why, throughout the Marrano Diaspora the answer is, "Out of respect for the mezuzah." If it is pointed out that the room has no mezuzah, one will be told that the mezuzah is within one's heart and mind. There are families where this custom is maintained, but no mention of a mezuzah is made, and the practice is seen as a family custom. This happens when parents have not informed their children of their likely Jewish origins. Other customs are treated in a similar manner, but in varying degrees. Traditions upon a death in the family include washing the body, covering mirrors, and staying in the home for seven days, while relying on friends and neighbors to bring food. Other customs are the veneration of Saint Eulalia, who is seen as personifying the biblical Queen Esther, and celebrating the festival of Purim four weeks before Passover, a date determined by checking the calendar against the moon. Purim is not seen as a joyous occasion, but as a three-day fast copying what Queen Esther did. Marranos-Anusim go to great lengths to avoid attention to their secret way of life. Outwardly they observe the local religion, yet underneath they try their utmost to conform to Jewish law. Fasting is used frequently because there is less chance of detection. If questioned, one could always excuse oneself from partaking of food by blaming an upset stomach. Another crypto-Jewish observance, now almost in disuse because today few people bake their own bread, was taking a piece of the baking dough and throwing it into the fire, usually accompanied by a blessing. In the Balearic Island of Ibiza, in case one was overheard by servants (the constant fear of secret Jews), the custom was to say "G-D bless the Jews, Moors, and Christians." Many went to great lengths to bake some kind of unleavened bread at Passover time, while in places like Belmonte, Portugal, where the baking was done and non-Jewish neighbors knew about the secret practices, the matzoth were not eaten on the first days of the festival for fear of being given away to the Inquisition. Today, Belmonte has an open Jewish life, a rabbi, and a synagogue; but in many villages on both sides of the nearby Spanish-Portuguese border, the majority of these practices continue and are still hidden from the outside world.

In many enclaves, young people often think of such rituals as being of family origin and only learn in later life of the Jewish connections. This situation is changing as young people study at universities, make new friends, and see open Jewish communities and Jewish student associations. What they thought were family customs turn out to be Jewish religious observances, leading them to question their ethnic origins.

For centuries it was believed crypto-Jewish settlers in Cuba and Puerto Rico had totally assimilated. It was accepted that the current Jewish community began at the end of the 19th century, with the Jewish influx from Salonika; but slowly in the recent years, more secret Jews, mostly young people who have left home for work or education, reacted as those in Iberia. They noticed similarities between Jewish customs in friends' homes and traditions within their own families, like family get-togethers on Friday nights, lighting of Sabbath candles, ways of naming children after grandparents, and mourning customs. Many young people began to question whether their family customs were Jewish in origin. Many of those who were not aware of their lineage, once informed, have come forward seeking to lead a Jewish life and applying to various Jewish organizations. It has emerged that there has been a continued Jewish existence and practice in nearly all the main Caribbean islands since the expulsion from Spain and Portugal. In addition to well-known Jewish communities on the tourist routes, small towns and villages have been discovered recently in Cuba and Puerto Rico with active Jewish communities. Much of this information was provided by new immigrants to the United States, where many have joined the Jewish community and others have settled in Israel. In Puerto Rico, the local government was surprised to learn of this hitherto unknown Jewish history. Recently, a group of young people opened a successful Jewish Internet chat site after which they decided to hold an exhibition. Within days of its opening, the organizers realized this was just the beginning of a long-hidden history. Over a period of 30 years, even before being aware of their Jewish roots, people reported being informed by their parents at a very early age that they were Isleneos or, sometimes, Nacion or Alcurnia. There was pride in describing to their offspring that they had special links to the Canary Islands and that it was from there that their ancestors found an eventual haven in the New World. They explained why the children were expected to marry only among these people. The Isleneos had their own form of the Hispanic language, a mix of Spanish, Portuguese, and Ladino. They formed societies of people with crypto-Jewish origins in South America, New Mexico, the Caribbean, Cape Verde, Newfoundland, and New Orleans. The New Orleans branch sadly lost much of its documentation with the destruction of its museum during Hurricane Katrina in 2005.

With its many islands, Cape Verde, long under Portuguese domination, was an isolated enclave where Jewish practices still survive. The Islands of São Tomé and Príncipe were the scene of tragic events. In 1493, 2,000 Jewish children between the ages of 2 and 12 were taken from their parents and sent there from Portugal because their parents could not pay the taxes levied by the king. After one year it was reported that only 600 remained alive, as so many succumbed to local pestilences. Yet nearly 200 years later, the Lisbon Inquisition sent out a priest to investigate reports of Judaizing there, which he did find. However, he was chased away by the local inhabitants. Today, local people who know of their antecedents are found lighting candles on Friday nights and observing other customs of Jewish origin.

Recently, taking into account the habits of Abraham Lincoln, there is an investigation that has already established some exciting evidence to suggest that he was possibly of Marrano stock. As the years go by, research on this and allied subjects will increase, binding closer the Jewish remnants around the world.

Selected Bibliography

- Braunstein, Baruch. 1952. The Chuetas of Majorca. New York: Ktav.
- Cesareni, David, and Gemma Romain, eds. 2006. Jews & Port Cities 1590–1990. London: Valentine Mitchell.
- Golden, Harry L., and Martin Rywell. 1950. Jews in American History. Charlotte, NC: Henry Lewis Martin.
- Hordes, Stanley M. 2005. To the Ends of the Earth—A History of the Crypto-Jews of New Mexico. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Institute for Marrano-Anusim Studies. Archives: Communication from Ron Rodriguez, Puerto Rico, February 13, 2005. Transactions of the Jewish Historical Society of England. Publications List. www.casa-shalom.com.
- Israel, Jonathan. 2002. Diasporas within A Diaspora. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.

- Lipski, John M. 1990. The Language of the Isleneos. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.
- Loker, Zvi. 1991. Jews of the Caribbean. Jerusalem: Misgav Yerusalym.
- Nastallah, Andrea K. 1998. "Crypto-Jewish Customs in Puerto Rico." Llave Magazine, March 1996. Reprinted in Casa Shalom Members Journal 1, no. 1 (1998).
- Vinas, Emanuel. 2003. "Communications from Rabbi Emanuel Vinas of New York." Casa Shalom Members Journal 5 (2).
- Vinas, Emanuel. 2005. "Communications from Rabbi Emanuel Vinas of New York." Casa Shalom Members Journal 7 (1).
- Wolf, Lucien. 1926. Jews in the Canary Islands. London: Jewish Historical Society of England.

Brazilian Marranism

Anita Waingort Novinsky

Translation by Mike Boyington

The Marranos' story in Brazil begins in the Iberian Peninsula where, after having lived culturally and socially integrated for 15 centuries, Sephardic Jews were declared second-class citizens by monarchical decree and infidels by the all-powerful Catholic Church. Their expulsion from Spain in 1492, their forced conversion to Catholicism in Portugal a few years later in 1497, the establishment of the court of the Holy Office of the Inquisition in 1536, and the diabolical and gory persecution of Portuguese people of Jewish descent all turned the Sephardic Jews once more into a wandering people and scattered them to the four corners of the earth. For these Jews, their lives were drastically changed and their destiny altered forever: it was a new Diaspora.

Insecure and stigmatized in their home country, many of the converted Jews and their descendents, known as New Christians, conversos, or Marranos, found refuge in the Brazilian New World, which they called the Promised Land. The Marrano history in Brazil should be understood first within the colonial context, because the converted descendants of Sephardic Jews (anussim in Hebrew) who came to the New World searching for a better or different life that held the possibility of escaping Inquisitional persecution underwent a completely different experience from that of the New Christians who converted back to Judaism in Italy, France, Holland, North Africa, the Levant, and elsewhere around the world.

Having crossed the Atlantic to Portuguese America, the New Christians rebuilt their lives within a radically different environment with other people who were also starting over. They transferred their economic techniques, commercial experiences, customs, and beliefs to a welcoming America, which they gratefully embraced. And today, with new research published in the past few years about the New Christians in Portuguese America, it is clear that they must be included among the builders of Brazil.

Brazil represents a real laboratory for Marrano studies. In Brazil the Marranos continued to follow the rituals and recount the sufferings of their long-established Jewish religion. They transmitted their understanding from one generation to another over three centuries. Recent discoveries show that Jewish practices are even followed among Brazilians today whose ancestors established settlements in the interior jungles, often without knowing their origin. Today, in large part because of modern communication and information available on the Internet, a Brazilian movement is developing: a return to the Marranos' Jewish roots. Though anthropological interest in families with Jewish customs in Rio Grande do Norte and Pernambuco contributed to knowledge about and created interest in the subject, much research remains to be done in other states of Brazil.

For 285 years, Portugal refused to entertain any departure from Catholic Church dogma. In fact, the Holy Office of the Inquisition was created by the king of Portugal, D. Joao III, uniquely and exclusively because of the "Jewish question." Accused of being false Christians and suspected of following the customs of the Jewish religion, every converso was at least potentially a criminal (a heretic). Practically speaking, this meant that any practice passed down through generations, even if it only pertained to domestic rituals and ceremonies, was enough to offer as evidence for the heinous crime of heresy.

The Holy Office was the grandest and most extensive bureaucracy of Portugal, but it had only one revenue source to finance its operations, which included hundreds of agents: confiscation. The Holy Office of the Inquisition supported its bureaucracy with the property of New Christians accused of Judaism. The Tribunal could only survive if there was a constant supply of victims. When a particular heresy diminished it had to be reinvented. Like modern totalitarian regimes (and even some democracies) the Inquisition had to create an enemy to legitimize and justify the system. The agents of the Inquisition were the Gestapo spies of the time. They operated throughout the Portuguese Empire—India, the Azores, and America—encouraging friends, neighbors, and business associates to bear witness against this "enemy within." Often the testimony was driven by jealousy and other personal considerations, and equally often, it was false. Not only was it dangerous to be a crypto-Jew, it was equally dangerous to be in any family that had former practitioners of Judaism who truly converted to Christianity.

Portugal also passed legislation that excluded Portuguese citizens with Jewish ancestors from all official (and thus, honorable) positions, and prohibited them from even having a superior education. Practically speaking, however, the legislation was inefficient because it only worked when there was sufficient interest to apply it. Often positions went to Jews both unknowingly and knowingly because particular applicants were preferred by those in authority. Sermons from the pulpit were the most influential channel through which the Portuguese people got this deeply anti-Semitic message. And during the Acts of Faith—celebrated mass spectacles that were attended not only by kings and the rest of the aristocracy but also by nearly the entire population—everyone turned out to see fellow citizens punished for a particular heresy. The heresy was being Jewish, or at least someone at some point in a family's history had been Jewish.

Historically, the Jews were the only people for whom a special court was created to investigate and punish their behavior and their ideas—and this court lasted three centuries. The persecution of the New Christians was an anti-Semitic program. To find the heresy (the crime), the inquisitors ordered their agents to identify the “origins” of every suspected Portuguese citizen. Hitler went back five generations but the Inquisition searched birth and family records for the preceding seventh and eighth generations to identify Jews. If current descendents were not actual practitioners of Judaism, they were likely ones, which amounted to nearly the same thing in determination of guilt.

Laws were continuously promulgated forbidding New Christians to leave Portugal, but even so, clandestine immigration to Brazil was uninterrupted. The everyday risk of exposure was great, and once exposed, torture and death were imminent. Clearly, the Inquisition’s goal was extermination of Judaism; it was an early model for the Holocaust.

During the reign of the House of Hapsburg, the Inquisition reinforced its functioning and became more organized and systematic, and its discriminatory politics in general were transferred to Brazil, where it came to include many peoples of mixed heritage (another model for Hitlerism).

However, the Dutch invasion of the northeast of Brazil in 1630 changed the social and religious picture of the country and the life of the New Christians. Jews arrived from Holland with the Dutch and influenced Marranos to return to the open practice of Judaism.

The religious tolerance the Dutch granted to the Brazilian Jews gave them hope of liberty and restoration of their personal dignity. Many New Christians in northeast Brazil returned to Judaism, circumcised their children, and even became practicing Orthodox Jews. A school, synagogue, and cemetery were established by the Jews of Pernambuco. The Inquisition was forbidden to act in Brazil’s Dutch Territory (which at one time included all of northeast Brazil), but in the remainder of the country the Inquisition’s agents were active and continued arresting. And once arrested, their victims were returned to Portugal and imprisoned. There, they were judged and sentenced and, if not executed, given life in prison or sentenced to slave labor on Portuguese galleys. Sometimes in special circumstances they were exiled.

The New Christians, including those living farther south in Brazil, played a fundamental role in the interplay between Portugal and Brazilian economic and financial worlds. In a time when the contacts were difficult—time consuming and exorbitantly expensive—the New Christians established a stronghold as intermediaries where confidence and trust were paramount; and it was linked by the members of particular families—all New Christians and/or Jewish—spread throughout strategic ports and trade centers of Europe and in the Americas. An exhaustive study of the amount of wealth confiscated by the Inquisition from the New Christians is still lacking, but it was significant by any measure. Ironically, the Inquisition—which was initiated and supported by the country’s royal family—was responsible for the exodus of large numbers of its population, and this exodus decimated the economic foundation of the Portuguese Empire.

Research has found that the Marranos in Brazil were engaged in many different professions and occupations, and in a few they were in the majority. It appears that all physicians in Brazil’s early centuries were New Christians, although officially New Christians were denied admittance to medical schools in Portugal. Other university-educated Marranos—writers, poets, lawyers, and well-educated businessmen—came to Brazil and represented the “learned class” in what was then a cultural wasteland. Their contribution to the cultural life of their new country was significant. However, the strongest attachment to Judaism in Brazil came from the lower middle class. In Rio de Janeiro, where the cultural level was much higher than in Paraíba, the Marranos were much less attached to religion of any kind.

In Brazil, as in Portugal, Marrano women were seen as the most dangerous element in the transmission of Judaism. The first crypto-Jewish women arrested for heresy in the 16th century were from Bahia, Brazil’s capital at the time. Their role was elemental in many respects, and it was for this reason that the majority of Brazilians arrested for heresy were women. In a world where most women were illiterate, Marrano women were mostly educated. Not only could they read and write, but they often played significant roles in their husbands’ businesses. They were knowledgeable in the affairs of their family and familiar with the outside world, and they passed on this knowledge to their offspring with accompanying opinions and criticisms.

The Portuguese literature of the time describes women in general as intellectually inferior to men, and the traditional portrayal of them as agents of Satan was common. However, a Portuguese chronicler who was usually representative of the official line, Duarte Nunes de Leão, in his work about the Kingdom of Portugal, dedicates three chapters of rapt description to the capacities of Portuguese women, writing about their achievements and courage and emphasizing their abilities in the arts and letters.

The Marranos drew their strength to keep together and to maintain their secret society from the home, and the home has always been the domain of women. The home was a vital factor and provided for the very survival of Judaism. From the family came the strongest force to revitalize Judaism. In their homes they followed religious ceremonies. Shabbat was the much cherished feast of the Marranos—and its practice one of the most serious crimes. They kept dietary laws and other rituals, and they observed Jewish holidays, especially Passover and Yom Kippur, which they called “the big day.”

During three centuries of the Inquisition, Jewish identity was transmitted by women relying on historical memory that they in turn transmitted to their children. These Brazilian Marrano women would have their memory reinforced by their mothers and other female relatives in Portugal or other countries from where they fled. By ship, letters would arrive from mothers and other relatives addressed to the New World. Inside the letters would be separate pieces of paper on which were written dates and events important for Jewish people to remember. “We were slaves in Egypt” one would say, and “There is only one God—the creator of the universe,” read another scrap received.

Without women’s participation, Marranism would have been impossible; because of women the numbers of the Inquisition’s victims were seriously reduced. In the first half of the 18th century, many Brazilian prisoners were women from Rio de Janeiro—167 women and 158 men. Once arrested, they were sent to Portugal. After torture and forced confessions most of these women were sentenced to life in prison, or allowed to reside in a certain village from where they were brought periodically before the Tribunal to give a “signal of Presence.” They were also forced to wear the sambenito, which was a sack over their clothes embroidered with devils and flames. However, two of the Brazilian women’s crimes were considered so serious that they were burned at the stake. Of the whole country of Brazil, reprisals against Marranos were severe. A total of 544 people were accused of Judaism. In Parailba the Inquisition virtually eliminated an entire crypto-Jewish community, most of them women.

After converting to Christianity, Marranos did not become equal to Catholics, but instead emerged as new pariahs. Even when the Jews lived as a free community in medieval, pre-Inquisition times and enjoyed a privileged situation in relation to the rest of Europe, they remained “tolerated” guests. The fact that after their conversion they belonged neither as Jews nor as Christians, and considering that they were forbidden to leave Portugal and could therefore not return to their Jewish origins, produced a tremendous tension in the Portuguese of Jewish descent.

The Portuguese and Brazilian Marranos who were discriminated against from birth were psychologically affected by it. Intolerance in the Portuguese Empire was expressed at all societal levels; the Portuguese did not allow or accept the “different” and pushed the converted Portuguese to society’s margins. The Marranos were forced to build a world of their own—the world of the “Secret.” They were forced to live two lives: one external, in which all Catholic strictures were observed, and the other internal, private, where they followed the customs passed down from their ancestors.

“Marranism” was a phenomenon that expressed itself differently depending on where it was practiced. In Brazil it had specific characteristics, which changed further within Brazil, depending on the area. There was no unique behavior that was practiced everywhere in Brazil and considered part of every ceremony. Many different expressions of Marranism were found in Brazil and throughout the South American continent. However, even in the diversity of expression there are similarities. A particular practice may have changed—evolved—through the generations, but still it is not difficult to identify the ritual, the practice’s ancestor, so to speak, from which it sprang. In other words, over time, and without rabbinical schools and books that would have helped keep practices “pure,” variations multiplied.

Much has been written in recent years about Marranos and Marranism, much of it contradictory. Rather than shedding light on heretofore secrets, recent work has mostly led to confusion. The old polemic that asked whether the Marranos were really Jews no longer has much meaning to scholars in the field, at least not after new research revealed the real measure of the phenomenon and the many shapes of Marranism. Often, even if Marranos did not celebrate Jewish holidays or even if they were unbelievers, they were Jews.

What is now known is that although not all New Christians were Jews, all Marranos certainly were. And further, it can now be categorically stated that Marranism does not always mean someone who practices Judaism in secret. To many Marranos, Jewish practices do not equate with religious posture. Still, one thing remains and is the signifier of the whole phenomenon that unites them all. It is “The secret society.” Real believers, atheists, and skeptics all belonged to the secret society that spread throughout the jungles and cities of colonial Brazil. What linked those different mentalities and several socioeconomic classes was their identity. They all together “did not belong” to the greater society. They went to church without believing. They confessed, lying, and at the Eucharist, they did not swallow. Their secret and their identity made them different, at least to themselves—but in the secret societies they referred to themselves as “us,” and in these societies they belonged.

The term “Marrano” is today part of a political and religious debate in Israel and throughout the Diaspora. Psychologists, anthropologists, philosophers, and psychoanalysts are paying attention to the Marrano dual personality. Edgar Morin, Richard Popkin, Miguel Abensour, Jacques Derrida, Antonio Damasio, and Jean Pierre Winter have all tried to interpret the psychological consequences produced by the ambiguous life, the dual personality, and the Marranos’ living their lives as pariahs.

A Marrano lived in constant turmoil with this dual identity. The main society in which Marranos made their way discriminated against them and excluded them when it could. But the secret side of society welcomed the Marranos, and it was only in this secret society that the Marranos felt a sense of belonging. This ever-present ambiguity captured Marranos in a vortex of two-world uncertainty: the Christian and the Jewish. The Marranos swam in a sea of fluctuatio animi, so well characterized by Spinoza (Ethics III). Jean Pierre Winter gives us an apt diagnosis of the Marrano when he writes that Jews not being tolerated for what they were had to pretend to be what they were not in order to preserve what they believed they were. This gave to the Marrano experience an extraordinary actuality. Philosophers, psychoanalysts, and anthropologists found that traces of the Marranos’ “being,” “ideas,” and “conflicts” can be found among their descendents even today. The spirit of Marranism can be found in Montaigne, Spinoza, Tirso de Molina, and even Freud. With new research and new interpretations of previous studies of Marranism, today researchers can better understand the psychological consequences of the tragic Inquisitional period. The Inquisition forced Portuguese and Brazilian people of Jewish descent to live divided, always pretending, lying, changing family names, and using word play with the Inquisition and with nearly everyone they encountered in their day-to-day lives.

Reality could not be shown as it was, but as the Marranos pretended it was. The Marranos never exactly knew what to want or even what to say, especially in the Inquisition’s interrogation process. The face of the inquisitors was where the Marranos took their cue. Sometimes they confessed and sometimes they refused or remained silent. Sometimes after confessing, a Marrano would deny the confession. The Marranos did not know which direction to take—because any option could bring death.

Until recently, neither Brazilian nor Portuguese Marranism has been studied from philosophical and psychoanalytical perspectives. However, with new and emerging research about Brazilian Marranism, researchers understand that because the Marranos could not assume their full and substantial identity they were thrown into a state of alienation. It was only by subverting their true and full self that they could function in a world where centuries had taught them that there was no place for Jews.

Selected Bibliography

- Kaysersling, Meyer. 1971. História dos Judeus em Portugal. Translated from the German by Gabriele Borchardt Corrêa da Silva and Anita Novinsky, with an introduction and notes by Anita Novinsky. São Paulo: Editora Pioneira.
- Novinsky, Anita. 1972. "A Historical Bias: The New Christian Collaboration with the Dutch Invaders of Brazil (17th century)." In Proceedings of the V World Congress of Jewish Studies, vol. II, 141–154. Jerusalem: World Union of Jewish Studies.
- Novinsky, Anita. 1982. "Some Theoretical Considerations about the New Christians Problem." In Sephardi and Oriental Jewish Heritage, edited by Issachar Ben-Ami. Jerusalem: Magness Press.
- Novinsky, Anita. 1987. "Jewish Roots of Brazil." In Jewish Presence in Latin America, edited by Judith Laiken Elkin and Gilbert W. Merckx, 33–44. Boston: Allen A. Unwen.
- Novinsky, Anita. 1989. "Sephardim in Brazil: The New Christians." In The Western Sephardi, vol. II, edited by Richard Barnett and Walter Schwab, 431–444. Grennton, UK: Gibraltar Books.
- Novinsky, Anita. 1992. Cristãos Novos na Bahia. 2nd ed. São Paulo: Editora Perspectiva.
- Novinsky, Anita. 1992. "Father Antonio Vieira, the Inquisition and the Jews." In The Frank Talmadge Memorial Album Jewish History, vol 1, edited by Ephraim Karnafogel, 151–162. Haifa: Barry Walfish.
- Novinsky, Anita. 1992. "Les Marranes, le Judaïsme Laique dans le Nouveau Monde." Panoramic-Juifs Laiques. Du Religieux Vers le Cultural 7: 92–96.
- Novinsky, Anita. 1993. "Nouveau-Chrétiens et Juifs Sefarades au Brésil." In Les Juifs D'Espagne-Histoire d' une Diáspora, edited by Michel Abitbol and Henry Méchoulan, 653–672. Paris: Liana Levi.
- Novinsky, Anita. 1996. "An Account of the Cruelties Exercised by the Inquisition in Portugal." In Found It at the John Carter Brown Library, edited by Hans Staden, 82–91. Providence, RI: Scholars and Sources.
- Novinsky, Anita. 2000. "A Critical Approach to the Historiography of the Marranos in the Light of New Documents." In Studies of the History of Portuguese Jews, edited by Israel J. Katz and Mitchell M. Serels, 107–118. New York: American Society of Sephardic Studies.
- Novinsky, Anita. 2001. "Marranos and the Inquisition: On the Gold Route in Minas Gerais." In The Jews and the Expansion of Europe to the West, 1450–1800, European Expansion & Global Interaction, vol. 2, edited by Paolo Bernardini and Norman Fiering, 215–241. New York: Berghan Books.
- Novinsky, Anita. 2001. "Marranos and Marranism. A New Approach." Journal of the World Union of Jewish Studies 40: 5–20.
- Novinsky, Anita. 2002. Inquisição, Prisioneiros do Brasil. Rio de Janeiro: Editora Expressão e Cultura.

Languages of the Diaspora

Characteristics of Jewish Languages

David M. Bunis

---

Before the modern era, Jewish languages arose wherever Jewish groups adopted for their everyday use a language spoken by co-territorial non-Jews. In Europe, Jews developed distinctive varieties of Romance, Germanic, and Slavic languages; in the Near East, Middle East, and North Africa, they evolved unique varieties of Aramaic, Greek, Persian, Arabic, Romance languages, Berber, Turkish, Georgian, and others. In many instances, the association of these distinctive languages with their Jewish speakers led them to be called “the Jewish language” by Jews and non-Jews alike. For example, the language of Eastern European Ashkenazim was known as Yiddish among its native speakers and as Żidowski among Poles; the language of the Sephardim of the former Ottoman Empire, today often known as “Judeo-Spanish” or “Ladino,” was traditionally called Djudézmo or Djidyó among native speakers and Yahudice among Turks. In one form or another, some Jewish languages, such as Jewish Aramaic and Jewish Greek, have been spoken since antiquity, while others, for example Yiddish, Judezmo, and Jewish Arabic, came into existence in the Middle Ages or later. At their height some Jewish languages had impressive numbers of speakers: before World War II several million Jews spoke Yiddish, over a million spoke varieties of Judeo-Arabic, and half a million spoke Judezmo. All three of these languages continue to survive. Other Jewish languages had more modest speech communities; some of them have disappeared, and others are on the verge of extinction.

While incorporating many features of the source languages, the Jewish correlates tend to differ from them in several respects and, as a group, to share certain common features. One reason for this is that, wherever they went, Jews established their own communities, retained a distinct religious and ethnic identity, and maintained at least partial legal autonomy in religious matters. Since ancient times, a key role in the propagation and preservation of the distinctive Jewish religion and lifestyle has been played by Hebrew and, to a lesser extent, Aramaic, the oldest Jewish languages. Sacred texts and formal prayers were read in Hebrew, and correspondence was often maintained in Hebrew, thus necessitating literacy in Hebrew among the learned. The Hebrew alphabet was traditionally used to write Jewish languages as well. Because of their centrality in discussions connected with Jewish civilization, Hebrew roots, words, expressions, and even grammatical elements were incorporated within everyday Jewish language speech and writing, and especially in the language of rabbinical scholars. For example, the annual preoccupation with the laws governing Passover led to the borrowing in Jewish languages of the Hebrew verbal root b-d-q “to verify, search,” reflected as Yiddish bátkenen, Judezmo badkár, and Judeo-Arabic bdag, all meaning “to search” (especially for leavened food before Passover). All three verbs illustrate the “fusion” nature of Jewish languages, which synthesize elements from diverse stock languages into a unique new whole.

Papyrus document in Aramaic, dated July 3, 449 BCE, found on Elephantine Island in Egypt. (Brooklyn Museum/Corbis)

In these three verbs, the base or root belongs to the Hebrew component, and the suffixes or verbalizing pattern derive from the principal components of the languages: Germanic in Yiddish, Hispanic in Judezmo, and Arabic in Judeo-Arabic. Despite many parallels, there are numerous divergences in the Hebrew components of Jewish languages, reflecting differences in the traditional pronunciation of Hebrew among the diverse Jewish subcultures, preferences for different grammatical forms, lexical items and their meanings, the influence of certain Hebrew sources over others, and the relative extent of the impact of Hebrew on the various Jewish languages.

Another factor explaining differences between Jewish languages and their non-Jewish correlates is the divergent history of their speakers. For example, by the 11th century, when Jews from Italy and France migrated to Germanic lands and began to speak what was to become Yiddish, Germans had already resided there for centuries. Although adopting many elements from local German dialects, the Jews retained some words from their historical pre-languages, medieval Jewish Italian, and Jewish French, such as béntshn, “to say the grace after meals,” and léyenen, “to read from the Torah.” When the Moors conquered Spain in 711, Jewish Ibero-Romance speakers adopted a judaized form of Arabic. As Spanish Christians retook Spain during the Reconquista, the Jews again returned to Ibero-Romance; but they retained some distinctive Judeo-Arabisms, including alhád, “Sunday” (literally, “first day”), which they found more acceptable than the Spanish domingo, known by them to derive from the Latin dominica dies, “Lord’s day,” an allusion to Jesus and thus incompatible with Jewish belief. To denote “Torah study,” the Jews of Spain and other Romance lands used reflexes of meletáō, “to contemplate,” preserved from the Jewish Greek their ancestors had used in the Roman Empire. Derived verbs such as the Judezmo meldár, the Judeo-French miaudér, and the Judeo-Italian meletáre stood in opposition to Romance reflexes of Latin legere, such as Old and Middle Judezmo leér, which denoted “reading” in general. This opposition did not exist in the non-Jewish correlates. In modern Judezmo, leér was abandoned entirely, and the distinctive meldár was used for “reading” of any kind.

In addition to elements retained from their pre-languages, Jewish language speakers preserved some elements once shared by Jewish and Gentile correlate languages, which eventually became obsolete in the latter; for example, the Judezmo solómbra, or “shadow,” was supplanted in Castilian by sombra. But Jewish languages were often innovative as well: for instance, compared with Castilian, Judezmo exhibited novel changes in its sound system (compare the Castilian tardar, “to delay,” and suegro, “father-in-law,” with the synonymous Judezmo tadrár and s-hwéyro/sfwéyro), its grammatical system (cf. Castilian tardé vs. Judezmo tadrí for “I delayed”), and its syntax (e.g., the Castilian su madre [de ellos] vs. the Judezmo sus madre for “their mother”). Jewish language speakers coined new words that did not exist in the non-Jewish correlates, such as the Judezmo konsográr, “to become related through marriage” (cf. Spanish con, “with,” + suegro, “father-in-law”). Jews borrowed material from the non-Jewish correlates selectively, so that some words and grammatical elements that were limited to a particular region in the non-Jewish correlate came to enjoy much wider use among Jews. For example, the widely distributed Yiddish diminutizing/plural suffix -ekh, as in kínderlekh, “children,” corresponds to a German suffix whose use was restricted to a part of Bavaria. Historical events and social change sometimes affected Jewish and non-Jewish correlate languages differently, as when an influx of Arab Bedouin in Baghdad prompted native Muslim residents to accommodate to features of Bedouin speech, but it did not have the same effect on native Jewish Arabic speakers. It is possible that in many such instances Jews used distinctiveness of language as a strategy meant to ensure the maintenance of religious, social, and cultural boundaries between themselves and members of neighboring societies who spoke a similar language. If so, they would have intentionally maximized the differences between their own language and its non-Jewish correlate as a form of negative accommodation to the surrounding culture, in order to preserve their own “nationhood.”

Through their own choice or by force, speakers of Jewish languages occasionally left the locales in which their languages had arisen, and they continued to use them in new settings. Contact with new peoples and languages led to mutual linguistic and cultural borrowing. Yiddish was enriched through contact with Slavic languages in Eastern Europe, just as Judezmo benefited from interaction with Turkish speakers in the Ottoman regions. Borrowings naturally included names for local flora, fauna, and elements of material culture. Some of the latter came to play an integral role in local Jewish culture, such as the borrekíta or “small filled pastry” (cf. Turkish börek + Spanish diminutive -ita) and the blínts(e) or “filled crêpe” (cf. Russian blin, Ukrainian mlyntsi) associated among Judezmo speakers and Yiddish speakers, respectively, with Jewish festival cuisine. But many borrowings were of a more abstract, often affective nature, for example, the Yiddish verb zháleven, meaning “to stint, begrudge” (cf. Slavic analogues such as Polish zátować, Russian zhalovaty + German-origin verbalizing -en), and the Judezmo verb ezvacheárse, meaning “to give up” (cf. negativizing Judezmo ez- [Spanish des-] + Turkish vazgeç- + Judezmo/Spanish verbalizing -ear + reflexive -se). The deep-level incorporation of local linguistic material is illustrated in the borrowing of suffixes such as the synonymous agent-forming -nik in Yiddish (cf. Polish -nik) and -djí in Judezmo (Turkish -ci). These are illustrated in the Yiddish khnífenik and Judezmo hanupadjí, both meaning “flatterer, hypocrite” and deriving from Hebrew words meaning “flattery” (ḥanifa [Ashkenazi khnife], ḥanupa). In many areas where Jews and Gentiles interacted, some non-Jews acquired knowledge of the local Jewish language. This resulted in borrowings into the language of the host society, such as the Turkish haham, meaning “rabbi,” and havra, meaning “synagogue; (fig.) noisy place,” reflecting the Hebrew words ḥakham, or “wise man, scholar,” and ḥevra, or “organization,” as pronounced thus and used in those senses in Judezmo.

In their places of origin, and especially when transplanted to new locales, Jewish languages often had dialect geographies distinct from those of the non-Jewish correlates. Yiddish existed in three main varieties: Eastern and Central Yiddish, spoken in Slavic territory, and Western Yiddish, retained in German-speaking areas. The unique Hispanic varieties used by the Sephardim in the modern era may be divided into the Eastern or former Ottoman dialects, and the Central, or European, dialects (mainly of Italy and Austria), where the language was often called Djudezmo; and the Western or North African dialects, where speakers called their language Ḥakitía. In the case of both Yiddish and Judezmo/Ḥakitía, each major dialect region was subdivided into smaller ones, with distinctive phonology, grammar, lexicon, syntax, and semantic systems. In Eastern and Central Yiddish the influence of Slavic was pronounced, while in Western Yiddish it was absent. In Eastern Judezmo there was considerable influence from Turkish, whereas Ḥakitía underwent enrichment through borrowing from North African Arabic. None of the Yiddish or Judezmo/Ḥakitía dialects bore an exact resemblance to any of the regional dialects of German or Yiddish.

In addition to the more ordinary forms of Jewish languages used in everyday speech and writing, several special varieties developed. Jewish education traditionally focused on Hebrew and Aramaic texts such as the Bible and Talmud, and children were taught to translate portions of them with extreme literality, preserving the original word order, using archaic vocabulary, and avoiding Hebrew-Aramaisms. This sacred-translation variety was known as Taytsh among Yiddish speakers, Ladino among Judezmo speakers, and Sharḥ among Judeo-Arabic speakers. A typical example is the Ladino translation of the phrase introducing the ethics of the Fathers: Tódo Yisraél ay a éyos páрте a el múnдо el vinyén (literally, “All Israel there is to them part to the world the coming”), which is an archaizing calque translation of the Hebrew Kol Yisra’el yesh la-hem ḥeleq le-’olam ha-ba, that is, “All Israel has a share in the World-To-Come.”

Commercial and social interaction often brought Jews into contact with non-Jews, some of whom understood their language. In situations perceived as potentially dangerous or disadvantageous, Jews prevented Gentiles from understanding their language by using a secret variety. Known among Yiddish speakers as loshn kóydesch and among Judeo-Persian speakers as lotoraí, its core consisted of a larger than usual percentage of Hebraisms, including many words not used in everyday speech. In addition to Hebrew words designating prices and names and qualities of merchandise, such varieties incorporated warnings such as the following used in Yiddish: “Daber nit, vayl der orl is meyvn kol dibur,” or “Don’t speak, because the Gentile understands every word” (compare the Ashkenazi Hebrew dabeyr, or “speak,” oreyl, or “Gentile,” and meyvin kol dibur, or “understands every word”).

The modern era brought heightened interaction between Jews and the host society, pressure on the Jews to integrate within it, and an increasing desire on the part of Jews to do so. Among the linguistic results of the ensuing assimilation were the writing of Jewish languages in non-Jewish alphabets; more intensive borrowing from the local languages, and from prestigious international languages such as French, Italian, and English; code-switching between Jewish and non-Jewish languages; a growing tendency to perceive Jewish languages as “jargons” and “Judeo” languages; and eventually a serious decline in their use.

Recognizing the danger of the imminent extinction of these cultural treasures, which reflect the unique intellectual and social development of Jewish communities in the Diaspora over the past centuries, community members as well as academicians in many parts of the world are now engaged in an urgent campaign to document, research, and teach Jewish languages to ensure their preservation for future generations.

Selected Bibliography

- Alvarez-Pereyre, Frank, and Jean Baumgarten, eds. 2003. Linguistique des langues juives et linguistique générale. Paris: CNRS.
- Bar-Asher, Moshe, ed. 1988. Studies in Jewish Languages. Jerusalem: Misgav Yerushalayim.
- Fishman, Joshua, ed. 1981. The Sociology of Jewish Languages. The Hague: Mouton.
- Fishman, Joshua, ed. 1985. Readings in the Sociology of Jewish Languages, Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Morag, Shelomo, Moshe Bar-Asher, and Maria Mayer-Modena, eds. 1999. Vena Hebraica in Judaeorum Linguis: Proceedings of the 2nd International Conference on the Hebrew and Aramaic Elements in Jewish Languages, Milan: Università degli Studi di Milano.
- Paper, Herbert H., ed. 1978. Jewish Languages: Theme and Variations, Cambridge, UK: Association for Jewish Studies.

Varieties of Diaspora Languages

John Myhill

---

Jews living in the Diaspora have spoken a great variety of languages, which they initially learned through contact with non-Jews speaking these languages. The earliest Diaspora languages for which there are records of Jews having switched to speaking were Aramaic, particularly among Babylonian Jews who were exiled after the destruction of the First Temple in 586 BCE, and Greek, particularly in Egypt even before Alexander conquered the homeland in 332 BCE. Since then, Jewish communities have frequently switched their spoken languages, adopting the language of new conquerors of the areas they have lived in or the dominant group in areas to which they have moved. Thus, for example, Jews in the Middle East generally switched from speaking Aramaic to speaking Arabic/Judeo-Arabic in the 200 years after the Arab conquests in the seventh century; Jews in Ashkenaz—today associated with Germany—switched from speaking a Jewish version of either a Romance language, a Slavic language, or Aramaic to speaking German/Yiddish (there is some controversy over this matter) around the 11th century; and Jews on the Iberian Peninsula switched from speaking a version of Arabic to speaking a version of Spanish in the course of the Reconquest of the Peninsula by the Romance-speaking Christians, particularly between the 12th and 14th centuries. In modern times, immigrant Jewish communities have generally adopted the spoken language of the countries to which they have moved (e.g., English or French)—with varying degrees of distinctiveness from Gentile usage—in the generation after their arrival.

But while one may say that Jews have frequently switched to speaking new languages that they learned from neighboring non-Jews, there has been considerable variation in the extent to which Jewish individuals and groups have spoken the same language in the same way as non-Jewish individuals and groups. Some American Jews today, for example, speak English with no distinctive Jewish characteristics, but others sprinkle their English speech with words and grammatical structures that are identifiably “Jewish,” borrowed from Hebrew, Yiddish, or Aramaic. Through history, however, there have been many cases in which Jews have spoken in a much more distinctive way. For example, this is true of Yiddish itself, which can be understood as being a “kind of German” albeit with a large number of features distinguishing it from the German of non-Jews, including many borrowings not only from Hebrew and Aramaic but also from other languages, particularly Slavic, and even features of grammar and pronunciation—or at least combinations of features—that are not found in the usage of non-Jews.

It has become increasingly common in recent times to refer to particular distinctive Jewish speech forms as being languages, “Jewish languages,” in their own right rather than as dialects of non-Jewish languages; thus, for example, Yiddish is today more or less universally considered to be an autonomous language rather than “bad German,” as it used to be. This trend toward recognizing distinctive Jewish languages can be traced at least to the second half of the 19th century, but it did not really become a mainstream view until after the World War II. In some cases, hyphenated names such as “Judeo-Spanish” or “Judeo-Arabic” are used, suggesting some degree of autonomy from the non-Jewish language while at the same time acknowledging the relationship between the two; on the other hand, the same linguistic entities may be referred to with entirely distinctive names (e.g., Judeo-Spanish is often referred to as “Ladino”). Of course, even for cases in which there were Jews who spoke a version radically different from that of Gentiles, there were often other Jews who clearly spoke the Gentile version of the language (e.g., German as opposed to Yiddish), and in individual cases it was not always clear whether a given person at a given time was speaking the Jewish version or the Gentile version, because the borderline between the two—as with any two closely related languages—was not really clear; nevertheless, in modern times at least, a distinction has in principle been made. On the other hand, it is generally perceived that Jews today do not speak, for example, English, Russian, or Hungarian today in a sufficiently distinctive fashion to warrant speaking of “Judeo-English,” “Judeo-Russian,” or “Judeo-Hungarian.”

Jewish languages have most obviously been distinctive in terms of borrowings from other Jewish languages and using the Hebrew-Aramaic alphabet, and there have been debates about whether either or both of these features are necessary or sufficient conditions for something to be considered to be a Jewish language. But in many cases there have also been systematic and general differences in grammar and pronunciation between Jewish and non-Jewish versions of a language; it must be said that these differences have been more systematic and general in some cases than others, but on the other hand the same arguments can be made about distinctions between non-Jewish languages such as Russian and Ukrainian, or Norwegian and Swedish, if these terms are understood to refer to the languages in general rather than only the standard form of the language.

The basic idea of the concept of a Jewish language of the Diaspora, then, is that it should be distinctive from the non-Jewish language to which it is related. But a deeper analysis shows that the situation is more complicated—and more interesting—than this. There is no clear and universal understanding of how distinctive two speech forms must be in order to be considered to be two different languages rather than two varieties of the same language; this is determined in each case by social and political factors. Thus, for example, Norwegian, Swedish, and Danish are considered to be distinctive languages, even though they are mutually intelligible, and the same is true of Russian, Ukrainian, and Belarussian; on the other hand, many dialects of Arabic are not mutually intelligible, and the same is true of Italian and German (even excluding Yiddish). Where there is linguistic similarity, the answer to the question of whether related speech forms are considered to be different languages or dialects of the same language is determined in each individual case according to individual factors not directly related to language, so that while it is certainly true that Yiddish, Judeo-Spanish, and Judeo-Arabic are more distinctive from the corresponding Gentile speech forms of these languages than are the Jewish versions of English, Russian, and Hungarian, it would nevertheless be theoretically possible not to acknowledge this difference in distinctiveness in terms of nomenclature, that is, to consider the former (as well as the latter) to be versions of non-Jewish languages rather than distinctive languages in their own right, or alternatively to consider the latter (as well as the former) to be distinctive languages in spite of the fact that they are only minimally distinctive.

With this understanding in mind, it can be said that in modern times—just as Ukrainian and Belarussian have been conceptualized as being distinct from Russian, and Norwegian has been conceptualized as distinct from Danish and Swedish—Jews have conceptualized, for example, Yiddish as being distinct from German. This does not mean, of course, that the terms “Ukrainian,” “Belarussian,” “Norwegian,” and “Yiddish” were not used before modern times, but they were not used systematically as part of a conscious ideology of distinctiveness as they are today.

Poster for a Yiddish theatrical performance of The Treasure, about 1930. (Library of Congress)

One may identify two important factors that led Jews in modern times to develop the idea that the Diaspora languages they spoke were—at least when they differed noticeably from Gentile languages—distinctive “Jewish languages” rather than merely dialects of Gentile languages. The first factor was the influence of non-Jewish European nationalist movements that began to sweep Europe in the late 18th century, initially associated with the writings of J.G. Herder, relating language—particularly spoken language—to individual and national identity. For groups such as Ukrainians and Norwegians, this was an important factor in the development of a conception of national identity, and this ultimately culminated in the establishment of independent nation-states; for Jews, on the other hand, who already had a concept of national identity, this same ideology relating language to national identity resulted rather in adopting the idea that whatever Jews spoke should—wherever linguistically plausible—be considered to be distinctive “Jewish languages,” and this was not associated with the establishment of a territorial nation-state but rather with generally reinforcing the idea of Jewish distinctiveness. This kind of thinking was particularly influential among the Jewish intellectuals who had had more contact with, and had been influenced more strongly by, the thinking of non-Jews, who were correspondingly generally less enthusiastic about the traditional criteria of Jewish identity based on religion and personal ancestry.

The second factor supporting the reconceptualization of Jewish versions as being distinctive Jewish languages has really been specific to Yiddish and Judeo-Arabic in particular and has been associated with a radical psychological and physical separation between Jewish and non-Jewish speakers of what might have been considered to be a single language—that is, Germans and Arabs—so that Jews in general (even the average person who does not think about such matters much) have felt a need to claim and believe that whatever he or she speaks is not that particular Gentile language; in other words, it is not German or Arabic, but rather something distinctively Jewish.

If one considers the first factor, it must be acknowledged that the case of Jewish languages is different from that of Norwegian and Ukrainian, for example, because Jews are also distinguished by their religious affiliation from those groups whose speech is similar, whereas this is not true for Norwegians (vis-à-vis Swedes) and (most) Ukrainians (vis-à-vis Russians). But Jewish languages are still not unique in this regard. Thus, for example, Serbian and Croatian are minimally distinctive at the spoken level, but they are understood to be different languages particularly because Serbs are Orthodox and Croats are Catholics; the same is true of (Hindu) Hindi versus (Muslim) Urdu. For the same reason, the Catholic Maltese consider their language, which could on linguistic grounds be considered to be a dialect of Arabic, to be a separate language in its own right, because Arabic is generally associated with Muslims, particularly in the area close to Malta. In each of these cases, as with Jewish languages, religious distinctiveness motivates a feeling of linguistic distinctiveness, and this is particularly supported by distinctive patterns of borrowing learned vocabulary; thus, Jewish languages borrow this vocabulary from Hebrew and Aramaic, Serbian borrows it from Greek and Old Church Slavonic, Croatian borrows it from Latin, Hindi borrows it from Sanskrit, Urdu borrows this it Persian and Arabic, and so on. Another feature supporting the distinctiveness of Jewish languages is the fact that they are written with a distinctive script, the same alphabet, with some modifications, that is used to write Hebrew, but here, too, the situation is parallel to that of Serbian (written with the Cyrillic script) versus Croatian (written with the Latin script), for example, as well as the other cases of this type that were mentioned previously, and in any case even if people write their version with a distinctive script, this does not necessarily mean they consider it to be a full-fledged distinctive language; after all, in premodern times, Jews used the Hebrew-Aramaic alphabet to write whatever languages they spoke, but nevertheless they only understood Hebrew and Aramaic to be fully legitimate languages.

Scholars motivated by this first factor have conducted a considerable amount of research on distinctive Jewish forms that have come to be considered distinctive Jewish languages. As with corresponding studies of non-Jewish languages, the research provides much of the material used to demonstrate linguistic distinctiveness. Given that the assumption of such research is that any distinctive Jewish linguistic usage must be a distinctive Jewish language, it is not clear exactly where to objectively draw a line regarding how distinct something must be before it can be considered a distinct language; it is not possible to give a straightforward, exhaustive, and definitive list of Jewish languages that can be considered to represent objective fact. This said, for the purpose of exemplification, note that Weinreich (1973) lists (Judeo-)Arabic, Aramaic, French, Georgian, Greek, Italian, Karaite, Krimchak, Latin,

Persian, Provençal, Slavic, Spanish, Tadjik, Tat, and Yiddish as Jewish languages, and Levi (1979) adds Berber and Kurdish but leaves out Karaite, Latin, and Tadjik. Such lists are periodically expanded as new studies are done resulting in new “Jewish languages” being “discovered.”

Turning now to the second motivation for considering Jewish linguistic usages to be distinctive, this has obviously been most powerful in the case of Yiddish, for two reasons. First of all, the Holocaust resulted in an overwhelming feeling among Jews that Jews and Germans had to be distinguished from each other in terms of identity, and the linguistic reflex of this was that there was an irresistible psychological urge to deny that Jews spoke German when there was any linguistic justification for this distinction at all, and this meant that the earlier feeling that Yiddish was “bad German”—or indeed German at all—came to be unacceptable to anyone (at the same time, of course, it could not be denied that some Jews really did simply speak German). Second, whereas before the Holocaust Yiddish speakers in Eastern Europe and Christian speakers of German in Eastern Europe shared many aspects of their linguistic usage, and the Eastern Germans far outnumbered the Jews, so that geographically it would have been reasonable to consider Yiddish to be a dialect of Eastern German, this situation changed radically during the Holocaust and in the aftermath of World War II, as almost all of the Yiddish speakers were exterminated or fled and almost all of the Eastern German speakers were expelled or fled to the West, so that Yiddish and German were literally geographically separated from each other for the first time. The resulting feeling that Yiddish is a language distinct from German has come from the Jewish community itself rather than Gentile thinking, and it is therefore much stronger and more widespread than the generalized belief in the existence of distinctive Jewish languages described previously; thus, although scientifically impeccable arguments for the legitimacy and autonomy of Yiddish had been advanced by Jewish intellectuals since the second half of the 19th century, it was only after the Holocaust that Jews in general came to more or less universally accept these arguments. Beyond this even, particularly as a consequence of its association with the Holocaust, many Jews have now come to see Yiddish as being not only a distinctive language but also as having a sort of special metaphysical status such as Jews had previously reserved for Hebrew and Aramaic; as noted by Roskies (1997, 26–27), “For the offspring of East European Jewry, the shtetl has become a kind of sacred space, sanctioned by the blood of the martyrs. In this scheme, Yiddish becomes a strictly liturgical medium, a language of lamentation.”

One observes the same general sort of thinking about Judeo-Arabic. Because of the Arab-Israeli conflict, and because this conflict and the associated rise of Zionism caused almost all Jewish speakers of Arabic (more than 800,000 of them) to leave the Arab-dominated territories, a similar psychological and physical separation has developed between Jewish and Arab identity, so that, for example, Israeli Jews from Morocco will refer to their spoken language as marokai (Moroccan) rather than aravit; as in the case of Yiddish, this is felt in the Jewish community in general (although not nearly as strongly, to be sure, as in the case of Yiddish), and not just among Jewish language enthusiasts.

The study of Jewish languages has thus come to be an important part of Jewish studies and a topic of interest to both researchers and consumers of Jewish culture. Writings in this area can be as popular as books written in praise of Yiddish or as sophisticated and esoteric as scholarly articles—which sometimes cannot be understood very easily by nonacademics or even nonspecialists—proposing, for example, new etymologies for previously mysterious words in Jewish languages. This phenomenon of interest in and documentation of Jewish languages should be understood as another way Jews have developed to be simultaneously Jewish and modern, along with Zionism, Reform Judaism, Modern Orthodoxy, and so on. Because the idea of Jewish languages emphasizes linguistic aspects of Jewish distinctiveness, it correspondingly downplays, in a relative sense at least, other forms of Jewish distinctiveness that might be considered important—such as territorial nationalism, religious identity and observance, and ancestry. It is thus naturally more popular among Jews who are concerned with Jewish distinctiveness but less enthusiastic about both Zionism and religion, although of course this is only a general pattern. Aside from this, the study of Jewish languages is ideal for Jews who are intellectually interested in academic linguistics of one type or another and at the same time want to express their Jewishness through their research.

The closest parallel to Jewish languages is found in groups who, like Jews, are simultaneously an ethnic/ancestral group and a religious group and who have partially or entirely lost their ancestral/sacred language as a spoken language, for example, Armenians, Greeks, Copts, Maronites, Assyrians, and Sikhs. Some of these groups have used their own distinctive alphabets to write languages that were originally foreign to them but that they eventually came to speak natively; for example, Armenians and Greeks wrote their version of Turkish in the Armenian and Greek script, and Maronites wrote their version of Arabic in the Syriac script. Such usages were essentially parallel to Yiddish and Judeo-Spanish for Jews. Even for groups that have not literally written down such languages, an argument could presumably be made that they were distinctive languages, based on such factors as distinctive patterns of borrowing from sacred languages. In practice, however, members of these groups do not appear to be nearly as interested as Jews have been in consciously constructing these to be separate languages. To a certain extent this can be attributed to the fact that Jews have had much more intimate contact with the European (particularly Eastern European) culture, which developed the idea that spoken language is an important marker of national identity, but there is no question that this idea also appealed to something indigenous in Jewish thinking.

Aramaic has been perceived as different from other Diaspora languages in that Jews have always regarded it as being a real language (traditionally even a sacred language). Small sections of the Bible are in Aramaic, as is most of the Talmud, many prayers, including Kaddish and Kol Nidre, and the Zohar. In fact, Jews traditionally regarded Aramaic rather than Hebrew as being the real language of scholarship, in the sense that, in theory at least, everyone, or at least every male, knew Hebrew to some extent, whereas knowledge of Aramaic was specifically associated with the intellectual elite. This special status may be attributed to the fact that Aramaic was, in effect, the first Diaspora language, so that all Jews have Aramaic-speaking ancestors (the Greek-speaking Jewish community of Egypt having disappeared into history), so that its special status does not threaten Jewish unity, in relation to which Aramaic was the general (though not universal) spoken language of the Levant and Babylonia between the sixth century BCE and the seventh century CE when Jewish identity was developed. Correspondingly, there has not been so much effort devoted in modern times to demonstrating that Judeo-Aramaic is or ever was a distinctive Jewish language.

Although Hebrew and Aramaic have obviously been the preferred language historically for writing from the point of view of religion, scholarship, and addressing general Jewish audiences, Jews have also written in other Jewish languages. The most obvious motivation for this was to reach readers who did not know Hebrew or Aramaic; it is, of course, generally easier, and requires much less education, to read in one's native language than in a foreign language. Writings in Diaspora languages were often (though by no means always) directed largely at women, because they received minimal instruction in Hebrew and Aramaic. Diaspora languages served as the medium for Bible translations, midrashim, philosophy, Hebrew grammar, popular manuals explaining Jewish law, in some cases (particularly Judeo-Arabic) science and mathematics, and, in modern times, literature and newspapers, particularly in Yiddish but also in Judeo-Spanish. Indeed, the 19th and 20th centuries saw a flowering of Yiddish literature impressive both in quantity and quality, including the writings of Shalom Aleichem, Mendele Moykher Sforim, Y. L. Peretz, and Isaac Bashevis Singer. In sanctioning Bible translations into vernacular languages, Jews chose a middle ground between the approach of Catholics and Muslims and that of Protestants. On the one hand, by allowing and actively circulating vernacular Bible translations, Jewish religious authorities, unlike those of Catholics and Muslims, supported the idea that the masses should basically understand the word of God; on the other hand, unlike Protestant Bible translations such as the English King James Bible and Luther's German translation of the Bible, Jewish Bible translations in languages other than Hebrew and Aramaic were never seen to have any inherent sanctity of their own—it was always understood that their sole purpose was to convey the basic message of the original text, and it was always recognized that the translation was necessarily deficient. Thus, it was written in Sofrim 1:7 that the day the Torah was translated into Greek “was as grievous as the day the [Golden] Calf was made, for the Torah could not be translated properly.” Yet the same religious authorities who would support such a statement would also unambiguously support making and circulating such a vernacular Bible translation; this profound—and yet realistic—ambivalence can be said to characterize premodern Jewish attitudes toward their own vernacular languages in the Diaspora.

As noted, Jews characteristically switch to speaking the language of non-Jews around them in one form or another, but in fact this does not necessarily happen very quickly. The most striking exception was the maintenance of Judeo-Spanish in the Ottoman Empire after the Expulsion in 1492 until the 20th century, but one might include in the same general category the maintenance of Yiddish in Eastern Europe when Jews were surrounded by speakers of non-Germanic languages (although, as already noted, there were also large numbers of Christian Germans in the general area at the time), the maintenance of Judeo-Persian in the Caucasus, and so on. It is indeed an interesting historical question why some Jewish communities have quickly adopted the language, or at least a version of the language, of their Gentile neighbors whereas others have maintained distinctive languages (even if they are not entirely distinctive) for longer. Thus far, however, this has not been the object of systematic comparative research.

In recent times, Jews everywhere have been switching to speaking the official languages of the countries they live in as their mother tongues and primary languages—including switching to Hebrew in Israel—and this means the children of native speakers of Yiddish, Judeo-Spanish, and Judeo-Arabic, for example, have been switching to speaking Hebrew, English, Turkish, French, Russian, and other languages. A fascinating aspect of the phenomenon of interest in Jewish languages is that these forms are coming to be recognized as languages at exactly the same time they are dying as spoken languages; a hundred years ago, these speech forms were not generally understood to be distinctive languages, so they could not have been understood to be dying in the same sense, but now it seems that they are being reconceptualized as languages specifically so they can be understood to be dying. And yet this is in a way consistent with what happened historically concerning Hebrew, the prototypical Jewish language: Jews only began to treat it as a real language—in premodern terminology a sacred language—when it came under imminent threat of extinction in the wake of the Babylonian Conquest, which introduced Aramaic as the dominant language in the area. It appears that Jews (in striking distinction to Europeans other than Greeks) value languages as symbols of their identity most highly when these languages are endangered or dead, whereas everyday spoken languages that are in no danger of disappearing are to a significant extent taken for granted.

One striking exception to this pattern, however, is Yiddish in the Ultra-Orthodox communities of the Diaspora. In most of these communities, Yiddish is surviving as the general everyday language of the community, even among the youngest speakers and even when the community is surrounded by speakers of other languages; the language seems to serve as a marker of not only Jewish identity but more specifically Ultra-Orthodox identity—in the minds of its speakers, authentic Jewish identity. In Israel, on the other hand, even the Ultra-Orthodox are generally switching to Hebrew—after all, one can argue that English, French, or Flemish is not a suitable language for “real Jews” to speak, but it is much more difficult to claim that “real Jews” should not speak Hebrew. Yet even this is not impossible, as there are Ultra-Orthodox in Israel, in particular the anti-Zionist naturei karta, who continue to speak Yiddish as their everyday language and believe modern Hebrew is not a legitimate language.

The general consensus of opinion among researchers in Jewish languages is that Jews have stopped creating distinctive languages in the past few hundred years as their contacts with non-Jews have become more extensive. One objective indication of this is that Jews have not recently been writing new languages with the Hebrew-Aramaic alphabet, as they used to (although this in itself is a phenomenon that needs to be explained). On the other hand, it is also possible to set the bar for distinctiveness lower and investigate in much greater detail how Jews are continuing to use language differently from non-Jews, for example, by looking at the characteristics of the English of Jews—not only borrowings from Hebrew and Yiddish but also pronunciations and grammatical structures—that are particularly associated with Jews, even if this is only in terms of quantitative frequency of usage; in some cases Jews, or at least some Jews, are aware of these differences and even talk about them, while in others they are below the level of consciousness, but either way they are manifestations of Jewish distinctiveness. There has been some research of this type in recent years, and it is quite possible this will be more significant in the future, because this is after all the same general idea that has motivated a general interest in Jewish languages in modern times: Jews are a distinctive people and therefore must be using language differently, and research demonstrating that Jews use language—any language—distinctively at the same time necessarily supports the idea of Jewish distinctiveness.

Selected Bibliography

- Blau, Joshua. 1999. The Emergence and Linguistic Background of Judaeo-Arabic: A study of the Origins of Neo-Arabic and Middle Arabic. Jerusalem: Ben-Tsvi Institute.
- Fishman, Joshua. 1981. Never Say Die! A Thousand Years of Yiddish in Jewish Life and Letters. The Hague, Netherlands: Mouton.
- Harris, Tracy K. 1994. Death of a Language: The History of Judeo-Spanish. Newark: University of Delaware Press.
- Myhill, John. 2004. Language in Jewish Society: Towards a New Understanding. Clevedon, UK: Multilingual Matters.
- Weinreich, Max. 1980. History of the Yiddish Language. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Judeo-Spanish in the Turkish Social Context

Mary Altabev

---

Judeo-Spanish is the language Spanish Jews brought to the Ottoman Empire during the 15th and 16th century after the Spanish Inquisition started a gradual mass emigration of the oppressed Jews toward the most accessible places like Portugal, Italy, the Netherlands, France, North Africa, and the Ottoman Empire. Within the Ottoman Empire, Judeo-Spanish was passed on to their descendants and is estimated to have been the group's vernacular until the early 20th century. Part of this group continues to live in the present-day Turkish Republic that replaced the Ottoman Empire in 1923. Today, of the 400,000 Sephardic Jews worldwide, approximately 25,000 live in Istanbul, and a couple of thousand in other parts of Turkey.

According to the figures given by different sources (Cohen 1973; Kastoryano 1992; Sephiha 1977) the Turkish Jewish population has steadily declined from the first official census in 1927. The reasons for the demographic decline after the establishment of the Turkish Republic vary from the isolated, occasional outbreaks of violence in Turkey to the establishment of the state of Israel in 1948. In addition to emigration from Turkey there was also a movement within the country's boundaries in which the remaining small Jewish communities converged toward Istanbul. Istanbul is estimated to have between 10 and 12 million inhabitants. Among these the Armenians, the Greek-Orthodox, and the Jews are the main religious minority communities.

Turkey's chief rabbi, Izak Haleva, gives a speech at Neve Shalom Synagogue in Istanbul on October 11, 2004. The Jewish community in Istanbul has the highest number of Jewish residents of any Muslim nation. (Fatih Saribas/Reuters/Corbis)

Other than the synagogues, the Jewish community in Istanbul supports various charitable organizations. Most of these organizations are attached to the chief rabbinate in Istanbul, with the chief rabbi as the official representative of the Turkish Jewish community as a whole. The elected chief rabbi, assisted by the beth din, the Judaic court, supervises the religious and lay council.

The community supports three Jewish schools: one primary, one high school, and a new complex including the whole spectrum from primary to high school, which opened in 1994. Apart from secular education, the Mahzake Tora, the religious Sunday school, provides religious teaching for the community's youngsters.

Six social clubs (with an estimated 2,500 young members in 1996) provide the cultural activities for the Turkish Jewish community in Istanbul. In the past few years, they have become the principal source of Sephardic cultural activities, such as Sephardic music evenings, Judeo-Spanish theatre, and so on. They attract the young generation through their organization of activities directed especially toward them. The weekly newspaper Şalom, with two pages in Judeo-Spanish, is the community's only surviving publication.

Similar to other low-prestige languages, Judeo-Spanish has been and is still called by various names, depending on the preferences of the speakers and the fashion of the day. This study encountered the use of Ispanyolca (which is the Turkish counterpart of [E]Spanyol, Judeo-Espanyol, Ladino, Musevice, Judezmo, Sefaradca, and Yahudice). As none of the interviews were conducted in Judeo-Spanish, Djudyo did not appear in the count, but during observed Judeo-Spanish conversations, the language has been referred to as Djudyo, “Jew” or “Jewish,” or la lingua muestra, “our language.” In addition to that, Bizim Ispanyolca, meaning “our Spanish” was used for explanatory purposes, that is, so that it would not be confused with modern standard Spanish.

It is generally accepted that the vernacular, Judeo-Spanish, stems from medieval Spanish with the addition of Hebrew loanwords and several lexical items and grammatical components from local languages encountered along its historical journey to its current form. Some prefer to describe it as a bastardized language, a distortion, a jargon, a mixture. This history is paralleled by that of other Jewish languages, in particular, Yiddish (Bunis 1981). However, the approach of this study was to consider Judeo-Spanish as an independent language in its own right.

Until the past few decades, Judeo-Spanish was written in its own specific writing system called rashi, which is a “script developed from square Hebrew characters and named after the acronym for Rabbi Selomo Itshaki (1040–1105)” (Saul 1983). Bunis adds that while rashi was used for printing, the handwritten cursive script was called soletreo (Bunis 1982). Nowadays in Turkey, as in other places where Judeo-Spanish is printed, Judeo-Spanish publications use the Roman alphabet but follow different orthographic rules.

With the establishment of the French Alliance schools (1860) Judeo-Spanish became the language predominantly spoken at home and by the uneducated. The loss of Judeo-Spanish’s prestige was reinforced by the symbolic function of the national unifying element attributed to the national language. By the late 1950s, when the prevailing slogan advertised in public places was “Citizen, speak Turkish!” minority languages had retreated to the private domain of the home. As a result the limited use of the language started to cause deterioration of its structure and lexicon.

In the present day, Istanbul Jews still generally believe they speak a bastardized Judeo-Spanish. This study suggested that Judeo-Spanish speakers were and still are affected by external and internal economic, sociopolitical pressures and demographic changes. That is, there is a two-way pressure. From one direction the speakers are motivated to give up the use of Judeo-Spanish because of their fear of being discriminated against by the dominant majority on the basis that it is not the national language. They believe use of Judeo-Spanish would be taken to be indicative of the users’ disloyalty/foreignness and thus would become an obstacle in their socioeconomic advancement. From another direction, that is, their own community members, the speakers are driven not to use Judeo-Spanish because of its negative social image.

This study’s main contention is that the apparent decline of Judeo-Spanish is related to the Turkish Jewish identification with the language. In other words, for various reasons, Judeo-Spanish as the binding agent of the community has been overtaken or replaced by other identity components, such as religion, peoplehood, or nationhood. Its function as an identity marker, on the other hand, is replaced by its being a way of speaking differently.

However, although academic research has predicted Judeo-Spanish's inevitable demise throughout the past half century, the speakers themselves seemed to disagree and continued to use it, and are still using the language (see Gerşon 1986), or as some would prefer to say, what is left of it. Whatever the case, Judeo-Spanish is currently used in Istanbul, although the speakers are almost exclusively over the age of 30. If one considers that the predictions of Judeo-Spanish's death started in the 1930s, and that in each case, the primary signpost appeared to be that none of the new generation is using it or can use it fluently, it is interesting that the nonfluent young generation of each of those studies, over a period of almost 70 years, used Judeo-Spanish, and in some cases, has even transmitted it—although there is an ongoing dispute about the quality of what is being transmitted.

Although most of the revival activities are based in Israel or Spain, a parallel movement is observed in the local Turkish Jewish community and press. Mainly the activities of the Jewish social clubs in the form of cultural evenings, concerts, and plays focusing on Judeo-Spanish are increasingly well attended. As to the community newspaper Şalom, it has survived since 1947 with two of its pages published in Judeo-Spanish.

Some of the reasons for Judeo-Spanish's survival in Turkey can perhaps be attributed to the fact that there is no strong standard Spanish competition as in the case of the U.S. study (Harris 1994). It is a language acquired with no apparent effort and has its practical uses, such as communication with other Spanish speakers all over the world. Additionally, it is presented as a language backed up by a state (in this case expectations are that it would be two states: Israel and Spain), thus displacing Judeo-Spanish from the marginal minority-language status.

Another possibility this study suggested is that rather than or at the same time as a Judeo-Spanish revival, an important linguistic change is taking place among the Turkish Jews. Inasmuch as the group has other linguistic means to mark and signal its identity—in other words, speaking differently—it is possible that we are witnessing the birth of another Jewish language, where in Bunis's terms Judeo-Spanish would be the prelanguage and Turkish the major determinant (Bunis 1981). That is, while Judeo-Spanish is surviving in the current Turkish Jewish context, at the same time it is branching out, and one of the branches is mutating into another language.

Selected Bibliography

- Bunis, D. M. 1981. "A Comparative Linguistic Analysis of Judezmo and Yiddish." International Journal of the Sociology of Language 30: 49–70.
- Bunis, D. M. 1982. "Types of Nonregional Variation in Early Modern Eastern Spoken Judezmo." International Journal of the Sociology of Language 37: 41–70.
- Cohen, H. J. 1973. The Jews of the Middle-East. 1860–1972. Jerusalem: Israel University Press.
- Gerşon, K. 1986. "The Relationship of Language, Ethnicity and Ethnic Group Identity. A Case: Judeo-Spanish." MA diss. Faculty of Letters, Department of Linguistic Science, Reading University.
- Harris, T. K. 1994. Death of a Language. The History of Judeo-Spanish. Newark: University of Delaware Press.

- Kastoryano, R. 1992. "From Millet to Community: The Jews of Istanbul." In Ottoman and Turkish Jewry, Community and Leadership, edited by A. Rodrigue, 253–277. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Saul, M. 1983. "The Mother Tongue of the Polyglot: Cosmopolitanism and Nationalism among the Sepharadim of Istanbul." Anthropological Linguistics 25 (3): 326–358.
- Séphiha, H. V. 1977. L'Agonie des judéo-espagnols. Paris: Editions Entente.

Two-Tiered Relexification in Yiddish: Jews, Sorbs, Khazars, and the Kiev-Polessian Dialect

Paul Wexler

---

Most students of comparative Jewish linguistics assume that the Jewish languages were invented by Jews (Birnbaum 1944; Fishman 1991; Alvarez-Péreyre and Baumgarten 2003; Myhill 2004). A minority view is found in Wexler (2002; 2006, preface) who proposes that the comparative study of Jewish languages suggests that the primary creators of the structurally most distinctive Jewish languages were not Jews but "converts" to the Jewish community. Examples are Yiddish, or the "relexifications" of the Bible in many Jewish speech communities for a population not fluent in Hebrew. Historically, the absence of a sizable number of proselytes is usually matched by the absence of a Judaized language that differs substantially from co-territorial non-Jewish speech. Judaized ethnolects of non-Jewish languages, which indeed owe their genesis primarily to the efforts of Jews themselves, are only minimally distinct from their cognate non-Jewish source languages (e.g., Judaized Romance, German [as opposed to Yiddish], Arabic, Chinese, Greek)—and essentially only in the lexicon.

Relexification entails the retention of one's original grammar, phonology, and phonotactics while replacing most of the native lexicon with foreign "phonetic strings"—that is, bare forms whose semantic and syntactic behavior are determined by the original grammar of the speaker. In Wexler's view, Yiddish is not a Germanic language but rather a Slavic language whose vocabulary was first largely "relexified" to High German. He speculated that Jews (primarily of Slavo-Turkic proselyte origin) speaking Sorbian between the 9th and 12th centuries in the Slavo-German lands resisted the pressure to switch fully to German language and religion (Christianity) that resulted from the migration of the Germans into the largely Sorbian lands. While most of the Slavs eventually shifted from a pagan Slavic to a Christian German identity, the indigenous Jews (mainly of non-Jewish Slavic origin) made only a partial language shift to German. Relexification was also carried out at about the same time and later by the Slavic-speaking descendants of the Judaized Khazars, first in Central Europe and then in the present-day north Ukraine and southern Belarus.

The motivation for carrying out relexification is always identificatory—never communicative. It stands to reason that new converts to Judaism would have had a strong motivation to create a new linguistic analogue to match their newly acquired religious identity. Sorbs were motivated to convert (and then to relexify their language) because of the need to avoid being sold into slavery by Germans and Vikings; in Eastern Europe, Judaism was spread by the need of the Khazar ruling classes to maintain neutrality vis-à-vis the Muslim caliphate and the Byzantine Empire and by their desire to participate in the international trade controlled then largely by Jews (on relexification, see Lefebvre 1986 and Wexler 2002).

To posit relexification in the genesis of a Judaized language is tantamount to suggesting that the speech community expanded primarily thanks to the accretion of significant numbers of converts. Because ethnic Jews were probably not in need of a new identification, they would not have needed to create radically distinct Judaized analogues of co-territorial or contiguous non-Jewish languages. Because the number of converts to Judaism in Jewish communities before 1200 was usually greater than that of the “original” Jews, there is the strong likelihood that the latter will espouse the Jewish language as their own.

If conversion to Judaism is the major factor behind the growth of Jewish communities outside Palestine, and if converts are the groups most likely to create maximally distinctive Judaized languages by retaining the groups’ original grammars, then the concept of a Jewish Diaspora created by enforced or voluntary migration out of Palestine (e.g., after 70 CE) is unjustified. The spread of religious ideas does not require the resettlement of a large population of practitioners or missionaries of those ideas.

It is widely assumed that the Ashkenazic Jewish immigrants from the Germano-Slavic lands to Eastern Europe vastly outnumbered the indigenous East Slavic-speaking Jews, but the facts of Yiddish suggest a Slavic-speaking majority there. The Slavo-Turks who, with a tiny Palestinian Jewish population, formed the Ashkenazic Jews have committed no less than six acts of relexification over the past 12 centuries: five acts of relexification of a Slavic language (a–e) and one act of relexification of Old (Semitic) Hebrew (f) (stands for “became relexified to”): (a) Sorbian (Middle High German, Hebrew/Aramaic lexicon = Slavic Yiddish I [9th–12th centuries]); (b) Yiddish (Old Hebrew/Aramaic with new Yiddish Hebrew creations) = written Ashkenazic Hebrew (12th–19th centuries), a Slavic language with a predominantly Hebrew lexicon; (c) Kiev-Polessian (the ancestor of modern northern Ukrainian and southern Belarusian) (Yiddish, Middle High German, Hebrew/Aramaic lexicon = Slavic Yiddish II [9th?–15th century?]); (d) Yiddish (Old Hebrew [as in (b)] but without most Yiddish Hebraisms = spoken/written Modern Hebrew [late 19th century]), a Slavic language with a predominantly Hebrew lexicon; (e) Yiddish (Latinoid lexicon = Esperanto [late 19th century]), a Slavic language with a Latinoid lexicon (the founder of Esperanto, Ludwik Zamenhof, was a native speaker of Yiddish); and (f) Old Hebrew → Middle High German lexicon = literal Yiddish Bible “relexifications” (14th–18th centuries), unusual dialects of Old Semitic Hebrew grammar with a predominantly Germanic lexicon.

There are two central diagnostic tests for identifying prior relexification in a language. First, Yiddish is a relexification-based language because its grammar and phonology are derived predominantly from a single source, Slavic, while the bulk of the lexicon has a different source—about 75 percent is of High German origin. The remainder is split roughly between Hebraisms (including innovative pseudo-Hebraisms) and Slavisms—the latter being the sole native elements. Unfortunately, appreciation of these facts is often complicated because many contemporary dialects of Yiddish have been Germanized in the past two centuries (especially in areas where Yiddish speakers were also fluent in German, such as Latvian Kurland and Ukrainian Bukovyna), and most texts written by speakers of Slavic Yiddish before the early 19th century were in Judaized German (though with Yiddish features).

Second, a language is relexification-based if, by comparing the lexicons and derivational structures of the putative substratal and superstratal (lexifier) languages, it is possible to predict with high accuracy (i.e., to motivate ex post facto) which superstratal lexical elements will be compatible with the substratal grammar. In Yiddish, one can predict accurately which German components will be accepted and where in the lexicon Yiddish will have to use Hebraisms, a few unique Romanisms, and unrelexified Slavisms, as well as invent pseudo-Hebraisms (far more frequently than in any other non-Jewish language adopted and adapted by Jews). No other model of Yiddish genesis can make such predictions about the total lexicon.

This second test is extremely important because it shows that it could not have been the seven or eight centuries of contact with Slavic languages that allegedly caused German component loss and extreme concomitant Slavicization in Yiddish (indeed, Yiddish was never removed from contact with German in Central and Eastern Europe). Furthermore, Slavicization of an alleged Germanic Yiddish could never explain the broad recourse to Hebraisms. Interference with Slavic would have resulted in entirely haphazard, regional, and unpredictable Yiddish acquisition of Slavic lexicon; but this is not the case. It should also be pointed out that the Slavic imprint in Yiddish differs both quantitatively and qualitatively from that of other languages in contact with Slavic for seven or eight centuries that did not undergo relexification, such as colonial German and Karaite in Belarus, Ukraine, and Poland.

An analysis of the Yiddish language, Ashkenazic religion and folklore, and migrational history suggest that the original Ashkenazic Jews in the German lands are not primarily of French and Italian Jewish origin, as is commonly maintained. This is because, first, the alleged unique French components in Yiddish can more easily be derived from Friulan, Italian, and Balkan Romance—thus pointing to a Balkan conduit for the forebears of the Ashkenazic Jews (Wexler 1992). Second, there are almost no Jewish settlements in the center of France in the first millennium CE—only in the extreme south (Provence) and extreme north. However, the Balkans have more or less unbroken Jewish settlements—from Greece and Macedonia up to Roman Hungary. Third, positing the birth of Yiddish in the southwest German lands (the Rhineland) is impossible because no form of Yiddish ever shows any features of the local German dialects. Fourth, Balkan Jews (of Slavo-Turkic descent primarily) probably migrated to the East German lands along with non-Jewish Slavs in the eighth century (note the similar name of the “Sorbs” in Germany and the “Serbs” in Yugoslavia). Thus, it is the Balkan-Caucasian Jews who spread westward within Europe, eventually reaching northern France. By the 13th century, Yiddish-speaking Jews began to migrate into the monolingual Slavic lands to the east. The fact that most of the oldest German Jewish cemeteries, ritual baths, religious centers, and synagogues are found in the southwest German lands need not detract from the hypothesis, because a modest Jewish presence in the early Middle Ages is also found in modern-day eastern Germany—the relative paucity of the latter (e.g., at Görlitz, alongside historic documentation of a Jewish presence), can be explained by the internecine wars between Germans and Slavs that ravaged eastern Germany after the eighth century and destroyed much historical testimony.

Selected Bibliography

- Alvarez-Péreyre, Frank, and Jean Baumgarten, eds. 2003. Linguistique des langues juives et linguistique générale [The Linguistics of Jewish Languages and General Linguistics]. Paris: CNRS.
- Fishman, Joshua. 1991. “How Does Yiddish Differ?” In Yiddish: Turning to Life, 313–323. Amsterdam: John Benjamins.
- Jacobs, Neil G. 2005. Yiddish. A Linguistic Introduction. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Lefebvre, Claire. 1986. “Relexification in Creole Genesis Revisited: The Case of Haitian Creole.” In Substrata Versus Universals in Creole Genesis, edited by Pieter Muysken and Norbert S. H. Smith, 279–300. Amsterdam: John Benjamins.
- Myhill, John. 2004. Language in Jewish Society. Towards a New Understanding. Clevedon, UK: Multilingual Matters.
- Wexler, Paul. 1981. “Jewish Interlinguistics: Facts and Conceptual Framework.” Language 57: 99–149.
- Wexler, Paul. 1992. The Balkan Substratum of Yiddish. Wiesbaden, Germany: Harrassowitz.
- Wexler, Paul. 2002. Two-tiered Relexification in Yiddish: Jews, Sorbs, Khazars and the Kiev-Polesian Dialect. Berlin: Mouton de Gruyter.
- Wexler, Paul. 2006. Jewish and Non-Jewish Creators of “Jewish” Languages. (With Special Attention to Judaized Arabic, Chinese, German, Greek, Portuguese, Slavic [Yiddish/Modern Hebrew], Spanish & Karaite & Old Semitic Hebrew [Ladino]). Wiesbaden, Germany: Harrassowitz.

A Perspective on Judeo-Ibero-Romance, Yiddish, and Rotwelsch

Paul Wexler

---

The title of this essay may come as a surprise, as no one before has ever suggested that Judeo-Ibero-Romance, Yiddish, and Rotwelsch (German slang lexicons, attested since the late 1300s; see Wolf 1956) have a set of common features sufficient to warrant their exclusive comparison. Although scholars have identified independent German and Jewish contacts with Romance and Judeo-Romance, respectively, have identified an enormous Hebrew imprint in many variants of Rotwelsch, and have traced the diffusion of Hebraisms and Aramaisms from Yiddish into Rotwelsch (and from the latter to a host of other European slang lexicons), they have neglected the effect of Judaized Romance on Rotwelsch.

Yiddish is often said to contain a small Judeo-French and Judeo-Italian component (Weinreich 1973), though Wexler (1992) thinks the alleged unique French components in Yiddish are best derived from Friulan, Italian, and Balkan Romance—thus pointing to a Balkan conduit, among others, for the forebears of the Ashkenazic Jews. The Judeo-Latin legacy of Rotwelsch takes the form of a corpus of Gallicized Hebrew elements, borrowed from Judeo-French by the late 14th century, if not earlier.

An investigation of the Judeo-Romance component in Yiddish in a comparative Romance context suggests that this component is both substratal (mainly from Judeo-Italian and Balkan Romance at birth in the 9th and 10th centuries) and adstratal (from Judeo-French and Italian after the conception of Yiddish). A discussion of the Judeo-Romance imprint in Yiddish and Rotwelsch must, of course, include a discussion of the origin of Judeo-Ibero-Romance itself (see Wexler 1988, 1992).

A comparison of these three heirs to a Judeo-Latin legacy requires investigation of three major research topics: dating the Judeo-Ibero-Romance languages, ascertaining the role of Romance in the genesis of Yiddish and Judaized German, and studying the corpus and origin of the Judeo-French elements in Rotwelsch. This research promises five important benefits:

1. For Judeo-Latin studies: Given the paucity of Judeo-Latin textual and epigraphic materials, it is imperative to try to identify Judeo-Latin elements preserved in the Judeo-Romance daughter languages and in languages in contact with the latter.
2. For the individual study of Judeo-Ibero-Romance, Yiddish, and Rotwelsch: The facts of one language are often indispensable for elucidating facts of another, as when Yiddish enables researchers to expand the Judeo-Romance corpus or when Judeo-Ibero-Romance helps to identify possible Judeo-Latin Hebraisms (e.g., Yiddish sheygets, or “non-Jewish boy,” with intervocalic /g/ < Hebrew shekets, or “abomination,” shows French pronunciation habits) and Judeo-Romance elements in Yiddish. A comparative framework also enables researchers to determine which Judeo-Romance languages might derive from Judeo-Latin and which developed later in the individual Romance territories from the newly forming Romance languages.
3. For Hebrew and Judeo-Aramaic linguistics: A comparative study of Hebraisms and Aramaisms in the Judeo-Romance languages might elucidate the relative chronology of borrowing from those two languages and reconstruct the outlines of spoken Palestinian Hebrew and Aramaic. (The only other source of information about old spoken Semitic would be transcriptions in non-Jewish languages, e.g., Coptic, Greek. Like written or Classical Latin vis-à-vis Vulgar Latin, old written Hebrew was too distant from colloquial Hebrew to serve as a reliable reflection of the spoken language.)

4. For Judeo-Greek studies: Judeo-Romance languages often preserve the only testimony of individual Judeo-Greek components.
5. For Jewish history: Linguistic data often focus the attention of Jewish historians on new research topics in ways that nonlinguistic data rarely can.

Linguistic geography and bilingual dialectology of the co-territorial Jewish and non-Jewish cognate languages emerge as the two primary tools for ascertaining when and where Jewish languages crystallized and, in the case of Judeo-Ibero-Romance languages, for determining which of the latter languages might be direct outgrowths of Judeo-Latin speech, and which are probably the result of much later processes of Judaizing Romance languages. In exploring for the first time the Judeo-Latin legacy of a number of European Jewish languages as well as German slang, Wexler 1992 makes three major claims:

First, Judeo-Spanish (known natively in the Balkans as Judezmo, Judyo, Jidyó and as Ḥakitía in Morocco) and Ladino (Hebrew “relexified” to unspoken Ibero-Romance; see Lefebvre 1986 and Wexler 1996 for a definition of relexification) developed when Arabic-speaking Jews Judaized Castilian dialects between the 11th and 14th centuries. It appears that only the Judaized Ibero-Romance speech of the northeast of the Peninsula (e.g., Judeo-Catalan, and possibly also Judeo-Aragonese and Judeo-Provençal) might be direct continuations of the Judeo-Latin speech brought to the Peninsula by Roman (or Greek) Jewish colonizers (note the remains of a synagogue from around the sixth century with Judeo-Greek inscriptions at Elche, in Alicante Province, Spain).

Second, Yiddish was created uniquely in the bilingual Germano-Slavic southeast German lands on Judeo-Slavic, Judeo-Greek, and minor Judeo-Italian substrata (and possibly even Judeo-Turkic—in the form of Khazar—brought by Caucasian emigrants) by the 9th or 10th centuries, and not in the southwest German lands on combined Judeo-French and Judeo-Italian substrata, as is commonly maintained. Only in southwest German lands were some French components acquired by Judaized German, which did not contribute to the genesis of Yiddish. (Judaized German probably postdates the birth of Yiddish and became extinct in the 15th century.)

Third, it is shown for the first time that Rotwelsch studies are relevant for Judeo-Romance linguistics, given the existence of a Judeo-Romance component in some early German Rotwelsch (slang) lexicons. Jewish linguistic terms would be attractive to Rotwelsch because they would be unlikely to be understood broadly by the German population. In later Rotwelsch lists, dating from the 16th century to the present, one finds a plethora of Romani (Gypsy) loans for the same reason. Significantly, besides Hebrew, some Yiddish Slavicisms and any Germanisms that had unusual meanings in Yiddish not readily recognizable to Germans were also attractive to speakers of Rotwelsch. For example, two variants of Hebrew qlfwt /klafot/ “peels, barks” are usually said to be the source of Rotwelsch klabot (ca. 1450; see Wolf 1956) and claffot (1510; also Wolf) “cloth(ing)” (usually used in the singular). The Yiddish slang counterpart is kluft “clothing” (also attested in Rotwelsch of 1753; see Wolf). The source of -ot in the earliest two Rotwelsch forms is not Hebrew -wt/-ot/, as the plural suffix of Hebrew qlf /klaf/ is -ym /-im/ “parchment, playing card” (vs.

related Hebrew qlph /klipa/ “peel, bark, skin,” which does allow the plural suffix -wt /-ot/). Furthermore, Hebrew /-ot/ would have been pronounced as -o(t)s in a Judeo-French reading tradition of Hebrew (or -es in Yiddish). A more felicitous analysis would be to derive Rotwelsch -ot from (Judeo-) French diminutive -ot, and klap- and claff- from Hebrew /klaf/.

The co-territoriality that developed between different Jewish languages and culture areas produced very different kinds of results in the northern and southern peripheries of the Judeo-Romance territory. In the Iberian Peninsula, the historical language shifts led to the obsolescence of the earliest Judaized languages—Judeo-Catalan and Judeo-Arabic—and to the birth of new Judeo-Castilian and Judeo-Portuguese. The confrontation in the north and southeast of Europe between the newly Judaized German and Yiddish (of Slavic origin with a majority German lexical component)—and Judeo-French, Judeo-Italian, Judeo-Greek, and Judeo-Slavic speech led to the total extinction of all of the latter (unrelexified Judeo-Slavic survived in the East Slavic lands at least up to the 17th century), though a small sediment from all those languages was deposited in regional Yiddish and from Judeo-Romance in Rotwelsch.

Coincidentally, the de-Romanization of the Jews in the south German lands, their re-Romanization in Castile and Portugal, and the obsolescence of Judeo-Catalan and Judeo-French, all date from the 13th to 15th centuries. Thus, in a single historical period most of Judeo-Romance speech disappeared in the successor states of the Roman Empire, leaving perhaps Judeo-Italian (in some of its dialects?) as the sole surviving Judeo-Romance language with uninterrupted links to Judeo-Latin. The status of Judeo-French requires comment. If the northern French communities were in part derived from migrating German Jews, then the French used by the Jews could not be of Judeo-Latin origin; moreover, Judeo-French texts (from France and England both, up to about the 1300s), do not differ significantly from Christian dialects. Judeo-Provençal could conceivably have originally developed directly from Judeo-Latin, but there is no guarantee that the medieval and early modern variants of the language are direct continuations of an original, allegedly Latin-derived, Judeo-Provençal. In the German lands, Yiddish retained its original Judeo-Slavic grammar and sound system, while exchanging most of its vocabulary for German and Hebrew(-like) words.

Conversely, in the Iberian Peninsula, Christians remained more receptive to Arabic elements than the Iberian Jews. The paucity of Arabisms in Judeo-Spanish would be anticipated if Judeo-Arabic speakers first “relexified” their language to Spanish vocabulary, while keeping their grammar and sound system intact. Subsequently, in the emigration, the Sephardic Jews became speakers of “genuine” Spanish, which they minimally Judaized.

Selected Bibliography

- Blondheim, David S. 1925. Les parlers judéo-romans et la Vetus Latina [Judeo-Romance speech and the Vetus latina]. Paris: É. Champion.
- Bunis, David M. 1981. Sephardic Studies. A Research Bibliography Incorporating Judezmo Language, Literature and Folklore, and Historical Background. New York: Garland.

- Bunis, David M. 1983. "Problems in Judezmo Linguistics." Mediterranean Language Review 1: 92–126.
- Jütte, Robert. 1988. Abbild und soziale Wirklichkeit des Bettler- und Gaunertums zu Beginn der Neuzeit [Reflection and Social Reality of Beggars and Thieves at the Beginning of the Modern Age]. Cologne, Germany: Böhlau.
- Kluge, Friedrich. 1901. Rotwelsch. Quellen und Wortschatz der Gaunersprache und der verwandten Geheimsprachen [Rotwelsch. Sources and Lexicon of Thieves' Language and Related Secret Languages]. Strasbourg, France: K. J. Trübner.
- Lefebvre, Claire. 1986. "Relexification in Creole Genesis Revisited: The Case of Haitian Creole." In Substrata Versus Universals in Creole Genesis, edited by Pieter Muysken and Norbert S. H. Smith, 279–300. Amsterdam: John Benjamins.
- Weinreich, Max. 1973. Gešixte fun der jidišer šprax [A History of the Yiddish Language]. New York: YIVO, pp. 1–4.
- Wexler, Paul. 1977. "Ascertaining the Position of Judezmo within Ibero-Romance." Vox romanica 36: 162–195.
- Wexler, Paul. 1982. "Marrano Ibero-Romance: Classification and Research Tasks." Zeitschrift für romanische Philologie 98: 59–108.
- Wexler, Paul. 1988. Three Heirs to a Judeo-Latin legacy: Judeo-Ibero-Romance, Yiddish and Rotwelsch. Wiesbaden, Germany: Harrassowitz.
- Wexler, Paul. 1989. Judeo-Romance Linguistics. A Bibliography (Latin, Italo-, Gallo-, Ibero- and Rhaeto-Romance except Castilian). New York: Garland.
- Wexler, Paul. 1992. The Balkan Substratum of Yiddish. A Reassessment of the Unique Romance and Greek Components. Wiesbaden, Germany: Harrassowitz.
- Wexler, Paul. 1996. The Non-Jewish Origins of the Sephardic Jews. Albany: State University of New York.
- Wolf, Sigmund A. 1956. Wörterbuch des Rotwelschen [Dictionary of German Slang]. Mannheim, Germany: Bibliographisches Institut.

The Yiddish-German Irony

Frank Heynick

---

Up to the late Middle Ages, Jews in the Diaspora spoke as their native tongue the (or a) general language of the land where they lived. Few, if any, Jews grew up speaking a language that could be called particularly "Jewish." Hebrew, the holy language used predominantly in religious ritual, was no one's native tongue.

To the extent the Jewish community of any given land lived in cultural or sociological—as well as, of course, religious—separation from the Gentile population, there was a sociolinguistic tendency to incorporate some distinctive features into the "Gentile" languages they spoke, particularly loanwords from Hebrew (typically, but not exclusively, related to religious matters). Such was the case among the Jewish communities in the German Rhineland in the early centuries of the second millennium CE, who spoke the then-current Middle High German, flavored with a smattering of Hebrew words and in-groups idioms.

The slaughters perpetrated on the Rhineland Jewish communities by the Crusaders en route to the Holy Land in the 12th century, and by a panicked Gentile population during the visitations of the bubonic plague in the 14th century, drove many Rhenish Jews to seek refuge in Eastern Europe. But Germans—Christian and Jewish—were also lured eastward for trade and economic development. The term “German” in Eastern Europe came to be not just an ethnic designation but also a socioeconomic one, referring to a commercial class. This status was a powerful incentive for the transplanted German communities to maintain their language rather than adopt the local Slavic or other language as their native tongue.

The Jewish and Christian Germans involved in the economic colonization of Silesia (today western Poland) shared the same German language and probably also a common German national consciousness. In the farther eastern reaches, however, the situation was somewhat different. All living languages are in a continual, usually gradual, state of evolution. When groups of speakers of the same language are isolated from one another, their tongues tend to drift apart. So, as the Middle High German of Germany became (standardized) Modern High German, the Rhenish German of the Jews of Eastern Europe also evolved, to the extent that it merited its own name: Jüdisch-Deutsch (Jewish German) or simply Jüdisch or Yiddish. But in its syntax (sentence structure), morphology (word structure), and phonology (sound system), Yiddish remained thoroughly Germanic—in some, though not all, ways more conservative than the Standard German of Germany.

In its vocabulary, Yiddish adopted, apart from Hebrew words (often of a religious nature), occasional Slavic or other lexemes. However, Yiddish and Standard German speakers who knew only their own languages could carry on a conversation with a high degree of mutual intelligibility (indeed with greater intelligibility than between a monolingual speaker of Standard German and monolingual speakers of many of the dialects of Germany).

The German Enlightenment of the late 18th century, which had its impact on the cultured elite of Eastern European Jewry, lent new prestige to the Standard German of Germany. In the 19th century, not a few Jews abandoned Yiddish in favor of Standard German in their writing. The Yiddish literati who did not go this far were nevertheless consciously influenced by the style of Modern High German. When efforts were made to standardize Yiddish, which was spoken with some variations by Jewish communities in a dozen countries, Modern High German helped provide a model and helped Yiddish develop new learned and technical terms for the modern age.

Otto von Bismarck, who presided over the welding of the various German lands into a unified Second German Reich in 1871, and who served as its chancellor for two decades, viewed the Jews in Eastern Europe as natural allies of Germany and as an instrument for maintaining German preeminence on the continent, not least because of their Germanic language and their historical and cultural ties to Germany. A few decades later, the chancellor of a Third German Reich saw the situation with the Jews differently. And herein lies not just the unspeakable crime of the Shoah, but also the mind-boggling irony: that a fanatically nationalistic German movement should have targeted for systematic annihilation the very people who had brought their old Germanic language to the eastern marches and the Russian steppes and had so faithfully maintained and nurtured it for centuries.

Yiddish as a Diaspora Language and Its Future

Dovid Katz

---

The notion of Jewish Diaspora languages is an inherently loaded nationalist origin-type term that effectively crowns one language “native” and all others as implicitly “foreign.” The (retrospectively speaking) first Jewish language, biblical Hebrew, was in fact an intricate fusion between the imported Aramaic (of the Abrahamic clan) and the native Canaanite (of the Promised Land’s native inhabitants), along with some later admixtures from Egyptian, Persian, and other foreign sources. Still, if ancient Hebrew is regarded as the first and only native Jewish language for having arisen in ancient Israel, then Jewish Aramaic, the second major Jewish language, becomes at once its first Diaspora language (during and after the Babylonian Exile). Jewish Aramaic went on, of course, to become the prime Jewish vernacular in Palestine throughout the Second Temple period and beyond. If a Diaspora language is brought to the Holy Land, does it stay a Diaspora language? And what of a native language taken to a Diaspora where it develops far beyond its original “in-the-native-land” scope? The popular definitions are conceptually problematic.

Frequently, however, the term “Jewish Diaspora languages” is diplomatically reserved primarily for the European period in Jewish history, which started around a millennium ago, in contradistinction to both Hebrew and Aramaic, themselves closely related northwest Semitic dialects. The European Jewish Diaspora language category has come to include, among others: Laazic (Judeo-Italian), Knaanic (Judeo-Slavic), Yevanic (Judeo-Greek), and Zarphatic (Judeo-French). The first-cited “linguonym” in each case reflects the anthropologic method of looking through the eyes of the culture in question and avoiding the externalized (and often disparaging) hyphenated nomenclature imposed (by which logic Hebrew might have been “Israelo-Canaanite,” and is in fact called “Language of Canaan” in the Hebrew Bible itself, at Isaiah 19:18). Yiddish scholars Matisyohu Miesis (1885–1945), Solomon A. Birnbaum (1891–1989), and Max Weinreich (1894–1969) passionately championed the “internalized” conceptualization of all the Jewish languages, sometimes attempting to put them on a generally equal conceptual footing—though they are by no means equal by the empirical measures of number of speakers, geographic extent, duration in history, literary output, or structural and lexical differentiation from the major source language.

The two best-known European Jewish languages are Ladino (or Judezmo or “Judeo-Spanish”), the language of pre-expulsion Sephardic Jewry on the Iberian Peninsula (and its progeny in various parts of Europe and northern Africa), and Yiddish, the language of Ashkenazic Jewry, which has been spoken by more Jews than all the other Jewish languages combined, and alone among the European Jewish languages is in the league of Hebrew and Aramaic in the realm of its qualitative and quantitative literary output (much of which remains to be studied).

Yiddish arose around a thousand years ago, among the (retrospectively speaking) first Ashkenazim, who came to inhabit the Rhine and Danube basins (linguistic evidence pointing more to the latter, more easterly region). The language combines—in a highly specific and intricate series of “fusion formulas”—the inherited Hebrew and Aramaic remnants the settlers brought with them with the majority component evolved from local urban dialects of German. From the start, Yiddish participated in an elaborate system of internal Jewish trilingualism. As the sole and universal vernacular, it stood in largely complementary distribution with the two classic languages that were studied, recited, and, importantly, also used for new literary works: the more prestigious Hebrew, used for biblical and legal commentaries and community correspondence, among others, and the still more prestigious Aramaic, used for major Talmudic and kabbalistic works.

Written Yiddish words are attested from the 11th century onward. The oldest dated Yiddish sentence is from 1272. In time, older Yiddish literature developed a “secular” branch, which included reworkings of medieval knightly European romances, such as the King Arthur cycle, into Yiddish, and significantly, the fusing of the European epic genre with Jewish material, perhaps best exemplified by the Shmuel bukh and Mlokhim bukh, based on the biblical books of Samuel and Kings. The synthesis of ancient Jewish content with contemporary European form is in a sense a metaphor for Yiddish generally. A pietistic and religious branch of Yiddish literature, which came to prominence in the 16th century, included works on morals and ethics and, eventually, complete Bible and prayer book translations, as well as original Yiddish prayers, particularly for women, that are known as tkhines.

From its original territory in central Europe, Yiddish expanded along with the migrations of the Ashkenazim, who fled medieval Christian massacres and expulsions (including the Crusades) on the original German-based territory. Colonies of Ashkenazim arose to the south (in Italy), the north (Holland), and, most significantly, in many parts of the Slavic and Baltic lands of Eastern Europe, which eventually came to constitute Ashkenaz II or Eastern Ashkenaz.

Within Eastern Yiddish, two major dialects of Yiddish developed: a northern (Lithuanian-Belorussian) dialect known as Lítvish (Northeastern Yiddish to linguists); and a southern (Polish-Ukrainian) variety sometimes called Póylish though it is itself markedly divided into a western (Polish-Galician-Hungarian) variety (Mideastern Yiddish) and an eastern (Ukrainian-Bessarabian-Rumanian) variety (Southeastern Yiddish).

In Eastern Europe during the later half of the history of the language, a prominent Slavic component joined the core Semitic + Germanic union that is universal to both Western and Eastern Yiddish. This gave added capacity for nuanced meanings; see, for example, neutral víkhtik (important) from Germanic, respectfully human referencing of khóshev (esteemed) from Hebrew, and humorous or sarcastic vázhne from Slavic. It is not always possible to predict which historic source might contribute the unmarked or neutral form; see, for example, póshet (simple) from Hebrew versus prost (coarse or uncultured, of a person) versus German-derived éynfakh (simplistic), which is usually limited to journalistic usage. A nar (fool), from Germanic, can be anyone, but only a Jew can be a típes or shóyte (from Hebrew).

The older dialects of Western Yiddish faded away, from the 18th century, as western Ashkenazim were assimilating to German and other central European cultures. In Eastern Europe, by contrast, Yiddish expanded dramatically, both demographically and culturally. The language became central to the new Hasidic movement in Ukraine and beyond in the 18th century. Moreover, various offshoots of the Haskalah enlightenment movement began to develop a variegated and vast modern-genre literature in the language in the 19th century. High-level Yiddish fiction is traditionally dated to November 24, 1864, when Mendele Moykher Sforim (Sh. Y. Abramovitsh, ca. 1836–1917) began to publish, in installments, his first Yiddish novel. His satiric fiction was followed by the romanticism of Y. L. Peretz (1852–1915) and the humor of Shalom Aleichem (pseudonym of Sholem Rabinowitz, 1859–1916). The Mendele–Peretz–Aleichem trio became known as the “triumvirate” of classic modern Yiddish literature.

From the start of the 20th century, a network of modern cultural and educational institutions, a vibrant daily press, and an ever more sophisticated literature helped mark the status of Yiddish as one of the major languages in Jewish history. In addition to the output of thousands of authors, there was an overarching demography. On the eve of World War II, there were around 13 million Yiddish speakers in the world, split between the native territory of Eastern Europe and the immigration centers. There were leading centers of Yiddish culture in Poland and other East European countries, and until the Stalinist repressions, there was a considerable Soviet Yiddish literature, too. In the West, New York City became a major center of Yiddish literature, press, education, and theater. In 1978, Polish-born Isaac Bashevis Singer (1904–1991), who migrated to the United States in 1935, was awarded a Nobel Prize for literature.

Yiddish language and culture were decimated by the Holocaust; most of the 6 million victims were native speakers, and the Eastern Ashkenazic civilization was destroyed in its native lands. The suppression of Yiddish in the Land of (and during the early years of the State of) Israel, the violent Stalinist repressions in the Soviet Union, and massive voluntary abandonment in western countries in the course of assimilation to the dominant national cultures, led to predictions of the imminent death of the language by the late 20th century. These were only slightly mitigated by the rise, on the one hand, of symbolic and sentimental reattachment in the west (e.g., Leo Rosten’s Joy of Yiddish in 1968 in the United States), and on the other, by the development of serious study of Yiddish language and literature at leading universities in North America, Israel, and Europe in the waning years of the century.

By the middle of the first decade of the 21st century, the number of (by then elderly) Yiddish speakers who had come to maturity before World War II dropped to around half a million, and this number was quickly collapsing with the death of this last prewar generation. The advent of several thousand younger “Yiddish enthusiasts” around the world, only several dozen of whom were capable of publishing extensive works in the language itself (rather than just work “about” Yiddish), could barely offset the devastating demographic loss of the last prewar generation.

The demographic surprise has come from Yiddish-speaking Haredim, and particularly Hasidim of the southern dynasties (including Satmar, Vizhnitz, Belz), among whom there were, by the midpoint of the first decade of the 21st century, over half a million Yiddish speakers of childbearing age internationally, ensuring the continuity of the vernacular language. Hasidim are producing a considerable Yiddish didactic and popular literature, and they publish a number of weekly newspapers. One of the largest-circulation Yiddish newspapers, the Algemeyner zhurnal, is edited by a prominent Lubavitch Hasidic family in Brooklyn (the Jacobsons), and it seeks to synthesize religious and secular material, in contrast to such publications as Satmar’s Der yid, which are strictly in-group. Given that Israeli Hebrew is not spoken by families that did not live in Israel per se, Yiddish is set to remain the world’s major (or only) Jewish Diaspora language, though only for sections of ultra-Orthodox Jewry, particularly its southern Eastern Europe origin Hasidic groups.

The historic layering of the language itself perhaps determines its status as a living linguistic repository of multiple “native” and “Diaspora” periods of Jewish history alike. Phrases such as shíker vi Lot (as drunk as Lot = very drunk; see Genesis 19, 31–36), a Yeróvm ben Nevót (a Jeroboam son of Nebat = an evil man) are among the many embedded expressions that hark back to the biblical period. A corpus of logical words comes from Aramaic of the Talmudic period, including such everyday items as aváde (definitely), makhtéyse (okay!) and mistáme (probably). Others are evocative of events in European Jewish history, for example, shabsetsvínik (believer in Sabbethai Zevi = someone who believes in something even after it’s apparent that it was a fraud), m’zol em brénen un brótn (even if he were burned and roasted = [he wouldn’t speak even if] burned and roasted [by the Inquisition]), fun Méylekh Sobétski’s yorn (from the years of King Sobieski [of Poland] = a very long time ago).

Beyond the synchronic linguistic embedding of millennia of Jewish history, the lexical and semantic structure per se of Yiddish is specifically Jewish at a cultural depth that transcends the language politician’s “native” versus “Diaspora” dichotomy. For example, gest (from Germanic) are any kind of guests; órkhim (from Hebrew) are (usually poor) Jewish guests welcomed for a Sabbath or holiday to one’s home or town; ushpízin (from Aramaic) are seven biblical figures, from Abraham to David, who visit the sukkah during the festival of Súkes (Sukkoth, Feast of Tabernacles) according to Jewish mystical tradition.

In contrast to modern Israeli Hebrew, Yiddish often retains the exclusively Judaic connotation of traditional terms, with “near-synonyms” from non-Hebraic roots being used for a corresponding general concept, for example, bitókhñ (optimism based on faith in God), mitsráyim (ancient, biblical-era Egypt), ríshñ (first day of a Jewish holiday), and yad (pointer for the Torah reading) versus the non-Hebraically derived words for “optimism” (optimízm), modern Egypt (Egíptñ), “first” (érshter), and “hand” (hant). Compare with the modern Hebrew bitakhón (“security”), mitsráyim (Egypt), rishón (“first”), and yad (“hand”).

In considering today's Jewish languages, it is prudent to keep in mind that modern Israeli Hebrew (Ivrit) has its roots in the work of Eliezer Ben-Yehuda and other East European revivers of the late 19th and early 20th centuries, and has been vastly affected by Yiddish and other European languages (in spite of many purist efforts to avoid this eventuality). Nearly all of Bialik's and Tchernichowsky's classic Hebrew poetry must be enjoyed with the Yiddish affected penultimate ("Diaspora") stress pattern (miléyl) of Yiddish and Yiddish-impacted Ashkenazic Hebrew. At the same time, Yiddish presents an uninterrupted chain of linguistic continuity that spans all of Jewish history. The essence of these two languages—Israeli Hebrew and Yiddish—can hardly be described, therefore, as "native" versus "Diaspora"; nevertheless, their functionality today and prognoses for the coming century do lead to a differentiation between the language of the State of Israel and the vernacular of traditionalist Hasidim. Outside the Yiddish-speaking Hasidic population, the remnant of Yiddish culture is more in a literary and cultural heritage than a viable future vernacular, though it is impossible to predict the directions future Hasidic Yiddish will take, particularly in the countries of the Diaspora.

Selected Bibliography

- Birnbaum, Solomon A. 1942. "Jewish Languages." In Essays in Honour of the Very Reb. Dr. J. H. Hertz, edited by I. Epstein, E. Levine, and C. Roth, 51–67. London: Edward Goldston.
- Fishman, David E. 2005. The Rise of Modern Yiddish Culture. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press.
- Goldsmith, Emanuel S. 1997. Modern Yiddish Culture. The Story of the Yiddish Language Movement. New York: Fordham University Press.
- Katz, Dovid. 1985. "Hebrew, Aramaic and the Rise of Yiddish." Readings in the Sociology of Jewish Languages, edited by J. A. Fishman, 85–103. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Katz, Dovid. 2007. Words on Fire: The Unfinished Story of Yiddish, rev. ed. New York: Basic Books.
- Katz, Dovid. YIVO Encyclopedia of Jews in Eastern Europe, S. V. "Yiddish." <http://www.yivo.org/downloads/Yiddish.pdf> (accessed April 2, 2008).
- Mieses, Matthias. 1915. Die Entstehungsursache der jüdischen Dialekte. Vienna: R. Löwit Verlag.
- Weinreich, Max. 2007. History of the Yiddish Language. Translated by Shlomo Noble with the assistance of Joshua A. Fishman. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

The Integration of Yiddish into English

Arnie Keogh

---

From its beginnings, Yiddish has been the language of a minority culture, dispersed throughout Central Europe. Since the Holocaust, it has been the native language (mame-loshn) of an ever-smaller minority, yet its influence has been disproportionately great, particularly on the English language. And although it has been adopted primarily as an idiomatic feature of American English, the widespread influence of the American language—through the economic and cultural power of American print, film, and electronic media—means Yiddish has become diffused through all of the world's English-speaking cultures. "Diffused" is the operative word here: like "Diaspora" (dispersion) it implies both "widespread" and "thinned out."

It is not only through American English that the influence of Yiddish has been felt. In Australia, for example, the word cobber (friend, mate) is derived from the Yiddish khaver, and cop (grab, as in "cop a little sleep") comes from the Yiddish khap. These and other Australian slang terms may have arrived with Jews transported as convicts from England in the 19th century.

Like all other languages, Yiddish functions to maintain the social and cultural solidarity of its speakers: it forms a linguistic barrier that separates the us within from the them without. But the barriers of language must be permeable, so that useful words and phrases may be imported from outside, and so that cultural goods may be exported to the wider world. Often, new words become naturalized. Speakers may be unaware of their foreignness; how many English speakers, for example, are aware that pyjama is a Hindi word, and tycoon a Chinese one?

Sometimes, though, imported words carry the flavor of the land of their origin. Or at least what the importers think of as that flavor. The Romans used Latin, for instance, for all kinds and levels of discourse. But modern English speakers use Latin phrases (quid pro quo, mutatis mutandis) as markers of learning, the language of lawyers and doctors. And French phrases (je ne sais quoi, comme il faut) represent the speaker's observance of the diplomatic language of nuance—to use another French term.

Part of the question here is: What are the cultural assumptions made by English speakers using Yiddish phrasing? What constitutes the "Jewishness" of this Jewish language? Michael Wex offers "complaint" in his recent book, Born to Kvetch (New York, 2005), and Leo Rosten, in Hooray for Yiddish (London, 1983), frequently uses the terms "scorn" and "sarcasm." But is it really bitter resentment that is at the heart of the cultural imagination of Yiddish?

In the early 1970s, a television commercial for a hot breakfast cereal showed a patrician George Washington seated at a colonial table to which his wife brings a pewter bowl containing, "Your breakfast, George." The American president dips his spoon in the bowl, lifts it to his Roman nose, and says, "Feh!"

The point of the ad is that Washington would—and the viewers should—prefer a cereal more to Jewish taste, that the advertiser's product has tam. Implicit in the ad is the poetic logic that Jews know what tastes good, that the ad's George Washington had Jewish taste and was "Jewish," and that the approximately 98 percent of non-Jewish Americans—the patriotic offspring of "the Father of his Country"—thus became, temporarily, metaphorically Jewish. "Feh," an expression of distaste, is an example of what linguists call "psycho-ostensives," words or phrases that serve as verbal emotional gestures, such as oy, sha, and nu, expressing, respectively, a groan of pleasure or pain, a demand for silence, and a nudge requesting the auditor to say or do something.

A number of Yiddish words are used untranslated in English, serving an emotional function for which there are no clear synonyms. Words like shlep (drag), chutzpah (effrontery), mayvin (expert), and yenta (busybody) have so entered the English language that their spelling seems to have become standardized, despite their nonconformity with official systems of transliteration.

Words prefixed with sh- are popularly used as markers of yiddishkayt: the salesman's shpiel, the comedian's shtick, the briber's shmeer, the unlucky schlemiel, and the stupid shmuck; the sounds let the hearers know that the speaker is "talking Jewish." And the sh- is used in invented comic rhymes, to sound Jewish: "fancy-shmancy," "Oedipus-Shmoedipus," and the like. Sometimes, to make the words look even more exotic, the prefix is spelled sch-.

Suffixes, too, like the -nik in nudnik, have been adapted for use in words like beatnik and peacenik; likewise, the diminutive -ele in mamele and bubele are appended when one wants a word to be an endearment.

In addition to such semantic importations, syntax—the arrangement of words in clauses and sentences—is another, perhaps more significant, penetration of Yiddish into English. Yiddish imperative constructions are imported into English: "Drop dead!" "Look who's talking!" and even "Live long and prosper," a usage of Leonard Nimoy's character Mr. Spock in Star Trek.

Interrogatives are an even more frequent direct borrowing from Yiddish. Repetition of a question to show that the answer is obvious: "Is he rich?" "Is he rich?" Repeating a statement as a question: "I'm depressed." "You're depressed?" Answering a question with a question: "What are you doing?" "What should I be doing?"

And then there is the direct translation of Yiddish syntactical peculiarities. Inversions of what would be normal word order in English are common in Yiddish, particularly the placement of the object before the subject: "Him I don't respect" sounds exotic to the ears of English speakers. Other Yiddish formations are also translated directly into English: "Ikh vil du zolst koyfn . . ." becomes "I want you should buy. . . ." "Genug shoynt!" is commonly heard as "Enough already" or "All right already." Shoynt (now) and vider (again) constructions are transported into English as Yiddishisms: Shoynt vider mit di frages! becomes, in English, "Again with the questions!"

Some of those who use Yiddish terms and structures in English use them consciously, choosing to sound Jewish, to claim Jewish identity, even if only for the moment, even if only ironically, and even if they are not Jews. I recall a non-Jewish friend complaining once, "We're living like goyim."

The Yiddish word can be used to make the complaint humorous. It may be that humor is the underlying cultural assumption about Yiddish, particularly among those for whom Yiddish is not a first language. Jews tell jokes, usually jokes about Jews. And they make wisecracks, expressions of complaint, scorn, or sarcasm—but the bitterness is more than tempered by laughter: "He's his own worst enemy" and "Not while I'm alive."

The humor in the use of Yiddish is very likely a defence, the means by which a minority people—frequently despised, often threatened—maintain solidarity, identity, and even superiority to their circumstances.

Diaspora Influences on Modern Hebrew (“Israeli”)

Ghilad Zuckermann

---

Hebrew was spoken by the Jewish people after the so-called conquest of Canaan (ca. 13th century BCE). It belonged to the Canaanite division of the northwestern branch of Semitic languages. After a gradual decline, it ceased to be spoken by the second century CE. The failed Bar-Kokhba Revolt against the Romans in Judea in 132–135 CE, in which hundreds of thousands of Jews were exterminated, marks the symbolic end of the period of spoken Hebrew. For more than 1,700 years thereafter, Hebrew was comatose. It served as a liturgical and literary language and occasionally as a lingua franca for Jews of the Diaspora, but not as a mother tongue.

Unlike Maskilic Hebrew (i.e., the Hebrew of the Haskalah), a literary language, Israeli (or Modern Hebrew) is a living mother tongue. Its formation was facilitated in Eretz Israel at the end of the 19th century by the most famous revival ideologue Eliezer Ben-Yehuda (1858–1922, born Perelman), schoolteachers, and enthusiastic supporters. Ben-Yehuda’s son, Itamar Ben-Avi (1882–1943), is symbolically considered to have been the first native Israeli-speaker. He was born one year after Ben-Yehuda, a native Yiddish-speaker, conversant in Russian and French, arrived in Eretz Israel.

During the past century, Israeli has become the primary mode of communication in all domains of public and private life. Yet with the growing diversification of Israeli society, it has also come to highlight the very absence of a unitary civic culture among citizens who seem increasingly to share only their language. Israeli is currently one of the official languages—with Arabic and English—of the State of Israel. It is spoken to varying degrees of fluency by its 7 million citizens (as of 2006)—as a mother tongue by most Jews (whose total number exceeds 5.3 million), and as a second language by Muslims (Arabic speakers), Christians (e.g., Russian and Arabic speakers), Druze (Arabic speakers), and others. It is also spoken by some non-Israeli Palestinians, as well as by a few Diaspora Jews. (There are approximately 5,280,000 Jews in the United States, 494,000 in France, 372,000 in Canada, 298,000 in the United Kingdom, and 235,000 in Russia.)

The genetic classification of “Israeli,” the language that emerged in Palestine at the end of the 19th century, has preoccupied linguists since its genesis. The still prevalent, traditional view suggests that Israeli is Semitic: (Biblical/Mishnaic) Hebrew revived. The revisionist position defines Israeli as Indo-European: Yiddish relexified; in other words, Yiddish, the revivalists’ mother tongue, is the “substratum,” and Hebrew is only a “superstratum” providing the vocabulary (cf. Horvath and Wexler 1997). This author’s mosaic (rather than Mosaic) hypothesis is that “genetically modified” Israeli is a “semi-engineered” multilayered language, which is a Semito-European, or Eurasian, hybrid—that is, both Semitic (Afro-Asiatic) and (Indo-) European. It is based simultaneously on “sleeping beauty”/“walking dead” Hebrew, máme lóshn (mother tongue) Yiddish (both being primary contributors

Eliezer Ben-Yehuda, credited as the founder and reviver of modern Hebrew. One of the first Zionists, he worked on the grammar and modernization of the language. His stubborn refusal to speak anything but Hebrew paved the way for it to gradually become a spoken language again. (Jewish Chronicle Ltd./HIP/The Image Works) rather than “substrata”), and many other languages, such as Russian, Polish, German, Judaeo-Spanish (Ladino), Arabic, and English. Therefore, the term “Israeli” is far more appropriate than “Israeli Hebrew,” let alone “Modern Hebrew” or “Hebrew” tout court.

Almost all revivalists—for example, Ben-Yehuda—were native Yiddish speakers who wanted to speak Hebrew, with Semitic grammar and pronunciation, like Arabs. Ben-Yehuda would have been most content had Israelis spoken biblical Hebrew, which he (and many others) considered the “purest” form of Hebrew. The Sephardic pronunciation (e.g., with “more Semitic” consonants and word final stress) was preferred to the Ashkenazic one. Ben-Yehuda often attempted to base his neologisms on Semitic languages such as Arabic.

However, not only were the revivalists European, but their campaign itself was inspired by European—for example, Bulgarian—nationalism. At the time, although territory and language were at the heart of European nationalism, the Jews possessed neither a national territory nor a national language. Zionism could be considered a fascinating manifestation of European discourses channeled into the Holy Land—see George Eliot’s Daniel Deronda (1876).

The revivalists could not avoid the Ashkenazic mind-set arising from their diasporic European cultural background. Their attempt to belie their (more recent) roots, negate diasporism (which was considered weak), and avoid hybridity (as reflected in the Slavonized, Romance/Semitic-substrate, Germanic Yiddish itself), failed.

One of the main problems facing revivalists was indeed that of Hebrew lexical voids, which were not semantic voids but cases in which purists tried to supplant unwelcome guest words, foreignisms, and loanwords. The revivalists attempted to use mainly internal sources of lexical enrichment but were faced with a paucity of roots. They changed the meanings of obsolete Hebrew terms to fit the modern world. This infusion often entailed the secularization of religious terms.

Semantic secularizations often involved ideologically manipulative “lexical engineering,” as exemplified by deliberate, subversive mechanisms of extreme semantic shifting, pejoration, amelioration, trivialization, and allusion. This is the case of a camouflaged impact of the Diaspora as the neologizers were influenced by secular movements such as the Haskalah. An example of such transvaluation is בלורית. Mishnaic Hebrew [bIllokrit] is “Mohawk, an upright strip of hair that runs across the crown of the head from the forehead to the nape of the neck,” characteristic of the abominable pagan and not to be touched by the Jewish barber. But defying religious values, secular socialist Zionists use blorit, with the meaning “forelock, hair above the forehead,” which becomes one of the defining characteristics of the Sabra (native Israeli). Thus, the “new Jew” is ultimately a pagan!

From time to time it is alleged that Hebrew never died (e.g., Haramati 1992, 2000; Chomsky 1957, 218). It is true that, throughout its literary history, Hebrew was used as an occasional lingua franca. However, between the 2nd and 19th centuries it was no one’s mother tongue, and in the opinion of this author the development of a literary language is very different from that of a fully fledged native language.

That said, what makes the “genetics” of Israeli grammar so complex is the fact that the combination of Semitic and Indo-European influences is a phenomenon occurring already within the primary (and secondary) contributors to Israeli. Yiddish, a Germanic language with Romance, Hebrew, and Aramaic substrata (and with most dialects having undergone Slavonization), was shaped by Hebrew and Aramaic. On the other hand, Indo-European languages, such as Greek, played a role in pre-medieval Hebrews. Moreover, before the emergence of Israeli, Yiddish, and other European languages influenced medieval and Maskilic variants of Hebrew (see Glinert 1991), which, in turn, influenced Israeli (in tandem with the European contribution).

The distinction between forms and patterns is crucial, too. In the 1920s and 1930s, gdud meginéy hasafá, “the language defendants regiment” (see Shur 2000), whose motto was ivri, dabér ivrit, “Hebrew [i.e., Jew], speak Hebrew!” used to tear down signs written in “foreign” languages and disturb Yiddish theater gatherings. However, the members of this group did not look for Yiddish and Standard Average European patterns in the speech of the Israelis who did choose to speak “Hebrew.” (The term “Standard Average European” was first introduced by Whorf [1941, 25] and recently received more attention from Haspelmath [1998, 2001] and Bernini and Ramat [1996].)

This is, obviously, not to say that the revivalists, had they paid attention to patterns, would have managed to neutralize the impact of their mother tongues, which was often subconscious (hence the term “semi-engineered”). Although they have engaged in a campaign for linguistic purity, the language the revivalists “created” often mirrors the very cultural differences they sought to erase. The alleged victory of Hebrew over Yiddish was, in fact, a Pyrrhic one. Victorious Hebrew is, after all, partly European at heart. Yiddish and Standard Average European survive beneath “osmotic” Israeli grammar.

The Founder Principle

Had the revivalists been Arabic-speaking Jews (e.g., from Morocco), Israeli would have been a totally different language—both genetically and typologically, much more Semitic. The impact of the founder population on Israeli is incomparable with that of later immigrants. The following is how Zelinsky (1973, 13–14) describes the influence of first settlements, from the point of view of cultural geography:

Whenever an empty territory undergoes settlement, or an earlier population is dislodged by invaders, the specific characteristics of the first group able to effect a viable self-perpetuating society are of crucial significance to the later social and cultural geography of the area, no matter how tiny the initial band of settlers may have been [. . .] in terms of lasting impact, the activities of a few hundred, or even a few score, initial colonizers can mean much more for the cultural geography of a place than the contributions of tens of thousands of new immigrants generations later.

Harrison et al. (1988) discuss the “founder effect” in biology and human evolution, and Mufwene (2001) applies it as a creolistic tool to explain why the structural features of so-called creoles (which he regards as “normal languages” just like English) are largely predetermined by the characteristics of the languages spoken by the founder population, in other words, by the first colonists. It is proposed that the following Founder Principle in the context of Israeli: Yiddish is a primary contributor to Israeli because it was the mother tongue of the vast majority of revivalists and first pioneers in Eretz Israel at the crucial period of the beginning of Israeli.

The Founder Principle works because by the time later immigrations came to Israel, Israeli had already entrenched the fundamental parts of its grammar. Thus, Moroccan Jews arriving in Israel in the 1950s had to learn a fully fledged language (even though it often did not appear so to the Hebrew-obsessed language planners). Obviously, they initially developed their own variety of Israeli, but ultimately the influence of their mother tongue was relatively negligible. Wimsatt’s (1999a; 1999b) notion of “generative entrenchment” is of relevance here. As Mufwene puts it, “the oldest features have a greater chance of prevailing over some newer alternatives simply because they have acquired more and more carriers, hence more transmitters, with each additional generation of speakers” (2001, 29).

At the same time—and unlike anti-revivalist revisionists—the author suggests that lethargic liturgical Hebrew, too, fulfills the criteria of a primary contributor for the following reasons: (1) Despite millennia without native speakers, it persisted as a most important cultural, literary, and liturgical language throughout the generations; and (2) revivalists made a huge effort to revive it and were, in fact, partly successful.

The Congruence Principle (Multiple Causation)

By and large, while Israeli phonetics, phonology and syntax are mostly European, its morphological forms and basic vocabulary are mainly—albeit not exclusively—Semitic. However, the author's research has demonstrated the Congruence Principle: If a feature exists in more than one contributing language, it is more likely to persist in the target language.

This principle is applicable to all languages and, indeed, to linguistic evolution in general. After all, every language is mixed to some extent (see Schuchardt 1884 and Hjelmslev 1938). For example, in the case of “phono-semantic matching” (Zuckermann 2003), a lexical item derives simultaneously from two (or more) sources that are (often serendipitously) phonetically and semantically similar. Such lexical accommodations are frequently concocted by language planners as a means of camouflaged borrowing.

The Congruence Principle is of particular importance, however, to new languages such as Israeli, that is, to linguistic genesis. Often the role of European languages in Israeli was not deliberate. Consider the Israeli expression niyá lo khóshekh baenáim, literally, “Darkness has been made in his eyes,” that is, “He saw blackness (after bad news),” a calque of Yiddish siz im gevórñ, fíntst↔r in di óygn “id.,” which, in turn, is traceable back to a Hebrew term meaning, literally, “His eyes became dark,” that is, “He saw blackness (after bad news).” The useful outcome is that Israeli has a historically related minimal pair, the Yiddish-descent phrase being of a lower register compared with khashkhú enáv (thus pronounced in Israeli). This is a marvelous manifestation of Israeli as a palimpsestic multilayered language.

The Congruence Principle can also be profitably used to allow for grammatical features of Israeli. Hebrew grammatical features, which—either serendipitously or due to an earlier Indo-European influence—were congruent with those of Standard Average European, Yiddish and other European languages were favored, and vice versa. This leads to the discussion of enhancement or reinforcement.

In sui generis Israeli the impact of Yiddish and Standard Average European is apparent in all the components of the language but usually in patterns rather than in forms. Moreover, Israeli demonstrates a unique and spectacular split between morphology and phonology. Whereas most Israeli Hebrew morphological forms, for example, discontinuously conjugated verbs, are Hebrew, the phonetics and phonology of Israeli—including these very forms—are European (see Zuckermann 2005). One of the reasons for overlooking this split is the axiom that morphology—rather than phonology—is the most important component in genetic classification. In fact, such a morpho-phonological split is not apparent in most languages of the world and is definitely rare in “genetic” languages. Israeli's “non-geneticness” makes it a hybrid language.

The study of Israeli offers a unique insight into the dynamics between language and culture in general and in particular into the role of language as a source of collective self-perception. When one revives a language, even at best one should expect to end up with a hybrid. Israeli is a “non-genetic” (cf. Thomason and Kaufman 1988), multilayered language, only partially engineered. Whatever one chooses to call it, one should acknowledge, and celebrate, its complexity.

Selected Bibliography

- Horvath, J., and P. Wexler, eds. 1997. Relexification in Creole and Non-Creole Languages—With Special Attention to Haitian Creole, Modern Hebrew, Romani, and Rumanian. Wiesbaden, Netherlands: Harrassowitz.
- Mufwene, S. S. 2001. The Ecology of Language Evolution. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Thomason, S. G., and T. Kaufman. 1988. Language Contact, Creolization, and Genetic Linguistics. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Zelinsky, W. 1973. The Cultural Geography of the United States: A Revised Edition. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall.
- Zuckermann, G. 2003. Language Contact and Lexical Enrichment in Israeli Hebrew. London: Palgrave Macmillan.

Music and Culture of the Diaspora

Overview of Diaspora Jewish Music

Marsha Bryan Edelman

---

The destruction of the Jerusalem Temple in 586 BCE sent the city's residents into exile in Babylonia, which became the first Jewish community outside biblical Israel. Only when 120,000 Iraqi Jews immigrated to the modern State of Israel between 1949 and 1952 did their 2,500-year Diaspora experience come to an end. Interestingly, these Jews brought with them a musical tradition that ethnomusicologists consider the closest available representation of what Jewish music might have sounded like during the heyday of the Temple ritual. The Babylonians among whom they had lived sang songs and played instruments in a style that was consistent with the music the Israelites had adopted during their earliest days as an independent people. More important, these Jewish residents of the Middle East (including their Yemenite cousins, who are presumed to be an ancient offshoot of the original Babylonia community, as well as coreligionists who made their way to Syria and Lebanon) were isolated from later developments in Western music. Although one cannot suggest that the music of the Temple period did not undergo significant change during 2,500 years, that change was organic, an evolution born of oral transmission and inevitable alterations caused by omissions and subsequent recreations. The music of the Jews of Arab lands is not seen to have undergone fundamental departure from its earliest roots.

The destruction of the Second Jerusalem Temple, in 70 CE, had two immediate effects on the evolution of Jewish music:

1. The loss of the Temple itself caused a cessation of the sacrificial ritual offered there, along with all of the musical ceremonies that attended it. The elaborate performances of the Temple choirs and orchestra were silenced.
2. The rabbinic response to this cataclysm was to declare a ban on public performance of music as a sign of the community's mourning for its lost religious center (not to mention its political autonomy). While the centuries saw an evolution of liturgical rites to take the places of sacrifices, the music that accompanied that new liturgy was circumscribed in the extreme.

Moreover, the inevitable outcome of this second dispersion of the Jews from their homeland—this to last for nearly two millennia—was the geographic isolation of Jewish communities from each other and the subsequent assimilation of local customs into the once-homogeneous fabric of Jewish life. This was to have a profound impact on Jewish musical practice.

Notwithstanding these rabbinic pronouncements, the people continued to make music. Mothers sang to their babies, workers sang songs of pride in their accomplishments, and life-cycle ceremonies were attended by songs of tradition and values. But the history of post-Temple Jewish music is both the story of the people's attitudes toward the rabbis' decrees and the result of contact with other cultures encountered during dispersion in a wide variety of geographic locales. This essay will explore the emergence of Jewish music in the Diaspora as it underwent influence by local customs and some of the changing interpretations of the rabbinic edicts that resulted from these contacts.

Traditional Music: Liturgical Rites

The most important change in religious practice in the Diaspora was the need to replace the Temple service. New liturgies retained the broad outlines of Temple practice, and in a remarkable display of theological unity in the face of geographic dispersion, Jewish prayer emerged with room for local variation and personal improvisation, but with clear consensus on basic texts and forms. The psalms continued to figure prominently in Jewish worship, and early synagogue song was characterized by simple chanting of these passages according to a form known as "psalmody." The psalms themselves were constructed primarily of parallel phrases, usually with equal numbers of stressed syllables. The basic form of psalmody called for a brief sequence of introductory pitches leading to a reciting note on which the bulk of the phrase was intoned, followed by a medial or final cadence. Small variations in each verse accommodated uneven numbers of unstressed syllables, providing the illusion of asymmetry, but in fact offering an easily learned pattern that could be quickly absorbed by a congregation with a new role in contributing to the service.

Over time, however, the chants themselves took on liturgical import, differentiating morning and evening services and distinguishing Sabbath and festival rituals from each other and from weekday forms. Particular scales and specific motives identified liturgical occasions, and fixed melodies alternated with improvised chants, which preserved the identifying markers for the rite. This nusach bore strong resemblance to the plainsong of the early Christian Church, but far exceeded it in its ability to accommodate variations in the length of phrases and in the patterns of stressed and unstressed syllables. More important, the possibility that any learned male member of a community might lead the prayers allowed for a greater degree of variation and personal performance style than the church allowed. Furthermore, as the development of the liturgy proceeded, liturgical hymns called piyutim were added to the service. The oldest of these apparently conformed to the psalmodic pattern of parallel phrases with equal numbers of stressed syllables, but the varying lengths of actual verses required an elastic treatment of the melodies. In addition, the custom arose to allow prayer leaders to extemporaneously create their own liturgical insertions. This led to the emergence of a corps of hazzanim who were more musically adept than other potential prayer leaders, but who, from the start, were often regarded with contempt for their practice of unnecessarily elongating the services with displays of their liturgical and vocal virtuosity.

The same pattern of psalmodic introduction, essential core, and concluding tones that dominated liturgical singing characterized the communal reading of biblical text. Public reading of the Torah had been initiated during the time of the Second Temple and remained an essential part of the worship service in the aftermath of the Temple's destruction. The patterns of the biblical phrases were transmitted through oral tradition and communicated by means of hand symbols called "chironomy." Attempts to develop a written notion for these phrases, and gradually a delineated tradition ascribing particular grammatical and musical importance to each word in the text, developed after the sixth century. This elaborated appreciation of the text, using ta'amei mikra (literally, "accents for reading") was canonized in the early 10th century by Aaron ben Moses ben Asher of Tiberias, and imposed on all of world Jewry, apparently displacing earlier systems that had been created in Babylonia and Palestine.

Other important changes to Jewish life, worship, and music were the result of the spread of Islam throughout the Near East during the eighth century. Jews living in the region experienced increased freedoms and greater interaction and integration with aspects of the general, secular culture. This brought a decline in the hegemony of the Eastern academies that had provided legal, liturgical, and musical leadership to the Jewish Diaspora. The Eastern communities themselves came under the increasing musical influence of the "great tradition" of Islam, and the two communities shared poetic and musical forms. Metrical texts entered Jewish liturgy, and metrical melodies to chant them soon followed. Moreover, inasmuch as Arab poetry had its influence on synagogue song, it was not surprising that the division between liturgical and secular song would soon blur.

This overlapping of secular and liturgical traditions had its parallel in the blurring between the lines of eastern and western Jewish communities. The Arab conquest of the Iberian Peninsula carried Eastern Jews to that region. With the Catholic conquest of Spain and Portugal some 300 years later, the Sephardic Jews of the Iberian Peninsula gradually lost affinity for the native Arab origins of their music in favor of the emerging Western music of Catholic Europe. All too soon, however, the expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492 (and from Portugal five years later) dispersed the Sephardic community yet again, bringing northern exiles in contact with the music of Amsterdam and England, while southern exiles merged with disparate communities in the Balkans and North Africa.

Meanwhile, Ashkenazic liturgical tradition evolved largely independently of developments in the Near East and, for the most part, disengaged from the Sephardic music of Europe. Liturgical music was solidified in melodies and motives born in Germany between the 11th and 15th centuries. Ashkenazic nusach maintained an improvisatory character born in the psalmody of the ancient rituals, but it also admitted a body of fixed melodies known as "MiSinai Tunes" for the high esteem in which they were held by the community. These melodies were clearly a product of German musical practice in the Middle Ages, but their juxtaposition with core texts of the Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur liturgy gave them a veneer of awe and emotional association that became quickly entrenched in liturgical custom. The pronouncements of Rabbi Jacob Moellin (ca. 1360–1427), the Maharil, in favor of maintaining local musical practices were a stabilizing factor in the development of Ashkenazic custom, but continuing population migrations led to inevitable variations in practice. In particular, a significant division emerged between the music of Jews from Western Europe and those who made their way further east to Lithuania, Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Romania, and Russia. Western Ashkenazim tend to favor modes that adhere strongly to the major and minor tonalities of Western music; East European music is characterized by extensive usage of modes with unusual intervals and nonrecurring pitch patterns, evidencing influence from local Gypsy and other eastern communities.

Popular Song

Liturgical necessity required the emergence of music to accompany synagogue practice. The same could not, in principle, be said for popular song, which appears to carry no ritual significance. Still, the rabbis could not stifle the human urge to sing. Traditional popular songs of the Jewish community reflect the same genres that exist in all folk cultures: songs of childhood and family relationships; songs of work and community; and songs of the cycle of life, from birth to love, marriage, and death. In what are perceived to be secular songs, though, the Jews often express strong ties to religious tradition and custom.

The Jews of the Oriental communities maintain separations between men and women in most aspects of life, and this includes music. Men's songs are usually in Hebrew (or Aramaic), and tend to be of a quasi-liturgical nature, often settings of liturgical texts or piyyutim (including zemirot, table songs traditionally sung at Sabbath meals). What appear to be love songs are typically settings from the Song of Songs, viewed by the rabbis as an allegory of the love between God and the Jewish people and expressive not only of religious devotion but also of the desire to be reunited with the beloved homeland in Israel. Men's songs are often sung according to the same liturgical modes used in the synagogue, and the elaborate delineation of prescribed modes for specific occasions (or in some communities, even for particular hours of the day) contributes to a rich repertoire.

Women's songs are typically in Judeo-Arabic and predictably focus more on women's roles at home. Songs of preparing the household for various Jewish holidays, or raising children to follow in the traditions of their families, are common. So, too, are songs of love and courtship, often including sarcastic depictions of the realities of married life, sung during weeklong wedding festivities for the benefit of naïve young brides who imagine a more idealized future. Women with particular singing ability are also designated as communal functionaries to preside as official "mourners," singing traditional dirges at funerals; or to sing quasi-liturgical songs of celebration at weddings and ritual circumcision ceremonies.

In addition to the same songs of ritual devotion sung by their Oriental brothers, Sephardic men have a unique genre of songs lauding biblical figures. The experience of living in Catholic Spain, where saints were extolled as virtuous role models, forced the Jews to elevate their own heroes well beyond the boundaries of rabbinic tradition, and the lives and personages of Abraham and Moses come in for special treatments.

Sephardic women sang songs in Ladino, a unique blending of 15th-century Spanish with Hebrew for words denoting Jewish communal functionaries, biblical personalities, and traditional values like hesed (kindness) and luck (mazal). They, too, sang of the Jewish life cycle and the travails of raising children. Their love songs focused on romantic love, though, and were strongly influenced by the Spanish romancas. Sephardic singers also borrowed songs of Spanish history and tradition with no Jewish content at all, preserving them in spite of exile from their Spanish homes. Songs sung by Jews from Turkey to Morocco, sprinkled liberally with vocabulary in the local vernacular absorbed from their host cultures, tell of Castilian castles and wars declared by the kings of Barcelona. It is interesting to note that, for the most part, the Spanish exiles who relocated to northern regions preserved their liturgical songs but lost their secular songs to the sounds and substance of the majority culture, which was happy to assimilate them. The Jews who migrated to more southern countries, often with a sizable Muslim presence, were welcomed, but integrated less well, managing to preserve their repertoire into the 20th century. In the past century, much of this music has been notated and recorded for a posterity that has seen this community shrink because of major losses suffered during World War II and increasing assimilation by the relatively small communities who have not migrated to larger Jewish population centers in the United States or Israel.

An elaborately decorated matzo from the Barcelona Haggadah of 1350, a prayer book used in celebrating Passover. (HIP/Art Resource, NY)

Ashkenazic songs outside the quasi-liturgical realm of Sabbath table songs are typically in Yiddish, an amalgam of German and Hebrew. Here, too, the traditional separation of men and women is preserved: men sing ritual songs and women sing about the struggle to raise children or the longing for romantic love. Many Yiddish songs have no traditional Jewish content whatsoever and are tied to the Jewish community only by the uniquely Jewish language in which the songs are sung. In other Yiddish songs, though, the separation between ritual and secular life is blurred by the overlap between synagogue and popular music and by the convergence of traditional Jewish values and mores with song lyrics that are ostensibly without religious content. So, for example, a song about the ubiquity of potatoes in the impoverished Eastern European diet quotes from the lernsteiger, the singsong chant of the yeshiva, while pointing out that rather than plain potatoes, as during the rest of the week, the special status of the Sabbath calls for a potato pudding to be served for festive meals.

A word needs to be said about the unique contribution of Hasidic philosophy and music to the repertoire of the Ashkenazic Jews. Drawing on Lurianic Kabbalah and other mystical writings, followers of Israel ben Eliezer (ca. 1700–1760), the Ba'al Shem Tov (Owner of the Good Name) credited with founding Hasidism, expounded on the need to return joy to Jewish life, and on the virtue of music as a means to achieve this joy, and through it, communion with the Divine. Rather than focusing exclusively on canonic texts, which were often beyond the capacity of the unschooled masses to understand, the Hasidim advocated the use of music to express sincere human emotion. The Hasidim recognized all melody as a reflection of the divine inspiration that sparked its creation, and so consciously borrowed existing songs, even from outside the Jewish community, for “elevation” to a higher status through devotion to God. They also offered the nig'n, a song without words, as the ultimate opportunity to express sentiments that went beyond words—or at least, beyond the capacity of the singer to articulate them. Reviled for their liberal tendencies by the rabbinic leadership of their day, which continued to eschew public performance of music (the so-called mitnageddim, opponents, were led by the Vilna Gaon, Eyliohu ben Schloyme Zalmen, 1720–1797), the Hasidim nevertheless encouraged the use of music and evolved a huge repertoire of songs that became popular throughout the Ashkenazic realm.

The Ashkenazic community also developed a theatrical tradition that did not emerge in either of the other Jewish Diasporas (although there is some evidence of isolated plays based on biblical themes being written in Ladino during the Middle Ages). Rabbinic tradition had been contemptuous of the theater and other frivolous entertainments introduced by the Greeks as immodest and inappropriate for a Jewish community with higher social mores and, until the 19th century, only occasional reenactments of the Purim story had challenged this position. Abraham Goldfaden (1840–1908) brought together the stand-up comedy provided by wedding entertainers, called badhanim; music of itinerant folk musicians, called klezmerim (who also performed primarily at weddings); and a sincere desire to educate the Jewish masses, to create the Yiddish theater. Most of his plays hung unlikely plots on the thinnest of historic or traditional premises, but they succeeded in contributing a new form of entertainment to the world of Jewish music. Goldfaden often reworked existing folk songs for use in his plays (a well-known lullaby of his time became the standard Rozhkinkes Mit Mandlen [Raisins and Almonds], from his 1880 play, Shulamis), but new pieces he wrote or commissioned often achieved long life outside the context of his plays. The so-called legitimate theater also spawned vaudeville-style variety shows whose songs, written expressly for stage performance, were often reborn on early 20th-century recordings and radio programs.

Emancipation and Innovation

The emancipation of the Jews of France and Germany in the late 18th and early 19th centuries inspired dramatic changes in attitudes toward music. Increasing numbers of Jews became involved in the performance and composition of Western secular music, and rising Jewish attendance in the concert halls of Western Europe made the Jewish community aware of the dramatic gap between the “glorious” traditions of Western art music and the simple, circumscribed chants of Jewish ritual singing. Demand for liturgical reforms that would bring Judaism into the modern era included the abandonment of nusach as a relic of ancient times that could no longer be countenanced in the new era of enlightenment, and cantors trained in Western music replaced the traditional hazan. A brief period of musical anarchy was concluded with the composition of liturgical music for the entire calendar year by Salomon Sulzer (1804–1890) in Vienna, Louis Lewandowski (1821–1894) in Berlin, and Samuel Naumbourg (1815–1880) in Paris, whose music was quickly adopted by Jews throughout Western Europe and beyond. The addition of the organ and choral singing (paralleling musical activities in the Church) made its way to Eastern Europe as well, and while Jews there did not benefit formally from political emancipation or synagogue reforms, Western practices brought the new chorshul (choral synagogue) style to congregations in Galicia and Russia. In the wake of innovations in Western harmonic practices in the late 19th century, composers like Baruch Schorr (1823–1904), Nissan Blumenthal (1805–1903), Eliezer Gerovitsch (1844–1914), and David Nowakowsky (1841–1921) were now able to produce choral masterpieces that retained the flavor of traditional synagogue practices while pushing their congregations to adopt modern liturgical styles.

In the wake of nationalistic fervor sweeping through Europe at the end of the 19th century, a cadre of Jewish ethnographers undertook the documentation of folk traditions practiced by the Jews of Eastern Europe. Joel Engel (1868–1927) presented simple arrangements of several songs collected by some early expeditions to the Russian hinterlands in lecture-demonstrations in Moscow and St. Petersburg. The success of these early presentations led ultimately to the notion that art music reflective of the Jewish experience could appear on the concert stage. Die Gesellschaft für Jüdische Volksmusik (Society for Jewish Folk Music) worked first from the music uncovered by subsequent ethnographic excursions, but the group quickly progressed from arranging folk songs to writing new vocal and instrumental works inspired by the flavor of Jewish music and visions of Jewish life. In its brief tenure from 1908 to 1918, the society published 88 individual compositions and collections and created an audience for Jewish art music among both the unschooled Jewish masses and the concert-going (and often non-Jewish) intelligentsia. Joseph Achron (1886–1943), Lazare Saminsky (1882–1959), and Solomon Rosowsky (1878–1962), who figured prominently in the leadership of the society, contributed many works to the group’s catalogue and continued to make important contributions to Jewish music, both on the concert stage and in the synagogue, after they joined millions of their coreligionists who sought new challenges and opportunities in the golden land called America.

Jewish Music in America

European Jewish immigrants to America brought their musical baggage with them to the New World. The first Jews arrived from Recife in 1654, bringing traditions from their original Dutch homeland, and for nearly 200 years, all American synagogues observed the northern Sephardic established in synagogues called Shearit Israel (New York, 1655), Yeshuat Israel (Newport, Rhode Island, 1658), Mikveh Israel (Savannah, Georgia, 1735, and Philadelphia, 1747), and Beth Elohim (Charleston, South Carolina, 1749). German Jews arriving in the mid-19th century incorporated new reforms into their Ashkenazic synagogues and soon adapted hymns in the style of American Protestant congregations to their liturgies. Cantors Alois Kaiser (1842–1908) and Edward Stark (1856–1913) were among the first to compose new music specifically for American synagogues, but they were joined in later years by composers more accustomed to writing for the concert stage; the early 20th century found Achron, Saminsky, and Rosowsky all contributing to synagogue liturgies, as did a host of others, including Lazar Weiner (1897–1982), Isadore Freed (1900–1960), and Heinrich Schalit (1886–1976).

Two million Eastern European Jews arriving between 1880 and 1920 brought the more traditional use of Ashkenazic nusach and ushered in a “Golden Age of Hazzanut” in which “star cantors,” often specially imported from Europe, used their vocal prowess to impress worshippers in the synagogue and even wider audiences on the concert stage. Cantors and choral directors wrote new music for these more traditional American synagogues, and they preserved their compositions in recordings that swelled the catalogues of secular producers like Columbia and RCA, which were eager to recruit sales from Jewish listeners.

This straddling of the line between liturgical and commercial ventures perpetuated the earlier ambiguous line between sacred and secular music in the folk music of Europe. But in the 20th century, Jewish immigrants faced new and greater threats to their musical traditions as the radio brought a rapidly changing world of American musical styles into their homes. Klezmerim accustomed to absorbing the music of the surrounding culture soon adopted the sounds of the Roaring Twenties, the Jazz Age, and the big bands. The “Odessa Bulgar” was transformed into “You Smile and the Angels Sing,” and Yiddish stage star Muni Weisenfreund was reborn as Hollywood star Paul Muni. Immigrants eager to be “real Americans” took pride in the accomplishments of musicians and performers who made their mark on secular stages. American synagogues continued to perpetuate all manner of European traditions, but Jewish secular music no longer bore any resemblance to liturgical rites.

In the mid-1960s, American Jewish music experienced yet another transition. In a repeat of European reforms a century earlier, Jewish leaders concerned with the abandonment of the synagogues blamed the music for not inspiring worshippers. Composers were commissioned to write all kinds of new music: some tapped Oriental and Hasidic sounds in an attempt to infuse seemingly tired Ashkenazic rituals with more exotic sounds from other Jewish traditions; others attempted to capture the contemporary vernacular with rock and roll services.

Ironically, similar attempts to create a contemporary Jewish musical vocabulary were achieving greater success outside the synagogue. Shlomo Carlebach (1925–1994) used his own neo-Hasidic music to tap the spiritual longings of American youth disaffected from Jewish traditions. Traditional Jews formed bands with names like the Rabbis' Sons and Ruach (Spirit), using American musical styles to set liturgical texts for use outside the synagogue, observing the traditional ban on the use of instruments in the synagogue, but reinventing the notion of a secular Jewish music that could live outside ritual practice. Another important moment arrived when Jewish composers created a new folk tradition, writing songs conveying Jewish history and values using American musical styles and a new Jewish vernacular: English.

The end of the 20th century saw once more a coming together of secular and liturgical customs and the reincarnation of traditional musics both within and outside the synagogue. Carlebach's melodies made their way into the synagogue, as did contrafacts from American and Israeli popular music. Composers who had once written Jewish rock music for concert settings began writing reverent tunes infused with both traditional nusach and a contemporary flavor—and many of these melodies were used in liturgical and popular venues with equal success. Yiddish klezmer music, once abandoned as the epitome of the Old World, was rediscovered and lovingly restored (though not without accretions that have pushed the envelope for what can be considered part of the traditional continuum). Most remarkably, the accessibility of world music has created interest in non-Ashkenazic Jewish music, incorporating the unfamiliar sounds of newly discovered Jews from Ethiopia and breathing new life into the music of the Sephardic and Oriental Diasporas.

Selected Bibliography

- Edelman, Marsha Bryan. 2003. Discovering Jewish Music. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society.
- Gradenwitz, Peter. 1996. The Music of Israel: From the Biblical Era to Modern Times. Portland, OR: Amadeus Press.
- Idelsohn, Abraham Z. 1929. Jewish Music in Its Historical Development. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston.
- Rothmuller, Aron Marko. 1967. The Music of the Jews: An Historical Appreciation. Cranbury, NJ: A. S. Barnes.
- Rubin, Emanuel, and John H. Baron. 2006. Music in Jewish History and Culture. Sterling Heights, MI: Harmonie Park Press.

Liturgical Music of Sephardi Jews

Mark Kligman

---

The diversity and uniqueness of Sephardic liturgical music is exemplified through its broad range of musical styles and integration into Jewish life. Originating in Spain and then dispersed around the Mediterranean, the musical styles of Sephardic liturgical music evolved through an absorption, adaptation, and reaction to a variety of influences. Like other areas of Jewish culture (language, art, literature, food), music reflects the way Sephardic Jews were assimilated into their local culture.

History

The 10th–12th centuries are referred to as the “Golden Age of Spain.” Under Muslim rule the Jews interacted with Christians and Muslims in free exchange, often referred to as the Convivencia (Coexistence). With Arab culture developing new forms of philosophy, logic, organization, grammar, and poetry, Jewish culture flourished with significant achievements in exegesis (Nachmonides, for example), philosophical works (such as those by Maimonides), and poetry (Ibn Ezra, Halevi, Ibn Gabriol). These accomplishments forever influenced Jewry. The Christian reconquest of Spain in the 13th–14th centuries led to increasing Jewish unrest. During this period, the Inquisition forced Jews to convert to Christianity or face death or, later, expulsion.

The expulsions led to Jews migrating to areas throughout the Mediterranean, Europe, the Balkans, and the Americas. Along the Mediterranean routes, Jews from Spain commingled with Jews in preexisting Jewish communities in North Africa (Morocco, Algeria, and Tunisia), Greece, Egypt, and Syria. Along the route to the Balkans and Europe there were some existing Jewish communities, but often the new arrivals established new communities. The Jews who arrived in South America (Brazil), for example, established a new community.

The result is a network of communities connected through commerce in trade routes or caravan. Spanish Jews had a significant influence on the new locations of resettlement. The dispersion of Spanish Jewry led to various forms of retention of cultural and religious traditions. Therefore, a definition of Sephardic Jewry needs to account for this complexity. The generally accepted definition is Sephardic-designated Jews from the Iberian Peninsula and their descendants in various areas of relocation. With the reemergence of a significant Sephardic population in Israel and the growing sense of ethnic pride, many of these Jews have taken on the label of “Mizrachi” or “Eastern” Jews. The designation “Sephardi and Mizrachi” is an encompassing term to refer to this diverse population.

Biblical Cantillation

The melodic practice of reciting the Bible is guided by the ta'amim, marking signs. These signs did not appear in the Torah scroll; they were codified by the family of Ben Asher in Tiberia in the 10th century. These markings, together with the diacritical marks and vowels, helped the reader prepare to chant the biblical text. The ta'amim thus served several functions: to aid in the proper pronunciation, syntax, and melodic recitation of the text.

Music scholars, on the practices of the cantillation of the Bible in the Sephardic and Mizrachi Jewish context today, defined five main musical traditions: Middle East (Iran, Bukhara, Kurdistan, Georgia, and northern Iraq), Southern Arabian Peninsula (Yemen), Near East (Turkey, Syria, central Iraq, Lebanon, and Egypt), North Africa (Libya, Tunisia, Algeria, and Morocco Sephardi), and the Portuguese communities of Europe. The shape or meaning of the cantillation sign did not indicate an exact melody. The diversity of the Sephardic practice is evident in the different usage of the ta'amim. In the Middle East and southern Arabian traditions, the melodic rendering was a general formula that applied to the text. Some described this practice as "psalmody," whereby the initial intonation of a sentence of the Bible was raised. The melody stayed on a particular note (referred to as a recitation tone) and concluded with a recurring melodic phrase. The ta'amim in Middle East and southern Arabian traditions guided the general shape of the biblical verse, not a direct melodic phrase for each cantillation sign. The Near East tradition of the Levant was highly ornate and great emphasis was applied to some words of the text. The Sephardi and Portuguese practice of cantillation followed the Western tonal system. Melodically, it was clearly different from the Ashkenazic practice, but its function as a mosaic process of combining musical cells was the same.

Piyyutim

A significant development in the early history of Jewish music at the end of the first millennia was the development of the piyyut (plural, piyyutim). The original intention of the piyyut was to enhance prayers. By the ninth century, prayers were formalized. The hazan repeated them out loud, followed by the congregation. As the desire for variety increased, piyyutim grew in their influence inside and outside the synagogue. A piyyut was a poetic Hebrew text closely tied to a religious concept and context. These new texts were sung and influenced music in Jewish life.

The creation of a piyyut and its application to the liturgy were interconnected. The practice of adapting melodies for piyyutim continued into the 20th century in many communities. It has remained a part of Mizrachi Jewish life today. Noted contributors to modern piyyutim were prominent members of their respective communities. Their work displayed continuity with the poetic and liturgical traditions of the past. Isaac Algazi (1889–1951) was born in Turkey and immigrated to South America in the 1930s. He recorded many liturgical melodies in the Turkish style as well as many piyyutim and Judeo-Spanish songs, thus encompassing a broad repertoire. Outside the Jewish context, he was well respected for his singing of the ghazel, a Turkish music genre. In Morocco, Rabbi David Buzaglo (d. 1975) was an expert in the Andalusian tradition. He was credited with keeping the Moroccan bakkashot tradition viable in Morocco and Israel, where he immigrated in 1965. He incorporated many contemporary Egyptian melodies into his piyyutim. In Israel, concerts of piyyutim singing were increasing. As these concerts were not held on Shabbat or a holiday, musical instruments could be added.

Liturgy

Liturgical music served several functions in Sephardic synagogues. The hazan recited large portions of the prayers with a melodic pattern at a rapid pace. Other portions were highlighted musically. The Kaddish and Kedusha were emphasized through congregational singing. The highlighting of liturgical passages between these phrases varied according to the community. Choral singing, two or more voices sung to pre-composed music, only appeared in the Sephardic traditions influenced by Western music in European locales. This was evident in the Spanish and Portuguese tradition, which had a rich heritage of many 19th- and 20th-century liturgical choral compositions. Choral singing was not practiced in Moroccan, Edot hamizrah, or Yemenite traditions.

Looking at liturgical practices in the context of geographic region clearly shows the influence of local music and culture on Jewish liturgical music. Jews from the Western Sephardic tradition (communities in Amsterdam, London, and the Americas) use Western music and hymn-like singing similar to other Christian traditions. North African Sephardic traditions use some melodies also found in the Western Sephardic tradition, but Western influence is mixed with the free nature of Andalusian music. Levant Sephardic traditions, as in Turkish, Syrian, and Egyptian Jewish communities, are influenced by Middle Eastern Arab musical styles.

Solo singing by the hazan is also a part of each tradition to highlight particular prayers. The style of the elaboration is an important liturgical expression for the hazan to move the congregation emotionally. This melodic elaboration follows the musical style of local culture. For example, in the North African Jewish communities the style is Andalusian, and in the Levant Sephardic tradition the Arab musical influences are heard with elaborations in an Arab mode, known as a maqām. Some hazanim were recorded on 78 rpm records, particularly Turkish cantors like Isaac Algazi. Although the Western Sephardic traditions are transmitted in printed editions and manuscripts, the North African, Levant, and Middle Eastern traditions are oral traditions. The only documentation of these oral traditions is in scholarly publications (the first significant publication is Idelsohn 1914–1933) and recordings; the National Sound Archives in Jerusalem has the largest collection.

Lively congregational singing was a key aspect of the Sephardic liturgy. Although many portions were recited by the hazan, as required by Jewish law, congregational participation was enthusiastic and joyful. Unlike the Ashkenazic practice, which intoned the last two to three lines of a liturgical text known as a chatima, Sephardic hazanim recited the entire liturgical text out loud. Congregants were allowed to join in the recitation; some did so in an undertone. The uniqueness of the Sephardic tradition was not only displayed by the melodies they used, but also by the liturgical performance practice itself, which combined active and passive participation from the congregation.

Selected Bibliography

- Idelsohn, A. Z. 1914–1933. Thesaurus of Hebrew and Oriental Melodies. 10 vols. Repr. New York: Ktav Publishing House, 1965. (Note: volumes 1–5 pertain to Sephardic and Mizrahi communities.)
- Idelsohn, A. Z. 1929. Jewish Music in Its Historical Development. New York: Henry Holt.
- Kligman, Mark. 2003. "Music." In The Jews in the Middle East and North Africa in Modern Times, edited by Reeva Simon, Michael Laskier, and Sara Reuger. New York: Columbia University Press. Includes compact disc with 27 musical tracks.

- Seroussi, Edwin. 1996. Spanish-Portuguese Synagogue Music in Nineteenth-Century Reform Sources from Hamburg: Ancient Tradition in the Dawn of Modernity. Yuval Monograph Series 11. Jerusalem: Jewish Music Research Centre.
- Seroussi, Edwin. 1999. "The Liturgical Music of the Sephardic Jews: East and West." In Proceedings of the Tenth British Conference on Judeo-Spanish Studies, edited by Annette Benaim, 289–298. London: Queen Mary and Westfield College, Department of Hispanic Studies.
- Seroussi, Edwin, and John Tyrrell. 2001. "Jewish Music." In The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians. Vol. 13, 24–112. London: Macmillan.

Liturgy and Music of Syrian Jews

Mark Kligman

---

Jews from Syria primarily resided in two cities: Aleppo and Damascus. Both cities are mentioned in the Bible: Aleppo, known in Hebrew as Aram-Zoba, appears in 2 Samuel 10:6 and 10:8 and Psalm 60:2; Damascus, known as Aram-Damasek, appears in 1 Chronicles 18:5 and 18:6. The name Aleppo was used by Italian merchants in the 14th and 15th centuries. Syrian Jews consider themselves to be Mizrahi (Middle Eastern) Jews influenced by Sephardic Jewry (Jews from Spain). Although Jews have lived in Syria since biblical times, the immigration of the Spanish Jewish exiles in the 15th century added to the community. During the Ottoman period, Aleppo was an important religious center. Jews in Syria lived in their own communities but interacted with Muslims and Christians as merchants and artisans. In the late 19th century, they left Syria and retained in various forms their liturgical and musical traditions, although in other aspects of their cultural and economic life they adapted to their new location.

Emigration for better financial opportunities began in the 1880s. Syrian Jews went to other Middle Eastern cities and Latin America, North America, and England. Brooklyn, New York, became an important center with more than 40,000 members of the community. Mexico City also has a significant population of Syrian Jews. In Israel, some synagogues practice the Syrian liturgical traditions, but most Syrian Jews in Israel have joined with other Middle Eastern Jews who call themselves Yerushalmi-Sephardim (Jerusalem Sephardic Jews).

Syrian liturgy, as well as other liturgies in general, makes use of a variety of texts, which encompass a range of styles and come from a variety of sources. These include biblical texts from the Hebrew Bible; rabbinic literature from the Mishnah and Babylonian Talmud, compiled from the first to as late as the seventh century; and liturgical poetry (piyyutim) composed after the seventh century. Each of the three textual types uses different styles of Hebrew language, meter, and rhyme.

In general, two rites divide the history of Jewish liturgy: Ashkenazic and Sephardic. The major distinguishing features between the two rites entail small changes in the order of the prayers and the inclusion or exclusion of psalms and various liturgical poems. The statutory prayers of the two major rites are the same, with slight differences in wording. The Sephardic rite, a development originally from Spain, influenced the local rites of the European and Middle Eastern communities that received an influx of Spanish Jews after the expulsion from Spain in the 16th century.

The liturgical and religious custom of Aleppo is known as Minhag Aram-Tzoba (the custom of Aleppo); the earliest compilation is Machzor Aram-Tzoba, published in Venice (1523–1527), a prayer book for the High Holidays of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur (portions of the texts appear in Idelsohn 1923b, 33–38). Since the 16th century, the liturgy of Aleppo was significantly influenced by the rite of the Spanish Jewish exiles. Today the liturgical rite for Aleppo Syrians in Brooklyn is close to the Spanish and Portuguese rite with some local modifications. The traditions of the Jews from Damascus are very similar to those of Aleppo Jews: one point of difference, for instance, is the order of psalms in Kabbalat Shabbat (Friday Evening Service). In general, the liturgical text of Syrian Jews considers both the Aleppo and Damascus tradition, for the Sabbath service is synonymous with the Sephardic rite. There is more variation and use of local custom with High Holiday liturgy than there is with the Sabbath morning liturgy.

Liturgical music appears in two categories: paraliturgical and liturgical. Paraliturgical music is sung at life-cycle events, in the home during the Sabbath and holidays, and on occasion in the synagogue. Syrian liturgical music is in two genres bakkashot and pizmonim. Both are Hebrew poetic texts written mostly by Syrian rabbis; most of these liturgical songs are adaptations of preexisting Arab melodies to a newly created Hebrew text. The bakkashot texts are usually sung before Sabbath morning prayers, a practice still extant among a small number of Syrian Jews in Brooklyn and an active practice in Israel. The pizmonim singing occurs on a more regular basis in a variety of contexts during Sabbath meals, during the sebet (an informal gathering at home in the Sabbath afternoon), and at the brit milah (the ritual circumcision ceremony).

One hears in the sound of the liturgical music by Syrian cantors in the synagogue a fluid recitation in a maqām, Arab mode. The congregation enthusiastically responds saying the last two or three words of a portion of text and in other places chants with the cantor. One finds within Syrian liturgy parallels to the murattal and mujawwad style of Koranic recitation, as well as the improvisatory singing found in Arab vocal music and the interaction between the leader and listeners, or, in this context, the cantor and the congregation. Thus, a variety of Arab musical styles serve as a basis for Syrian liturgy. A guiding aspect in Arab music is the use of a different mode, a maqām (plural, maqāmāt). There are many maqāmāt in Arab music. The cantillation of the Bible is in a recitation melody based on melodic formula in maqām siga. Other portions of the prayers are sung in maqām siga but to different melodic formula. For Sabbath prayers, the musically elaborate section is the shaharit portion. For shaharit, a particular Syrian practice is the association of maqām to a biblical reading. For example, biblical readings that deal with happy events, like the Jews leaving Egypt, known as parsha beshalach (Exodus 13:17–17:16), are associated with maqām ajam. Melodies sung to the liturgy during the Shacharit prayers, on the week where this biblical portion is read, would be in maqām ajam. The next week it would be a different maqām. Portions of the shaharit prayers are sung to preexisting Arab melodies that are acquired through first becoming pizmonim; other portions of the prayers are improvised where a cantor can modulate to a different maqām. Thus, the music in the liturgy is dynamic and significantly influenced by Arab musical culture.

Cantors learn the tradition by practice because transmission is oral. The music is not written. In Brooklyn, there are few cantors who were raised in the community; cantors raised in Israel come to Brooklyn to lead prayers in Syrian synagogues.

Selected Bibliography

- Elazar, Daniel J. 1989. The Other Jews: The Sephardim Today. New York: Basic Books.
- Kligman, Mark. In press. Maqam and Liturgy: Ritual, Music, and Aesthetics of Syrian Jews in Brooklyn. Detroit: Wayne State University Press.
- Shelemay, Kay Kaufman. 1998. Let Jasmine Rain Down: Song and Remembrance among Syrian Jews. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Zenner, Walter P. 2000. A Global Community: The Jews from Aleppo, Syria. Detroit: Wayne State University Press.

Humor and Satire in Judeo-Spanish Song

Judith R. Cohen

---

Studies of Judeo-Spanish song often privilege the ballad (romance), with its links to medieval and Renaissance Spain and life and calendrical cycle genres. The approach is generally solemn, often lamenting the imminent death of the romance, while neglecting lighter genres. This essay examines humor, satire, and general lightheartedness, levity, and ludic elements in Judeo-Spanish song, based on the author's fieldwork. Four categories of levity are suggested: bawdy humor, merri-ment and joy, satire and parody, and miscellaneous.

Bawdy Humor

For Moroccan Sephardic Jews, wedding songs, traditionally sung by women, often include bawdy humor. Fray Pedro, also known as Brother Peter, Paipero, and Fray Diogo in Spanish, is a lascivious priest who impregnates 120 "ladies" (i.e., nuns). In "La novia destrenza el pelo" (The Bride Lets Her Hair Down), erotic references progress from subtle to unambiguous: "Shawil bends over to put on his boots and his balls are visible." "Las prendas de Rahél" (Rahel's Gifts) pairs "your hair and my combs," "your eyes and my gaze," and, more recently, "your car and my engine," "your radio and my plug," and "your dafina (Sabbath casserole) and my eggs" (Martinez Ruiz 1963, 110–111). "Vivardueña," originally a common work song and singing game, mimes agricultural tasks and can be seen as a metaphor for human fertility (Cohen 1990, lxxviii).

Merriment and Joy

Light-hearted merriment accompanies many life and calendrical cycle songs. “La parida del hijo y de la hija” (Mothers of Male and Female Babies), from Morocco, is humorous, but at the expense of women. The mother of a boy receives treats, but the mother of a baby girl is given “skimpy sardines” and banished to the kitchen to “squabble with the neighbors.” The groom gets the sardines in “La Cena del despozado” (The Groom’s Dinner), and is told to “wait for love until morning, for there is no bed.” In a Salonican song, the groom teases his bride: “If your father doesn’t give me 1500 liras [monetary unit], I’ll replace you with raki.”

Several religious holidays are festive and joyous, and Purim, which celebrates the story of Esther, is an occasion that stipulates merrymaking. The narrative “Coplas de Purím” (Purim Verses) is sung with risos y cantos y con gran plaser (laughter, songs, and great pleasure). Masquerades and operettas are also part of the festivities.

Satire and Parody

In Moroccan communities, the mere use of haketia (Moroccan Judeo-Spanish) invokes nostalgia, community identification, and often hilarity. The ballad “Raquel lastimosa” describes a potentially adulterous wife who resists temptation. Solly Lévy sings a parody about the misadventures of a Spanish bullfighter improbably versed in the art of Sephardic baking. Lévy also sings a popular Spanish song that as a boy he chanted with his friends to the melody of a liturgical chant and a political parody of the “Coplas de las flores” (Verses of the Flowers), in which each flower proclaims itself the most beautiful and the most suited to praise the Creator. A unique Canadian composition is “Avramico y Davico,” composed in Toronto by Tangier-born Jack Benlolo during the first wave of Moroccan Jewish immigration to Canada in the late 1950s. The words are amusing, but the real humor lies in Benlolo’s choice of melody: “Dominique” by “The Singing Nun,” which was popular when Benlolo composed his parody. “Jacob y Mazaltov” is a bawdy song based on culinary imagery: ovens and frying pans as metaphors for the female reproductive system (see Anahory-Librowicz and Cohen 1986). Bouena Sarfatty Garfinkle sang satires and parodies to foxtrot and tango tunes.

Miscellaneous

The same song may be sung sadly, blandly, exuberantly, or otherwise, depending on circumstances. The ballad “Diego León,” sung by a group of elderly Moroccan women at a bingo game, lost its gently flowing rhythm, speeded up, and became progressively hilarious. Mercedes Bohbot sang the ballad “Landarico,” in which an adulterous queen is discovered by her royal husband. After singing it with classic balladic restrained pathos, at the last line, “and so he cut out her tongue” she would break into a gleeful chuckle.

There are “trickster” tales in the romancero. In “El caballero burlado” (The Tricked Knight), a young woman parries the advances of a young man by saying she is a charcoal seller’s daughter (or the leprous king’s daughter) and brings bad luck; when they reach Paris she laughs and says she is really a princess. “Don Gato” (Sir Cat), well known in pan-Hispanic cultures, describes, in lugubrious detail, the funeral of Sir Cat, fatally injured in his pursuit of an alluring female. It is sung, with a different melody, as an endecha (lament) on the Fast of Av, and a saying warns that if you laugh on this solemn mourning day (Tisha Be’Av) you will weep on Rosh Hashanah.

These categories are not definitive, simply a convenient way of beginning to classify and describe a neglected aspect of Judeo-Spanish song. The ludic aspect serves to link everyday and spiritual life through musical bridges. Topical parodies reflect familiarity with the surrounding environment, which is essential for survival, as well as the ability to poke fun at oneself while maintaining pride in the community.

Selected Bibliography

- Anahory-Librowicz, Oro, and Judith R. Cohen. 1986. “Modalidades expresivas de los cantos de boda judeo-españoles” [Expressive Modalities of Judeo-Spanish Wedding Songs]. Revista de dialectología y tradiciones populares 41:189–209.
- Cohen, Judith R. 1990. “Judeo-Spanish Songs in the Sephardic Communities of Montreal and Toronto.” PhD diss., Université de Montreal.
- Martinez Ruiz, J. 1963. “Poesia sefardi de caracter tradicional” [Traditional Sephardic Poetry]. Archivum 13: 79–215.

Music and the Reconstruction of Iberian Crypto-Jewish Identity

Judith R. Cohen

---

In 1925, Samuel Schwartz published a book on the hidden Jews of Belmonte in Portugal, and shortly afterward Captain Artur de Barros Basto began his “rescue operation” (obra de resgate) setting in motion a series of events that changed their lives dramatically. Interest in the crypto-Jews has escalated, and with it misunderstandings related to their music and the music used in imagined Sephardic events in neighboring Spain.

Classification of the Musical Repertoire of the Village Crypto-Jews

“Indigenous” Repertoire

This category includes prayer texts and Biblical ballads, the oldest genres. Typically, they are in Portuguese, are mostly recited rather than sung, and are mostly performed and transmitted by women, who were in charge of much of ritual life. (See Schwarz 1925; Canelo 1985; Paulo 1969, 1985; and García 1993 for transcriptions.) The Biblical ballads are narrations of danger, rescue, and faith. The one ballad still actually sung, at Passover, is “The Crossing of the Red Sea.” Schwarz (1925, 93–94) includes the melody, which is the same as the current one. Though it is a common Western European–style melody, probably from the late 19th century, Schwarz describes it as “oriental and exotic,” concluding romantically that it “therefore dates back to very early times” (46–47). The song has become an identity marker of Portuguese crypto-Jews.

Early 20th-Century Jewish Imparted/Acquired Songs

The first group of such songs dates from the early 20th century. The songs are auto-identified as traditional. For example, Belmonte Jews identify the narrative ballad “Judah and Tamar” as “ours.” Although they claim it has always been around, neither the text nor the simple dance tune seems older than the late 19th century. Barros Basto published the text in Ha-Lapid (1928, 10:7–8).

This group also includes Ladino and Hebrew songs. For example, a Portuguese version of the Israeli anthem Hatikva, was attributed by Barros Bastos’s daughter, Miriam Azancot, to her father, though in Ha-Lapid it is presented differently. In the late 1970s, an unpublished master’s thesis (Nabarro 1978) presented popular Ladino songs as having been collected, by herself, among crypto-Jews in Portugal; however, careful investigation subsequently showed that this was a fabrication. Otherwise, neither Ladino nor Hebrew is used except in recently acquired songs.

Later 20th-Century Jewish Imparted/Acquired Songs

Since 1990, Belmonte has had visiting rabbis, and other Jewish visitors from abroad. Liturgical melodies and Israeli songs taught by them or left on recordings constitute another level of crypto-Jewish musical life, especially the popular Judeo-Spanish song “Cuando el rey Nimrod” (“Avraham avinu”).

Shared Local Repertoire and Musical Preferences

One subgroup of these songs is seen as “Jewish” by Jews. The only local songs identified as “Jewish” by self-identified Jews are certain play party songs (jogos de roda). Their use was described by a Portuguese scholar as early as the 1920s (Vasconcelos 1958, 173).

Another subgroup of these songs is seen as Jewish by non-Jews. Songs from areas identified with Jewish history are sometimes erroneously presented as “Jewish” (Topa 1998, 91). There are two local ritual songs to which some local people attribute Jewish origins: the “Encomendação das Almas” (Blessing of the Souls), a solemn Easter song, and “The Twelve Words, or Two Tablets of Moses.” This is a cumulative chant sung in Spain as a Christmas song, but in Portugal it is sung as a deathbed ritual. Of its long history (Espinosa 1930), what is relevant here is its similarity to the Passover cumulative song “Ekhad mi yodea” (Who Knows One?), but with a mixture of Christian and Old Testament imagery.

A third subgroup of these songs has a shared repertoire not identified as Jewish. For example, the Judeus have a similar range of repertoire to that of their neighbors, even though in Belmonte some say they do not sing the songs of the goios (non-Jews).

Musical Preferences

Several northeastern Judeus disdained songs of the lavradores (farmers); they themselves are mostly itinerant merchants in regional markets. Fado was often cited as a preference. Among those who had reconverted to Judaism, a preference was for “anything Jewish.” Some women shared a local fondness for old broadside ballads, which used to be circulated by cegos (itinerant blind singers) or mule drivers.

Imagined Communities

In Spain, the small towns of Ribadavia and Hervás hold annual festivals featuring Jewish culture, though almost no Jews live there. Judeo-Spanish songs that local singers and festival organizers learned from recordings have entered their repertoire (Cohen 1999). There are ethical issues around turning a tragic stage of history into a tourist event, however. One may treat these and related developments as misleading, argue that it is simply reappropriation of a lost part of their own culture, or adopt the staunchly neutral standpoint of postmodernist anthropology seeing it as a new, valid, creative expression. Music whose history is unknown to many of the protagonists has become part of rewriting Iberian Jewish history.

Selected Bibliography

- Canelo, David Augusto. 1985. Os Últimos Judeus Secretos [The Last Secret Jews]. Belmonte, Spain: Jornal de Belmonte.
- Cohen, Judith. 1999. “Constructing a Spanish Jewish Festival: Music and the Appropriation of Tradition.” World of Music 41 (3): 85–114
- Espinosa, Aurelio. 1930. “Origen oriental y desarrollo histórico del cuento de las doce palabras retorneadas” [Eastern origin and historical development of the tale of the twelve words repeated]. Revista de Filología Española 17: 390–413.
- García, María Antonieta. 1993. Os Judeus de Belmonte [The Jews of Belmonte]. Lisbon, Portugal: Universidade Nova.
- Nabarro, Margaret. 1978. “The Music of the Western European Sephardic Jews and the Portuguese Marranos: An Ethnomusicological Study.” MA thesis, University of South Africa.
- Paulo, Amílcar. 1969. Romanceiro Criptojudáico: Subsídios para o estudo do folclore marrano [Crypto-Jewish Ballads: Material for the Study of Marrano folklore]. Braganza, Portugal: Escola Tipografica.
- Paulo, Amílcar. 1985. Os Judeus Secretos em Portugal [The Secret Jews in Portugal]. Oporto, Portugal: Laberinto.
- Schwarz, Samuel, 1925. Os Crisçãos-Novos em Portugal no Seculo XX [The New Christians in Portugal]. Lisbon, Portugal: Universidade Nova.
- Topa, Abílio. 1998. “Galandum, Galandaina.” In Festival Intercéltico, edited by Mario Correia, 77–82. Oporto, Portugal: Discantus.
- Vasconcellos, José Leite de. 1958. Etnografia Portuguesa [Portuguese Ethnography]. Vol. 4. Lisbon: Imprensa Nacional–Casa de Moeda.

Contemporary Jewish Music in America

Mark Kligman

---

New Jewish music, from the late 1960s through the first decade of the 2000s, has grown significantly, raising intriguing questions of expressions of Jewishness, continuity with the past, change, and the creation of a new American Jewish sensibility. “Jewish music” can be defined as a self-conscious effort to express a message, idea, or sound that its creators, performers, and listeners consider to be Jewish. It is estimated that more than 2,000 recordings of Jewish music are currently available and that close to 250 records are released each year (Kligman 2001, 88). While not a recent phenomenon, the creation of new Jewish music is found throughout the Jewish community in a vast range of musical styles that represent a vehicle for the new generation of American Jews to express music with some connection to Judaism, while distinguishing itself from the immigrant generation. The immigration of Eastern European Jews to the United States from the 1880s to the 1930s shaped Jewish musical life in America. Their music included cantorial, Yiddish songs, Hasidic music, and the music of the Yiddish theater. The development of contemporary Jewish music in America saw the acceptance of new American styles and the incorporation or rejection of earlier forms of Jewish music. In both religious and nonreligious contexts, this new music represents various responses to the past and has become an integral part of Jewish life in America, interconnecting and shaping Jewish identity.

Religious Contexts

In religious contexts new Jewish music illustrates the functional role of music in Jewish life in America. For the Orthodox community, their new Jewish music replaces the role of popular American culture. New recordings, concerts, and programs have become an integral part of Orthodoxy. For Reform Jews, their new Jewish music is closely connected to making liturgy and prayer accessible and interesting. New music in the Reform community, in large measure, has been driven by the folk music of summer camps. The Conservative movement displays traces of Orthodox and Reform community. Each religious community has a different need for music to express, enhance, or engage the Jewish life of its members.

One of the most interesting features of new popular music in the Orthodox community is the sheer volume, which represents at least half of all the music available. The Orthodox music industry, based predominantly in Brooklyn, has grown significantly over the past 25 years. This growth is attributed to the limited involvement and participation of right-wing members in secular culture. As a result, they have developed their own type of popular music whose sources include the Bible, liturgy, and a genre of English songs that deliver a powerful message of faith and devotion. This new music satisfies the need for religiously appropriate entertainment, as other forms of amusement such as television, film, or theater are discouraged.

An important innovator was Shlomo Carlebach (1925–1994), who effectively linked folk music and Jewish music and is credited as the father of new Jewish music. Innovatively drawing from the European tradition and combining it with a new style, Carlebach provided a novel form of music consisting of two or three repeated sections to communicate a Jewish message.

In the 1960s and 1970s, the crucial feature of the new Jewish music was its detachment from the use of Eastern European musical modes, styles, and aesthetics. The 1970s ushered in a new influence in response to popular American music whose lyrics and musical experimentations were becoming more intertwined with that era's drug culture. Orthodox Jewish artists endeavored to convey a strong message and maintain a positive influence in their music. In the 1970s, Mordechai Ben David emerged as a performer, and in the 1980s, Avraham Fried. These two are prominent performers along with dozens of other performers and groups.

Music in the Reform community is a reaction to life in America, but the response it generates is different than that of the Orthodox community. For Reform Jews, the most significant Jewish experience in their lives is the synagogue, thus signaling the importance of its music. In the 1960s, musicians thought synagogue music was too formal and out of date, opting instead for folk and popular styles. However, this resulted in a mixed reaction from Reform cantors, who are the professional body of clergy responsible for music and prayer in synagogues.

In the 1970s, the style of synagogue music reflected the influence of Reform youth who were motivated to participate in prayer through their camp experiences. The musical aesthetic of folk singers like Pete Seeger, Bob Dylan, Tom Paxton, and James Taylor was much preferred because it was participatory and more current than European Jewish music. In the mid-1970s through the 1980s, those returning camp attendees called upon their Reform cantors, unfamiliar with the new camp music, to sing these new melodies. The reception of this musical change ranged from enthusiastic endorsement to disdain. Composer Sam Adler says supporters of communal singing were eager to blame low synagogue attendance on the music rather than seeing the decline in familiarity with and affinity to synagogue ritual life. Critical of this change in synagogue music, Adler sharply attacked the pseudo-Hasidic or Israeli tunes as "the trademark of the Jewish commercial sacred music norm" (Adler 1992, 297). Whereas the new folk-rock music does not make use of the Eastern European modal tradition, some elements, such as nigun singing, have become more commonplace, but are viewed as "pseudo-Jewish." Presently, the most influential performer and creator of New Reform liturgical music is Debbie Friedman.

New Jewish music in the Conservative movement shares similarities with both Orthodox and Reform. On one hand, new music recordings and concerts serve as a means of entertainment, much like in the Orthodox movement. On the other hand, even though Conservative Jews prefer worship that is relatively fixed and minimally changed, it is similar to Reform in that the younger generation wants to carry on its camp experiences and incorporate new music within the liturgy, even though the synagogue is not committed to making any changes. Those campers who had experienced participatory prayer at Ramah camps sought to continue worshipping in this style with egalitarian services and the inclusion of communal song singing. This became the hallmark of the smaller and more intimate chavurah minyanim. Craig Taubman and the group Safam are two important exemplars of new Jewish music connected with Conservative Judaism.

Nonreligious Contexts

Throughout the 20th century, the number of American Jews who have chosen not to affiliate with a synagogue has risen. Secular Yiddish and Israeli cultures became viable alternatives for those who wanted to be connected to Judaism through the cultural dimension of Jewish life without religious obligations. For others, art and music (performed in concert halls) provided the venues for expressing their Jewishness. Yiddish songs, Hebrew songs of Israel, and klezmer music satisfied the desire of those who wanted to be connected to Judaism but not through religion.

In the realm of symphonic music, late 19th- and early 20th-century composers sought to express nationalism in music. This was a conflict for European Jews who were struggling with a national identity. Ernest Bloch (1880–1959) drew upon his experiences as a Jew in his two seminal works, Schelomo (1915–1916) and Avodath ha-Kodesh (Sacred Service; 1930–1933). This established a model for other composers. Leonard Bernstein's (1918–1990) larger symphonic works incorporate "Jewishness" in some capacity: "Jeremiah," Symphony No. 1 (written in 1942), uses cantillation motifs, while Symphony No. 3 (1963), as well as the Dybbuk ballet of 1974, use the text of the Kaddish. His vocal works include Hashkivevenu (1945) and Chicester Psalms (1965), which are based on six psalm texts set in Hebrew. David Diamond (1915–2005) incorporates a free, modal, and expressive style in his compositions, which include David Mourns for Absalom for voice and piano and the orchestral work Psalms (1936). Among his more than 200 works are a dozen that express Jewishness. Among his last works is Kaddish for Violoncello and Orchestra (1987–1989). Composer Steve Reich, in his modern use of minimalism in music, incorporated cantillation in Tehillim (1981). For these composers, Jewishness is expressed individually not through novelty but through references to Jewish rituals that composers intend to be transcendent spirituality.

The klezmer music revival of the 1970s is a success in terms of reawakening interest in a traditional form of music and providing new contexts and venues for growth. The four revival bands of the 1970s are the Klezmerim, Kapelye, the Klezmer Conservatory Band, and the Andy Statman Klezmer Orchestra. Performers were accomplished musicians who sought to revive the music out of interest for their musical heritage and their interest in this music; some performers were non-Jews.

What separates klezmer performers from other performers in the religious community is their approach to Jewish music through the music itself, as a challenge to sharpen their virtuosic skills and deepen their understanding of another musical system. Klezmer music became a way to access a lost world. While veteran klezmer musicians trained some revival musicians, the younger musicians sought to learn the style of the early 20th century through the recordings of clarinetists Dave Tarras and Naftule Brandwein. This led to the reissuing of older recordings of the repertoire on 78 rpm records, which became the staple repertoire of the revival bands. In the late 1980s, klezmer music took a turn as groups moved away from the revival approach of mainly performing the traditional repertoire to creating new music as well as combining it with pop, jazz, and many other styles. The four prominent klezmer bands today are the Klezmatics, Brave Old World, the Klezmer Conservatory Band, and Andy Statman.

Other areas of Jewish music have a small but loyal following. Sephardic music serves as an exotic style to Jews of Ashkenazic descent, but functions as a familiar style to those of Sephardic descent. The Ladino songs have created a devoted following due to active performers and groups such as Judy Frankel, Judith Cohen, Voice of the Turtle, and Alhambra, who incorporate a variety of distinct European and Middle Eastern styles in their music. A renewed interest in choral music can be attributed to the Zamir Chorale of Boston, which has influenced a resurgence of a cappella choirs in colleges throughout the country as well as the staging of a one-week choral festival in the Catskills. Another smaller musical community is the Jewish music corner of the New York avant-garde jazz style, whose growing popularity is pushing the boundaries of its local appeal. The recordings of the group Hassidic New Wave has drawn much interest, as evidenced by their performances at the Knitting Factory in downtown New York. Using stylized Hasidic and klezmer music, and placing it within the New York avant-garde jazz framework, Hassidic New Wave moves from pop, rock, jazz, blues, and new classical styles within a piece. Well-known American recording artists have also explored aspects of Jewish music, from Kenny G's Jazz Service (1986), Itzhak Perlman's In the Fiddler's House (1995), Mandy Patinkin's Mamaloshen (1997), and Barbra Steisand's recording of Max Janowski's "Avinu Malkeinu" on Higher Ground (1997). While some well-known artists draw upon their Jewish heritage, others have become prominent in the mainstream of American culture through their Jewish heritage. Matisyahu is a performer of reggae music drawing from his connection to the Lubaviteh Hasidic group. His recording Youth (2006) is on the Sony label.

Although synagogue attendance has dropped for all Jewish movements since the 1970s, the increase in new Jewish music indicates that expressions of Jewishness are found in new places. New Jewish music becomes a vehicle to be Jewish and to express Jewishness in diverse, complex, and new ways.

Selected Bibliography

- Adler, Sam. 1992. "Sacred Music in a Secular Age." In Sacred Sound and Social Change: Liturgical Music in Jewish and Christian Experience, edited by Lawrence Hoffman and Janet Walton, 289–299. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press.
- Kligman, Mark. 2001. "Contemporary Jewish Music in America." American Jewish Yearbook. 101: 88–141.
- Rogovoy, Seth. 2000. The Essential Klezmer: A Music Lover's Guide to Jewish Roots and Soul Music, from the Old World to the Jazz Age to the Downtown Avant-Garde. Chapel Hill, NC: Algonquin Books of Chapel Hill.

- Schleifer, Eliyahu. 1995. "Current Trends of Liturgical Music in the Ashkenazi Synagogue." The World of Music 37 (1): 59–72.
- Slobin, Mark. 2000. Fiddler on the Move: Exploring the Klezmer World. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Slobin, Mark, ed. 2002. American Klezmer: Its Roots and Offshoots. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Summit, Jeffrey. 2000. Lord's Song in a Strange Land: Music and Identity in Contemporary Jewish Worship. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Rescue and Virtual Preservation of Diaspora Cultural Heritage by the Center for Jewish Art

Aliza Cohen-Mushlin

---

The Center for Jewish Art is dedicated to the systematic and comprehensive survey and documentation of what remains of the Jewish visual culture in Israel and the Diaspora, from a coin to a synagogue and from ancient times to the present. The center is committed to researching this legacy for educational purposes and disseminating it through electronic media, publications, conferences, and various study programs for scholars, educators, curators, laypeople, and children.

The historic events of the 20th century, particularly the Holocaust, the Soviet regime, and waves of immigration, destroyed a large part of the Jewish visual heritage in the Diaspora. However in 1990, when the researchers of the Center for Jewish Art started a systematic documentation in the former Soviet Union, they were astounded to find the remnants of a great culture of bygone days: for example, silver ritual objects of exquisite workmanship hidden in crates in a former monastery in Kiev, ruined edifices of synagogues from the 16th century on, richly decorated tombstones from that time, and paintings and sculptures by renowned Jewish artists hidden in private collections, about to be sold and dispersed throughout the world.

This culture, developed by Jewish communities within the regions they lived in during many centuries, is now in great danger of being lost forever: many synagogue buildings are collapsing or being reconstructed and changed; abandoned cemeteries are being destroyed by natural forces and vandalism; ritual and fine art objects are being stolen or sold in bazaars and auction houses, torn from their cultural fabric.

It would be impossible to physically maintain and guard what is left of this rich culture. A painful choice has to be made subject to numerous criteria and involving high costs. However, an economically viable solution carried out by the Center for Jewish Art is the painstakingly systematic, region-by-region documentation of synagogue buildings, ritual and fine art objects, tombstones, and manuscripts and their study in relation to the indigenous culture. The center carries out comprehensive surveys and documentation by photographing, measuring, describing, and researching the objects and the data is computerized (see the center's Web site: <http://cja.huji.ac.il/>).

This documentation has a twofold purpose:

1. To save by documentation and research, which is done in relation to the surrounding culture, the endangered Jewish visual heritage in Israel and the Diaspora, and to make the data available to everyone via the Internet; and
2. To strengthen Jewish identity through the study and dissemination of the visual culture in connection with the literary sources.

These sources constitute part of the science of Judaism, Wissenschaft des Judentums, which was started by a group of Jewish intellectuals during the 1810s and 1820s in Germany, and headed by Leopold Zunz (1794–1886), who outlined the program and scientific methods of this new discipline. It was to include the study of Judaism in all its manifestations: theology, religious worship, Jewish law, Hebrew literature, history, and Jewish ethics. However, Zunz failed to include the arts. Now, more than 150 years later, the science of Judaism, which Zunz and others instigated, is extended to include the visual heritage, thus adding a new and significant dimension to Jewish culture.

The study of Jewish visual art in Israel and the Diaspora, which began in the 20th century, was recognized as a specific discipline at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem in the 1960s through the efforts of Professor Bezalel Narkiss, Israel Prize laureate. Inspired by the Princeton Index of Christian Art, in 1969 Narkiss founded the Jerusalem Index of Jewish Art in order to define the particular features of the Jewish visual heritage within the regional cultures in which it flourished. The establishment of the Center for Jewish Art in 1979 started a systematic gathering of first-hand data on visual material in five fields: ancient and modern Jewish art; Hebrew illuminated manuscripts; ritual and ceremonial objects and the customs of their usage in different Jewish communities; and the architecture of synagogues, ritual baths (mikvahs), cemetery chapels, and tombstones. In addition to the Jerusalem Index of Jewish Art, from 1974 to 1998 the center also published 24 volumes of the journal Jewish Art, and from 1983 to 1999 it published 7 volumes of the journal Rimonim (in Hebrew).

The connection of the database of visual culture to Jewish literary sources is done by the team of researchers at the Jerusalem Index of Jewish Art (10 volumes have been published to date), the main research and educational venture of the Center for Jewish Art. Up to now, the index has amassed about a quarter of a million documents, with photographs of objects and architectural plans—the results of documentation in 40 countries. The relatively low costs of documentation, research, and computerization is due to the fact that this work is carried out by master's degree and doctoral students and architects at the center, with the cooperation of educational or governmental institutions in various countries.

Ritual objects are being documented in countries with dwindling Jewish communities and places where no Jewish communities exist, including North Africa, the Balkans, Eastern Europe, the Caucasus, India, and central Asia. The knowledge on many such objects was saved by documentation before they disappeared without trace. The systematic documentation of Hebrew illuminated manuscripts usually takes place in museums and libraries, such as the British Library in London, the Royal Library in Copenhagen, the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, the Austrian National Library in Vienna, and the Vatican Library. However, in recent years, special efforts have been made to document private collections before they are sold. The same is true for paintings and sculptures of modern Jewish artists documented in Israel and Eastern Europe, such as Marc Chagall, Abel Pann, Meir Akselrod, Vadim Siddur, Solomon Gershov, and Dimitry Lion. Ancient Jewish art, including coins, ossuaries, synagogues, and synagogue mosaics, was documented in Israel as well as in Albania, Macedonia, Jordan, and other countries. Endangered monuments, such as synagogues, Jewish houses containing synagogues, mikvahs, cemetery chapels, and tombstones, were documented in the Caucasus, Balkans, Central Asia, Eastern Europe, and other places.

The center is in the process of mapping these structures, built up to 1950, throughout the Diaspora. The endangered buildings in places without Jewish communities are usually privately owned; in secondary use; or abandoned, dilapidated, or about to be reconstructed or demolished. It is estimated that about 3,600 such buildings are still standing in Europe, and perhaps 5,500 throughout the Diaspora. The numbers are a rough estimate, however, because each documentation expedition undertaken by the center brings surprises for better or worse.

The Department of Architectural History at the University of Braunschweig has been a close partner of the Center for Jewish Art since 1994. Under the supervision of Professor Harmen Thies and with the help of three postdoctoral students acting as instructors, more than 150 extant synagogues and other buildings have been documented in five German states. Some, destroyed in 1938, were reconstructed as wooden models. The minimal costs are due to a program that was integrated into the curriculum of more than 300 students, some from the Universities of Dresden and Weimar.

In order to continue the mutual work of the two institutions, a research unit called Beit Tfila (House of Prayer) was established, dedicated to the documentation and research of Jewish architecture in Europe. Through this program many European students become familiar with Jewish culture viewed as part of their own heritage (see the Web site: www.bet-tfila.org). A similar program is being successfully carried out in Slovakia, organized by Dr. Maros Borsky, and in England, organized by Dr. Sharman Kadish. Both scholars were researchers at the Center for Jewish Art.

The Center for Jewish Art has also held symposia on Jewish art in 1987 (Catalonia, Spain), 1989 (Provence, France), 1991 (Piemonte, Italy), 1993 (Turkey), 1995 (Prague, Czech Republic), 1997 (Greece), 1998 (Israel), and 2000 (Alsace, France). In addition, on May 16–23, 1985, the organization held the First International Seminar on Jewish Art in Jerusalem. Subsequent seminars were held in 1988, covering synagogues, ritual objects, Hebrew illuminated manuscripts, modern Jewish artists, and Jewish museums; in 1991, covering the image of the Jew, education in and through Jewish art, modern Jewish artists, and ceremonial art; in 1994, covering the Second Commandment in Jewish, Christian, and Islamic art; in 1996, covering the real and ideal Jerusalem in Jewish, Christian, and Islamic art; and in 1999, covering the Bible in Jewish, Christian, and Islamic art.

Documenting and researching the buildings, ritual objects, manuscripts, and ancient and modern art of the Jewish communities in the Diaspora affords a glimpse into their rich cultural life and provides a strong foundation for the developing Israeli culture. Jewish visual heritage, like the science of Judaism, provides the material that enables researchers to gain insight into and appreciation of the values of the multifaceted Jewish culture. Through education, this knowledge will pass on from generation to generation.

Selected Bibliography

- Amar, Ariella. 2003. "Synagogues and Ritual Artifacts." In Morocco, edited by Haim Saadoun, 273–288. Jewish Communities in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries [in Hebrew]. Jerusalem: Ben Zvi Institute and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.
- Amar, Ariella. 2005. "Synagogues and Ritual Artifacts." In Tunisia, edited by Haim Saadoun. Jewish Communities in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries [in Hebrew]. Jerusalem: Ben Zvi Institute and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.
- Amar, Ariella, and Ruth Jacoby, eds. 1998. Ingathering of the Nations. Treasures of Jewish Art: Documenting an Endangered Legacy. Jerusalem: Center for Jewish Art.
- Cohen-Mushlin, Aliza. 1979. "Synagogue Floor Mosaic with Temple Facade and Implements; Bottom of a Cup with Torah Ark and Temple Implements; Fragments of Cup Bottom with Torah Ark and Temple Implements; Medallion with Menorah; Oil Lamp with Menorah; Oil Lamp with David and Goliath; Plaque Against the Evil Eye." In Age of Spirituality, Late Antique and Early Christian Art, edited by Kurt Weitzmann, 375–389. New York: Metropolitan Museum of Art.
- Cohen-Mushlin, Aliza. 1983. The Making of a Manuscript, The Worms Bible of 1148, vol. 25. Wiesbaden, Germany: Harrassowitz.
- Cohen-Mushlin, Aliza. 2001. "Cost-Efficient Virtual Preservation of Synagogues." In Historic Cities and Sacred Sites: Cultural Roots for Urban Futures, edited by I. Serageldin, E. Shluger, and J. Martin-Brown, 117–120. Washington, DC: The International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, The World Bank, Oxford University Press.
- Cohen-Mushlin, Aliza. 2001. "Reconstructing the Past to Build the Future: Rescue and Preservation of Cultural Heritage." In Culture in Sustainable Development, edited by I. Serageldin and J. Martin-Brown, 72–77. Washington, DC: World Bank and UNESCO.
- Cohen-Mushlin, Aliza. 2003. "Scribes and Artists in Hebrew Manuscripts." In Cathedral Workshops on Religious Arts and Crafts, edited by C. Carlo-Stella, 327–332. Rome: Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church.
- Cohen-Mushlin, Aliza. 2003. "Survey and Inventory of Jewish Sacred Property in Post-conflict Areas." Museum International 55 (2): 218.
- Cohen-Mushlin, Aliza. 2003. "Virtual Preservation of Minority Visual Culture: The Index of Jewish Art." In Cathedral Workshops on Religious Arts and Crafts, edited by C. Carlo-Stella, 117–120. Rome: Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church.
- Feuchtwanger, Naomi, ed. 1984. Ohel Moshe: The Synagogue and its Ritual Objects, Jerusalem: Center for Jewish Art.
- Hanegbi, Zohar, and Yaniv Bracha. 1991. Afghanistan: The Synagogue and the Jewish Home. Jerusalem: Center for Jewish Art.

- Jacoby, Ruth, and Talgam Rina. 1988. Ancient Synagogues: Architectural Glossary. Jerusalem: Center for Jewish Art.
- Kravtsov, Sergey. 1994. "Synagogues of the Western Ukraine: State of Preservation and Exploration." Visnyk: Periodical of The West Ukrainian Institute for Conservation 2: 10–16.
- Kravtsov, Sergey. 1995. "Die Juden der Grenz—und Freihandelsstadt Brody" [in German]. David, March, 16–19.
- Kravtsov, Sergey. 1996. "Synagogues in Eastern Galicia." In Treasures of Jewish Galicia: Judaica from the Museum of Ethnography and Craft, edited by Sarah Harel Hoshen, 37–49. Tel Aviv: Beth Hatefutsoth.
- Kravtsov, Sergey. 1999. "Galician Towns of the 16th–17th Centuries (Composition and Symbolism)" [in Russian]. Architekturnoye Nasledstvo (Architectural Heritage) 43: 53–59.
- Kravtsov, Sergey. 2003. "Rekonstruierte Vergangenheit: die Synagoge von Leszniów im Model." Judaica: Beiträge zum Verstehen des Judentum 2: 98–110.
- Kravtsov, Sergey. 2005. "Juan Bautista Villalpando and Sacred Architecture in the Seventeenth Century." Journal of the Society of Architectural Historians 3: 312–339.
- Kravtsov, Sergey. 2005. "Gothic Survival in Synagogue Architecture of the 17th and 18th Centuries in Volhynia, Ruthenia and Podolia." Architectura. Zeitschrift für Geschichte der Baukunst/Journal of the History of Architecture 1: 69–94.
- Mellinkoff, Ruth. 1999. Antisemitic Hate Signs in Hebrew Illuminated Manuscripts from Medieval Germany. Jerusalem: Center for Jewish Art.
- Narkiss, Bezalel, and Aliza Cohen-Mushlin. 1985. The Kennicott Bible. London: Facsimile Editions.
- Narkiss, Bezalel, and Aliza Cohen-Mushlin. 1985. "Worms Mahsor." In Worms Mahsor, edited by M. Beit-Arie. Jerusalem: Vadus.
- Narkiss, Bezalel, Aliza Cohen-Mushlin, and Anat Cherikover. 1982. Hebrew Illuminated Manuscripts in the British Isles. Vol. I, Spanish and Portuguese Manuscripts. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Rudolf, Anthony Rudo. 1995. "The Jewish Architecture." Jewish Quarterly Autumn, 60–62.
- Sabar, Shalom, ed. 1995. Between Judaism and Islam in the Mirror of Art [in Hebrew]. Jerusalem: Center for Jewish Art.
- Wischnitzer, Rachel. 1990. From Dura to Rembrandt. Jerusalem: Center for Jewish Art.
- The World Directory of Jewish Museums*. 1994. Jerusalem: Center for Jewish Art.
- Yaniv, Bracha, Hanegbi Zohar, and Sabar Shalom, eds. 1988. Hebrew Inscriptions and Their Translations. Jerusalem: Center for Jewish Art.

Jewish Contributions to the Arts

Sylvia Barack Fishman

---

Jews as Active Participants in Modern Western Culture

This essay explores the developing role of Jews in Western Diaspora cultures in modern times; the contributions Jews made to literature, music, theater, film, and comedy; and the ways these changes reflect transformations in the attitudes of creative Jewish toward their own Jewishness. Although Jews in the arts may not appear, on the surface, to occupy the same monolithic status as the names of Benedict Spinoza (1632–1677), Sigmund Freud (1856–1939), Albert Einstein (1879–1955), and Karl Marx (1818–1883), Jewish writers, filmmakers, artists, and producers have profoundly influenced contemporary Western culture, especially that of the United States. They have articulated the values of their adopted societies and have arguably been the prime movers in producing cultural attitudes that embrace liberal Western Jewish values. In recent decades, many have turned their attention to Jewish history, culture, and concerns and have brought Jewish culture to both Jewish and non-Jewish audiences. Because exhaustive discussions of these phenomena would require many volumes, this essay focuses on representative personalities and their contributions.

Jewish Entry into Western Artistic Activities

Jews in many historical periods interacted with the cultures surrounding them. Jews contributed significantly to the cultural output of the countries they inhabited during those historical episodes when such contributions were possible. Moreover, from the earliest Jewish texts Jewish cultures were enriched by materials absorbed from external societies—and those materials were then profoundly transformed within the contemporaneous Judaic ethos. Poetic expressions and philosophical works of medieval Jews of the Iberian Peninsula, to take one oft-cited example, illustrate the brilliant potential of such cultural interchange. Nevertheless, until the modern period, boundaries between Jews and non-Jews were characteristically supported by both communities, limiting the extent of cultural exchange.

Boundaries began to erode in the 18th and 19th centuries, during the period of the political emancipation of the Jews, first in Western and then, incompletely, in Eastern Europe. A complex interaction between Jews and the non-Jewish majority began to define modern Diaspora Jewishness, especially in Western societies. Some Jewish artists and intellectuals applied modern concepts and techniques to Judaic materials and created a rich new array of poetry, fiction, theatrical and artistic works. The East European Haskalah especially nourished an intense, creative, and innovative Jewish outpouring among writers such as short story master Y. L. Peretz (1851–1915), powerful poet Hayim Nahman Bialik (1873–1934), the brilliant fiction humorist Shalom Aleichem (1859–1916), saga writer Sholem Asch (1880–1957), novelist Chaim Grade (1910–1982), and the Singer brothers—Isaac Bashevis Singer (1902–1991), best known for his incorporation of spiritualism and sexuality into his fiction about Jewish life, and I. J. Singer (1893–1944), whose family epics portray Jewish societal transformations. Beyond their deeply differentiated styles of writing, these writers created two secular literary approaches, competing preferences for Hebrew, reclaimed as a language for modern literary expression, versus Yiddish, as the language of the ordinary people.

Writers of the Haskalah had typically grown up in pious Jewish homes and had attended Orthodox schools and yeshivas (seminaries teaching the Talmud and other rabbinic texts). Deeply steeped in classic Jewish texts, they used their language, images, symbols, and themes in their secular writing, even when their work criticized Jewish societies. Moreover, the maskilim realized the shtetl society that had so long typified Eastern Europe was quickly disappearing, and some of their work elegizes that disappearing world. Some of these authors, especially Shalom Aleichem and Isaac Bashevis Singer, achieved widespread recognition among non-Jewish and Jewish audiences.

Jews became prominent contributors to the cultures of many Western countries. However, prejudice remained, especially for Jews who aspired to careers in artistic and intellectual arenas. In European settings, many talented and ambitious 18th-, 19th-, and early 20th-century Jews saw that they could not progress in their chosen fields without being baptized into Christianity. Three famous examples speak volumes: All the children of Moses Mendelsohn, the great 17th-century pioneer of the German Haskalah, abandoned their father's enlightened Jewish learning and piety and converted to Christianity; Felix Mendelssohn (1809–1847) contributed his magnificent music to Western culture, not as a Jew, but as a Christian; and German poet Heinrich Heine (1797–1856) reportedly converted out of convenience, and is said to have declared the conversion of Jews like himself futile, because, “No Jew can believe in the divinity of any other Jew.” In contrast, Bernard Berenson (1865–1959), who began life as a Lithuanian Jew but became a famous art historian as an Episcopalian, earnestly referred to “our Puritan forebears.” Nevertheless, some converted artists created works that many see as being deeply informed by Jewish consciousness and concerns. Most Jewish artists did not convert from their hereditary faith, although many became completely secular. Westernizing Jewish writers and artists became part of polyglot bohemian artistic circles. Some of them formed lively, distinctly Jewish creative societies, organized around poetry and novels, theater, music, and eventually film. Warsaw, especially, became the epicenter of developing Jewish culture, and it was teeming with Jewish creativity of all kinds.

The flourishing Jewish artistic culture that incorporated both Jewish and secular expressions was destroyed along with the majority of Europe's Jews—more than a third of world Jewry—by the Nazi Holocaust. In the wake of that destruction, the majority of Diaspora Jewish contributions to modern culture flowed from the largest Diaspora community, which had been growing by leaps and bounds in the United States. The American Jewish population had increased from 300,000 in 1880 to 4,400,000 in 1930. Not surprisingly, among the millions of Jewish immigrants, creative artists of all kinds found their way to America's shores, and Jewish creativity developed there in unprecedented ways.

Portraying American Jewish Immigrant Realities

In America, unlike many European settings, no one indigenous ethnoreligious group controlled society and cultural expressions. Baptism was not a required ticket to success, and accommodation with the external culture without formal conversion was commonplace. Nevertheless, except for those who used the immigrant experience as grist for their artistic mills, or those who were specifically interested in Yiddish or Hebrew cultural expressions, most American Jewish artists during the first half of the 20th century did not incorporate their Jewish antecedents in any obvious way. Exceptions were artists and producers who worked within venues designed exclusively for Jewish audiences in Yiddish-language theater, films, literature, and other print materials. These American Yiddish-language materials are not within the purview of this essay, but they provided a fertile training ground. Jewish musicians, actors, and writers often developed their talents in Yiddish-speaking environments and then went on to fame in the wider world—often with less Jewish-sounding names.

Jewish materials in the late decades of the 19th century and the first few decades of the 20th century are found in the novels, theater, films, and music depicting the immigrant experience for a general, English-speaking audience. Socialist activist, journalist, and prolific author Abraham Cahan (1860–1951) described the trials of immigrant Jewish men and women coping with societal and familial disruptions, as did later authors Anzia Yeziarska (1885–1970), Daniel Fuchs (1909–1993), and Henry Roth (1906–1995), among others. Mary Antin (1881–1949) described the acculturation of immigrants in her book, From Plotsk to Boston. Not least, The Jazz Singer, the 1927 film that brought sound to the commercial screen, told the story of a cantor's son who runs away from home and from Judaic commitments to become a success on Broadway, complete with a beautiful and supportive non-Jewish girlfriend. Christian as well as Jewish Americans enjoyed these portrayals because so many of them had come from immigrant backgrounds and they could relate to the intergenerational struggles despite their differing ethnoreligious origins. These stories about immigrant Jews captured a critical chapter in Christian American social history as well.

Al Jolson performs in blackface in the motion picture The Jazz Singer (1927). (Library of Congress)

American Art by Jews—But Not about Jewishness—Before World War II

Music, Theater, and Musical Theater

Except for immigrant stories, Jewish novelists more often wrote about ethnic groups other than Jewish families. Jews whose earliest memories included neighborhood synagogues with their liturgical cantorial music shaped the early 20th-century voice of American music. Many achieved world-class careers in music—without overtly referencing their Jewish backgrounds—in venues ranging from highbrow to lowbrow. Nevertheless, some listeners perceived Jewish-authored music as enriched behind the scenes by some indefinable Jewish emotionalism—perhaps akin to the later notion of musical soul. Both Irving Berlin's (1888–1989) 1927 biography and the words onscreen in the film The Jazz Singer (1927) refer to Jewish musician's "tear" in the voice or melody. Composer Aaron Copland's (1900–1990) music evoked Appalachia and the desert Southwest, but not the Jewish streets and synagogues where he learned his first musical notes. Nevertheless, in later years Copland himself evaluated his musical oeuvre as having been influenced by his Jewishness: the "passionate lyricism" and its "dramatic" and "intense" qualities meant it could not have been "written by a goy [non-Jew]." Berlin's musical ditties celebrated "white Christmas," the "Easter parade," and every non-Jewish festival in-between, but only in safely Jewish contexts did he refer to the calendar of the Jewish year that he experienced in his Lower East Side of New York origins, where his father was a part-time cantor. Berlin, like other Jewish artists, tended to portray a warm, jovial version of secularized Christian culture, rather than inflamed religious passions, and their artistic creations may have subtly lowered the barriers between American Jews and Christians. At the same time, some musical artists continued to produce Jewish materials for Jewish audiences. Making fun of themselves and other Jews who affected American backgrounds, Jewish musicians parodied other Jewish musicians in Jewish dialect pieces—"I want to be an Oy, Oy, Oyviator," "I'm a Yiddisher Cowboy," "I've got a mammy/ but she don't come from Alabammy"—that seemed threatening to more Americanized Jews of the time.

Jews entered mainstream show business through the New York theatrical scene early in the game. In the 1890s, economic hardships and the failure of many theaters opened the way for Jewish entrepreneurs, and six Jewish booking agents and producers formed the Theatrical Syndicate, which virtually monopolized show business nationally for decades and provided the model for the motion picture industry that would follow. Broadway, especially the genre of musical theater that developed in the 1920s and 1930s, attracted many Jewish writers, musicians, and producers. Indeed, some have argued that the American musical theater was to some extent a Jewish creation. Producers like Lee, Sam, and J. J. Shubert (née Levi [1871–1953], Shmuel [1878–1905], and Jacob Szemanski [1879–1963]) and David Merrick (originally Margulois, 1911–2000) controlled theater chains; Jerome Kern (1885–1945),

Richard Rodgers (1902–1979) and Oscar Hammerstein (1895–1960), Frank Loesser (1910–1969), Abe Burrows (1910–1985), George S. Kaufman (1889–1961), the Gershwin brothers, George (1898–1937) and Ira (1896–1983), and scores of other artists shaped the American theatrical and musical idiom. Jews provided not only talent, but also an ideology of ethnoreligious tolerance, repeatedly presented as an American value. The Broadway musicals' consumers also were disproportionately Jewish, perhaps up to half of a typical audience. Jewish creators and consumers supported inclusivity as an American characteristic.

These issues were of primary concern during this time period because of the increasing American nativist racism, a movement that sought to limit the numbers of “polluting” immigrants—including Jews—entering the United States. Academics, politicians, and other public personages urged immigration restrictions, ultimately successfully, as the gates of immigration were virtually closed to those defined as undesirable peoples in 1924. Jews who were accused of having ugly, indelible “race traits” created and responded to novels, plays, and music that preached the unity of all humankind. Beginning with Israel Zangwill's (1864–1926) 1908 drama, The Melting Pot, continuing with the powerful 1927 musical drama Show Boat, and reiterated in later musical theater successes such as Finian's Rainbow (1947), South Pacific (1949), and West Side Story (1957), among others, Jewish artists shone a spotlight on the irrationality of hating other races and religions. The male ingenue of South Pacific learns painfully that boundaries corrosively divide people one from the other, and that societies deliberately—and wrongly—promulgate vicious boundaries: “You've got to be carefully taught,” he sings sarcastically, “before you are six or seven or eight/to hate all the people your relatives hate.” Later, composers and librettists such as Leonard Bernstein (1918–1990) and Stephen Sondheim (1930– ) continued the message, as Jewish music, theater, and musical theater promoted the creation of an America defined by the absence of racial and religious hatreds. In many ways they succeeded, as Americans absorbed the Jewish definition of a tolerant American culture.

Nonmusical playwrights also transformed Judaic materials into more universalistic formats before the American multiculturalist movement liberated them to access their Jewish backgrounds directly. While Clifford Odets (1906–1963), writing in the 1930s, was still creating some dramatic characters with identifiable Jewish names and characteristics, Arthur Miller (1915–2005) and Neil Simon (1927– ), to give just two examples, played down the Jewish antecedents of their characters in plays like The Death of a Salesman, All My Sons, The Crucible, The Odd Couple, and others. Although Miller claimed that he thought a lot about Jewish history when writing The Crucible, there is little in the play to indicate that preoccupation. It was not until the 1970s that Simon created his warm Jewish family plays, beginning with Brighton Beach Memoirs. A different America was needed before these artists felt comfortable dealing with memories that were closest to home. Not coincidentally, Jewish writing and films worked quietly to create that different America.

Jews and the American Film Industry

Jews are often accused of controlling the American film industry. Neal Gabler famously suggested in his book An Empire of their Own that Jews did more than David O. Selznick, film producer from the 1930s to the 1950s, is best known for producing Gone with the Wind (1939).

(Library of Congress)

that—the “Jews invented Hollywood.” Many observers suggest that Jews got involved with film, as with other enterprises, because they saw an unmet need and moved in to fill the gap. Jews were associated with the developing motion picture industry from its beginnings in the nickelodeon theaters in the first decade of the 20th century, when moving pictures began to be shown by neighborhood entrepreneurs. For only five cents, at any time of the day, patrons of all ages and financial means could escape into a world of fantasy and entertainment—nickelodeons that featured not only the short films that were their official rationale but also songs, live acts, and sometimes amateur nights. These movie theaters caught on like wild-fire across America. By 1908, New York alone had more than 100 movie houses, most of them seating under 300 people, and most located in Jewish neighborhoods where “garment merchants turned exhibitors” like Marcus Loew (1870–1927), Adolph Zukor (1873–1976), and William Fox (1879–1952) had banded together to form the Moving Picture Exhibitors Association. Carl Laemmle (1867–1939), a German-Jewish immigrant who founded the Independent Motion Picture Company of America (IMP) began to produce and distribute his own moving pictures. Campaigns to rein in and control the “depravity” of these unsupervised environments were quick to follow, many of them smacking openly of anti-Semitism. One cartoon, for example, showed a grotesque Jewish caricatured peddler on a cart, distributing films; his wagon is labeled “independent junk wagon,” and his stubborn donkey is tagged “small exhibitor.” While non-Jewish (and often anti-Semitic) filmmakers, including Thomas Edison (1847–1931), D. W. Griffith (1878–1948), and Thomas Ince (1882–1924), operating in New York, were respectfully referred to in the press as inventors or pioneers, Jewish filmmakers, including the founders of the IMP along with Samuel Goldwyn (1882–1974), Jesse Lasky (1880–1958), and Louis B.

Mayer (1885–1957), who relocated their filmmaking to Southern California, were denigrated as uneducated, crude, vulgar autocrats.

These first Jewish filmmakers were joined by Harry (1881–1958) and Jack Warner (1892–1978), Harry Cohn (1891–1958), Irving Thalberg (1899–1936), and David O. Selznick (1902–1965) after the invention of talking pictures. As Jewish Hollywood was established, automobile magnate Henry Ford (1863–1947) had the 1905 Russian forgery, The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, translated into English, and Ford promulgated the charge that Jews were ruining the Christian youth of America through their control of popular entertainment, what the Dearborn Independent called, “the Jewish manipulation of the public mind.” Among other charges, Ford’s publications accused Jewish filmmakers of being motivated by communist sympathies—a charge that would recur periodically and would torment much of Jewish Hollywood decades later during the notorious Joseph McCarthy hearings for the U.S. House Un-American Activities Committee. In an atmosphere of rising anti-Semitism, Jewish films promoted a melting pot philosophy from The Jazz Singer (1927) and Abie’s Irish Rose (1929) onward. In many Jewish works, marriage across cultural boundaries was an important symbol: the ability of minority groups to marry persons from mainstream culture was presented in many Jewish-authored novels, plays, and films as a litmus test of the prominence of true democratic egalitarianism. During these years, actual intermarriage between Jews and non-Jews was relatively low in general, but was most common among artists, intellectuals, and the most well-educated and ambitious Jews. In addition to intermarriage as an ideological motif in the attempt to create a more tolerant America, it was often possible—especially for men—to accelerate the process of acceptance by acquiring symbolic Christian status without converting by marrying Christian women from prominent families. Jewish movie moguls played down their Jewish origins in the 1930s and 1940s, running newsreels preceding films in public movie theaters prominently featuring themselves and their tall blond wives around the Christmas tree.

Overtly Jewish content virtually disappeared from films and other Jewish artistic output after the creation of movie codes that prohibited or severely restricted ethnic materials. After several groups jockeyed for power in the creation of such codes in the 1920s, Postmaster General Will Hays joined together with the Catholic Legion of Decency, which had been lobbying against the pernicious Jewish influence, to create and implement the 1930 motion picture codes. One historian wittily refers to motion pictures from the 1930s to the 1950s as “an industry largely financed by Protestant bankers, operated by Jewish studio executives, and policed by Catholic bureaucrats, all the while claiming to represent grass-roots America.” After Adolf Hitler became German chancellor in 1933, Germany fired all its Jewish filmmakers, demanding that American film offices in Germany do the same. In America, also, many prominent film companies were pressured not to articulate anti-Nazi sentiments. Catholic Hollywood reporter Joseph I. Breen, head of the Production Code Administration from 1934 on, saw the rising Nazis as useful in cleaning Hollywood from the influence of Jews, “the scum of the earth,” who “think of nothing but money-making and sexual indulgence.” When Warner Brothers’ 1937 film The Life of Emile Zola focused on French anti-Semitic persecution of Captain Alfred Dreyfus—without ever uttering the words “Jew” or “anti-Semitism”—Breen nevertheless privately complained about the film’s “propaganda.” Some Hollywood figures formed the Hollywood Anti-Nazi League in 1936, and 58 individuals in the industry did petition for an anti-Nazi boycott in 1938, but Breen and others accused Jews of trying to drag America into a Jewish war as well as promoting communism. Nevertheless, some studios continued to promote anti-Nazi films, some dramas, some comic, which enjoyed box office success. Significantly, none of these films referred to Jews as victims of Nazi aggression. Even filmmakers who wished to emphasize Jewish stories were forced to do so through sleight of hand, rather than directly. The splendid director Ernst Lubitsch (1892–1947), for example, directed Jack Benny and Carole Lombard in a brilliant black comedy, To Be or Not to Be (1942), a film about the invading Nazis taking over a Warsaw theater, with scarcely a mention of the Jewish dimension—but Lubitsch points toward Jewish suffering by visually focusing on a Jewish actor’s nose.

Under these pressures, Jewish themes and concerns went underground and emerged only in a kind of code—movies featured other marginalized groups, tolerance was a cause célèbre (albeit seldom mentioning Jews), and the ability to repel savage enemies and to rise up and reinvent oneself despite unspeakable destruction was a frequent plot motif. Moviemakers often transformed into film the tolerance-promoting musicals of the Broadway stage, thus bringing the message of a more pluralistic America to screens in far-flung locales. Like their Broadway originals, these films trumpeted the wrongheadedness of prejudice against persons of African American or Polynesian—but never Jewish—backgrounds. Nevertheless, the transplantations of these messages of tolerance did not always fare well: The arguments of South Pacific, for example, so offended racists in the 1950s American South that some sought, unsuccessfully, to pass a law against lyrics promoting “an underlying philosophy inspired by Moscow” that provided “justification of interracial marriage.” The slur about these philosophies emanating from “Moscow” refers, of course, to the Jewishness of the creative artists, the putative socialistic leanings of such Jews, and hence their un-American nature.

Partially because of the combined pressure of the American motion picture codes and the Nazi determination to erase the influence of Jews in Western cultures, the visible presence of Jews in literature, film, and popular culture diminished in the 1920s, 1930s, and 1940s. This virtual invisibility—while Jews were in fact enormously active in the creative and production aspects of all of these—was accomplished through shifts in emphasis, plot, settings, and especially names. Characters in novels, plays, and films frequently started their existence with what sociologists call “distinctive Jewish surnames,” but then those names were replaced with generic American names. Jews in the entertainment industry often changed their own names, or had their names changed by their agents or studios, in an attempt to not have their careers impeded by overt Jewish identity. Playwright and Jewish activist Ben Hecht (1894–1964), author of numerous prize-winning and popular screenplays, wrote in his nonfiction book, A Guide for the Bedeviled (1944), his disgust at “the almost complete disappearance of the Jew from American fiction, stage, radio and movies.”

It was not until the Allies were victorious in World War II that overtly Jewish materials began to emerge in films once again. The first films focused on anti-Jewish prejudice and its appalling results: In 1947, both Gentleman's Agreement and Crossfire spotlighted the irrationality and evils of anti-Semitism, a message Americans seemed ready to hear in the post-World War II years. A very pretty—but nonetheless moving for many—version of the The Diary of Anne Frank appeared in 1959. Both the Holocaust drama Judgment at Nuremberg and Exodus, a pro-Israel film based on Leon Uris's sprawling history of the Jewish experience in the Holocaust and the struggle for a Jewish state, were released in 1960. A grittier, more painful film, Sidney Lumet's (1924– ) The Pawnbroker brought the Holocaust and its psychological aftermath to the commercial screen in 1965. Hollywood's suppression of overt Jewishness had come to an end. A new era of open portrayals of Jews and Jewish themes had begun in film, television, and Jewishly particularistic literature as well.

Jewish Performers in American Culture

Not only writers, musicians, and artists, but also comic and dramatic performers were disproportionately represented by Jews. Few took the path of the prolific, multit talented Molly Picon (1898–1992), who from an early age acted, sang, and danced for decades in Yiddish plays, musicals, and films, and later was also in demand in English-language commercial plays and films. Most performers who could find work on the nonsectarian stage and screen left Jewish venues behind. Some did not bother to change their names, but Paul Muni (1895–1967, Muni Weisenfreund), Judy Holliday (1922–1965, Judith Tuvim), and John Garfield (1913–1952, Jacob Julius Garfinkle) were among the many performers who began in Jewish environments and then went on to careers in the wider world with different, less Jewishly recognizable names. Although the general press ignored their Jewish origins, none of these particular performers downplayed their Jewishness, and Garfield was especially active on behalf of Israel and in diverse Jewish causes, appropriately playing the fearless Jewish soldier Dave Goldman in Gentleman's Agreement. Some, like Shelley Winters (1920–2006, Shirley Schrift), at first played generic young women's roles and then depicted older Jewish women as she got older (and as films featuring nagging Jewish mothers increased).

Although 20th-century American comedy was, in fact, a very Jewish influenced field, it followed the familiar pattern of other performance arts: During the immigration years, Jewishness was played for laughs, both within primarily Jewish environments and on the public stage. Jewish vaudeville and Catskill Mountain resorts and comedy shows trained scores of hopefuls who cut their comic teeth with Jewish audiences. Many produced satiric Jewish materials that might well be taken as anti-Semitic, had they not been created by Jews. However, by the middle of the 1930s, with the spillover impact of the motion picture codes and arguably anxiety about Nazis and anti-Semitism, overt Jewishness only seemed safe and appropriate in Jewish environments. With some notable exceptions, such as Gertrude Berg's (1899–1966) radio portrayal of the wise Jewish domestic matriarch Molly Goldberg, which was first aired in 1929 and ran through the American entertainment industry's Jewless years, most comics who hoped to make a success in broader settings worried about appearing too Jewish, so they changed their names and dropped their Jewish inflections for their American careers. Although stars such as Jack Benny (1894–1974, Benjamin Kubelsky), George Burns (1896–1996, Nathan Birnbaum), Milton Berle (1908–2002, Mendel Berlinger), Eddie Cantor (1892–1964, Israel Iskowitz), Sophie Tucker (1884–1966, Sophie Kalish), Sid Caesar (1922– ), and Danny Kaye (1913–1987, David Daniel Kaminsky) all got their start on vaudeville stages, and some continued to occasionally indulge in insiders' Jewish humor for Jewish audiences, they became famous as American comics, and shaped American comedy. Fanny Brice (1891–1951, Fania Borach) discovered that Jewish accents and humor did not translate into new environments. Beginning in 1937, her radio audiences liked her nonethnic character, "Baby Snooks," much better than they did her Yiddish-accented previous characters. Jack Benny and Milton Berle, in particular, were known for their clean comedy, managing to be both inoffensive and very funny.

Even Groucho (1890–1977), Chico (1887–1961), and Harpo Marx (1888–1964) encoded their Jewishness, with Chico and Harpo taking on ethnic—but not Jewish—characteristics. In film after film, as the zany and clever little Marx Brothers outwitted their tall, wealthy, aristocratic—but stupid—antagonists, Jewish audiences were left to understand the Jewish triumphalist subtext, which was safely invisible to Christian audiences. Similarly, in Sid Caesar's Your Show of Shows (1950–1954), he took on personae of many foreign characters, none of them specifically Jewish. His skits often encoded Jewish materials or perspectives in ways that would only be visible to Jews. In one skit, for example, non-Jewish businessmen all order items such as bacon and raisin and hamhock sandwiches for lunch—unlikely pork-based combinations that reflect what Jews might imagine that non-Jews might eat. Many of these performers, however, perceived a Jewish dimension to their work. Comic actor Jerry Lewis (1926– , Joseph Levitch)—adored by the French for his slapstick visual comedy—saw himself as a comic crusader against villains and bullies.

It was not until the post-World War II years, when Jewishness was tentatively gaining visibility in various media, that particularly Jewish comic voices began to erupt as well. After a few, mostly positive, cinematic and television portrayals of Jews in the late 1940s and 1950s—including the familiar gentle humor of The Goldbergs, whose television incarnation aired from 1949 to 1956, and the melodic, earnestly didactic nostalgia of the stage version of Fiddler on the Roof in the 1960s—Lenny Bruce (1925–1966, Leonard Schneider) ruptured taboos in extended comic riffs on what defined "Jewish" and "goyish" styles. Peppered with obscenities and wide-ranging ethnic insults (and sometimes fueled by alcohol and drugs), Bruce's comedy—along with transgressive, sexually explicit novels by Henry Miller (1891–1980), Norman Mailer (1923–2007), and Joseph Heller (1923–1999)—transformed the public performance landscape.

Liberated as well by changing social and cultural trends that embraced multiculturalism rather than the melting pot, humorist filmmakers such as Woody Allen (1935– , Allen Stewart Konigsberg) and Mel Brooks (1926– , Melvin Kaminsky), as well as stand-up comics like Alan King (1927–2004, Irwin Alan Kniburg), Jackie Mason (1931– , Yacov Moshe Moaza), Joan Rivers (1933– , Joan Sandra Molinsky), and others found that overtly (and sometimes abrasive) Jewish humor had become immensely salable, and they began including Jewish materials in their language, plots, and references in their comic routines. Gilda Radner (1946–1989) posed as “The Jewess in Jewish Jeans” in one of many memorable Saturday Night Live episodes that featured overtly Jewish humor and artists. They were followed by numerous younger comics who took the inclusion of Jewish references as a given, such as Jerry Seinfeld (1954– ), Larry David (1947– ), and Adam Sandler (1966– ). As a result, Yiddish words and Jewish life-cycle symbols and events became part of the American cultural heritage: television comedy plots featured the search for a mohel, the relationship between baptism and mikveh, and the creation of “Jewish” wine (just add a lot of sugar, according to the television comedy Frasier). Non-Jewish Americans began to routinely use words like chutzpah (nerve), schlep (drag), schlemiel (unsuccessful person), tchotchke (kitschy bric-a-brac), as well as saltier terms such as tokhes (rear end) and putz (penis), which had once been limited to Jewish environments. Long before the turn of the 21st century, Jewish comics had helped the cultural boundaries between American Jews and non-Jews to become porous indeed.

Post–World War II Period: Focusing on Jewish Assimilation into the Bourgeoisie

In real life, repeated waves of Jewish immigrants to the United States had been acculturating enthusiastically virtually from their arrival on American shores. Although the millions of Jews who emigrated between the years of 1881 and 1924 arrived as measurably the poorest of all the European immigrant groups, Jews rose relatively quickly up socioeconomic ladders for several, interrelated reasons: they placed an inordinate emphasis on education; poured whatever earnings they achieved back into their fledgling businesses; and were unusually mobile, moving into increasingly more gentrified neighborhoods as they bettered their fortunes. As the Depression gave way to World War II and the postwar period, large numbers of American Jews had attained middle-class status.

Jewish determination to get ahead as members of the bourgeoisie and sometimes the haute bourgeoisie became the new subjects of American Jewish fiction, plays, and films in the 1940s, 1950s, and 1960s. Three American Jewish novelists rose to international fame and for a time seemed to be the primary writers on the American literary scene: Saul Bellow (1915–2005), Bernard Malamud (1914–1986), and Philip Roth (1933– ). Each of these writers, in very different ways, made use of their experiences growing up in Jewish neighborhoods, hearing the sounds of Jewish—and for Bellow Yiddish—conversations, absorbing the rhythms of American Jewish lifestyles. Their fictional works, while wide-ranging, reflected these rhythms. Bellow, an intensely intellectual, sometimes exuberantly humorous writer, was for decades the English-language novelist most widely translated into other languages. His Mr. Sammler’s Planet (1970), for example, chronicles the decline of Western civilization in America in the 1960s, tracing that decline all the way back to the French romantic egalitarian ideals, while incorporating wild comic chases into the plot of the novel. Bellow labored in Jewish vineyards as well, coauthoring a much-reprinted translation of Yiddish stories. Malamud's stories often incorporated fantastical elements, magic and spiritualism that foreshadowed the later American fascination with these subjects; he also had a special interest in the relationships between Jews and persons of other racial and cultural backgrounds. One of his finest novels, The Assistant (1957), demonstrates his reverence for Jewish suffering because he believes it educates Jewish hearts to be more compassionate. Roth became a bridge figure between the Jewish literary world in the mid-20th century, the transformed Jewish literary scene in the post-1960s era, and the turn of the 21st century. His prolific output of short stories, novels, and essays continually evolved, incorporating new intellectual interests and changing times. Although his writing garnered angry criticism from Jewish and some literary critics, his genius was recognized in numerous prizes, beginning with Best American Short Stories (1956) and the National Book Award (1960), and culminating with a second National Book Award (1995), the Pulitzer Prize for Fiction (1997), the Ambassador Book Award of the English-Speaking Union and the National Medal of Arts at the White House (1998), and the National Book Foundation's Medal for Distinguished Contribution to American Letters in 2002.

Jewish American author Bernard Malamud is known for such works as The Natural and The Assistant. (Library of Congress)

American Jewish cultural output—much of it savagely satirical—began to focus directly on Jewish characters, plots, and themes at just the moment when American Jews had become the exemplars of middle class mores. Filmmakers like Paul Mazursky (1930– ) made fun of pretentious middle-class Jews preoccupied by their possessions, devoted to their own self-gratification, and oblivious to the suffering of others or to deeper concerns in life. Portrayals of middle-class Jews were often divided by gender, with Jewish men and Jewish women exhibiting very different characteristics. In novels and plays by Jerome Weidman (1913–1998) and Canada’s Mordecai Richler (1931–2001), to cite two of many examples, Jewish men are depicted as ruthlessly ambitious, immoral businessmen. Alternative caricatures of Jewish men depicted overly intellectual, fearful, and not very virile hysterics. Both of these stereotypes were common in 19th-century anti-Semitic non-Jewish materials, but in 20th-century American arts those depictions were almost always produced by Jewish artists themselves. Both the Jewish hustler and the wimp were unforgettably brought to the screen in Mel Brooks’s original comedy, The Producers, starring comic geniuses Zero Mostel (1915–1977) and Gene Wilder (1933– ). Indeed, the transition from Mostel’s hilarious but not specifically Jewish performance in the musical comedy film A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum (1966) only two years earlier, to the edgy, transgressive Jewish humor of The Producers, marks a shift in cultural paradigms.

Novelist Philip Roth pilloried the vacuousness of the American Jewish yearning for middle-class security, mocking the shallow disdain with which assimilated American Jews regarded more traditional European Jews in his 1959 story, “Eli the Fanatic.” For decades, however, Roth was far better known for his portrayals of Jewish men breaking free from Jewish bourgeois proprieties by embracing Christian women. Roth’s notorious novel, Portnoy’s Complaint (1968), suggested that rather than being a “Good, Responsible & Dutiful” Jewish son, the enterprising “Jewboy” could capture the interest of a beautiful “blond-haired Christian,” a woman who was “the legitimate resident and owner of this place.” Roth skewered his generation’s love-hate relationship with the non-Jewish world around them. On one hand, Christianity as a religious faith is described with unrelenting scorn. On the other hand, the absolute acceptance and ease in their world that Christians seem to enjoy seemed utterly appealing: “America is a shikse nestling under your arm whispering love love love love love.” The artistic image of the scrawny, anxious Jewish male was most indelibly fixed in 20th-century Western culture through the films of Woody Allen. A voracious consumer of film and literature, and a prolific writer of humorous and sometimes thoughtful explorations on cinematic and literary themes, Allen in the early 1960s played the inept and anxious schlemiel as a stand-up comic. His first comic films included few if any overtly Jewish materials. By the late 1970s, however, Allen’s skill as a satirist of the foibles of Jewish—and non-Jewish—families had been launched with the Annie Hall (1977), in which Allen, as neurotic Jew Alvy Singer, travels to Chippewa Falls, Wisconsin, to encounter the healthy, bland American family—complete with “Jew-hater” grandmother and sociopath brother.

Portrayals of neurotic Jewish men were almost completely transformed into images of nervous but sweet and responsible men in television programs of the 1980s and 1990s. Created by Jewish male screenwriters, these male characters were almost universally portrayed with adoring Christian romantic partners. Jewish women characters, however, did not fare as well. Together, novelists Herman Wouk (1915– ) and Philip Roth and filmmaker Woody Allen fixed in the public imagination two negative stereotypical images of Jewish women: the overbearing Jewish mother and the spoiled Jewish daughter. In his 1955 novel, Marjorie Morningstar, Wouk introduced readers to the Jewish daughter—the “Shirley”—as the ultimate bourgeois consumer who wants the “big diamond engagement ring, house in a good neighborhood, furniture, children, well-made clothes, furs.” In the hands of other writers and filmmakers, as well as popular culture and jokes, this spoiled and demanding Jewish girl became known as the “Jewish American princess,” the JAP. Across American college campuses, the so-called JAP jokes took on a sometimes vicious life of their own. Roth contributed domineering mother Sophie Portnoy, who shook a bread knife at son Alex to make him eat dinner and followed him to the toilet door demanding a report. Small wonder that Portnoy complained, “A Jewish man with parents alive . . . will remain a fifteen-year old boy until they die!” condemning not only his parents, but Jewish religious culture as well, requiring a “kosher and bloodless” existence, “self-control, sobriety, sanctions—this is the key to human life, saith all those endless dietary laws.” Woody Allen developed the Jewish mother’s power even further in “Oedipus Wrecks,” in the 1989 trilogy, New York Stories, where a Jewish mother’s pudgy face fills the sky to better control her son’s every move. The Jewish mother stereotype became ubiquitous in American culture, especially in television and film. In the numerous novels, films, and television programs that portrayed Jewish identity as a species of middle-class entitlement, with little attention on the richness of the Jewish cultural heritage, plots often focused on Jewish men saving their independent souls by escaping the clutches of Jewish mothers and daughters.

After the 1960s: Exploring Jewish Particularism

World events and American social trends came together in the late 1960s and set the stage for a very different tone in Jewish artistic expression. The hegemony of white, Christian, middle-class American culture was disrupted by anti-Vietnam War protests and civil rights activism on behalf of African Americans and other minorities, both of which attracted many Jewish participants. Literature, film, music, television programs like Roots, and popular culture began to celebrate the efforts of ethnic minority groups to explore their own cultural heritages. As one wag put it, “When African Americans discovered that ‘Black is beautiful,’ Jews discovered that Jewish is reasonably attractive.” This impulse was dramatically reinforced by Jewish reactions to the 1967 Six-Day War, in which Israel moved preemptively to protect itself against Arab armies massed at its border. Fearful of Israel’s vulnerability and joyous at its triumph over enemies, many American Jews developed a new interest in the Holocaust, Jewish history and texts, and Israel. The ethos was open to the work of two writers who helped to create a new Jewish artistic ecology. Spiritually focused Jewish fiction emerged in the 1960s with the translation from French into English of Night, a memoir by Transylvanian Jewish author Elie Wiesel (1928– ), whose stories captured the moral imagination of the Western reading world. Also influential were the surprisingly popular novels of Chaim Potok (1929–2002), which sympathetically depicted traditional Judaism in its various shades, from Hasidism to the careful liberalizations of Conservative Jewish scholars. Potok’s two early novels, The Chosen (1967) and The Promise (1969), brought information about traditional Jewish beliefs, values, and lifestyles to broad reading audiences, created appetites for more such literature, and convinced publishers that materials of this kind could sell.

In the 1970s and 1980s, American Jewish writers produced a new, inward-turning genre of fiction exploring the individual Jew's connection to the Jewish people; to Jewish religion, culture, and tradition; and to the chain of Jewish history. Although sometimes witty, work by authors such as Cynthia Ozick (1928– ), Arthur Cohen (1928–1986), Mark Helprin (1947– ), Hugh Nissenson (1933– ), Rebecca Goldstein (1950– ), and others wrestled with weighty spiritual matters: Jewish conceptions of faith and redemption in a post-Holocaust world; the conflict between free will and predestination in light of Jewish belief and history; and the notion of the Jewish people as an am segulah, a chosen people. Ozick, widely recognized as a public Jewish intellectual, alternated the publication of novels and short story collections with brilliant essays that garnered a more unequivocal response than her fiction. After writing a series of novels, Goldstein eventually returned to her first love, philosophy, publishing an extremely well-received book, Betraying Spinoza (2006). Their writing nourished a new generation of young writers—many of them women, and many with intense religious backgrounds and/or interests: Allegra Goodman (1967– ), Naomi Ragen (1949– ), Jonathan Rosen (1963– ), and others have sold large quantities of novels dealing with specifically Jewish topics such as close-knit Orthodox Jews in the Catskill Mountains, the perils of life for women in ultra-Orthodox Jewish communities, and the personal struggles and spiritual life of a young Reform woman rabbi, respectively.

Performance art and films by American Jewish artists reflected this new confidence, daring, and inward glance, exploring nonstereotypical Jewish characters, settings, and plots. Internationally famous singer and filmmaker Barbra Streisand (1942– ) seemed engaged in a singular project of redeeming the cinematic image of Jewish women. In films like Funny Girl (1968), The Way We Were (1973), Yentl (1983), and Prince of Tides (1991), Streisand portrayed Jewish women as talented singers and comediennes, loving social activists, religious scholars, and committed healers—rather than the overstuffed mothers and spoiled brats more commonly depicted. Streisand made history by shortening neither her name nor her nose. Likewise, singer, actor, and performance artist Bette Midler (1945– )—acclaimed by fans as “the Divine Diva”—followed Streisand's lead in exhibiting, rather than playing down, her sassy mouth, her comic talents, her enterprise, and her intelligence—in short, her Jewishness.

Among the many carefully crafted and unconventional cinematic pictures of Jews that proliferated, director Joan Micklin Silver (1935– ) released both Hester Street (1974), a loving recreation of Cahan's novella, Yekl, and the romantic comedy Crossing Delancey (1988), which turned feminist platitudes on their heads and slyly recommended that Jewish women look for sweet men who pray in the synagogue. Harvey Fierstein's (1954– ) stunning stage play about a Jewish homosexual yearning to be a loving Jewish parent while earning a living as a drag queen singer, Torch Song Trilogy, was made into a powerful film (1988). Sephardic Jews in England—and the struggles of intelligent women without money—were the subjects of a British film, The Governess (1998). Orthodox Jews received detailed cinematic scrutiny that was sometimes flattering, as in Sidney Lumet's A Stranger Among Us (1992), and sometimes uncomfortably critical, as in A Price Above Rubies (1998).

In an unanticipated development, Philip Roth's writing also took a new turn, and he emerged as one of the great informing talents of intensely Jewish writing. Beginning with his masterpiece, The Counterlife (1986), and continuing with Operation Shylock (1993) and subsequent novels, Roth moved beyond the sociological story of American assimilation and explored complex, multifaceted, pluralistic Jewish identity in Israel and the Diaspora. In addition, his novels increasingly featured risk-taking forays into postmodernist narrative forms that embody critical theories and ideas, modeling his discussions of Jewish identity into exemplars of literary theory. In The Counterlife and Operation Shylock, the question, "What defines a contemporary Jew?" is a central theme and a pivotal, critical point upon which each plot turns. Roth pointed the way to a new direction—the reimagining of the Jewish past—in The Plot Against America, which imagined what would have happened had America's Nazi sympathizers gained power.

The New Wave: International Reimagining of the Jewish Past

As the 1990s gave way to a new millennium, Jews around the world encountered disheartening evidence of the ineradicability of anti-Semitism, often thinly disguised as anti-Zionism. As many Jews lost the optimistic belief that the existence of the State of Israel would solve the riddle of anti-Jewish hatred, and as the generation that had lived through and born witness to the Holocaust began to age and die, the role of the Diaspora in Jewish historical experience was reevaluated by writers in settings as diverse as the United States, the former Soviet Union, and Israel. American writers like Jonathan Safran Foer (1977– ) and Gary Shteyngart (1972– ) created postmodern fictive reflections on Jewish life and experience, to enthusiastic, nonsectarian critical response. Russian writers like Grigory Kanovich (1929– ) and others reimagined a Jewish life in European settings that they themselves had never experienced. A number of young writers who had grown up in the homes of Holocaust survivors contributed their own distinctive voices, among them Thane Rosenbaum and Melvin Jules Bukiet. Canadian Jewish writers David Bezmozgis (1973– ) and Pearl Abraham (1961– ) have produced novels about Diaspora travels and dislocations that are widely described as remarkable. The extraordinary Diaspora Jewish contribution to Western culture seems in no danger of abating, and reimaginings of the Jewish past have been characteristic of some young Israeli writers as well. Perhaps a greater convergence will emerge as part of this new chapter in Jewish creativity.

Selected Bibliography

- Carr, Steven. 2001. Hollywood and Antisemitism: A Cultural History up to World War II. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Desser, David, and Lester D. Friedman. 1993. American Jewish Filmmakers: Traditions and Trends. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Gabler, Neal. 1988. An Empire of Their Own: How the Jews Invented Hollywood. New York: Crown.

- Hoberman, J., and Jeffrey Shandler. 2003. Entertaining America: Jews, Movies, Broadcasting. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Most, Andrea. 2004. Making Americans: Jews and the Broadway Musical. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Whitfield, Stephen. 1999. In Search of American Jewish Culture. Hanover, NH: Brandeis University Press/University Press of New England.
- Wirth-Nesher, Hana, and Michael P. Kramer, eds. 2003. The Cambridge Companion to Jewish American Literature. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Wisse, Ruth. 2000. The Modern Jewish Canon—A Journey through Language and Culture. New York: The Free Press.
- Zurawik, David. 2003. The Jews of Prime Time. Hanover, NH: University Press of New England.

Women in the Diaspora

The Jewish Diaspora and the Role of Women

Judith R. Baskin

---

Women, who constitute half of the Jewish people, have played essential roles in ensuring Jewish continuity through their domestic, economic, spiritual, and creative contributions. Their roles in various eras and locations of the Jewish Diaspora have been determined by the attitudes and legal traditions of rabbinic Judaism and the customs and practices of majority cultures.

Rabbinic Judaism

The rabbinic sages apportioned separate spheres and responsibilities to women and men, locating female activities in the domestic realm, which included economic undertakings. This pattern was already established by late biblical times, as indicated by Proverbs 31:10–31, which describes the domestic, philanthropic, and entrepreneurial activities of the ideal wife. Rabbinic Judaism excluded women from significant participation in public worship, study of religious texts, and community leadership (Baskin 2002, 16–18).

Women who satisfied male expectations in their domestic roles were honored for enhancing the lives of their families and enabling male relatives to fulfill religious obligations. Women also traditionally observed a number of ritual regulations within the home, including preparing and serving food according to the rabbinic dietary laws (kashruth) and observing limitations on marital contact during and after the wife's menstrual period (niddah; Baskin 2002, 22–29, 70–73).

Rabbinic jurisprudence went beyond biblical precedents in ameliorating some of the difficulties women faced as a consequence of biblical legislation. New protections for women included the formulation of marriage contracts (ketubbot), which provided financial support in the event of divorce or widowhood, and permission for woman to petition a rabbinic tribunal to compel her husband to divorce her in specific circumstances. Nevertheless, according to the rabbinic foundations upon which all Diaspora communities rested, men expounded the divine rulings that affected women's lives. Women, the objects of these directives, had no standing to legislate for themselves or others (Baskin 2002, 89–93, 122–124).

Impact of the Host Culture

Jewish societies in the Diaspora tended to adopt the language and dress of the host society and many of its social attitudes toward women. Certainly the patriarchal culture of rabbinic Judaism that flourished in Sassanian Babylonia conformed in great part to wider Middle Eastern norms restricting women to domestic tasks and limiting their presence from centers of communal authority and prestige.

However, the Greek-speaking Diaspora of the Hellenistic and Roman worlds allowed some independent women significant communal participation. Although most Jewish women in this milieu lived their lives in the relative seclusion of the home, examinations of funerary and other inscriptions in Greek and Latin from the first century BCE to the sixth century CE describe women as “head of the synagogue,” “leader,” “elder,” “mother of the synagogue,” and “priestess,” indicating that some Jewish women assumed positions of leadership in the synagogue in these Diaspora communities (Brooten 1982). Some of these women may have been widows or otherwise independent, as they are rarely mentioned in conjunction with a male relative. Similarly, Philo of Alexandria (first century CE) relates that a small number of upper-class, well-educated Jewish women joined the contemplative monastic Therapeutic community, which was located outside Alexandria, Egypt (Kraemer 1992, 113–115, 123).

In the Muslim world of the Middle Ages, expectations for Jewish women were strongly influenced by Islamic norms. Although Jewish women of prosperous families were not literally isolated in women’s quarters, as were Muslim women of comparable social status, Jewish religious and community ideals dictated that women should remain at home as much as possible (Goitein 1978, 153–155). Polygyny was a feature not only of biblical and rabbinic practice but also of Muslim society; not surprisingly, many Jewish men in Muslim environments appear to have had more than one wife. Polygyny remained a feature of Jewish life in the Muslim world well into the 20th century.

In medieval and early modern Christian Europe, on the other hand, monogamy was the rule and women, as a group, were far more visible in daily social, economic, and religious life. An 11th-century takkanah (rabbinic amendment) forbidding polygyny for Jews in Christian countries is attributed to Rabbi Gershom ben Judah (ca. 960–1028). He is also credited with the pronouncement that no woman could be divorced against her will (Grossman 2004, 77–78). The high status of Jewish women in this Diaspora community is also indicated by their large dowries. In France and Germany between 1100 and 1500, Jewish women played a vital and often autonomous part in their family’s economic lives as merchants and money lenders. Surviving records indicate that women were responsible for one-third to one-half of all loans in northern France in the 13th and 14th centuries and in German and Austrian communities between 1350 and 1500. Because of their high tax contributions, some of these businesswomen gained administrative power as tax collectors and were elected officers in their Jewish community administrative council (kehillah), a most unusual honor for a woman and evidence of the power they had attained through their economic success.

Another indication of women’s economic influence in medieval and early modern Europe (Ashkenaz) was their voluntary assumption of religious practices from which they were exempt in rabbinic Judaism. Some rabbis permitted women to perform and to recite blessings over time-bound positive precepts, such as putting on tefillin (phylacteries); to count in the quorum of 10 people required to recite the (d.1786), the founder of Haskalah in Central Europe, and others of his circle, expressed opposition to arranged marriages and advocated love matches. Haskalah also led to religious transformations that enhanced women's position and status. Reform Judaism emphasized equal religious education for girls and boys, including the introduction of a confirmation ceremony for young people of both sexes (bar mitzvah and bat mitzvah). Worship in the vernacular and the introduction of mixed seating in North America also made Reform Judaism attractive to many women (Kaplan 1991, 66–68).

However, acculturation differed for women and men in Central and Western Europe in the 19th and early 20th century. Confined to the domestic scene, restricted in their educational opportunities, and prevented from participating in the public realms of economic and civic life, most Jewish women had few contacts with the non-Jewish world. Rather, they were encouraged to cultivate a home-based Judaism in which spirituality was expressed in domestic activities. Emulation of Christian models of female philanthropy and religious activism inspired middle-class Jewish women to establish service and social welfare organizations in Germany, England, and North America in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. These included the Jüdischer Frauenbund in Germany (1904), the Union of Jewish Women in Great Britain (1902), the National Council of Jewish Women in the United States (1893), the Zionist organization Hadassah (1912), and synagogue sisterhoods (Kaplan 1991, 211–219; Hyman 1995, 40–41). Women also played important roles in founding and raising funds for religious schools, hospitals, and homes for the needy and aged.

Women were frequently in the forefront of the East European Haskalah movement of the late 19th century. Perhaps because girls and women in Eastern European Jewish society were already secularized by their active participation in public economic life, women became active in a wide range of political movements, including Zionism and the socialist Bund. These organizations offered women opportunities for activism and leadership unavailable in traditional Jewish society (Hyman 1995, 71–81). In this era of expanded female possibilities, some Jewish women began to pursue training in the professions or aspired to lives in the arts.

The ordination of women as rabbis, beginning in the 1970s, was also affected by larger cultural attitudes. Female rabbinical ordination was first seriously considered in late 19th-century Germany and the United States as a natural result of Reform Judaism's insistence on the equality of men and women. This discussion was part of a larger social debate as women began to gain access to higher education and other learned professions. However, it took the impact of the second-wave feminism of the 1960s and 1970s on American Reform Judaism to finally open doors for women to the Rabbinate in a sustained and institutionalized way (Nadell 1998).

At the beginning of the 21st century, Jewish women in the Diaspora are a highly educated, professionalized group who are also successful and visible in creative endeavors. Actively Jewish, women constitute a majority of rabbinic students and congregational cantors outside the Orthodox community and are among the most active creators of new Jewish rituals, liturgy, and theology (Baskin 2004, 395–399).

Selected Bibliography

- Baskin, Judith R. 2002. Midrashic Women: Formations of the Feminine in Rabbinic Literature. Hanover, NH: Brandeis/University Press of New England.
- Baskin, Judith R. 2004. "The Changing Role of the Woman." In Modern Judaism: An Oxford Guide, edited by Nicholas de Lange and Miri Freud-Kandel, 389–400. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Brooten, Bernadette. 1982. Women Leaders in the Ancient Synagogue. Chico, CA: Scholars Press.
- Goitein, Shlomo D. 1978. The Family. A Mediterranean Society: The Jewish Communities of the Arab World as Portrayed in the Documents of the Cairo Genizah. Vol. 3. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Grossman, Avraham. 2004. Pious and Rebellious: Jewish Women in Medieval Europe. Waltham, MA: Brandeis University Press.
- Hertz, Deborah. 1988. Jewish High Society in Old Regime Berlin. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Hyman, Paula E. 1995. Gender and Assimilation in Modern Jewish History: The Roles and Representation of Women. Seattle: University of Washington Press.
- Kaplan, Marion. 1991. The Making of the Jewish Middle Class: Women, Family, and Identity in Imperial Germany. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Kraemer, Ross S. 1992. Her Share of the Blessings: Women's Religions among Pagans, Jews, and Christians in the Greco-Roman World. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Melammed, Renée L. 1998. "Sefardi Women in the Medieval and Early Modern Periods." In Jewish Women in Historical Perspective, 2nd ed., edited by Judith R. Baskin, 115–134. Detroit: Wayne State University Press.
- Nadell, Pamela S. 1998. Women Who Would Be Rabbis: A History of Women's Ordination, 1889–1985. Boston: Beacon Press.
- Weissler, Chava. 1998. Voices of the Matriarchs: Listening to the Prayers of Early Modern Jewish Women. Boston: Beacon Press.

Sephardi Women, Marriage, and Family: 16th–17th Centuries

Ruth Lamdan

---

After the Expulsion of the Jews from Spain (1492) and the hardships endured in its wake, Jewish society underwent unprecedented demographic, social, economic, and cultural transformations. Within a few decades, most of the exiles reached the Ottoman Empire, which was then at the peak of its power. Its provinces included communities in Asia, Anatolia, Eastern Europe, the Balkans, and, from 1517, the Middle East: Syria, Palestine, Egypt, and Arabia. The Ottoman Empire opened its gates to the exiles almost unconditionally; Spanish and Portuguese exiles, as well as Jews from North Africa, Italy, and Central Europe (Ashkenazi), settled in these locations, joining the existing local Jewish congregations: the Romanioths in the Greek-speaking lands of the empire, and the Must'arabs in the Arabic-speaking lands. Forced to reorganize institutionally, culturally, and socially, the newcomers gradually adapted not only to foreign customs but also to life within a Muslim society, where they were a tolerated minority (dhimmis).

The demographic upheaval gave rise to various Halachic (legal) and personal problems, many of which pertained to family and women's life: many Sephardi (Iberian) families were torn apart; children were taken away by force, died of hunger and illnesses, or were lost in the traumatic events. Questions concerning levirate marriage and divorce (yibbum and halitzah) became highly pertinent, especially when the husband's brother or brothers remained in Spain. Problems arose in cases where husbands disappeared without a trace, leaving their wives deserted (agunot), or when one spouse preferred to remain in Iberia. Societal conventions were broken, and fathers, dispossessed of all material assets, lost their traditional authority. Many inheritance-related questions were also brought to court. Rabbinical authorities and community leaders were forced to act flexibly and intelligently to preserve an organized sense of family life. During the first one or two decades of uncertainty, they still hoped for their converted brethren to leave Spain and Portugal and rejoin their Jewish families and were therefore reluctant to retroactively annul marriages and family ties. But as it became clear that this happened very rarely, the sages set about finding legal solutions for women whose marital status was not clear and could not remarry. They were also forced to consider the somewhat permissive spirit of the time, when women who were separated from their families, and, longing to rebuild their lives, remarried impetuously, or allowed themselves a freedom that would have been impossible under ordinary circumstances. They tried to prevent hastily arranged marriages, unsanctioned by the families and not preceded by an inquiry into the economic background and personal status of the groom (such as the possible existence of another wife or brother abroad). To protect women from charlatans who would take advantage of their loneliness and distress, only to desert them later, various marriage regulations were introduced in almost all Jewish communities. One of them strictly prohibited ceremonies of betrothal (qidushin) or marriage (nisuin) without the presence of at least 10 witnesses, including a rabbi or a community leader. This regulation served also as a safeguard—though not always brought to test—in cases of marriages contracted treacherously, in jest, or in a state of inebriation.

In post-Expulsion days, Jewish society, basically urban and living in overcrowded neighborhoods, had become considerably heterogeneous. The notion of the family institute as an instrument for continuing the Jewish people was firmly established. Both Iberian and non-Sephardi Jews were anxious to stabilize family life and return to the old traditions of prearranged engagements and marriage agreements, where economic and social considerations were predominant. Because intermarriages were quite common, they had to resolve Halachic differences by learning to comply with the diverging customs of the spouse. There were extensive connections between the Jewish centers in the Ottoman Empire, especially between Salonica—with a majority of Iberian Jews—and Istanbul—with a majority of Romaniot Jews. Both centers were marked by their large number of Jewish congregations and their eminent scholars and rabbinical authorities. In both centers, the Jews enjoyed a period of affluence and prosperity in the 16th century. There was considerable cooperation, exchange of information, and mutual appreciation among scholars. One of the first problems they agreed to resolve concerned marriage gifts (sivlonot): in Istanbul, if a bride-to-be accepted any present from her betrothed groom, directly or through an agent, it was as legally binding as a wedding ceremony (kidushin), and she had to receive a bill of divorcement or she could not marry another man. This gave way to financial exploitation in cases when, for one reason or another, the betrothal had to be canceled. In Salonica, however, the exchange of gifts had no such severe implications. The numerous debates surrounding this issue were concluded with an understanding according to which, in all matters concerning sivlonot and kidushin, the rabbinical authorities were to follow the custom of the bride's district.

As the principle aim of marriage was to carry on the familial and national lineage, high expectations were imposed upon young newlyweds, especially of Sephardic origin. The woman was expected to conceive as soon as possible, and when she became pregnant she received prayers, blessings, and amulets wishing her easy delivery and, with no exception, a healthy male offspring. Jewish society expressed its preference for boys over girls in many contemporary sayings and folklore songs, and the birth of a male child was celebrated with great rejoicing. It had significant implications not only for the future of the family and the status of the mother, but also in legislation concerning the father's rights of inheriting his wife's fortune in case she predeceased him. A female child, on the other hand, was a cause of worry for her chastity and dowry expenses, and thus, the family's joy upon birth was very much restrained. Breast-feeding—by the mother or, in some wealthier families, by a wet nurse—was common for about two years. Usually girls received no formal education and were expected to learn only the Jewish laws that pertain to women. They were prepared for the role of a housewife by participating in household chores, joining the mother and other female relatives in cooking, needlework, and other women's tasks. Boys—regardless of socioeconomic status—started their regular education around the age of five, usually at a preliminary school (Talmud Torah) operated by the congregation to which the family belonged. There they learned the canonical Jewish sacred and Halachic literature. The father or grandfather was the dominant figures in a boy's life, as it was assumed boys should not spend too much time in female company. They then continued learning until the age of 13 or 14, when, according to their talents, it was decided whether they would join the father's profession, learn a craft, or go on to a yeshiva for higher studies to become a professional scholar.

Normally, the marrying off of a young couple involved intensive negotiations between the families. Virginity was a mandatory condition for the bride, as was a trade or scholar position for the groom. Moreover, social considerations were unavoidable in these negotiations. The financial arrangements were especially crucial: the dowry and its components, the gifts, and the couple's means of livelihood had to be previously contracted. Various other conditions were also stipulated in the prenuptial agreement to ensure the well-being of the bride and the rights of the family. A son's or a daughter's refusal to go through with the match was very rare, and the more affluent and respectable a family was, the less say the children had in choosing a spouse. In line with the parents' intention to secure the economic future and well-being of their children and to preserve the family name, they tended to arrange marriages within the family and at a very early age. Girls were often married to their uncles on their father's side, or to their cousins, in order to secure the family's capital and in the hope that their kin would take good care of them. Minor girls were betrothed by their fathers (by kidushin, a legally binding commitment) even before they came of age, and usually began living with their husbands—occasionally much older than them—at the age of puberty. Boys were first married between the ages of 15 and 18. Betrothal and wedding parties, the most important days in a girl's life, were joyous and crowded events, both in Sephardi and Romaniot congregations. As most young couples began their marital life in the household of one of their parents (usually that of the husband) they were typically subject to constant meddling in their affairs from their elders. This had significant consequences, especially on the self-confidence of the young bride. A measure of independence could be attained only after the couple had children of their own, left the parent's house, and secured independent income.

This was not the case in second marriages of older couples, where both sides had greater experience, and the wife—being a widow or a divorcee—had already come into an amount of money or some property of her own and could thus set her own conditions. As a rule, multiple marriages were very common. Being a divorcee was not considered a hindrance in Jewish society, and widows as well as divorcees were anxious to remarry.

The pragmatic premarital arrangements surely did not presuppose romantic love as a priority. However, the many examples of partnership and appreciation between husbands and wives show that most couples led a harmonious life and shared mutual interests, respect, and love. Although Jewish legal sources (the Responsa literature), by their nature, intensify marital and family disputes and induce the exceptional rather than the normative, they also give surprising insights into the happier aspects of married life: couples who loved and trusted one another drew up property settlements in their lifetime, using technical loopholes so that the wife could inherit her husband, wives were appointed guardians of their husbands' property and children, and gifts were bestowed upon beloved wives and were formalized by legal deeds. All this caused considerable anxiety to potential heirs, who appealed to courts of law to cancel such wills and other legal prearrangements. As for marital conflicts, these are manifest in recorded disputes concerning petitions for divorce. Husbands referred mainly to the wife's infertility, illness, and/or her inability to minister to their needs and look after the household. Women's demands for divorce referred mainly to the husband's violation of his commitment to remain monogamous, impotency, violence, neglect or desertion, and the Halachic claim of mi'us (repulsion), which was always accepted when made by the husband, but not when raised by the wife. In Jewish law, a man's status in divorce cases is superior to that of his wife (see Mishnah, Yevamot, 14,1; T. Bavli, Gittin, 49b), so most petitions by men for divorce were granted, and—in spite of communal regulations and prenuptial stipulations—whenever women refused to accept a divorce, they either lost their right to alimony, or their husbands were permitted to marry a second wife. Because a woman's motives for divorce were always treated with suspicion by the rabbis, men were never coerced to grant a bill of divorcement, though in some cases they were urged to do so.

Polygamy was fairly common in the 16th-century Levant because, notwithstanding previous conditions and bans, a husband—even an Ashkenazi—had the Halachic right to divorce his barren wife or to marry another if he so preferred. Having female slaves and servants in upper- and middle-class households was also a regular phenomenon, and sometimes they served as bedmates to their masters. Some women were strong enough to contest a rival female in the house and demand a divorce, separate quarters, or the dismissal of the servant. Some did not hesitate to apply to Gentile courts of law in marital matters. The majority, however, faced with a fait accompli and having no relatives or rabbis to support them, had to accept the situation.

It is difficult to evaluate the average family size in the 16th-century Ottoman Empire. Nonetheless, a nuclear family is generally assumed to consist of five members, children included. Official registers, when they exist, relate to households, not to individuals. A high rate of infant mortality, caused by epidemics, cramped living quarters, and poor sanitary conditions, was somehow counterbalanced by the fact that many families, especially in the eastern lands of the Empire, were polygamous and possibly had more than three children. As a result of the continuing inflow of immigrants from Europe into the Ottoman Empire, Jewish neighborhoods were characterized by multistory buildings and a high population density. Privacy, by modern standards, was very rare. An entire family living in one room was nothing out of the ordinary. Prying neighbors were witnesses to any deviation from moral norms.

Because families lived in close quarters, intensive relations were maintained even among distant relatives in the extended family. Many marriage contracts (ketubah) stipulated that a couple would reside near the bride's family. Families who lived in different locations often formed not only marriage connections but also a network of common business and commercial relations. In a considerable number of cases the wife represented her husband in commercial deals, acting on his behalf when he went away on business or personal trips. In wool-industry centers such as Salonica, the Balkans, and Safed, women were partners to their husbands and specialized in crafts connected with this industry or in trade. In spite of various restrictions that required Jewish women to observe utmost chastity, in reality they were present in open markets and stores, and their involvement in the financial and commercial life of Jewish communities all around the Ottoman Empire was impressive—much higher than their Muslim counterparts.

Selected Bibliography

- Lamdan, Ruth. 1996. "Child Marriage in Jewish Society in the Eastern Mediterranean during the Sixteenth Century." Mediterranean Historical Review 11 (1): 37–59.
- Lamdan, Ruth. 1998. "The Mercies of the Court: Jewish Women Seeking Divorce in Sixteenth Century Palestine, Syria and Egypt." Nashim 1: 51–69.

- Lamdan, Ruth. 2000. A Separate People: Jewish Women in Palestine, Syria and Egypt in the 16th Century. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Lamdan, Ruth. 2005. "Communal Regulations as a Source for Jewish Women's Live in the Ottoman Empire." The Muslim World 95 (2): 249–263.
- Levi, Avigdor, ed. 1994. The Jews of the Ottoman Empire. Princeton, NJ: Darwin Press.
- Lewis, Bernard. 1984. The Jews of Islam. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Rozen, Minna. 1996. "The Life Cycle and the Significance of Old Age during the Ottoman Period." In Daniel Carpi Jubilee Volume, edited by Dina Porat, Anita Shapira, and Minna Rozen, 109–175. Tel Aviv: Tel Aviv University.
- Rozen, Minna. 1998. "Public Space and Private Space among the Jews of Istanbul in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries." Turcica 30: 331–345.
- Rozen, Minna. 2002. A History of the Jewish Community in Istanbul, The Formative Years (1453–1566). Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Shmuelevitz, Arie. 1984. The Jews of the Ottoman Empire in the Late Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Yuhasz, Esther, ed. 1990. The Sephardi Jews in the Ottoman Empire. Jerusalem: The Israel Museum.

Jewish Women in Central Europe: 19th–20th Centuries

Dieter J. Hecht

---

The lives of Jewish women reflect many of the political, economic, and religious transformations since the late 18th century in Central Europe (Germany and the Habsburg Empire). Jewish women shared the disadvantages of their sex and their people. The emancipation process of women (in general) and of Jews showed many similarities. Both were seen as second-class citizens. For Jews, the political emancipation led to changes in residence and occupation patterns, the educational system, and religious practice during the 19th century. Jewish women participated in these changes as Jews and benefited from them. As women, they enjoyed equal rights only in the 20th century. Jewish women contributed on various levels to Jewish and non-Jewish society. Along with Jewish men, they adopted bourgeois culture and became more acculturated; their religious attitudes diversified, stretching from Orthodox to secular. Some women even converted and intermarried. The many different ways in which these changes took place account for the enormous diversity of Jewish life. Jewish women entered European society but did not merge with it. Alongside the integration process, anti-Semitism continued to spread, varying only in intensity in the different parts of central Europe. At the end of World War I, Jewish women were confronted with another massive wave of anti-Semitism and pogroms; anti-Semitism culminated with the rise of national-socialism in Germany and the Shoah. In May 1945, after the liberation from national-socialism, Jewish communities were reconstructed, and Jewish women played a crucial role in this process. In political terms, most of Central Europe, except Austria and West Germany, belonged to the communist eastern bloc until 1989. Under communist rule, Jewish activities were very limited. Only after 1989 was Jewish life fully restored in these countries.

In spite of the political and socioeconomic diversity of Jewish life in Central Europe, the main changes in the lives of Jewish women will be exemplified by three topics: education, family, and women's organizations. Within traditional Jewish society, the education of boys had priority for religious purposes. The education of girls was considered less important. In modern society, formal education constitutes the basis for participation in society. Therefore, most Jewish girls went to non-Jewish schools. However, the first Jewish girls' school was founded in Prague, in 1784, only two years after a public school was founded for Jewish boys. Until the first decades of the 19th century, state-run Jewish girls' schools spread over most parts of the Habsburg Empire and Germany. Besides the public schools, private girls' schools—Jewish and non-Jewish—opened during the 19th and 20th century. For example, Sarah Schnirer (1883–1935) founded the religious Beth Jacob School in Krakow, in 1917. The main focuses of Jewish and non-Jewish girls' schools were languages, music, and industrial training. In contrast, boys were sent to a yeshiva or gymnasium; the latter was the precondition for university studies. Higher education for girls was limited. Because of women's emancipation, by the end of the 19th century, an increasing number of young women attended a gymnasium for girls or wanted to study at universities. Jewish girls were overrepresented at institutions for higher education. These women came mostly from a bourgeois family background. The universities opened their gates very hesitatingly to women. Only after World War I were women successful in all fields. Jewish women belonged to the pioneers of higher education for women. The first woman to get her doctorate at the University

Elise Richter was a philologist of Viennese birth. She was the first woman to receive a doctorate at the University of Vienna, in 1901, and the first woman to receive a coveted teaching position there, in 1921. (Elga Kern, Führende Frauen Europas, 1928) of Vienna, in 1901, and a venia legendi (teaching position), in 1921, was Elise Richter (1865–1943), who later died in Theresienstadt.

With a higher formal education Jewish women could establish themselves in prestigious occupations like teaching, medicine, or journalism. But most Jewish women found work in factories and small handcraft shops and as shop assistants. Concurrently with new occupational opportunities, Jewish women participated in language shifts. Until the 18th century, Yiddish was their common language at home. In the 19th century, German became the lingua franca and Yiddish flourished mainly in the eastern parts of the Habsburg Empire. Toward the end of the 19th century, territorial national languages like Hungarian, Polish, or Czech gradually replaced German and Yiddish. Changes in occupational and language patterns were connected to transformations in family structures, religious traditions, and the position of women. The traditional task of Jewish women was taking care of the family and earning a livelihood, while their husbands studied in the yeshiva. The bourgeois family concept of the 19th century limited the lives of Jewish and non-Jewish women to the private sphere, that is, around marriage and family. The public sphere was reserved for men. Theoretically, this concept applied even to working-class Jewish society. In practice, Jewish working-class women always had to work and to take care of their families. As a result of the women's rights movement, a new type of Jewish women appeared: a working woman independent of family obligations. However, Jewish women constantly had to struggle against discrimination as women and as Jews. Because the borders between Jewish and non-Jewish society were blurred from the Enlightenment onward, some Jewish women opted for intermarriage and conversion as a way of life.

Changes in religious traditions and socioeconomic transformations within general society enabled Jewish women to enter the public sphere. At first, only wealthy women like Fanny von Arnstein (1757–1818) in Vienna and Amalie Beer (1767–1854) in Berlin succeeded with their salons to attract Jewish and non-Jewish society as well as to promote Jewish affairs. In the second half of the 19th century, Jewish women from different social background followed their example. The main entry key for women into the public sphere was social welfare, because it was seen as compatible with family tasks. Jewish women engaged in Jewish and non-Jewish organizations and participated in various movements. One of the most influential organizations was the Jüdische Frauenbund (JFB) in Germany, founded by Bertha Pappenheim (1859–1936) in 1904. The JFB served Jewish women as a platform for Jewish and general interests, for example, education for Jewish girls and orphans, the fight against anti-Semitism, suffrage for women, and the fight against white slavery. In the 1930s, the JFB had more than 50,000 members. As individuals, Jewish women played an important role in national and international organizations, too, including Rosika Schwimmer (1877–1948), who was one of the leading feminists in Budapest before World War I, and a leading member of the International League for Peace and Freedom. Nevertheless, most Jewish women were organized in social welfare organizations connected to their local synagogue.

A major challenge for Jewish women's activities in the Diaspora was the foundation of the political Zionist movement by Theodor Herzl. Right from the beginning, it became highly attractive for women, because of its ideology of equality between the sexes. In 1898, the Zionist organization was the first national movement granted general franchise for women. In practice, however, women held only subordinated positions within Zionist organizations. Therefore, a special women's organization was needed to promote women's affairs, and in 1920, the WIZO (Women's International Zionist Organization) was founded in London. The main activities of WIZO were vocational training for and education of women, with special emphasis on agricultural pioneering, as well as care and education of children. In Central Europe, most Zionist women engaged in WIZO, less in other Zionist women's organizations like Mizrachi and Hadassah. During the Shoah, Jewish women's organizations were destroyed and most of their members murdered. Since the end of World War II, Jewish women's organizations were reestablished only gradually in Central Europe. A revival of Jewish women's activities can be seen after the emigration of Jews from Russia to Germany and Austria from the 1970s onward, and especially since the end of the communist regimes in the former eastern bloc in 1989. At the end of the 20th century, Jewish women held leading positions in Jewish and non-Jewish organizations.

Selected Bibliography

- Berkowitz, Michael. 1995. "Transcending 'Tzimmes and Sweetness': Recovering the History of Zionist Women in Central and Western Europe 1897–1933." In Active Voices: Women in Jewish Culture, edited by Maurice Sacks, 41–62. Chicago: University of Illinois Press.
- Freidenreich Pass, Harriet. 2002. Jewish, Educated: The Lives of Central European University Women. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Hertz, Deborah. 1988. Jewish High Society in Old Regime Berlin. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Hyman, Paula. 1995. Gender and Assimilation in Modern Jewish History: The Roles and Representation of Women. Seattle: University of Washington Press.
- Iggers, Wilma. 1995. Women of Prague: Ethnic Diversity and Social Change from the Eighteenth Century to the Present. Providence, RI: Berghahn Books.
- Kaplan, Marion. 1979. The Jewish Feminist Movement in Germany: The Campaigns of the Jüdischer Frauenbund 1904–1938. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
- Kaplan, Marion. 1991. The Making of the Jewish Middle Class—Women, Family, and Identity in Imperial Germany. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Rozenblit, Marsha. 2001. Reconstructing a National Identity: The Jews of Habsburg Austria during World War I. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Wenger, Beth. 1990. "Radical Politics in a Reactionary Age: The Unmaking of Rosika Schwimmer, 1914–1930." Journal of Women's History 2: 66–99.

Women, Family, and Identity in Imperial Germany (1871–1918)

Marion Kaplan

---

Jewish women exerted a powerful influence on German-Jewish identity, serving as agents of modernization and tradition. They stood between two worlds, mixing contemporary German bourgeois practice and their Jewish heritage. They provided a balance between integration into the German majority and maintenance of Jewish identity.

While Jewish men entered the worlds of business and politics, Jewish women were central to the Bildung—the education and cultivation—of their families. Bildung had a twofold purpose: it served not only as Jews' entrée into cultured German bourgeois society, but it also became synonymous for many Jews with their Jewishness. A comfortable family life nurtured not only their integration but also more traditional religious attitudes and institutions.

The period between 1870 and 1918 was, for the great majority of German Jews, one of upward economic mobility and urbanization. The changes produced by an industrializing society affected family life. Women's work changed from helpmate to housewife, mother, and cultural connoisseur. In these roles, women allowed German bourgeois modes to penetrate familial relationships as well as their decor, and encouraged the display of Jewish acculturation. However, even as women helped prepare the family for the world by acculturating to bourgeois Protestant culture, they also maintained familial and Jewish traditions.

Women played a role in designing the tone and style, the way of life, and the identity of the bourgeoisie. Not only exemplary family lives but also cleanliness and orderliness were paramount virtues. These model homemakers decorated, polished, and ordered their homes incessantly. They also had other duties to fulfill in their endless campaign against dirt and disorder. They were the shapers and guardians of respectability in a group striving to be accepted by a Gentile, frequently anti-Semitic, bourgeoisie.

In addition, as mothers, Jewish women trained a Jewish bourgeoisie every bit as gendered and stylized as its Gentile counterpart. Traditionally kept from religious learning, women had acquainted themselves with secular culture. Their education, and the appreciation of German culture that they shared with their offspring, enhanced their family's status as much as their heavy furniture and tasteful salons. Further, the Jewish middle class, dependent on intellectual rather than manual skills, inculcated values of responsibility, dependability, and trustworthiness in its children. These children would likely live by their wits and temperament. Therefore, character formation and moral education were essential goals of good parenting (as well as signs of Bildung).

Jews had special issues to confront on their climb into the bourgeoisie. Convinced that their emancipation had been earned by their appreciation of German culture and etiquette, they continued to link the improvement of their status to their own self-betterment, and believed it necessary to exhibit these ideas and behaviors in the family. Education and gentility, associated with quiet comportment, was a must. Gentility signified class to bourgeois Germans. To Jews, whose only entry into Germanness was through its bourgeoisie, gentility denoted class and Germanness.

Bourgeois Jewish women encouraged their children to enjoy the attributes of a cultured and physically active life. Women transmitted German (and other European) folk and fairy tales and literature. Many read the German classics aloud, adopting Schiller, Goethe, and Lessing for their general renown, and because they symbolized an Enlightenment tradition and Bildung. Women also subscribed to newspapers and periodicals, probably as much for the fashion and style they endorsed as for the news they conveyed. Furthermore, to play an instrument and have an appreciation for music in general were essential attributes of a bourgeois child's education, for which the mother was not only responsible, but often an active contributor.

Mothers promoted healthy bodies as well as minds. German Jews made walks and weekend hikes (replete with reminders about posture and demeanor) part of their repertoire. In addition, mothers saw to it that children took part in sporting and other activities, including swimming, ice skating, tennis, biking, and gymnastics. Jewish families may have been influenced by a general, growing emphasis on health and nationalism, but they also tried to counter the pale, unhealthy ghetto image that anti-Semites foisted upon them. In Imperial Germany, where health was equated with patriotism, Jews strained every muscle to achieve standards set by their society.

Although physical and educational activities dominated children's time, bourgeois respectability in its feminine and masculine varieties were omnipresent requirements. Mothers had to restrain their children from behavior attributed to Jewish children by anti-Semites. The latter depicted Eastern European Jewish children, but by implication all Jewish children, as noisy, dirty, undisciplined, and unmannerly—ungebildet, in other words. It is no wonder that in asserting their claim to German culture, Jews enforced “a modulation of tone, a lowering of the decibel level” upon themselves and their children.

As busily as women molded the bourgeois home and family, they also shaped a milieu that reinforced traditional religious sentiments. Jewish observance, more than that of other religions, took place in the home, in a familial setting. Here women impressed their offspring as much with their feelings about their religion and heritage as with their observance of religious forms. The informal transmission of Jewish practice—affective, ethnic, private, and personal, including foods, family, and hearth—was women's domain. Especially in rural areas, Jews—and particularly women—were conscious of the Jewish calendar and the tradition of certain rituals and foods on these days. In cities, too, all but a minority of families attempted to commemorate the major holidays, if only by a family reunion and traditional meal.

In fact, for many Jews, religion and family were one totality. For them, family provided the meaning religion once had. The family became the cornerstone of a more secular version of Judaism, visible testimony to the “embourgeoisement of Jewish piety.” And, even as the family functioned to uphold religious traditions, religion functioned to affirm family connectedness. One woman wrote of the 1880s in Berlin: “Besides the ceremony of Friday nights there was a strict rule of family togetherness.” Just as families gathered to celebrate the holidays and Sabbath, these occasions also served to reaffirm the family.

Whether Jews maintained such rituals as a result of real spirituality, family traditions, communal custom, or a feeling of solidarity with other Jews is difficult to determine. Whatever the cause, participation in the updated rituals of their parents indicates their Jewish group identity. Furthermore, in the case of women, it was in some ways easier to consider oneself observant than in the case of men. They experienced less dissonance between religious practice and their daily routine. Moreover, because Judaism excluded women from many Jewish rituals, they had fewer positive commandments to fulfill. Obviously, there were women who gradually dropped the observance of most ritual, particularly second-generation urbanites. Nevertheless, the predominant role of the Jewish woman as housewife and mother provided both a richer sphere of activity and a more constricting boundary for women than for men, inhibiting the former more than the latter in assimilatory behavior. Conversion and intermarriage statistics consistently show Jewish men to have been the group far more prone to cut all ties with Judaism.

Jewish women remained enclosed in a small circle of Jewish friends and family. They took responsibility for family networks; for the care of grandparents and orphans; in short, for the moral and material support, the continuity and organization, of an often geographically dispersed family system. Naturally, small-town life helped maintain family connections, but even when heightened mobility tore these ties asunder, women in particular traveled to relatives for vacation, to help out, or to meet prospective marriage partners. Whereas boys left home for an apprenticeship or the university, girls left, temporarily, to maintain family connections.

The family circle provided a buffer between Jews and an often unfriendly society as well as an extra level of communality and sociability. As such, it insulated against complete assimilation. The predominant role of women in the home and family meant that Jewish women had less access to Gentile environments and less opportunity to meet non-Jews than Jewish men. While other factors played their parts in shaping women’s religious and ethnic identification in each era, it may be suggested that society reinforced women’s familial preoccupations, giving them the unique potential to maintain Jewish traditions.

In this period of social mobility, the role of women was essential to the creation of a German-Jewish bourgeoisie. Women transformed the home into the model German bourgeois household, contributing to the social position of Jews and to their sense of class and, hence, Germanness. A good Haushalt equaled a good “house” and, more importantly, a respectable middle-class family. Women passed on that side of Bildung, centered on character formation and moral education, which German Jews integrated into their understanding of the spirit of their Germanness and their Jewishness.

Coupling faith with domesticity, women helped their families acculturate while many continued to perform the rituals, cook special Jewish dishes, and think and act in terms of Jewish life cycles, family and community networks, and the Jewish calendar. In the midst of a successful push toward acculturation, theirs was a holding action, as much to maintain tradition as to hold family and community together. As time went on, it was precisely the family and the community—including extended kin, friendship, charity, and cultural networks—rather than the strict observance of religious customs, which provided vehicles for Jewish identity in Germany.

Selected Bibliography

- Aschheim, Steven. 1982. Brothers and Strangers: The East European Jew in German and German-Jewish Consciousness, 1800–1923. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.
- Kaplan, Marion. 1991. The Making of the Jewish Middle Class: Women, Family, and Identity in Imperial Germany. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Kaplan, Marion, ed. 2005. Jewish Daily Life in Germany, 1618–1945. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Meyer Loevinson, Johanna. 1947–1948. Unpublished Memoir. New York: Leo Baeck Institute.

Jewish Women in Yemen

Yael Katzir

---

Jews had lived in Yemen, the mountainous, fundamentalist Muslim country located in the southwest corner of the Arabian Peninsula, for at least 1,700 years until their immigration to Israel in 1948. They were isolated for a thousand years from the rest of world Jewry. Most Yemenite Jews were rural, scattered within the Muslim population in hundreds of small villages throughout the Yemen highlands. However, part of the Yemenite Jewish population lived in towns.

The World of Yemenite Jewish Men

A brief account of the world of Yemenite Jewish men is essential in order to understand the world of their women. Yemenite Jewish men were artisans who monopolized certain economic niches in Yemenite economy, such as silversmithing, coin minting, weaving, tailoring, and shoemaking, vocations that Muslims considered polluting. Men were also traders, moving around villages to sell their family products and, meanwhile, forming socioeconomic networks outside their kin group.

Yemenite Jewry transmitted all property, vocational skills, and formal Jewish religious tradition solely to the males. Yemenite Jews lived in patriarchal extended family households of three generations or more. Household male heads had absolute authority over their wives and children, including their married sons and their families.

All Yemenite Jewish men could read in Hebrew (although often they could not write). Men were “walking books” who recited continuously and knew by heart the whole Old Testament. Fathers had personal responsibility to train their sons in both the Biblical tradition and craftsmanship and hence were their sons' masters and teachers. The spoken language in Yemenite Jewish homes was Yemenite Arabic.

Social life was marked by a high degree of segregation between the sexes. Men and women lived in separate cultural and activities worlds. Only men had access to the public political, economic, and religious domains. Yemenite Jewish men participated regularly in religious rituals, especially in the synagogue. Only men had access to the market. Men purchased all household supplies on the market, including clothes and accessories for the women.

The World of Yemenite Jewish Women

The world of Yemenite Jewish women was confined to the domestic domain. Women were greatly subordinated to the men. Women had no access to the market and the synagogue. Rural women could walk through the village exhibiting a modest behavior, such as eyes lowered to the ground, and wearing a dress that fully covered the body. Urban women were more segregated and could walk in public only if accompanied by an older woman or a male family member. All women were illiterate and received no formal education. Women were informally trained in domestic tasks by their mothers or mothers-in-law.

Yemenite Jewish woman and girl in traditional dress, 1949. (Eldan David/Israeli Government Press Office)

Yemenite Jewish women neither inherited any property from their father or husband nor received any dowry. Upon marriage, a woman was exchanged for bride wealth, which was totally kept by her patrilineal kin. Women had almost no property and no independent income and could not work for a living. Thus, throughout their lives, Jewish women were totally dependent economically on their male kin by birth or by marriage. The Jewish ketuba, marriage contract, and women's jewelry and clothes provided women with some measure of economic security upon widowhood or divorce.

First marriages were always arranged. The bride often did not know her groom before the wedding. Mothers had a central role in the marriage arrangements for their children. Often, they chose the spouse for their child, and then their husbands performed the formal rituals of negotiations and agreements. Girls were married at the age of 9 to 12, and boys at age 13 to 18. Marriage consummation required public proof of virginity. Marriage consummation was delayed for the very young girls. The new wife moved into the husband's extended family household. Polygyny, multiple marriages to two or more wives, was legitimate among Yemenite Jews.

The position of a young bride in a new household was often precarious and humiliating until she produced offspring for the patrilineage. The daughter-in-law was always the stranger in the household. Folk stories abound about the poor bride exploited and abused physically and psychologically, especially by the wicked mother-in-law. In reality, however, the structure of extended family provided women with support as wives and mothers. Young women, who were often children upon marriage, formed strong bonds with their mother-in-law, who became their surrogate mother, instructing and helping them with child care and child rearing, guiding them in forming intimate relationships with their husband, and teaching them domestic tasks. Strong affectionate relationships of mutual help often developed in the sisters-in-law group.

Women gradually acquired great power within the household through their influence over their husbands and children. Women had a central role in their children's education. Typical of patriarchal societies, strong affective ties persisted within the matricentric, mother-centered group of the mother and her children and among siblings. Mothers were seen by both sons and daughters as a source of affection, warmth, support, and comfort. Men were very attached to their mother and often sided with her in conflicts with their young wife.

Census data show a low household stability in the Yemenite Jewish population. The death rate was extremely high, and young women often died giving birth. The high death rate of infants added to a woman's precarious position in the household because her status depended on the number of children especially, males. Divorce requests in Yemenite Jewish communities were easily granted to the men. A new widow or divorcee remarried as soon as possible. Consequently, two or three marriages for men and women were not uncommon. For a woman, remarriage usually meant moving into a new household, usually in a new village, while the remarried man remained at his original home. A woman was, thus, likely to move several times in her lifetime among families and villages, and each time she was forced to adjust anew. In second and third marriages, women actively manipulated their environment or courted the potential husband to achieve a better relationship and socioeconomic status.

The daily routine of a woman started before sunrise. The woman would prepare a snack of cookies and hot goat's milk for her husband before he left for the morning prayer in the synagogue. All household chores were performed manually. Before daybreak a group of women would leave for the village outskirts to chop wood and carry it home on their head for heating and cooking. Women would then fetch water from the village well and carry the pots home on their head. Washing clothes was done by hand by the village spring. These were the places where the women met and chatted with other Jewish and Arab women. The daily routine also included long hours of grinding wheat and barley, cooking, house cleaning, and tending to the children and the animals. Toward noontime, the women would take a break and rest for a few hours, smoking nargilla, a water pipe, and chewing the mildly narcotic khat leaves. In the early evening hours, women visited family and friends.

Women had extensive friendship networks with other women expressed in mutual visiting, known as "women's visiting." The woman would pack a bundle of ja'ala, dried nuts and fruits, which she would bring as a gift. Women maintained close ties with their natal kin group through periodic visits. At the village springs, wells, and woods, Jewish and Arab women struck long-lasting friendships. These all-women social networks served as a crucial means of exchanging sociocultural and political information. Essential information about folk culture and potential brides and grooms was provided through these networks, and matchmaking deals were struck between women.

In contrast to their low social status and their meek and submissive public appearance, privately, Yemenite Jewish women were bright, shrewd, verbal, lively, and manipulative. Women's dress included pants embroidered at the ankles, worn underneath the dresses, head scarves, and silver jewelry. Women's bright eyes were emphasized by the black kohl eye liner, which originally served as a cure for eye infections. Women were considered specialists in folk medicine. Jewish women specialized in basket weaving and embroidery of the stripes that were attached to women's pants, which their husbands sold to female clients.

Jewish women loved to dance and sing. There was a pervasive oral tradition of folk songs and storytelling. Women accompanied their daily activities by singing songs, which they often composed. Songs were a mode of recounting daily news, storytelling, and providing political commentaries. Professional singers, accompanying themselves by drumming on large tin cans, were present in all social events.

Selected Bibliography

- Druyan, Nitza. 2006. "Yemenite Jewish Women." Nashim: A Journal of Jewish Women's Studies, no. 11 (March).
- Eraqi Klorman, Bat Zion. 2006. Yehudei Teiman: Historia, Khevra, Tarbut [Yemenite Jews: History, Society, Culture], vol. 2. Jerusalem: Hauniversita Hapetukha [The Open University] and Yad Ben-Zvi.
- Gamliel, Nissin. B. 1974. Ahavat Teiman: Hashira Ha'amamit Ha'teimanit. Shirat Nashim [Arabic Love Songs of Yemenite Jewish Women]. Tel Aviv, Israel: Davar Press.

- Goitein, Shlomo D. 1955. "Portrait of a Yemenite Weavers' Village." Jewish Social Studies 17 (1): 3–26.
- Kafih, Joseph. 2002. Halikhot Teiman: Khayei Hayehudim Be'Sana'a [Jewish Life in Sana'a]. Jerusalem: Machon Ben-Zvi.
- Katzir, Yael. 1982. "Preservation of Jewish Ethnic Identity in Yemen: Segregation and Integration as Boundary Maintenance Mechanisms." Comparative Studies in Society and History 24 (2): 264–279.
- Katzir, Yael. 1983. "Yemenite Jewish Women in Israeli Rural Development: Female Power versus Male Authority." Economic Development and Cultural Change 32 (1): 45–61.
- Ratzaby, Yehuda. 1978. Yahadut Teiman [Yemenite Jewry]. Tel Aviv: Israel Defence Forces.
- Saadon, Haiim, ed. 2002. Teiman: Kehilot Israel Bamizrakh Bameot Hatesha'esre Veha'esrim [Yemen: Jewish Communities in the East in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries]. Jerusalem: Machon Ben-Zvi and the Ministry of Education.
- Seri, Shalom, ed. 1993. Bat Teiman: Olama shel Ha'isha Hayehudiya [Daughter of Yemen: The World of Jewish Woman]. Tel Aviv: E'ele Batamar Press.

Women and Egalitarianism in American Judaism

Shaul Magid

---

If Judaism's central focus in the 19th century was coming to terms with emancipation and the development of Zionism, and the first two-thirds of the 20th century in the Diaspora, especially in America, dealt with democracy and later the reverberations of the Holocaust. In the latter third of the 20th century, Jews in the Diaspora have been grappling with the question of feminism and gender. From the perspective of ritual and liturgy, this took the form of the debates regarding egalitarianism. The Reform movement in America decided on this matter quite early (ordaining women in 1972), followed by the Reconstructionist movement (ordaining women in 1977). Reform allowed women to pray together with men without a ritual separation, or mehiza, as early as the late 19th century. Conservative Judaism ordained its first woman rabbi in 1983 and at the same time began implementing egalitarian practices in its synagogues, schools, and summer camps. Opposed to Reform and Reconstructionist Judaism, Conservative Judaism views itself as bound by Halacha (Jewish law) and thus its decisions and policies must be validated by Halachic analysis. This has caused a rift in the Conservative movement resulting in majority and minority opinions on this issue. As a contemporary movement dedicated to pluralism (external and internal) the Conservative movement is predominately egalitarian, but nonegalitarian minyanim, or prayer quorums, still exist in some of its synagogues. For example, at present there is still a daily nonegalitarian minyan at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, Conservative Judaism's academic center.

The basis of the Reform and Reconstructionist decisions are not identical. Reform Judaism does not see law as the central tenet of Jewish religiosity. Ritual and liturgy are thus altered to conform to contemporary mores and sensibilities. Reconstructionist Judaism fashions itself as post-Halachic. By that it means it does view ritual as a central focus of its religiosity but does not see Halachic tradition as binding. Mordecai Kaplan's quip that "tradition has a voice but not a veto" captures this sentiment.

Orthodoxy generally views Halacha as binding and unalterable unless adequate precedent can be found in the sources of tradition for change. For more traditional Orthodox communities this question is not a pressing issue because its own social norms do not generally conform to egalitarian secular society. For Modern Orthodoxy, a community that prides itself on living comfortably in both religious and secular worlds, this issue has become more pressing in the past few decades. Modern Orthodoxy is committed to living according to what it determines are Halachic standards. Therefore, a change of this magnitude, one that not only affects synagogue worship but also its social structure more generally, is extremely precarious. To implement full egalitarianism (i.e., counting women in a minyan and fully integrating them in ritual and liturgical life) would require a radical alteration of their religious life. In Orthodoxy's view, the gender boundaries dictated by the Halachic system are not circumstantial and contextual but embody a deeper understanding of Judaism's original construction of society. On the other hand, Modern Orthodox women are becoming part of the secular workplace and assuming roles of power and influence in their communities due, in part, to their participation in secular higher education. Two other factors have contributed to the rise of feminism in Modern Orthodoxy. First, Modern Orthodox women are not marrying as young as their more traditional counterparts, resulting in a fairly novel social category in Modern Orthodoxy, the independent adult single woman. Second, the 20th century has produced household technology that has significantly expanded leisure time for women, even those with families. The combination of the single adolescent young Jewish woman and the easing of domestic life in postindustrial society initially resulted in women seeking educational opportunities outside the home. This phenomenon began in late 19th-century Europe and resulted in the founding of the Beit Ya'akov School for women by Sarah Schenirer in the 1920s, partly in response to the fact that young women were seeking secular education because of the lack of educational opportunities in their Jewish community.

Although this school revolutionized women's Jewish education, it was born in a highly traditional society and adhered to strict Halachic restrictions regarding its educational curriculum. For example, women were excluded from the study of Talmud, the central literary corpus of traditional Jewish life. The reason for excluding women from the study of Talmud is a complicated Halachic matter whose source lies in the Mishnah, the original text of Rabbinic Judaism. It was a prohibition that was almost uniformly maintained throughout premodern Jewish history. In the 1970s, Modern Orthodox seminaries for women began teaching women Talmud under the advice of Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik of Boston who also taught at Yeshiva University in New York. Curiously, Soloveitchik never justified his position through any published Halachic response. The success of his innovation seemed largely due to his influence and charisma rather than the more conventional lifting of a ban via jurisprudential means. In any event, by the end of the 20th century, the study of Talmud for women has become common in many Modern Orthodox circles. One consequence of opening Talmudic study to women is that it exposes them to the complexity of legal reasoning and, even unwittingly, invites them to participate in the Talmudic and legal process of adjudication. Partly as a result of this process, Modern Orthodox women began directly confronting rabbinic authorities about certain limitations of women's participation in religious practice. In the Diaspora, at least three organizations, The Jewish Orthodox Women's Feminist Alliance (JOFA), Feminism and Orthodoxy, and the Edah Community arose to deal, in part, with the desire for Orthodox women's participation in religious life. Although these institutions have contributed much to moving toward a kind of Orthodox "egalitarianism" they have not called for outright alteration of the Halachic limitations regarding women and prayer. Social roles—largely a matter of custom and not law—have been significantly altered, and new Orthodox communities, such as Shira Hadasha, in Jerusalem and elsewhere, and Darkei Noam in New York City, have arisen to offer women more participatory roles in synagogue life. Some communities have allowed woman to serve in quasi-rabbinic roles, and there are even some Orthodox women who have private ordination from Orthodox rabbis. Generally speaking, however, it is unlikely Modern Orthodoxy will implement full egalitarianism for at least two reasons: one theological and one sociological. Theologically, the issue of the roles of men and women in traditional Jewish society is not something limited to synagogue life but runs very deep in the traditional psyche regarding social mores, family, and the structure of marital relationships. Perhaps because modernity has made wide inroads into Modern Orthodox communities and its women now play leading roles in such areas as business, academia, medicine, and law, it has become more important that the sacred space of the home and the synagogue retain traditional structures. Sociologically, Modern Orthodoxy needs to retain distinct divisions between itself and Conservative Judaism, which stands on its immediate left. To become fully egalitarian would arguably erase a very important line of distinction. Orthodoxy has maintained that full egalitarianism cannot be justified through Halacha. To change directions on that position would seriously damage Modern Orthodoxy's claim to be the Diaspora Judaism that has most successfully incorporated the best of modernity without allowing modernity to undermine its beliefs and practices.

Egalitarianism is an example of the complicated calculations of Judaism in the Diaspora. How can a minority religion that lives deeply and freely in a host culture incorporate that host culture's values without having those values undermine its integrity and sacrality? Reform Judaism was born precisely in that nexus in 19th-century Germany and thus its very nature is formed not as a defense against secular values but an affirmation of them. Reconstructionist Judaism is a product of American democracy and begins revaluing the very theological foundations of the religion in light of American modernity, which liberates them from the confines of what they view is an outdated rendition of tradition and authority. Conservative Judaism stands in the middle, understanding that incorporating modern sensibilities will result in ritual and theological alterations, but believing such changes does not undermine the authoritative voice of tradition. Modern Orthodoxy stands, in many ways, with Conservative Judaism, ideologically, but differs programmatically in that it is more willing to simply reject modern innovation if it is determined to be incompatible with their understanding of traditional authority. One essential difference between Modern Orthodox and Conservative Judaism, on this point, is that the constituency of the former largely shares the movement's commitments and agenda whereas the latter's constituency is largely less committed, less aware, or less interested in the movement's agenda. Gender politics in Judaism is moving into different phases. Modern Orthodoxy is on the verge of making significant, if incremental, changes to its understanding of women's roles in its society. Conservative Judaism is on the cusp of making its commitment to egalitarianism a paradigm for rethinking its position on homosexuality.

Selected Bibliography

- Adler, Rachel. 1998. Engendering Judaism. Philadelphia: JPS.
- Davidman, Lynn, and Shelly Tenenbaum. 1994. Feminist Perspectives on Jewish Studies. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Hauptman, Judith. 1998. Re-Reading the Rabbis. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Magid, Shaul. 2004. "Is Egalitarianism Heresy? Re-Thinking Gender on the Margins of Judaism." Nashim 8: 189–229.
- Plaskow, Judith. 1991. Standing Again at Sinai. San Francisco: HarperSan Francisco.
- Ross, Tamar. 2004. Expanding the Palace of Torah: Orthodoxy and Feminism. Waltham, MA: Brandeis University Press.
- Zloty, Shoshana. 1993. And All Your Children Shall be Learned. Northvale, NJ: Jason Aronson Press.

Genetics, Medicine, and Genealogy

Jewish Genetic Diseases

Edwin H. Kolodny

---

The Jewish people consist of various ethnic subgroups in whom until recently the gene pools remained distinct because of relative geographic isolation and a tradition of intrareligious and intracommunity marriage. Studies of the paternally derived Y chromosome show a genetic relatedness between Jews and the non-Jewish Middle Eastern population, suggesting a common Middle Eastern origin (Nebel et al. 2001). Gene mutations of an ancient origin are, therefore, more likely to be found in Jews of Ashkenazi, Sephardic, and Oriental background as well as other Middle Eastern populations, whereas those that occurred after the dispersion by the Roman conquest of Jerusalem (70 CE) are more frequent among Ashkenazi Jews (AJs).

At least 20 specific gene loci are more frequent among AJs, but there are also genetic traits that are specific to either Sephardic or Oriental Jews. Richard Goodman was the first to catalog these in his monumental monograph published in 1979. In each case, the basis for the causative genetic defect is a founder mutation that expanded in a particular segment of the Jewish population because of a severe bottleneck in population size followed by rapid expansion from a limited member of families. Such conditions most favor genetic drift (random fluctuations of gene frequencies). There is no evidence for selective environmental conditions contributing to the increased frequency of specific genetic diseases among any of the Jewish populations (Risch et al. 2003).

The predilection for Tay-Sachs disease and its genetic predisposition among Jews of Eastern European origin has been well known for more than a century. The dramatic reduction in its incidence since the introduction of carrier screening programs among AJs in the 1970s stimulated interest in other genetic diseases among Jews. Although genetic diseases occur worldwide in all populations, the strong emphasis placed on health education and disease prevention by the Jewish community has encouraged the study of genetic diseases in Jews both in Israel and the Diaspora.

The inheritance pattern in most Jewish genetic diseases is autosomal recessive, that is, the abnormal trait is silent in carriers (heterozygotes), allowing 50 percent expression of the normal gene product, which is sufficient to prevent disease. However, in the mating of two heterozygotes, there is a 25 percent (one in four) chance that the abnormal trait will appear twice in any one offspring so that no functional gene product is produced. The incidence of such homozygotes in various Jewish populations is shown in Tables 1 and 2. It varies from 1 in 27 for nonclassical adrenal hyperplasia to 1 in 40,000 for Bloom syndrome.

In a few instances, the disease gene is dominant, but its expression is variable depending on disease penetrance. Examples are torsion dystonia and Usher's syndrome. Genes that predispose to breast and colon cancer are also variably penetrant,

Table 1 Genetic Diseases in the Ashkenazi Jewish Population

Disease	Inheritance Pattern	Incidence	Carrier Frequency
Adult polyglucosan body disease	AR	~40 reported cases
Alpha-thalassemia	AR		1/13
Bloom syndrome	AR	1/40,000	1/110 (Polish Jews 1/37)
Breast cancer	AD with variable penetrance		1/40
Canavan disease	AR	1/6400	1/38-57
Colorectal cancer	AD with variable penetrance		APC 1/26-30 I1307K 1/13 (Russian, Polish, Romanian Jews)
Cystic fibrosis	AR	1/2500	1/23-29
Factor XI deficiency	AR	1/130	1/11
Familial dysautonomia	AR	1/3700	1/27 (Polish Jews 1/18)
Familial hypercholesterolemia	AD		1/56
Familial hyperinsulinism	AR		1/89
Familial Mediterranean fever	AR	1/200	1/5
Fanconi anemia (type C)	AR	1/32,000	1/89
Gaucher disease type 1	AR	1/900	1/15-19
Glycogen storage disease type 1a	AR	1/20,000	1/143
Inflammatory bowel disease	AD with variable penetrance
Mucopolipidosis IV	AR	1/10,000	1/100-127
Myotonic dystrophy	Trinucleotide repeat expansion	1/20,000
Niemann-Pick disease type A	AR	1/32,000	1/70-100
Nonclassical congenital adrenal hyperplasia	AR	1/27	1/3
Tay-Sachs disease	AR	1/3000	1/26-30
Torsion dystonia	AD with variable penetrance	1/2000
Usher's syndrome	AR	3/100,000	R245X 1/100

AD = autosomal dominant; AR = autosomal recessive.

requiring other genetic alterations and/or environmental triggers before the cancer is manifest (Kedar-Barnes and Rozen 2004).

Age of onset and severity also vary widely. Signs of classical Tay-Sachs disease, Canavan disease, and Niemann-Pick disease type A appear in the first year, cause progressive neurodegeneration, and lead to death within a few years. Mucopolipidosis IV and familial dysautonomia also cause progressive central nervous system (CNS) disease in childhood. Progressive CNS disorders beginning in later decades,

Table 2 Genetic Diseases in the Sephardic and Oriental Jewish Populations

Disease	Inheritance Pattern	Incidence	Carrier Frequency
Alpha-thalassemia	AR		1/80 Kurdistan Jews 1/5 Yemenite Jews
Ataxia telangiectasia	AR		1/40 Moroccan Jews
Beta-thalassemia	AR		1/160 Kurdistan Jews
Breast cancer	AD with variable penetrance		1/40
Colorectal cancer	AD with variable penetrance		11307K 1/21 Yemenite Jews
Costeff syndrome	AR	~40 reported cases among Iraqi Jews
Cystinuria	AR		1/25 Libyan Jews
Dubin-Johnson syndrome	AR		1/20 Iranian Jews
Factor VII deficiency	AR		1/40 Iranian Jews
Factor XI deficiency	AR	1/130	1/11
Familial Mediterranean fever	AR	1/200	1/4.5 North African Jews 1/2.5 Iraqi Jews 1/17 Iranian Jews
Glucose-6-phosphate dehydrogenase deficiency	X-linked		1/4–6 Males
Glycogen storage disease type IIIa	AR	1/5400	1/35 North African Jews
Hereditary inclusion body myopathy	AR
Myotonic dystrophy	Trinucleotide repeat expansion	1/2500 Yemenite Jews 1/5700 Sephardic & Oriental Jews
Phenylketonuria	AR		1/35 Yemenite Jews

AD = autosomal dominant; AR = autosomal recessive.

such as late-onset Tay-Sachs disease and adult polyglucosan body disease, are also encountered. Other organs primarily affected are the hematopoietic system (blood), as in factor XI deficiency, alpha-thalassemia, Gaucher’s disease, and Fanconi’s anemia; muscle, as in glycogen storage disease types Ia and III, myotonic dystrophy, and hereditary inclusion body myopathy; and the gastrointestinal tract, as in inflammatory bowel disease. Gaucher’s disease has multiple systemic effects, as do cystic fibrosis, familial Mediterranean fever, and nonclassical congenital adrenal hyperplasia. Bloom and Fanconi’s syndromes predispose to malignancy in childhood, whereas several breast and colon cancer genes are silent until the later decades.

Screening for certain genetic traits, especially those transmitted as autosomal recessive disorders, can provide expanded reproductive options to couples who would otherwise not knowingly have affected offspring with serious progressive childhood disease (ACOG Committee on Genetics 2004). One study that screened 2427 AJs for eight conditions found that one in seven were carriers of at least one of these traits (Strom et al. 2004). Furthermore, testing single men and women anonymously in the Dor Yeshorim program provides the Orthodox community with a means of avoiding the partnering of two carriers, without stigmatization. Testing for presymptomatic disease where there may be incomplete penetrance is fraught with ethical concerns, but it can facilitate early diagnosis and treatment through intensified disease surveillance. Of utmost importance is pre- and posttest education to ensure informed decision making and a full understanding of the possible outcomes and the actual results and their implications. The information gleaned may also be useful to other family members.

None of the Jewish genetic diseases can be cured but a few are easily treated, for example, Gaucher's disease and nonclassical congenital adrenal hyperplasia. Umbilical cord stem cell transplantation is an option in Fanconi's anemia, and gene therapy is being studied as a treatment for Canavan disease. The more common disorders and a few of the rare forms of genetic diseases in specific subgroups are shown in the tables, and are also described in alphabetical order in the sections that follow. The chromosomal localization of many of the genes mentioned are shown in parentheses.

Alpha-Thalassemia

AJs have a high carrier frequency (7.9 percent) for alpha-thalassemia, even though they have not resided in the malaria belt where this gene disorder is common. Affected individuals have a microcytic hypochromic anemia, enlarged liver and spleen, mild jaundice, and sometimes bone changes. Nearly all Ashkenazi alpha-thalassemia carriers possess a single  $\alpha$ -globin gene deletion, alpha, supporting a founder effect.

Bloom Syndrome

The molecular defect in this autosomal recessive disease in the Bloom syndrome gene ( $blm^{Ash}$  mutation) is present in 1 in 110 AJs, but has a higher frequency among Polish AJs (1:37). In the homozygous state, there is marked growth delay at birth, short stature, abnormalities of skin pigmentation aggravated by sun exposure, and immunodeficiency. Men are sterile and women have reduced fertility. As in Fanconi's anemia, there is increased chromosomal breakage and a greatly increased risk of malignancy over the normal risk.

Breast Cancer

There is a recognized predisposition to breast cancer, and in 20–40 percent of familial cases it can be attributed to mutations in BRCA1 (17q21) and BRCA2 (13q12–13). Three founder mutations have been identified in AJs: 185delAG and 5382insC in BRCA1 and 6174 delT in BRCA2. Their combined prevalence in AJs is 2–3 percent, which is approximately 10 times that of all BRCA1 and BRCA2 mutations in the general U.S. population. The age of diagnosis in carriers is significantly lower than in noncarriers. Penetrance for these founder mutations by the ages of 40, 50, and 70 years are approximately 7 percent, 20 percent, and 40 percent, respectively.

These mutations also increase the risk for developing ovarian cancer. These are estimated to be 28–66 percent for a BRCA1 mutation and 16–27 percent for a BRCA2 mutation. The strongest predictor of mutation status is a previous diagnosis of breast or ovarian cancer or a family history of breast cancer before the age of 50 years. The BRCA1 predisposition gene, 185delAG, present in 1 percent of the Ashkenazi population, is also prevalent in the Iraqi Jewish population at a rate similar to that for AJs, suggesting that this mutation emerged before the dispersion of the Jews around 70 CE.

Canavan Disease

Canavan disease is a progressive neurodegenerative disease of brain white matter that begins within the first three months. Visual inattention, head lag, hypotonia, and developmental delay occur early, followed by macrocephaly (an enlarged head), hypertonia (increased muscle tone), feeding difficulties, and optic atrophy. On brain magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) there is a markedly abnormal signal throughout the central white matter, including the subcortical U-fibers, and N-acetylaspartic acid is elevated in a urine screen for organic acids. The disease is attributable to a deficiency of the enzyme aspartoacylase encoded by the ASPA gene on 17p13ter. Approximately 1 in 57 AJs are carriers of a mutation in this gene. The most common, A854C, accounts for 88 percent of mutant alleles in this population and is probably attributable to an ancestral AJ founder. A second mutation, C693A, accounts for the rest of the mutant AJ alleles. A third mutation, C914A, is common among non-Jewish patients but is not seen in the AJ carrier population. The American College of Medical Genetics and the American College of Obstetrics and Gynecology have recommended screening for Canavan disease mutations in AJ individuals and couples (ACOG Committee on Genetics 2004).

Colorectal Cancer

Colorectal cancer is the third most commonly diagnosed cancer in the United States and Canada. However, familial clustering has been noted in only about 15 percent of cases. These include familial adenomatous polyposis (FAP) and hereditary nonpolyposis colorectal cancer (HNPCC). FAP is caused by mutations of the APC gene and HNPCC by mutations in mismatch repair genes (MSH2, MLH1, and MSH6). Two founder mutations have been traced to the Jewish population.

Among AJs, 6 percent carry the I1307K mutation in the APC gene. This increases the risk of developing colorectal cancer 1.5–2.0 fold. Israeli Jews immigrating to Israel from Russia, Poland, and Romania had an even higher carrier frequency, 7.7 percent, whereas for Israeli Jews from non-European countries the carrier frequency is 1.3 percent. The I1307K carrier frequency among Yemenites was ~4.7 percent.

Unaffected AJ controls have half the carrier frequency of patients with colorectal cancer, suggesting that the APC gene does indeed act as a colorectal cancer susceptibility gene. The age at diagnosis of colorectal cancer in carriers does not differ substantially from that of noncarriers. Both Ashkenazi and non-Ashkenazi Jews, as well as Arabs, carry the I1307K mutation. This points to an ancient origin for the mutation before the separation of the Jewish communities into the Diaspora, a conjecture born out by studies showing sharing of marker alleles on the mutant chromosome.

The MSH2* 1906G→C mutation (also known as A636P) in the MSH2 gene, on the other hand, represents quite the opposite situation. It is found only among Ashkenazim and is the rarest founder mutation identified, present in 0.22 percent of healthy AJs; it is significantly more frequent in colorectal cancer cases than in healthy controls. It arose relatively recently (approximately 10–20 generations ago) and predisposes to colorectal cancer at age 40 or earlier.

Costeff Optic Atrophy Syndrome (3-methylglutaconicaciduria type 3)

This progressive neuroophthalmologic disorder occurs almost exclusively in Iraqi Jews. Optic atrophy occurs early in childhood followed later by spasticity, a movement disorder, and mild intellectual impairment. The increased urinary excretion of 3-methylglutaconic acid and 3-methylglutaric acid in these patients is due to a founder mutation (IVS1-1G→C) in the OPA3 gene.

Cystic Fibrosis

Cystic fibrosis is the most common genetic disease among whites that leads to premature death; it has a carrier frequency of 1/20 to 1/40, depending on the ethnic group. Among AJs, the carrier rate is approximately 1/23. This multisystem disease affects the epithelia of the respiratory tract, pancreas, intestine, male genital tract, hepatobiliary system, and sweat glands. Affected patients have chronic pulmonary disease, gastrointestinal and nutritional abnormalities, absence of sperm production, and salt loss. The disease is caused by mutations in the cystic fibrosis transmembrane conductance regulator (CFTR) gene (7q 31.2) in which more than 1,000 mutations have been found. Among Ashkenazim, five mutations account for 97 percent of the mutant alleles, but other Jewish populations have their own unique mutation spectrum. Studies in Israel suggest that a panel of 15 mutations should be used when screening married Jewish couples of mixed ethnic origin.

Factor XI Deficiency

Factor XI deficiency (FXI) is an injury-related bleeding tendency characterized by low FXI coagulant activity. It affects 1 in a million in the general population, but among Jews, 1 in 11 are carriers and 1 in 130 are affected. The lowest levels of FXI clotting activity occur in individuals homozygous for the type II Glu117stop mutation, whereas the highest levels of activity are found in homozygotes with the type III F283L mutation. Half of affected AJs are compound heterozygotes for the type II and III mutations and another quarter are homozygous for each, respectively. The type II mutation is prevalent in Iraqi Sephardic Jews and AJs, and thus is believed to have arisen in ancient times. The type III mutation is found predominantly in AJs, suggesting a much more recent origin. Haplotype analyses imply a founder effect for both mutations.

Familial Dysautonomia

This autosomal recessive disease is also known as Riley-Day syndrome or hereditary sensory and autonomic neuropathy III. There is diminished tear production; absence of fungiform papillae on the tongue; lack of axon flare after intradermal histamine injection; abnormalities of swallowing, feeding, temperature, and blood pressure regulation; and insensitivity to pain sensation. A single mutation (IVS2+6T→C) in the IKBKAP gene (9q31) accounts for more than 99.5 percent of familial dysautonomia alleles (one of a series of possible alternative forms of a gene sequence) in AJs. The overall incidence of AJ carriers is 1:32, but among AJs of Polish descent it is 1:18. This mutation is believed to have arisen relatively recently, perhaps at the end of the 15th century. Another minor mutation, R696P, has been found in a few AJs. With improved medical care, many of these patients now survive into adult life.

Familial Mediterranean Fever

Family Mediterranean fever (FMF) is characterized by recurrent self-limited episodes of fever and inflammation of serosal membranes, including peritonitis, pleuritis, and synovitis. A small number of patients develop amyloidosis. Daily colchicine treatment can prevent FMF attacks and the development of amyloidosis. Few common mutations in the Marenstrin-encoding fever gene (MEFV; 16p) account for most of the DNA variations in FMF patients. Those with the M694V mutation have a more severe course and are more likely to develop amyloidosis.

FMF is common in the Mediterranean area, especially among Armenians, Turks, Arabs, and Jews. It is most frequent among Jews of North African origin, but there is a high frequency of carriers among Jews of various ethnic groups: Iraqi, 39 percent; North African, 22 percent; Ashkenazi, 21 percent; and Iranian, 6 percent. Ashkenazi and Iranian Jews carry the E148Q mutation, which is associated with a milder phenotype, thus explaining the lower prevalence of FMF among these two ethnic groups.

Fanconi's Anemia

Greater than 1 in 100 AJs are carriers of a mutation (IVS4+4A→T) in the FANCC gene, which causes Fanconi's anemia, a rare autosomal recessive disorder associated with short stature, a subnormal response to growth hormone stimulation, hypothyroidism, and in some, impaired glucose tolerance. Two-thirds have congenital malformations. There is progressive bone marrow failure (90 percent by age 40) and tendency to leukemia and other malignancies (33 percent by age 40). A Fanconi-like syndrome with high rates of brain tumors, Wilms' tumor, and early onset leukemia may also occur in the presence of BRCA2 mutations. Bone marrow or umbilical cord blood transplantation using stem cells from an human leukocyte antigen-matched family donor is the only proven treatment.

Gaucher's Disease Type 1

This lysosomal storage disease can present at any age, most patients showing symptoms by age 20. It is due to reduced activity of glucocerebrosidase, the enzyme that degrades glucocerebroside. Lipid-filled macrophages accumulate in the reticulo-endothelial system resulting in an enlarged spleen and liver, thinning of bone, anemia, and low platelet count. Fatigue, easy bruising, nosebleeds, bone pain, and fractures are some of the secondary effects. Therapy with enzyme replacement and substrate reduction is available.

In the AJ population, four mutations account for more than 90 percent of the disease alleles: N370S, 84GG, L444P, and IVS2+1. Homozygotes for the N370S mutation generally have the mildest disease. The L444P mutation, when homozygous, will result in CNS manifestations characteristic of Gaucher's disease types 2 or 3. The carrier frequency in the AJ population is 1 in 15 to 1 in 19 individuals. Because some patients may remain asymptomatic well into adult life, homozygous-affected individuals are sometimes discovered in the course of carrier screening.

Glycogen Storage Disease

Two disorders of glycogen metabolism appear more frequently in Ashkenazim than in the non-Jewish population: glycogen storage disease type 1a and adult polyglucosan body disease (APBD). GSD1a is caused by a deficiency of D-glucose-6-phosphatase, a key enzyme in the synthesis of glucose. This causes severe hypoglycemia in infants and children, which may lead to mental retardation. In young adults with the disease, seizures, tumors of the liver, and kidney failure occur. Most affected AJ subjects are homozygous for a single mutation, R83C, in the GSD1a gene, suggesting a founder effect. The frequency of this mutation in the AJ population is estimated to be 0.7 percent, which implies a disease prevalence among AJs of 1 in 20,000. This is five times that of the general white population.

APBD presents in the fifth decade, with slowly progressive gait difficulty, urinary incontinence, disturbance in coordination, and distal sensory neuropathy. The leg weakness progresses and memory dysfunction may develop. Large inclusions containing glycogen are found in peripheral nerves and in various parts of the brain and spinal cord. A deficiency in glycogen branching enzyme has been found in AJ cases associated with a single missense mutation (Y329S) in the GBE gene (chromosome 3). Glycogen branching enzyme deficiency has only rarely been detected in non-Jewish cases of APBD, and in such instances novel mutations have been described.

Another glycogen storage disease, type IIIa, is unusually frequent among North African Jews. Although the disease incidence in the United States is 1 in 100,000 births, in North African Jews in Israel its prevalence is 1 in 5,400. This disease is characterized by an enlarged liver, hypoglycemia, hyperlipidemia, short stature, and, to a variable degree, enlargement of the heart and muscle involvement. It is due to deficiency of the glycogen debranching enzyme, AGL, which together with phosphorylase is responsible for the breakdown of glycogen. A single founder mutation in AGL, 4455 delT, is present in 1 in 35 North African Jews and, in homozygous form, is responsible for the disease in this population.

Hereditary Inclusion Body Myopathy

Hereditary inclusion body myopathy is a neuromuscular disorder that begins in young adults with preferential involvement of the muscles of the lower leg but sparing of the quadriceps muscle. Rimmed vacuoles and filamentous inclusions are found on pathological examination of muscle. Mutations in the gene for UDP-N-acetylglucosamine 2-epimerase/N-acetylmannosamine kinase (GNE, 9p12–13) have been identified in affected individuals. A single founder mutation, M712T, appears to be responsible for the clustering of this disease among Jews of Middle Eastern ancestry.

Inflammatory Bowel Disease

The incidence of inflammatory bowel disease is two- to fourfold higher in AJs compared with non-Jewish whites. It is multifactorial, but there is evidence of strong genetic predisposition with a sibling risk of 35-fold for Crohn's disease (CD) and 15-fold for ulcerative colitis. Three allelic variants of the IBDI gene on 16q12 (NOD 2/CARD15) are associated with more than 50 percent of Jewish pediatric patients with CD and 37.5 percent in adults. In individuals with a double dose of the CD susceptibility gene, NOD 2/CARD15, the risk of developing CD increases to 20- to 40-fold. Other potential predisposing genes for CD are IBD2, IBD3, IBD 4, and IBD 5. Jews of middle-European origin have an excess risk relative to Jews of Polish/Russian origin. Non-AJs with CD carrying the gene for familial Mediterranean fever are more likely to have a stricturing disease pattern and extraintestinal disease manifestations of CD.

Mucopolipidosis IV

Mucopolipidosis IV (MLIV) is a neurodegenerative lysosomal storage disease almost exclusively confined to the AJ population. Developmental delay and corneal opacification are noted within the first year. An affected child has receptive language and may be able to sign but is totally unable to speak. Weakness, hypotonia, and incoordination prevent the youngster from walking independently. Other findings include elevated blood gastrin, achlorhydria, and blood iron deficiency. Electron microscopy reveals multilamellar bodies in all cells, which on chemical analysis consist of phospholipids, gangliosides, neutral lipids, and mucopolysaccharides.

MLIV is caused by mutations in MCOLN1 (19p1.2–1.3), the gene that encodes mucolipin 1, a cation channel protein involved in a late stage of prelysosomal trafficking of endosomes. The frequency of carriers of MLIV in the AJ population is 1 in 100, so that the predicted disease incidence is 1 in 10,000. The origin of the parents of most patients can be traced to the northern Poland/south Lithuania region. Two founder mutations, IVS3–2A→G (major) and 511del 6434 (minor), account for 95 percent of MLIV alleles in the AJ population.

Myotonic Dystrophy

This common neuromuscular disease has a worldwide prevalence of 1 in 20,000. It is characterized in adults by myotonia (inability to easily relax muscles after a contraction), progressive muscle weakness, and wasting. In most patients, it is caused by an expansion mutation of the trinucleotide (CTG) in the DMPK gene (19q13.3). The prevalence among Ashkenazim is similar to that of other populations in the world but among Sephardic and Oriental Jews it is 3.5 times that of Ashkenazim. Yemenites have the highest prevalence, approximately eightfold higher than AJs. These differences are believed to be the result of a common ancestral premutation in the Sephardic/Oriental and Yemenite Jews causing a conversion to the unstable expanded (CTG)<sub>n</sub> in form of the DMPK gene.

Niemann-Pick Disease Type A

Poor feeding, recurrent vomiting, and a protuberant abdomen are early signs of Niemann-Pick disease type A. A cherry-red spot may be observed in the macula of the eye. Psychomotor regression occurs by the age of one year. Lymph nodes and liver are enlarged, and respiratory difficulties ensue. There are vacuolated lymphocytes in peripheral blood, foam cells in the bone marrow, and a fine reticulated appearance of the lungs on chest x-ray. The child develops jaundice and ascites, loses weight, and generally dies before the age of three years.

The disease is due to a deficiency of the lysosomal enzyme acid sphingomyelinase (ASM; chr. 11). The major AJ mutations are delR608, fsP330, and L302P, with an overall carrier frequency in the AJ population of approximately 1 in 100. A milder variant, Niemann-Pick disease type B, is associated with relative sparing of the brain. There is enlargement of the liver and spleen, pulmonary infiltration, and in many patients a cherry-red spot in the macula. Half of the AJ patients with type B have at least one R496L ASM mutation.

Nonclassical Congenital Adrenal Hyperplasia

Congenital adrenal hyperplasia (CAH) results from defective cortisol synthesis from cholesterol. Because of the impairment in cortical secretion, levels of adrenocorticotropic hormone rise, causing hyperplasia of the adrenal cortex. Nearly all cases of CAH are due to deficiency of 21-hydroxylase resulting in an accumulation of precursors that are shunted into the androgen pathway. Patients with the most severe disease have salt-wasting because of impaired aldosterone synthesis. In the classical form, aldosterone is not affected. Both forms are associated with ambiguous genitalia in females.

In nonclassical CAH there is diminished 21-hydroxylase activity, but normal secretion of aldosterone, and females do not have ambiguous genitalia. However, postnatal androgen excess leads to advanced bone age, early pubic hair, precocious puberty, tall stature in childhood but short stature in adults, hirsutism, and frontal balding as well as polycystic ovaries and irregular menstrual periods in females and testicular adrenal rest tissue in males.

Nonclassical CAH is the most common of all autosomal recessive diseases, estimated to occur with a frequency of 1 in 100. It is especially prevalent among AJs in whom the carrier frequency is 1 in 3 and the disease frequency 1 in 27. Homozygosity of a single mutation in exon 7 (V281L) of the CYP21A2 gene is responsible for half the cases and 36 percent of patients have compound heterozygosity of the exon 7 mutation and another more severe mutation. Early diagnosis is important, as signs and symptoms can be reversed by dexamethasone treatment.

Tay-Sachs Disease

Tay-Sachs disease (TSD) is the best known of the Jewish genetic diseases, perhaps because of the success of worldwide TSD prevention programs aimed at preconception or prenatal testing of the at-risk population. An infant with Tay-Sachs disease appears clinically normal at birth but fails to reach the usual developmental milestones by the age of one year. The child startles easily, appears listless and hypertonic, and fails to follow objects visually. A cherry-red spot is seen in the macula on fundoscopic examination, and seizures develop. After one year of age, the child is blind, hypertonic, and progressively more lethargic, eventually becoming vegetative and requiring continuous nursing care. Progressive cachexia, dehydration, and aspiration pneumonia precede death, usually at four or five years of age.

This lysosomal storage disease is characterized by the accumulation within nerve cells of  $G_{M2}$ -ganglioside. The sphingoglycolipid requires a series of lysosomal glycosidases for its enzymatic hydrolysis. One of these, hexosaminidase A, is deficient leading to the  $G_{M2}$  storage. Two mutations in the HEXA gene (15q23–24) are responsible for nearly all AJ cases of classical infantile-onset TSD. These are a 1278insTATC mutation, which accounts for 75–80 percent of AJ mutations and an IVS 12+1 splice site mutation accounting for the remainder. Within the AJ population, the carrier frequency is 1 in 25 persons but disease prevalence in this population has been much reduced as a result of voluntary carrier screening programs.

A late-onset form of  $G_{M2}$ -gangliosidosis (LOTS) exists, which is also much more frequent in AJs than in the general population. It is characterized by poor coordination, tremor, and proximal muscle weakness, especially in the lower extremities. Half of the patients experience depression and frank psychosis. Cognition is generally preserved but because of progressive ataxia and frequent falls, patients become wheelchair dependent. Most patients with LOTS are compound heterozygotes who possess one G269S mutation in exon 7 of HEXA along with one of the two common infantile AJ mutations. One in 40 AJ individuals found by enzyme analyses to be TSD carriers actually carry the G269S exon 7 mutation rather than one of the two common infantile mutations.

Torsion Dystonia

Primary torsion dystonia usually begins in childhood or early adolescence with torsion spasms and postural abnormalities in one or more limbs. The abnormal movements may initially occur only with activity, are increased with stress, and disappear during sleep. Mean age of onset is about 10 years. The symptoms may remain focal or spread to include other limbs, but only rarely are the neck and cranial musculature involved. Approximately 90 percent of early-onset AJ cases are due to a single founder mutation in the DYT1 gene located at 9q34. This mutation, a GAG deletion resulting in the loss of a glutamic acid residue from the protein torsin A, is a dominant trait present in 1 in 2,000 AJs, but it causes actual disease in only 30–40 percent of carriers. Another alteration in the DYT1 gene, a polymorphism at amino acid residue 216, if present on the opposite allele, appears to protect carriers of the GAG deletion from overt disease. Partial relief of symptoms has been obtained with benzodiazepines and anticholinergic drugs as well as pallidotomy and thalamotomy.

Usher's Syndrome

Approximately 1/1,000 children worldwide are hard of hearing, and of these a hereditary cause is found in 41–44 percent. In approximately half the cases of hereditary bilateral sensorineural hearing impairment among both AJs and Sephardic Jews, mutations are present in the connexin 26 (Cx26; GJB2) or connexin 30 (GJB6) genes. Mutations in GJB2 have been found in approximately 1 in 20 AJs.

Of the deaf-blind population, which has a prevalence of 1/10,000 between ages 30 and 49, more than 50 percent are due to Usher's syndrome (US). The overall prevalence of US in AJs is 3/100,000. In addition to sensorineural hearing impairment, patients with US have vestibular dysfunction and progressive retinitis pigmentosa. The most severe form, USH1, is characterized by congenital profound deafness, prepubertal onset of retinitis pigmentosa, and abnormal vestibular function. Seven USH1 genes have been identified, of which a single alternation in the PCDH15 gene (10 q11.2-q21), a R245X mutation, accounts for more than half of the USH1 cases. The carrier rate for this mutation in the AJ population is 1/100.

Another form, USH3, is characterized by delayed onset of the hearing loss, variable onset and severity of retinitis pigmentosa, and the occasional presence of vestibular dysfunction. A single gene locus (USH3A; 3q25) has been identified. Among AJs with US, 40 percent of cases are believed to result from homozygosity for a N48K mutation in this gene, suggesting a founder effect. The carrier frequency of the N48K mutation in the AJ population is on the order of 7/1,000. Together, this mutation and the R245X mutation of PCDH15, account for approximately 67 percent of cases of US in this population.

Selected Bibliography

- ACOG Committee on Genetics. 2004. "Prenatal and Preconceptional Carrier Screening for Genetic Diseases in Individuals of Eastern European Jewish Descent." Obstetrics and Gynecology 104: 425–428.
- Goodman, Richard M. 1979. Genetic Disorders among the Jewish People. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Kedar-Barnes, I., and P. Rozen. 2004. "The Jewish People: Their Ethnic History, Genetic Disorders and Specific Cancer Susceptibility." Familial Cancer 3: 193–199.
- Nebel A., D. Filon, B. Brinkmann, P. P. Majumder, M. Faerman, and A. Oppenheim. 2001. "The Y Chromosome Pool of Jews as Part of the Genetic Landscape of the Middle East." American Journal of Human Genetics 69: 1095–1112.
- Risch N., H. Tang, H. Katzenstein, and J. Ekstein. 2003. "Geographic Distribution of Disease Mutations in the Ashkenazi Jewish Population Supports Genetic Drift over Selection." American Journal of Human Genetics 72: 812–822.
- Strom, C.M., B. Crossley, J. B. Redman, F. Quan, A. Buller, M. J. McGinniss, and W. Sun. 2004. "Molecular Screening for Diseases Frequent in Ashkenazi Jews: Lessons Learned from More Than 100,000 Tests Performed in a Commercial Laboratory." Genetics in Medicine 6: 145–152.

Patient Resources

- Jewish Genetic Disease Consortium, e-mail: info@JewishGeneticDiseases.org
- Canavan Foundation, e-mail: info@canavanfoundation.org
- Dor Yeshorim Committee for Prevention of Jewish Genetic Diseases, Brooklyn, NY, telephone: 718-384-2332
- Dysautonomia Foundation, e-mail: info@familialdysautonomia.org
- Dystonia Medical Research Foundation, e-mail: dystonia@dystonia-foundation.org
- Fanconi Anemia Research Fund, e-mail: info@fanconi.org
- National Gaucher Foundation, e-mail: robinbmd@aol.com or rhonda@gaucherdisease.org
- National Tay-Sachs & Allied Diseases Association, e-mail: info@ntsad.org

Genetic Diseases and the Diaspora

Joel Zlotogora

---

The relatively high frequency of genetic disorders among Jews is a well-known phenomenon. With the advances in molecular genetics of the past two decades, the molecular basis of most of the disorders relatively frequent in the different Jewish communities has been elucidated.

Some of the disorders found with a relatively high frequency among several of the Jewish communities, such as thalassemia, familial Mediterranean fever, or G6PD deficiency, are also frequent in the non-Jewish local populations among which these communities were living. The most probable explanation is the existence of a selective advantage for the carriers of these disorders, such as resistance to malaria for thalassemia and G6PD carriers. These disorders, however, represent exceptions, and in most cases the high frequency of the genetic diseases is limited to the Jewish community. The main factor that led to these observations was the isolation of the

Table 3 Mendelian Disorders Relatively Frequent among Jews

Disorder	Heterozygote Frequency
Ashkenazi Jews
Abetalipoproteinemia	Rare
Adrenal hyperplasia III, nonclassical 21 OH deficiency	1:6
Bloom syndrome	1:94–112
Breast cancer (predisposition)	1:100
Ovarian cancer (predisposition)	1:75
Canavan disease	1:41–60
Colon cancer (predisposition)	1:14–1:20
Cystic fibrosis	1:25
Deafness	1:25
Dysautonomia, familial	1:30–36
Factor XI (PTA) deficiency	1:12
Familial Mediterranean fever	1:5–1:10
Fanconi's anemia	1:77–218
Gaucher's disease type I	1:7–18
Glycogenosis Ia	1:71
Glycogenosis IV (adult)	Rare
Glycogenosis VII phosphokinase deficiency, late-onset	Rare
Hermansky-Pudlak syndrome	1:235
Hypercholesterolemia, familial (Lithuanian Jews)	1:69
Lipoamide dehydrogenase deficiency	1:94
Maple syrup urine disease	1:113
Mucopolidosis IV	1:100–112
Nemaline myopathy	1:108
Niemann-Pick disease A	1:90
Pentosuria	1:35
Persistent hyperinsulinemic hypoglycemia of infancy	1:125–160
Tay-Sachs disease	1:25–30
Thalassemia, alpha	1:17
Torsion dystonia (idiopathic)	1:4,000
Usher's syndrome	1:72
Jews from Morocco
Adrenal hyperplasia, 11 beta hydroxylase	1:30–1:128
Albinism, oculocutaneous	1:30
Ataxia telangiectasia	1:80
Color blindness, total (achromatopsia)	Unknown
Complement C7 deficiency	1:100
Cystinosis	1:100
Cerebrotendinous xanthomatosis	1:70
Dubin-Johnson syndrome	1:100
Factor VII	1:42
Familial Mediterranean fever	1:7
Fanconi's anemia	1:100

(continued)

Table 3 (Continued)

Disorder	Heterozygote Frequency
Jews from Morocco (continued)
Glycogen storage disease III	1:35
Monilethrix	1:100
Tay-Sachs disease	1:110
Jews from Tunisia
Brittle cornea syndrome	Unknown
Creutzfeld-Jakob disease	1:24,000
Factor V and VIII deficiency	Unknown
Familial Mediterranean fever	1:7
Leber's congenital amaurosis	Unknown
Fragile X syndrome	Unknown
Selective intestinal malabsorption vitamin B-12	Rare
Mucopolidosis III	Unknown
Jews from Algeria
Distal spinal muscular atrophy	G526R
Familial Mediterranean fever	1:5
Jews from Libya
Creutzfeld-Jakob disease	1:24,000
Cystinuria	1:25
Limb girdle muscular dystrophy	1:10
Familial Mediterranean fever	1:5
Megaencephalic leukoencephalopathy	1:50
Jews from Iraq
Color blindness, total (achromatopsia)	Unknown
Factor XI deficiency (plasma thromboplastin antecedent deficiency)	1:30
Familial Mediterranean fever	1:15
G6PD deficiency	1:4 males
Type III 3-methylglutaconic aciduria	1:10
Microphthalmia/anophthalmia	Unknown
Monilethrix	1:100
Myasthenia gravis, infantile	Unknown
Pituitary dwarfism II (Laron)	Unknown
Pseudocholinesterase deficiency (E1)	1:11
Thrombasthenia (Glanzmann)	1:40
Xeroderma pigmentosum, unclassified	Unknown
Jews from Iran
Color blindness, total (achromatopsia)	Unknown
Corticosterone methyl oxydase II def	1:30
Dubin-Johnson syndrome	1:20
Factor V and VIII deficiency	Unknown
Factor VII	1:40

(continued)

Table 3 (Continued)

Disorder	Heterozygote Frequency
Jews from Iran (continued)
G6PD deficiency	1:7 males
Microphthalmia/anophthalmia	Unknown
Mitochondrial myopathy, sideroblastic anemia, and lactic acidosis	Unknown
Monilethrix	1:100
Myasthenia gravis, infantile	Unknown
Myoneurogastrointestinal encephalopathy	Unknown
Inclusion body myopathy	1:12
Pituitary dwarfism II (Laron)	Unknown
Polyglandular deficiency syndrome	1:50
Pseudocholinesterase deficiency (E1)	1:9
Jews from Turkey
Familial Mediterranean fever	1:15
Jews from Kurdistan
G6PD deficiency	1:1.6 male
Thalassemia, alpha	1:8
Thalassemia, beta	1:6
Egypt (Karaites)
Huntington's disease	Unknown
Spinal muscular atrophy I	1:10
Frontoparietal polymicrogyria	Unknown
Ethiopia
Neutropenia, chronic familial	1:3
Uzbekistan
Oculopharyngeal muscular dystrophy	1:700

communities and mainly due to the rapid population expansion in the last centuries; many genetic diseases became relatively frequent in each of the different Jewish communities (Table 3). As expected for such a process, a single major mutation was found to be responsible for the high frequency of each of those diseases (founder effect). In most cases, the founder mutation is unique, specific for a single Jewish community. However, there are few examples in which the same mutation was found in more than one Jewish community. For instance, the mutation responsible for factor XI deficiency (F11, GLU117TER) is frequent among Ashkenazi Jews and Iraqi Jews. These communities diverged mainly during the 600 years that elapsed between the destruction of the First Temple in 586 BCE and the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE, and it was demonstrated that the mutation probably first occurred around this period. The mutation responsible for a frequent myopathy among Iranian Jews (GNE, M712T) was also found among Jews

Table 4 Mutations Prevalent among Jews That Are Also Found in Other Populations

Mutation	Population
Bloom syndrome [BLM, 6-BP DEL/7-BP INS]	Ashkenazi Jews in Mexico, New Mexico, El Salvador
Albinism [TYR, G47D]	Jews from Morocco, Puerto Rico, Canary Islands
Creutzfeld-Jakob disease [PRNP, 200K]	Jews from Libya, Tunisia, Italy, Spain, Chile

from Iraq, Kurdistan, Uzbekistan, Afghanistan, and Egypt, probably as a result of the migration of the Iranian Jews to those countries. As may have been expected, some of the so-called Jewish mutations have been also found in non-Jews (Table 4), mostly in populations with similar origins. For instance, the mutation causing albinism (TYR, G47D) occurs on the same haplotype in Moroccan Jewish persons as in persons from the Canary Islands and Puerto Rico, suggesting a common origin.

However, there are still several unexplained observations, one being the non-random distribution of the disorders that are frequent, such as the group of lysosomal diseases among the Ashkenazi Jews, and another being the existence of many disorders caused by more than one mutation (Table 5). The main explanations have been either a selective advantage to carriers or a founder effect and genetic drift. The possibility of a founder effect and a rapid expansion is the preferred explanation to most human geneticists.

Table 5 Several Genetic Mutations in One Jewish Community

Disorder	Location of Genetic Mutation
Ashkenazi Jews
Canavan disease	ASPA [GLU285ALA]; [TYR231TER]
Factor XI (plasma thromboplastin antecedent) deficiency	F11 [GLU117TER]; [PHE283LEU]
Gaucher's disease type I	GBA [ASN370SER]; [84GG]; [LEU444PRO]; [IVS2DS, G-A, +1]
Lipoamide dehydrogenase deficiency	LAD [GLY229CYS]; [1-BP INS, TYR35TER]
Mucopolipidosis IV	MCOLN1 [IVS3-1A-G]; [del (EX1- EX7)]
Niemann-Pick disease A	SMPD1 [ARG496LEU]; [LEU302PRO]; [PRO330FS]
Persistent hyperinsulinemia hypoglycemia of infants (PHHI)	SUR [IVSAS, G-A, -9, EXON ALPHA DEL]; [3-BP DEL, PHE1388 DEL]
Tay-Sachs disease	HEXA [4-BP INS, EX11]; [IVS12DS, G-C, +1]; [GLY269SER]
Cystic fibrosis	CFTR [PHE508DEL]; [TRP1282TER]; [GLY542TER]; [ASN1303LYS]; [IVS19, C-T, +10]
Jews from Morocco
Cerebrotendinous xanthomatosis	CYP27 [IVS4DS, G-A, +1]; [1-BP DEL, FS]
Tay-Sachs disease	HEXA
Jews from Iraq
Thrombasthenia	GPIIIa [11 -BP DEL, EX 12]; [11.2 Kb DEL]

Selected Bibliography

- Online Mendelian Inheritance in Man, OMIM. McKusick-Nathans Institute for Genetic Medicine, Johns Hopkins University (Baltimore, MD) and National Center for Biotechnology Information, National Library of Medicine (Bethesda, MD). <http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/omim/> (accessed April 4, 2008).
- Risch N., H. Tang, H. Katzenstein, and J. Ekstein. 2003. "Geographic Distribution of Disease Mutations in the Ashkenazi Jewish Population Supports Genetic Drift over Selection." American Journal of Human Genetics 72: 812–822.
- Zlotogora J., G. Bach, and A. Munnich. 2000. "The Molecular Basis of Mendelian Disorders among Jews." Molecular Genetics and Metabolism 69: 169–180.
- Zlotogora J., and G. Bach. 2003. "The Possibility for a Selection Process in the Ashkenazi Jewish Population." American Journal of Human Genetics 73: 438–440.

Evolution of Jewish Genealogic Studies

Sallyann Sack

---

Genealogy has been part of Jewish history from the start. The book of Genesis lists 10 fully delineated generations from Adam to Noah. Two Torah portions begin with the word toldot (generations). The first is Noah (Genesis 6:9); the second simply is called Toldot and deals with Isaac (Genesis 25:19). Exodus 6:14 lists the founders of three tribes and their descendants. When individuals assigned tasks in the building of the Tabernacles in the desert are mentioned, their full lineage is given, for example, Bezalel, the son of Uri, the son of Hur of the tribe of Judah (Exodus 38:22). The book of Numbers, starting with the camping arrangement, provides a census (Numbers, chapters 1B3), and the book of Ruth ends with a listing of King David's ancestry (Ruth 4:18B22). Ezra (7:1B5) gives his lineage back to the High Priest Aaron, and Nehemiah (7:5) speaks of the genealogical registers of families who were the first to return from Babylonian exile

With the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE and the start of the Diaspora, one ceases to read about genealogies for several centuries. In the Middle Ages, rabbinic responsa literature frequently includes the lineages of the authors. Although leading, usually rabbinic, families often maintained traditions of their lineages, the practice was neither widespread nor organized.

The first known Jewish genealogy society was founded in Berlin in the 1930s by ophthalmologist Dr. Arthur Czellizer. The society and its members fell victim to the Nazis. A record exists of the founders of a Jewish genealogical society in Palestine in 1937, but nothing more is known of that group. For practical purposes, contemporary, organized Jewish genealogy may be said to have begun in 1977 with the publication of Finding Our Fathers by Dan Rottenberg, the first how-to Jewish genealogy book, followed 18 months later by a similar work, Arthur Kurzweil's From Generation to Generation. These books were the impetus for the inauguration, also in 1977, of Toldot: The Journal of Jewish Genealogy and the creation of the New York-based Jewish Genealogical Society, Incorporated (JGS). Subsequently, Rabbi Malcolm Stern, long-time president of the JGS, earned the nickname of “father of Jewish genealogy” as he encouraged the formation of Jewish genealogical societies all across the United States.

In 1981, New York was the venue for the first of what has become an annual Jewish genealogical conferences organized by local Jewish genealogy societies and held in a different location every year. The Jewish Genealogy Society of Greater Washington organized a genealogy conference in Jerusalem, the first conference outside the United States, thereby inaugurating the international presence of Jewish genealogy. The Israel Genealogical Society formed subsequent to the 1984 conference, and the Cercle de Généalogie Juive (the French Jewish Genealogical Society) organized in France in the same year.

Avotaynu: The International Review of Jewish Genealogy, a quarterly publication now in its 22nd year, appeared as a consequence of the 1984 conference. From its inception, Avotaynu served as the “voice of Jewish genealogy,” and today has the largest number of subscribers of any publication devoted exclusively to Jewish genealogy. It soon developed into a major publisher of Jewish genealogical reference books and, in 2004, the U.S. Association of Jewish Libraries awarded it a Body of Work Award for its efforts in developing the field of Jewish genealogy. Avotaynu's biweekly e-zine Nu? What's New? was established in 2000. With its 7,000-plus subscribers, Nu? is the most-read Jewish genealogy e-zine on the Web.

The number of Jewish genealogical societies continued to grow all over the world, and in 1987 Rabbi Stern and others founded an umbrella organization, the Association of Jewish Genealogical Societies (later, the International Association of Jewish Genealogical Societies [IAJGS]). Gary Mokotoff was elected its first president in 1988. The IAJGS assumed responsibility for determining the venue of the yearly conferences and in recent years has taken an increasingly active role in sponsoring them.

With the fall of the Soviet Union and its Eastern Bloc allies early in the 1990s, Jewish genealogy established contacts with archives and archivists all over Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union. In 1994, the IAJGS established the practice of inviting foreign archivists to address its conferences. JewishGen.org, today the primary voice of Jewish genealogy on the Internet, burst on the genealogical scene in 1995 with a vigor that continues unabated. Today it hosts numerous special interest groups based primarily on country of interest and sponsors the creation of numerous genealogically relevant databases, all posted online for use free of charge. Genealogists all over the world communicate daily via the JewishGen digest. Its efforts are fueled primarily by volunteers.

From 1997 onward, the Jewish genealogical community became truly international. The annual conference was held in Paris, and the number of those pursuing their Sephardic roots began to steadily increase—researchers achieving some remarkable success despite lack of access to archival records in their mostly Muslim ancestral countries.

From its inception, organized Jewish genealogy has been characterized by intensive volunteer efforts that have created reference works, developed databases, and literally developed the field of Jewish genealogy. In the first few years of the 21st century, trends from avocation toward professionalization have begun to emerge. In 2003, JewishGen became an affiliate of the Museum of Jewish Heritage in New York. In 2006, the International Institute of Jewish Genealogy and Paul Jacobi Center (IIJG), affiliated with the Jewish National and University Library in Jerusalem, opened its doors. The world's first academic research institute devoted exclusively to Jewish genealogy, the IIJG has two major missions: to conduct professional, academic research in Jewish genealogy and to bring about the establishment of endowed chairs of Jewish genealogy in universities with strong Jewish studies programs all over the world.

Today, thousands of enthusiasts pursue research into their family histories. Research projects increasingly involve collaborations with related disciplines and institutions. Holocaust studies hold a special place while DNA and migratory research look to become increasingly important. The IAJGS has 78 member societies located in Argentina, Australia, Canada, Europe, Israel, South Africa, and the United States. Study groups in Jewish genealogy exist in countries with small Jewish populations, such as New Zealand, and annual conferences attract upward of 2,000 attendees.

Increasingly, the pursuit of Jewish genealogy is moving beyond the realm of the hobbyist toward professionalization. Increasing numbers of individuals offer their research services for a fee; as nonsectarian Web sites charge for their service and their data, so also has JewishGen begun to offer some enhanced services to those who make substantial financial contributions, and the creation of the IIJG marks a substantial step toward making the pursuit a recognized academic discipline.

Selected Resources

The International Association of Jewish Genealogical Societies [IAJGS]: www.iajgs.org

Jewish Genealogy Avotaynu: www.avotayn.com

JewishGen: The Home of Jewish Genealogy. Museum of Jewish Heritage: www.jewishgen.org

International Institute for Jewish Genealogy and Paul Jacobi Center: www.iijg.org

Jews, Diaspora, and Medicine

Frank Heynick

---

For some 1,000 years and counting, medicine has been the preeminently Jewish profession. In modern times, the Jewish contribution to advances in all fields of medical science (as indexed, for example, by the number of Nobel Prizes awarded) has been phenomenal. But also in ages past, when treatment was largely theoretical, empirical, folkloric, and (by modern standards) pseudoscientific or irrational, Jewish doctors were among the most illustrious. At all levels, in fact, the Jewish community, usually less than one or two percent of any given country's population, typically supplied from one-sixth to one-half of all physicians. This has been so in remarkably varied societies and political systems, including those that were otherwise generally unfriendly to Jews. The history of this preeminence involves not just science but also religion, economics, sociology, and psychology.

Jews Choose Medicine; Gentiles Choose Jewish Doctors

The reasons for the millennium of Jewish preeminence in medicine in the Diaspora have been diverse and have varied according to era and locale. Rational medicine—whether based on Greco-Roman natural philosophy, as in ages past, or on recent developments in biology and biochemistry—requires intellect and literacy. This is true, of course, whether the physician be Jewish or Gentile. But whereas the Gentile population in past times was largely illiterate, the Jewish community, intelligent and multiliterate, traditionally produced far more than its share of excellent and even phenomenal students. Furthermore, Jews, in their centuries of wandering and with their international contacts, had resource to a wide range of medical writings: Talmudic, Greco-Roman, Arabic, and so forth.

Medicine has always been a financially attractive field, and the accumulation of individual and communal wealth has long been a Jewish concern. Also, physicians are well respected among people of all religions. This afforded the Jewish community in general some prestige and influence, especially when Jewish doctors (e.g., court physicians) served powerful leaders of the state and the church.

Judaism's attitude toward the human body and life in this world differed significantly from that of its daughter religions, Christianity and Islam, which generally viewed life on earth as a portal to eternal life in the hereafter. Christian ideology in particular, from Saint Augustine onward, was often permeated with a certain disdain for the corporal. Jewish thinking and ethics, by contrast, placed great emphasis on a person's temporal life and respect for the body and its functions.

Medical knowledge had the further advantage of portability. When the Jewish community was expelled from any country, Jewish physicians would find a ready market for their skills and expertise in a new land—the human body being basically the same everywhere.

The vast majority of the typical Jewish doctors' patients were not their coreligionists, but Gentiles, who eagerly sought their services. These especially included the wealthy and the powerful, often church authorities at the highest levels, despite repeated ecclesiastic prohibitions on Christians consulting Jewish physicians.

What made Jewish doctors so highly attractive to Gentile patients? The reasons partly coincided with those that made the medical profession attractive to Jews. Gentiles were aware of the comparatively high level of intellect and learning among the Jews, and they appreciated the Jewish respect for the body and the Jewish value for human life in this world. Sometimes a more mundane economic factor was also in play. Late medieval Gentile physicians accused their Jewish colleagues of, in the time-honored mercantile tradition, undercutting the going rate.

But part of the Gentiles' attraction to Jewish doctors was less rational, especially in ages past, when medicine was at best grounded in pseudoscientific theory and when folk remedies and superstition were widespread. Jews were often thought to have access to dark powers, of which a good Christian could not or should not have knowledge, that might be drawn upon to effect a miracle cure. Also beyond the realm of the rational is the psychoanalytic explanation: the affect-laden image in the Gentile patient's mind of the Jew as moralistic Old Testament father figure and of the Jewish doctor as paternal herald of punishment for or (hopefully) relieve from the patient's misdeeds.

Biblical and Talmudic Background

As with most prescientific medical systems, the Babylonian and Egyptian approach to illness in the ancient Middle East was a mix of supernatural causation and cures brought about by gods and malevolent and benevolent spirits, various magical and superstitious beliefs, medicaments and remedies discovered by trial and error, and empirical practical techniques.

With the appearance of Jews on the world stage in the second millennium BCE, the concept of the supernatural causation and cure of disease remained, but it was now (at least in principle) in the power of the One God. The great contribution of the biblical Jews to medicine was in the area of public health, most notably the anti-contagion measures in the Torah.

It was in the Diaspora, under the rabbinical system (many rabbis were in fact also physicians), that Jews began to be identified with medicine. The Talmud, although containing no specifically medical text, included hundreds of medical and health references and anatomical observations (particularly with reference to animals, in connection with kosher regulations).

The Islamic Era

Jewish preeminence in medicine began around the dawn of the second millennium CE, when Islamic civilization was in its golden age. Although Mohammed had initially waged war against Jews, Islam evolved into a relatively tolerant social system after its aggressive expansion across an area ranging from Spain to present-day Pakistan. It was the respect for the learning of others by Islamic scholars (who were themselves usually not great innovators) that brought about the golden age.

In ancient Greece and the Roman Empire, philosophers and physicians—Aristotle, Hippocrates, Galen—had established a rational medicine based on natural philosophy rather than on magic or the supernatural. But with the fall of the Roman Empire in the mid-fifth century CE, the ancient texts fell into disuse as Europe slid into the Dark Ages. This rational medicine was revived and expanded upon by the physicians in the Islamic world.

Most prominent of the many Jewish physicians of the Islamic era was Maimonides (Rabbi Moses ben Maimon [1135–1204]). Driven from Spain as a child when an intolerant Islamic sect came to power, Maimonides went to North Africa and eventually settled in Cairo, where he served as chief physician to the caliph.

Authoring 10 medical books based largely on Greco-Roman doctrine, Maimonides expounded on subjects such as diet, poisons and antidotes, and medicaments (wisely urging moderation). As spiritual leader as well as physician, he wrote on Maimonides was arguably the leading Jewish philosopher and intellectual of the Middle Ages. He codified the Talmud and wrote a number of works interpreting Jewish religion in rational terms in light of the Aristotelian philosophy, in vogue in his day. He was also one of the outstanding physicians of Egypt at the time. His thought and work are still studied and carry influence in contemporary Jewish life. (National Library of Medicine) mental health and advocated a variation of Aristotle's golden mean. Maimonides' medical aphorisms formed a handy compendium for practicing physicians.

European Reawakening

The waning of the golden age of Islamic civilization coincided with the emergence of Christian Europe from the Dark Ages into the High Middle Ages. With this came the transfer of philosophical and scientific knowledge, particularly medical, from the Islamic to the Christian world, largely via Jewish physicians as a result of the centuries-long Reconquista of Iberia by the Christians, the expulsion of all nonconverted Jews from Spain in 1492 (and soon from Portugal), and the persecution by the Inquisition of (nominal) converts.

Multilingual Jewish physicians, such as Judah ibn Tibbon, the "father of translators," carried the medical knowledge of Hippocrates and Galen, which had been elaborated upon, expanded, and systematized by the likes of Maimonides into Europe, especially southern France.

Beginning in the seventh century, Catholic church ordinances repeatedly restricted, or forbade outright under pain of excommunication, the consulting of Jewish physicians by the faithful. Nevertheless, Gentiles were so in awe of Jewish medical knowledge that various loopholes were found. Popes, bishops, kings, and princes regularly had Jewish court physicians. As for the general population, it has been estimated that Jews constituted half of all physicians in the late Middle Ages, although only about one in a hundred Europeans were Jewish.

Iberian Jews hounded by the Inquisition found a welcome in the Netherlands, a predominantly Protestant country in rebellion against their Catholic-Spanish Habsburg overlords. Iberian-Jewish doctors served the Dutch royal court and were central to the drama around the heresy accusations against philosopher Spinoza (1632–1677), who, although not a physician, made crucial contributions to psychology and to the mind-body debate.

Modern Europe

The great scientific, artistic, and intellectual advances of the Renaissance and Enlightenment were taking place, somewhat ironically, at a time of increased ghettoization and intellectual isolation of the Jews in most Central and Western European countries (partly because of the policies of the rabbis). Fortunately, Jewish physicians, the only university-educated Jews, could serve as conduits to their communities of the developments in larger European society.

Europe's first universities, founded from the 11th century onward, were church institutions from which Jews were, in principle, excluded. (Jewish doctors, like most Christian physicians, learned medicine as apprentices to older practitioners.) But Padua in Italy regularly made exceptions for Jewish medical students. The Dutch universities, beginning with Leiden in the 16th century, were nondiscriminatory. In the 18th century, German universities began to allow Jews to matriculate in medicine. (Rabbis, for their part, were wary about letting young Jews be exposed to modern science and philosophy; but they granted dispensation for the study of medicine.)

Practical progress in medicine was painfully slow. The Greco-Roman doctrines, which although rationally based were generally fallacious, were superseded by new anatomical research (observations, postmortem dissections, experimentation) and advances in chemistry and physics. Various new medical theories were propounded, but these seldom resulted in effective treatments.

However, as the 19th century progressed, a veritable explosion of medical knowledge took place, particularly in the German-speaking lands, as researchers with their newly perfected microscopes focused on the subvisible world, and modern chemistry was applied to biology. Not by chance, this coincided with the gradual political emancipation of the Jews and their increasing participation in wider society. Whatever differences there had been between the Jewish and the Gentile practice of medicine largely disappeared in modern industrialized countries. (Folkloric practices continued, however, among “healers” in less advanced Jewish communities.) The contributions of Jewish medical men—increasingly assimilated, sometime irreligious or apostate—now reached new heights. Particularly noteworthy was the Jewish role in the triumph over pathogenic microorganisms, the scourges of humankind since time immemorial.

A great pioneer of the germ theory of communicable diseases was Jacob Henle (1809–1885) in Berlin, Heidelberg, and Göttingen. Rober Remak (1815–1865) in Berlin elucidated, among many other things, the concept of cell division (including microorganisms) and was instrumental in disproving the fallacy of spontaneous genetation. Ferdinand Cohn (1828–1898), professor of botany in Breslau, pioneered the concept of specific etiology: that for any given infectious disease there is a specific strain of microorganism as its causative agent.

Arguably the greatest Jewish doctor of all time was the physician-chemist Paul Ehrlich (1854–1915). As professor in Berlin and Frankfurt, Ehrlich pioneered the field of immunology: the body's natural defense against pathogenic microorganisms and toxins. (For this he shared the Nobel Prize in 1908 with the Russian half-Jewish immunologist Eli Metchnikoff of the Pasteur Institute in Paris.) Ehrlich went on to tame the scourge of syphilis by creating Salvarsan ("safe arsenic"), the first rationally developed chemotherapeutic agent for any disease.

In Vienna, Sigmund Freud (1856–1939) began by making important contributions to neurology, particularly to the study of aphasia. But he then went on to develop his revolutionary (nonphysiological) model of the mind, with emphasis on unconscious forces and the role of early childhood in personality development.

In the early decades of the 20th century, Karl Landsteiner (1868–1943) in Vienna established blood group classification (Nobel Prize 1930). During World War I, the Polish hematologist Ludwik Hirsfeld established the geographic distribution of these blood groups. (The Nazis later perverted their work to use against the Jews.) At Oxford during World War II, the German refugee chemist Ernst Boris Chain was instrumental in developing penicillin (Nobel Prize 1945).

For each of these European Jewish medical luminaries there were many others, too numerous to mention, making vital contributions to every field of medicine. Up to mid-century, 13 Nobel Prizes had been awarded to Jewish physicians, the majority of them European. Furthermore, the number of practicing Jewish physicians in all fields was wildly disproportionate. In Germany in the early 20th century, one-sixth of all physicians were drawn from a Jewish population of less than 1 percent. All that changed with the Holocaust, and with the rise of the United States as a medical superpower.

The American Century

Records of Jewish doctors in the British American colonies date back to the 17th century. But notwithstanding some important discoveries, America's contributions to world medicine—whether by Gentiles or Jews—lagged far behind those of Europe up to the turn of the 20th century. This was largely because of the generally appalling state of U.S. medical schools, most of which were diploma mills.

The transformation of American medicine and medical education was largely due to the brothers Simon Flexner (1863–1946) and Abraham Flexner (1866–1959) of Louisville, Kentucky. Simon headed the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Science in New York, which focused on fundamental biomedical research, for three decades after its founding in 1901. In 1910, Abraham (a nonphysician educator) issued, under the auspices of the Carnegie Foundation, the Flexner report, which resulted in the closing of most U.S. medical schools and the radical upgrading of the others, with higher admission standards and basic biomedical sciences in the curriculum. (Ironically, in the first half of the 20th century, the admission of eminently qualified Jewish students to most U.S. medical schools would be limited by a quota system.)

Among the several early 20th-century American-Jewish breakthroughs in medicine were the principles of manipulative biological engineering of German-born Jacques Loeb (1859–1924) at the Rockefeller Institute, and Austro-Hungarian-born Joseph Goldberger's (1874–1929) elucidation that the epidemiology of pellagra in the southern states was attributable to a vitamin deficiency and not to microbes.

The most historic American-Jewish contribution to medicine to date was that of the soil biologist Selman Waksman (1888–1973) at Rutgers University's Agricultural College. The Ukrainian-born Waksman was part of the wave of millions of East European Jews who were changing the face of American Jewry and American medicine. Streptomycin, the original antibiotic developed by Waksman from the exudes of Actinomyces soil microorganisms, proved devastatingly effective against the age-old scourges of tuberculosis and bubonic plague, and it won Waksman the Nobel Prize in Medicine in 1952.

Recent Developments and Future Trends

The second half of the 20th century saw the transition of American (and Western) medicine into an industry characterized by billion-dollar investments in high-tech facilities, predominantly involved with the chronic and complex health problems—cardiovascular disease, cancers, mental and psychosomatic afflictions, genetic defects, and geriatric care—of an advanced and prosperous society.

Presently, one in six or seven of all American medical doctors are Jewish, but this proportion is far greater at the top echelons of the profession. From 1952 to 2007, 40 Jewish MDs and PhDs—the great majority American, including several refugees and three women—have been awarded the Nobel in medicine/physiology. Their contributions have ranged from neurology to microbiology, cardiology, oncology, pharmacology, endocrinology, and beyond.

An apparent trend around the turn of the 21st century has been a decline in Jewish applicants to U.S. medical schools, presumably because of a certain socio-economic complacency and the somewhat diminished status of physicians in the evolving health care system. But, as noted, the reasons for Jewish identification with medicine are many and have varied through the ages. The 1,000-year tradition of medicine as the Jewish profession can be expected to continue strongly in the new millennium.

Selected Bibliography

- Friedenwald, Harry. 1944. Jews and Medicine: Essays. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins.
- Heynick, Frank. 2002. Jews and Medicine: An Epic Saga. Hoboken, NJ: KTAV.
- Preuss, Julius. 1911. Biblical and Talmudic Medicine. Translated from the German by Fred Rosner. Repr. Northvale, NJ: Jason Aronson, 1993.

Freud, Judaism, and the Emergence of Psychoanalysis

Frank Heynick

---

As one of the most important Jewish thinkers of all time, Sigmund Freud (1856–1939), the originator of the psychoanalytic model of the mind and of the corresponding method of psychotherapy, influenced Western thought for most of the 20th century. He once asked with regard to psychoanalysis, “Why did it have to wait for an absolutely irreligious Jew?” This question was rather rhetorical, for Freud was well aware of how his particular intellect and personality and their Jewish component reacted with the mix of sociocultural, religious, political, and scientific currents in Vienna to produce and advance psychoanalysis.

Background: Society, Politics, and Medicine in Vienna

In the second half of the 19th century, the Jews of Vienna experienced an escalation in their socioeconomic status, profiting from free trade across the Austro-Hungarian Dual Monarchy, industrialization, the benevolent protection of Emperor Francis Joseph, and a national government drawn largely from the middle class, which included Jewish ministers. However, stock market crashes and scandals led to a popular disillusionment and to a rise of Austro-Germanic nationalism and anti-Semitism. Karl Lueger, elected mayor of Vienna in 1895, was overtly hostile to Jews in his rhetoric, if not necessarily in his policies.

Although Vienna was continually fed by an influx of traditional Ostjuden (Eastern European Jews), the city had been a center of the Haskalah (Jewish Enlightenment), and was now a focus of modernism, to which Jews who were loosened from their traditional moorings (sometimes nominal converts to Christianity) were contributing mightily. Josef Popper-Lynkeus expounded the concept of aesthetic beauty and technology for its own sake; Ludwig Wittgenstein developed the philosophy of science called logical positivism; Arnold Schönberg began experimenting with “atonal” Lieder.

In the field of medicine, the latter decades of the 19th century were a time of breathtakingly rapid progress, particularly in the German-speaking countries of Europe, as the subvisible world of cells, microorganisms, and molecules revealed their secrets to microscopists and biochemists. In Vienna, as elsewhere, a wildly disproportionate number of doctors were Jewish, and they were contributing to advances in medicine and surgery. But in the new age of medical specialization, the prejudiced academic powers that be were channeling young Jewish doctors into more marginalized specialisms such as ophthalmology and dermatology—and psychiatry.

Yet if some Jewish doctors were being pushed into psychiatry, many others were drawn to it, for the Jews of late 19th century Vienna were facing mental pressures different from any in past Jewish history. For centuries, Diaspora Jewish physicians and philosophers, such as Maimonides, had written on the means of attaining spiritual well-being, often in a sea of hostile humanity. Their compass was the age-old Jewish religious and cultural values. Now, however, Jews were being set adrift in an era of modernity that they themselves were doing so much to create.

Freud and Judaism

As a rationalist of the modern age, Freud, throughout his adult life, rejected all religion beliefs, even likening them to neuroses. But Freud strongly identified himself as a Jew, feeling an amorphous spiritual bond with the Jewish people. He proudly drew upon the Jewish rational tradition, exemplified by the likes of Spinoza, which he credited for the freedom of thought that allowed him to develop psychoanalysis. He furthermore expressed admiration for the moral teachings of Judaism, and saw psychoanalysis as facilitating the channeling of instinctual drives for the work of civilization.

Freud also repeatedly identified himself as culturally Germanic. However, the rise of anti-Semitism served only to strengthen his identification with the Jewish people. He consistently opposed conversion, seeing it as inherently dishonest. Freud furthermore credited his Jewish spirit of not conforming to the majority with providing him with the fortitude to overcome the medical establishment's strong opposition to his theories.

Freud's Development of Psychoanalysis

Freud studied medicine at the University of Vienna, specializing in psychiatry-neurology. (His middle-class merchant father had moved the family from Freiberg, today Pribor, Czech Republic, when Sigmund was three years old.) In the new era of Sigmund Freud devised the therapy for mental disorders known as psychoanalysis, which involves uncovering repressed psychological traumas so that the patient can confront and overcome them. Although the specifics of many of his theories no longer command the wide acceptance they once did, the general framework for psychotherapy that he created has exercised an enormous influence on the theory and practice of psychology. (Library of Congress) rapid advances in anatomical research, cellular biology, and biochemistry, young Dr. Freud was first attracted to the neurological side of the field. Among his important contributions was his study of aphasia—major disruptions of language due to gross physical trauma or stroke.

But in the 1890s, Freud was increasingly drawn to more subtle language disturbances, such as slips of the tongue, and was particularly intrigued by the strange features of dreams, which he regarded as a language of sorts. Through analysis of speech and dreams, and retrieval of memories of early childhood, Freud developed his model of the mind.

Freud theorized that the thinking of infants and young children operates according to a set of primary processes that are governed by such nongrammatical features as displacements, condensations, and reversals. With the acquisition of verbal language, the primary processes are superseded as the conscious manner of functioning by the secondary processes, which operate by the rules of grammar and logic. The primary processes, however, are not banished from the mind, for they remain the manner of functioning of the unconscious.

Essential in Freud's theory of psychopathology was the belief that the unconscious part of the adult mind is the repository not only of an infantile-childlike mode of thinking but also of a thought content derived from the early years of life. This includes unsocialized instinctual drives, jealousies, traumas, and the like, particularly of a sexual nature: the Oedipus complex in boys and the Electra complex in girls. Such unconscious complexes are at the root of adult neuroses: personality disturbances, maladaptive interpersonal relations, mood disorders, phobias, obsessions, and fixations.

Freud's therapeutic treatment involved shedding light on the unconscious complexes and thereby neutralizing their influence. Access to the unconscious by the conscious mind is blocked by the psychological agency that Freud termed the "censor." But indications of the unconscious content of the psyche are revealed by primary-process interference with everyday speech (Freudian slips such as unintended word substitutions and neologisms) and—more dramatically because the censor is less on guard at night—by the primary-process features of dreams (such as symbol substitutions and composite images). Free-associating by a patient to these elements under guidance of an analyst serves to further reveal the unconscious complexes and retrieve crucial memories from early childhood.

Various cultural and artistic works—paintings, sculptures, literature, myths, fairy tales, humor, theater, and cinema—are theoretically likewise products of an interplay of the unconscious and conscious regions of the mind. Freud and his disciples applied his theory to analyze these as well.

Psychoanalysis and Jewishness

There is nothing particularly Jewish in psychoanalytic theory as outlined here, except that Freud proudly drew upon the rationalist strain of Judaism. (It is questionable whether he may also have been influenced by Hasidic and Talmudic views on dreams and their interpretation.) Freud's patients were, like Freud himself, largely middle-class Jews; however, he considered his discoveries to be applicable to the human condition in general.

Noteworthy is that Freud's fascination with dreams was clearly enhanced by Jewish conflicts and concerns on a societal level. Several of his dreams and their analysis, which are presented in The Interpretation of Dreams, involved matters of academic barriers, assimilation, and the temptations of (nominal) conversion (e.g., his Rome series of dreams). In such cases, Freud provides few if any indications of Oedipal or other early childhood roots to the conflicts, although he maintained in principle that such complexes are ultimately the driving force behind virtually all dreams.

Almost all of the members of Freud's inner circle of disciples were Jewish, and Freud was concerned that psychoanalysis would be viewed as a Jewish national affair. He therefore saw the Swiss Protestant psychiatrist Carl Gustav Jung as his crown prince until Jung, who was ever more deeply involved in a mysticism antithetical to Freud, broke with the psychoanalytic movement in 1913 to develop his own depth psychology.

When Hitler came to power in Germany, Jung opportunistically touted his psychological doctrine as an Aryan alternative to Jewish psychoanalysis. Jung's flirtation with Nazism was rather brief, but Freud's doctrines were a target of many anti-Semites as being destructive to the Germanic soul. In the wake of the Anschluss of Austria with Germany in 1938, Freud, thanks to his international fame, was able to find refuge in London, where he died, a Jewish exile, the following year.

Selected Bibliography

- Bakan, David. 1958. Sigmund Freud and the Jewish Mystical Tradition. Repr. Boston: Beacon, 1975.
- Gay, Peter. 1978. Freud, Jews and Other Germans: Masters and Victims in Modernist Culture. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Gilman, Sandor L. 1993. The Case of Sigmund Freud: Medicine and Identity at the Fin de Siècle. Baltimore: John Hopkins University Press.
- Heynick, Frank. 1993. Language and Its Disturbances in Dreams: The Pioneering Work of Freud and Kraepelin Updated. New York: John Wiley & Sons.
- Heynick, Frank. 2002. "Vienna, City of Dreams." In Jews and Medicine: An Epic Saga, 363–398. Hoboken, NJ: KTAV.
- Robert, Marthe. 1977. From Oedipus to Moses: Freud's Jewish Identity. Translated from the French by Ralph Manheim. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul.
- Yerushalmi, Yosef Hayim. 1991. Freud's Moses: Judaism Terminable and Interminable. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Sephardi, Oriental, and Ashkenazi Ethnicities and Culture

Jews under Muslim Rule

Frederick Schweitzer

---

The heyday of the Jews in the Arab-Islamic world was 800 to 1250, when a near equality prevailed in those spheres that were not specifically religious, notably economic activity. Many centuries of political instability, economic deterioration, and military defeats followed. The exception to prolonged decline was the Ottoman Empire, the greatest Muslim state in history, in which Jews flourished so long as the empire flourished, to about 1700; in its successor, modern Turkey, Jews continue to enjoy acceptance. Although there is an anti-Semitic infrastructure extant in Islam, it is clear that Jews were much better off under Islam than in Christendom. References to Jews in the Koran are mostly negative, and the positive references were consistently ignored or explained away by Muslim interpreters. The Koran requires “abasement and poverty” for Jews, and Muhammad’s expulsion of Jewish tribes from Medina was a compelling precedent much invoked by later Muslim authorities. The hadith (tradition, law, legend) is scathing in attacking Jews as debased, cursed, anathematized forever by God; cheats and traitors; defiant and stubborn; murderers of the prophets; and liars who falsify scripture and take bribes. As infidels they are considered ritually unclean, a foul odor emanating from them—such is the image of the Jew in classical Islam, degraded and malevolent. Although they allegedly tried to poison him, the Jews could not be condemned as killers of Muhammad, who, in any event, was neither a Jew nor a god.

Jews (and Christians) had the status of dhimmis (protected minority). The dhimma code was intended to degrade and humiliate individuals as well as the religious community. It specified that dhimmis had to pay heavier taxes and wear clothes and insignia distinguishing them from Muslims (the yellow badge originated in Islam). In addition, they were barred from holding public office, bearing arms, riding a horse or mule, or intermarrying with Muslims. Dhimmis were disqualified as witnesses in litigation involving Muslims, they had to swear a demeaning oath, and they could not erect new or repair old synagogues or proselytize or hold public religious processions (including funeral corteges). Later provisions prohibited dhimmis from adopting Arab names, studying the Koran, and selling alcoholic beverages. Thus, Muslim antipathy for Jews is a much more normal form of antagonism of one people, or one religion, for another than the Christian-Jewish encounter. Dhimma discrimination was often merely theory, and de facto toleration usually prevailed. Nevertheless, the code constituted a perpetual potential menace to the dhimmis—a danger that materialized whenever a revolutionary or pious ruler came to power. Dhimmitude was repeatedly invoked down to the present as the proper status of Jews, one of legal inequality and social inferiority, hedged about by humiliation and contempt, institutionalized, religiously ordained, and utterly routine, yet far better than in Christian Europe.

The dhimma system and Jewish status in Islamic society have been the subject of varied judgments, from the older golden age school to the recent revisionists' persecution and pogrom interpretation. The traditional school follows the pro-Islamic Jews, who were pioneering and empathetic historians of Islam, especially of the Arab and Ottoman periods. In response to Christian persecutions, from the Crusades on, which victimized Jews and Muslims alike, such scholars propounded the myth of a golden age or several great ages—notably Muslim Spain—when Jews prospered in economic freedom and presumably enjoyed equality and acceptance virtually undisturbed by persecution or discrimination; these pioneering scholars ignored the historical record of pervasive humiliation, discrimination, and periodic violence in a kind of solidarity with fellow Semites in the face of Christian hostility. The myth, says Bernard Lewis, was fashioned by Jews “as a reproach to Christians” and is now taken up by Muslims—invoking putative golden ages—“as a reproach to Jews” (Lewis 1973, 130, 134–135). According to Arab-Muslim claims, frequently reiterated since 1948, Jews always enjoyed equality and social harmony under Islam. Under the yoke of dhimmitude, Muslim-Jewish relations were good because Jews were held in check and Muslims were thus protected from them; the demise of the system, first under Western colonial rule, then the rebirth of Israel meant that Jews were supposedly dangerous to Muslims and Islam.

Such idealization of the past ignores a catalogue of polemics, forced conversions (in some instances victims were allowed to return to Judaism but from the 12th century the theological argument surfaced that Muhammad had promised 500 years of tolerance, after which, if the Messiah had not come, Judaism would be outlawed and forced conversions legalized), expulsions, and massacres. It did not take much to trigger violence when Jews were addressed in such forms as “carrion, sons of carrion” and identified by a yellow badge or its equivalent. Rumors and accusations that a Jew or the Jews had blasphemed Muhammad, insulted Islam, defamed a Muslim, molested a Muslim woman, desecrated a mosque, or apostatized after conversion to Islam could cause an explosion. Expulsions of Jews by the first caliphs were inauspicious. Hostile attitudes manifested in the ninth century resulted in persecution and outbreaks of violence that took a heavy toll, and there is record of a great many Jews expelled from Baghdad by the supposedly liberal caliph, al-Ma'mun. Anti-Semitic propaganda of the 10th and 11th centuries made Jews out to be untrustworthy, treacherous oppressors, and exploiters of Muslims, which inspired outbreaks of violence and caused many casualties. In 1012–1019, Caliph al-Hakim of Fatimite Egypt expelled all the dhimmis who refused conversion to Islam; the last century of Mamluk Egypt, until the Ottoman conquest in 1517, was one of outright persecution, extreme discrimination, and extortionate taxation. The Jews of Baghdad suffered severe persecution in the years 1120–1121, again in 1291, and throughout the 14th century from a brutal, persecutory enforcement of the dhimma code. Morocco's rulers had forcibly moved many of its Jews to the mellah of Fez, a ghetto intended to protect them but that turned into a trap in 1465, when a Jewish vizier was assassinated, the signal, as it often was, to unleash a pogrom on the mellah and touch off a wave of massacres across the country. Thereafter Morocco's history is punctuated every few years to the end of the 19th century with anti-Jewish violence and depredations.

Jews also suffered violence and ghettoization in Muslim-controlled Spain. There were violent outbreaks in Cordoba in 1011, and Granada's Jewish quarter was wiped out in 1066, because some Jews were wealthy and others, as royal officials, exercised authority over Muslims—that is, they “oppressed” Muslims. In 1090, the Almoravids conquered Muslim Spain, destroying Granada's Jewish quarter again. The fanatical Almohads conquered North Africa and most of Muslim Spain from 1147 to 1160, proceeding with widespread massacres and forcing the dhimmis to accept Islam or perish by the sword. This development appalled the great sage Maimonides—his family had fled from Spain to Egypt—who lamented that “no nation has ever done more harm to Israel. None has matched it in debasing, humiliating, and hating us” (Cohen 1994, 198). A Muslim poem of the 11th century dubs the Jews a criminal people and complains that society is collapsing because Jews, having accumulated great wealth and power, exploit and betray the Muslims—the poet urges as a religious duty the assassination of viziers and other appointed Jewish officials in order to end their usurpation and domination. The poet also claims that Jews worship the devil, and, as required by Jewish law, they poison food and water just as physicians poison their patients. The poem reprises most of the anti-Semitic accusations made against Jews in medieval and early modern Europe, including ritual murder.

Yemeni Jews, who were perennial targets of riot and forced conversion, were expelled to a desert region near the Red Sea in 1678, which caused great suffering and cost many lives before they were allowed to return in 1681. Persia, the modern Iran, has a long history of persecuting Jews, and from 1500 to 1900 the condition of Jews there seems to have been worse than elsewhere under Islamic rule; Shia Islam regards Jews as ritually impure and unclean, and thus Jews, among other indignities, were compelled to remain indoors when it rained so that their impurity would not wash off on Muslims. Physical attack and forced conversion en masse to Islam were commonplace, creating many crypto-Jews like those of Spain and Portugal.

The Damascus blood libel of 1840 was instigated by Arab Christians and supported by the French ambassador: after many arrests, the torture of suspects, mob violence, several murders, and forced conversions, Western governments intervened with the result that the prisoners were released and the Ottoman sultan issued a decree denouncing blood libel as a baseless fabrication. Nevertheless, many accusations of ritual murder occurred in later decades in Syria, Lebanon, Palestine, and Egypt and are rife in anti-Semitic propaganda throughout the Middle East since 1967. Arab anti-Semitic writings date from the decades after the Damascus affair, when European anti-Semitism was introduced by Westerners and funneled into the Middle East by Arab Christians. It was Islamized by 1900 by reference to the Koran and hadith; the motif of eternal Jewish conspiracy was confirmed by the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, first translated by a Lebanese Maronite Christian priest in 1925, and, equally pernicious, August Rohling's Talmud Jew, which appeared in 1899. Later, Hitler's Mein Kampf and Henry Ford's International Jew were added to these anti-Semitic best sellers.

The end of the Diaspora in Arab lands, reducing more than 800,000 Jews to less than 50,000 by the 1990s, is a unique series of expulsions. The Arab-Israeli conflict since 1948 was a catalyst rather than its cause. From the 1920s and 1930s, and especially during World War II in those areas under German, Italian, or Vichy French occupation and influence, the foundations of every major Jewish community were undermined by repeated violence initiated by Arab governments or mob actions: supposedly spontaneous riots and assaults; massacres and pillage that destroyed homes, businesses, and synagogues; mass arrests and internments; assets frozen and property sequestered; citizenship canceled, rendering Jews stateless in a process of denaturalization; designation of Zionism as a crime in the penal code; spurious trials and public hangings of so-called spies; and demands and orders to leave with only the clothes on their backs alternating with prohibitions on movement or departure. In any year and in any Arab country, this statement by a Jewish reporter about a pogrom in Constance, Algeria, would be valid: “[A]ll of [Arab] North Africa presents at this moment [1934] the aspect of a volcanic territory, at the center of which an explosion can erupt from one instant to the next” (Stillman 1991, 365). Following are some examples: in 1929, Palestinian Arab rioters killed 129 Jews (mostly defenseless elderly pilgrims) at the Western Wall in Jerusalem; in 1936, murderous riots occurred widely in Palestine and spread to cities of neighboring countries; in 1937–1939, there was much pillaging of Jewish private and communal property in many areas of the Middle East; in 1941, there was a terrible pogrom in Baghdad when the pro-German regime was overthrown as the British army approached; in 1941, Italian forces in Libya cleared out extensive areas, deporting Jews to internment camps and labor brigades where many died of disease or exposure or shootings of accused collaborators; in 1942–1943, German military occupation of much of North Africa led to the Nazi brutality of roundups and forced labor, beatings and shootings, and confiscation of property, especially in Tunisia in the last stages of the campaign; in French Algeria, the Vichy racial laws were imposed followed by the familiar gamut of internments, slave labor, confiscations, and high casualties; in 1944 and each year thereafter, culminating in 1948 with Israel’s rebirth, there were incessant anti-Semitic incitement and anti-Zionist riots with much pillage and loss of life throughout the Arab world. Conditions, said a Jewish observer in 1949, are “unbearable materially, economically as well as morally” and compel us to get “free of this hell” (Stillman 1991, 155). And so, Libya, Yemen, Aden, Iraq (where Jews had lived for 2,500 years), and Syria were virtually emptied of their Jewish populations. Having always been closed to Jews in modern times, Saudi Arabia had no Jewish community to demean or expel. Egyptian Jewry’s turn came with Gamal Nasser’s nationalization of the Suez Canal and the 1956 war with Britain, France, and Israel. France’s withdrawal from its North African colonies brought independence to Morocco (its Jewish community of a quarter million was the largest in Arab lands), Tunisia, and eventually Algeria. To the traditional Judeophobia, these countries added an intolerant nationalism that turned the isolated Jewish communities into alien entities, with the result that the Jews fled (mostly to France, because they were French citizens). The final episode was a last exodus from Tunisia after the bloody and destructive riots sparked by the Six-Day War of 1967.

Selected Bibliography

- Cohen, Mark R. 1994. Under Crescent and Cross: The Jews in the Middle Ages. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Lewis, Bernard. 1984. The Jews of Islam. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Perry, Marvin, and Frederick M. Schweitzer. 2007. Antisemitic Myths: Historic and Contemporary Texts. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Stillman, Norman A. 1979. The Jews of Arab Lands: A History and Source Book. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America.
- Stillman, Norman A. 1991. The Jews of Arab Lands in Modern Times. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America.
- Wistrich, Robert S. 2002. Muslim Anti-Semitism: A Clear and Present Danger. New York: American Jewish Committee.

History of the Religious Leadership of Oriental Jewry

Menachem Ben-Sasson

---

The organization of Jewish public life during the early Islamic period has been sketched many times in a consistent portrait: several centralized, super-communal institutions located in Babylonia and the Land of Israel stood at the top of a hierarchy. Claiming sacred authority, they prevented the rise of independent, local Jewish communities. Only with the decline of these central institutions did new, super-communal networks develop among Jews in Egypt, Yemen, North Africa, and Spain. By usurping the powers and responsibilities of the old sacred centers, however, the new regional centers in turn blocked the development of local Jewish communities in Islamic lands. Such a highly organized picture of the central institutions governing the Jews of Islamic lands distorts the image of their society, which has been depicted within either a Geonic or a Mediterranean framework. Moreover, the tendency has been to overlook specific societal features, such as local and family identities, in order to present a simplified and unified historical picture.

This study offers an alternative description of Jewish intercommunal relations during the Geonic and the classical Genizah periods, from the 8th to 13th centuries CE, dealing with Rabbinite communities throughout the Islamic world. Focus will be on the variegated nature and sophistication of intercommunal relations during the Geonic and Genizah periods and the stages in the rise of local Jewish communities in Islamic lands. What should emerge is an alternative institutional history of Islamic Jewish society.

Super-Communal Authorities: Image and Reality

The basic structure of Jewish leadership—its institutions and organization—was rooted in the pre-Islamic period. After the Islamic conquest the leadership of the two sacred centers in Babylonia and the Land of Israel was regarded as authoritative both by the Jews themselves and by the non-Jewish rulers of these regions. Jewish leadership in these centers was concentrated in four yeshiva institutions: the three respective Babylonian yeshivas of Sura, Pumbedita, and the Exilarch (Rosh ha-golah), and the yeshiva of the Land of Israel. Claiming to be the sole legitimate successor to the Sanhedrin—not only in name but also in function—each yeshiva demanded recognition as the absolute authority for directing Jewish life.

The centers in the Land of Israel and Babylonia both developed religious justifications for their supremacy. While the former pointed to its geographic location in the Holy Land as proof that it occupied the seat of the ancient Sanhedrin, the latter derived its absolute authority from a tradition concerning Jehoiachin, one of the last kings of Judah who was exiled by the Assyrians to Babylonia. According to legend, Jehoiachin established a yeshiva (i.e., a sanhedrin), accomplishing thereby the divine plan to transfer the teaching of the Oral Law to a more secure place than the Land of Israel, which would face mounting pressures and persecutions for more than 500 years to come. In this way Babylonia became, according to its champions, the divinely chosen place for Jews until the Last Redemption. And the word Zion came to designate a particular Babylonian virtue, excellence in study (me~zuyanim be-limmudam), rather than a geographic location. Each center's claim to authority was translated as well into the system of leadership that prevailed at its yeshiva. For generations, only members of certain sacred dynasties were permitted to hold the leading positions at these institutions—positions that invested national leadership in them as well. It should be noted that the term yeshiva was exclusively reserved at that time for these leading institutions; it never designated a local academy.

With each institution claiming absolute authority, the communities they sought to control could, in fact, play one off against the other. To avoid such maneuvering and prevent the outbreak of controversies, the eastern regions were divided into four geographical areas or reshuyot (sing. reshut): Egypt, Syria, and the Holy Land were under the yeshiva of the Land of Israel; Persia and the region east of Iraq belonged to the reshut of the Exilarch; northern and western Iraq were attached to the Gaon of Sura; and the South, including the Yemen, was under the Gaon of Pumbedita.

With the support of non-Jewish rulers, through long-established precedent and their claim to sacred supremacy, the yeshivas succeeded in exerting their power. The local Jewish communities of the reshut areas were compelled to accept the authority both of the yeshiva's head and of his local appointees; any official Jewish business done in these communities was performed, in effect, with the permission of the head of the yeshiva. Even lower officials in the local communities were nominated by the local judge, who was a member (haver) of the yeshiva and received his authority from its head. By supplying the authority for a community's activities, the yeshiva made that community its dependent. It would not be mistaken, therefore, to define the yeshiva as a super-communal institution.

The relations between these centers and the local communities are reflected in hundreds of documents discovered in the Cairo Genizah. Another important source is the detailed report of a certain Nathan ben Isaac the Babylonian (ca. 950 CE), which was based on his personal experience at the yeshiva of Sura. Impressed with his objective tone, historians have tended to give the account special weight and have, for example, accepted uncritically his periodization of Geonic leadership. At the same time, however, much has been incautiously projected from Nathan's description of the Babylonian center, and scholars have assumed that its official authority extended over all Jewish settlements in the Islamic world. Support for such an assumption has been derived from the hundreds of surviving questions, which were directed to Baghdad from the Maghreb. The evidence that thousands of dinars were sent as donations to the yeshivas of Babylonia and the Land of Israel has suggested, moreover, that the two centers maintained similar types of relations with the Diaspora. Indeed, it seemed natural to conclude that throughout the lands of the caliphate, Jewish communities remained subordinate to the centers in Babylonia and the Land of Israel and were thereby prevented from developing as independent entities. Although the Genizah discoveries have led scholars to modify Nathan's harmonious picture, there is still a tendency to project it upon Jewish communities throughout the lands of Islam.

Fragment of a document from the Cairo Genizah. (Isadore Singer, ed., The Jewish Encyclopedia, 1901)

The fault in this line of thought is that, even if Nathan's account were wholly reliable, two main points are ignored. First, Nathan never claimed that his report applied to communities outside the Reshuyot, and with more than one institution claiming absolute authority, the heads of the different yeshivas struggled constantly with each other to establish their supremacy. The official authority claimed by the centers in Babylonia and the Land of Israel extended only over the areas already mentioned. Although these centers remained the sources of authority for their Reshuyot, the communities west of Egypt appointed their own officials and did not claim the authority of the centers for their daily communal activities. Sources relating to the history of North African and al-Andalus Jewry reveal that the western communities took full responsibility for their members in both sacred and secular walks of life. Second, the existence of distinct Reshuyot did not fully alleviate tension between yeshivas, which some communities succeeded in exploiting. Outside the Reshuyot, for example, certain communities systematically approached the heads of two yeshivas with the same question in order to compare their respective Responsa. Although this practice infuriated the heads of the yeshivas, they were powerless to stop it. Within the Reshuyot, on the other hand, communities might seek to switch allegiance from one yeshiva to another. This was especially true when a community was distant from the center and the yeshiva under whose authority it lay was experiencing troubles.

Sicily: A Case of Community's Subordination

Up until now, Sicilian Jewry has been regarded in scholarship as a community influenced by the traditions and authority of Eretz Yisrael. It has even been described as one of the communities officially subordinated to Eretz Yisrael center—under the Reshut (jurisdiction and authority) of Yeshivat Eretz ha-Tzvi. However, new data and their interpretation alter this conception considerably.

The common conception of connection between Diaspora and center is based in part on estimates of donations to a particular center. Because the Sicilian communities donated monies mainly to the yeshiva of Eretz Yisrael, they were considered subordinated to that center. However, reexamination of the documents dealing with the donations of the western communities to the centers reveals an unexpected result. Although the financial share of the Eretz Yisrael center was larger than that of the Babylonian, the Sicilians, and in fact all the western communities, sent their Halachic questions to the Babylonian yeshiva.

Additionally, even at a time of tension between Babylonia and Eretz Yisrael, a prominent scholar from Sicily, Rav Matzliah b. Elyah, studied with Rav Hai Gaon in Babylonia rather than in the yeshiva of Eretz Yisrael. Rav Matzliah later became the Jewish chief judge of Sicily, which one would not expect of a community subordinate to the Eretz Yisrael yeshiva. Even during the decline of the Babylonian center, during the 1040s, the leadership in Eretz Yisrael could not have had any illusions with regard to its official authority over the Sicilian communities. As a letter to the Gaon of the Eretz Yisrael Yeshiva clearly states, his opinion in a certain Halachic issue could not automatically be accepted as he had no official authority over the communities west of Egypt.

The relations between the Diaspora Jewish communities and the Eretz Yisrael center are usually measured not only by institutional and social contacts but also by the footprint of Palestinian rites, traditions and texts in a given community. A document from 1020 in Syracuse contains a peculiar item. Among the details describing a long affair regarding one Eliyah b. al-Harar (the silk maker), the writer stresses that “Eliyah b. al-Harar took an oath in their presence [the members of the community who were present in the synagogue that Thursday] that he did not take the money, and the Torah was open [in front of him] and he read the Ten Commandments [to prove] that he did not take the money.”

It is possible to explain this way of taking an oath as reflecting the custom of Eretz Yisrael of having the Torah scroll parade and reading the Ten Commandments (but not from the scroll) and then returning the scroll to the Ark. It seems that in Syracuse, Elijah b. al-Harar actually rolled the scroll and read the Ten Commandments from it. A careful examination of documentation, both Halachic and historical, points to this as a Babylonian tradition for taking an oath on the Ten Commandments.

Elijah b. al-Harar's oath in the synagogue is a reminder of another aspect of Mediterranean Jewish social life: the procedure of complaining in front of the community about personal problems by interrupting public prayer. The traditional view in research was that the European Jewish communities had to develop this procedure because they lacked organizational tradition; this custom was adduced as another proof that these communities were the first to form that entity known as "the Jewish Community," namely, the framework of a local self-sufficient political unit in medieval Jewry.

Goitein found evidence in the Geniza of a parallel to the custom of complaining to the public and interrupting its prayers, and cited it as one of the functions of the gathering together of the community in the synagogue. He interpreted this phenomenon as a case of community functioning as tribunal. A. Grossman took up again the traditional distinction between Ashkenaz and the Muslim world and interpreted all of Goitein's evidence as post-12th century or as irrelevant to the Ashkenazi custom of stopping the prayer for private purposes.

A letter from mid-11th-century Sicily, presumably from Matzliah b. Elya to Rav Hananel of Qayrawan, mentions (as a familiar procedure) that a certain Shemuel b. Haim was "complaining and shouting" trying to find some evidence to support his legal case. After failing, he accelerated his activities: "For a few months he shut synagogues and prevented [the people of the community of Palermo] from praying."

In the light of this new piece of information, Goitein's other texts of istighatha ila 'l-yahud (to call for the Jews) and of mustaghith ila yisra'el (calling Israel for help) stand firm as proof of the existence of an almost-established procedure among Jews in Muslim lands for the individual to bring his or her complaints before the public. But, differing somewhat from Goitein's interpretation, all of these cases turn out to have revolved around a procedural issue. The public was not requested to judge as was interpreted but rather to pressure the local institutions into completing the judicial procedure according to the request of the plaintiff.

These cases, however, should be considered along with many other kinds of evidence when describing the beginnings of the local Jewish communities in Muslim lands. Roots, even common roots with the Ashkenazic communities, derived not from their divided medieval reality but from previous Jewish tradition.

The description of the Sicilian Jewish attitude toward the sacred centers of Eretz Yisrael and Babylonia described previously is insufficient to classify the Sicilian Jewish communities as typically Mediterranean. For the Sicilian case testifies to an additional type of relationship with centers. Not only did the Sicilians manifest a deferential attitude toward Eretz Yisrael, and not only did they accept almost fully Babylonian Halachic authority, but they also developed a functional dependence on the authoritative center of learning in Ifriqiya.

True Ifriqiya was a conduit for contacts with the traditional centers. This was the case with Spain, as expressed by ibn Daud when he wrote that Samuel the Nagid of Andolusia was drinking Rav Hai Gaon's water (i.e., the Torah) from Rav Nissim of Qayrawan's vessels. The relations between Ifriqiya and Sicily, however, were also based on a more essential connection with the local academy of Qayrawan. The authority of the Qayrawanese scholars among the Sicilian Jews was not official and did not enjoy the advantage of the traditional centers in the East. Rather the sages of Qayrawan were recognized because of their proximity and reputation for learning. After the Qayrawanese scholars were acknowledged by the Sicilian communities as an Halachic authority, the Sicilians began to consult with them even on topics of public concern that had no connection with Halachic issues. The regional centrality of Ifriqiya is reflected also in the sparse documents and indigenous Halachic literature of Jews from the northern shores of the Mediterranean. In the Sicilian case, unlike Spain, it was not a matter of turning away from the old, sacred centers in Babylonia and Eretz Yisrael and establishing a new one with native institutions of learning and original scholarship, but rather of becoming dependent on a new regional center in nearly North Africa.

Selected Bibliography

- Ben-Sasson, Menahem. 1987. "Egyptian Jewry in the 10th–12th Centuries: From Periphery to Center." Bulletin of the Israeli Academic Center in Cairo 8: 14–16.
- Ben-Sasson, Menahem. 1989. "The Structure, Goals, and Content of the Story of Nathan Hababli" [Hebrew]. In Culture and Society in Medieval Jewry. Studies Dedicated to the Memory of Haim-Hillel Ben-Sasson, edited by M. Ben-Sasson, et al., 137–195. Jerusalem: Zalman Shazar Center.
- Ben-Sasson, Menahem. 1991. The Jews of Sicily 825–1068: Documents and Sources. Jerusalem: Ben-Zvi Institute.
- Ben-Sasson, Menahem. 1994. "Ben Ezra Synagogue during the Medieval Period." In Synagogue, edited by Phyllis Lambert, 200–223, 259–261. London, Weidenfeld & Nicolson.
- Ben-Sasson, Menahem. 1996. The Emergence of the Local Jewish Community in the Muslim World (Qayrawan 800–1057) [Hebrew]. Jerusalem: Magnes Press.
- Ben-Sasson, Menahem. 1997. "The Emergence of the Qayrawan Jewish Community and Its Importance as a Maghrebi Community." In Judaeo-Arabic Studies: Proceedings of the Founding Conference of the Society for Judeo-Arabic Studies, edited by Norman Golb, 1–13, Vol. 3. Studies in Muslim-Jewish Relations. Amsterdam: Harwood Academic Publishers.
- Brody, Robert. 1998. The Geonim of Babylonia and the Shaping of Medieval Jewish Culture. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Cohen, Gershon D. 1960–1961. "The Story of the Four Captives." Proceedings of the American Academy for Jewish Research 29: 55–131.
- Cohen, Mark R. 1980. Jewish Self-Government in Medieval Egypt—The Origins of the Office of Head of the Jews, ca. 1065–1126. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Friedlander, Israel. 1904–1905. "An Arabic Original of the Report of R. Nathan Hababli." Jewish Quarterly Review 17: 747–761.
- Gil, Moshe. 1992. A History of Palestine 634–1099. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Goitein, Shelomo D. 1967–1993. A Mediterranean Society, 6 vols. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Goitein, Shelomo D. 1973. Letters of Medieval Jewish Traders. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Goitein, Shelomo D. 1983. The Yemenites: History, Communal Organization, Spiritual Life [Hebrew]. Jerusalem: The Ben-Zvi Institute.

- Golb, Norman. 1973. "A Judeo-Arabic Court Document from Syracuse—AD 1020." Journal of Near Eastern Studies 32: 105–123.
- Hirschberg, Haim Z. W. 1974. A History of the Jews in North Africa. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Ibn Daud, Abraham. 1967. The Book of Tradition (Sefer Ha-Qabbalah). Critical edition with a translation and notes by Gerson D. Cohen. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America.
- Lambert, P., ed. 1994. Fortifications and the Synagogue—The Fortress of Babylon and the Ben Ezra Synagogue. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson.
- Mann, Jacob. 1920–1921. "The Responsa of the Babylonian Geonim as a Source of Jewish History." Jewish Quarterly Review 11: 433–471
- Mann, Jacob. 1920–1922. The Jews in Egypt and in Palestine under the Fatimid Caliphs, Vols. I–II. Repr. New York: Ktav Publishing House, 1970.
- Mann, Jacob. 1931. Texts and Studies in Jewish History and Literature, 1. Cincinnati: HUCA Press.
- Poznanski, S. 1914. Babylonische Geonim im nachgaondischen Zeitalter. Berlin: Mayer & Muel-ler, 15–36.
- Sassoon, D. S. 1949. A History of the Jews in Baghdad. Letchworth, UK: Alcuin Press.
- Simonsohn, S. 1997–2001. The Jews in Sicily. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Stillman, N. A. 1979. The Jews of Arab Lands. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America.

Insights into Sephardic Intellectual History

Marc D. Angel

---

Although Jews lived in Spain for many centuries, little is known about their intellectual life until the 10th century when a burst of creativity emerged under the patronage of the Jewish leader Hasdai Ibn Shaprut. Through his wisdom, wealth, and political standing, Hasdai transformed Cordoba into a vibrant Jewish cultural center. Whereas Spanish Jewry had formerly relied on Babylonian rabbinic scholars for religious guidance, Hasdai's goal was to create an indigenous Spanish rabbinic and intellectual leadership.

During the 10th and 11th centuries, classic works were composed in rabbinic literature, Hebrew poetry, grammar, biblical commentary, philosophy, and ethics. This was the era of such luminaries as Rabbi Yitzhak Alfasi, who headed the rabbinic academy in Lucena; Shelomo Ibn Gabirol and Bahya Ibn Pakuda, profound philosophers who lived in Saragossa; and Judah Halevi, the premier poet of medieval Jewry, who lived in Toledo. This golden age also included the works of Abraham and Moses Ibn Ezra, Shemuel ha-Naggid, and other authors whose works are still studied today.

The most significant intellectual figure of Spanish Jewry was Moshe Maimonides (1135–1204). Born in Cordoba, his family fled Spain after the invasion of the fanatical

The synagogue in Cordoba, the birthplace of Maimonides, was built in 1315 and is one of the oldest surviving in Europe. (Ogen Perry)

Almohads in 1146. Under the Almohads, anyone who did not convert to Islam faced death or exile. Maimonides's family chose to leave, first going to Morocco and later to Egypt, where Maimonides became personal physician to the caliph. Maimonides's works in Jewish law and philosophy remain staples of Jewish learning today. His achievements as a doctor, logician, and mathematician were greatly respected by Jews and non-Jews alike. He is the foremost exemplar of rational philosophy within traditional religious Judaism.

During the 13th century, kabbalistic studies advanced in Spain. In some measure a reaction to Maimonides's devotion to reason, Kabbalah stressed the irrational, mystical elements of religion. Rabbi Yitzhak the Blind (ca. 1160–1235) and his circle of mystics turned Gerona into a major center of Kabbalah. Rabbi Moshe ben Nahman spread kabbalistic teachings through his commentary on the Torah. Late in the 13th century, Rabbi Moshe de Leon issued the Zohar, a kabbalistic text attributed to the Talmudic sage Rabbi Shimon bar Yohai. The Zohar became the classic book of Kabbalah throughout the Jewish world.

During the 14th and 15th centuries, Spanish Jewry faced new challenges because of the reconquest of Spain by Christian forces. A virulent Christianity arose that sought to convert Jews and humiliate Judaism. Jewish thinkers and leaders were compelled to engage in polemics to defend the honor and truth of Judaism and to refute the Christian slanders of Jewish tradition. In 1492, King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella gave Jews the choice of converting to Christianity or leaving Spain. Although thousands converted (with many continuing to live as crypto-Jews), many thousands more chose exile. When Portugal forbade the practice of Judaism in 1497, public Jewish life came to an end in the Iberian Peninsula after a period of more than 1,000 years.

Jewish intellectual life in Spain encompassed many fields of study. While making lasting contributions to Jewish law, philosophy, and literature, Spanish Jews also had impressive achievements in general science, medicine, mathematics, and other disciplines. A distinguishing character of Spanish Jewry was their ability to blend Torah culture with active participation in the general intellectual life of their society. Judah Halevi, Maimonides, and Nahmanides were not only Torah luminaries but also physicians. Shemuel HaNaggid was not only a Talmudist and a Hebrew poet but also a military leader and government official. Yitzhak Abravanel was not only a great biblical commentator but also a statesman in the employ of the king of Spain. These outstanding personalities reflected the general Spanish Jewish ideal of excellence in Torah study combined with excellence in worldly wisdom.

During the first several generations after the expulsion of the Jews from Spain and Portugal, Sephardic Jewry was in the process of creating a new Diaspora. Thousands of Sephardic refugees found haven in the Ottoman Empire; others settled in North Africa and the Middle East, including the Land of Israel. Some Sephardic exiles made their way to cities in Western Europe, although Catholic Europe was not particularly hospitable to Jews.

Aside from Sephardic communities established by exiles from Spain and Portugal throughout the Mediterranean world, other communities were formed by crypto-Jews who chose to return to Judaism, mainly in Western Europe. By the end of the 16th century, Amsterdam—a Protestant domain—was emerging as an attractive settlement for returnees to Judaism, and the country went on to become the major bastion of the Western Sephardic tradition.

During the 16th century, the Sephardim in Muslim lands maintained a vibrant rabbinic literature. Among the great figures were Rabbi Yosef Karo, author of the Shulhan Arukh, the classic code of Jewish law; Rabbis Moshe Cordovero and Hayyim Vital, authors of major kabbalistic works; and Rabbis David Ibn Abi Zimra and Samuel de Medina, authors of authoritative volumes of legal Responsa.

Rabbis such as Yosef Yaavets and Meir ben Gabbai were outspoken critics of philosophy. They argued that the faith of Spanish Jewry had been sapped by its rationalistic tendencies; if Sephardim had studied only traditional Jewish texts, they would have been more pious. Although some Sephardim continued to engage in philosophic speculation, the spiritual climate moved in the direction of narrowing intellectual life to the realm of rabbinic texts—including Kabbalah.

The kabbalistic/midrashic approach to religion came to predominate among the masses of Sephardim in Muslim lands. This tendency increased following the Sabbatai Sevi debacle in 1666, when his messianic pretensions were proven false. The spiritual despondency after this messianic bubble was popped was palpable. Rabbinic leadership from the late 17th through mid-19th centuries stressed the need for Jews to accept their fate with pious resignation.

The general economic and cultural decline in Muslim lands affected Jewish residents along with everyone else. As poverty became widespread, schools and yeshivas lost their sources of financial support as well as their base of students. Boys had to quit school at an early age so they could earn money for their families; education above the elementary level became a luxury. (At that time, girls received little or no formal education.) Intellectual life for the Jewish elite centered on rabbinic literature; for the masses, a lively folk culture emerged.

As Mediterranean Sephardic communities developed during the 16th and 17th centuries, ex-converso communities were established in cities of Western Europe, including Amsterdam; Paris, Bordeaux, and Bayonne, France; Hamburg, Germany; and London. During the 17th century, Western Sephardim were the pioneers of Jewish life in the New World.

The ex-converso communities in Europe were founded by people who had grown up as crypto-Jews in the Iberian Peninsula. Although publicly practicing Catholicism, they observed some Jewish religious practices in secret. While living in Spain and Portugal, the crypto-Jews feared persecution by the Inquisition, which considered Judaizing to be punishable by torture, confiscation of property, and even death.

Crypto-Jews of the first generation still had memories of having grown up with Jewish laws and traditions. Subsequent generations, though, never experienced the open observance of Judaism. Their Jewish knowledge was limited to the Bible, a smattering of prayers and religious observances, and the list of Judaizing practices issued by the Inquisition. When they returned to Judaism in Europe, they needed to study Jewish tradition almost from scratch. Their original teachers were Sephardic rabbis from Turkey, Morocco, and elsewhere in the Sephardic Diaspora.

The newcomers to the Western Sephardic communities, while living as Catholics in Spain and Portugal, had access to higher education. They were proud of their high culture, and continued to engage in the study of philosophy and literature while deepening their knowledge of Judaism.

Rabbi Manasseh ben Israel (1604–1657) of Amsterdam operated a publishing house that provided books in the vernacular for the returnees. He wrote works in Portuguese, in which he recorded the laws and practices of Judaism and explained the principles of Jewish faith. He and other rabbis (e.g., Immanuel Aboab and David Nieto) wrote important works explaining rabbinic tradition and upholding the authority of the Torah and the Oral Law. Isaac Cardoso (1604–1681) and others wrote works of Jewish apologetics defending Judaism from Christian criticisms and slanders.

By the middle of the 18th century, Spanish and Portuguese had died out as spoken languages among the Western Sephardim. They adopted the languages of the lands in which they lived and participated actively in the general cultural and commercial life.

While Western Sephardim were becoming more Westernized, Mediterranean Sephardim were becoming more insulated intellectually. The many rabbinic books published by their sages dealt almost exclusively with religious texts and topics.

The classic work of 18th-century Ladino literature was the Me'am Lo'ez, the first volume of which was published in Istanbul in 1730. Its originator, Rabbi Yaacov Huli, wrote in a genial style, with the intention of offering the Sephardic masses instruction in Torah and its commentaries, the midrash, Jewish law, ethical precepts, and so on. Upon Rabbi Huli's death in 1732, other authors continued the project in his style so as to produce volumes on the five books of the Torah and eight other biblical books. The Me'am Lo'ez was enthusiastically received and went into various editions. It reflected a deep traditionalism, reverence for rabbinic authority, and a focus on the world to come. In eschewing the vanities of this world, it taught the importance of piety, patience in the face of suffering, and faith in God's goodness. These were the general values that pervaded Sephardic rabbinic works through the 19th century.

By the mid-19th century, there were signs of an intellectual reawakening among Mediterranean Sephardim. Rabbi Yehudah Alkalai (1798–1879) called for the reestablishment of Jewish sovereignty in the Land of Israel. Well before the rise of modern Zionism, Rabbi Alkalai preached and wrote that Jews should assert themselves in shaping their own destiny. He encouraged political activity, including practical steps to create an economically viable society in the Holy Land.

Growing numbers of Sephardic intellectuals were drawn to the Haskalah, the Jewish Enlightenment. Educators called for and implemented expansive curriculums for Jewish schools taught by better-trained modern teachers. The Alliance Israelite Universelle established numerous schools throughout the Ottoman Empire, Middle East, and North Africa, in which French was the language of instruction. Students received a strong general education along with their Jewish studies.

A secular Ladino literature blossomed during the 19th century, including 75 newspapers and journals, hundreds of novels, poems, dramatic works, historical studies, and translations of French and Hebrew works. Many Sephardim found new opportunities for creative expression and communal involvement.

Among the Western Sephardic communities, intellectual life coped with the challenges of modernity. In England, Grace Aguilar (1816–1847) called for modernization of Jewish education, and especially for increased education for girls and young women. In Leghorn, Italy, Rabbi Eliyahu Benamozegh (1822–1900) wrote impressive works on Jewish ethics and the universal teachings of Judaism. In New York, Dr. Henry Pereira Mendes (1852–1937), religious leader of the historic Congregation Shearith Israel (founded 1654), presented Jewish ethical teachings in a style intended to engage Jews coping with the modern world.

Major demographic changes drastically altered Sephardic life. During the early 20th century, thousands emigrated from the Ottoman Empire and Middle East to the United States and other destinations. The Holocaust decimated European Jewry, including Sephardic communities like those in Amsterdam, Salonika, Rhodes, and Sarajevo. During the mid-20th century, hundreds of thousands of Sephardim settled in Israel, nearly emptying their former communities in North Africa and the Middle East. By the end of the 20th century, most of the Old World Sephardic communities had disappeared or shrunk. Israel is currently the main center of Sephardic Jewry, but there are also large communities in France and the Americas.

The profound demographic changes have obviously affected Sephardic intellectual life. The new generations of Sephardim are engaged in the intellectual and cultural process of understanding their communities' history and traditions, while adapting to the new cultural and intellectual patterns that have engulfed them.

Selected Bibliography

Angel, Marc D. 1991. Voices in Exile: A Study in Sephardic Intellectual History. Hoboken, NJ: Ktav Publishing House.

- Ashtor, Eliyahu. 1973, 1979, 1984. The Jews of Moslem Spain. 3 vols. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America.
- Baer, Yitzhak. 1961, 1971. History of the Jews in Christian Spain. 2 vols. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America.
- Benardete, Mair Jose. 1952. Hispanic Culture and Character of the Sephardic Jews. New York: Hispanic Institute.

Jewish Enlightenment and Its Impact on the Diaspora

Shmuel Feiner

---

From the early 18th century until the end of the 19th, relatively small groups of young maskilim (followers of the Jewish Enlightenment) from Central and Eastern Europe wrought a significant cultural revolution, one that was unprecedented in the Ashkenazi Diaspora. The appearance of the maskilim on the stage of Jewish history, as the representatives of a new intellectual elite who felt obligated to undertake the role of educating the public and providing alternative ideological leadership, augured a revolutionary move—the transfer of cultural sovereignty over the Jewish public space to new hands. An intellectual elite emerged to compete with the rabbinical, scholarly elite that held a complete monopoly over knowledge, books, cultural creation, education; supervised norms and behavior; and provided guidance to the public. This new elite adopted some of the basic values of the European Enlightenment culture, in particular humanism, religious tolerance, freedom of opinion, criticism, rationalism, and the consciousness of progress, and it regarded itself as responsible for reforming traditional society in the light of these values. Looking back, it seems as if the whole public culture of the Jews in the modern age—the book culture, the ideological debates, the new religious movements, modern politics, and the press as a forum of cultural and political discourse—all of these would not have been possible had it not been for that revolutionary breakthrough of a new Jewish intelligentsia. It was secular insofar as its source of authority and ideological fabric was concerned (albeit with a diverse spectrum of views regarding its commitment to religious tradition) and had at its center the writer, the modern Jewish intellectual. From a historical perspective, this new elite expanded cultural boundaries, raised acute questions about the place of Jews in modern Europe, and entered into a cultural conflict with emerging Orthodox elite.

This revolution had many remarkable implications. The internal Jewish public discourse left the Talmudic houses of study, the synagogues, the sermons, and the communal committee meetings and moved to the multilingual periodicals, the literary clubs, and private homes. New publications were added to the traditional Jewish library—books of science, history, geography, language, and philosophy. The religious control over knowledge was weakened and in many places changed hands.

Two major moves of the Haskalah had an enormous impact on modern Jewish culture. The Haskalah gave rise to the secular intellectual and the self-consciousness of the modern Jew and optimistically proclaimed humankind's historic shift to the new era and all its challenges. The Haskalah movement was not the first to launch the processes of modernization; it was preceded by philosophical skeptics in the Sephardic Diaspora, particularly in Amsterdam and London, who questioned the conventions of the religious tradition, and the sons and daughters of the wealthy and merchant elite in the cities of Western and Central Europe, such as Berlin, Vienna, and Hamburg, who were acculturated and whose lifestyle was in keeping with the latest fashion. However, the Haskalah was the first to construct an ideology that justified modernization, to mobilize public opinion to support it, and to suggest new directions and practices to introduce it into many spheres of Jewish life.

The cultural shift of the Haskalah began with the early Haskalah—with curiosity and a passion for knowledge and philosophy that awoke among several young men in 18th-century Central Europe who could not find intellectual satisfaction within the boundaries of the institutions, knowledge, and library of the religious elite in which they had been reared. Some of them were also filled with a sense of inferiority and wished to do away with the intolerable cultural limitation that marked the Jews in contrast to the scientific progress and expanded knowledge of the surrounding culture. A new elite of maskilim, who pursued that same science that was assigned such an inferior and external status, shunted to the sidelines as other, and denied legitimacy, emerged from the Ashkenazi religious elite that closely guarded its dominance in the public discourse and demanded a monopoly in guiding the public and shaping their spiritual world. The early maskilim contributed Hebrew works on science, philosophy, language, and Bible to the Jewish library that was being revived. The most famous and influential was Moses Mendelssohn (1729–1786), who spent most of his life in Berlin. From the standpoint of his aspiration to revitalize Jewish culture, in particular the tradition of philosophical study and Bible commentary, Mendelssohn belonged to the early Haskalah, but his works in general philosophy and literary criticism raised him to the status of a leading member of the Enlightenment elite in Germany. His fame, his widespread social connections, and the esteem in which he was held also obliged him to relate to the discussion then being conducted about how, if at all, the Jews could be integrated into the modern state and European culture. As a consummate humanist, an advocate of religious tolerance and human freedom, and an Enlightenment thinker, Mendelssohn demanded that the state and Christian society show tolerance and willingly forego the authority to supervise and coerce members of the Jewish community insofar as their religious beliefs and mode of behavior were concerned.

But the inception of the Haskalah movement was not dependent on Mendelssohn, and it would be a mistake to regard him as its leader. The first circles of maskilim were organized in the Prussian communities of Koenigsberg, Berlin, and Breslau by young Jewish students and tutors who wished to establish new frameworks in which the maskilim could gather, set up literary forums to disseminate their ideas, and form an alternative force to that of the rabbinical and communal leadership. The living spirit behind these initiatives was Isaac Euchel (1756–1804), a native of Copenhagen who, in the 1780s, was the initiator of the first circle of maskilim known as Chevrat Dorshei Lashon Ivri (Society of Friends of the Hebrew Language). A year later, the first issue of the maskilic journal Hame'asef came out, edited by Euchel and several of his friends. A few years earlier, the first modern Jewish school in the world was founded in Berlin (1778): the Chinukh Ne'arim (Education of Youth, also known as the Freischule), whose curriculum was divided between religious and secular subjects. Four years later, in 1782, Naphtali Herz Wessely (1725–1805) published an open letter entitled “Divrei shalom ve’emet” (Words of Peace and Truth) in which, for the first time, he formulated the principles of a revolutionary curriculum combining in equal measure what he called “the teaching of God” (the religious knowledge whose source was the Torah) and “the teaching of man” (the human knowledge acquired through reason and human experience). Wessely proposed this far-reaching reform in Jewish education motivated by the tolerant legislation enacted by the Austrian emperor Joseph II, aimed at reforming the Jews so they could be integrated as citizens of the state. But Wessely and his program met with a sharp protest by the rabbinical elite in Central Europe who regarded it as threat to the hegemony of the rabbis in the Jewish public arena and to the supreme value of Torah study.

Naphtali Herz Wessely, German Hebrew scholar and educator. (Isadore Singer, ed., The Jewish Encyclopedia, 1901)

At the end of the 18th century, the Haskalah in Berlin declined. The sweeping processes of modernization there left no room for the trends of the cultural renaissance of Hebrew literature led by the maskilim. But this did not mean the end of the Haskalah. Its ideas, programs, and literary works resonated in communities in which the processes of modernization were relatively slow or had not yet begun. Throughout the 19th century, centers of the Haskalah movement were established in the Austrian Empire (Vienna and Prague), and with special intensity in European communities, first in Galicia and then in the Russian Empire. Galician maskilim (Yosef Perl, Isaac Erter, Yehudah Leib Miseses, and others) regarded the pietistic movement of Hasidism as the major obstacle to the modernization of the Jews, describing it as a troubling deviation in Jewish history, one that perpetuated the ignorance of the masses, fostered superstition, and blocked progress.

In Russia, the Haskalah developed both as a continuation of the trends that began with Wessely and Mendelssohn and as a result of the Czarist policy that brought pressure to bear on the Jews in order to reduce their communal autonomy, influence them to engage in more productive economic endeavors, oblige them to send their children to government Jewish schools, and require them to fulfill civil duties, including military service. The Haskalah movement achieved the peak of its success in Russia in the second half of the 18th century, when various circles of maskilim were formed; Hebrew literature flourished, enriched by the first Hebrew novels and textbooks; and periodicals appeared in Hebrew, Russian, and Yiddish. Outstanding maskilim, such as Moshe Leib Lilienblum and Judah Leib Gordon, then demanded that the rabbis ease the burden of the Halacha that, in their view, was making the daily life of the Jews so difficult. Other maskilim, the most prominent being Peretz Smolenskin, the editor of Hashachar (The Dawn), fearful that the solidarity and cohesiveness of the Jewish world would break down in the era of modernization, warned against assimilation and the dangers of modern anti-Semitism and fostered the nationalist stream of the Haskalah.

From a historical perspective, the Haskalah was the movement that led to a cultural shift in Jewish history from several significant aspects. A literary republic, encompassing writers, journalists, publishers, editors, and literary critics emerged from the Haskalah and had a readership that showed enormous interest in expanding the cultural horizons of the Jews. New networks of communication emerged that incorporated letters, meetings, journals, and newspapers in which modern cultural life was conducted. From its inception, this literary republic thought it was also its function to mobilize public opinion for the projects of modernity initiated by the maskilim. From this standpoint, the maskilim were clearly agents of modernization. They not only protested against and criticized phenomena such as the limitation of the traditional library, the excessive authority of the rabbis, the adoration of the Hasidic leader, and the eschewal of non-Jewish cultural assets, but their rhetoric also introduced a new type of discourse. Out of optimism, and perhaps naïveté, the maskilim depicted a world picture divided between a benighted past marked by ignorance, religious fanaticism, oppression, and insularity and a present in which the sun is rising toward a better future in which all the injustices and wrongs of the past will be rectified and the Jews, together with all peoples, will partake of the happiness promised by an era of tolerance, humanism, scientific progress, freedom, and equality.

Just as the maskilim were acutely aware of modernity and the challenges it posed to Jewish traditional society and culture, they were also particularly sensitive to the question of the boundaries of Jewish modernization. The Haskalah brought the Jews of Europe a new world of books and ideas as well as new values of aesthetics, manners, tastes, and smells, and its spokespeople advocated profound reforms in consciousness and behavior. The Haskalah advocated the division of the Jewish identity into various spheres of behavior, thought, and existence, eloquently expressed by Judah Leib Gordon in his classic poem, “Awake My People”: “Be a man in the street and a Jew in your home, be a brother to your countrymen and a servant to your king.” From now on, a definition of “Jew” that embraced the ethnic, religious, cultural, and communal dimension no longer sufficed, and the unified, cohesive world was broken. Jews could now live in parallel in the all-human sphere and the civic sphere, and they could also continue to preserve their Jewish identity. Their total rejection of the option of assimilation led the maskilim to reexamine the boundaries of the modernization they aspired to. Whenever they encountered Jews who were inclined to assimilate, to abandon the Hebrew language, or even to become religiously permissive, enticed by the opportunities and temptations of life in European cities, they denounced this trend as “pseudo-Haskalah.” Although the maskilim exemplified the transition between tradition and modernity and endeavored to devise dualistic formulas to bridge the old and the new, the pseudo-maskilim in Odessa or Warsaw were depicted as frivolous assimilationists. The Haskalah represents the central position in the discourse of modernization conducted in Jewish society, and it rejected both the antimodernist enemies of Enlightenment from the Orthodox camp as well as the enemies of the unique Jewish identity and a separate Jewish existence.

Selected Bibliography

- Altmann, Alexander. 1973. Moses Mendelssohn: A Biographical Study. Philadelphia: University of Alabama Press.
- Feiner, Shmuel. 2002. Haskalah and History: The Emergence of a Modern Jewish Historical Consciousness. London: Littman Library of Jewish Civilization.
- Feiner, Shmuel. 2004. The Jewish Enlightenment. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Feiner, Shmuel, and David Sorkin, eds. 2001. New Perspectives on the Haskalah. London: Littman Library of Jewish Civilization.
- Sorkin, David. 2000. The Berlin Haskalah and German Religious Thought. London: Littman Library of Jewish Civilization.
- Sutcliffe, Adam. 2003. Judaism and Enlightenment. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Stanislawski, Michael. 1988. For Whom Do I Toil? Jehuda Leib Gordon and the Crisis of Russian Jewry. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Zipperstein, Steve J. 1985. The Jews of Odessa—A Cultural History 1794–1881. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

Beginnings of Hasidism in Eastern Europe

M. Avrum Ehrlich

---

The Hasidic revolution of the 18th century saw the emergence of certain previously dormant forms of prophetic/mystical Jewish leadership, which was considered marginal, undesirable, and even dangerous by traditional rabbinic sentiment. By their stubborn opposition to the emerging movement the Talmudic elites became known as the opposers to religious renewal, or misnagdim. In crisis due to internal and external challenges and the social economic upheaval of the oncoming era, it seemed as though circumstances were again ripe for a resurgence of mysticism and what may be closer to political euphoria, amongst the Jewish population, not dissimilar to earlier socio-messianic movements, such as Spanish expulsion of 1492, the great immigration of Spanish Jewish scholars and mystics to the Land of Israel in the mid-1500s, and the spread of Sephardi mysticism in Eastern Europe via Kabbalah study and the Sabbatean movement.

Parts of traditional Jewish society were drifting in the wake of the Jewish Enlightenment, the emergence of Hasidism, and the political tides of all of Europe. Each ideology competed for the soul of the village Jews of Eastern Europe. The mystic, miracle worker, and saint were also popular, and the emergent ideology attracted many people into a spiritual revolution, where circumstances were hardly an obstacle for spiritual awareness. The myriads of Hasidic rebbes and dynasties that sprung up within this current fused religious, Talmudic, intellectual, spiritual, psychological, cultural, and artistic components.

The Hasidic movement was formerly founded on the life and teachings of Rabbi Israel, the Ba'al Shem Tov (Master of the Good Name; 1698–1760). His teachings were disseminated by a mixed circle of Talmudic intelligentsia, mystics, and the piously disenchanting and taken on foot by of a cast of other personalities, all of whom merged to form the first generation of saints and Hasidic rebbes. The socio-religious ideology they taught weaved through many Jewish communities in the Ukraine, Poland, Hungary, and to a lesser extent in Russia. With the migration of surviving Eastern European Jews to other Diasporas, Hasidism spread throughout the Jewish world, itself institutionalizing and becoming the mainstay of Orthodox Jewish life.

The religious hierarchy of Eastern European Jewry had been governed by standards of scholarship, family wealth, and rabbinic inbreeding. Although piety and religious fervor were virtuous, the decisive requisite for eminence, marriage eligibility, or leadership was marked by Talmudic scholarship. Scholarship had been the hallmark of honor, and knowledge of the Talmudic tracts was a mark of superiority and intelligence. Prestige was attained through gymnastic feats of legal sparring and mastery over the commentaries. A good dowry ensuring many years of continuing study and a wealthy and supporting family would often culminate in appointments as rabbi of a community or a town or as a teacher in the study halls.

Without financial means, Jewish village dwellers in Ukrainian, Polish, and other Eastern European regions were increasingly removed from the scholastic world of the ever proliferating Talmudic corpus, and they were ready to cast their eyes on a more inspiring religious leader and toward a religious identity not answerable to material circumstance.

Charismatic personalities attracted more followers, even some from the disillusioned scholarly classes. The various factors that brought about the Hasidic revolution are debated: Dubnow argues that Hasidism was a spiritual palliative for “the stress and sorrow of Jewish public life.” Etkes agreed with Dubnow and points out that the early Hasidim often mingled with the upper echelons of society. This is corroborated by Rosman’s study; he argues that the Ba’al Shem Tov was both a doctor and a mystic who attracted many middle-class people to nighttime study sessions. He enjoyed the community’s patronage until his death, and privileges were handed to his son. Dinur argues that the friction between the traditional establishment intelligentsia and the unschooled masses brought on the deep-seated support for change in the religious leadership. All agree that Hasidism emerged from the relative deprivation of the Jewish masses.

The Ba’al Shem Tov was characterized by his miracle work and wonders. Recently found Polish municipal documents shed a more sobering light on his real persona as a registered doctor. He served as a healer, mystic, and teacher. It is likely that later rabbinic figures and charismatic leaders used him as a repository for their own imaginative projections and aspirations. The charismatic preacher R’ Dov Ber, also known as the Magid of Mezeritch (d. 1772), emerged as the most dominant Hasidic master after the Ba’al Shem Tov.

He attracted many hundreds of students and instructed them in mysticism and divine service. He also cultivated a more intimate group of disciples numbering approximately 30 people. Because he was considered a rabbinic scholar, versed in classic Jewish scholarship as well as mysticism, people ranging from mystical/charismatic illiterates to rabbinical figures and scholars of eminence were attracted to him, becoming the first generation of Hasidic “rebbe” that fanned throughout the villages and towns of Poland or the Ukraine.

The movement became a worktable for the frustrated and the gifted who found themselves handicapped and accused by the traditional community of misnagdim. Suspicion that they were igniting false messianic hope and exerting other heretical influences on the masses caused Hasidism to be shunned by the traditional leadership. They were accused of trespassing Halacha, but even though some Hasidic writings and behavior indicate a variance with traditional behavior and Halachic commitment, as a rule, Hasidism became the champion of Halacha and preserved it in modernity despite significant challenges.

Types of Hasidic Groups

There are many hundreds of Hasidic groups, small and large, whose Hasidic people follow dynastic leaders. Some still assert ideologies and religious systems, and others are committed to their lineage of rabbis and the Eastern European towns they hailed from or were buried in.

There have been a few major categories of Hasidim in its 200-year-old history as well as in the surviving strands. Ideological groups include Habad, Breslav, and perhaps Toldot Aharon Hasidism; and Polish Hasidism, which includes groups like Kotz, Ger, Radzin, Timshinover, Alexander, and many others. Other Hasidim include Chernoble, Zanz, Visnitz, Belz, Rizhin, Ropshitz, Bluzhov, and more. Another type of Hasidic leaders and followers leaned to miracle working; these included the Jadwokna, Kerestirer, Liska, and others. Lithuania had its own Hasidic groups, including Slonim, Stolin, and Kuvdenov Hasidim.

Selected Bibliography

- Abramsky, C. 1979. "The Crisis of Authority within European Jewry in the Eighteenth Century." In Studies in Jewish Religious and Intellectual History Presented to Alexander Altmann, edited by Siegfried Stein and Raphael Loewe. Tuscaloosa: The University of Alabama Press.
- Buber, M. 1960. The Origins and Meanings of Hasidism, edited and translated by Maurice Friedman. New York: Horizon Press.
- Dubnow, S. 1916. History of the Jews in Russia and Poland. 3 vols. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America.
- Dubnow, S. 1975. History of Hasidism [Hebrew]. 4th ed. Tel Aviv: New York University Press.
- Dubnow, S. 1991. "The Beginnings: The Baal Shem Tov (Besht) and the Center in Podolia." In Essential Papers on Hasidism, edited by G. D. Hundert. New York: New York University Press.
- Ehrlich, M. A. 2000. Leadership in the Habad Movement: A Critical Study of Habad Leadership, History and Succession. Northvale, NJ: Jason Aronson.
- Etkes, I. 1988. "Hasidism as a Movement—the First Stage." In Hasidism: Continuity or Innovation, edited by B. Safran. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Hundert, G. D., ed. 1987. Essential Papers on Hasidism. New York: New York University Press.
- Loewenthal, Naftali. 1986. "The Apotheosis of Action in Early Habad." Daat 18: 5–19.
- Loewenthal, Naftali. 1990. Communicating the Infinite: The Emergence of the Habad School. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Rosman, M. J. 1987. "Miedzyboz and Rabbi Israel Baal Shem Tov." Zion 52: 177–189.

Israel and the Diaspora

Jewish Immigration to Pre-State and Modern Israel

Danny Ben-Moshe

---

Ever since the Jews were exiled from the Land of Israel in 70 CE, the longing to return to Zion has been expressed in daily prayer. A central belief in Zionism, the Jewish national liberation movement, is the ingathering of the exiles through aliyah. A word with biblical origins that literally means “to ascend,” aliyah originally applied to religious pilgrimage to Israel. Since the advent of Zionism, however, aliyah has become a term for immigration that creates, builds, and sustains the Jewish state, offering a renaissance of Jewish identity to those who choose to live there. This was predicated on the traditional Zionist belief that only there could they be fully free and secure as Jews.

The elite within Zionism were the early 20th-century socialist pioneers who gave selflessly of themselves by settling in barren parts of the Land of Israel. The rationale and belief was that, by physically reconnecting with the land, they would be transformed from passive urban European Jews that Zionism was rejecting into new, physically strong, rural Jews Zionism sought to establish. “We will build the land and be built by it” was a song sung by the pioneers. The Zionist leadership knew that the borders of the state would be determined and consolidated by Jewish settlement. “A people for a land for a land with a people” was an early Zionist slogan. There were six waves of aliyah until Israel’s establishment in 1948.

The first aliyah, 1882–1904: 30,000–40,000 migrants arrived during this period, initially influenced by Hovevei Zion, the Lovers of Zion group, which was a forerunner to modern political Zionism. Hovevei Zion was an ideological group, seeking to renew Jewish national life by establishing private-economy agricultural settlements, moshavot, such as that in Petach Tikva.

The second aliyah, 1904–1914: 35,000–40,000 immigrants arrived after a renewed outbreak of pogroms in Eastern Europe. They were pioneers, and the first socialist Kvutza, forerunner to the kibbutz, was established during this period.

During the first and second aliyahs, the Ottoman rulers imposed restrictions on Jewish immigration out of concern for Arab opinion, but Jews were often able to circumvent these restrictions. All immigration ceased with the outbreak of World War I.

The third aliyah, 1919–1923: 35,000 immigrants arrived as part of this aliyah, which was enhanced by the 1917 Balfour Declaration and Jews escaping the Russian Civil War (1918–1920) and the Russo-Polish War (1919–1920). However, it was a highly ideological migration, the majority being pioneers who established the first kibbutz. After Arab attacks on Jewish settlements in 1921 the British imposed restrictions on Jewish immigration. Ultimately, it was economic depression that brought this aliyah to an end.

The fourth aliyah, 1924–1931: 80,000 urban capitalist immigrants arrived in the fourth aliyah, half from Poland, who were escaping harsh fiscal decrees aimed at Jews. Up until this point, most Eastern European Jews immigrants had gone to America, which by this time had introduced restrictions, so the Jewish immigrants had to go to Palestine. After the 1929 Arab riots, the British limited immigration.

The fifth aliyah, 1931–1939: This aliyah was made up of 224,785 European Jews escaping anti-Semitism; 1932 saw the start of illegal immigration designed to circumvent immigration quotas. Political instability after the 1936 Arab riots culminated in the 1939 white paper, which limited immigration to 75,000 over five years.

The sixth aliyah, 1939–1948: During World War II, 60,000 Jews arrived in Palestine, and another 60,000 arrived after the war until independence. About 40,000 were illegal immigrants.

By the time the State of Israel was established, the Jewish population had grown from 24,000 to 650,000 since the origins of Jewish settlement. The first law the State of Israel passed in 1950 was the Law of Return, which gave all Jews from anywhere in the world the automatic right of citizenship, so that after the Holocaust, no Jew would ever again be homeless.

After the State of Israel was established, Oriental Jewish communities that had lived in Arab countries for centuries were expelled as part of the Arab response to Israel's formation. From 1948 to 1951, Israel's population more than doubled as 687,000 immigrants arrived (see Table 6). These and subsequent aliyahs were known by their country of origin rather than year.

New immigrants to pre-state Israel attend a foundation stone-laying ceremony in 1944 at Kariat Bialik, near Haifa. (Zoltan Kluger/Israeli Government Press Office)

Table 6 Jewish Arrivals in Israel between 1948 and 1951

Country of Birth	Number of Migrants
Iraq	123,371
Yemen	45,640
Libya	30,472
Morocco	28,283
Iran	21,910
Tunisia	13,243
Egypt, Sudan	8,760
Algeria	3,810
Aden	3,275

There were further aliyah from Tunisia, Algeria, and Morocco after the collapse of French rule through the 1950s, and several hundred thousand more Jews from the Arab world (Asia) and North Africa arrived throughout the mid-1960s. By the mid-1960s Oriental Jews had come to equal the number of Ashkenazi/Europeans in Israel and were soon to become a majority (see Table 7).

Aliyah continued from various countries, including the airlift of Ethiopian Jews in the 1980s. Once they were recognized in Israel as being Jewish, immigration of Ethiopian Jews to Israel began on a large scale in 1976, most notably through dramatic Israeli airlifts from Africa in 1984 (Operation Moses) and 1991 (Operation Solomon). With ongoing immigration since then, there are currently 100,000 Ethiopian Jews in Israel and another 20,000 Falash Mura, the majority of whose ancestors had converted from Judaism to Christianity, waiting to be transported from Ethiopia to Israel.

The next mass aliyah followed the demise of the Soviet Union in 1989 when almost one million Jews arrived over a decade, as is shown in the chart, a movement that had a major impact on Israeli society, contributing to the economic boom of the 1990s. The number of immigrants from the former Soviet Union has now stabilized and was 10,127 in 2004 and 9,378 in 2005.

Over the past 50 years, Israel has absorbed more than 3 million immigrants from more than 100 countries, but less than 15 percent have come from the West, where the Zionist message of aliyah has not resonated.

To increase aliyah from the West, in 2002 the organization Nefesh B'Nefesh was established. From 2002 to 2005 it assisted more than 7,000 immigrants from Canada and America. Nefesh B'Nefesh takes a new approach to Western aliyah by taking on a significant organizational dimension of the migration and covering many

Table 7 Jewish Immigrants to Israel from Asia and Africa

Year	Immigrants from Asia	Immigrants from Africa
1952	6,992	10,132
1953	3,115	4,995
1954	3,473	12,343
1955	1,583	32,646
1956	3,182	45,138
1957	5,223	24,413
1958	8,039	4,064
1959	3,622	4,414
1960	1,890	5,310
1961	4,253	18,163
1962	5,415	42,036
1963	5,073	38,834
1964	5,158	17,638
1965	5,351	8,915
1966	3,263	3,387
1967	2,089	6,798
1968	4,828	9,217
1969	7,376	9,487

Table 8 Diaspora Immigration to Israel, 1948–2000

Year	Ethiopia	South Africa	Argentina	Great Britain	France	North America	Former Soviet Union	Rest of the World	Total
1948	0	178	62	501	640	336	1,175	98,936	101,828
1949	1	228	326	796	1,665	659	3,255	233,024	239,954
1950	5	205	435	662	672	888	290	167,406	170,563
1951	5	72	325	347	401	618	196	173,315	175,279
1952	0	51	291	257	246	353	74	23,338	24,610
1953	3	46	427	192	196	234	45	10,432	11,575
1954	13	73	398	181	201	349	30	17,246	18,491
1955	25	111	363	204	206	380	139	36,100	37,528
1956	1	234	505	176	199	209	470	54,536	56,330
1957	5	96	665	223	267	313	1,423	69,642	72,634
1958	4	106	515	227	274	409	729	25,026	27,290
1959	3	114	420	229	326	379	1,362	21,155	23,988
1960	3	154	337	268	371	462	1,923	21,174	24,692
1961	2	116	495	235	372	348	224	45,943	47,735
1962	11	1,921	693	363	580	677	194	57,094	61,533
1963	17	409	4,255	536	546	968	314	57,444	64,489
1964	8	381	1,998	408	731	1,122	541	49,847	55,036
1965	9	310	1,154	356	830	1,016	895	26,545	31,115
1966	21	301	664	351	700	826	2,054	11,040	15,957
1967	13	233	547	299	893	739	1,403	10,342	14,469
1968	17	160	559	467	2,523	1,035	224	15,718	20,703
1969	14	715	1,274	1,763	5,292	6,419	3,019	19,615	38,111
1970	13	803	1,457	1,585	4,414	7,158	992	20,328	36,750
1971	7	647	2,107	1,381	3,281	8,122	12,839	13,546	41,930
1972	40	605	2,598	1,030	2,356	6,034	31,652	11,573	55,888
1973	41	577	2,809	760	1,473	4,687	33,477	11,062	54,886
1974	24	432	1,625	832	1,345	3,393	16,816	7,512	31,979
1975	19	415	892	707	1,382	3,065	8,531	5,017	20,028
1976	10	585	1,616	592	1,416	2,979	7,279	5,277	19,754
1977	90	1,448	2,158	840	1,226	2,906	8,348	4,413	21,429
1978	37	1,403	1,960	1,005	1,302	3,285	12,192	5,210	26,394
1979	45	978	1,577	1,058	1,648	3,273	17,614	11,029	37,222
1980	259	346	1,036	900	1,430	2,550	7,570	6,337	20,428
1981	650	220	949	882	1,430	2,670	1,770	4,028	12,599
1982	950	271	1,165	1,154	1,682	2,934	782	4,785	13,723
1983	2,393	324	1,283	1,294	2,094	3,806	399	5,313	16,906
1984	8,327	281	841	786	1,539	2,827	367	5,013	19,981
1985	1,886	246	836	577	1,017	2,090	362	3,628	10,642
1986	236	565	772	568	927	2,179	202	4,056	9,505

(continued)

Table 8 (Continued)

Year	Ethiopia	South Africa	Argentina	Great Britain	France	North America	Former Soviet Union	Rest of the World	Total
1987	231	737	1,078	577	888	1,986	2,096	5,372	12,965
1988	595	487	1,546	528	920	1,700	2,283	4,975	13,034
1989	1,448	262	1,853	452	900	1,533	12,932	4,670	24,050
1990	4,121	175	2,045	488	864	1,546	185,227	5,050	199,516
1991	20,014	135	666	472	966	1,703	147,839	4,305	176,100
1992	3,648	267	356	459	1,182	2,068	65,093	3,984	77,057
1993	863	437	375	647	1,372	2,280	66,145	4,686	76,805
1994	1,197	595	538	626	1,512	2,398	68,079	4,899	79,844
1995	1,312	287	966	669	1,635	2,503	64,848	4,141	76,361
1996	1,411	299	1,370	547	1,870	2,262	59,048	4,112	70,919
1997	1,661	290	1,255	487	1,938	2,057	54,621	3,912	66,221
1998	3,110	204	738	393	1,667	1,788	46,020	2,802	56,722
1999	2,290	228	936	383	1,366	1,697	66,848	3,018	76,766
2000	2,199	192	1,053	326	1,152	1,400	50,762	3,046	60,130
Total	59,307	20,955	57,164	32,046	66,325	109,618	1,073,012	1,432,017	2,850,444

of the costs. This model appears to be successful, and there has been a 200 percent increase in aliyah from the United States and a 40–50 percent increase from Canada since the Nefesh B’Nefesh began operating. In 2006 it expanded activities to the United Kingdom.

The rise in anti-Semitism in France since 2000 led then Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon to call, in 2003, for their immediate aliyah. Each year from 2000 to 2005 saw an increase in French aliyah from the previous year; a total of 11,148 Jews made aliyah from France in this period. This included 3,300 immigrants in 2005, a 35-year high.

France remains one of Israel’s main targets for increased aliyah, and the Jewish Agency continues to work with the private organization Alya et Meilleure, or Aliyah and Better Organisation, which was established in 2005, to achieve this. Although the end of the largest Jewish community in Europe is not imminent, the recent rise in anti-Semitism has caused many French Jews to question their future in their home country. In a 2005 survey, 65 percent of French Jews said the situation for Jews in France has deteriorated, and a full third said they do not see themselves living in France in the next several years. The majority of these are considering aliyah.

Israel remains a refuge for Jews in times of distress, whether economic or anti-Semitic. For example, when the Argentinean economy collapsed in 1999–2002, tens of thousands of Argentinean Jews emigrated to Israel, but the rate of immigration slowed as the Argentinean economy recovered.

With the growing birth rate among Palestinian citizens of Israel and a declining Jewish birth rate, Israel continues to explicitly seek aliyah (see Table 8). It does so through 79 Jewish Agency aliyah offices in 43 countries from Ukraine to Uruguay, which help immigrants with aliyah planning information and administration.

Selected Bibliography

- Hakohen, Deborah, and Gila Brand. 2003. Immigrants in Turmoil: Mass Immigration to Israel and Its Repercussions in the 1950s and After. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press.
- Herman, Donald L. 1984. The Latin-American Community of Israel. New York: Praeger Publishers.
- Jones, Clive. 1996. Soviet Jewish Aliyah, 1989–92: Impact and Implications for Israel and the Middle East. London: Frank Cass.
- Ofer, Dalia. 1999. Escaping the Holocaust: Illegal Immigration to the Land of Israel, 1939–1944. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Rapoport, Louis. 1986. Redemption Song: The Story of Operation Moses. San Diego: Harcourt.
- Shulewitz, Malka Hillel, ed. 2001. The Forgotten Millions: The Modern Jewish Exodus from Arab Lands. New York: Continuum.

Diaspora Anti-Zionism

Thomas A. Kolsky

---

Zionism, with its goal to create a sovereign Jewish state in Palestine, began as a minority movement, which has faced opposition from Diaspora Jews since its inception. The Zionists did not surmount that opposition until the rapidly deteriorating condition of European Jewry in the 1930s and the impact of the Holocaust catastrophe made it possible for them to realize their goal—the establishment of the State of Israel.

In 1896, Theodor Herzl (1860–1904), the father of political Zionism, published his pamphlet “Der Judenstaat” (The Jewish State) in which he argued that anti-Semitism was incurable and that the only viable solution to it was the creation of a sovereign Jewish state. In 1897, Herzl convened in Basel, Switzerland, the first Zionist Congress, which created the World Zionist Organization and elected him its president. The Zionist Congress declared that the goal of Zionism was to work for the creation of a Jewish homeland in Palestine that was to be secured by openly recognized, legal means, implying the need to obtain the backing by a great power. To achieve internal consensus and not upset the Ottoman Turks who controlled Palestine at the time, the language of the declaration was deliberately elastic and thus open to various interpretations. Nevertheless, in his private diary Herzl candidly confessed that in Basel he founded a Jewish state.

As early as 1897, Zionism faced opposition from various Jewish quarters. A vast majority of Orthodox Jews, who rejected the notion of the restoration of Palestine by human intervention, considered Zionism to be a false messianic movement. Most Jewish liberals and socialists, believing in the promise of the Enlightenment with its emphasis on optimism, reason, and progress, regarded Zionism as reactionary philosophy. The majority of well-to-do and assimilated Jews in Western and Central Europe opposed Zionism until the events of the 1930s and 1940s undermined

Theodor Herzl was the founder of Zionism, the political movement that espouses the core belief that the Jewish people are entitled to a homeland and a state of their own. Herzl organized the First Zionist Congress, held in Switzerland in 1897. He is admired as the founding father of the modern State of Israel. (Library of Congress) their optimism and drove them to make peace with Zionism. The anti-Zionists generally argued that Jews were a religious community, not a national entity; that Jews, a religious group, had no right to a state of their own; that Zionism raised the specter of dual loyalty; that Zionism was a political utopian fantasy; and that Zionism was an illegitimate creed. Quiescent during most of the years of Zionist growth, anti-Zionist Jews tended to react aggressively to Zionism at critical moments of its evolution, at times when Zionism seemed to make significant progress: in 1897, 1917–1919, and the 1940s.

The events surrounding the First Zionist Congress in 1897 elicited the earliest Jewish anti-Zionist reactions. When the German community learned that the Zionists planned to hold their congress in Munich, rabbis representing all shades of religious views, dubbed contemptuously by Herzl as Protestrabbiner, objected vociferously and forced the Zionists to shift their gathering to Basel, Switzerland. In public protest in Jewish and non-Jewish newspapers, the rabbis proclaimed their undivided loyalty to the German fatherland and denounced Zionism as fanaticism, contrary to the teachings of Jewish scriptures. In Austria, Moritz Guedemann (1835–1918), the chief rabbi of Vienna, Austria, and a major authority on Judaism, criticized Herzl's ideas and activities. Great Britain's chief rabbi, Hermann Adler (1839–1911), rejected Herzl's ideas and characterized political Zionism an "egregious blunder." In France, Zionism was viewed as a retreat from the ideals of the French Revolution and a surrender to anti-Semitism. In an interview in Le Figaro on September 7, 1897, Joseph Reinach (1856–1921), the prominent Jewish author and politician, asserted that the "French fatherland [nationality] was given to the Jews by the revolution" and neither the anti-Semites nor the Zionists at Basel were to be allowed to take it away from them. In the United States, Rabbi Isaac Mayer

Wise, the architect of American Reform, dismissed the Zionist movement as a mere aberration, calling it “Zionmania.”

Between 1897 and World War I, Zionism and its institutions in the Diaspora and Palestine evolved into a respectable Jewish political movement that offered a solution to the dilemma of anti-Semitism. Nevertheless, its progress was limited. When World War I broke out, the movement still lacked support for a legally sanctioned homeland in Palestine. In the meantime, other ideologies were competing with Zionism as solutions for the Jewish question. In Eastern Europe, where large concentrations of Jews lived mostly in the multiethnic Austro-Hungarian and Russian empires, Zionists and anti-Zionists shared the view that Jews were an ethnic or national group. But there the Zionists faced serious challenges from ideological rivals who proposed alternative political programs for the amelioration of Jewish plight. In Western Europe and the United States, where there was a much smaller concentration of Jews than in Eastern Europe, most anti-Zionists preferred to define themselves as a religious community, not a nationality. This turned out to be their main point of contention with the Zionists.

In Eastern Europe, Marxian Socialism, which attracted many Jews, vehemently opposed Zionism. For example, important Jewish Marxist leaders, such as Leon Trotsky, Rosa Luxemburg, and Julius Martov, rejected Zionism as a reactionary, late capitalist development. They hoped Jews would ultimately assimilate themselves into a just socialist society and abandon their separate identity. After coming to power in Russia in 1917, the Communist regime enlisted Jews in a number of schemes designed to eradicate Jewish nationalism. In 1918 they established the Yevsektzia, a Jewish section of the Communist Party created to eliminate Jewish bourgeois nationalism. In 1928, the Soviet regime created a Jewish autonomous region in Birobidzhan, an area in southeastern Siberia bordering China, which also failed ultimately to solve the Soviet Jewish problem.

Diaspora nationalism offered a serious alternative to Zionism in Eastern Europe. Articulated most cogently by Simon Dubnow (1860–1941) and Chaim Zhitlowsky (1865–1943), Diaspora nationalism expressed faith in the possibility of solving the Jewish question in the countries where Jews were living. Both Dubnow and Zhitlowsky stressed the need to preserve the Jewish communal autonomy, identity, and culture as well as the Yiddish language spoken by the masses. Dubnow considered Jews a unique spiritual nation, precisely because they had survived for thousands of years despite dispersion and the loss of homeland. He criticized the Zionists’ negative view of the Diaspora, their emphasis on the exercise of political power, and their insistence on the acquisition of territory. In 1906, in a brief foray into politics, he actually helped to found a party based on his ideas, the Folkspartei (Peoples’ Party), which had no success in Russia and moderate success in Poland and Lithuania in the 1920s and 1930s. Zhitlowsky, a dedicated Socialist, who objected to what he considered Zionism isolationism, sought to integrate Jews into the mainstream of progressive history by reviving Jewish culture and connecting the Jews’ future with socialism. His ideas influenced the Bund.

The Bund (the General Jewish Labor Union in Lithuania, Poland, and Russia), founded in Vilna, Lithuania, in 1897 for the purpose of uniting the Jewish workers in the Russian Empire, presented Zionism with the most serious challenge in Eastern Europe. The Bund was secularist in its outlook. Its major theoreticians, Arkady Kremer (1865–1935) and Vladimir Medem (1879–1923), shared with Zhitlowsky a deep commitment to preserving the Yiddish language and culture as well as socialism. They called for cultural autonomy for Jews in the Russian Empire and the end of the exploitation of the Jewish working class. The Bund accused Zionism of diverting the attention of the Jewish masses from the task of the class struggle necessary for their liberation. The Bund strongly rejected the idea of Jewish homelessness outside of Palestine. It even warned that establishing a Jewish state in Palestine would lead to an endless conflict between Jews and Arabs. Outlawed in the Soviet Union after the Bolshevik Revolution, the Bund, with the slogan “nationhood without statehood,” became an influential Jewish political party in Poland in the inter-war period.

A substantial segment of Eastern European Orthodox Jews opposed the Zionist movement from its beginning until the 1940s, with some opposed until the birth of the State of Israel. A small minority continued to reject the state until the present. In 1912, in response to the growing influence of Zionism and the creation of the Mozrachi, a religious Zionist party, an alliance of anti-Zionist Orthodox groups founded the Agudat Israel, a worldwide movement of Orthodox Jews. Bitterly denouncing the secularism of the Zionist movement, the Agudists accused Zionism of betraying the belief in the messianic idea. According to Isaac Breuer (1883–1946), one of the major leaders and theoreticians of the Agudat Israel movement, Jews were a religious nation, and it was religion that saved the nation from extinction. In Palestine, Agudat Israel established institutions independent of the Zionist Yishuv (the Jewish settlement in Palestine). In the mid-1930s, however, when Agudat Israel began to cooperate with the Zionists in practical administrative matters in Palestine, a group of die-hard ultra-Orthodox Jews, led by Rabbi Amram Blau (1894–1974), which became known as the Neturei Karta, withdrew from Agudat Israel. The Neturei Karta became undoubtedly the most extreme anti-Zionist Jewish group in the world, with branches presently in Israel, the United States, and Great Britain. After World War II, Rabbi Blau found an ally in the fiercely anti-Zionist Rabbi Joel Teitelbaum (1888–1979), leader of the Satmar Hasidic sect, which was based in the Williamsburg section of New York City and the nearby Hasidic village of Kiryas Joel. Die-hard anti-Zionists, the Neturei Karta not only opposed the idea of a secularly created Jewish state, but they also continued to refuse to recognize the legitimacy of Israel after its foundation in 1948. So intense has been the Neturei Karta antagonism toward Israel that nowadays they identify themselves as Palestinians, not Israelis. In fact, after the 1993 Oslo Agreement, Yasir Arafat appointed Rabbi Moshe Hirsch, their self-proclaimed foreign minister, to the symbolic post of the Palestinian Authority’s minister for Jewish affairs.

The Zionist movement was finally able to secure an alliance with a great power that would help to advance its cause during World War I. On November 2, 1917, toward the end of World War I, the Zionists secured the Balfour Declaration, a pledge by Great Britain to facilitate “the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people.” After conquering Palestine, the British enabled the Yishuv to evolve into a viable political community and brought the Zionists a step closer to realizing their intended—though not openly declared—final goal: the establishment of a sovereign Jewish state. The events surrounding the Balfour Declaration unleashed open opposition to Zionism from many major Jewish religious, philanthropic, and self-defense organizations as well from prominent community leaders in the United States and Western Europe.

In France, strong opposition to Zionism had existed among the Jewish elite since 1897. Alliance Israelite Universelle, an organization founded in 1860 to promote Jewish emancipation and education as well as to combat anti-Semitism, strongly disapproved of the Balfour Declaration. Sylvain Levi (1863–1935), one of its foremost activists and its president from 1920 until 1935, declared that creating a Jewish polity in Palestine was “singularly dangerous,” fearing it might provoke Muslim fanaticism and intense hostility in the Arab world. In Germany, the Central-Verein deutscher Staatsbuerger juedischen Glaubens (Central Association of German Citizens of Jewish Faith), an organization founded in 1893 to fight for citizens’ rights and against anti-Semitism, considered Zionism a threat to the civil status of Jews in Germany. Also critical of Zionism was the Hilfsverein der deutschen Juden (Relief Organization of German Jews), which was founded in 1901 to improve the social and political condition of Jews in Eastern Europe and Asia, including Palestine. Many German civic leaders distanced themselves from Zionism. In fact, the most prominent German Jewish philosopher, Hermann Cohen (1842–1918), expressed a popular view when he stressed the purely religious nature of Judaism, insisting that German Jews belonged to the German nation and that Zionism was incompatible with German patriotism.

In Great Britain the fiercest anti-Zionist reaction to the Balfour Declaration came from the Anglo-Jewish aristocracy. The Board of Deputies of British Jews (founded in 1760), the main representative body of British Jewry, and the Anglo-Jewish Association (founded in 1871), an organization created to help Jews in distress around the world, opposed Zionism until the 1940s. Among the most outspoken British anti-Zionists—all members of prominent families—were Lucien Wolf (1857–1930), Claude Montefiore (1858–1938), Laurie Magnus (1872–1933), and Edwin Samuel Montagu (1879–1924). Their main arguments against Zionism were that it misrepresented Judaism, contributed to anti-Semitism, and undermined the status of Jews as nationals of their home countries. Significantly, it was during British government’s deliberations on the formulation of the Balfour Declaration that Edwin Samuel Montagu, the sole Jewish member of the cabinet, contributed to diluting the phrasing of the document from “Palestine as the National Home,” as proposed by the Zionists, to “Palestine as a National Home” and to including a safeguard clause providing for the protection of non-Jews in Palestine and the political status and rights of Jews around the world. In 1917, British opponents of Zionism also created the League of British Jews, an anti-Zionist association with several hundred members, which campaigned against Zionism until the end of the 1920s.

In the United States, Zionism faced opposition from Orthodox, Socialist, and liberal Jews. But the most lasting and vehement opposition to Zionism came from Reform Jews. American Reform rejected Jewish nationalism even before Herzl’s appearance. The Pittsburgh Platform of 1885, which remained Reform's basic statement of principle until 1935, defined Jews as a purely religious community and explicitly rejected the idea that they constituted a nation. For many years, beginning in 1897, the religious and lay organizations of Reform Judaism repeatedly passed resolutions condemning Zionism. On March 4, 1919, Congressman Julius Kahn delivered to President Wilson an anti-Zionist statement to be presented to the Paris Peace Conference, which was endorsed by 299 Jews who rejected Zionism. The American Jewish Committee (AJC), an organization founded in 1906 for the purpose of defending Jewish rights in the United States and throughout the world, and the American Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), an organization created to provide relief to Jews in distress around the world, remained anti-Zionist until the 1930s.

In the 1930s, however, the deterioration of the international situation helped to advance the cause of Zionism. The coming to power of Nazism in Germany, the rapid spread of anti-Semitism, and the savage assault on liberal values undermined the theoretical foundation of anti-Zionism in the United States and Europe. World events seem to vindicate the Zionists' dire predictions about anti-Semitism. The issuance of the British White Paper of May 1939, which limited Jewish immigration to Palestine and proposed an independent—not a Jewish—state in Palestine within a 10-year-period, effectively ended the Zionists' alliance with the British. Disillusioned with Great Britain, the world Zionist movement turned to the United States for the support of its Jews, general public, and government for its ultimate political goal—the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine. World War II and the Holocaust created a historic opportunity for the Zionist movement. Half a year after the American entry into World War II, in May 1942, at the Biltmore Hotel, the Zionists openly declared their aims: free immigration to Palestine and the establishment there of a Jewish commonwealth. They proceeded to campaign for the support of the American Jews and the American government.

During World War II, as the European Jewish tragedy was unfolding and the Zionist movement was rapidly gaining support, two organizations were formed to fight against the establishment of that state: the Jewish Fellowship in Great Britain and the American Council for Judaism in the United States. The fellowship, with fewer than 2,000 members, included Jews of Liberal and Orthodox religious orientations. The American Council for Judaism, with approximately 14,000 members, consisted mostly of Reform Jews. Both organizations emphasized the message that Jews were a religious group, not a nationality, and that a Jewish state would endanger the status of Jews around the world. In response, the Zionists savagely condemned the members of the two organizations as insensitive, cowardly, shameless, self-hating, and disloyal Jews.

The Jewish Fellowship was founded in 1942 by Basil Henriques (1890–1961) and began its active anti-Zionist campaign in 1944. Among the lay members of the Jewish Fellowship were members of prominent Anglo-Jewish families. The organization's spiritual guide was Rabbi Israel Mattuck (1883–1954), leader of Liberal Judaism in Great Britain. He was supported by leaders of British Judaism, such as rabbis Curtis Cassell, Harold Reinhart, and Gerhard Graf. Considered by some as the last stand of organized anti-Zionism in Great Britain, the Jewish Fellowship remained isolated in the Jewish community, which by the 1940s became increasingly sympathetic to the Zionists. It had very little impact on British foreign policy and dissolved itself in November 1948, half a year after the State of Israel was born.

In 1942, a number of American dissident Reform rabbis, led by rabbis Louis Wolsey (1877–1953), William Fineshriber (1878–1968), and Morris S. Lazaron (1888–1979) founded the American Council for Judaism (ACJ), the first and only American Jewish organization created to oppose Zionism and the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine. Although initially a group representing religious opposition to Zionism, the council rapidly transformed itself into an essentially secular anti-Zionist pressure group after Lessing J. Rosenwald (1891–1979) assumed its presidency in April 1943. Under Rosenwald's leadership and the organizational and ideological guidance of Rabbi Elmer Berger (1908–1996), the executive director, the ACJ became the most formidable opponent of the Zionist movement in the United States in the 1940s. The organization's membership consisted mostly of Reform Jews of German descent. The ACJ's principles, based on classical Reform tenets, emphasized the purely religious nature of Judaism and rejected Jewish nationalism. The establishment of a Jewish state was repudiated as regressive, undemocratic, and contrary to Jewish interests. For the ACJ, Zionism represented a philosophy of despair, loss of faith in emancipation, and self-segregation. Instead of a Jewish state, the ACJ supported free Jewish immigration and equal rights for Jews throughout the world. For Palestine, it proposed the establishment of a democratic state wherein all citizens, regardless of their religions, would enjoy equal rights. From 1942 to 1948, the ACJ fought fiercely against the creation of a Jewish state in Palestine. Since in the 1940s a vast majority of American Jews rallied behind the Zionist program, the ACJ failed to make significant inroad into the Jewish community. While isolated among Jews, it cooperated closely with the American state department, which also opposed the creation of a Jewish state.

But the impact of the Holocaust as well as the successful Zionist political preparatory work in Palestine and the international arena created the political momentum that made the birth of Israel possible. With the emergence of the Jewish state, organized Jewish anti-Zionism in Great Britain and the United States was defeated. The creation of the Jewish state was a clear victory for Zionism. After the creation of a Jewish state, anti-Zionist opposition to its establishment ceased to make sense. Despite various degrees of criticism of its policies, with the exception of the Neturei Karta, Diaspora Jews accepted the existence of the State of Israel. Also, the ACJ reconciled itself to the reality of Israel as a fait accompli. The ACJ, however, did not go out of existence in 1948; instead, it turned into a severe critic of Israel and its ideological supporters. It remained a lonely Jewish voice crying in the political wilderness.

Selected Bibliography

- Berger, Elmer. 1978. Memoirs of an Anti-Zionist Jew. Beirut: Institute for Palestine Studies.
- Kolsky, Thomas. 1990. Jews Against Zionism: The American Council for Judaism, 1942–1948. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.

- Laqueur, Walter. 1972. A History of Zionism. New York: Rinehart and Holt.
- Miller, Rory. 2000. Divided We Stand: Anti-Zionist Opposition in Britain to a Jewish State in Palestine, 1945–1948. London: Frank Cass.
- Wistrich, Robert S. 1998. "Zionism and Its Jewish 'Assimilationist' Critics (1897–1948)." Jewish Social Studies 4 (Winter): 59–111.

Jewish Diaspora Engagement with Israel

Danny Ben-Moshe

From the outset of Zionism, the Diaspora has had a distinct role to play with developing the homeland, raising funds, mobilizing political activity, and providing immigrants. Today, particularly since 1948, Israel continues to play an unequivocally essential role in Diaspora Jewish identity. This centrality is expressed through many areas of Jewish life, such as education, community, philanthropy, and political activism. These deep-seated attachments to Israel are also evident through growing rates of aliyah, participation in Israel programs, and visits to the Jewish state.

Since 1967, a time when the Jewish world was gripped by the realization that the State of Israel could be destroyed, and people were then caught up in Israel's jubilation at her survival, Israel has been a central factor in Diaspora Jewish life and identity. Israel is seen as playing a central role in maintaining Jewish identity throughout the Diaspora. The existence of Israel is important to world Jewry, as is illustrated by the following data: 87 percent of Canadian Jewry believes Israel is "important to being a Jew"; more than 80 percent of American Jews in the 2000 National Jewish Population Survey were very or somewhat familiar with social and political events in Israel, and over 80 percent strongly or somewhat agreed that Israel is the spiritual center of the Jewish people; 81 percent of British Jews were, according to a 1997 survey, strongly or moderately attached to Israel; and 86 percent of respondents to a 2002 survey of French Jews said they felt "very close or close" to Israel. The importance of Israel in the identity of world Jewry today is manifested through various means of engagement with the Jewish State.

Education

Levels of enrollment in Jewish day schools vary in different parts of the Diaspora: 55 percent in Canada, 29 percent in America, and 70 percent in Australia. For those who do receive a formal Jewish education, Israel is a central part of it.

Jewish schools have dedicated programs that teach about Zionism and the State of Israel. These are not emotionally detached subjects, but rather they teach of Israel as the home of the Jewish people. They are complemented by extracurricular Israeli events in schools, such as celebrating Yom Ha'atzmaut (Israeli Independence Day) and Yom HaZikaron (the day for fallen Israeli soldiers).

Hebrew language teaching is based on curricula that, in addition to teaching the language, imbue identification with contemporary Israel. This is the case, for example, with the Canadian Tal Sela program and the Boston-based Neta (Noar Letovat HaIvrit) program. Both programs are used around the world.

Youth Movements

The formation of the Zionist Movement led to a number of factions that were active in the Yishuv and in preparing Diaspora Jews for settlement in Palestine. Today these organizations, together with those established after the formation of the State of Israel, still exist in the Diaspora in the form of Zionist youth movements, where members meet regularly to discuss Zionism and Israel, hold winter and summer camps, and travel to Israel on programs. These youth movements also operate in Israel. Movements, their members, and participating countries include the following:

- Hashomer Hatzair, a socialist movement with 15,000 members in Germany, Canada, the United States, Mexico, Venezuela, Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay, Chile, France, Belgium, Austria, Italy, Switzerland, the Netherlands, Hungary, Bulgaria, Belarus, Ukraine, and Australia.
- Betar, a right-wing movement with 8,500 members in the United Kingdom, United States, Canada, Australia, France, Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay, Chile, Ukraine, and South Africa.
- Bnei Akiva, a religious national movement with 45,000 members in the United States, Canada, Ukraine, Holland, Belgium, Australia, New Zealand, United Kingdom, Switzerland, South Africa, Venezuela, Uruguay, Mexico, Brazil, Argentina, Russia, France, Sweden, Spain, Italy, Norway, Germany, Denmark, Hungary, and Scandinavia.

Members of the Hashomer Hatzair youth movement, pictured in pre-state Israel in 1941. (Daniel Kaplan/Israeli Government Press Office)

Additional youth movements include Reform Zionist youth groups, which operate under several names in Britain, Holland, Australia, Argentina, Spain, Russia, Belarus, Germany, South Africa, Ukraine, Baltic countries, and North America; and the kibbutz-oriented Habonim Dror, with thousands of members in Argentina, Brazil, Uruguay, South Africa, Mexico, America, Canada, Zimbabwe, England, Scotland, France, Holland, Germany, Hungary, Sweden, Australia, New Zealand, Turkey, and Belgium.

Prayer

In synagogues around the world, the Prayer for the State of Israel is read on Sabbath mornings, as is the prayer for the welfare of the Israeli Defence Forces. Thanksgiving prayers are also offered on Israeli Independence Day in Modern Orthodox congregations. Prayer is thus a particular means through which Jews engage with the State of Israel. Indeed, on particular occasions prayer is a distinct means to respond to events in Israel. For example, when Israeli soldier Gilad Shalit was taken captive in June 2006, special prayers services were held for him across France.

Not all synagogues, however, say formal prayers for the Israeli state and military, such as non-Zionist Haredi, including Lubavitch, synagogues, and many Reform synagogues. Despite this, Orthodox Jews, be they Modern Orthodox or ultra-Orthodox, including Hasidim, are emotionally attached to Israel, visit often, have high rates of aliyah, read Hebrew, and send their children on more Israel programs, including yeshiva (seminaries). Their prayers, moreover, are heavily littered with references to the Land of Israel, especially on the holidays. They are thus heavily engaged with the State of Israel, even if for the ultra-Orthodox it is the Land of Israel rather than the modern Zionist state.

Volunteering

Community service is a characteristic central to Jewish life and has been extensively applied to causes for Israel, from door knocking for the Jewish National Fund (JNF) to running a range of pro-Israel organizations in the Diaspora. In addition to volunteering for Israel causes in the Diaspora, Jews also volunteer in Israel itself.

Before statehood, Jews volunteered in a range of efforts to support the Zionist enterprise. In World War I, some 300 Jewish Canadians volunteered for the Jewish Legion, the military unit formed by volunteers from Jewish communities in Western democracies to fight alongside British forces to liberate Palestine from Turkish rule in the World War I.

Jews also volunteered in the 1948 War of Independence. For example, 800 young South African Jews volunteered as part of Machal, the Volunteers from Abroad program, and even greater numbers volunteered from the United States and Great Britain. Similarly, during and immediately after the 1967 Six-Day War, more than 1,000 French Jews volunteered in Israel.

Today, Diaspora Jews participate in multiple volunteer programs that specifically encourage Diaspora volunteers, such as the Magen David Adom Ambulance service and the Israeli fire fighters. In 2004, there were 3,367 Jewish volunteers in Israel from 40 countries, ranging from Brazil to Norway.

Israel Visits

Literally going to Israel is another centrally important dimension of Israel–Diaspora relations, although the numbers of visitors vary according to the different Diaspora communities. For example, one survey found that 35 percent of American Jews had visited Israel, 66 percent of Canadian Jews had visited Israel at least once, 83 percent of South African Jews had visited Israel at least once in the previous 10 years, 66 percent of British Jews had visited Israel at least once during the previous 10 years, and 73 percent of Melbourne Jews had visited Israel.

Israel and the Diaspora are committed to increasing the percentage of Jews who visit Israel. The current Birthright Israel Program aims to ultimately bring every Jew aged 18–26 to Israel, as part of their Jewish birthright. In 2005, the MASA initiative was launched by the government of Israel and the Jewish Agency for Israel, with the aim of quadrupling the number of participants in long-term (semester to one year) programs in Israel to 20,000 by the year 2008.

Philanthropy

The Jewish Diaspora helped establish the State of Israel by raising funds for it. Two major organizations that still today continue their fund-raising efforts and that preceded the existence of the State of Israel are Keren Hayesod (United Israel Appeal or UIA) and Keren Keyemet (Jewish National Fund or JNF). UIA operates in 45 countries. Established in 1920, UIA was the central organization for raising funds for the nascent state before 1948. Since its establishment Keren Hayesod has raised $4 billion. Income over recent years is shown in Table 9. In addition to the actual dollars raised, Keren Hayesod also provides a network for thousands of volunteers to be involved in Israel related works across five continents.

Table 9 Funds Raised for the State of Israel by U.S. Organizations

Year	Donations Raised by World Jewry (U.S.$)
2000	100,200,000
2001	100,400,000
2002	132,000,000
2003	126,000,000
2004	139,000,000
2005	137,000,000

JNF was established at the second Zionist Congress in 1901 to raise funds to acquire land in Palestine. Between World War I and World War II, approximately 1 million JNF blue boxes could be found in Jewish homes around the world. JNF currently operates in 34 countries worldwide, but the main countries are the United States, Australia, Canada, France, Germany, and Italy. On average, JNF generates $25–30 million. As part of their core work of raising millions of dollars a year, both UIA and JNF offices around the world have regular newsletters, bring speakers from Israel, and take “missions” of supporters to Israel.

Other major organizations active in raising funds for Israel across the Diaspora include Women's International Zionist Organization, Magen David Adom, and Israeli universities. Hundreds of other organizations, from Israeli soldier to welfare organizations, also connect the Diaspora to Israel through their fund-raising efforts. In total, it has been estimated that Israel imports $1.5 billion in philanthropic support each year.

Political Activism

Jewish political lobbying for Israel is another dimension of Diaspora participation in the Zionist enterprise that dates back to the origins of the Zionist movement. Chaim Weizmann drew on British Jewry to assist him in his efforts to secure the 1917 Balfour Declaration. During the period in which the State of Israel was established, Jewish American figures such as Rabbi Steven Wise and Justice Louis Brandeis played crucial roles in lobbying Congress and the Eisenhower administration. Lobbying for Israel has continued to be a staple of Israel–Diaspora relations.

Most communities have organizations dedicated to pro-Israel lobbying, such as the America–Israel Public Affairs Committee, the Canada–Israel Committee, and the British–Israel Communications and Research Centre. Activities organized by these and other groups include solidarity rallies, media monitoring, and lobbying of politicians. This is aimed at redressing what is widely regarded as an imbalance against Israel in both media and political environments.

Political activism also includes public demonstrating in support of Israel. For example, in April 2002 when the Israel–Palestinian fighting that erupted in September 2000 was at its peak, 100,000 people rallied outside the White House; 15,000–20,000 gathered in Rome; 20,000 rallied in Ottawa; and the largest pro-Israel rallies in the history of Berlin, Sydney, and London were attended by 2,000, 10,000, and 40,000 people, respectively.

Aliyah

Aliyah, or emigration to Israel, is another way in which Diaspora Jews engage with the Jewish State.

Trade

An underresearched area of Israel–Diaspora relations is trade. Jews are behind the format of binational chambers of commerce in a range of countries. These are aimed at the general import-export sector rather than the Jewish community, but the core membership and leadership of these groups are invariably Jewish.

Other economic engagement with Israel includes purchasing Israel bonds, of which more than $25 billion have been sold. The proceeds and securities from these sales are used by Israel's Finance Ministry to help fund projects in key economic sectors.

A Final Word: The Generational Factor

Surveys across the Jewish world note that identification and participation with Israel is weaker among younger age groups. The outcomes of efforts to engage with younger age groups will determine the nature and extent of the Diaspora's ongoing relationship with the Jewish state.

Selected Bibliography

- Beilin, Yossi. 2000. His Brother's Keeper: Israel and Diaspora Jewry in the Twenty-first Century. New York: Schocken Books.
- Ben-Moshe, Danny, and Zohar Segev, eds. 2007. Israel, the Diaspora and Jewish Identity. London: Sussex Academic Press.
- Gal, Allon, and Alfred Gottschalk, eds. 2000. Beyond Survival and Philanthropy: American Jewry and Israel. Cincinnati, OH: Hebrew Union College Press.
- Gidron, Benjamin, Yael Elon, Avital Schlanger, and Raviv Schwartz. 2006. The Sector of Philanthropic Foundations and Funding Organizations in Israel: Its Characteristics, Functions, Relationship with Government and Patterns of Management. Jerusalem: Israeli Center for Third Sector Research.
- Mittelberg, David. 1999. The Israel Connection and American Jews. Westport, CT: Praeger.
- Rosenthal, Steven T. 2001. Irreconcilable Differences? The Waning of the American Jewish Love Affair with Israel. Waltham, MA: Brandeis University Press.
- Seliktar, Ofira. 2002. Divided We Stand: American Jews, Israel, and the Peace Process. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Education in Israel about the Diaspora

Matt Silver and Aliza Shenhar

---

Education in Israel about the Diaspora is rooted in attitudes and approaches that developed before 1948, in the pre-state late Ottoman and British Mandatory periods. Although the pre-state models never entirely propounded the Zionist conception of "negation of the Diaspora" (shlilat hagola), they were influenced by visions of Jewish life outside Eretz Israel as servile, humiliating, unproductive, and endangered. This hostile attitude toward Diaspora life complemented educational efforts in the Yishuv and early years of statehood to create a new type of pioneering Jew whose character would be bereft of all the negative features associated with Diaspora life.

Since the 1950s, and in an accelerated fashion after the 1967 Six-Day War and the 1973 Yom Kippur War, Israeli education has shed this partial commitment to the negation of the Diaspora model and developed new methodologies that explore Jewish continuity, traditional sources, and forms of interdependence between Israel and the Diaspora. However, just as the negation of the Diaspora ideology was never fully dominant in the Yishuv's and Israel's educational system, so, too, have these new, more inclusive models retained traditional Zionist assumptions about the primacy of Jewish life in Eretz Israel and aliyah as the supreme act of Jewish devotion among Diaspora Jews. Also, a number of challenges and issues remain today in Israeli educational approaches toward the Diaspora. For instance, ambivalence and inconsistency often cloud pedagogical approaches toward traditional Jewish texts; loose ends and questions remain in education about the Holocaust, even though Holocaust teaching has become a standardized part of Israel's educational curriculum; and concepts of Diaspora life important to ideological and religious movements that are based in the United States and elsewhere in the Diaspora are not systematically presented in Israeli curricula.

Research studies about Israeli education on the Diaspora emphasize the transition from a negation of the Diaspora mode to a relatively inclusive methodology of Jewish consciousness or Jewish continuity. There is, however, no single accepted explanation to account for this transformation.

Generally, researchers and educators agree that the rigidly harsh Zionist conception of Diaspora life as intolerable galut. Exile became untenable as a result of a number of factors. These include contemporary feelings of empathy with Holocaust victims in the 1940s and then a national reevaluation of the subject in the aftermath of the Adolf Eichmann trial; rising confidence after the establishment of Israel in 1948 and a willingness to acknowledge the country's need for support among Diaspora Jews (a willingness that increased as a result of traumas such as the 1973 war); the waning of the halutz ethos by which a new Jewish pioneering vanguard believed itself to be in rebellion against Jewish life outside of Eretz Israel; and the rise of religious Zionism and increased interest in the Jewish roots of Zionism after the 1967 Six-Day War.

Transition from Negation of the Diaspora to Jewish Continuity

One systematic study of about 150 history textbooks in Eretz Israel classrooms, from the turn of the 20th century to the mid-1980s, emphasizes the eclipse of the negation of the Diaspora mode. Ruth Firer found that in the 1930–1948 pre-state period, when Zionist conceptualization permeated strongly in Yishuv classrooms, teaching about Jewish history and culture presented the Diaspora in a strongly negative light, suggesting that the Yishuv stood alone, and by itself carried the burden of preserving and revitalizing Jewish heritage.

In some ways, this negation of the Diaspora attitude hardened during the period between the 1948 Independence War and the 1967 Six-Day War, during an educational period Firer describes as ideological extremism. Most poignantly the negation position expressed an acute lack of sympathy for Holocaust victims, who were said to have walked like sheep to the slaughter; the only form of Jewish heroism identified in the story of the Holocaust was that of ghetto fighters, as in the case of the Warsaw uprising. Generally, Israeli education struck a suspicious, even somewhat xenophobic, pose toward Gentile nations.

After the 1967 war, Israeli education was transformed. History textbooks were written not by private individuals but by teams that worked in conjunction with the Education Ministry. A more professional, less mythologized approach to Zionist themes consolidated in this period; and textbooks ceased to use derogatory terms such as “stagnation” or “decline” in the description of Diaspora communities—be they pre-Holocaust centers of Jewish life in Europe or Sephardic communities of North Africa and Asia.

The transition to a more inclusive attitude to Jewish tradition and Diaspora life is a clearly discernible trend in Israeli education from the pre-state Yishuv period to the end of the 20th century. But the question remains: Was there ever a categorical attitude of denial of the Diaspora in the Israeli school system?

Certainly, early Israeli educators were passionately committed to Zionist values that grant precedence to settlement in Eretz Israel and question the long-term vitality of Jewish life in the Diaspora. Yet it would be wrong to generalize casually about a negation of the Diaspora attitude in any period of Israeli education. Overall, Israeli educators condemned the galut as an existential condition of exile, persecution, and dependence, but they were loath to condemn the Jews who fought in the Diaspora for national survival and unity.

In the Yishuv period, educators affiliated with the evolving Labor Zionist movement sometimes spoke disdainfully of the “contamination of Exile”—Dr. Baruch Ben Yehuda of the Herzliya Secondary School in Tel Aviv is one such example. But other educators, such as Shlomo Schiller of Jerusalem’s Hebrew Gymnasium, countered this negation trend by pointing out that “Jewish education cannot omit 2000 years of creative existence.”

During the early years of statehood, the Jewish historian Ben-Zion Dinur set the stage both for the renewal and demise of the negation of the Diaspora attitude in Israeli classrooms. Presiding over the legislation of the 1953 State Education Law as Israel’s third minister of Education, Dinur cited two reasons in favor of study of Diaspora communities in the state school system: to prevent another Holocaust by instilling knowledge of anti-Semitism and to cultivate a sense of Jewish solidarity, the ethos of Klal Yisrael. His advocacy of education about the Diaspora seemed to mark a retreat from his pre-state attitude, during which he intoned (in 1939) that “Zionism is a revolt against the Diaspora.” (Learning about the Diaspora, Dinur declared in 1939, could be justified only as the effort to “know your enemy.”) All told, however, Dinur’s attitude could be described as hatred of galut (exile) but love of the Jewish people who endured it; and as a historian he devoted prodigious labors toward chrestomathies, or edited compilations of Diaspora Jewish life. In fact, as one historian observes, rarely in his writings did Dinur call for the negation of the Diaspora; “on the contrary, much of his scholarly effort was devoted to the recovery of the resilient experience of the Jewish people.” This attitude remains discernible today in Israeli education on the Diaspora, from the secondary school level to the university classroom.

Jewish Continuity Efforts in Israeli Education

After an initial period of educational flux and uncertainty, which preceded the legislation of the 1953 Education Law, a series of official, or semiofficial, attempts arose to formulate educational policy favoring a more inclusive attitude toward Jewish tradition and Diaspora communities. During his terms of office as education minister (1955–1960; 1963–1969), Zalman Aranne supervised the work of five committees on issues of Jewish continuity education. On the eve of the Six-Day War these efforts culminated in the establishment of a Center to Foster Jewish Consciousness, which upheld four content areas in Jewish education: the people of Eretz Israel; Jewish philosophy; Diaspora communities, past and present; and Jewish religion and tradition examined from a cultural-national perspective. The Jewish continuity perspective endorsed by this center was articulated in the Six-Day War period, when discourse about Judaism and politics in Israel changed radically; the center's influence abated not long after its founding.

After 1967, religious Zionist proponents searched for the Jewish roots of contemporary Israeli society and infused political debate in the country with religious rites and symbols. The rise of religious Zionism significantly changed Jewish education policy discourse in Israel.

By the 1990s, political debates about Israeli settlement policy and related issues between religious-right and secular-left groups spawned an Israeli version of the American culture wars in the education system. Two successive committees, led by Professors Zimmerman and Bartal, issued recommendations for pedagogical methodologies that would survey Eretz Israel and Zionist issues in the broad context of Jewish history and world history. Insisting on this interplay between Jewish nationalist themes and world history, the Bartal Committee conceptualized Jewish education in terms of three categories: nationalism in Israel and elsewhere, Zionism and the Middle East, and totalitarianism and the Holocaust.

Such approaches sparked a backlash in the education system. Critics such as Dr. Yoram Hazoni objected that the Bartal group's proposed curriculum promoted "insufficient discussion of the national legacy and distortion of Jewish and Zionist history." Spurred by such allegations about ways in which proposed curricula might harm national solidarity, the Knesset Education Committee sponsored a process of inquiry; and in an extraordinary step, Education Minister Limor Livnat rejected a history textbook, A World of Changes, sponsored by the Bartal Committee.

In 1991, the contentious atmosphere stirred by such mini culture wars, along with widespread reports about declining interest in Jewish studies on all levels of Israel's school system and challenges posed by the mass immigration of Jews from a Soviet system prompted the formation of a high-level Jewish education public commission, popularly known as the Shenhar Committee. The committee's mandate was to formulate policy recommendations on Jewish education in Israel's non-Orthodox public school system.

After years of intensive discussion, the committee submitted its report to Israel's minister of education, culture and sports. Upholding a pluralistic, inclusive approach to Jewish education, the Shenhar report maintained that "Jewish subjects should be taught in a way that emphasizes their character as humanist topics which impart culture and values." Jewish education in Israel, the report explained, "should stress both the uniqueness of Jewish culture, and also that culture's positive links with world cultural groups." Pluralistic methodologies should stress open discussion and dialogue, the report recommended. Espousing curriculum materials that cover a wide swath of Jewish religion and culture in the periods and regions of the Diaspora, the report noted that such a broadly inclusive methodology should search “for components that are pertinent to the lives of contemporary students.”

Whereas previous educational policy statements in Israel had departed from the negation of the Diaspora model primarily by focusing on aliyah-related trends and Jewish solidarity issues, the Shenhar report moved in the direction of recognizing Jewish Diaspora culture in its own right. Rather than upholding in the Diaspora whatever can be fit into Zionist conceptualization, the report declared that education in non-Orthodox Israeli schools should expose students to the “extensive creativity of Diaspora communities.” Education should emphasize “the mutual responsibility linking Israel and the Jewish Diaspora,” because this bond is “a vital component of Jewish identity.”

The Shenhar report emphasized that complex topics in Jewish history should be studied in wider contexts of Jewish civilization and world culture. School curricula, it added, “should address the role of anti-Semitism in the modern world, and the lessons to be learned from the Holocaust.”

In many ways the report stressed the imperative of familiarizing secular students with the classic sources of Jewish religion and culture. It also conceptualized contemporary secular Jewish identities, in Israel and the Diaspora, as viable existential expressions in a pluralistic Jewish civilization. “We should emphasize that secular orientation is a Jewish identity with a positive value that sprouts from modern and ancient Jewish experience, and integrates Jewish and universal cultural values,” concluded the report.

Continuing Challenges and Activities

Mounting criticism about bias and prejudice in education in Israel about the heritage of Eastern Jewish communities (called either Sephardic or Mizrahi Jews) led in 1976 to the Ministry of Education’s establishment of the Center for the Integration of the Legacy of Eastern Jewry. The extent to which Western ethnocentrism colors Jewish education in Israel remains in dispute.

After the pre-Eichmann period, in which education in Israel was reticent or unsparing about Holocaust issues, Holocaust studies have become a focal point in Israel’s educational system. This is a rapidly developing trend—one study notes that of 75 curricular materials instituted in Israeli education, 5 date from the 1970s, 20 from the 1980s, and the remaining 50 from 1990 through the present.

Some scholars believe this intensive upsurge in formal and experiential teaching about the Holocaust was not preceded by thorough methodological preparation. Among other objections, they claim that Holocaust study has become compulsory study whereas essential components of Jewish religion and tradition are not required subjects, that experiential approaches in Holocaust education deemphasize analytic comprehension and knowledge of Jewish history before the rise of the Nazi party, that there is a lack of thoughtful discussion of parallels and differences between the Holocaust and other acts of genocide, and that education about the Holocaust is sometimes tailored demagogically to suit present political agendas.

The extent to which Israel's educational resources should be linked in a global Jewish education effort remains a relatively underexplored topic. By the end of the 1990s, as concerns mounted in the Diaspora about intermarriage and other identity issues, important Jewish Diaspora leaders called for expanded programming in Israel run along the lines of summer workshops for Diaspora educators sponsored by the Melton Center for Jewish Education.

Can informal education methods be an effective means of stressing consciousness in Israel about Jewish continuity and stimulating Israeli-Diaspora partnerships? This question has been explored over the past decades by a number of innovative ventures in informal Jewish education, including the Melitz Center for Jewish-Zionist Education, founded in 1973 in Jerusalem.

Responding to processes of political, social, and economic polarization in Israel, as well as a perception that the spirit and moral content of traditional Jewish learning has been eroding in Israel's secular society, a number of voluntary non-profit groups have since the early 1990s sponsored local activities devoted to open, pluralistic discussion of traditional Jewish texts. These efforts are often described as the "Jewish bookshelf" movement; their impact on the content and norms of education about the Diaspora in Israeli schoolrooms remains to be seen.

Affirmative conceptualizations of Diaspora experience generated by Jewish leaders and movements within the Diaspora itself are not systematically presented in Israel's education system. Among many other subjects, ideas associated with streams of Judaism in the United States, as well as their European antecedents and counterparts, are not regular parts of secondary-school curriculum. That is to say, the Reform notion of the mission of Jewish life in the Diaspora, the Reconstructionist movement's founding idea of Judaism as a civilization, and many other pluralistic Judaism conceptualizations are not familiar ideas in Israeli education.

A preliminary institutional base for education about pluralistic approaches to Judaism in Israel emerged in 1988, when the Enriched Jewish Studies (TALI) network formally became part of Israel's state education system. Today, TALI is a network comprising 120 Israeli state schools and preschools in which 22,000 Israeli youngsters learn about pluralistic approaches to Judaism.

Selected Bibliography

- Dror, Yuval. 2003. "From Negation of the Diaspora to Jewish Consciousness: The Israeli Educational System 1920–2000." Israel Studies Forum: An Interdisciplinary Journal 18 (2): 58–82.
- Firer, Ruth. 1985. The Agents of Zionist Education [Hebrew]. Haifa: Oranim.
- Gottschalk, Alfred. 1989. "Building Jewish Culture in the Diaspora: Diaspora-Israel Partnership." Forum on the Jewish People, Zionism and Israel 62: 39–47.
- Kronish, Ronald. 1984. "Strengthening the Bonds between Israel and the Diaspora in Israeli Jewish Education." Jewish Education 521: 29–34.

Migration and Wanderings of Diaspora Jews

A Chronology of Jewish Travelers and Explorers

M. Avrum Ehrlich and Steve Hall

---

- Sixth century BCE Early Jewish travelers are able to establish the first trade routes to Persia, developing political and commercial ties between two large continents.
- 40–135 BCE The famous Rabbi Akiv travels throughout Palestine, Arabia, Cappadocia, Media, Rome, and Parthia, where he continually seeks support for coreligionists. He meets the emperor, Nerva.
- Middle Ages During the Middle Ages, Jewish merchants travel throughout different lands, including Central and Eastern Europe, and into Africa and Asia where they encounter Jews who know Hebrew and support their coreligionists; thus, they could combine their interests in travel and commerce with education about new lands, customs, and mathematics, as well as other scientific pursuits such as mapmaking, math, and astronomy.
- 750 Jewish merchants organize regular commercial expeditions to China.
- 900 Eldad Hadini, a Jewish adventurer, claims to have encountered the descendants of the 10 lost tribes of Israel while traveling through East Africa; though many are skeptical, his reports on Ethiopia are eventually verified.
- 11th century Jewish astronomers, who lead the field, introduce the use of the astrolabe.
- 1108 Abraham ibn Ezra wanders through France, England, Italy, Palestine, and Egypt and toward India, where he studies people, languages, ways of life, learning habits, mathematics, and astronomy in Islamic countries.
- 1160 Benjamin of Tudela, Spain, leaves from Saragossa, Spain, and documents his extensive travels through Provence, Italy, Greece, Asia Minor, Palestine, Mesopotamia, Persia, India, and eventually, the frontiers of Tibet and China and Yemen, before returning home.
- 1195 A Bohemian Jew named Pethahiah, from Prague, begins a journey in 1195 through Poland, Russia, Crimea, Armenia, Babylonia, Persia, and India, returning to his homeland through Syria, Palestine, and Greece.
- 1270 Jacob Ben Mahir Ibn Tibbon, a professor at the University of France, invents the quadrant, and his astronomic tables are used by sailors until the middle of the 18th century.
- 1300 Estori Ben Moses Farhi is one of the first to scientifically investigate the topography of the holy lands, and in uncovering archaeology and folklore, his efforts focus on categorizing important scientific data, such as history, geography, architecture, numismatics, weights, and measure.

- 1375 Abraham Cresques completes the Catalan Atlas, now one of the most prized maps in the history of geography, for which he collaborates with Benjamin of Tudela and numerous others who had crossed into Africa, opened unknown trade routes in Europe, and ventured through the Sahara from Algiers to Morocco to Timbuktu. His son, Jehuda Cresques, a crypto-Jew, founds the School of Sagres, which becomes the primary training center of explorers and navigators. Mecia de Villadestes, a crypto-Jew from Majorca and one of Cresques' pupils, is an expert on Africa and traces the first map of the Sahara Desert. Other Majorca Jews are Gabriel de Vallsecha, who provides Amerigo Vespucci with his map, and Abraham Farrisol, an explorer of Africa, who brings treasures back to Europe.
- 1492 Currently, there is a considerable debate as to whether Columbus was Jewish (a crypto-Jew); it is known that of his crew, many were Jewish, and that he was taught by Abraham Zacuto, whose works he carried on his voyages.
- 1500s Abraham Zacuto is instrumental in perfecting tables and an astrolabe before being consulted by Vasco da Gama before the expedition on which da Gama discovers the maritime route to India.
- 1670 Tobias Cohen, a pioneer of medical science, travels throughout the Middle East conducting careful and exact studies of the plague and death, diseases, and hygienic conditions there.
- 1750s Simon van Geldern, a grand uncle of the poet Heinrich Heine, wanders throughout Europe in search of adventure, lecturing throughout most of the towns, from country to country, visiting all the capitals of Europe, and being implicated in various plots and affairs, which he documents in a well-organized diary.
- 1753–1758 and 1772–1778 Haym Joseph Azulai travels throughout Turkey, Egypt, Italy, Germany, France, Holland, England, Tunisia, and Algiers, diligently collecting notes and information on the economic and cultural life of the people, mainly Jews, in those areas. He holds interviews with rabbis and scholars and keeps notes and manuscripts. Around the same time, one of the most fortunate adventurers of the 18th century is Alexander Salmon, Robert Louis Stevenson's intimate friend; he goes on to become royalty in Tahiti when he marries the female ruler of the island, becoming her principal adviser. Eventually, their daughter becomes queen.
- 1774 Israel Lyons accompanies Captain Phipps, or Lord Musgrave, as chief astronomer to the North Pole as part of a scientific expedition headed by non-Jews.
- 1795 Samuel Aaron Romanelli explores North Africa and acquires an intimate knowledge of Morocco; he writes a book on Morocco that attracts general attention. Five Arctic expeditions in the 19th century are headed by Jews. Isaac Israel Hayes becomes known as the ultimate authority on the poles and travels to many areas never before reached by humans.
- 1831–1834 Baruch Ben Samuel of Safed, Palestine, travels to Yemen in search of the 10 lost tribes of Israel.

- 1845–1853 Israel Joseph Benjamin, who called himself Benjamin the second, travels in Syria, Kurdistan, India, Afghanistan, and Algeria, and his reports attract the interest of explorers and geographers.
- 1860 Isaac Israel Hayes leads a polar expedition to the North Pole and eventually directs an expedition to Greenland.
- 1871 Emil Bessels is appointed surgeon on the Polaris and proves that Greenland is an island. Eventually, in his studies of the coast of America, he and the other crew members from the Polaris are forced to abandon their vessel at Seymour Narrows, British Columbia, before eventually being rescued.
- 1886 Franz Boas, a great anthropologist, begins a study of life in northwestern Canada, eventually providing proof of the cultural relationship between the Siberians, Inuit peoples, and North American Indians, and forming the basis of his anthropological theories.
- 1887 Louis Gustave Binger, an eminent geographer and philologist and an expert on African languages and dialects, concludes important treaties with the native chieftains throughout Africa near the Ivory Coast.
- 1889 Ney Elias is entrusted with the task of demarcating the borders of Siam and the Burman Shan States and accomplishes his task bravely and fairly.
- 1892 Angelo Heilprin becomes world famous when he leads the Peary relief expedition to Greenland; eventually, he explores the island of Martinique, North Africa, and Alaska.
- 1895 Some of the most valuable contributions to the knowledge of Islamic populations, Jews of northeastern Africa, and the Middle East are made by Hermann Burchardt, a Jew who is eventually murdered in Southern Arabia.

Franz Boas was an influential social philosopher and anthropologist.
(Library of Congress)

- 1900 Sir Marc Aurel Stein travels throughout central Asia making history and changing the historical study of art; he discovers ancient locations in China, such as the cave of the Thousand Buddhas, where he gathers old paintings and manuscripts. He is instrumental in saving a large number of otherwise lost works of art.
- 1910 Leo Sternberg is exiled to the island of Sakhalin as a political prisoner. There he studies the language of the Gilyak, Orok, and Ainu tribes and makes expeditions to the Amur region.
- 1928 Russian Jew Rudolph L. Samoilvich rescues Umberto Nobile in another relief expedition in the polar region.
- 1929 The data gathered by the daring Jewess Sarah Lavenburg Straus (widow of Oscar S. Straus and ambassador to Turkey) while traveling more than 15,000 miles and exploring the fauna of Africa, becomes of great importance to zoology.

Selected Bibliography

- Bieber, Hugo. 1965. "The Jewish Contribution to the Exploration of the Globe." In The Hebrew Impact on Western Civilization, edited by Dagobert D. Runes. New York: The Citadel Press.

Migration Patterns of Iraqi Jews

Myer Samra

---

During the ninth century, the Persian geographer Ibn Khurradadhbih described the prodigious trading network of the Jews from Radhan, a neighborhood of Baghdad, who journeyed across North Africa and the whole Eurasian landmass from France and Spain in the west to India and China in the east, crisscrossing the continents from north to south. These Radhanites had learned many of the languages spoken within this vast territory and traded in commodities as diverse as swords, brocade, eunuchs, and slaves from the west, to spices, perfumes, and precious woods from the east. The Radhanites were fortunate to be able to rely on the local knowledge of Jews living across both continents.

Middle Eastern Jews continued to participate extensively in international trade during the medieval period, but by the beginning of the 16th century, once the Portuguese had charted a sea route from Europe to India, they aggressively fought off competitors in the region and dominated the scene for close to two centuries.

By the mid-1700s, after Britain and Holland supplanted the Portuguese and assumed control of much of the trade in the East, Iraqi Jewish merchants were again able to venture out into that field, gradually reestablishing a vast trading network reaching right across Asia, with smaller outposts in Europe (e.g., Vienna, Paris, and Manchester, England). International trade between Iraq and the rest of the world came to be dominated by Iraqi Jews, who also played an expanding role in the trade between India and China with Europe and the Middle East.

In the process, substantial Baghdadi Jewish communities were established in many of the British colonies in Asia and the Dutch East Indies. These communities developed successively, commencing with Surat on the west coast of India, followed by colonies further east. By the mid-19th century, Iraqi Jews were living in Bombay, Calcutta, Rangoon, Mandalay, Penang, Singapore, Surabaya, Borneo, Hong Kong, and Shanghai, making significant contributions to the development of each colony. The founders of these communities, many of them pious and wealthy, often traveled with an entourage of Jewish ritual functionaries such as a shohet (ritual slaughterer), a kosher cook, a hazan (cantor) to lead prayers, and an istadh (a melamed to European Jews), whose numbers helped to augment the small communities.

Jewish traders from other parts of the Middle East who settled in these locations tended to assimilate into the Baghdadi communities rather than establish separate ones, because there were more traders from Iraq than from other regions and Baghdadi women seemed more ready to accompany their menfolk to such far-off places. In 1790, Shalome Cohen from Aleppo in Syria traveled to Surat on the west coast of India, then the main center for international trade in India. After making several lucrative trips back to the Middle East, Cohen decided to settle in India. In 1792, he sent for his Aleppan wife, Sathie, to join him. Her parents refused to let her go, responding colorfully "If you pave the way from Surat to Aleppo with jewels, we will not send our daughter to you" (Musleah 1975, 17). Consequently, Cohen took a second wife, Najema Semah, from among the Baghdadi Jews then in Surat.

Although the prospects of great profits in international trade partially account for the Iraqi Jews' adventurousness, factors at home also encouraged many to seek their fortunes abroad. The frequent flooding of the Tigris River would bring the plague in its wake, causing many to abandon Baghdad for elsewhere in Mesopotamia, or to leave the country altogether. Additionally, political conditions in the late Ottoman Empire were often unsettled, and the position of the Jews in Mesopotamia depended on the whim of the governor in Baghdad at any given time. Daud Pasha, who governed Baghdad from 1817 to 1831, was the most oppressive, seizing wealthy Jews on the flimsiest pretence and holding them for ransom or assassinating them.

Daud Pasha's most prominent victim was David Sassoon, who was arrested in 1828. The son of Sheikh Sason ibn-Saleh, the former nasi (prince) or head of the community of the Jews in Iraq, Sassoon fled to Bushire in Persia after he was ransomed, and then on to Bombay in 1832. There he built a vast fortune: he owned dockyards, provided loans to other merchants, and shipped goods as diverse as tea, raw cotton, opium, spices, carpets, textiles, silks, hides, dried fruits, and gold across Asia, the Middle East, and Britain.

This trade was facilitated by David Sassoon's strategic placement of his eight sons in such entrepôts as Calcutta, the Gulf ports, Persia, Shanghai, Hong Kong, Rangoon, Singapore, London, and Manchester, where they were able to identify foreign goods in demand and purchase local products for export. The firm of David Sassoon and Sons continued to prosper after its founder's death in 1864, as did the firm of E. D. Sassoon & Co., established in 1867 by the patriarch's second son, Elias, who was destined to become a leading manufacturer of cotton in India.

The success of the Sassoon firms attracted many Iraqi Jews and coreligionists from Persia, Yemen, and Syria to migrate to India, Burma, China, and the Straits Settlements, where they could safely expect employment in the firms' scattered branches. Poor Baghdadi Jews were also attracted by the generosity of David Sassoon and his sons, who established magnificent synagogues in many locations and provided hospital amenities and charitable endowments that ensured the basic needs of any indigent Jew would not be left unmet.

The Sassoons' largesse was not restricted simply to the support of their compatriots and coreligionists. David Sassoon endowed a hospital in Poona for the use of people of all creeds, a number of schools, a reformatory to help rehabilitate delinquent youths, and a library for the Mechanics Institute in Bombay, and he supported many other worthy causes. His sons followed their father's generous example, extending their philanthropy to benefit members of the local Jewish community and Jewish concerns farther afield; to support organizations helping the poor and the whole society; and to establish hospitals, parks, and monuments, such as the Gateway of India. In addition, their employees were better paid than the staff of their competitors. The Sassoon family gained recognition for their services to the wider community and were honored with two hereditary baronetcies.

Whereas rich merchants could travel between the various colonies and return to Baghdad from time to time, for the humbler settlers, communications with friends and relatives outside their particular colony were slow and irregular before the spread of telephones and air travel. Those who had left Iraq for the East were sometimes referred to by the term al-marhum, which is generally used for a person who has died; the colonials were virtually considered as if they had died, simply by leaving to settle in a faraway place from which they were unlikely ever to return.

The opening of the Suez Canal in 1869 greatly improved communications and trading links between Europe and East Asia. Jews from many countries, Iraq among them, migrated to Egypt to take up opportunities there. The Zilkha family established a bank, which became a major financial institution throughout the Middle East until its assets were appropriated by Egypt in 1956.

The new trade routes increased Baghdad and Basra's importance and prosperity, but they also stimulated growth in the Baghdadi Jewish colonies in India and East Asia. Although the political conditions experienced by the Jews who settled in the various Asian colonies were similar in that they were living under British (or Dutch) protection and their small communities flourished with the opportunities open to them, the communities differed from one another in their contact with Jews of other backgrounds.

Two distinct Jewish communities had been settled on the west coast of India for many centuries: the Bene Israel immediately south of Bombay and the Jews of Cochin, further south in Kerala. Whereas the Iraqi Jews spoke Arabic and later adopted English, the Bene Israel spoke Marathi and the Cochini Jews spoke Malayalam, the languages of their respective territories. In Bombay, the Iraqi Jews kept their distance from the Bene Israel. In Calcutta, Iraqi Jews interacted with other Middle Eastern Jews who had, like them, come to trade in India.

In 1798, Shalome Cohen from Aleppo became the first Jewish settler in Calcutta, exporting precious stones, coffee, spices, and indigo back to the Middle East.

Cohen's business successes attracted members of his family from Aleppo and trading partners from Iraq. He also employed Jews from Syria, Iraq, and Cochin. These people came to form the nucleus of the Jewish community in Calcutta. As the community grew, reaching a peak of around 5,000 souls during World War II, most of the settlers ultimately hailed from Baghdad.

The Jewish communities in Burma and the Straits Settlements were predominantly Iraqi, but included small numbers from Persia, Yemen and Egypt. In the Dutch East Indies, European Jews settled in Batavia (Jakarta) while the Baghdadis preferred Surabaya.

Some Iraqi Jewish families rose to prominence in the various Asian colonies through trade, realty investment, and manufacturing. The leading family in Calcutta, the Ezras, had migrated from Baghdad in 1817. Their mercantile operations stretched from China to the Middle East and across to Zanzibar; they traded in indigo, silk, and opium, and land purchased in the center of Calcutta made them very prosperous. The Ezra Benevolent Institution helped develop a Jewish free school, catering to the needs of the poor members of the community and freeing them from attending Christian missionary schools. Members of the family also provided textbooks, prayer books, clothing, and meals for the students.

In the 20th century, Benjamin Nissim Elias became the most successful Jewish businessmen in Calcutta, running jute mills and manufacturing cigarettes, light bulbs, and electrical goods among other products. These concerns became a major source of employment for members of the local Jewish community, much as the Sassoon firms had been in an earlier generation. As representatives of B. N. Elias & Co., Calcutta Jews traveled across India, seeking and filling orders for the company. In 1948, during Israel's War of Independence, some Muslim leaders exhorted their followers to boycott readymade cigarettes, asserting that the profits from the Indian National Tobacco Company—a B. N. Elias concern—would assist Israel's war effort. The Eliases, like other prosperous Baghdadi Jews, were generous philanthropists: they provided dowries for indigent brides and regular financial support to poor Jewish families.

In Shanghai, Silas Hardoon became a major landowner and the most famous foreigner in the city. His life story has fascinated the Chinese public and has been memorialized in novels and Chinese operas. Although Hardoon built the Beth Aharon Synagogue in memory of his father, his charity was directed mainly to Chinese projects. He sought to acquire the aesthetic sensibilities of a cultured Chinese and was influential with the Chinese nationalist movement led by Sun Yat Sen.

The Iraqi Jews had become a well-established, prosperous community in Shanghai during the course of the 19th century, before the influx of Jews fleeing Russia in the early 1900s and, subsequently, refugees from Germany and Central Europe escaping Nazi persecution. Iraqi Jews, led by Sir Victor Sassoon and Ellis Hayim, spearheaded relief for the refugees. Beth Aharon Synagogue was converted into a reception and accommodation center for the refugees and later housed the Mir Yeshiva, while the Abraham and Toueg families ran a free kitchen, feeding around 600 refugees daily.

The name Kadoorie is almost synonymous with Hong Kong, the home of such luminaries as Sir Ellis Kadoorie, Sir Elly Kadoorie, Sir Horace Kadoorie, and Baron

Iraq-born philanthropist Sir Ellis Kadoorie (front row, sixth from left) during a visit to the Wataniya Jewish school in Baghdad in 1925. A resident of Hong Kong, Ellis Kadoorie was a benefactor of the school. (Courtesy Dr. Myer Samra)

Lawrence Kadoorie of Kowloon, who was elevated to a life peerage in 1981. The Kadoories' commercial interests included the Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, a chain of hotels, the Star Ferry between Hong Kong Island and the mainland, the colony's electricity supply, and textile manufacturing. The Kadoories had extensive charitable interests: they founded the New Territories Benevolent Society, established agricultural schools in China and Israel, financed the building of a synagogue for Marranos in Portugal, and supported the education of Jews in Baghdad and the Bene Israel in Bombay.

In Singapore, Sir Menasseh Meyer invested heavily in real estate and came to be regarded as the wealthiest person in Asia early in the 20th century. He was responsible for building two synagogues on the island, Maghain Aboth in 1879, which served the community, and Hesed-El for his own use in 1904. Sir Menasseh paid for a minyan, a quorum of 10 men, to attend Hesed-El daily. Approached by Albert Einstein in 1922, Sir Menasseh donated generously to the founding of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. His brother, Elias Meyer, funded the Jewish boys' school in Calcutta and Jewish education in Rangoon.

When Singapore attained self-government in 1955, David Marshall, a gifted barrister of Iraqi Jewish origin, was elected chief minister. Marshall advocated independence for the island state, resigning in 1956 when Britain refused his demands. He later serves as Singapore's ambassador in France between 1978 and 1993.

During World War I, Jews in Iraq were conscripted into the Ottoman army. As the position of Turkey deteriorated, more and more young men were pressed into uniform, for ever-longer periods of service. After Basra fell to the British in November 1914, many Jews fled there from Baghdad to avoid the army; others went farther, joining kinspeople in Asia.

Between 1920 and 1932, Iraq was a British protectorate, and many Jews found employment in government posts. Knowledge of English was a clear advantage, and some families sent children to relatives in Bombay to study English. In 1941, a pro-Nazi regime briefly controlled Iraq but was expelled by the British. After the collapse of the regime, while the British surrounded Baghdad, a pogrom known as the Farhud led to the murder of around 180 Jews in the city over a period of two days. Others were injured or maimed, and Jewish property was looted or destroyed. This was yet another stimulus for hundreds of Iraqi Jews to flee to the east, to take shelter among kinsfolk and friends.

Small numbers of pious Iraqi Jews had settled in Jerusalem from the mid-19th century. With the growth of the Zionist movement, others followed in the 1920s and 1930s. Later, Zionism came to be regarded as inimical to Arab nationalism and its supporters considered criminals. Upon the declaration of the State of Israel in 1948, Jews were prohibited from leaving Iraq. However, around 10,000 Jews were smuggled out of the country. In March 1950, the government gave those Jews who wished to leave 12 months to renounce their citizenship or stay in the country. Around 130,000 Jews—more than 90 percent of Iraq's Jewish population at the time—opted to leave, most of them settling in Israel. In the following decades, virtually all the Jews left Iraq.

Abraham Gubbay of Newcastle, whose parents, Menashe and Sima from Baghdad, had settled in Newcastle, Australia, in the late 1880s. (Courtesy Raie Levy)

When the former European colonies in Asia achieved independence in the postwar period, the conditions that had favored the Iraqi Jews dissipated, and most chose to resettle in Israel, Britain, Australia, Canada (Vancouver), or the United States (California). In recent years, Jews have again been attracted to economic opportunities in Asia. These sojourners are largely associated with Israeli and American companies, although Persian Jews in the gem trade have made their home in Bangkok, Thailand.

Perhaps the most famous Iraqi Jews today are the brothers Maurice and Charles Saatchi, who established the world's most successful advertising agency in Britain. Margaret Thatcher's success in the 1979 British elections was assisted by the powerful advertising campaign conducted by the Saatchis on behalf of the Conservative Party.

Selected Bibliography

- Abraham, Isaac S. 1969. Origin and History of the Calcutta Jews. Calcutta, India: Daw Sen.
- Betta, Chiara. 1999. "Silas Aaron Hardoon and Cross-Cultural Adaptation in Shanghai." In The Jews of China, Volume One: Historical and Comparative Perspectives, edited by Jonathan Goldstein, 216–230. New York: M. E. Sharpe.
- Elias, Flower, and Judith Elias Cooper. 1974. The Jews of Calcutta. Calcutta, India: The Jewish Association of Calcutta.
- Ezra, Esmond D. 1986. Turning Back the Pages: A Chronicle of Calcutta Jewry. London: Brookside Press.
- Hyman, Mavis. 1995. Jews of the Raj. London: Hyman.
- Jackson, Stanley. 1968. The Sassoons: Portrait of a Dynasty. London: Heinemann.
- Kerem, Yitzchak. 2002. "Assistance Given by the Established Iraqi Jewish Community to the Jewish Refugees in Shanghai, 1937–1945." In Studies in the History and Culture of the Jews in Babylonia, edited by Yitzhak Avishur and Zvi Yehuda. Or Yehuda, Israel: Babylonian Jewry Heritage Center Research Institute of Babylonian Jewry.
- Meyer, M. J. 1994. "The Sephardi Jewish Community of Shanghai 1845–1939 and the Question of Identity." PhD thesis, London School of Economics, London University.
- Musleah, Ezekiel. 1975. On the Banks of the Ganga: The Sojourn of Jews in Calcutta. North Quincy, MA: Christopher.
- Nathan, Eze. 1986. History of the Jews in Singapore 1830–1945. Singapore: Herbilu.
- Roland, Joan G. 1989. Jews in British India. Hanover, NH: University Press of New England.
- Roland, Joan G. 1999. "Baghdadi Jews in India and China in the Nineteenth Century: A Comparison of Economic Roles." In The Jews of China, Volume One: Historical and Comparative Perspectives, edited by Jonathan Goldstein, 141–156. New York: M. E. Sharpe.
- Sassoon, David S. 1949. A History of the Jews in Baghdad (self-published).
- Weinstein, Brian. 2002. "Charity and Public Service of the Babylonian Jews in India." In Studies in the History and Culture of the Jews in Babylonia, edited by Yitzhak Avishur and Zvi Yehuda, 231–246. Or Yehuda, Israel: Babylonian Jewry Heritage Center Research Institute of Babylonian Jewry.

Westward Migration Routes of Sephardi Jews

Julia R. Lieberman

---

The history of the Iberian New Christians, or conversos, and their return to Judaism has been told numerous times and still its narrative does not cease to amaze. It is the history of those Jews who converted to Christianity and remained in Spain after the expulsion of 1492 and those who went to Portugal and were forcibly baptized in 1497. For about 100 years, they lived under the guise of Christianity while in their private lives they continued to practice crypto-Judaism, or religious practices that incorporated aspects of both Judaism and Christianity. Throughout the 16th century, many Iberian New Christians prospered as merchants in international trade, but they also continued to be rejected by the Old Christian society. At the end of the century, monarchs from several Western European countries began to welcome the New Christians to their city ports, where they founded merchant communities. Leghorn, Italy; Amsterdam, the Netherlands; Hamburg, Germany; and London, England, were some of the most important settlements. Collectively these communities formed a well-organized network that not only included Jews in their new settlements but also New Christians still living in Spain and Portugal. Historians refer to these Jews as the Western Sephardim to differentiate them from the Eastern Sephardim, Spanish exiles of 1492 living under Islam in the Ottoman Empire whose members never abandoned Judaism. What united Western Sephardim and the New Christians was their sense of belonging to the Hebrew nation; they referred to themselves in Portuguese as the Nação portuguesa e espanhola, which included all New Christians and their descendants.

The Judaism reconstructed by the Western Sephardim followed rabbinic laws and traditions but differed in a number of ways from traditional Judaism as their view of the world was shaped by their experiences in Portugal and Spain. Each Sephardi community developed its own collective character that was shaped by the political and social uniqueness of its hosting country, while at the same time sharing many common features with one another because of their members' mobility as merchants and their desire to maintain ethnic kinship ties.

Soon after their arrival, New Christian merchants began to organize communal prayer in their new places of residency, clandestinely, in small groups and in private homes. Perhaps they were continuing practices they had followed in Portugal or Spain when they might have occasionally celebrated Jewish holidays, at great risk to their lives if they were denounced to the Inquisition. What was different from the Iberian experience in these new places was that if they were discovered holding religious services, they were either ignored by the local civic authorities or given tacit permission to continue their gatherings. As their numbers grew, these congregations would rent or purchase buildings they called synagogues. Another common tendency was the founding of several congregations, usually as a result of dissenting views on how to conduct rituals. Eventually, however, each Western Sephardi community would once again unite into one congregation and would not allow new ones to be created.

In Leghorn, there were New Christians during the last decades of the 16th century. In 1591, the Grand Duke Ferdinando I de Medici issued La Livornina, inviting merchant Iberian New Christians to the city port of Leghorn and granting them freedom of religion as well as protection from the Italian Inquisition. The first synagogue was in a rented house, the home of a wealthy merchant named Abraham Israel. La Santa Esnoga de Livorne, as the synagogue was known in Spanish, was inaugurated in 1607 and embellished several times throughout the years. This synagogue served the Sephardi congregation until 1789.

In Amsterdam, Iberian merchants founded the first congregation around the year 1602; by 1618 there were three, and by 1639 they had all merged into one under the name of Talmud Torah. A synagogue building served the united congregation until 1675, when the great Esnoga (synagogue, in Portuguese) was inaugurated. This beautiful building is still in use and stands as a reminder of the economic prosperity the community enjoyed during most of the 17th century. Amsterdam became the most important of the Western Sephardi congregations.

In Hamburg, three congregations coexisted starting around the year 1605. But, in contrast to Amsterdam, their gatherings in private homes were prolonged because of the hostility of local Lutheran clergy, who limited Jewish practices to the privacy of homes, even though Portuguese merchants were welcomed into the city. In 1652, the congregation was given the right to hold public prayers, and the three existing congregations united into one under the name of Bet Israel. Their synagogue did not survive, as it burned down in the disastrous fire of Hamburg in 1842.

Entrance to the Esnoga, a 17th-century Sephardic synagogue in Amsterdam. (Richard T. Nowitz/Corbis)

The clandestine period of what eventually became known as the Shaar Ha-Shamaim congregation of London lasted from about 1542 until 1655, when Rabbi Manasseh ben Israel traveled from Amsterdam to London to negotiate with Oliver Cromwell for the readmission of Jews in England, where the practice of Judaism had been forbidden since 1290. Manasseh's petition was denied, but as a result of his appeal, the community was tacitly accepted. The right to publicly practice Judaism was given to the congregation in 1664. The first synagogue was a leased building in Creechurch Lane, which served the congregation from 1656 until 1701 when Bevis Marks, a synagogue still in use today, was inaugurated.

Another urgent need the Sephardi communities had to attend to soon after their founding was the proper burial for the dead, with Jewish rites, in their own cemeteries. The Bet Haim or Casa da vida, in Portuguese, of these communities differed a great deal from Ashkenazi cemeteries, as they were influenced by the contemporary Christian burial customs the New Christians carried with them when they reentered Judaism. This influence is most evident in the beautifully decorated gravestones they place on the tombs, in spite of the Biblical injunction not to make "a carved image nor any likeness" (Exodus 20:4). The institution known as Hebra de Bikur Cholim provided care for the ill and dying, washed the dead, accompanied the funeral processions, and provided mourners with the first meal after internment.

In Leghorn, despite the freedoms granted to the community, the Sephardim were forced to bury their dead in a site known disdainfully as the "Campaccio," where dead horses were also buried. In 1648, the community was granted its own cemetery, but because of the Catholic Church's constrain, they were not permitted to surround it with a fence. When a third site was granted in 1694, in the Via del Corallo, a fence was built around both the old and new cemeteries.

The first Amsterdam Sephardi community bought a plot of land in 1602 in Groet, in Alkmaar, at a rather long distance from Amsterdam, because the local authorities refused to grant permission for the purchase of a more convenient location. Nevertheless, in 1614, the two existing congregations were finally allowed to purchase a piece of land in Ouderkerk on the Amstel, where the dead were carried to their final rest by canal boat.

In Hamburg, the congregation buried their dead in local Lutheran cemeteries until 1611, when the community purchased a tract of land in the nearby town of Altona, in Konigstrasse. This cemetery was in use until 1839.

Shortly after the London community was founded, it leased land, in 1657, in a nearby hamlet, Mile End Road. This cemetery, known today as the Velho Bet Haim, was in use until 1735.

Although some New Christian merchants arrived at their new places of residency with their families intact and all their members returned to Judaism, many left some of their close relatives or their entire family behind in Spain or Portugal. To start a new Jewish life among members of the Nação, a social institution was needed to facilitate the formation of new families. In 1613, a society was founded in Venice, the Hebra de casar horphaos (Society for Marrying Orphans), by 26 merchants from the Ponentine community, that is, New Christians or their descendants. This social institution was to serve as a model to two others. In 1615, a similar institution was founded in Amsterdam, the Santa Comphanhia de dotar orfans e donzelas pobres, which become known as Dotar. In 1644, the Hebra de Cazar Orfas e Donzelas was founded in Leghorn. Membership in these dowry societies required a substantial entrance fee, but membership was perpetual and could be passed on to an heir. Thanks to their wealth, they dispensed generous dowries to young women, orphans and poor nonorphans alike. Although each developed its own specific features and character, the main function of these three institutions was to arrange marriages between members of the Nação, scattered in their network of merchant's communities all over the world. The Amsterdam Dotar went as far as to accept maiden women still living as New Christians in Catholic centers such as Antwerp, Rouen, and southern France.

Selected Bibliography

- Bodiam, Miriam. 1997. Hebrews of the Portuguese Nation: Conversos and Community in Early Modern Amsterdam. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Hyamson, Albert M. 1951. The Sephardim of England. A History of the Spanish and Portuguese Jewish Community, 1492–1951. London: Jarrold and Sons.
- Studemund-Halévy, Michael. 2000. Biographisches Lexikon der Hamburger Segarden. Hamburg, Germany: Hans Christian Verlag.
- Toaff, Renzo. 1999. La Nazione Ebraica a Livorno e a Pisa (1591–1700). Firenze, Italy: Olschki Editore.

Population Transfer of the Jews of Thessaloniki

Yitzchak Kerem

---

For most of the 450 years since the 1492 expulsion of the Jews in Spain, the Jews formed either a majority or plurality of the total population of the city of Salonika (Thessaloniki). With the advent of mid-19th century industrialization in Salonika, the Jewish industrialists of the city relied primarily on Greek Orthodox labor and enjoyed cordial relations with them, except for an occasional outbreak of Greek Orthodox religious fanaticism, or criminal action.

In the Ottoman period, the Sabbath was the unofficial rest day of the city because of the large Jewish population. Banks, markets, large commercial firms, and the port were closed on the Sabbath.

After Salonika became Greek in late 1912, Greece sought to acculturate the Sephardic Jews, who were viewed as a foreign element. The assimilation of the Jews was a solution against the seeming threat the Jewish community posed and would annul the uniqueness of the Jews in the city. In 1921 and 1922, local municipalities such as Kavalla and Florina issued bylaws whereby Jews, like Christians, were obliged to close their businesses on Sunday.

The 100,000 Greek Orthodox Asia Minor refugees that arrived in Salonika in around 1922–1923, because of the population exchange between Greece and Turkey, outnumbered the dwindling Jewish population of about 56,000. The demography of the city changed, and the Jews lost their stature and majority status.

The refugees brought with them from Asia Minor an economic rivalry between the Greek Orthodox and the Jews and a history of zealous fanaticism toward the Jews, mainly in the latter 19th century, through instigating more than 50 blood libels at a time of mounting Greek nationalist activity. Also, they introduced a law in the Salonikan municipal council, Le Repos Dominical, intentionally passed to harm Jewish economic life by prohibiting work on Sunday, thus forcing the Jews to either break the Sabbath or lose a day's pay.

The proposal for this social law for a general rest day for all Thessalonikan residents on Sunday was approved by a majority on May 7, 1924; only Jewish council members disagreed. This compelled the Jews to close their stores and businesses twice a week, causing great financial loss. The Shomrei Shabbat (Sabbath Observers) League organized protest meetings and applied external pressure, which in the end caused an increase in anti-Semitic agitation by the local Greek press. On May 24, 1925, in protest over the law, the Jewish communal executive committee members resigned en bloc. However, many Jews adjusted to the new law and opened their businesses on the Sabbath. Many Jews migrated to France and Italy and small numbers of Jews began migrating to Eretz Israel, which had strict immigration quotas imposed by the British Mandatory Government.

Toward the end of the 1920s, the Salonikan Greek-language daily Makedonia incited against the local Jewish population; particularly against the Jewish Maccabi youth sports movement. This was an additional expression of the disdain of the Greek Orthodox Asia Minor refugees against the local Jewish population. In 1928, Nikos Fardis, chief editor of Makedonia, began to publish the vehemently anti-Semitic text, "The Protocols of the Elders of Zion," in his newspaper. In 1929, Fardis tried to persuade attorney and Jewish communal executive committee member Asher Moissis to hand over to him one of the buildings of the Jewish community in exchange for the newspaper changing its policy toward the Jews. This act of extortion and blackmail worried the Jewish community, but it refused to give in to Fardis's conniving scheme.

In 1930, Makedonia became the official organ of the extremist nationalist movement Ethniki Enosis Ellas (National Union Greece; EEE), popularly called the "Tria Epsilon," which had been founded in 1927. Its members were Asia Minor refugees, merchants jealous of Jewish commercial competition, and university students. In 1931 its national membership was 7,000, most of whom were Asia Minor refugees; 3,000 of those members were in Thessaloniki. The organization conducted vehement anti-Semitic propaganda with fascist Nazi-like features such as uniforms and blowing trumpets. The central government in Athens did not support the group, but it had hidden supporters at the regional government level.

On June 20, 1931, Makedonia falsely accused Maccabi member Isaac Cohen of going to Bulgaria for a Macedonian nationalist youth conference in Sofia, when in actuality he went to Bulgaria for an international Maccabi meeting four days afterward. In its front-page headline and article, Makedonia accused the Maccabi Federation of Salonika of treason against Greece for its supposed support of the revolutionary Bulgarian Comitadjis (communist) movement. Simultaneously, nationalist EEE students at the Aristotelian University in Thessaloniki distributed pamphlets cursing Jewish communists, accusing the Jews of supporting the Bulgarian Comitadjis, and calling for a systematic boycott of the Jews. That same day, anti-Semitic incidents of violence began. According to David Recanati:

On 20 June the Greeks robbed a Jewish commercial house in the Rege suburb, and pillaged the office of the scout movement "Hakoach," and placed there the announcement "Jews leave Thessaloniki." Anti-Semitic gangs passed through the city and systematically labeled buildings K or H to announce that they belong to Jews, and sent anonymous threat letters to many Jews to leave the city. They broke the windows of the Aboav Orphanage and attacked several house of the edges of the city.

Even though Maccabi published a denial of the accusations against Cohen, Makedonia continued the insinuation. In light of this active campaign, anti-Jewish feeling mounted amongst public opinion.

A group of armed nationalists organized an attack on the Maccabi club headquarters on June 23, 1931. They ruined furniture and beat up three Maccabi members who were present at the time.

To prevent the deterioration in relations between the Jews and the Greek Orthodox, the Salonikan Jewish community sent a delegation to the regional governor seated in Thessaloniki, General Gonatas, but he received them very coldly and promised nothing. Based on information of the intentions of extremist elements to attack the Jewish quarters throughout the city, the Jewish community sent a telegram to Greek Premier Venizelos requesting his speedy intervention. Venizelos answered their request and received promises from the city governor to act in quieting the atmosphere and punish all the factions connected to the incitement and violent acts.

On June 25, Venizelos not only told Gonatas that the situation was at its lowest regrettable point and urged him to take measures so that parallel incidents would not dishonor Greece, but he also requested a hearing about the maliciousness in the press. The Jewish parliament member Bessantchi and Senator Asher Mallah also met with Venizelos to voice their dismay at the recent deplorable events. Salonikan Jewish communal leaders met with Police Chief Calochristianakis emphasizing the need for reinforcements to guard the Jewish neighborhoods. He assured them that the Jewish population had nothing to worry about.

On June 25, 1931, a group of rioters entered the house of Shmuel Moshe in the 151 neighborhood and broke the windows. One Jew was murdered and several were injured in the disturbances. Simultaneously, other rioters entered the home of Haim Meir in another neighborhood. The same night, a discussion was held in the local Chamber of Commerce to boycott the stores of the Jews. Three days later, rioters attacked the 6 neighborhood and tried to ignite it, but a group of young Jews repelled them. Both Jews and Greek Orthodox were injured in the disturbances.

On a Monday night, June 29, 1931, taking advantage of Gonatas's absence from the city while on vacation, a mob of some 2,000 Greek Orthodox, organized in gangs and armed with knives, sticks, and oil containers, entered the Campbell neighborhood and burned it down. This neighborhood contained 220 Jewish refugee families from the famous 1917 fire. The police did nothing to stop it. Residents battled the rioters, but in the midst of the attack the whole neighborhood went up in flames. Fifty-four families lost their houses, including the family of Rabbi Avraham Peretz. The rabbi was injured in the riots and several women were raped (Recanati 1972, 226). The rioters destroyed a synagogue, school, and pharmacy. Two Torah scrolls were ripped and nasty graffiti was written on them. A Christian witness noted that Greek Air Force soldiers took part in the riots and the head of their group even ordered them to shoot at the police who came to defend the suburb. The soldiers came with kerosene and grenades, which they threw on the synagogue and buildings. The rioters prevented firefighters from extinguishing the flames. The police did not allow the Jews to leave their homes and did not intervene to defend them. A group of Jewish youth from other neighborhoods tried to help their Jewish neighbors, but the police refused to allow them in the Campbell neighborhood. The rioters killed the Gentile neighborhood baker who asked to defend his Jewish friends. Twenty Jews were injured in the riots, and Leon Vidal, who had been injured in the previous attack on the 151 neighborhood, died from his wounds. Total damage from the riots was 2 million drachmas.

The Jewish refugees from Campbell found refuge in two synagogues, a matzo factory, the Alliance Israelite Universelle school, and elsewhere. The day after the riots, which the public coined the “Campbell riots,” the police published a report of the disturbances in all of the morning newspapers. According to the police, the rioters were Greek Orthodox refugees, and because of their large numbers the police could not curb them and prevent the disturbances (Kerem and Rivlin 1998, 251). The anti-Semitic press, in its usual fashion, distorted the events and blamed the Jews.

After the Campbell riots, Jews began fleeing from the suburbs and heading toward the center of the city out of fear of further riots. Parliament condemned the rioters, and guards were placed in Jewish neighborhoods. Even Greek Orthodox university students volunteered to guard the Jews. On June 30, anti-Semitic slogans were written on many Jewish stores and homes. Athens issued urgent orders to the authorities in Thessaloniki to restore order. However, the reaction of authorities in Greece’s largest northern city was too slow and failed to deter the rioters. The government prevented newspapers and telegrams from being sent abroad, and letters were censored so the Greek government’s inability to control the situation would not be leaked abroad.

The Jewish community demanded that the allegations against Maccabi be checked and that the responsibility of the press bureau, Makedonia newspaper, and nationalist organizations for the Campbell riots be investigated. Those injured from the riots were promised reparations, and the 17 Jews detained during the riots were to be released. In the aftermath, 15,000–18,000 Salonikan Jews moved to Eretz Israel and another 15,000 moved to France during the years 1932–1938. In the Greek parliament, President Venizelos commented that the accusations against the Jews were not true.

The trial opened in the District Court of Veria, an EEE stronghold, on April 2, 1932, and the sessions lasted until April 18. Fardis, the Makedonia editor, and EEE leaders Haritopoulos and G. Cosmides were accused of inciting the Campbell riots. Also, several Greek Orthodox refugees were charged with arson in the Campbell neighborhood. Also on trial were the Maccabi leaders in Thessaloniki, who were accused of acting against the territorial completeness of Greece.

The jury's verdict determined the guilt of the three suspects in the arson of the Campbell neighborhood. The court blamed the Makedonia for inciting the riots, because its insinuations were fictitious. However, the rioters were acquitted on the premise that their actions were in the spirit of patriotism and they believed their homeland was endangered. The Greek Orthodox anti-Semitic inciters were likewise acquitted. Fardes and the two EEE leaders were deemed innocent of the charges of incitement and spreading hate. The Maccabi leaders were also acquitted. In the end, all those accused were deemed innocent. Law 5369 of April 2, 1932, dealt with payment for property burned in the Campbell neighborhood. The Jewish community received no indemnity for damage caused to its property, but the Jewish community's mortgage for the neighborhood it established was annulled. Finally, on June 21, 1935, the official government register announced that the Campbell neighborhood would be confiscated from the Jews.

Anti-Semitism continued in the form of attacks on individuals during the 1933 elections, and Makedonia continued baiting the Jews. The Jews' anti-Venizelist support in the Chamber and Senate elections of 1932 and 1933 was resented by many of the Asia Minor refugees and Makedonia. During the Metaxas dictatorship, in 1936, the Jews fared better when the EEE was banned and anti-Semitism in the press was curbed.

In Salonika, during the Holocaust, the Asia Minor Greek Orthodox were still a majority of the general population, and they remained hostile toward the Jews. This population did not help the local Judeo-Spanish and French-speaking Jews hide and flee from the region. Assistance was left to the local elite, and they were not very successful in convincing the conservative Jewish leadership and general Jewish population to resist deportation. Thus, some 54,000 Salonikan Jews were sent to the Nazi death camps in Poland, where most died in gas chambers or by forced labor; only some 2,000 returned to Salonika after the liberation.

Selected Bibliography

- Ben-Zvi Institute. Jerusalem. Greece manuscripts collection 182/7. Resignation of Jewish communal council over "Le Repos Dominical." 25 May 1925. [Judeo-Spanish]
- Kerem, Yitzchak. 1999. "The Effect of the 1923 Greek-Orthodox/Turkish-Muslim Population Transfer on the Jews of Thessaloniki." Kol haKehila. Available at http://www.yvelia.com/kolhakehila/archive/documents/salonika/salonika/salonika\_002.htm (accessed April 2, 2008).
- Kerem, Yitzchak. 2003. "The Multicultural Background of Greek Jewry: Factors in their Diversity and Integration in Modern Greece." Mesogeios 20–21: 57–79.
- Kerem, Yitzchak, and Bracha Rivlin. 1998. "Saloniki, the Modern Period" [Hebrew]. In Pinkas Hakehillot, Yavan, edited by Bracha Rivlin, 217–299. Jerusalem: Yad Vashem.
- Le Progres*. 1931. "Les evenments de la journee d'hier." June 26, 4.

- L'Independent*. 1931. "Une demarche du Conseil Communal aupres de M. Gonatas." June 25, 4.
- Mavrogordatos, George Th. 1983. Stillborn Republic, Social Coalitions and Party Strategies in Greece, 1922–1936. Berkeley: University of California Press, 255–259.
- Recanati, David, ed. 1972. Zikhron Saloniki, I. Tel Aviv: Salonikan Communal Book Publication Committee, 226–227.
- Saloniki Ir Ve'em Beyisrael* [Hebrew]. 1967. Jerusalem: Institute for the Research of Salonikan Jewry, 227–231.

Migration Routes of Rhodian Jews of the Ottoman Empire and the Mediterranean Basin

Yitzchak Kerem

---

The most vast Diaspora of Judeo-Spanish Jews from the Ottoman Empire is that of the Jews of Rhodes, who, beginning at the end of 19th century and throughout most of the 20th century, spread throughout the world and created independent communities, synagogues, and enclaves in Africa (Rhodesia, the Belgian Congo, and South Africa), the United States (New York City; Atlanta; Montgomery, Alabama; Los Angeles; Portland, Oregon; and Seattle), South America (Buenos Aires, Argentina; and Sao Paulo and Rio de Janeiro, Brazil), Brussels, Belgium, and Haifa and Ashdod, Israel.

In 1895, Mousa and Gabriel Benatar arrived in Salisbury, Rhodesia, and in 1905 an influx of Rhodians settled in the northern remote outposts of Chakari, Gatooma, Darwendale, Shamva, Eiffel Flats, Que Que, Penhalonga, and Bindura, but they eventually established themselves in larger enterprises in the capital, Salisbury. In Rhodesia, the Rhodian Jews established the Sephardic Hebrew Congregation in 1931 in Salisbury, and they were active members in the synagogue in Bulawayo. After the fall of the white regime in Rhodesia in 1979, most Rhodian Jews migrated to South Africa where they settled in Capetown and Johannesburg and joined the local Sephardi congregation there. After the fall of the white regime in South Africa, some of the Rhodians migrated to Perth, Australia, Atlanta, Georgia, and Toronto, Canada.

Salomon Benatar of Rhodes left Umtali, Rhodesia, in 1900 and went on an expedition to the Belgian Congo. With 80 armed men, he went by foot 800 kilometers to Elizabethville; where he eventually created the base for a Rhodian enclave and would make his fortune. The Rhodian Jews established general stores and trading posts in Rhodesia and the Belgian Congo. After the nationalization of industry and commerce in Zaire in the late 1960s, most Rhodian Jews relocated to Brussels and Seapoint outside of Capetown, South Africa. Some migrated to Ashdod.

Rhodian Jews in the Congo established a synagogue in Elizabethville as well as numerous trading posts, general stores, and commercial enterprises in the Kasai region. Maurice Alhadeff helped Mobotu ascend to power in the independent Zaire, and others, like Gabriel Alhadeff, Leon Hasson, and the Israel brothers, became wealthy merchants. In the 1930s, numerous Jews migrated to the Congo from Rhodes, and in 1938, when the Italian Fascist regime annulled Italian citizenship to Jews who settled in Rhodes after the 1923 Lausanne agreement, some 2,000 Jews were forced to leave and settled in the Congo, in the International Zone in Tangiers. Some 200 went to Eretz Israel on the Agios Nikolaos, an illegal immigration boat.

The first Sephardi Jews that settled in Seattle in 1903 were from Marmara, Turkey, and Rhodes. They followed local Greek Orthodox groups to work in fish-packing and other sea-related activities. Many of the Sephardic immigrants were sent to Seattle by the Industrial Removal Office. The Rhodian Jews founded a philanthropic organization called Koupa Ozer Dalim Anshe Rhodes in 1909, their own minyan, burial society, and later a congregation called Ezra Bessarot in 1914. The first Turkish Sephardim in Seattle, Washington, were primarily from Marmara and Tekirdag (Rodosto), but also Gallipoli and Istanbul, and they formed the Sephardic Bikur Holim Congregation in 1910. After forced military conscription in Turkey in 1924, dozens of families from Tekirdag migrated to Seattle. Since 1907, those Rhodians who had economic problems in Seattle went to Portland, Oregon, and established a synagogue and community there. By 1912, there were 80 Sephardim in Portland; most were Rhodians, but others came from Marmara and Tekirdag. From 1908 to 1910, many Turkish and Rhodian Jews began settling in Los Angeles from Seattle and Portland.

Also, Rhodian Jews followed the Greek Orthodox to Atlanta, Georgia, and Montgomery, Alabama, in the southern United States. Most Jews went first to Atlanta and then some settled in Montgomery. In Atlanta, the Rhodian Ahavath Shalom was founded in 1910; a group of 22 split off to form Or Hachaim in 1912, and in 1914, the two congregations united into Or VeShalom, which is a Conservative synagogue today. In 1912–1914, 42 families were from Rhodes, and 23 families were from Turkey.

The Jews began leaving Salonika when they feared the breakup of the Ottoman Empire and future forced military conscription under a Young Turk regime. They sought to leave the limited economic conditions of their towns of origin and dreamed of golden futures in the Americas or Africa (as in the case of the Rhodian Jews). In the first decade of the 20th century, they began to migrate to New York and London, and Salonikans and other Jews from Greece and Turkey also founded the Holland Park synagogue in London in 1928. In New York, they established the Sephardic Brotherhood of America as a burial society and unsuccessfully tried to unite the Sephardim of New York and America. The Salonikans established synagogues on the Lower East Side in Manhattan, in Harlem, in Bronx, and later in Queens. They also established themselves in New Brunswick, New Jersey, and formed Kahal Kadosh Etz Ahaim, which later relocated in Highland Park.

In the 1930s, the newly established petit bourgeois Salonikan Jews migrated to France, mostly to Paris, but also to Lyons and Marseilles. In Paris, they established themselves in three districts: the wealthy settled in the 16th arrondissement, the middle class in the 9th district, and the poor in the 11th district by the Voltaire metro station and rue de la Roquette. After the 1931 anti-Semitic Campbell riots in Salonika, some 15,000–18,000 migrated to Eretz Israel. Some 300 Salonikan stevedores and boat workers Judaized the Haifa Port in 1933, and during the 1936 Arab boycott, the Salonikan port workers, denied entrance to their workplace at the Jaffa Port, established the Tel Aviv Port. In 1937, Greek Jews from Castoria and elsewhere in Greece established the Moshav Tzur Moshe, named after Ioanniote Zionist and Jewish community leader Moshe Koffinas.

The Jews of Castoria began migrating to New York in the early 1900s. A small group also settled in Rio de Janeiro. In New York, the Castorialis eventually established synagogues in New Lots, Brooklyn, and Cedarhurst, Long Island.

At the same time, Romaniote, Judeo-Greek-speaking Jews, migrated to New York and established synagogues on Broome Street on the Lower East Side, in Harlem, in the Bronx, and in Mapleton (Bensonhurst), Brooklyn. They also established the Allen Boys Club and the Sisterhood of Ioannina.

Jews in the Greek Peninsula chose immigration when Ottoman sovereignty was replaced by a Greek regime, which often did not curb anti-Jewish agitation. In several instances the Greek regime initiated legislation that was adverse to Jewish communities in Greece, like a mandatory rest day on Sunday and a separate electoral college. Ultimately, the Greek regime was overrun by a heinous Nazi regime that annihilated most of the Jews of Greece but did prompt significant migration to Eretz Israel for those that fled or those who returned from Auschwitz/Birkenau and other concentration camps.

New York City had numerous Sephardi Landsmanschaften organizations: Hesed ve Emet de Kastorialis, the Brotherhood of Adrianople, the Brotherhood League of Rhodes, and more. Although these societies provided assistance to the new immigrants through loans, contacts, and fraternity and by helping them with the American acculturation process, they also furthered Sephardic fragmentation, prevented unity, and hindered the formation of unified synagogues, schools, burial societies, a professional Sephardi Judeo-Spanish speaking theater, and a long-lasting Judeo-Spanish press.

The Judeo-Spanish speaking community of Monastir began migrating to the Americas in the first decade of the 20th century. Migration ensued to New York City; Rochester, New York; Indianapolis, Indiana; and Temuco, Chile. When Monastir was bombarded continuously in 1916–1917, much of the community migrated not only to the Americas, but also to Florina and Salonika, Greece. Since the late 19th century, in aliyah to Eretz Israel, in particular to the Old City of Jerusalem, many Monastirli came as individuals and families. They established the synagogues Yagel Yaakov (1888) and Ahavat Hesed (1893) in the Old City. They also settled in the new city of Jerusalem and established another synagogue, Yagel Yaakov, in 1930.

The Sephardi enclave of Cincinnati, which formed in the first decade of the 20th century, had 42 families from the Dardanelles, Turkey, and only 8 from Salonika. They formed the La Hermandad (The Brotherhood) in 1910, bought a cemetery plot in 1920, and attracted Jews from Monastir and Katerini, Greece.

Turkish Jews also migrated to the Americas at the beginning of the 20th century. Aside from the aforementioned migrations after the Young Turk Revolution, the Balkan Wars, and World War I, many Izmir Jews left their hometown in light of the harsh Greek rule of 1918–1922 and migrated to the Americas. Jews from Izmir and Istanbul were the founders and main congregant base of the kehalim Bet-El in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, and the Camargo Street synagogue in Buenos Aires, Argentina, which were founded in about 1918 and 1919, respectively. Turkish Jews made up the overwhelming majority of the Judeo-Spanish–speaking Sephardic community of Buenos Aires; which in 1919 evolved into the Asociacon Comunidad Israelita Sefardita de Buenos Aires (ACIS). Rhodian Jews began migrating to Buenos Aires in the first decade of the 20th century, and by 1929 enough had amassed for them to found the Kal Shalom synagogue. Sephardic synagogues were also founded in other cities in Argentina: Rosario, La Plata, Tucumen, and elsewhere.

Turkish Jews began migrating to Cuba in the early 1900s, during the last years of the Ottoman rule, because of fear of future political stability and in search of economic success. At the time of the Balkan Wars of 1912–1913 and World War I, Turkish Jews left Turkey for fear of military conscription, and many chose to settle in Cuba. In 1914, they established the Uniona Hebrea Shevet Ajim, a separate entity from the Ashkenazi community. Migration heightened in 1924 when Turkish Jews feared military conscription during the establishment of the modern Turkish Republic. Not only did the Turkish Jews settle in Havana and establish the Shevet Ajim Synagogue, but they also settled in the coastal towns of the far eastern part of the island where they were peddlers and merchants for the rural agricultural population. The Jews from Silivri, near Istanbul, settled in Camaguey, and those from Kirkliste (Killareli) migrated to Oriente. Sephardic religious and communal organizations, mostly of Turkish Jews, were in Manzanillo, Ciego de Avila, Camajuani, Colon, Camaguey, Guantanamo, Artemisa, Matanzas, and Santiago de Cuba in Oriente Province, the most eastern point of the island, 972 kilometers from Havana.

The Turkish Jews in France, like the Salonikans, had similar settlement patterns. Regarding Sephardi Balkan settlement in Paris, the ninth district was primarily Salonikan middle class, but the lower-class 11th district was primarily of Turkish origin.

The Syrian Jews maintained distinct communal identities in Damascus and Aleppo, and their tight communal identity and parochial structure continued afterward in the Diaspora throughout the 20th century in New York City; Deal, New Jersey; Mexico City; Panama; Colombia; São Paulo, Brazil; Buenos Aires; and Tel Aviv and Jerusalem in Eretz Israel. Most of these Jews possessed a Judeo-Arabic culture, but a significant minority emanated from Iberian and later Livornese Portuguese origin. Previously, Aleppoans Jews, as well as Corfiote Jews, had settled in Manchester, England, as early as 1850. They were cotton merchants and were part of the Cheetham Hill Road Synagogue founded in 1871.

In their enclave on Ocean Parkway in Flatbush, Brooklyn, in New York City, the Syrian Jewish community is separated by the Damascan (Shami) and the Aleppoans synagogue congregations, but they share joint institutions like the Sephardic Center and schools. The Aleppoans number many more, and most of them have lived there longer than the Damascan Jews, many of whom had only managed to migrate from Syria in the latter decades of the 20th century. The neighborhood also contains a Lebanese synagogue and Ahava ve Ahva, an Egyptian synagogue of Cairo Jews, mostly of Syrian origin, who migrated to New York after 1956.

In the 1880s, Sephardi and Romaniote Jews from the Greek Peninsula and Turkey, and Syrian Jews, most of Judeo-Arab culture, migrated to Egypt, which enjoyed economic prosperity after the Suez Canal was built and opened. Corfiote and Zakythian Jews of Italian culture, Ioanniote Judeo-Greek-speaking Romaniote Jews, and Sephardi Judeo-Spanish-speaking Jews from Salonika, Istanbul, and Izmir settled in Egypt, mostly in Alexandria, but also in Cairo. After the large-scale 1891 Corfiote blood libel, many Corfiote Jews settled in Trieste and Alexandria. Italian Jews had migrated to Alexandria since the 1840s, created an autonomous community in 1854, and dominated the Jewish community rabbinic and lay leadership.

At this time, Cairo was full of Jews who had migrated from Morocco, Tunisia, Syria, and the Balkans. Many of the North African and Syrian religious Jews founded the Ahava VeAhva religious cultural center and evening yeshiva. In the 1940s, there was an active movement of illegal immigration to Eretz Israel of youth from Cairo, Alexandria, and elsewhere in Egypt. The first large wave of migration to Israel came in 1948, and then in 1956, when the Jews were forced out of Egypt, some 35,000 Jews migrated to Israel, but most went elsewhere. Many migrated to Italy; to France, where they established a synagogue in Paris near Gare de St. Lazare in the 9th arrondissement; to New York; and to São Paulo, Brazil, where they established their own synagogue and numbered some 6,000 immigrants.

In Mexico, the first Jews were Syrian Jews who fled from persecution and arrived in Mexico City and Guadalajara between 1870 and 1890. At the beginning of the 20th century, Salonikan Jews and Jews from Turkey settled in Mexico City and increased in number after the 1908 Young Turk Revolution. The Damascan Alianza de Monte Sinai congregation was founded in 1912, the Aleppoan Sociedad Beneficencia del Alicencia Israelita Sedaka y Marpe was formed in 1928, and the Union Sefardita (consisting of Balkan Jews) was established in 1923.

In Panama, the Sephardic Kahal Shearith Israel was founded in 1876, but eventually became Reform, and most of its members assimilated and intermarried. During World War I, Sephardim came from Eretz Israel, and after World War II, Sephardim from the Balkans, Syria, and North Africa migrated. They affiliated with the Shevet Ajim congregation; which is staunchly Orthodox.

The Judeo-Spanish Haketia-dialect-speaking Jews from Spanish Morocco, mainly from Tangiers and Tetuan, started migrating to the Amazons of Brazil in the 1820s. Waves of migration occurred after 1860, when the Spanish conquered the geographical areas of those Jewish communities of the Moroccan Sultanate; after the rubber boom of the 1880s, when they settled in the Amazons; and afterward. They settled in remote communities like Belem, where they established a synagogue in 1824; in Manaus, Brazil; and in the remote Iquitos in Peru from the 1890s onward. In the next decade, Sephardic Jews from the those Spanish Moroccan communities migrated in relatively small numbers to Buenos Aires and in 1891 established their own community, called Congregacion Israelita Latina. Also, before World War I, Moroccan Judeo-Spanish-speaking Jews, including those from Melilla, migrated to Caracas, Venezuela, and formed the vibrant synagogue Sociedad Israelita de Venezuela in 1919. In the 1960s, many remaining Moroccan Jews migrated to Montreal, Canada, where these Francophone Jews remain separate from the English-speaking Ashkenazi general Jewish community. Politically, the Francophone Moroccan Jews support the controversial Quebec separatism. In the 1970s and 1980s, many Spanish-Moroccan Jewish immigrants in Montreal left for Toronto and established two synagogues there.

Selected Bibliography

- Alboher, Shlomo. 2005. Monastir (Bitola), Macedonia, An Ancient Jewish City Where No Jews Exist Today, The Flames of Treblinka Consumed Them [Hebrew]. Jerusalem: Sifriya Sionit and Mossad Bialik, 337–339.
- Baki-Bejarano, Margalit. “The Sephardic Community of Buenos Aires” [Hebrew]. Master’s thesis, The Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 18, 28.
- Beton, Sol, ed. 1981. Sephardim & A History of Congregation Or VeShalom. Atlanta: Congregation Or VeShalom, 101–113.
- Carciente, Jacob. 1991. La Comunidad Judia De Venezuela. Caracas, Venezuela: Centro de Estudios Sefardies de Caracas, 48.
- Donnell, Shelton. “At the End of the Frontier: Sephardim in the Western United States.” In The Sephardim: A Cultural Journey from Spain to the Pacific Coast, edited by Joshua Stampfer, 114–137. Portland, OR: Institute of Judaic Studies.
- Elazar, Daniel. 1989. The Other Jews, The Sephardim Today. New York: Basic Books, 147, 149, 151–152, 155, 157, 159.
- Kerem, Yitzchak. 1996. “The Migration of Rhodian Jews to Africa and the Americas, 1900–1914: The Beginning of New Sephardic Communities.” In Patterns of Migration, 1850–1914, edited by Aubrey Newman and Stephen W. Massil, 321–334. London: Jewish Historical Society of England with Institute of Jewish Studies.
- Kerem, Yitzchak. 1997. “The Settlement of Rhodian and Other Sephardic Jews in Montgomery and Atlanta in the Twentieth Century.” American Jewish History 85 (4): 373–391.
- Kosmin, Barry A. 1980. Majuta; A History of the Jewish Community of Zimbabwe. Guelo, Zimbabwe: Mambo Press, 125, 130.
- Landau, Jacob M. 1969. Jews in Nineteenth Century Egypt. New York: New York University Press, 25.
- Levine, Robert M. 1993. Tropical Diaspora: The Jewish Experience in Cuba. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 21.
- Papo, Joseph M. 1987. Sephardim in Twentieth Century America: In Search of Unity. San Jose, CA: Pele Yoetz Books; Berkeley, CA: Judah L. Magnes Museum, 141–147, 163–165, 279–280.
- Segal, Ariel. 1999. Jews of the Amazon, Self-Exile in Paradise. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society.
- Zenner, Walter P. 2000. A Global Community: The Jews From Aleppo, Syria. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 65.

Migration Routes of Egyptian Jews

Racheline Barda

---

Like all the other Jewish communities of Arab lands, Egyptian Jewry has come to an end, and there is no prospect of its being revived either in the near or distant future. The Jews of Egypt were either expelled or forced into exile in the aftermath of the first three wars between Egypt and Israel (in 1948, 1956, and 1967). The rise of an exclusive Arab-Islamic type of nationalism, the growing threat of Islamic fundamentalism and the escalating Arab-Israeli conflict were the fundamental causes for its demise. Before these developments, the Jews of Egypt occupied what they thought was a safe and respected place in Egyptian society. They were about 80,000 and formed a diverse, vibrant, and quasiautonomous community. Their immense contribution to the economic development and modernization of the country was “totally out of proportion to their actual numbers.” They were mostly middle class, and their dominant characteristics were an ethnic, religious, and cultural pluralism; a Western-style education; and multilingual skills. They lived in symbiosis with several non-Muslim local communities, such as the Copts, the Greeks, the Syrians, the Italians, and the Armenians. As the Egyptian political climate changed, especially beginning in 1945, the status of the Jews became increasingly untenable, and they were forced to look for a new home. In the space of less than 20 years, Egypt was emptied of its Jewish population. By the late 1960s, approximately 37,000 had immigrated to Israel while the rest dispersed throughout the Western world, mainly North and South America, France, Great Britain, Canada, and even as far as Australia. A handful of elderly Jews still live in Cairo and Alexandria.

A relatively large number—about 15,000—chose to settle in Brazil because of its open-door immigration policy, particularly under the presidency of Juscelino Kubitschek (1956–1961). When the Suez crisis erupted, the Brazilian Embassy in Cairo had received instructions not to limit the number of visas issued to Egyptian Jews. The immigration formalities were further facilitated by the fact they could be conducted in Egypt, and the visa applications were processed in situ at a rate that was to allow for the establishment of the necessary infrastructure to accommodate the refugees. In cases of hardship, the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society (HIAS) or the Brazilian Jewish community compiled lists of people who wished to immigrate and forwarded those lists, already bearing a permanent visa authorization, to the Brazilian officials in Egypt. Once they landed in the country, the Egyptian refugees were the sole responsibility of HIAS, which provided them with temporary accommodation in hotels and financial support. They settled mostly in Rio de Janeiro and São Paulo. Initially, they experienced some difficulties because of the language, but most learned Portuguese relatively quickly and joined the workforce very soon after their arrival.

France was another preferred migration route for more than 10,000 Jews from Egypt, in view of its proximity and reputation as a traditional haven for political refugees. However, the primary motivation was their affinity with the French language and culture as a result of their schooling in Egypt. Already in the early 1950s, young Egyptian Jews had chosen to pursue their university studies in France and subsequently settled there. The Jewish refugees who landed in France after the 1956 Suez crisis were either repatriated French nationals or stateless. The latter included those who were forced to renounce their Egyptian nationality before leaving the country and the so-called sujets locaux who had never been granted Egyptian nationality.

The plight of the French nationals was somewhat alleviated as the French government had organized emergency housing in hotels, financial aid, and employment assistance. They were also eligible to receive social security and medical benefits. The situation of the stateless Jewish refugees was not as privileged. A large number wished to settle in France and required urgent help. Others were in need of a temporary sanctuary while waiting for visas to other countries, such as the United States or Australia. The combined efforts of relief organizations such as the International Committee of the Red Cross, the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in cooperation with HIAS, and the American Jewish Joint Distribution (AJDC), which facilitated the transfer of the Jewish population from Egypt, through Europe, and to their final destinations. The Jewish Agency directed the immigration to Israel from Europe.

Notwithstanding the subsidies of international and national government institutions, most of the funds needed to settle and integrate the Egyptian refugees into the local economy or to help them emigrate to other countries were provided by AJDC. France was its main theater of operation, particularly between 1957 and 1960. A special programs assistance fund was established by AJDC specifically to cope with the needs of Jewish refugees from Egypt and Eastern Europe. This fund subsidized local Jewish agencies, such as the French Comité Juif d'Action Sociale et de Reconstruction and the Service Social des Jeunes. They provided refugees with cash relief and assistance with food, child care, and housing for a year or until the head of the family found suitable employment. The issue of employment was crucial, as the refugees who wished to settle in France could not have a resident permit without a work permit and vice versa. The majority settled in Paris and seemed integrate successfully into French society and the French economy. They made good use of the opportunities that were available when they first arrived, such as communal and government assistance, cheap housing, and free tertiary education for the young.

A number chose English-speaking countries because they believed these countries would offer better economic possibilities for the future. These countries included the United States, which received approximately 9,000 immigrants; the United Kingdom, approximately 4,000; and Canada and Australia, approximately 2,000 each. The United States was a preferred destination for many of the refugees from Egypt, however, the waiting list was long, as strict quotas regulated American immigration policy. Many had to wait for the Refugee-Escapee Act of September, 11, 1957, which allowed the admission of persons "fleeing persecution in Communist countries or countries in the Middle East," outside the national origins quota system. They settled in various cities of the United States, again with the assistance of HIAS.

Some could not afford to wait for an American visa and tried alternative migration routes. Australia was often a second- or third-choice destination because of its geographical isolation at the edge of the Diaspora. In the 1950s, the sea voyage took over a month from Europe and the plane trip, three to four days. In addition, Australia had a very selective immigration policy. It only accepted holders of British nationality and applicants with a close family member already in the country who could act as a sponsor. Otherwise, the quota system applied. Shortly after Egypt unilaterally nationalized the Suez Canal in July 1956, the Australian Embassy in Cairo was closed because of Australia's close alignment with Great Britain. As a result, immigration applications could not be processed in Egypt. The Egyptian Jews were required to present themselves at Australian embassies in Europe. First, they had to overcome the racial discrimination of the white Australia immigration policy toward Jews of Middle Eastern origin. This hurdle was surmounted thanks to the tireless efforts of leaders of the Australian Jewish community, such as Sydney D. Einfeld, who lobbied the Australian government to allow Egyptian Jews into the country on humanitarian grounds. Through a process of chain migration and the help of a parliamentarian, Patrick Galvin, a significant number settled in Adelaide, where they joined some of their compatriots who had settled there as early as 1947. The rest of the group was divided between Sydney and Melbourne.

Egyptian refugees still had to wait several months in Europe for their applications to be accepted. Those who had no means of support during that interim period were offered accommodation in HIAS-designated hotels, as well as meal tickets and medical help. HIAS also paid for the passage to Australia when required. In accordance with published data, the HIAS helped 591 Jewish refugees from Egypt immigrate to Australia from 1956 to 1963, although the extent of that assistance was not specified.

Regardless of the migration routes they chose to take, the Jews from Egypt have successfully acculturated and integrated into new societies, while retaining their own cultural diversity, thanks to their multilingual skills, multilayered identity, and innate ability to adapt and interact with a variety of ethnic groups. As time unfolds, this distinctiveness is bound to fade away as their descendants acculturate more and more to their host country. Nevertheless, their history both in and out of Egypt constitutes an integral part of the greater picture of Jews of Arab lands and their subsequent dispersion throughout Israel and the Western world.

Selected Bibliography

- Beinin, Joel. 1998. The Dispersion of Egyptian Jewry. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Cohen, Hayyim J. 1973. The Jews of the Middle East, 1860–1972. New York: Wiley.
- Jupp, James. 1991. Immigration. Sydney, Australia: Sydney University Press.
- Krämer, Gudrún. 1989. The Jews in Modern Egypt, 1914–1952. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 37.
- Laskier, Michael. 1992. The Jews of Egypt, 1920–1970: In the Midst of Zionism, Anti-Semitism and the Middle East Conflict. New York: New York University Press.
- Laskier, Michael. 1995. "Egyptian Jewry under the Nasser Regime, 1956–70." Middle Eastern Studies 3 (July): 573–619.

- Laskier, Michael. 1998. "The Regeneration of French Jewry: The Influx and Integration of North African Jews into France." Jewish Political Studies Review 10 (1–2): 37–72.
- Leftel, Ruth. 1997. "A comunidade sefaradita egipcia de São Paulo." PhD thesis, History, University of São Paulo.
- Rouchou, Joëlle. 2003. "Nuits d'été au parfum de jasmin: Souvenirs des Juifs d'Égypte à Rio de Janeiro—1956/7." PhD thesis, University of São Paulo.
- Rutland, Suzanne D. 1988. The Edge of the Diaspora. Sydney, Australia: Collins Australia.
- Rutland, Suzanne D. 1991. "The Hon. Sydney David Einfeld, AO: Builder of Australian Jewry." Australian Jewish Historical Society Journal 9: 312–331.

Why the Majority of the Jews of Iraq Emigrated to Israel in Operation Ezra and Nehemya, as Viewed by Jewish Memoirs

Daphne Tsimhoni

---

The mass immigration of the Jews of Iraq to Israel in operation Ezra and Nehemya included 119,000 people and nearly liquidated the ancient flourishing Jewish community of Iraq. Spectators of the period described it as "the largest air migration in history." None of the people involved in preparing the 1950–1951 law permitting the Jews to leave expected such a large-scale migration.

Various explanations have been offered for this unique mass emigration of nearly the total Jewish community of Iraq to Israel. One explanation promoted by the Israeli emissaries who organized the operation, including the Israeli emissaries Shlomo Hillel and Mordechai Ben Porat, considers the origins of the Jewish drive to leave Iraq for Israel as the "natural Zionism" of the Jews of Iraq. Accordingly, despite their 3,000 years of exile in Iraq, the Jews considered themselves guests in their own homeland and yearned for their redemption and emigration to Zion. Other assumptions prevalent among members of Jewish community of Iraq accuse the Israeli emissaries of pushing them to register for emigration to Israel by throwing bombs on Jewish meeting places.

The political circumstances of the promulgation of the 1950–1951 law permitting the Jews to leave were explained in the article "The Political Background of the Mass Immigration of the Jews of Iraq to Israel." The article pointed to the deterioration of the position of the Jews from the 1930s because of the expansion of Nazi anti-Jewish propaganda and the influence of the Arab-Jewish conflict in Palestine; the memory of the Farhud—the anti-Jewish pogrom in 1941; and the persecution and discrimination after the 1948 war, which aroused apprehensions of the return of the atrocities of the 1941 pogrom.

For many, the sentence of Shafiq Adas was a turning point and the beginning of the end in Iraq. Adas was a rich, dignified Jewish businessman affiliated with the Iraq elite. He was apprehended and prosecuted in September 1948 for supplying British military equipment to the Zionists in Palestine. He was sentenced to death and was hanged in front of his house in Basra in the presence of a large mob. His Iraqi partners were not apprehended at all. The persecutions reached their peak in September and October 1949 when members of the outlawed Zionist movement were targeted. These circumstances induced many Jewish youngsters to flee from Iraq to Iran between Basra and the Shatt al-Arab. The upheaval that was created and the activities of American and British Jewish organizations in coordination with the Israeli government brought about American and British pressure on the government of Iraq to stop persecuting the Jews and allow them to leave Iraq legally.

The resignation of the Nuri al-Said government and the rise in February 1950 of the Tawfiq al Suwaydi, a moderate pro-British politician, brought about a change in the Iraqi policy toward the Jews. Hence, the new prime minister presented the Iraqi parliament a law enabling the Jews to leave Iraq. It was officially promulgated on March 9, 1950, after a secret hasty procedure in parliament. It was clear that hardly any country would accept Jewish immigrants. Hence, Israel remained the only option for migration. Spectators anticipated that no more than 10,000 Jews would leave, but the Jewish mass emigration exceeded all the expectations by far.

The Yearning for Zion and Its Meaning for the Jews of Iraq

Babylonian Jews had cherished their deep affiliation with the Holy Land since the beginning of their exile more than 2,500 earlier. It was particularly noticeable among the lower classes, which formed the majority of the community. The yearning for Zion was part of their prayers, their mourning, and their celebrations. However, it did not become Zionist political notion as in late 19th-century Europe, and it was nothing like political Zionism. Emigration to the Holy Land and donations from Babylonian Jews for the purchase of lands in Palestine never stopped throughout the ages. According to this view, emigration to Palestine was not done out of Zionist commitment but rather a religious binding.

The yearning for Zion had different expressions among different groups of the community. The leadership and socioeconomic elite considered itself part and parcel of the Iraqi society, an ancient deep-rooted community whose roots were earlier than that of the Muslims in Iraq, but at the same time, the Jews cherished their own unique ethnoreligious identity. This group maintained close social contacts with the governing Muslim elite and considered themselves to be Iraqi nationals of the Jewish faith. Their affiliation with Jerusalem was of the affiliation with the Jerusalem of heaven. They rejoiced when the State of Israel was established but considered the focus of their life to be their community in Iraq. They were apprehensive about the debacle that the establishment of the State of Israel and the Arab-Israeli conflict were liable to bring about for the Jews of Iraq. They were particularly apprehensive about the rumors regarding the forced population exchange scheme between Israel and Iraq that was supported by Britain.

During the crucial years of 1946–1950, the communal leadership was in a state of deformation. It lost its prestige versus the young generation; its attempts to ease the government's pressures on the community through a quiet diplomacy proved to be useless, which added to their apprehensions regarding the future of the Jews in Iraq. Unlike the young and the lower classes, the leaders of the community hoped for better days with the solution of the Palestine issue.

Iraqi immigrants arrive at Lod Airport in Israel, 1950. (Hans Pinn/Israeli Government Press Office)

The Jewish masses kept their deep affiliation with tradition and Judaism. When the Zionist movement reestablished itself clandestinely in Iraq in 1942, it found its first ardent supporters among this group. Some Zionist activists consider this support as the modern reflection of the ancient yearnings to Zion. It is difficult to consider these feelings as the central cause for the mass immigration of the Jews to Israel, however. Religious, cultural, and spiritual affiliation can move individuals and small groups, but never in history had such feelings been so strong as to eradicate total communities. This was true to the Jews of Iraq in the same way that it was true to any Diaspora.

The establishment of the State of Israel had a great impact on the self-identity of the Jews of Iraq. It forced them to decide between two national identities: the Zionist Israeli or the Arab one. There was no space any more for a Jewish Arab identity or a Jewish Iraqi identity, neither in the eyes of the Jews nor in the eyes of their Muslim Arab environment.

For the Jewish masses and young people, particularly the members of the Zionist movement, the establishment of the State of Israel was a dream that materialized. Authors such as Yitzhak Bar Moshe and Eli Amir, and Zionist activists such as Eitan Shems and Yosef Meir, recognized the fact that discrimination and persecution had brought the majority of the Jews of Iraq to the notion that they had no future in Iraq. Discrimination and redundancies impoverished many and nearly brought some to starvation. The exodus from Iraq was primarily a solution of the poor. Still, there was no immediate danger to the physical existence of the Jews in Iraq.

Shalom Darwish, who was the secretary of the Jewish community of Baghdad in the early 1940s, described his decision to leave Iraq after having been disappointed by the lawlessness of the Iraqi judicial system after the death sentence of Shafiq Adas. Yitzhaq Bar Moshe describes how disappointed and persecuted communists decided that their place was not in Iraq any more and that Israel was the only country that was prepared to absorb them.

The Snowball Effect

Just a few people registered for denaturalization during the first weeks after the promulgation of the 1950–1951 law on March 9, 1950. As long as the organization of the departure from Iraq was not completed the Zionist emissaries asked the Jews not to register themselves for denaturalization. The preparations of the Jews to leave illegally and the massive sale of property and household expanded, which infuriated the nationalists of the Istiqlal Party, who accused the Jews of causing an economic crisis and started attacking Jews in centers of sale of properties. On April 8, 1950, a bomb was thrown into a coffee house where Jews used to sit, and a few people were hurt. Simultaneously, the members of the local Zionist movement called the Jews to register for immigration to Israel on April 9, 1950, one day after Passover; 40,000 registered within one week. The registration acquired a snowball effect and in less than six months most Jews had registered themselves for denaturalization and immigration by an air lift to Israel.

Between April 1950 and March 1951, approximately five bombs exploded in places Jews used to frequent. Rumors persist today among the Jewish community of Iraq that Zionist emissaries threw these bombs. These claims have never been proved. Altogether the bombs did not cause serious damage, which lent credence to the rumors that they were meant to horrify and push the Jews to leave Iraq. Regardless of who threw the bombs, it is clear that the panic the bombs may have caused could only have emerged against the background of the horrifying events of the Farhud in June 1941 and the apprehensions that they were liable to return.

According to Shalom Darwish, the 1950 law permitting the Jews to leave did not promise equal rights to the Jews who chose to stay, and throughout the period extreme nationalists continued to attack the Jews. These attacks convinced the Jews that it was not possible to rewind the clock to the days before the Arab–Israeli conflict began. Furthermore, there was no clue about whether it would be possible to leave Iraq after the 1950 law expired. There was no other possibility to leave Iraq except by the air lift to Israel with the knowledge that the minister of interior had the authority to cancel the law any moment.

Another factor that accelerated the registration to leave Iraq for Israel was the snowball effect. The close-knit structure of the Jewish family in Iraq meant that mothers wanted to join their sons, the young and elderly would not be left behind, and neighbors followed because they did not want to be left alone either. Most of the Jews in Iraq lived in Baghdad and Basra, which facilitated the snowball effect. Bar Moshe and Samir Naqqash beautifully described the sad atmosphere and the sense of emptiness and strangeness that induced many to go even if it was difficult for them to leave their homeland.

The snowball effect was closely connected with the communal cohesion and cultural uniqueness as well as the education in Jewish schools and the Hebrew teaching. Their acculturation into their Iraqi Arab neighborhood did not create a crisis of identity as Jews faced in the 19th-century Western Europe. This crisis came with the establishment of the State of Israel and the acceleration of the Israeli-Arab conflict. They put before the Jews the choice between their Arabness and Jewishness, and because of the continued discrimination and persecutions most of the community saw no future in Iraq. They took then the only option possible.

Beyond any logical explanation, the mass immigration of the Jews from Iraq to Israel has remained an exceptional historical event, uprooting an ancient Diaspora from its thousand years' roots in its host country and returning it to its motherland.

Selected Bibliography

- Bar Moshe, Isaac. 1977. Exodus from Iraq, Recollections 1945–1950 [Hebrew and Arabic]. Jerusalem: Council of Sephardi Community.
- Ben Porat, Mordechai. 1996. To Baghdad and Back [Hebrew and English]. Or Yehuda, Israel: Ma'ariv.
- Haim, Sylvia G. 1976. "Aspects of Jewish Life in Baghdad under the Monarchy." Middle Eastern Studies 12: 188–208.
- Hillel, Shlomo. 1985. Operation Babylon [Hebrew and English]. Jerusalem: Idanim.
- Tsimhoni, Daphne. 1991. "Why the Majority of the Jews of Iraq Immigrated to Israel in Operation Ezra and Nehemya" [Hebrew]. In Iyunim Bitkumat Israel, vol. 1, 379–404. Jerusalem: Ben Gurion University.

Modern Jewish Refugees from Arab Countries

David G. Littman

---

A mass exodus of nearly a million Jews from Arab lands occurred in the 20th century, mainly from 1948 to 1972. It coincided with two major events: the restoration of the Jewish homeland and Israel's independence and the end of European colonial rule in Arab countries after World War II.

Oriental Jewry's millennial tradition of Zionism was symbolized 40 years before the First Zionist Conference by a Prussian Orientalist, Heinrich Freiherr von Maltzen. When visiting Tetuan in 1858, he noted that Moroccan Jews would ask him if it was true that the Rothschilds were about to buy back Palestine from the Ottoman sultan, and it would again become a Jewish kingdom (Littman 1985, 229 n. 108).

After Israel gained its independence, 90 years later, they began a massive exodus toward their homeland.

Historical Background as Prologue

Jews had lived throughout the Orient and North Africa from antiquity, and numerous communities had flourished outside the Land of Israel, from the Persian Gulf to the Atlantic, for a more than a millennium before the advent of the Arab invasions in the mid-seventh century. Their spiritual, cultural, and material presence is widely attested in many sources, chronicles, and archaeological remains.

The initial tolerance of the Muslim conquerors was dictated by expediency—so long as the populations submitted without fighting. But as Muslim immigration in the conquered lands, and its occupation, took root the social and economic condition of the indigenous peoples (both Christians and Jews) worsened. Their legal status became that of ahl al-dhimma, a “protected people,” tolerated in the conquered, Islamized lands (now part of the dar al-Islam or the region of Islam), where they were subjected to various disabilities and humiliations specified in regulations known as the Covenant of Umar—the refusal or infringement of which could incur the death penalty.

The minority Jewish communities did not represent a threat to Muslim power and were often considered economically indispensable on account of the onerous jizya (poll tax) and their considerable trading experience. They managed to survive successive conquests and dynastic upheaval, even the cruelest of destructions and forced conversions under the fanatic Almohads of North Africa in the 12th century, when some of the worst persecutions occurred. This was the period when Maimonides, like so many Sephardic Jews, fled with his family from Cordoba, Spain, and then from Fez in Morocco—before finding a home and fame in Fatimid, Egypt. Later, in his epistle to Yemen—where Jews were faced with compulsory apostasy—he wrote:

Never did a nation molest, degrade, debase and hate us as much as they [the Arabs] . . . we have acquiesced, both old and young, to inure ourselves to humiliation . . . all this notwithstanding, we do not escape this continual mistreatment which well nigh crushes us. No matter how we suffer and elect to remain in peace with them, they stir up strife and sedition, as David predicted: “I am for peace, but when I speak, they are for war.” [Psalm 120:7] (Bat Ye’or 1985, 352)

Up to the last decades of the 19th century, and in some regions into the 20th century, the Jews in most of these regions remained a segregated, dhimmi community amid the general population. They resided in special quarters, were usually obliged to wear distinctive clothing and forbidden to carry arms, while their sworn testimony was not accepted in any Islamic court or jurisdiction. Harsh persecutions and massacres often preceded their expulsion or flight. The era of European colonization emancipated the Jews from the discriminatory dhimmi status of the shar’ia law and introduced religious equality—in Algeria they were even granted French citizenship in 1870.

Zionism in the 20th Century and Arab Reactions

Basic Arab anti-Zionism had two powerful root causes:

- The atavistic Christian Judeophobia and anti-Zionism, which was inspired in the 19th century by the Catholic, Orthodox, and Reform Churches, linked to European imperialistic designs in the Holy Land and to the Levantine Christian missions.
- The traditional Muslim concepts on dhimmis, combined with derogative references to Jews in the Koran and the hadith (the sayings of the Prophet Muhammad).

From the 1930s, local Judeophobia, heightened by fascist and Nazi propaganda, increased alongside anti-Zionism, as did economic discrimination and sporadic assassinations, while synagogues were attacked in Egypt, Syria, Iraq, and Aden. A Nazi-inspired hostility intensified dramatically in many Arab countries—even under European control—during World War II and its aftermath when thousands of Jews were brutally killed and injured, and schools and synagogues were bombed in Iraq (the 1941 farhud), Syria (1944, 1945, 1947), Egypt (1945, 1948), Libya (1945, 1948), Beirut, Lebanon (1946), Aden (1947), and Morocco (1948). Most attacks occurred before Israel's independence was declared on May 15, 1948.

A Double Exodus: Arabs from Palestine and Jews from Arab Countries

By the 1940s, the Jewish population of all Arab countries was nearly a million (over 1,200,000 with Turkey and Iran): in Morocco, about 300,000; French Algeria, 150,000; Iraq, roughly 140,000; Tunisia, 120,000; Egypt, 90,000; Yemen and Aden, 60,000; Syria, 40,000; Libya, 40,000; and Lebanon, 6,000.

On November 29, 1947, the United Nations (UN) General Assembly adopted Resolution 181 (the Palestine Partition Plan), which delineated the land west of the Jordan river into two parts: an Arab state and a Jewish state, with an international corpus separatum for Jerusalem, the whole comprising about 22 percent of the roughly 120,000 square kilometers of the original 1922 League of Nations Palestine area. In 1922, the land east of the Jordan River (78 percent or 94,000 square kilometers) became the Emirate of Trans-Jordan by Britain's decision. In 1949, it was renamed the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan soon after the occupation of the West Bank of the Jordan.

This UN decision was refused by the Arab League and the Palestinian leadership—still nominally headed by the mufti of Jerusalem, Haj Amin al-Husayni, who had been named as a war criminal at the Nuremberg trial but was granted asylum in Egypt. Five days earlier, on November 24, 1947, Egypt's delegate, Heykal Pasha, warned the UN General Assembly that the proposed plan “might endanger a million Jews living in Muslim countries. If the United Nations decides to partition Palestine it might be responsible for very grave disorders and for the massacre of a large number of Jews” (Meron 1999, 84).

The title of a New York Times article a day after Israel's Declaration of Independence echoed that warning: “Jews in Grave Danger in all Moslem Lands: Nine Hundred Thousand in Africa and Asia Face Wrath of Their Foes.” The Arab League’s refusal to accept international legality, the infiltration of forces into the UN-designated Jewish state, and the subsequent invasion by the armies of five Arab states in May 1948 led to a double exodus: from 550,000 to 600,000 Arab refugees fled the war zone in Palestine, soon to be followed by an even larger number of Jews obliged to emigrate from Arab lands.

Subjected to regimes of terror, general surveillance, threats and insults, massive arrests, expulsions, sequestrations, and fears for their future, nearly 300,000 destitute Jewish refugees fled Arab countries to Israel from 1948 to 1951 (a further 80,000 left Iran and Turkey). They were integrated even as the nascent Jewish state was threatened with extinction by neighboring Arab states. Nearly 400,000 followed in the subsequent 20 years, thereby doubling Israel’s population, while a further 300,000 found refuge in Europe and the Americas.

After the Six-Day War, UN Security Council Resolution 242 of November 22, 1967, was rejected at the Khartoum Arab League Summit Conference with the slogan: “No peace with Israel, no recognition of Israel, no negotiation with Israel, no concessions on the questions of Palestinian national rights.” But Resolution 242 also called for “a just solution to the refugee problem,” a term covering Jewish refugees from Arab countries as stated by President Jimmy Carter in 1978 at Camp David.

This steadfast refusal by the Palestine Liberation Organization leadership and the Arab League to recognize Israel continued for 40 years—and is still axiomatic for several Arab states and nonstate Arab parties. That denial since 1947 of Israel’s de jure existence in any part of UN-mandated Palestine was the fundamental reason for the double refugee tragedy. But the deliberately targeted victims—far from the Palestinian war zone—were the innocent, indigenous Jews in 10 Arab countries, numbering today scarcely 5,000, half of one percent of the roughly million inhabitants from these ancient communities.

Refugees from Arab Countries and Their Descendants Are Now Half of Israel’s Jewish Population

About half of Israel’s current Jewish population (almost 5.5 million) is composed of these refugees from Arab lands and their descendants who received no humanitarian aid from the UN. It was Israel, with assistance from Jewish communities worldwide, which integrated them into a nascent society. The dire hardship endured by these indigenous Jewish refugees from Arab lands has never received serious attention from the international community, nor has the loss of their private and collective property and their inestimable heritage, dating back to antiquity, been recognized.

Selected Bibliography

- Cohen, Hayyim J. 1973. The Jews of the Middle East 1860–1972. Jerusalem: Israel Universities Press.
- Dineen, Bernard, and Terrence Prittie. 1974. The Double Exodus: A Study of Arab and Jewish Refugees in the Middle East. London: Goodhard Press.

- Gilbert, Martin. 1976. The Jews of Arab Lands: Their History in Maps, illustrated ed. London: Furnival Press.
- Landshut, Siegfried. 1950. Jewish Communities in the Muslim Countries of the Middle East: A Survey. London: The Jewish Chronicle.
- Lewis, Bernard. 1984. The Jews of Islam. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Lewis, Bernard. 1986. Semites and Anti-Semites. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson.
- Littman, David. 1975. "Jews under Muslim Rule in the Late Nineteenth Century." Wiener Library Bulletin 28 (35/36): 65–76
- Littman, David. 1976. "Jews under Muslim Rule, II: Morocco 1903–1912." Wiener Library Bulletin 29 (37/38): 3–19.
- Littman, David. 1985. "Mission to Morocco (1863–1864)." In The Century of Moses Montefiore, edited by Sonia and Vivian D. Lipman, 171–229. London: Oxford University Press.
- Littman, David, and Bat Ye'or. 1976. "Protected Peoples under Islam." In The Myth of Islamic Tolerance: How Islamic Law Treats Non-Muslims, edited by Robert Spencer, 92–106. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books.
- Meron, Ya'akov. 1999. "The Expulsion of the Jews from Arab Countries: The Palestinians' Attitude towards It and Their Claims." In The Forgotten Millions: The Modern Jewish Exodus from Arab Lands, edited by Malka Hillel Shulewitz, 83–125. London: Cassell.
- Roumani, Maurice M. 1975. The Case of the Jews from Arab Countries: A Neglected Issue. Jerusalem: World Organization of Jews from Arab Countries.
- Schechtman, Joseph B. 1961. On Wings of Eagles: The Plight, Exodus and Homecoming of Oriental Jewry. New York: Thomas Yoseloff.
- Shulewitz, Malka Hillel, ed. 1999. The Forgotten Millions: The Modern Jewish Exodus from Arab Lands. London: Cassell.
- Stillman, Norman A. 1979. The Jews of Arab Lands. A History and Source Book. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society.
- Stillman, Norman A. 1999. The Jews of Arab Lands in Modern Times. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society.
- Ye'or, Bat. 1999. "The Dhimmi Factor in the Exodus of Jews from Arab Countries." In The Forgotten Millions: The Modern Jewish Exodus from Arab Lands, edited by Malka Hillel Shulewitz, 33–51. London: Cassell.
- Ye'or, Bat. 2002. Islam and Dhimmitude: Where Civilizations Collide. Cranbury, NJ: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press.

Contemporary Migration Patterns of Russian Jews to Germany

Barbara Dietz

---

Between 1990 and 2005, Jewish communities in Germany experienced an unexpected and remarkable growth, expanding the number of community members from 27,700 in 1990 to 103,000 in the year 2005 (Central Council of Jews in Germany, member statistics). This was primarily the consequence of a considerable immigration movement of Jews from the former Soviet Union to Germany.

Emigration Motivation and German Admission Policy

The emigration of Jews from the Soviet Union and later its successor states has a long tradition that is strongly associated with anti-Semitic sentiments and discrimination (Zaslavsky and Brym 1983; Sabatello 1994). However, emigration from the Soviet Union was kept under strict control by the Soviet authorities until the late 1980s when the policy of perestroika and the subsequent breakup of the Soviet Union led to a relaxation of emigration restrictions. Because of the new freedom to travel abroad, the emigration of Jews from the successor states of the Soviet Union grew considerably (Tolts 2003). Although Israel and the United States had been the most important immigration destinations for Jews from the Soviet Union until the end of the 1980s, since the beginning of the 1990s Germany was increasingly attracting Jewish immigrants, becoming the most important receiving country of Jews from the successor states of the Soviet Union in 2002 (Dietz 2003, 11). Whereas 2,494 Jewish emigrants moved from post-Soviet states to the United States in 2002, 18,878 went to Israel and 19,262 to Germany.

From what is known about the motivation of Jews to leave the former Soviet Union, a number of reasons played a role (Domernik 1997; Schoeps et al. 1999). First of all, overt as well as latent anti-Semitism in Russia, the Ukraine, Moldova, and other successor states of the Soviet Union were push factors. In addition, economic crisis and political instability contributed to the emigration decision of Jews, and in some cases, career advancement, the future of the children, or health problems were decisive factors.

Yet the decision to move to Germany was to a great extent related to the changing admission policies of Western states. When the authorities of post-Soviet states accepted the freedom of movement, many Western states, first of all the United States, closed their borders to immigrants from this area or reduced their immigration quotas. Israel, in contrast, kept its doors open to Jewish immigrants from the former Soviet Union, and Germany introduced a new admission procedure for this group in 1990.

When Jewish emigrants from the former Soviet Union started to move to Germany in the beginning of the 1990s this was in many cases a second choice, as a number of Jewish emigrants, particularly those who lived in mixed families, were insecure about going to Israel for economic, political, religious, or social reasons, and others were unable to obtain a visa for the United States. Besides, some Jewish emigrants voted for Germany because of a greater cultural and linguistic proximity compared with Israel. Furthermore, in the course of the ongoing migration movement to Germany, more and more Jewish emigrants from the former Soviet Union could count on relatives, friends, or acquaintances in Germany who were expected to ease the integration of newcomers. As a consequence, spreading migrant networks supported the Jewish emigration from the former Soviet Union to Germany.

The German admission policy for Jewish emigrants from the former Soviet Union dates back to a July 1990 decision of the German Democratic Republic government to grant asylum to Jewish citizens from the Soviet Union who had come to East Germany because they were threatened by persecution in their home countries. After German reunification, this provision was not incorporated into the Unification

Orthodox Jewish rabbi Yehuda Teichtal holds a candle while lighting a Hanukkah menorah with his family at his home in Berlin, Germany, in 2007. Berlin's Jewish community has grown sharply in recent years with the arrival of thousands of Jews from the former Soviet Union. (Sean Gallup/Getty Images)

Treaty, although Jewish immigrants who had come to Germany between June 1, 1990, and February 15, 1991, were recognized retroactively as so-called "quota refugees." After lengthy discussions the German government invoked its historical responsibility with respect to the Holocaust, to provide refuge to Jewish immigrants in a time when immigration to Germany was highly restricted (Dietz 2003). A further argument was to strengthen Jewish communities in Germany, which were continuously aging.

Until December 2004, entry visas for Jewish immigrants from the former Soviet Union were provided on the basis of the quota refugee regulation, guaranteeing a residence permit for an indefinite period and entitling immigrants to various rights and benefits, for example, language courses and welfare payments. Non-Jewish spouses and children under 18, living in the household of the eligible Jewish immigrant, were equally allowed to move to Germany. However, when the first German Immigration Law was introduced in January 2005, new criteria for the admission of Jewish immigrants from the successor states of the Soviet Union were set up. Entry visas would only be issued if Jewish immigrants were admitted by a Jewish community in Germany, had some command of the German language, and could guarantee that they would not become dependent on welfare payments. Because the Central Council of Jews in Germany severely criticized these new regulations, the German government has so far agreed to revise the new rules and grant entry to those 27,000 applicants who have already received an immigration guarantee (Central Council of Jews in Germany 2006).

How many Jews have actually moved from the successor states of the Soviet Union to Germany since 1990? To answer this question, two sources have to be addressed: the Federal Administration Office and the Central Council of Jews in Germany (see Table 10). Whereas the Federal Administration Office defines the number of Jewish immigrants according to the quota refugee regulation, including the group of non-Jewish spouses and children, the Central Council of Jews in Germany counts only those immigrants who have become a member of Jewish communities, meaning they are Jewish according to the Jewish religious law (Halacha). Consequently, this different classifications result in remarkable differences in immigration figures. As Table 10 shows, according to the Federal Administration Office, 219,604 Jewish quota refugees arrived between January 1991 and December 2004, and 83,642 Jewish immigrants joined the Jewish communities in Germany between 1990 and 2002. In the light of these differences, one might argue that approximately 50 percent of Jewish quota refugees in Germany are either non-Jewish relatives of immigrants or Jews who did not become a member of the Jewish communities.

Table 10 Jewish immigrants from the Former Soviet Union in Germany, 1990–2004

Year	No. of Jews Who Emigrated to Germany <sup>1</sup>	No. of Jews Who Joined the Jewish Communities <sup>2</sup>
1990	N/A	1,008
1991	12,583	5,198
1992	15,879	3,777
1993	16,597	5,205
1994	8,811	5,521
1995	15,184	8,851
1996	15,959	8,608
1997	19,437	7,092
1998	17,788	8,299
1999	18,205	8,929
2000	16,538	7,405
2001	16,711	7,152
2002	19,262	6,597
2003	15,442	N/A
2004	11,208	N/A

<sup>1</sup> Jewish immigration according to the quota refugee regulation (Federal Administration Office, running statistics).

<sup>2</sup> Central Council of Jews in Germany, member statistics.

Jewish Immigrants from the Former Soviet Union in Germany: Sociodemographic Background and Integration

Before moving to Germany, most Jewish immigrants had lived in the European part of the former Soviet Union, in Russia, the Ukraine, the Baltics, Belarus, and Moldova (Schoeps et al. 1999). As is typical of the Jewish population in the former Soviet Union, nearly all had been city dwellers. Although the Jewish immigration to Germany consisted of a relatively high number of people over 50, on average, immigrants are still younger than the Jewish population who remained in the Soviet Union successor states. This is characteristic of family migrations with an ethno-national background, where migrants leave the home country without a return option.

A number of surveys found that Jewish immigrants from the former Soviet Union in Germany are well educated: more than 70 percent have a university or college education (Tress 1995; Schoeps et al. 1999). Many have extensive professional experience as academics, scientists, or technicians. In most cases, however, this high level of human capital cannot be transferred to the German labor market. Among other reasons, incompatibilities in educational attainment and professional experience and the lack of German-language competence are responsible for this (Gruber and Rüssler 2002).

Having arrived in Germany, Jewish immigrants are confronted with wide-ranging integration problems: They have to learn the German language and seek housing, employment, and schools for their children. Furthermore, Jewish immigrants have to face the integration into German society and into Germany's Jewish communities as well. These are not only responsible for assisting Jewish immigrants, primarily with respect to social integration, but they also support and legitimize the immigration and integration procedure.

As Jewish religious traditions have not been part of the education and upbringing of most Jewish immigrants in the former Soviet Union, their Jewish self-identification is not strong. Many are estranged from Judaism, although their Jewish belonging has been reinforced by post-Soviet nationality policy and often by anti-Semitism (Tress 1995). Most Jewish immigrants in Germany maintain strong ties to the Russian language and the cultural traditions of their former home countries (Kessler 2006). In a number of cases, this led to the formation of Russian-speaking circles in Jewish communities in Germany. Obviously, the more secular practice and the post-Soviet cultural background and education set Jewish immigrants apart from local Jewish Community members.

Some Jewish immigrants from the former Soviet Union do not participate in Jewish communities, although they are of Jewish background. Instead, they are active in their own, newly established self-help organizations. Usually these organizations pursue integration-related goals, for example, helping to find housing and jobs or organizing leisure activities. Other Jewish newcomers join groups that have been formed by secular Jews outside the Jewish communities, thus contributing to the heterogeneity of Jewish life.

Beyond the Jewish communities, the integration of Jewish immigrants into German neighborhoods or institutions seems to be rather limited so far. Most Jewish immigrants base their social relations on family and friendship networks that rely on connections built up in the former homeland. Regardless of the obviously slow integration process, a considerable number of Jewish immigrants, especially of the younger generation, express a certain satisfaction with their emigration decision.

To conclude, the implications of the recent Jewish immigration for the Jewish communities and Jewish life in Germany are manifold. In the years to come, the integration of Jewish immigrants from post-Soviet societies will challenge Jewish communities in Germany, as the newcomers represent a more secular and pluralistic population. Nevertheless, the immigration of Jews from the former Soviet Union strengthened German Jewish communities, turning Germany into the only country in Europe with an expanding Jewish population.

Selected Bibliography

- Central Council of Jews in Germany. "The Law since January 2005." <http://www.zentralratjuden.de/de/topic/83.html> (accessed April 28, 2006).
- Dietz, Barbara. 2003. "Jewish Immigrants from the Former Soviet Union in Germany: History, Politics and Social Integration." East European Jewish Affairs 33 (2): 7–19.
- Doomernik, Jeroen. 1997. Going West: Soviet Jewish Immigrants in Berlin since 1990. Avebury, UK: Aldershot.
- Gruber, Sabine, and Rüssler, Harald. 2002. Hochqualifiziert und arbeitslos. Jüdische Kontingentflüchtlinge in Nordrhein-Westfalen [Highly Qualified and Unemployed. Jewish Quota Refugees in Northrhine-Westphalia]. Opladen: Leske+Budrich.
- Kessler, Judith. "Foreigners in Wonderland: Jewish Immigration from the Former Soviet Union." <http://www.berlin-judentum.de/englisch/immigration.htm> (accessed April 28, 2006).
- Sabatello, Eitan. 1994. "Migration from the Former Soviet Union to Israel." In European Migration in the Late Twentieth Century, Historical Patterns, Actual Trends and Social Implications, edited by Heinz Fassmann and Rainer Münz, 261–274. Avebury, UK: Aldershot.
- Schoeps, Julius H., Willi Jasper, and Bernhard Vogt. 1999. Ein neues Judentum in Deutschland [A new Judaism in Germany]. Potsdam, Germany: Verlag für Berlin-Brandenburg.
- Tolts, Mark. 2003. "Mass Aliyah and Jewish Emigration from Russia: Dynamics and Factors." East European Jewish Affairs 33 (2): 71–96.
- Tress, Madeleine. 1995. "Soviet Jews in the Federal Republic of Germany: The Rebuilding of a Community." The Jewish Journal of Sociology 37 (1): 39–54.
- Zaslavsky, Victor, and Robert Brym. 1983. Soviet Jewish Emigration and Soviet Nationality Policy. London: Palgrave Macmillan.

Contemporary Diaspora

The Demography of Modern Diaspora Jewry

Sergio Della-Pergola

---

Earlier Developments

Throughout Jewish history, the concepts of Jewish peoplehood and Jewish population have been powerfully interrelated. Although history cannot be reduced to a sequence of demographic events, the political, social, and cultural impact of mass migration between different countries and the periods of dramatic Jewish population increase or reduction that have appeared periodically do constitute significant markers of the Jewish collective experience in the longer term.

Since the beginnings of transmitted Jewish collective memory, textual, archaeological, and other sources exemplify three important processes that repeatedly affected Jewish demography:

- A succession of periods of growth and decline emerged in Jewish population size and an unequal pace characterized Jewish population development over time;
- Growth or decline differently affected specific sections within the total Jewish population, significantly shaping the sociodemographic composition of the whole; and
- Large-scale international migration repeatedly influenced the location, contexts, and characteristics of the main centers of Jewish civilization.

World Jewish population in antiquity was predominantly located in the Middle East where it originated. Repeated wanderings between Mesopotamia and Egypt resulted in the creation of a main cultural and at times political center in the Land of Canaan that was renamed Eretz Israel (the Land of Israel). Since the early Middle Ages the Jewish population significantly expanded westward to southern Europe and North Africa, then gradually to northwest Europe, and after the 12th century in growing numbers to Eastern Europe.

The size and structure of world Jewry during the Middle Age and early Modern period cannot be accurately assessed, but available evidence points to a range between less than 1 to 2 million persons. Although population size tended to be stable in the long term, major fluctuations reflected occasional catastrophic events, such as famine, mass epidemics, and wars that usually were shared by Jews and non-Jews. Jewish population also periodically declined after massacres, mass expulsions, and forced conversions that particularly targeted Jewish communities in different times and places.

17th Century to World War II

Since the second half of the 17th century, a weakening of these negative factors and modest improvements in general standards of living allowed for a gradual buildup of Jewish population size. World Jewry rose from an estimated 1 million around 1700 to 2.5 million around 1800 and 10.6 millions around 1900 (see Table 11). These rates of Jewish population growth—0.9 percent annually during the 18th century and 1.5 percent annually during the 19th century—were quite unique. Jewish population during this period indeed grew faster than most other national populations in Western and Eastern Europe, Asia, and Africa. Most of the increase after 1850 occurred in Eastern Europe. This demographic transition determined a shift from an early balanced split between Sephardi/Oriental communities, mostly located in the Middle East, North Africa, and parts of southern Europe, and Ashkenazi communities, mostly located in northwestern/Eastern Europe. The eventual result was an overwhelming numerical predominance of the East European component of world Jewry.

Central to the onset of Jewish population growth was a comparatively early decline in mortality and infant mortality rates in particular. This occurred in the context of nearly universal, relatively young, and homogeneous religious Jewish marriage and comparatively high fertility levels. These demographic features reflected the influence of traditional Jewish norms, institutions, and behaviors in the daily life of individuals and communities before the start of modernization. Population growth was also one of the main determinants of increased socioeconomic pressure among impoverished European Jewry. Jewish emigration began in Central Europe around the middle of the 19th century, and since the 1880s decisively developed into mass westward migration from Eastern Europe.

Since the 19th century, and especially in the course of the 20th century, cultural and socioeconomic transformations of Jewish society led to a diminished impact of religious norms in the life of the Jewish Diaspora. Especially important were the geographical and occupational mobility processes that had been set into motion since the liberalization of anti-Jewish laws in Central and Western Europe, which became known as the Emancipation. In the newly urbanized and better-educated context, Jews anticipated the surrounding population in the transition from higher to lower fertility levels—as had already been the case with mortality levels, at least partly thanks to the widespread influence of Jewish religious and social norms.

Jewish migrants to Western countries helped to radically change the geography of world Jewry. More than 2.4 million migrated between 1881 and 1918, and another 1.6 million migrated during the interwar years (see Table 12). Toward the end of the 19th century the United States reached its first million Jews, and over the next 40 years U.S. Jewry was to grow to more than 4.5 million. Migrants to North America, Latin America, South Africa, and Australia imported the demographic models of their communities of origin but rapidly adapted to their new modern environments. Rates of natural increase declined, though in absolute terms Jewish population growth was still substantial and could be estimated at 1.1 percent annually since 1900. At the end of the 1930s, the world's Jewish population was estimated at 16.5 million.

Table 11 World Jewish Population by Major Regions, 1700–2005<sup>1</sup>

Region	1700	1800	1900	1939	1948 <sup>2</sup>	1970 <sup>3</sup>	2005 <sup>4</sup>
Number in thousands
World total	1,100	2,500	10,600	16,500	11,500	12,662	13,034
Total Diaspora	1,095	2,493	10,550	16,055	10,735	10,080	7,796
Total Palestine/Israel	5	7	50	445	650	2,582	5,238
Europe	720	2,020	8,765	9,500	3,750	3,241	1,520
Western Europe <sup>5</sup>	180	363	1,230	1,425	1,035	1,119	1,066
Eastern Europe, Balkan <sup>5</sup>	265	803	3,450	4,680	765	216	94
Former Soviet Union in Europe <sup>6</sup>	275	854	4,085	3,395	1,950	1,906	360
Asia	200	260	440	1,000	1,275	2,944	5,277
Palestine/Israel	5	7	50	445	650	2,582	5,238
Former Soviet Union in Asia	195	253	390	165	350	262	20
Other Asia <sup>7</sup>				390	275	100	19
Africa	175	212	340	600	700	207	79
North Africa <sup>8</sup>	170	200	305	500	595	83	5
South Africa <sup>9</sup>	5	12	35	100	105	124	74
America-Oceania	5	8	1,055	5,400	5,775	6,270	6,158
North America <sup>10</sup>	5	8	1,000	4,940	5,215	5,686	5,652
Latin America			40	430	520	514	397
Oceania <sup>11</sup>	0	0	15	30	40	70	109
Percent
Total Diaspora	99.5	99.7	99.5	97.3	93.3	79.6	59.8
Total Eretz Israel	0.5	0.3	0.5	2.7	5.7	20.4	40.2
Europe	65.5	80.8	82.7	57.6	32.6	25.6	11.7
Western Europe <sup>5</sup>	16.4	14.5	11.6	8.6	9.0	8.8	8.2
Eastern Europe, Balkan <sup>5</sup>	24.1	32.1	32.5	28.4	6.7	1.7	0.7
Former USSR in Europe <sup>6</sup>	25.0	34.2	38.5	20.6	17.0	15.1	2.8
Asia	18.2	10.4	4.2	6.1	11.1	23.3	40.5
Palestine/Israel	0.5	0.3	0.5	2.7	5.7	20.4	40.2
Former Soviet Union in Asia	17.7	10.1	3.7	1.0	3.0	2.1	0.2
Other Asia <sup>7</sup>				2.4	2.4	0.8	0.1
Africa	15.9	8.5	3.2	3.6	6.1	1.6	0.6
North Africa <sup>8</sup>	15.5	8.0	2.9	3.0	5.2	0.7	0.0
South Africa <sup>9</sup>	0.5	0.5	0.3	0.6	0.9	1.0	0.6
America-Oceania	0.5	0.3	10.0	32.7	50.2	49.5	47.2
North America <sup>10</sup>	0.5	0.3	9.4	29.9	45.3	44.9	43.4
Latin America			0.4	2.6	4.5	4.1	3.0
Oceania <sup>11</sup>	0.0	0.0	0.1	0.2	0.3	0.6	0.8

<sup>1</sup> Minor discrepancies due to rounding.<sup>2</sup> May 15.<sup>3</sup> December 31.<sup>4</sup> January 1.<sup>5</sup> Eastern European countries that joined the European Union are included in Eastern Europe.<sup>6</sup> Includes the Asian parts of the Russian Republic and Baltic countries.<sup>7</sup> The Asian parts of Turkey are included in Europe.<sup>8</sup> Includes Ethiopia.<sup>9</sup> South Africa, Zimbabwe, and other sub-Saharan countries.<sup>10</sup> United States and Canada.<sup>11</sup>

Table 12 Jewish International Migration, by Major Areas of Origin and Destination: Absolute Numbers, Percent Distribution, and Yearly Rates per 1,000 Jewish Population in Countries of Origin, 1881–2002

Areas of Origin and Destination	1881–1918	1919–1948 <sup>1</sup>	1948 <sup>1</sup> –1952	1953–1960	1961–1968	1969–1976	1977–1988	1989–1996	1997–2002
	Absolute numbers (thousands)
Grand total <sup>2</sup>	2,400	1,615	855	460	565	451	589	1,240	535
Yearly average	63	55	190	58	71	56	49	155	89
	Percent
From Eastern Europe	97 <sup>3</sup>	86	45	27	20	39	41	64	62
To Western countries	95 <sup>3</sup>	65	8	7	3	8	29	23	25
To Palestine/Israel <sup>4</sup>	2	21	37	20	17	32	12	41	36
From Asia-Africa <sup>5</sup>	3 <sup>6</sup>	5	46	55	59	14	14	19	10
To Western countries	2 <sup>6</sup>	2	4	19	29	5	7	1	1
To Palestine/Israel <sup>4</sup>	1	3	42	36	30	9	8	18	9
From Palestine/Israel to Western countries <sup>7</sup>	0	3	4	15	14	20	24	11	17
From Western countries to Palestine/Israel <sup>4</sup>	0	6	5	3	7	27	20	5	12
Regional subtotals
To Western countries	97	70	16	41	46	33	60	35	43
To Palestine/Israel <sup>4</sup>	3	30	84	59	54	67	40	65	57
Percent to Palestine/Israel
Out of total Eastern Europe	2	24	82	74	85	80	71	64	59
Out of total Asia-Africa	33	60	91	65	51	64	53	95	90
	Yearly emigration per 1,000 Jews in country of origin
Grand total <sup>2</sup>	6	4	17	5	6	4	4	12	7
From Eastern Europe	12 <sup>3</sup>	8	31	7	6	10	12	110	97
To Western countries	12 <sup>3</sup>	6	6	2	1	2	8	38	40
To Palestine/Israel <sup>4</sup>	0	2	25	5	5	8	3	72	57
From Asia-Africa <sup>5</sup>	3 <sup>6</sup>	3	109	43	108	44	73	146	134
To Western countries	2 <sup>6</sup>	1	9	15	52	14	32	42	13
To Palestine/Israel <sup>3</sup>	1	2	100	28	56	30	40	94	121
From Palestine/Israel to Western countries	—	5	6	6	4	4	3	4	3
From Western countries to Palestine/Israel <sup>1</sup>	0	1	1	0	1	2	1	1	1

<sup>1</sup> May 15.

<sup>2</sup> Not including international migration within each typological region.

<sup>3</sup> Including intercontinental migration among western countries.

<sup>4</sup> Since 1970, includes immigrant citizens (from West).

<sup>5</sup> 1990, Asian regions of FSU included in Asia-Africa.

<sup>6</sup> Emigration from Palestine included in migration from Asia-Africa to West countries.

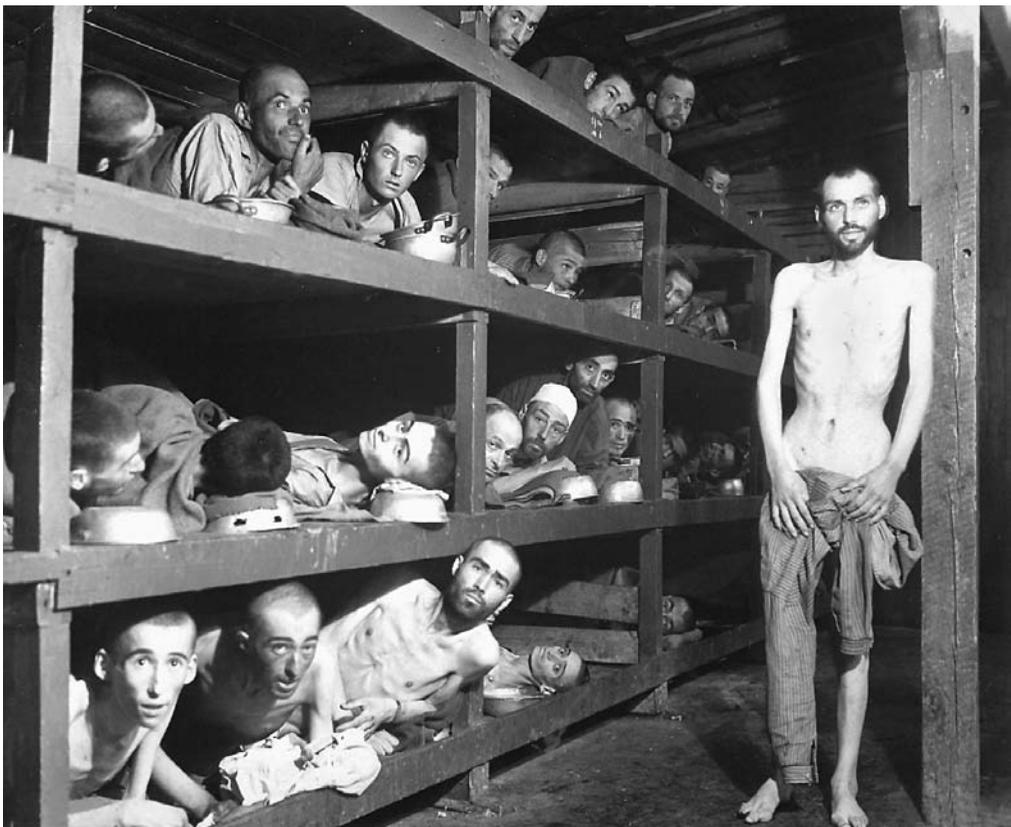

<sup>7</sup> All emigration from Palestine/Israel included here.

Source: Adapted from DellaPergola (1998); Israel Central Bureau of Statistics; HIAS; and various other sources.

World War II to the Present

During World War II, about 6 million Jews perished, largely because of extermination policies carried out by the Nazi regime and its collaborators. The tragic anti-Jewish persecution—known as the Shoah—determined the destruction of 36 percent of the prewar world Jewish population, more than 60 percent of total Jews in Europe Jewry, and the nearly total annihilation of large Jewish communities in Central and Eastern Europe and the Balkans. World Jewry never again recovered its pre-World War II size. Moreover, long-lasting population unbalances were determined by high Jewish child mortality and low birth rates during the Shoah. It has been calculated under very conservative assumptions that had the Shoah not taken the lives of 6 million Jews, these and their descendants would have been part of a total Jewish population ranging between 25 and 32 million in the year 2000. In the same year, the actual Jewish population was about 13 million. The projected virtual cumulated loss incurred by the Jewish people because of the Nazi massacres therefore ranged between 12 and 19 million Jews.

After the shock of World War II, waves of international migration intensely affected the geography of world Jewry in subsequent decades. During the 1950s and Slave laborers in a barrack at Buchenwald concentration camp near Weimar, Germany, on April 16, 1945. On April 11, the U.S. 3rd Army assumed control of the camp, finding many prisoners dead from starvation and scientific experimentation. (National Archives)

1960s, more than 500,000 Jews left North Africa and the Middle East; between the late 1960s and late 1980s more than 250,000 left the Soviet Union. Since 1990, a major exodus from the former Soviet Union involved over a million Jews and members of their households, and all of Ethiopia’s Jews also left their country. Most of these migrants went to Israel. As a consequence of these changes, the cultural-linguistic profile of world Jewry shifted from a predominance of Russian and other Slavic languages toward English and eventually Hebrew (see Table 13).

Of the 11 million Jews left in 1945, 500,000 lived in Palestine. Since Israel’s independence, its Jewish population grew rapidly—to 1 million in 1949, 2 million in 1962, 3 million in 1976, 4 million in 1991, and 5 million in 2001. Mass immigration was the major determinant of growth until the 1960s, while natural increase subsequently predominated. The total size of Diaspora Jewry declined from 10.8 million in 1948 to 10.1 million in 1970, 9.1 million in 1990, and 7.8 million in 2005. After initial mass aliyah to Israel had not impinged on total Diaspora population size, a negative demographic balance prevailed. World Jewish population, after some postwar recovery, was approaching zero population growth. Natural increase in Israel was compensated by natural decrease in the Diaspora.

At the turn of the 21st century, world society, and world Jewry within it, witnessed intensive transformations. The general political, economic, and cultural globalization process involved operative contraction of time and space as well as greater interdependence among different and distant components of world society, such as political-military interests, industrial production, international trade, and most significantly media and communication networks. Continuing gaps in standards of living and human opportunities stimulated large waves of geographical mobility and generated growing ethnocultural heterogeneity in local societies. Although as part of the continuing drive of modernization society became increasingly secularized, large masses of people, including Jews, were more than ever involved in a keen quest for spiritual meaning and sought gratification in religious values and ethnic identities.

In 2005, of a world total of about 13 million Jews, 94 percent lived in nine countries that each had 100,000 Jews or more (see Table 14): the United States, Israel, France, Canada, the United Kingdom, Russia, Argentina, Germany, and Australia. Other significant communities were in Brazil (97,000), Ukraine (89,000), South Africa (74,000), and Hungary (50,000), down to smaller concentrations in another 80 countries with at least 100 Jews. Similar sociodemographic trends prevailed across the

Table 13 World Jewish Population, by Official Language of Country of Residence, 1931–2005<sup>1</sup>

Official Language	1931	1967	2005
English	32	50	47
Hebrew	2	17	40
French	3	4	4
Russian and other Slavic languages	42	18	3
Spanish and Portuguese	3	5	3
German	5	1	1
Arabic	4	1	0
Other	13	4	2

<sup>1</sup> Figures shown are rough percentage estimates.

Table 14 The 15 Countries with the Largest Jewish Populations, 2005

Rank	Country	Population	% of World's Jewish Population	% of Diaspora
1	United States	5,280,000	40.5	67.7
2	Israel	5,237,600	40.2	N/A <sup>1</sup>
3	France	494,000	3.8	6.3
4	Canada	372,000	2.9	4.8
5	United Kingdom	297,000	2.3	3.8
6	Russia	235,000	1.8	3.0
7	Argentina	185,000	1.4	2.4
8	Germany	115,000	0.9	1.5
9	Australia	102,000	0.8	1.3
10	Brazil	96,700	0.7	1.2
11	Ukraine	84,000	0.6	1.1
12	South Africa	72,500	0.6	0.9
13	Hungary	49,900	0.4	0.6
14	Mexico	39,800	0.3	0.5
15	Belgium	31,200	0.2	0.4

<sup>1</sup> Not applicable.

Diaspora: intense concentration in major metropolitan areas (see Table 15, showing that more than 50 percent of world Jewry in 2005 lived in five large metropolitan areas), suburbanization, high educational levels, and specialization in liberal and managerial professions. Recent international migrants were rapidly absorbed and acculturated.

Demographic patterns, too, followed similar courses in the Diaspora. Fertility, after a temporary postwar increase, declined to very low levels, and since the mid-1970s approached 1.5 children per Jewish woman in the Diaspora—this figure also reflects an increase in later marriages, permanent celibacy, and divorce. Low birth rates were the major determinant of a steady process of Jewish population aging. Although these features were common to all industrialized countries, Jews were more intensely affected because of the rapid diffusion of mixed marriage. Already widespread in Western and Central Europe since the early 20th century, mixed marriage had not been significant in North America until the 1960s. Around the year 2000, it was estimated that more than 50 percent of new Jewish spouses in the United States, higher percentages in continental Europe, and up to 80 percent in the Russian Republic, were marrying non-Jewish-born partners who did not convert to Judaism. According to available evidence, most children of mixed marriages are not raised as Jews. The combined effect of low Jewish birth rates, growing proportions of Jewish elderly, frequent mixed marriages, and other forms of assimilation determined a negative balance between Jewish births and deaths among Jews in the Diaspora.

Table 15 The 20 Metropolitan Areas with the Largest Jewish Populations, 2005

Rank	Metropolitan Area <sup>1</sup>	Country	Jewish Population	% of World's Jewish Population
1	Tel Aviv <sup>2,3</sup>	Israel	2,707,000	20.8
2	New York <sup>4</sup>	United States	2,051,000	15.7
3	Los Angeles <sup>4</sup>	United States	668,000	5.1
4	Jerusalem <sup>5</sup>	Israel	660,000	5.1
5	Haifa <sup>2</sup>	Israel	656,000	5.0
6	Southeast Florida <sup>4,6</sup>	United States	498,000	3.8
7	Be'er Sheva <sup>2</sup>	Israel	347,000	2.7
8	Philadelphia <sup>4</sup>	United States	285,000	2.2
9	Paris <sup>9</sup>	France	284,000	2.2
10	Chicago <sup>4</sup>	United States	265,000	2.0
11	San Francisco <sup>4</sup>	United States	218,000	1.7
12	Boston <sup>4</sup>	United States	208,000	1.6
13	London <sup>8</sup>	United Kingdom	195,000	1.5
14	Toronto <sup>9</sup>	Canada	180,000	1.4
15	Washington, DC <sup>10</sup>	United States	166,000	1.3
16	Buenos Aires <sup>11</sup>	Argentina	165,000	1.3
17	Baltimore <sup>10</sup>	United States	106,000	0.8
18	Detroit <sup>4</sup>	United States	103,000	0.8
19	Moscow <sup>12</sup>	Russia	95,000	0.7
20	Montreal <sup>9</sup>	Canada	93,000	0.7

<sup>1</sup>Most metropolitan areas include extended inhabited territory and several municipal authorities around a central city. Definitions vary by country. Some of the estimates may include noncore Jews.

<sup>2</sup>As newly defined in the 1995 Israeli Census.

<sup>3</sup>Includes Ramat Gan, Bene Beraq, Petach Tikvah, Bat Yam, Holon, Rishon Lezion, Netanya, and Ashdod, each of which has a Jewish population larger than 100,000.

<sup>4</sup>Consolidated metropolitan statistical area (CMSA).

<sup>5</sup>Revised estimate. Includes the whole Jerusalem District and parts of the Judea and Samaria districts.

<sup>6</sup>Miami–Fort Lauderdale and West Palm Beach–Boca Raton CMSA.

<sup>7</sup>Departments 75, 77, 78, 91, 92, 93, 94, and 95.

<sup>8</sup>Greater London and contiguous postcode areas.

<sup>9</sup>Census metropolitan area.

<sup>10</sup>Metropolitan statistical area.

<sup>11</sup>Capital Federal and Gran Buenos Aires Partidos.

<sup>12</sup>Territory administered by city council.

By contrast, the Jewish population in Israel continued to feature relatively frequent marriages, a total fertility rate of 2.6–2.7 children per Jewish woman, very rare mixed marriages (besides those performed abroad by new immigrants), a comparatively young age structure, and a moderate but persisting rate of natural increase. Differences in demographic behavior between immigrants of different origins tended to decline through a general process of internal convergence among the Jewish population in Israel.

Table 16 Selected Jewish Populations by Main Age Groups, 1897–2004

Country <sup>1</sup>	Year	0–14 (%)	15–29 (%)	30–44 (%)	45–64 (%)	65+ (%)	Median Age <sup>2</sup>
Traditional type
Ethiopia	1991	51	20	13	11	5	14.7
Syria	1960	43	23	12	16	6	19.6
Russian Empire	1897	41	28	16	12	3	19.8
Romania	1899	40	26	19	12	3	20.8
Transition type
Poland	1921	34	30	16	15	5	23.0
Iran	1976	30	28	19	17	6	25.7
Soviet Union	1926	29	34	18	15	4	29.4
Mexico	1991	24	27	20	22	7	35.0
Venezuela	1998	24	19	21	24	12	35.0
United States	1957	24	17	21	28	10	36.6
Ageing type
United States	1990	19	19	26	19	17	37.6
Prussia	1925	18	25	24	25	8	34.4
United Kingdom	1986	17	19	19	21	24	41.1
United States	2001	16	20	19	26	19	41.5
Italy	1986	14	23	18	26	19	40.8
Russian Republic	1959	14	19	23	36	9	41.2
Terminal type
Russian Republic	1970	10	16	23	31	20	45.5
Yugoslavia	1971	10	23	17	29	21	45.0
Russian Republic	1979	8	15	21	31	25	49.2
Russian Republic	2002	5	11	14	33	37	57.5
Romania	1979	5	11	10	34	40	59.1
Israeli type
Palestine	1931	33	32	19	11	4	23.0
Israel	1948	29	26	26	15	4	27.1
Israel	1961	34	22	19	20	5	25.9
Israel	1985	30	24	20	16	10	27.5
Israel	2004	25	24	19	20	12	30.8

<sup>1</sup> Countries are sorted by the descending percentage of population at age 0–14 years. The largest age group in each population is underlined.

<sup>2</sup> The median divides the population into two equal parts: one half having higher and one half having lower ages than the median age.

Prospective

Future demographic change will reflect the Jewish population's age composition resulting from past trends and continuing gaps in demographic behaviors across Jewish communities in different regional contexts. The leading future scenario points to a Jewish people increasingly concentrated in North America and Israel, with Israel possibly becoming the single largest Jewish community before the end of the first decade of the 21st century. The sharp age-structural differences separating Israel and the Diaspora have already made Israel the largest reservoir of Jewish youth and the principal and most challenging target for Jewish education (see Table 16). On the other hand, over the forthcoming decades the issue of aging will become a crucial and problematic focus for Jewish community service in the Diaspora. Fewer economically productive individuals will be responsible for ensuring the living conditions of a growing share of Jewish elders. In Israel, the evolving demographic balance of Jews and Palestinians within the territorial framework of Israel's pre-1967 borders and even more so over the whole territory between the Mediterranean Sea and the Jordan River, suggests enormous challenges to the very existence of a state that would at the same time be democratic and have a Jewish majority. The prospect of a significant reduction in the share of Jews out of the total population calls for careful evaluation and strategic decisions concerning the definitive political borders of Israel.

Continuation of demographic trends observed during the 1980s and 1990s in Israel and the Diaspora will expectedly produce significant changes in the total size and geographical distribution of world Jewry—in spite of an expected reduction in the impact of international migrations, namely to Israel. By 2020, according to the medium version among a wider range of projections, the Jewish population in Israel would reach 6,228,000—an increase of 1.0 million (19 percent) over the 2005 total. The aggregate Jewish population of the Diaspora would decline to 7,330,000—a loss of 470,000 (6 percent). The 2020 world total of 13.6 million Jews would be 525,000 higher (4 percent) than in 2005. The proportion of Jews in Israel out of the world total would increase from 23 percent in 1975 and 40 percent in 2005 to 46 percent in 2020. Because of different fertility levels and age composition, the proportion living in Israel out of all world Jewish children aged 15 or less could approach 59 percent. On the other hand, Jewish Diaspora communities will become increasingly older and therefore even more exposed to continuing population decline. Polarization between the two major world Jewish population centers in Israel and North America will increase (84 percent altogether in 2020 versus 81 percent in 2005), while the aggregate weight of other communities will continue to diminish.

Selected Bibliography

- Bachi, R. 1977. The Population of Israel. Jerusalem: The Hebrew University and Israel's Prime Minister Office.
- Della-Pergola, S. 1998. "The Global Context of Migration to Israel." In Immigration to Israel: Sociological Perspectives, Studies of Israeli Society, vol. 8, edited by E. Leshem and J. T. Shuval, 51–92. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction.

- Della-Pergola, S. 1999. World Jewry beyond 2000: The Demographic Prospects. Occasional Papers, 2. Oxford, UK: Oxford Centre for Hebrew and Jewish Studies.
- Della-Pergola, S. 2005. "World Jewish Population." American Jewish Year Book 105: 87–122.
- Della-Pergola, S., and L. Cohen, eds. 1992. World Jewish Population: Trends and Policies. Jerusalem: Hebrew University of Jerusalem.
- Della-Pergola, S., U. Rebhun, and M. Tolts. 2000. "Prospecting the Jewish Future: Population Projections 2000–2080." American Jewish Year Book 100: 103–146.
- Della-Pergola, S., U. Rebhun, and M. Tolts. 2005. "Contemporary Jewish Diaspora in Global Context: Human Development Correlates of Population Trends." Israel Studies 11 (1): 61–95.
- Israel Central Bureau of Statistics. Statistical Abstract of Israel. Jerusalem (annual).
- The Jewish People Policy Planning Institute. 2005. Annual Assessment 2005: Facing a Rapidly Changing World. Jerusalem: Jewish People Policy Planning Institute.

Self-Revitalization of Diaspora Life

Martina Urban

---

The term "Jewish renewal," which is predominantly used today to denote trends in North American Judaism since the 1970s, is the common designation for a set of practices or attitudes intended to revitalize Jewish life. To be sure, renewal or revitalization is not a phenomenon exclusive to the modern period. Renewal is an integral feature of the rabbinic concept of tradition as the continuous interpretation of the Torah and the adaptation of its teachings to ever-changing realities. However, it is only with modernity and major reconfigurations of Jewish communal life and identity that renewal becomes an explicit issue. Competing conceptions of renewal were soon formulated by practically all Jewish denominations, placing a different emphasis on the text-centered form of Jewish tradition, on the one hand, and Jewish spirituality, on the other. Confronted with assimilation, conversion, intermarriage, and anti-Semitism, the exploration of viable visions of renewal became a necessity for Jewish continuity. At the close of the 20th century, far-reaching social changes, including gender awareness, gave rise to new conceptions of Jewish renewal. As endemic to most Diaspora communities today, the decline of the Jewish population, caused by a variety of factors, renders revitalization an especially urgent task.

On the threshold to modernity, 18th-century Eastern European Hasidism presents the first self-declared movement for Jewish spiritual renewal. Whereas the Haskalah, the Jewish enlightenment, sought cultural renewal by modernizing Judaism through Hebrew literature, education, and the adoption of secular humanistic values, Hasidism aimed at a major transformation of Jewish religious consciousness. Through a popularization of central ideas of Lurianic Kabbalah, such as tikkun (literally "repair," i.e., the process of restoring the world to its original harmony), Hasidism succeeded in adapting mysticism to everyday life. The movement's emphasis on spiritual worship, that is, religious experience through spontaneous, ecstatic, and devotional worship of God in prayer and contemplation, but also through everyday life, would later inspire in particular spiritual Zionists as well as many subsequent Jewish renewal movements. Attuned to the existential condition of the human being, especially the problem of alienation, spiritual Zionists sought to regenerate Judaism by regaining a sense of authentic community modeled on Hasidism alongside attempts to recover the spiritual power of Hasidism through its myths and legends. Among those who saw Hasidism as the model for Jewish renewal were Micha Joseph Berdichevsky (1865–1921) and Martin Buber (1878–1965). Both shared the conviction that rabbinic Judaism was spiritually moribund and should be replaced with dynamic modes of religious self-realization or even self-redemption represented by Hasidism. In Buber's view, Hasidism realizes a hallowing of existence that overcomes the separation between the profane and sacred and replaces rabbinic Judaism's fixed concept of religion with a vitalizing religiosity. Although neo-Hasidism also gained a powerful voice in Abraham Joshua Heschel (1907–1972), he does not sever Hasidic spirituality from its traditional rabbinic framework. Interested in the constitutive elements of religious consciousness and the manifestation of the divine in human consciousness, Heschel taught that a persistent self-examination in light of Judaism's founding spirit will guard Jewish life from spiritual atrophy. The founding pathos of Judaism is the prophetic consciousness kindled anew in Hasidism, which charges people to transcend their egocentric preoccupations and assume a divine concern with the human condition in its all social and existential dimensions.

A major impulse for rethinking the meaning of Judaism and its forms of religious practice as well as Jewish identity in a secular, post-traditional age came at the late 19th century from Zionism. As a national liberation movement, political Zionism sought a solution for the abnormalities of Jewish Diaspora existence. This

Martin Buber, Austrian-born philosopher of Jewish thought and religion who immigrated to pre-state Israel and helped develop the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. (Library of Congress) uncompromising negation of a continued life in the Diaspora and its alleged lack of Jewish creativity was not shared by liberal Jews. Hermann Cohen (1842–1918) vehemently rejected the Zionist conception of the Jews as a nation in exile as well as Zionism's quest for nationhood. Given his ethical conception of messianism, Cohen defended liberal Judaism's concept of the mission of Israel, which envisions the realization of Judaism's spiritual vocation in the Diaspora.

For Ahad Ha'am (1856–1927), the founder of spiritual or cultural Zionism, Jewish renewal could only be secured by recasting Judaism as a secular culture, which he insisted must maintain continuity with select spiritual qualities and values of traditional Judaism. As a Hebraist he also shared the concerns of those who favored a rebirth of Judaism as a secular culture through language, which for many Eastern European Jews was Yiddish rather than Hebrew. Although a cultural Zionist, Buber focused his efforts on inducing a radical transformation of spiritual consciousness, one that emphasizes religious-ethical sensibilities rather than the observance of the ritual commandments. He envisioned a Jewish renaissance as the revival of original Jewish creativity through a wide range of cultural activities. In his later philosophy of dialogue Buber linked renewal to interpersonal encounter and the establishment of genuine community as the space of renewed revelation of God's presence. Beholden to the humanistic tradition, Buber made education the central pillar for Jewish revitalization. Together with Franz Rosenzweig (1886–1929), Buber headed the Jewish adult education movement in Germany which became the center of Jewish life until it was disbanded by the Nazis in 1938. Through his Free Jewish House of Study, which sponsored Jewish learning, Rosenzweig in particular emphasized the renewal of Judaism as a text-centered culture, in which even non-observant, indeed, agnostic Jews could participate. For Rosenzweig, the study and interpretation of the classical Jewish sources would also prompt an encounter with the divine and with God's voice revealed in those texts that constitute the ontological wellspring of all living Judaism. Rosenzweig sought a culture of learning that would lead from life back to the Torah. Here the meaning of Jewishness assumes a new urgency in which learning requires the individual to continuously transform the text into something living that speaks to one's concrete existential reality.

In the wake of the Holocaust, remnants of European Jewry brought various conceptions of Jewish renewal to North America, where the teachings particularly of Buber and Rosenzweig as well as Heschel had a great impact. However, North America had its own indigenous movement of renewal. Reinterpreting Judaism in light of a naturalistic theology, Mordecai Kaplan (1881–1983) founded Reconstructionism. By conceiving Judaism as an evolving religious civilization rather than a religion based on supernatural revelation and the authority of a transcendent God, and by emphasizing personal autonomy and the pragmatic value of Judaism to promote individual well-being, Kaplan not only created a new denomination but also brought Judaism in accord with liberal values and the pragmatic sensibilities of America.

Jewish renewal entered a new phase with the rise of the counterculture of the late 1960s and early 1970s. At this historical juncture Jewish identity, political engagement, and the quest for social justice and spiritual renewal became inseparably

Reb Zalman Schachter-Shalomi, a “renegade” rabbi who left Orthodoxy and founded a religious fellowship in 1962. He argued for the need for a paradigm shift in Judaism by emphasizing meditation, mysticism, and prayer in the manner of the founders of Hasidism. He currently lives in Boulder, Colorado. (Helena Foster) linked. In this liberal milieu so-called havurot, experimental fellowships for prayer and study founded by young rabbis, academics, and political activists, began to flourish and prepared the ground for the Jewish renewal movement in North America. Among their founders were Rabbi Arthur A. Green, a scholar of Hasidism, the political activist Arthur Waskow, and Michael Strassfeld. Another major figure in redefining Judaism as a spiritual way of life was Zalman Schachter-Shalomi, a renegade Lubavitch ordained rabbi who founded the B'nai Or Religious Fellowship in 1962 (later renamed P'nai Or) to further a paradigm shift in Judaism by emphasizing meditation, mysticism, and prayer for which both Hasidism and Eastern spiritual traditions served as sources of inspiration. Schachter-Shalomi shares the belief of Reconstructionism that Judaism is an evolving religious civilization. He eventually broadened his organization to include the entire spectrum of postdenominational Jewish revitalization efforts, to become ALEPH: Alliance for Jewish Renewal with the Shalom Center for Jewish political activism, founded by Arthur Waskow, as one division. In 1986, Waskow's journal Menorah merged with Schachter-Shalomi's The B'nai Or Newsletter to become the more politically oriented New Menorah. Michael Lerner, founder and editor of the journal Tikkun (1986), likewise addressed the issue of renewal based on tikkun olam as the essence of Judaism in conjunction with a quest for an authentic Jewish identity. Lerner (1994, 14) calls for a Jewish identity that is “more spiritual; moral; God-centered; politically committed to social justice; pluralistic; democratic; nonsexist, joyful; full of intellectual ferment; and open to dissent.” During the 1980s and 1990s, the spirit of Jewish renewal permeated all denominations, above all Reconstructionism. With a new generation of communal leaders, Reconstructionism became increasingly sensitive to the spiritual aspect in Judaism, incorporated some mystical practices and issued new prayer books that reflected its new appreciation of spirituality. The former member of the havurot culture, Arthur A. Green, demonstrated the vitalizing power of Jewish mystical spirituality through Hasidism by adapting some of its ideas and practices to contemporary life. Green, who was influenced by Heschel with whom he studied, has been a central figure in American neo-Hasidism since the 1980s. He occasionally teaches, like Schachter-Shalomi and Waskow, at the transdenominational Jewish retreat center Elat Chayyim.

Since the 1970s, Jewish feminists in the United States made a significant and highly original contribution to revitalizing Judaism. An important concern of women's liberation was social justice, which Jewish feminists also considered a prime aspect of tikkun olam. A first concrete step toward the realization of social transformation within Judaism from the feminist perspective was the admission of women in the Reconstructionist and Reform rabbinate. In academia, Jewish feminists reshaped the knowledge of Judaism through the category of gender. What evolved within Progressive Judaism as a reexamination of Judaism from a variety of disciplines was readily acknowledged by women of other denominations as an important process of re-envisioning or "engendering" Jewish life and thought toward a more active, meaningful, and equal participation of women in ritual practice. These activities gained urgency against the backdrop of communal decline in the Diaspora. By recovering suppressed narratives about women in the classic texts of Judaism, Jewish feminist scholars and writers hoped to restore the voice of woman to the collective memory and to rewrite a Jewish historiography they faulted as patriarchal.

Feminists of Modern Orthodoxy, such as Blu Greenberg, critically examined those aspects of Jewish law that pertain to women, claiming that because the Halacha has evolved over time it can absorb feminist critiques. From a post-traditional perspective of Judaism, Rachel Biale argues for the need of a fundamental reform of Jewish law. Feminist theologian Rachel Adler advocates a revision of liturgy and codes for sexual relations and marriage, while Judith Plaskow proposes to use the method of midrash to fill in the lacunae in the biblical text. Tamar Ross, another voice from within Modern Orthodoxy, crafts a theology of "cumulative revelation" (2004, 197), which accepts the transmitted dominant patriarchal interpretations as part of revelation but claims that feminism is the "new revelation of the divine will" (Ross 2004, 210). Yet, she concedes, consensus of the interpretative community is a presupposition for authenticating these new readings as part of tradition (Oral Torah) and as divine. Parallel to these revalorizations of Judaism from the perspective of gender, various groups and institutions were established: the study group Ezrat Nashim, founded in 1971 by Paula Hyman and others; B'not Esh, a Jewish feminist spirituality collective founded in 1981 by Judith Plaskow; the Jewish Congress Feminist Center in Los Angeles, established in 1991 under the founding rabbinic director, Sue Levi Elwell; Ma'yan, a Jewish feminist spirituality collective founded in 1993 by Barbara Dobkin; and the Jewish Orthodox Feminist Alliance, founded in 1997. Journals were created to advocate a Jewish feminist perspective (Journal of Feminist Studies in Religion, Nashim, and the magazine HUES to name a few). The latest offshoot of Jewish feminism is ecofeminism. Inspired by a gamut of critical theories, ritual innovation also became an issue for queer Jewish theology, which emerged in the 1990s.

Selected Bibliography

- Adler, Rachel. 1998. Engendering Judaism: An Inclusive Theology and Ethics. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society.
- Hauptman, Judith. 2005. Rereading the Mishnah: A New Approach to Ancient Jewish Texts. Texte und Studien zum antiken Judentum. No. 109. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.
- Lerner, Michael. 1994. Jewish Renewal: A Path to Healing and Transformation. New York: Putnam.
- Ross, Tamar. 2004. Expanding the Palace of Torah: Feminism and Orthodoxy. Waltham, MA: Brandeis University Press.
- Silberstein, Laurence J. 1989. "The Renewal of Jewish Spirituality." In Jewish Spirituality. Vol. II, From the Sixteenth-Century Revival to the Present, edited by Arthur A. Green, 402–432. New York: SCM Press.

Jewish Values and Diaspora Philanthropy

Gary A. Tobin

---

Philanthropy in the Diaspora is deeply rooted in Jewish law and tradition as well as the cultures in which Diaspora Jews live. Giving to both Jewish and secular causes reflects a core set of values that are the foundation of a vast network of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs). Most of the NGOs for Jews are designed to serve the Jewish community (e.g., Jewish day schools), some have evolved to serve both Jewish and non-Jewish populations (e.g., Jewish community centers), and others help the larger society (e.g., American Jewish World Service). The NGO system is more a system of systems, each of which operates within its own sphere and represents a specific constellation of beliefs and values.

Sometimes the values that guide Jewish philanthropy are explicit—understood by the volunteers and professionals that contribute to and manage the NGOs and clearly stated in the bylaws and mission statements of the organizations. Other times, the values are implicit, embedded in the activities and programs of the NGO. In many cases, the basic Jewish values guiding a Jewish organization are not fully articulated or understood by the users, providers, or supporters of NGOs.

Philanthropy includes giving money and volunteering time. Both are essential to maintain a healthy NGO delivery system. Modern philanthropy requires leadership in both realms—volunteers who will help guide and manage the NGO and donors who will set standards by how much they give. NGOs also need donated labor for many of their services. Without these components, the philanthropic system cannot function.

The need for Jews to achieve a level of self-reliance and mutual aid, both within specific nations and internationally has led to a well-established and, in many cases, large infrastructure of NGOs. For many Jews outside of Israel, most Jewish values are expressed through NGOs, and in those countries where Jews feel free to do so, they have heavily invested in philanthropy. Successes have been numerous and profound, not the least of which has been the Diaspora support for the establishment of the State of Israel.

Yet Jewish philanthropy, while guided by core Jewish values, is also always in transition. Established Jewish NGOs are continually challenged by the emergence of new initiatives and organizations. Struggles for greater efficacy and efficiency often provide the impetus for new ventures. Inevitably, however, shifts in the Jewish philanthropic world also lead to reevaluation and emergence of new Jewish values that guide philanthropy. Sometimes organizations debate values—what they are, how to fulfill them, and which organization is responsible or best suited to fulfill them.

Traditional Jewish philanthropy is guided by five sets of values. First, Jewish philanthropy is devoted to communal prayer and ritual. The synagogue is the primary institution that embodies this value, although Jewish community centers and other organizations also play this role to a more limited extent. Synagogues are the central institutions for daily, weekly, and seasonal religious services, and they provide most of the rabbis who perform life cycle rituals, such as birth, bar and bat mitzvah, marriage, and death. The synagogue encompasses the values of devotion to God and community—the sacred components of Jewish life. Synagogues, through membership dues (which are charitable donations) and other contributions are one of the core areas of Jewish philanthropic activity, reflecting the central place of religiosity. Most Jews will belong and contribute to synagogues over the course of their lives and will use rabbinic assistance as well.

Second, Jews give money and time to help those in need. The religious directives to support the widow, orphan, homeless, and poor have evolved to include elderly, sick, disabled, and unemployed Jews. Jewish communities have built Jewish family and children's organizations, Jewish vocational services, nursing homes, and subsidized housing for the elderly. Counseling for individuals and families in trouble, help finding a job, and loans for financial crisis are all available from the Jewish community.

Jews contribute heavily to taking care of the needy in the general society as well. In times of crisis, such as natural disasters, Jewish individuals and organizations become deeply involved in relief efforts. On an annual basis, Jews are major contributors to secular NGOs providing human services, and particularly those devoted to health care. Jews provide major support for medical research and to create institutions that tend to the sick in the general society.

The emergence of public support for health care, basic income support, and the availability of public human services necessitate a profound examination of Jewish philanthropic values: How to achieve the right balance between public and Jewish communal NGO services to the needy. This balance requires that the Jewish community avoid duplication while at the same time ensuring that Jews in need are supported. As social welfare systems have developed in modern societies, Jewish communities debate what the appropriate roles should be for the public sector and the Jewish NGO system in providing services, to what extent, and for which populations in need. Whenever possible, the philanthropic system looks to shift resources to the areas of greatest need and to maximize public sector support—for which Jews pay their fair share in publicly collected and distributed tax revenue.

Third, Jewish philanthropy reflects the core value of teaching successive generations about Judaism—in formal classroom settings, with mentors and tutors, and in nonclassroom settings, such as camping or Jewish community center programs. A growing network of Jewish day schools functions alongside the synagogue-based schools that supplement secular public/private education with Jewish learning. Increasingly, Jewish education also targets adults, both those who have little or no Jewish education and those who want to become more steeped in Jewish knowledge.

The value placed on learning transcends giving to Jewish education and motivates donors to contribute to educational institutions of all kinds, especially colleges and universities. Most of the largest contributions made by Jews go to secular higher education, although occasionally to Jewish colleges and universities.

Fourth, the Jewish community has built a group of NGOs devoted to building bridges to other religious, racial, and ethnic groups and serving the function of community defense. Jews value their distinctiveness and separate identity, but they also want to participate as free and equal citizens in Diaspora countries. They cherish the particularity of their own beliefs, customs, and communal cohesiveness, but they also hold fast to a belief in universalism, where Jews participate actively in secular society. Historical anti-Semitism, which seeks to isolate and persecute Jews, combined with the tensions and conflicts that often characterize the interactions among different groups of people, requires constant philanthropic investment from the NGO system in fighting overt and latent anti-Semitism and working to build dialogue, alliances, and cooperative programs with other racial, religious, and ethnic populations.

Self-protection also involves rescue and relief of Jewish populations at political and social risk. This has included the efforts to financially assist major population migrations—from the Arab world in the post-World War II years and, more recently, from the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia. In other cases, efforts are made to secure the Jewish community where they are, such as the Joint Distribution Committee's work in supporting Argentina during economic crisis or building infrastructure in the former Soviet Union. Sometimes the motivation for these efforts is bolstered by the value to take care of the needy as well as to protect Jews from hostile forces.

Rescue and support of population transfers are also anchored in a fifth important value: the support of the historical Jewish homeland and nation state in Israel. This devotion has spurred the creation of hundreds of NGOs that support Israel politically and financially. Jewish philanthropy funds religious, cultural, and educational institutions in Israel, as well as NGOs that are designed to provide financial, political, and military support from the United States and other governments. Institutions and programs have also been built that strengthen ties between Diaspora Jews and Israel, both to reinforce the commitment of Diaspora Jews to support Israel and to reinforce the commitment of Diaspora Jews to their own Jewish identity.

Financial support for Israel allows donors to combine a number of their philanthropic values. For example, supporting medical research at an Israeli university gives the donor three incentives—helping the sick, funding education, and supporting the Jewish nation-state. If the donation is for scholarship for low-income students, another philanthropic value is fulfilled. Philanthropy to support Israel, more often than not, embeds two or more core values of Jewish giving.

Sixth, Jews hold the idea of tikkun olam, “repairing the world,” as a commanding value. Jewish teaching is filled with directives, exhortations, and commandments to do good deeds in a myriad of ways. Even though tikkun olam is one of many mitzvah that Jews can undertake, it has become in a central theme in Jewish philanthropy. Tikkun olam embodies the general desire to make the world a better place in all kinds of ways: improving the environment, seeking justice for minorities who experience discrimination, building libraries, or providing theater, opera, and symphonies to the public. Perhaps the overriding core value in Jewish philanthropy, it represents a sense of obligation and responsibility to improve the natural and human condition in all possible ways. Tikkun olam encompasses all the other values and all efforts for sustenance and progress.

Jewish philanthropy is most powerful when it intersects with and is bolstered by the core values of the secular society where Jews live, as is the case in the United States. Americans have built the most elaborate and successful NGO system in the world. Americans embrace the ideology of giving: Philanthropy is a moral and civic responsibility and obligation. The philanthropic system is envisioned as a partner with the public sector. American Jews, therefore, have dual motivations for giving—as Americans and as Jews. This mutually reinforcing value system helps explain why American Jews are leaders in both American and global Jewish philanthropy. The accumulation of wealth, of course, provides the ability to give, but it does not explain the propensity to give. Many wealthy individuals and societies are not very generous. American Jews have both the means and the commitment to give to both Jewish and secular causes.

Jewish philanthropy is nearly always built upon this foundation of values even though most of the root knowledge and history for giving are unknown to the giver and often the NGOs themselves. But the origins and activities of these values are anchored in Judaism. Yet the language of Jewish philanthropy is more often focused on how to run an annual campaign, attract major gifts, and organize fund-raising events. The language of values is often superficial, with cursory references to Jewish tradition, if any.

Yet as Jewish philanthropy evolves, it seeks to both reinforce and redefine the core values of Jewish philanthropy. Sometimes this means challenging and interpreting how a value is institutionally or programmatically expressed. The constant change is, in itself, also a type of Jewish value: a belief in progress. Jewish values are expressed differently in different places and in different times, revealing a measure of a healthy philanthropic system that changes over time.

Jewish philanthropy has, traditionally, relied on the collective action of the Jewish community. However, this collective action is evolving into a myriad of private decisions, as umbrella fund-raising and distribution give way to private foundations. The core values of Jewish philanthropy are increasingly posing different choices: Should donors fund local NGOs or those in Israel? Jewish education or basic human services? These choices are no longer made in community debate and through consensus, but rather in the marketplace of ideas, NGOs, and private choices.

The dichotomies about where Jews should give are a false construction. While not unlimited, the financial resources of the Jewish community far exceed current giving levels in the Diaspora and to Israel, to secular and Jewish causes, and to meet the various needs within the Jewish community.

There are ambitious old and new organizations that embrace the idea of an ever-changing and ever-growing Jewish philanthropic system. New philanthropic organizations have developed that reflect emerging values in the Jewish community and innovative institutional approaches to issues in Jewish life. For example, the Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America, seeks to expose anti-Semitism in the media, embracing a policy of “sunshine is the best disinfectant” rather than dialogue. Be’chol Lashon (In Every Tongue) promotes racial and ethnic diversity in the Jewish community, tackling head on the issues of Jewish demographic decline, trends of exclusivity, and questions about who is a Jew. El Centro helps Anusim (descendants of Spanish and Portuguese Jews) return to Judaism while celebrating their existing cultural heritage. Nefesh B’Nefesh is helping Jews around the world to make aliyah outside the auspices of traditional Jewish mega-organizations such as the Jewish Appeal. Every year, new organizations emerge that reflect the changing values of Jewish life or develop new approaches to expressing existing values.

Also, there are existing organizations that respond to challenges and mold their operations to meet the changing needs of the Jewish community and beyond. The Joint Distribution Committee, while undoubtedly among the older and larger Jewish NGOs has been able to offer a myriad of funding opportunities to Jewish philanthropists that allow for a greater sense of accountability and personal involvement by donors. As the days of collective action wane, some of the Jewish community’s most well-established organizations are becoming more flexible to allow for increasing donor involvement, innovation, and entrepreneurship in philanthropy.

But the Jewish community should not simply focus on maintaining the high levels of giving Jews have already established—it should seek to increase it. Although Jewish philanthropy is characterized by generosity, especially in times of crisis, the resources available to fulfill the values of Jewish philanthropy are largely underutilized. The language of philanthropy must be reinforced with the language of the values themselves—mission statements, the language of fund-raising, and platitudes about giving back to society and making a difference will not be enough to take Jewish philanthropy to its highest levels. The core values from which Jewish philanthropy evolved must become explicit, and the laws, traditions, and sacred meaning of giving must be reinvigorated. The language of philanthropy should reflect the profound purposes it serves.

Selected Bibliography

- Burlingame, Dwight F., ed. 2004. Philanthropy in America: A Comprehensive Historical Encyclopedia. 3 vols. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO.
- Cutlip, Scott M. 1999. Fund Raising in the United States. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers.

- Marts, Arnaud C. 1991. Philanthropy's Role in Civilization. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers.
- Salamon, Julie. 2003. Rambam's Ladder: A Meditation on Generosity and Why It Is Necessary to Give. New York: Workman.
- Tobin, Gary A. 2001. The Transition of Communal Values and Behavior in Jewish Philanthropy. San Francisco: Institute for Jewish and Community Research.
- Tobin, Gary A., Michael Austin, Meryle Weinstein, and Susan Austin. 1999. Jewish Foundations: A Needs Assessment Study. San Francisco: Institute for Jewish and Community Research.
- Tobin, Gary A., Jeffrey R. Solomon, and Alexander C. Karp. 2003. Mega-Gifts in American Philanthropy: General & Jewish Giving Patterns between 1995–2000. San Francisco: Institute for Jewish and Community Research.
- Wuthnow, Robert. 1991. Acts of Compassion: Caring for Others and Helping Ourselves. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Wuthnow, Robert, Virginia A. Hodgkinson, et al. 1990. Faith and Philanthropy in America. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass.

Contemporary Responses to Intermarriage

Gerald Cromer

---

As American Jews moved to the suburbs after World War II, they underwent a process of acculturation without assimilation. Those living in the newly created gilded ghettos became increasingly indistinguishable from their Gentile neighbors. At the same time, however, the new suburbanites largely remained a group apart. American Jews saw themselves and were viewed by their fellow compatriots as the classic example of voluntary group endogamy. However, the publication of a series of local and national surveys during the 1960s drew attention to a steady increase in the number of Jews “marrying out.” Gradually, the focus of concern shifted from integration to survival and the issue of intermarriage rose to the top of the communal agenda.

As long as the intermarriage rate remained low, academics and communal leaders explained the phenomenon in psychological rather than social terms. They portrayed it, for instance, as a kind of Jewish self-hate and attributed it to dysfunctional family backgrounds. However, these explanations became increasingly difficult to sustain with the dramatic rise in the number of people marrying out. As the rate of intermarriage escalated, it came to be seen less as the result of personal problems of one kind or another and more as “the sting that comes from the honey of freedom.” Marrying out, it was argued, is an inevitable and unfortunate corollary of the privilege of living in an open society.

This realization led to a series of jeremiads and prophecies of doom about the future of the Jewish community. At the height of the concern in the early 1970s, however, a number of sociologists and religious leaders adopted a much more optimistic view of the situation. They suggested that intermarriage provided an opportunity for American Jewry rather than being a threat to its existence. If a concerted attempt was made to reach out to those who marry out rather than to stigmatize them for doing so, it could lead to a net gain rather than a loss for the community.

Following this advice, first the Reform movement and then other religious and communal organizations have set up a wide variety of outreach projects that are designed to impart basic knowledge about the rudiments of Judaism and/or help the partners explore the nature of their relationship to their respective heritages and think about how they want to incorporate them into their marriage and family life. These programs are backed up by a concerted effort to persuade both the leaders and rank-and-file members of the community to accept those who marry out with open arms.

Advocates of this inclusive approach do not only claim that it has led a large number of Gentile partners to identify themselves as Jews and to take an active part in the life of the community, but they also contend that it has had a positive effect on their Jewish spouses. The chance to learn about Judaism and to explore their relationship with it supposedly stimulates a new or renewed interest in and attachment to things Jewish. Meeting the other, it is argued, leads to a clarification of one's own beliefs and a fresh understanding of the self.

Many academics and communal leaders, however, have questioned the effectiveness of the outreach programs in the battle against intermarriage. They are of the opinion that those concerned—both the Gentile and the Jewish partner—do not represent the best target population, and that the community's resources should be channeled toward the moderately affiliated. According to this view of the situation, the emphasis should be shifted to enlarging the core by shrinking the middle, rather than working with those on the periphery of the community or beyond its confines. "Inreach," it is argued, is preferable to outreach for one simple reason; it is more likely to be successful in strengthening American Jewry.

Taking this argument a step further, there are those who claim that the move from outrage to outreach not only does less good than its proponents would have one believe but it also causes a great deal of harm. They contend that adopting an inclusive approach toward those who marry out and their Gentile partners leads others to believe there is nothing wrong in it and to follow in their footsteps. Outreach is therefore counterproductive. Rather than inducing people to join the community, it encourages them to leave its ranks.

A similar debate has taken place concerning two important developments—the solemnization of mixed or nonconversionary marriages, and the introduction of patrilineal descent—within the Reform movement. In both cases, however, the controversy did not only focus on the effect of the changes on the fortunes of American Jewry; it also related to the question of whether they were in keeping with Jewish tradition. Each side claimed it was both the true heir of the community's past and the sole guarantor of its future.

The requirements regarding both the conversion process itself and the couple's subsequent lifestyle have always been much less demanding in the Reform movement than in Conservative and Orthodox Judaism. Nevertheless, a large and growing proportion of intermarriages are mixed or nonconversionary ones in which the Gentile partner decides he or she is not interested or ready to become Jewish. In 1973, the Central Conference of American Rabbis (CCAR) passed a resolution opposing the participation of its members in such weddings, but it seems to have had little or no effect. Taking advantage of the next clause, which recognizes that members of the CCAR hold divergent interpretations of Jewish tradition, an increasing number are willing to solemnize mixed marriages.

Many Reform rabbis insist that the prospective couple accept certain conditions related to the preparations for their marriage (e.g., taking a course of Jewish study), the wedding itself (e.g., no involvement of Christian clergy or presence of Christian symbols), or their family lifestyle afterward (e.g., a commitment to bring their children up as Jews). Nevertheless, the marriage remains a nonconversionary one. Even if all the conditions are met, it is still a union between a Jew and a Gentile.

Having agreed to solemnize mixed marriages, rabbis found it extremely difficult to reject their congregants' demands that the children of these unions be recognized as Jewish. After five years of acrimonious debate the CCAR overturned the long-standing Jewish tradition of matrilineity and declared that "the child of either Jewish parent is under the presumption of Jewish descent." Although this change was first mooted as part of a drive for gender equality, it was actually made as a response to the predicament of an ever-increasing number of Reform Jews. As one scholar succinctly put it: "Social necessity was the mother of rabbinic invention."

Advocates of this and other innovations made no attempt to hide the fact that they were a response to current needs. Indeed, those in favor of solemnizing non-conversionary marriages and patrilineal descent regarded it as point in their favor. Placing themselves firmly within the Reform tradition that views Halacha (Jewish law) as providing guidance rather than being a source of ultimate authority, they believe they have not only the right, but also the duty to adapt it to the needs of contemporary American Jewry.

Those in favor of an inclusive policy toward intermarriage made two seemingly contradictory appeals to tradition. They often contended that the innovations were not a major break with the past. Thus, the advocates of patrilineal descent drew attention to the fact that even though Joseph, Moses, and Solomon married Gentile wives, their children were considered Jewish, and in both biblical and Talmudic times the paternal line alone was followed in matters of inheritance and priesthood. In contrast, they did, on a number of occasions, emphasize the radical nature of the proposed change. In doing so, however, the proponents of change referred to major rabbinic innovations such as Rabbenu Gershom's edict outlawing polygamy to show that Halacha can, indeed should, be altered to meet the needs of the hour.

Clearly, therefore, the advocates of these changes and the accompanying outreach programs defend their stance in terms of the Jewish past and future. There are those, however, who relate to the issue of mixed marriage on a more personal level. A growing number of handbooks for intermarried couples focus on family ties in general and the marital relationship in particular. As far as the authors of these manuals are concerned, the most important thing is to help make intermarriage work for the couple and their children.

This focus of concern finds clear expression in the stance that the self-appointed mentors adopt toward the conversion of the Gentile partner and the religious upbringing of children. Conversion, they point out, is just one of the ways of coping with the complexities of intermarriage and is not inherently preferable to other options. The major criterion for any decision in this regard must be whether or not it contributes to the success of the marriage. The handbooks differ as to whether parents should raise their children in both Judaism and Christianity. Some believe doing so is bound to lead to identity confusion in later life; others insist it gives the next generation the best of both heritages and the opportunity to synthesize them. Either way, however, it is the well-being of the children that is uppermost in the authors' minds. That is the sole criterion for deciding how to raise them.

Those concerned with making intermarriage work make no attempt to underestimate the difficulties in doing so. In fact, they accept that marrying out is a particularly precarious undertaking. The handbooks therefore implore both the Jewish and the Gentile partner to acknowledge the existence of the difficulties and to take two kinds of action, one personal and the other impersonal, to avoid them. Both spouses, it is argued, have to achieve individuation from their parents and discover what their religious affiliation means to them. In addition, the couple must engage in a constant dialogue in order to work out the outstanding issues between them.

Some manuals take this argument a step further. Rather than simply contending that marrying out is not necessarily a recipe for disaster, they insist that it provides an opportunity for personal and interpersonal growth. Differences between spouses are to be celebrated because they can lead to a strengthening of their self-identity and to a deepening of the relationship between them. According to this perspective, intermarriage should be viewed as an opportunity rather than a threat—on the individual and on the communal level. If dealt with in the right way intermarriage can prove to be a blessing in disguise.

Some of the handbooks portray intermarried couples as role models or pioneers who are paving the way to a more promising future for both themselves and the wider community. In contrast, the authors are highly critical and even contemptuous of anyone who is less enthusiastic than they are about intermarriage. They refer to parents who are unwilling to come to terms with their children marrying out as parochial, prejudiced, and even racist. Significantly, none of the manuals attribute parental opposition to the older generation's commitment to Jewish law or Jewish continuity. They explain it instead in psychological terms. Conflicts about intermarriage, the guides insist, are just a reflection of family dynamics in general and the power struggle between the generations in particular.

Explanations of this nature are highly reminiscent of those used before the steep rise in intermarriage to help understand why Jews married out. This parallelism is, perhaps, the clearest sign of the enormous change that has occurred in American Jewry over the past 50 years. The stigma that was attached to those who marry out has not simply ceased to exist in large sectors of the community; instead, it has been transferred to their parents and communal leaders who oppose them doing so. The outrage is increasingly directed against those who take a firm stand against exogamy. It is they who are now beyond the pale.

Selected Bibliography

- Cohen, Steven M., and Leonard J. Fein. 1985. "From Integration to Survival: Jewish Anxieties in Transition." Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science 480: 75–88.
- Cromer, Gerald. 2004. The Quintessential Dilemma: American Jewish Responses to Inter-marriage. Ramat Gan, Israel: Rappaport Center for Assimilation Research.
- Massarik, Fred. 1978. "Rethinking the Inter-marriage Crisis." Moment (July): 25–26, 31–33.
- Petsonik, Judy, and Jim Rensen. 1988. The Inter-marriage Handbook: A Guide for Jews and Christians. New York: William Morrow.
- Wertheimer, Jack, Charles S. Liebman, and Steven M. Cohen. 1996. "How to Save American Jews." Commentary 101 (1, January): 47–51.

A Rabbi's Reflections on the Modern Rabbinate and the Jewish Community

Marc D. Angel

---

Before the onset of the modern period, Jewish communities operated within the framework of Jewish law and custom. Jews generally lived in their own sections of town, ran their own schools, and spoke their own languages; they functioned as autonomous communities, relatively insulated from the larger non-Jewish society around them. Jews did not have—or even expect—full privileges of citizenship or equal access to opportunities available to non-Jews. They suffered anti-Jewish discrimination as a normal feature of life.

In the premodern Jewish communities, the role of rabbi was of central importance. The rabbi was the authority in Jewish law to whom people could turn for religious guidance. In many cases, he served on the community's rabbinic court, taught in the yeshiva, oversaw the town's kashruth, and represented the Jewish community to the non-Jewish authorities. His hallmark was Torah scholarship. His task was to teach Torah and lead his community according to its dictates.

With the advent of the modern period, Jewish communities throughout the world underwent major transformations. Increasingly, Jews gained citizenship rights, attended secular schools and universities, and interacted freely with non-Jews. The process of modernization included a lessening of attachment to Jewish law and tradition and a consequent breakdown in the traditional patterns of Jewish life. Assimilation increased. Non-Orthodox religious movements arose, claiming to modernize Judaism.

The demography of the Jewish world also underwent massive changes, especially beginning in the latter 19th century. Significant numbers of Jews left Europe for America; thousands were drawn to the Land of Israel through the inspiration of the Zionist movement. Even within Europe and its colonies, many Jews were leaving villages to move to cities.

These cataclysmic sociological changes ripped the fabric of Jewish life. Large segments of the Jewish people now lived outside the orbit of traditional religious life. Spiritual and cultural battles erupted between traditionalists and nontraditionalists. Western Judaism became fragmented into competing movements. Many Jews abandoned traditional Jewish belief and observance.

Where traditional patterns held, though, the role of the rabbi as Halachic authority also held. Rabbis were primarily Torah scholars and teachers. They gave guidance to their community based on the Torah wisdom they had attained. This model has continued to prevail within the right-wing Orthodox and Hasidic communities.

Where non-Orthodox communities emerged, rabbis were no longer Halachic authorities—because the people had largely discarded Halacha. They no longer taught in a yeshiva—because the non-Orthodox did not have yeshivas. They were not members of a beth din—because non-Orthodox Jews went to secular courts rather than rabbinic courts to resolve their disputes. Rather, rabbis emerged as a minister of religion—officiating at religious and life-cycle services, providing pastoral counseling, and preaching on righteousness and moral causes. Some became involved in societal issues, interfaith work, charitable efforts, and work on behalf of Israel. Instead of Torah scholarship being their hallmark, the focus for non-Orthodox rabbis shifted to such areas as social work, social action, and communal relations.

Modern Orthodox rabbis have forged a new model of rabbinic leadership. On the one hand, they see their role as Halachic authority, Torah scholar, and teacher. Like the traditionalists, they are vitally concerned with the ritual religious framework of their community: kashruth, mikvah, eiruv, day schools, and yeshivas. Yet they have also taken on roles characteristic of modern religious leaders: pastoral,

The Torah scroll contains the five books of Moses, otherwise known as the written law, which is the basis for the Talmud and the Halacha. (Steven Allan) social, and communal. They work with the general organizations and charities of the entire Jewish community (not just the Orthodox); they may engage in interfaith work, political action, and especially efforts on behalf of the State of Israel.

Just as right-wing traditionalists have fostered a rabbinate that serves their needs, and just as non-Orthodox communities have fostered a rabbinate that reflects their interests—so the Modern Orthodox community has engendered a rabbinate that combines traditionalism and modernity. Modern Orthodox rabbis not only have studied in yeshivas, but most have also attained college and advanced degrees.

The role of rabbis, then, is influenced by the expectations of their communities. On the other hand, it is vital for rabbis to be focused clearly on their own mission in life and not to let the pressures of communal life crush their idealism. Rabbis, certainly in the Orthodox tradition, must be Torah scholars and therefore devote considerable time to Torah study and teaching. They must reach out to all segments of their community, bringing everyone closer to Torah observance and values. They must teach not only by word but also by example. Because there are so many calls on a rabbi's time—meetings, funerals, counseling sessions, classes, communal obligations, and so on—it is possible for them to feel overwhelmed by their multifarious responsibilities. Peoples' expectations of rabbis are often unrealistic. Unless they are true to their ideals, rabbis risk becoming petty bureaucrats or low-level play actors—a parody of what a rabbi should be.

Rabbis need to make priorities, schedule their time intelligently, be available to congregants and community members, maintain a regimen of Torah study, and tend to the religious needs of the community. They need to work respectfully with their congregation to elevate religious life and Torah commitment. They must foster communal harmony but must not shrink from controversy or independent thought.

What is a rabbi? Rabbis are persons who occupy themselves with assorted tasks and responsibilities on behalf of Judaism and the Jewish people. They accomplish various things, accumulate certain honors, and fill certain functions.

Who is a rabbi? A rabbi is someone who finds no rest in this world and expects to find no rest in the world to come. A rabbi is someone who strives mightily—and often without success—to go from strength to strength in service to the Almighty, the Jewish people, and humanity.

Selected Bibliography

Angel, Marc D. 2001. But Who Am I and Who Are My People: A Rabbi's Reflections on the Rabbinate and the Jewish Community. Hoboken, NJ: Ktav.

Insight into the Workings of a Diaspora Beth Din

Raymond Apple

---

The institution of a beth din (“house of judgment”) is traced back to biblical times, when Moses appointed elders to help judge and govern the people. Other biblical figures are also said to have had their batei (pl.) din, and in the rabbinic period there arose a controlled hierarchy of courts that dealt with both civil and ritual law. Because the Torah requires difficult questions to be submitted to “the judge that shall be in those days” (Deuteronomy 17:9), it was taken for granted that community decision making should be made by duly authorized experts. Some matters could be adjudicated by a sole judge, but a rabbi who acted without colleagues was regarded as arrogant. The basic number of judges required for most matters was three, although larger courts were needed for some purposes.

The range of matters dealt with by batei din in the Diaspora depended on the degree of autonomy enjoyed by the community. Rabbinic responsa (she’elot ut’shuvot) indicate that about 70 percent of rulings made in pre-Emancipation communities dealt with commercial, civil, and even criminal cases. These responsa not only indicate the development of Jewish law in these areas but also afford information about the social and economic life of the times.

With the coming of the Emancipation, rabbinic jurisdiction shrank. Jews were now able to and did resort to the civil authorities, leaving the rabbis to deal with ecclesiastical matters such as prayers, synagogue procedures, life-cycle events, and kosher food. Orthodox Jews still honored the principle of taking their disputes with other Jews or Jewish institutions to a beth din, though others regarded a summons to a beth din as religious coercion. In modern legal systems a beth din is often an accepted medium of alternative dispute resolution, and its arbitrations are binding as a matter of civil law unless there is misconduct, such as fraud, corruption, bias, or denial of natural justice.

Usually there is only one official beth din in a city. Some congregations have established their own internal judicial system, but their batei din do not claim jurisdiction outside their own group. The procedures followed in all batei din are laid down by the volume of the Shulhan Arukh (Code of Jewish Law) known as Hoshen Mishpat (the Breastplate of Justice). Unlike dinei Torah (arbitrations), which are recognized by the secular legal system, Diaspora batei din generally have no power of compulsion or sanctions, though it is assumed that those who submit a ritual question to a beth din will abide by its decision.

A beth din’s agenda usually depends on the time and circumstances. Examples are the cases of agunot (women whose husbands are missing) after World War II, and the effect of recent technological developments on many areas of Jewish law. If Beth din rulings in different places are not identical, it is generally the result of different circumstances.

Batei din are often engaged in all or many of the following activities:

1. Responding to queries on Halacha. On unusual or complex questions, there will be consultation with other batei din and/or expert pos'kim (decisors), and the rulings may be incorporated into written responsa.
2. Advising synagogues and communal institutions, for example, on matters of liturgy, kashruth, Shabbat observance, and burial procedures.
3. Conducting dinei Torah and issuing rulings in due form.
4. Administering gittin (religious divorces). Ancillary issues that arise include securing the cooperation of a recalcitrant spouse, the relationship of Jewish and secular courts, the status of Israelis living in the Diaspora, financial settlements, and the well-being of children of the marriage.
5. Responding to applications for conversion; some batei din never or rarely accept converts, whereas others are more active in this field.
6. Advising in family matters such as adoption, circumcision, pidyon haben (“redemption of the first born son”), bar and bath mitzvah, and marriage.
7. Supervising shehitah (kosher slaughter of animals) and butcheries; the provision of kosher foods, matzo, and Passover commodities; function catering, and so on.
8. Supervising religious institutions and facilities, such as mikvahs (ritual baths) and sha'atnez (forbidden mixtures of textiles) laboratories.
9. Examining and certifying candidates for appointment as mohels (circumcisers), shohetim (slaughterers), mashgihim (supervisors), sopherim (scribes), and so on.
10. Attesting and issuing documentation of Jewish status. This issue has become topical since the emigration of ex-Russians to many parts of the Jewish world.

Certain batei din exercise jurisdiction over a number of countries; for example, Australian batei din handle Halachic queries for Southeast Asian communities. As a matter of courtesy, a visiting dayan (judge) from elsewhere will be invited to sit in on proceedings in another city or country. The contacts created assist the process of inter-beth din consultation and often reinforce the status of the host beth din. All batei din have contacts with Israeli rabbinical courts, and though there is no requirement for Israel to endorse a dayan's qualifications to sit on a Diaspora beth din, the informal relationship with Israel is highly valued. In British Empire and former colonies the batei din were originally appointed and authorized by the chief rabbi in London but local independence is now established.

In contrast to the period after the Emancipation, there is increasing resort to Halachic sources and authorities on broader issues of social, economic, and political life. Batei din are called upon to advise and rule in relation to business and professional ethics and bioethics, as well as taxation, inheritance, and intellectual property. Queries constantly arise in connection with synagogues and their religious and lay leadership. The interrelationship between institutions and community facilities frequently raises the issue of hassagat g'vul (encroachment on another's territory); for instance, how far away should one school of synagogue be from another, or a butchery, bakery, or other kosher outlet.

In some communities the beth din members are full- or part-time paid officials of the community. In other communities a congregational rabbi doubles as a dayan without additional salary.

Selected Bibliography

- Elon, Menachem. 1994. Jewish Law, History, Sources, Principles. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society.
- Schachter, Jacob. 1952. "Talmudical Introductions down to the Time of Chajes." In The Student's Guide through the Talmud, edited by Z. H. Chajes. London: East and West Library.
- Weinryb, Bernard D. 1967. "Responsa as a Source for History (Methodological Problems)" In Essays Presented to Chief Rabbi Israel Brodie on the Occasion of his Seventieth Birthday, edited by H. J. Zimmels, J. Rabbinowitz, and I. Feinstein, 275-290. London: Soncino.

Contemporary Conversion Patterns into Orthodox Judaism

Marc D. Angel

---

Each year, thousands of people throughout the world convert to Judaism. They come from different religious backgrounds, races, geographical locations, and sociological conditions.

Within the State of Israel, almost all conversions are performed under the aegis of the Orthodox rabbinate. In the Diaspora, though, most conversions are performed under non-Orthodox auspices. Although many converts in Israel choose to become Jewish in order to feel fully integrated into the Jewish state, converts in the Diaspora come to Judaism for a variety of reasons. Some are seekers of truth who have become disenchanted with the religion in which they were raised and have found spiritual satisfaction in the Jewish tradition. Others have discovered Jewish ancestry and wish to reconnect with the religion of their forebears. A growing phenomenon is the desire to return to Judaism among descendants of "anousim" (Jews forcibly converted to Christianity in medieval Spain and Portugal).

A large percentage of converts choose Judaism for the sake of Jewish spouses. They would like to marry or are already married to a Jew. They wish to convert in order to remove friction from their marriage and to enable them to raise their children in one faith tradition.

Some converts seek Orthodox conversions after previously having undergone non-Orthodox conversions. As their levels of Jewish knowledge and observance increase, they opt to convert according to Halacha as practiced by Orthodoxy.

Some converts are children of Jewish fathers and non-Jewish mothers. Although they are not Jewish according to Halacha, they may have a strong Jewish identity and would now like to become Jewish according to Halachic standards.

Orthodoxy—whether in Israel or the Diaspora—only recognizes the validity of conversions performed according to Halacha. The process entails circumcision

(for males), ritual immersion in a mikvah, and acceptance of the commandments of the Torah tradition. The conversion must be sanctioned by a rabbinic court (beth din) of three members, all of whom are fully observant of Halacha. Since the Reform movement does not subscribe to the Halachic system, its conversions are not Halachically valid, by self-definition. Although the Conservative movement claims to adhere to Halacha, it has introduced major revisions based on opinions of its own rabbinic authorities. Their beliefs and rulings are sometimes in sharp contrast to Orthodox understanding and practice; therefore, conversions performed by their rabbis are generally not recognized as valid within Orthodoxy.

In the Diaspora, many converts to Judaism have not converted according to Halacha. Although they have left their birth religions and have adopted a Jewish identity, their status (and that of the children of female non-Halachic converts) is not Halachically Jewish. This poses a variety of problems, especially when it comes to establishing Jewish status for purposes of marriage.

Although Orthodoxy validates only conversions performed according to Halacha, many Orthodox rabbis do not engage in conversions at all; many others do so only with great reluctance. Orthodox rabbinic courts in Europe and North America have raised increasing obstacles in the paths of would-be converts, so that the conversion process might take years. While proclaiming the inefficacy of non-Halachic conversions, the Orthodox rabbinate in general has not provided a meaningful and realistic Halachic alternative for those seeking to join the Jewish people and the Jewish faith, except for those willing to accept a totally Orthodox lifestyle.

Certainly, Judaism historically has not seen itself as a proselytizing religion. It recognizes that people of all nations can be righteous and worthy of a place in the world to come. As long as they observe the basic principles of faith and morality (i.e., the Noahide laws), they do not need to seek salvation by becoming Jewish. Thus, those who choose to become Jewish should do so only because of an extraordinary attachment to the teachings of Judaism and a sincere desire to be counted among the Jewish people.

In discussing the procedure for receiving candidates for conversion, the Talmud instructs that the person be told of the consequences of becoming Jewish:

Our rabbis taught: if at the present time a person desires to become a proselyte, he is to be addressed as follows: Why do you come to be a proselyte? Do you not know that Israel at the present time is persecuted and oppressed, despised, harassed, and overcome by afflictions? If he replies, I know and yet am unworthy [but still wish to convert], he is accepted forthwith, and is given instruction in some of the minor and some of the major commandments . . . He is not, however, to be persuaded or dissuaded too much. (Yebamot 47a–b)

The candidate for conversion needs to realize that he or she must identify with the fate and destiny of the Jewish people and must also be held responsible for observing the religious practices of Judaism.

The Talmud records the opinion of Rabbi Nehemiah who invalidates conversions in cases where the convert comes to Judaism for ulterior motives, for example, to marry a Jew, to gain worldly advantages, or because of fear. According to this opinion, proselytes may be accepted only if their motives are purely religious and idealistic. Yet Rabbi Nehemiah's opinion is rejected by the Talmud, and the accepted law is that conversions are valid even when the convert had ulterior motives (Yebamot 24b). Maimonides codified the law: "Even if it is known that he converted for some ulterior motive, once he has been circumcised and immersed he has left the status of being a non-Jew." Although one might suspect the convert's sincerity, such a person is still a valid convert. Maimonides adds: "Even if he recanted and worshipped idols, he is [considered] a Jewish apostate; if he betroths a Jewish woman according to halakha, they are betrothed. . . . Having immersed, he is a Jew" (Maimonides, Mishneh Torah, Isurei Biah 13:17). Although it is preferable for converts to be inspired by pure religious motives, their conversions are Halachically valid even when ulterior motives are involved.

Over the ages, some Halachic authorities have taken a positive view of conversion, and others have taken a far more restrictive view. The inclusive view is based solidly on Halachic precedent in the Talmud, Maimonides, and other classic Halachic codes and responsa. The restrictive view, though reflected in ancient and medieval rabbinic literature, has become more widespread since the 19th century.

With the rise of modernity, Jews have had much greater contact with non-Jews, and the incidence of intermarriage has increased. With the breakdown of traditional religious belief and observance, some Halachic authorities have thought it best to raise standards, demanding that potential converts spend many months, even years, studying Torah and that they agree to observe the religion according to all the rules of Orthodox tradition. In 1876, a leading Halachic authority—Rabbi Yitzchak Shmelkes—went so far as to rule that a conversion is not valid unless the convert fully observes the commandments of the Torah (Beit Yitzchak, 2:100). This view became increasingly accepted, especially within the Orthodox Ashkenazic communities of Europe.

Great Halachic authorities have rejected the opinion of Rabbi Shmelkes and have been far more receptive to receiving converts into Judaism, even under less than ideal conditions. A powerful exponent of the inclusive view was Rabbi Benzion Uziel, Sephardic chief rabbi of Israel (Mishpetei Uziel, 5724, nos. 18 and 20). He argued that it is incumbent for rabbis to enable people to convert to Judaism—even if their religious commitments and observances are deficient—especially if such candidates for conversion are involved with a Jewish fiancé or spouse. Such conversions eliminate the sin of intermarriage and provide the possibility for children to grow up in fully Jewish homes. Rabbi Uziel did not see himself as being lenient in matters of conversion, but strict in his opposition to intermarriage.

Although there are Orthodox rabbis in the Diaspora who subscribe to Rabbi Uziel's view, the dominant position tends to be far more restrictive. Many of the rabbinic courts are controlled—or strongly influenced by—the more extreme right-wing Orthodox Halachic authorities who tend to sympathize with the restrictive position. Thus, potential converts may find it preferable to turn to non-Orthodox channels for conversion.

Orthodoxy, though, has a strong and attractive message for those considering conversion to Judaism. It fosters a traditional belief system and way of life that provide meaning and happiness. Even when potential converts face initial rebuff by Orthodox rabbis, those who persist often find the conversion experience to be exhilarating. Although many Orthodox rabbis are not receptive to working with would-be converts, others are quite open and helpful. It is to be hoped that the Orthodox rabbinate in general will come to accept the singular responsibility of providing religious guidance and instruction to the thousands of people who wish to join the Jewish people and religion.

Selected Bibliography

- Angel, Marc D. 2005. Choosing to Be Jewish: The Orthodox Road to Conversion. Jersey City, NJ: Ktav.
- Zohar, Zvi, and Abraham Sagi. 1994. Giyur ve-Zehut Yehudit. Jerusalem: Shalom Hartman Institute and the Bialik Institute.

Jewish Day School Education in French-Speaking Europe

Zehavit Gross

---

Jewish education is considered the best antidote to assimilation and the only guarantee for Jewish commitment and continuity (Waxman 2001). Hence, the future of European Jewry depends on the quality of its Jewish day schools. The aim of this entry is to describe the challenges facing Jewish day schools in francophone countries. The information is based on a study carried out in six Jewish day schools in Paris, three in Brussels, Belgium, and one in Geneva, Switzerland (Gross 2002).

The main threat to the existence of many Jewish communities in Europe, and especially the francophone communities, are incidents of anti-Semitism and violence toward Jews. In response, for security reasons, many Jews prefer to send their children to Jewish day schools rather than to public schools. If the increase in violence continues, there will be a growing need to establish new schools in those countries, as the existing schools will not be able to hold the vast number of Jews who want to send their children to Jewish schools. The question is whether these schools will be the same as the schools that exist today, or whether something new and fresh will develop.

Today in francophone countries, Jewish schools are not attractive to many parents; as a result, a relatively small minority sends their children to Jewish schools (Tal 2005). These day schools cope with four main problems:

1. Resources: the financial state of most school is very poor, their infrastructure is primitive, and they lack the basic educational equipment needed in a modern school.
2. The economic status of the teachers: the salaries of most teachers in Jewish education are lower than the official salary tables accepted in all three countries, and teachers have no union to protect their interests. They have personal contracts (formal and informal), generally for part-time positions, and need to supplement their income by working in more than one school. As a result, many schools cannot establish a permanent staff for Jewish studies.

3. The social status of the teachers: most of the teachers are of Sephardic origin and low socioeconomic status. There is a correlation between their low salaries and their image in the eyes of students and parents.
4. Professionalism: most of the teachers have neither formal professional training (didactic or disciplinary) nor a diploma from an academic institution.

In spite of these obstacles, the teachers are generally extremely committed to their profession. They view their work as a mission rather than as a job and are ready to sacrifice.

The organizational structure of most of the schools is bureaucratic and hierarchical. The hierarchy is headed by the state, which has de jure influence over school affairs. Each principal (except those in Geneva) is bound by state law and is subordinate to the school board or committee, which is made up of key community personalities, such as rabbis, wealthy members of the Jewish community, intellectuals, selected parents of high socioeconomic status, and official community representatives and headed by a president. The committee is the direct employer of the principal and functions as the school's executive body. According to most principals, the school committees are as important as the state.

The more centralized the state, the more pivotal its influence on components of professional administrative functions and school curricula. School principals in France indicate that they have more extensive reporting obligations vis-à-vis the state and that the bureaucratic procedures they have to follow are more complex than is the case for their peers in Belgium or Switzerland. This is probably related to the fact that, as representatives of the state, Parisian principals exercise a great deal of power on behalf of the state, and thus their accountability is greater than that of Belgian or Swiss principals.

The most prominent similarity among all schools is the dual structure of school organization, comprising two subcurricular systems (general studies and Jewish studies). This duality on the organizational/administrative level corresponds to particularistic (Jewish) and universal (general) elements and reflects the ambivalence of the Jewish school toward the bicultural world in which Jews live as a minority.

The schools maintain no official, practical contact with parents as individuals except through ad hoc committees. Students are situated at the bottom of the school hierarchy and are expected to adhere to the school curriculum and obey its teachers. Students take this situation for granted and accept it as part of the francophone tradition of hierarchy and order.

The school's organizational structure and balance of power reflects its identity and conceptual world. That is, its organizational structure reflects the forces operating within the school system, the power wielded by various actors, and the relationships existing between the system and the actors. A school's balance of power is thus a practical manifestation of its inherent political inclination and identity (Gross 2006).

All the principals surveyed claim that the purpose of a Jewish school is to enhance Jewish education, expose children to Jewish culture, and create a Jewish milieu where Jews can meet in order to avoid assimilation. However, the hours allocated to the Jewish curriculum are limited and the level and quality of Jewish studies is very low. In most schools, Judaism is perceived in the narrow sense of observance of precepts and not as a civilization in the broader sense. The process of socialization places greater emphasis on the behavioral aspects of Judaism (religious laws and practices) than on cultural ones. Judaism as taught at school is perceived as anachronistic and does not seem to be an equivalent alternative to the meaningful existential experience bestowed by the values of the modern Western world.

The connection to Israel is the foundation of the school but there are fundamental differences between schools. The more religious the school, the more positive its attitude toward the Land of Israel from the theological aspect and the more critical it is from the political point of view. In most schools (especially in Paris, where there is a rapidly growing ultra-Orthodox or haredi community) there is criticism about the secular nature of Israel. On the other hand, in the more pluralistic and secular schools (for example, in Brussels, where there is a rapid process of secularization and assimilation), which view Judaism as culture, the State of Israel and the Hebrew language serve as the focus of Jewish education. These dichotomous attitudes are accompanied by negative feelings toward the State of Israel for universal-humanistic reasons (because of the Israeli policy in the West Bank and its relationship with the Palestinians). This attitude can be found among leftist radical intellectuals in Brussels and Paris.

If Jewish education is the basis for Jewish continuity, the local Jewish communities in these countries need to view it as the core of their financial, spiritual, and human investment. The financial priorities of the communities, as well as the professional empowerment of the schools, will make the schools agents of Jewish education, not merely schools for Jews.

Selected Bibliography

- Gross, Zehavit. 2002. From Philanthropy to Meritocracy: The World of Jewish Day Schools in Paris, Brussels and Geneva [Hebrew]. Ramat Gan, Israel: Rappaport Center for Research of Assimilation and Jewish Vitality, Bar-Ilan University.
- Gross, Zehavit. 2006. "Power, Identity and Organizational Structure as Reflected in Schools for Minority Groups: A Case Study of Jewish Schools in Paris, Brussels and Geneva." Comparative Education Review 50 (4): 603–624.
- Tal, Rami. 2005. The Jewish People Policy Planning Institute Annual Assessment 2004–2005: The Jewish People between Thriving and Decline. Jerusalem: The Jewish People Policy Planning Institute.
- Waxman, Chaim I. 2001. Jewish Baby Boomers: A Communal Perspective, Albany: State University of New York Press.

The International Network of Religious Zionist Kollels

Yael Ehrenpreis Meyer

---

Kollel Torah MiTzion (TMT) created a revolution in the Jewish world when it launched its first center for the intensive study of Torah within the framework of religious Zionism. Since its establishment in 1996, the TMT system has expanded into a worldwide network that today encompasses 33 school-based, campus-based, and community kollels across five continents. The scope of TMT is constantly increasing, and a new kollel opens its doors nearly every year.

History

In 1994, two religious Zionist institutions of Torah study were established independently on opposite sides of the world. One, called Torat Tzion, was established in Cleveland, Ohio, under the direction of Rabbi Binyamin Taboury. The second, the yeshiva of Cape Town, South Africa, was founded by Rabbi Jonathan Glass with a staff of Hesder graduates. These revolutionary initiatives set the stage for the development of the religious Zionist kollel concept.

Two years later, the founders of what would become the TMT network established their first institution, a religious Zionist kollel in Memphis, Tennessee. The kollel, initiated as a pilot program, was a success, and by 1998, there were 18 such institutions flourishing in as many geographic locations. The programs in Cleveland and Cape Town were also incorporated into this new network, which was later named Torah MiTzion, a reference to the Biblical line Ki MiTzion Tetzeh Torah (From Zion the Torah will come forth).

Philosophy

The kollel (pl. kollels) is an institute for the advanced and intensive study of Torah, usually with a focus on Talmudic study and analysis. Although many cities worldwide with strong Orthodox communities do have one or more kollels—most connected to yeshivas but some hosted by the communities themselves—in most cases these institutions are run under non-Zionist rabbinic and organizational auspices. In contrast, the TMT kollels were developed not only to serve as centers of Torah study but also to promulgate the ideals of religious Zionism—Torat Israel, Am Israel, and Eretz Israel, to underscore the relationship between Torah learning and Israel and to foster the relationship of the greater Jewish community with these two integral concepts.

To achieve these goals, the TMT system is led in the field by a cadre of shlichim who are themselves graduates of Israeli Hesder yeshivas and women's midrashot, and thus uniquely exemplify the philosophical balance between safrá v'safya that is the hallmark of religious Zionist ideology.

The TMT mandate also underlies the importance of strengthening Torah living and learning on a communal level. This means kollel shlichim not only devote several hours daily to intense Talmud study but are also committed to enhancing the Jewish identity and education of their resident communities.

Geographic Distribution

As of 2006, the TMT system encompassed three categories of kollels, for a total of 38 institutions operating on five continents. These include community kollels in the American cities of Atlanta, Baltimore, Chicago, Des Moines, New York, and St. Louis, as well as cities in Canada, South America, Italy, the former Soviet Union, South Africa, and Australia; school-based kollels in Cleveland, Detroit, Memphis, Washington, DC, Montreal, and Melbourne, Australia; and university-based kollels on 16 campuses in the United States and Great Britain.

The Tripartite Model

The basic TMT kollel model includes: a Rosh Kollel, who both teaches and provides administrative management; and shlichim, consisting of one to four young married couples and/or two to four single (male) students. There are three paradigms for the TMT Kollel, each one geared to a specific mode of community.

Community-based Kollels

The most common type of TMT kollel, community-based kollels provide a full-service educational and communal forum with programs geared to the entire spectrum of the target population, including men, women, and youth.

School-based Kollels

In some locations, the TMT kollel is hosted by the local day school. Although teaching and programming is provided for the public at large, as in the community-based model, the focus here is on the school. Hence, students are exposed to the concept of full-time Torah learning, and shlichim play a role in both formal and informal Jewish/Zionist education, thus providing maximum impact on the community's youth.

University-based Kollels

At university-based kollels, the campus is the community. These kollels serve not just as an educational forum but also as a clearinghouse for information on Judaism and a center for Jewish student life. Thus, the kollel not only provides Torah classes and Jewish/Israel-oriented programming but also acts as a Jewish home away from home for the student body.

Partnerships

On the executive level, the TMT headquarters in Israel works in close concert with major Israeli and Zionist agencies, including the Israel Ministry of Education, the Jewish Agency/World Zionist Organization, and major international religious Zionist organizations.

On the local level, each kollel's shlichim work together with the leadership of schools, synagogues, and Jewish/Zionist institutions to leverage the kollel's potential within the community. The campus-based kollels represent the Jewish Learning Initiative, an initiative spearheaded by the Orthodox Union in conjunction with TMT and Hillel.

Administration

The board of directors of TMT consists of members from each of its partner organizations. TMT is also guided by a rabbinic advisory board whose members include Rabbis Avraham Shapira and Mordechai Eliyahu (former chief rabbis of Israel); Rabbi Aaron Lichtenstein, Rosh Yeshiva of Yeshiva Har Etzion; Rabbi Chaim Druckman; and Rabbi Yosef Carmel. Zeev Schwartz, a founder of TMT, served as executive director from its initial establishment until July 2006. He then became director of the World Bnei Akiva organization, but retained his association with TMT as its new chairman. Laurence (Larry) Roth, chairman until July 2006, was appointed president at this time.

Conclusion

TMT has established an educational model that serves as a paradigm for successful Jewish/Zionist identity and knowledge development on the communal level. In their unique combination of "midrash and ma'aseh," the kollels of TMT continue to create a vibrant atmosphere of Torah Judaism and religious Zionism in Jewish communities throughout the world.

Selected Bibliography

- Cohen, Asher, and Israel Harel. eds. 2004. Religious Zionism: An Era of Change: Studies in Memory of Zevulun Hammer [in Hebrew]. Jerusalem: Bialik Institute.
- Gelles, Benjamin. 1964. Two Essays on Religious Zionism: Mizrachi Ideology. Jerusalem: World Mizrachi Organization Information Department.
- Morrison, David. 2003. The Gush: Center of Modern Religious Zionism. Jerusalem: Gefen.
- Sheffer, Eliezer. 2006. "Mizrachi Education in the Diaspora." In One Hundred Years of Religious Zionist Education: A Collection of Essays, edited by Simcha Raz, 365–372. Jerusalem: World Mizrachi Organization Education Department.
- Soloveitchik, Joseph B. 2002. The Rav Speaks: Five Addresses on Israel, History and the Jewish People. Brooklyn, NY: Toras Harav Foundation/Judaica Press.
- Teichtal, Yisachar Shlomo. 2002. Eim HaBanim Semeichah: On Eretz Yisrael, Redemption, and Unity. Jerusalem: Urim.
- Tirosh, Yosef. 1964. The Essence of Religious Zionism. Jerusalem: World Mizrachi Organization Information Department.
- Zohar, Chaim. 2006. "What is the Kollel Tzioni." In One Hundred Years of Religious Zionist Education: A Collection of Essays [in Hebrew], edited by Simcha Raz, 365–372. Jerusalem: World Mizrachi Organization Education Department.

The Habad Movement, Its Organizations, and Its Influence in the Diaspora

M. Avrum Ehrlich

---

Habad Hasidism, which hailed from Russia, succeeded in becoming probably the most important and influential network of religious Jewish communities in the world. With universal ideology, highly motivated disciples, decentralized institutions and organizations, and ever-growing success in achievement and numbers, its role in the contemporary Jewish Diaspora is peerless.

The Outreach Concept

The term “outreach,” as used by the Habad movement, refers to missionary work aimed solely at Jews. Jonathan Sacks, chief rabbi of the United Kingdom, says of Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, a key player in the Habad movement, that he “not only came to embody the concept of ‘outreach,’ he very nearly invented it.” The goal of Habad’s outreach was to reawaken the soul of every Jew, especially the majority who were secular and nonreligious, to God, religion, and the observance of Jewish law. The idea was to be found in embryo in the origins of the Habad movement, whose rebbes had always concentrated on educating and sending emissaries to remote Jewish communities to facilitate the observance of Jewish law and custom. It was only under Schneerson, however, that the concept was institutionalized as the prime characteristic of Habad’s social activity.

The concept of outreach gave the impetus for all of the other initiatives undertaken by the movement during the period of Schneerson’s leadership, and it became the primary cause of his fame throughout the world but especially within the general Jewish community. Outreach was the driver behind the shlichut (emissary/missionary) program, the most effective tool in the consolidation of Schneerson’s leadership. The promotion of outreach through shlichut made many of the services of the movement possible and helped support many of its institutions. So important and effective was Habad outreach for the growth and consolidation of the movement after the death of Yosef Yitzhak, the sixth Habad rebbe, that some observers have called for its tactics, initiatives, and methodology to be adopted in rehabilitating all of Diaspora Jewry.

During the period of Schneerson’s leadership, Habad became the fastest-growing Jewish subcommunity in the world. Although the Habad movement is not the largest Hasidic sect, it is certainly the best known, and the noticeable presence of members of the movement served to promote its name and ideology in overt disproportion to its numerical size. Without the willingness of many thousands of young men, newly married couples, and larger, more established families to move to cities and even foreign countries at the request of Schneerson, the movement would not have been as effective as it has been in bringing many to return to Jewish observance. At present, Habad is not as well known for its mystical philosophy and ideology as for its outreach efforts.

Schneerson dispatched his emissaries to all areas of the world where Jews might be found, but he concentrated the movement's efforts on several key targets: university campuses, non-Habad synagogues, and remote areas that lacked an effective infrastructure for Jewish observance.

Campus Outreach

As a former university student, Schneerson no doubt recognized that outreach would at some stage need to reach the secular Jewish intelligentsia, and he wasted no time in doing this. He instructed emissaries to focus on university campuses throughout the United States, where study houses and lectures were initiated for the benefit of Jewish students. It was thought that young, intelligent, idealistic Jewish students might be attracted to the movement, and might be able to find purpose and direction through the practice of Hasidism. The comparative modernity of Habad was an attractive factor in the success of campus outreach. The movement demonstrated that Judaism did not have to be a European, Old World phenomena, as many of the students' parents might have thought, but could be practiced in a modern context, using advanced technology and providing material opportunities not traditionally associated with Hasidism. Habad's outreach activities have been compared with those of the early days of Hasidism, during which the Hasidim were eager to convince the mitnagged (those that opposed Hasidism) intelligentsia of the Hasidic way, although undoubtedly there was more in common between the Hasidim and mitnaggedim than between Habad and secular Jews.

Lubavitch rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson. (AP Photo/Mike Albans)

The efforts of Habad in campus outreach were effective not only in attracting converts, the ba'alei teshuvah, but also, and possibly more important, in exposing a high proportion of future academic, business, and political leaders to Habad and its ideas and familiarizing many with the image of Schneerson. It was no doubt hoped that those exposed to Habad on campus might later, when they had become respected members of the general community, be able to support the legitimacy of the movement, whether financially, politically, socially, or otherwise.

Synagogues

From the origin of his leadership, Schneerson encouraged all his Hasidim who were able to do so to study to pass the semikah examinations and become rabbis. Until 1983, these ordinations were carried out under the old criterion of scholarship and intellectual ability, but from that date Schneerson began to actively encourage the mass ordination of rabbis. Consequently, the standards required to become a rabbi in Habad were lowered, and the emphasis moved from being able to pass examinations to possessing piety and an inclination to the job. This is not to say that there were not many highly learned students in Habad who were encouraged to study for semikah, but rather what was looked for was enthusiasm and suitability for the position of rabbi more than traditional scholarly achievement.

This change was implemented in order to ordain rabbis who would serve primarily as religious functionaries and community leaders; thus, it can be seen as a political tool to increase the influence of Habad in the broader Jewish community. Because of their generally poor academic competence, these Habad rabbis would defer serious Halachic and religious matters to more competent rabbinical authorities, either within Habad or outside the movement. This is not to say that the movement did not produce some old-style rabbis, academically gifted and scholarly, but rather that the minimum standard for ordination had been lowered to accommodate the less academic members of the community. A disproportionately high percentage of Habad Hasidim were consequently ordained into the rabbinate, and many began to take up rabbinical positions in synagogues across America and the world.

Although these new rabbis were often younger than their congregants and less educated in worldly issues, they were often respected by their communities by virtue of their religious studies and commitment to spirituality. When it became evident to their congregations that these rabbis turned for advice and counsel to more senior rabbis, who in turn revered and respected Schneerson, it fostered the impression that Schneerson was a grand rabbi, a "rabbi's rabbi," to whom all turned for clarity and guidance. This enhanced the reputation of the rebbe, and elevated the status of the Habad movement, wisely led by such a respected and venerated man.

The work of Habad rabbis in non-Habad synagogues popularized Schneerson's status and the Habad system. People interested in pursuing a more committed Jewish life were encouraged to do so through Habad educational facilities; hence, the movement attracted many newly repentant Jews to its ranks. The distinctions between Habad and normative Judaism were increasingly blurred, especially in the minds of newcomers, who frequently were unaware of the differences between the two. Habad community rabbis, believing their traditions were superior, did not call attention to these dissonances.

Ba'alei Teshuvah

One of the most significant developments in the Jewish world in the past 50 years has been the dramatic rise in the number of Jews adopting the religious lifestyle. At the forefront of the movement encouraging the newly religious, known as ba'alei teshuvah (masters of repentance) has been the Habad movement, which has not only actively sought out converts from the nonreligious Jewish community but has also greatly assisted those who wish to spiritually reconnect with their Jewish ancestry.

Like many other new religious movements, the Habad outreach seems to have developed with a specific target demographic in mind: single, educated, Jewish, college-aged, spiritual seekers. The movement's first active recruitment centers were primarily located in college towns, in houses close to campus, with the assumed intention of attracting young, idealistic, and easily persuaded Jewish youth to the religious lifestyle. These early Habad centers provided a home away from home, primarily for students, and for many often represented the first contact with ultra-Orthodox Judaism. The Habad House did not simply serve as a forum for exploring Jewish tradition, for it also served a social purpose in bringing together people of similar backgrounds and ideas.

As with fraternities and other student societies, the primary activities of campus outreach were organizing social functions, but in this case they had an educational purpose, and offered lectures/classes connecting various aspects of Jewish theology to practical concerns in the lives of the audience. Although lectures provided an ideological framework for incorporating Jewish spirituality into the everyday experience of potential recruits, the most important conversionary tactic was the social experience of inviting the curious into everyday Hasidic life. Central to this was the open-house policy maintained by Habad surrounding the observance of Shabbat. The opportunity to participate in one of the foremost religious practices of observant life, in a spiritual and family atmosphere (the Habad Houses were often run by young married couples), was an exceptionally successful recruitment technique, and remains so to this day. The experience of Shabbat represented a golden opportunity to expose the unobservant not only to theology, but also and most important, to the everyday practice of Jewish spiritual life. It was an exceptional tool for exploring religion in a friendly setting where questions of a practical nature could be explored at leisure. The experience permitted the full range of issues surrounding religious life to be examined: ritual and tradition, law and custom, dietary laws (kashruth), family relations, prayer and traditions of worship, and perhaps most important, the inculcation of the Hasidic devotional spirit through singing and storytelling.

The Habad House also served as a center for learning and for training those who wished to adopt a religious lifestyle. Although the social complexities of Hasidic custom were important in developing an emotional attachment to the movement, connection to Schneerson also played a major role in the religious life of many, if not all, ba'alei teshuvah. However, attachment without proper education in its practical use and direction was discouraged by the movement, as it has been by traditional Judaism through the centuries. To help newly observant followers develop a lasting commitment to Jewish observance and, incidentally, to the Habad movement, Habad Houses and representatives frequently lectured or led seminars in which ideological and practical issues were discussed. At first these classes were small and designed to instruct on a basic level, but as the movement grew in size and influence, the demands of recruits necessitated the development of special educational programs for ba'alei teshuvah. In time, this was to develop into an organized curriculum in local communities, and eventually led to the establishment of several yeshivahs, located in key locations around the world. The purpose of this education was quite different from what is found in traditional yeshivahs, where the emphasis is on studying Talmud and Hasidut. The emphasis at first was on communicating basic knowledge regarding Jewish custom, culture, and law, as well as Hebrew language, and the basics of Habad philosophy. Most classes, therefore, at least in the initial training, were concerned with ethics, kashruth, observance of Shabbat, and other practical matters essential to the observant lifestyle. Of course, the hope was that by the end of the training, men at least would be able to commence the study of Talmud, and women would be able to maintain an observant home.

This last was to be one of the central elements of the Habad recruitment strategy, because once the basics of Hasidism had been learned, the emphasis was on encouraging recruits to marry and establish observant families of their own. Once married, usually arranged through a matchmaker, the ba'alei teshuvah were encouraged to establish Habad Houses of their own and commence the recruitment of further followers. This was to be done through the same tactics by which they themselves had been recruited—a socialization process directed at nonreligious Jews.

One may add that there is now a substantial representation of university-educated ba'alei teshuvah in the Habad movement; also, many students and researchers who initially came into contact with Habad for the express purpose of objective research have been inspired to join its ranks. Because Habad was an accessible Jewish group, open to contact with the outside world, favorably disposed to technology and publicity, but still distinct and exotic, it attracted the interest of sociologists, theologians, and others drawn to research a cultural or religious phenomenon. There are a number of prominent cases where researchers were touched either by the local Habad rabbi they contacted, by Schneerson himself, or by both. This is not an unusual occurrence in religious ethnographic research.

The attraction of these academics to the movement added to the intrigue surrounding Habad, and tales of university professors (actually, usually graduate students) who had discovered the greatness of the rebbe spread in the movement. These stories validated the beliefs of Hasidim and gave hope for the ultimate success of the rebbe's outreach programs. Academic converts to Habad also enhanced the movement's reputation in the outside world. These ba'alei teshuvah academics disseminated pro-Habad sympathies through their writing, teaching, and other academic work, and they helped create a positive image of the movement as a living philosophy rather than solely a religious or doctrinal system. Later, some Habad rabbis were to earn academic degrees, so that Habad became even more appealing to the educated segments of the broader Jewish population. The presence of academic Hasidim also helped keep the movement from being classed as a form of fundamentalism, with the negative connotations of narrow-mindedness and naïveté implicit in such a classification.

Emissaries/Missionaries

Schneerson's emissaries were the executors of his outreach campaign. They were characterized by enthusiasm for Schneerson and strict obedience to his directives. There are claims that few international organizations could have been more tightly led by a single individual on the most slender of resources, namely, the stream of communication he maintained with the emissaries through correspondence and later more modern methods. Despite their dispersal to most places on earth where Jews reside, the emissaries kept in touch with each other, and discipline and morale remained high, mainly thanks to the personal contact each had with the rebbe.

Schneerson's discourses, ideas, suggestions, and campaign initiatives were communicated almost immediately to the emissaries, who in turn obediently communicated them to congregants, students, and children in their respective communities. The purpose of having emissaries throughout the world, and of the organizations and services they founded, was to instill the spirit and practice of authentic Judaism into the life of Jews wherever they may be. According to one observer, "the Rebbe built Lubavitch into the most powerful Hasidic movement in history. . . . tens of thousands around the world feel and act a little more Jewish because of him; no one else comes close to that achievement." This was one of the fundamental goals of the Habad movement under Schneerson and guided much of its outreach work.

Currently, there are an estimated 2,000 official Habad institutions worldwide, staffed by more than 8,000 emissaries, and there are innumerable Habad Houses on six continents. Schneerson encouraged his emissaries to wear their distinctive Hasidic clothing at all times if possible, but certainly when they were representing the movement, believing this would arouse feelings of familiarity and warmth in non-observant Jews and would remind them of their parents or ancestors. It also served as a kind of uniform for the movement, by which its members could be identified, and thus acted to unite the Hasidim wherever they might be, through a sense of common history and tradition.

Habad emissaries in countries with few Jews have often taken advantage of the reputation of Jews as powerful, wealthy, and influential to further their outreach work. In Habad, stories are told of emissaries to Asian and South American countries who were able to cultivate high-profile business leaders and politicians because of the belief that the Habad movement was an influential Jewish lobby with good business connections. Whatever the reasons, many close political and social alliances were formed by Habad emissaries worldwide, and the idea that Habad was a representative of Judaism itself grew with its increased public profile through these alliances. Schneerson's status as leader of the movement was also enhanced by this type of activity, further consolidating his authority.

Public Relations

Schneerson was extremely effective in the area of public relations. From the time he assumed the position of rebbe, he encountered a wide and often influential range of individuals who afterwards spoke highly of him. Some of these were important personages, but many were not, and it is significant that there are few articles and reports of encounters with Schneerson that do not describe him favorably. One might think it possible to glimpse the true person behind the public face of the rebbe through accounts by non-Hasidic and even non-Jewish people who met him, people unbiased by any emotional connection to him as rebbe and zaddik, but all the reported encounters seem to have been perceived through the same filter of adulation through which the Hasidim perceived their rebbe. This influenced even non-Habad visitors.

The public profile of Habad was also heightened by the use of billboards, full-page newspaper and magazine advertisements in major publications like the New York Times, the appearance of members on radio and television programs, and books and movies. Until the 1990s, Habad was the only Orthodox Jewish religious group to embrace technology as an instrument for Jewish revival.

In addition, the growth within the movement of messianic speculation and ideology throughout Schneerson's tenure provoked a great deal of attention and interest within the general Jewish community and from the media. Chaim Potok has argued that the media-conscious orientation of the Habad movement, starting with the arrival of Yosef Yitzhak in the United States, may have been a key factor in its promulgation of a strongly messianic ideology. Messianism may have been seen as a device to attract more media attention to the movement and its outreach goals. Although this idea may be a little cynical about Habad's sincerity, messianism certainly drew media attention to the movement and provided a framework in which Hasidim were able to missionize to nonreligious Jews worldwide. Outreach campaigns such as public donning of tefillin (phylacteries), the sukkah-mobile (a mobile sukkah used during the festival of Sukkoth), and public celebrations of Hanukkah drew public interest to Jewish issues and in the movement that was behind these activities.

The success of Habad's public relations enterprises was most graphically demonstrated when Schneerson died in 1994. Many important political and civil dignitaries attended his funeral, which was also widely covered on television and in the print media worldwide. Indeed, a collection of more than 200 articles and obituaries for Schneerson was published shortly after the event, with stories taken primarily from American newspapers. That so many articles were written in so short a space of time is an indication of the huge public interest in the movement and in Schneerson himself. His death even made it onto international television news broadcasts, demonstrating the breadth, if not the depth, of interest Habad and its messianic ideology had attracted worldwide.

Modern Technology

Public relations for Habad were amplified through the efforts of many technologically conscious Hasidim who, because of their exposure to the modern world and the university, had flirted with these media well before they became essential household tools. Although still influenced by modernity, Habad Hasidim were strongly discouraged from studying at university, in accordance with the ethos of ultra-Orthodoxy. Particular opposition was directed against study of the humanities, which was believed to pose the greatest threat to religious life. The advent of modern technology, particularly the computer and developments in communications, was therefore a blessing for many otherwise outwardly directed people. There are a number of reasons why modern technology was embraced so quickly by Habad: first, it was new, and so its use was not tainted with stigma; second, rejectionist religious views had not yet been developed in relation to the latest technology, and so its use was not forbidden. Technology allowed Hasidim to access the modern world without reliance on formal study of the forbidden humanities.

Habad was the first ultra-Orthodox Jewish group to take advantage of such technology. As the Internet became a medium to access secular education, it came to the attention of non-Habad ultra-Orthodox religious legislators, who subsequently condemned it, and in some instances outlawed its use by their adherents. In Habad, however, technology was adopted so quickly that by the time Habad's religious authorities became fully aware of it, the use of modern technology was so widespread in the movement as to make a prohibition all but impossible to enforce. Indeed, technology had become so indispensable a part of the movement's activities that its use was accepted in rabbinic circles because it was credited with disseminating Torah.

Use of the Internet, and e-mail in particular, was to prove essential to outreach, and also to the cohesion of the movement. Both official and unofficial Habad Web sites began to appear shortly after public access to the Internet was available, and in time many local communities and organizations supported sites of their own. These sites served to inform community members of important events, provided access to teachings, and offered the opportunity to disseminate the teachings of Habad to a new and educated audience. One of the most important consequences of the use of the Internet in Habad, however, was its use as a tool for networking. E-mail lists of community members and activists were developed, and religious teachings were disseminated, including calendars and reminders of events important to the world Habad community, such as birthdays and anniversaries of the passing of the rebbes. Weekly biblical readings were distributed directly to Hasidim electronically, along with commentaries by learned scholars. Online learning was also developed, whereby someone new to Hasidism could move from the basics to the most abstruse theology and ideology. Most important for Habad, pictures of and discourses by Schneerson were also available online, as well as by satellite, television, radio, and audio and video recordings, enabling the worldwide community to have instant access to Crown Heights, New York, and the court of their rebbe. Religious books and other products could be purchased via the Internet, a useful feature for small and geographically remote communities. The worldwide Habad movement was therefore reinforced by the World Wide Web, and the challenges presented by its international character became more easily negotiable and surmountable.

At present the Internet is one of the main forums for discussing Schneerson and the significance of his passing, and it is used by messianist, nonmessianist, and antimessianist Hasidism. There is even a Web site for ex-Habad Hasidim, who have left the movement for various reasons but nevertheless wish to stay in touch with one other and offer mutual support. Thus, despite geographical separation and lack of wide numerical support, these groups are able to survive and cohere across the world, and the debates in which they engage may well prove determine the future direction of Habad in the post-Schneerson era.

Habad's embrace of technology and the Internet has had other positive effects for the reputation of the movement in the wider community. Apart from its direct use in disseminating the ideology of the movement, many Habad Hasidim who did not choose careers as emissaries have become computer technicians, programmers, and professionals in related technological industries. This not only enhances the future survival of the movement by ensuring that it has a presence in the modern world, but it also serves to advance Habad's reputation as a movement that embraces modernity.

The Drawbacks of Outreach

Despite its many achievements, the outreach program has also had some drawbacks. These were primarily the result of the time and effort required by Habad's innovative techniques of outreach, which diverted funds and energy from other projects, and the challenges to the movement's ideological system raised by exposure to the world at large. These influences have had a negative effect on the education of the next generation of Hasidim, but they have also contributed to the uniqueness of a movement that would not have succeeded were it not for the perceived aberrations it practices.

The practice of outreach has earned Habad a reputation like that of the Jesuits in Catholicism, for the movement's missionizing has given it wide influence and has disseminated its teachings throughout the world. Missionary activity to non-Jews has generally been considered taboo throughout the history of Judaism, which has developed an ideological and practical opposition to the conversion of non-Jews to the faith. Habad adopted the term "outreach" to avoid the negative, Christian-centered connotations of the concepts of "missionary work" or "missionizing," and even within Habad's outreach effort, the emphasis has been on returning non-religious Jews to the religious observance practiced by their ancestors. Nevertheless, Habad's zeal for outreach and its aggressive marketing techniques have provoked a certain wariness toward the movement among secular and religious Jews alike, who do not care for the notion of Jews engaging in missionary activity even within the confines of the Jewish community. The general success of Habad—its embrace of modernity, its warmth toward fellow Jews throughout the globe, its ideology of acceptance, and the general open-mindedness of its disciples and emissaries—has distinguished itself and left potential critics within the secular Jewish world unable to find sufficient cause for rebuke.

The movement has changed in other ways as a direct result of outreach activity. The Habad Hasidim sent around the world as students and emissaries have themselves been exposed to new ideas and practices to which they would not have been exposed in a more traditional Hasidic sect. One consequence is that Habad youth are often far more worldly than other Hasidic or Orthodox youth, many of whom have grown up in ghettos or sheltered communities with only intermittent or controlled interaction with the outside world. Familiarity with slang and popular culture among modern Habad youth is no doubt a cause for concern to the religious leaders who are responsible for preserving the movement's identity and piety.

The Habad Yeshiva System

The idea of a specifically Habad yeshiva was initiated by Shalom Dov Ber, the fifth Habad rebbe. The system of Hasidic education it represented may very well have been responsible for the Lubavitch dynasty's survival despite persecution in Eastern Europe, especially during the reign of Yosef Yitzhak. It was also a central part of the reemergence of Habad in the United States. The first Habad yeshiva in America was founded as soon as Yosef Yitzhak arrived in 1940. His experiences in Russia very probably had convinced him that the successful transplantation of Habad into the New World was dependent on the establishment of a yeshiva to train and teach the next generation.

The same principle was applied throughout the United States and around the world under Schneerson. As more children grew up within the movement and more students arrived in Crown Heights to study, it became a routine part of the Habad educational policy to spend some time after high school in a yeshiva. This became even more the case as the educational facilities of the movement attracted more committed people and better teachers and as the infrastructure grew. Although not a common expectation in the early years of the movement, by the 1970s it was practically a basic requirement that every Habad boy study at least for a time in a Habad yeshiva, especially when Schneerson encouraged rabbinic ordination for all men who were able.

A yeshiva is best compared to a theological school. Although the subjects of study vary from community to community, it is generally assumed that the Talmud and other Halachic texts occupy most of the curriculum, which requires a total of approximately 16 hours of study daily. In Hasidic yeshivahs generally, and Habad yeshivahs in particular, the study of mysticism is an added feature of the curriculum, generally occupying two or three hours per day. The trend in contemporary Habad yeshivahs is for students to break from their studies regularly on Fridays, and less regularly on various occasions throughout the year, to dedicate time to outreach programs. This practice has earned the movement severe criticism from other streams of Orthodoxy, which claim that this practice takes students away from their primary duty of study to less important pursuits. Habad yeshivas have developed a reputation in the Jewish scholarly world for weak scholarship, and therefore do not attract the better Talmudic students. Exceptional Habad students who are serious about learning often continue their studies at non-Habad Lithuanian yeshiva, where the study regime is more traditional and much more rigorous.

The yeshiva system was the backbone of Schneerson's popular support even before he assumed the post of rebbe. It continued to be his main support throughout his tenure and still is years after his death. Schneerson was always careful to maintain ties with the movement's students, whose rebelliousness, enthusiasm, imagination, vigor, and free time made them a valuable (and vocal) resource to be channeled into useful initiatives. As these students grew older, they became the next generation of leadership of Habad, all intensely committed to Schneerson and his vision for the movement.

As school students, Habad boys learn both secular and religious subjects; the yeshiva system is somewhat different. Attendance is voluntary, and therefore students are generally more serious and committed to studying and developing their spiritual life. While attending yeshiva many students begin to mature in their observance, developing a deeper religious commitment. In Crown Heights, yeshiva students were often the most fervent supporters of Schneerson. Part of their curriculum was spent studying Schneerson's writings and teachings, which further developed their commitment to him. They were often the most earnest members of the audience at Schneerson's talks. He was the primary reason they were on their mission, and their attachment to him was palpable. Much of the messianic fervor evident throughout the history of the movement, especially in the last decade of the rebbe's life, was fostered in the yeshiva.

As the movement became larger and more influential, the top students were chosen to go overseas. At first, only specially selected students were given the honor of serving the rebbe abroad. In time, though, it became commonplace, especially as more Habad yeshiva students became available. Today, it is standard procedure for Habad students to travel on shlichut, where they undergo an active apprenticeship in the mission of the movement, under trained, experienced leaders in real-life circumstances. Most yeshiva students emerge from their experience as seasoned missionaries, ready for a more committed career within the movement.

Originally, it was mainly students from the central Habad yeshiva, Ohelei Torah, in Crown Heights, who were sent to the movement's centers around the world. By the time of Schneerson's death, the Habad movement had opened dozens of yeshivas around the world, and in most countries where there was a sizable Habad community, there was a yeshiva. Students were frequently sent to these smaller yeshiva for one or two years as emissaries of the movement, to perform outreach and strengthen communities that lacked human resources and educators. In turn, many Habad students from around the world spent a few years of study in the central Habad yeshiva in Crown Heights. This central meeting point has often been described as an officers' training corps for emissaries.

To be sent on shlihut was and is considered an honor and a privilege. It is usually very exciting for students, who get to travel the world, meet new people, and practice their outreach skills. Often the period of shlihut gives the young student his first exposure to secularism and other perceived vices outside his previously sheltered Orthodox lifestyle, but it is impossible to determine how many have been tempted to leave Habad as a result of this exposure. The sense of being on a mission as an emissary of the rebbe no doubt lessens the desire to adopt outside ways too strongly.

Many emissaries developed a strong sense of responsibility for educating the communities as they came to realize the full extent of Jewish assimilation and cultural ignorance. Students became teachers or took on other roles in the community, and many decided to settle in the location permanently, often marrying a local girl. In this way, Habad developed an international flavor, with relatives and friends throughout the world and a network of contacts focusing on Schneerson, Crown Heights, and the achievements of the movement. Many students developed a new appreciation for the rebbe and his interest and concern for the well-being of far-flung international Jewish communities. His personality became larger than life, because their only contact with him was via stories, satellite hook-ups, and video. As a result, his significance as a leader seemed even more imposing abroad.

The results of this worldwide educational enterprise are varied. The exposure outreach provided to non-Hasidic Jewish communities throughout the world made the Habad movement one of the best-known ultra-Orthodox groups. Although most ultra-Orthodox sects are little known outside their home territory, living as they do in isolated communities in Israel, Belgium, the United State, and other countries, Habad is a familiar force throughout the Jewish world. This has enabled the movement to influence the very concept of Orthodoxy in the broader Jewish community and to establish cross-cultural relationships with a wide cross-section of the Jewish world.

The work of yeshiva students over the years has been invaluable to expanding the movement. Apart from the fact that students give their time and effort to outreach with no expectation of pay, which has saved the movement vast amounts of money over the decades, the yeshiva has provided an organized reserve of activists who can be mobilized for especially worthwhile causes. The independence and initiative of the students, doubtless a result of their youth and idealism, spurred many new ideas for effective outreach on behalf of the movement. This human reservoir could not have been maintained in other, less homogeneous and ideologically united organizations. Its group cohesiveness, coupled with the image of activists as tireless walking advertisements for Schneerson and Habad, had an effect on Jewish communities abroad. To many in the broader Jewish community, Habad became a paragon of Orthodox observance. It stood out as an identifiable movement, separate from other Orthodox schools, and escaped being identified as one strain of Orthodoxy among many. This reappraisal of Habad within the spectrum of Judaism facilitated the appraisal of Schneerson as the grand rabbi of Orthodoxy and not simply another rebbe of a small subsection of the Hasidic community. Schneerson's position in world Jewry was greatly enhanced by the disproportionate representation of Habad throughout the world, through its emissaries and their role in the revival of religious observance.

The Habad yeshiva system is a good example of Schneerson's centralized-decentralized method of administration. Under this system, the local community took responsibility for the financial and other burdens of its ongoing work, and the central administration provided broad ideological guidance. The yeshiva system is controlled partly by the Merkaz L'Inyanei Hinukh, the central Habad agency, and partly by the United Lubavitch Yeshivot. During the tenure of Yosef Yitzhak, the United Lubavitch Yeshivot was run by Shmaryahu Gurary, and under Schneerson he continued to do so, no doubt in part because of Schneerson's desire to change nothing established by his predecessor. Gurary was an excellent manager of the yeshiva system and a gifted orator and fund-raiser, continuing throughout his life to collect money for his yeshiva. The yeshivas that were opened throughout the United States and internationally during Schneerson's leadership were sponsored primarily by Merkaz and the local communities, although they were administered in conjunction with Gurary's organization. The yeshiva system was a highly effective instrument in establishing Habad influence in mainstream Jewish Orthodoxy, strengthening its influence on world Jewry, and providing a considerable tool for Schneerson's consolidation of leadership.

The Habad House

As part of its aim to spread the observance of religious law throughout the Jewish world, the Habad movement established the institution of the Habad House. Unlike the yeshiva system, the primary aim of which was the further education of those who were already observant, the Habad House aimed to provide education, training, and guidance to facilitate the religious observance of those new to Habad and to provide a living example of observance for the Jewish populace worldwide. The idea of the Habad House was initiated by Schneerson in 1959 with a call for all Habad families to open their homes to the general Jewish community. There was both a personal and an institutional call for homes to be opened for hospitality, education, and prayer, and every family personalized this principle into their daily routine and welcomed fellow Jews into their lives and homes. Because of this program, there are currently thousands of Habad Houses around the world, providing education and hospitality to those interested in seeing the religious life in practice.

In addition to families opening their homes, a number of Habad Houses were opened by young emissaries who targeted a particular demographic, usually the student body on a university campus or younger Jews in a major city. These target-focused Habad Houses eventually expanded their operations to smaller areas and localities, to better serve the needs of the broader population. Habad Houses are often run by a dynamic husband-and-wife team, the wife often becoming indispensable in attracting female interest, as well as providing the hospitality services that are an important element in attracting visitors. The establishment of a Habad

House is often financially aided by the Merkaz L'Inyanei Hinukh and by the local Habad community, but it is expected to achieve independence and do its own fundraising within a short space of time.

The role of the Habad House in expanding the movement is best demonstrated by its operation in smaller communities. In areas with a small Jewish population, and therefore with no synagogue, the Habad House frequently becomes the place for religious services, especially on Shabbat. As a focal point for community building and activity, this often leads to the development of a large local Habad community within a few years. The Habad House thus serves to fill a religious vacuum in the chosen locality.

The practice of sending emissaries into areas and setting up Habad Houses to encourage locals to become part of the movement often leads to complaints about Habad. It has embittered non-Habad community leaders who believe the movement is encroaching on their territory. In some ways, they are right. The movement has an abundance of eager, efficient, enthusiastic emissaries who are willing to work for little or no money, which makes it difficult for those outside the movement to equal the activities or interest generated by the Habad House. As many of the emissaries are also rabbinically qualified, Habad has tended to take over communities in need of rabbis or other religious functionaries. On the other hand, the fact that Habad has been able to do this indicates that there is a need in the local communities that is not being met by other organizations.

Thanks to their central role in their communities, the Habad Houses worldwide have provided self-generated employment for Habad Hasidim, as well as massive public relations activity. They are often the only Orthodox presence in many Jewish communities around the world, providing essential services to those they have encouraged to join the movement. As well as bringing many nonreligious Jews to observance, the Habad Houses and Hasidim disseminate the teachings of Schneerson and Habad and help to build the cult of personality that surrounded him. This in turn further popularized him in general Jewish circles and increased his influence worldwide.

The conception of opening up branches of hospitality and outreach is not new to Judaism, and it has long been a feature of many Jewish organizations. However, the scale on which Schneerson implemented the Habad House was unprecedented. The idea that every Habad household would be actively involved in outreach and public dissemination of Habad ideology and observance meant that the entire movement was drafted into the outreach effort. Whether it was an activity as simple as offering hospitality to strangers or visitors for a Shabbat meal or as complex as studying with a less committed Jew to teach the heritage, the community was put to work. Business and professional Hasidim were not exempt from this, and outside their work hours they were often involved in an extracurricular outreach program.

The involvement of every Habad family was encouraged not only by the rebbe's directive but also by peer pressure from the community. Commitment to the movement was further demonstrated by the Habad House sign affixed to the front doors of many homes, an advertising directive issued by Schneerson to signify the presence of a Habad House in a community. The pressure to affix the sign to their homes challenged the apprehensive to make up their minds and commit more fully to a leader of Habad. Through symbolic gestures such as signs and community activities, those who were loosely affiliated with Habad were encouraged to deepen their commitment and articulate their connection to the movement.

The Habad House spearheaded Habad's outreach enterprises and activated all the followers of Habad in the movement's activities. It also attracted many newcomers into the religious lifestyle, through commitment to the principles of Habad. In this way, Schneerson further consolidated his authority and translated the Hasidic outreach mission into a format for every individual to participate in, even those outside the institutionalized community.

Other Organizations

During his years as rebbe, Schneerson initiated many other projects and organizations to expand the movement and serve the general Jewish community. The nature of these initiatives indicates his concern for the advancement of Judaism worldwide, beyond the world of his Hasidim. Many of the programs he established reflect the strategy that characterized Schneerson's institutional policy and work ethic, evident from the very early days of his leadership. Unlike other religious groups, many of which focused their attention on the religious elite and the yeshivas, Schneerson also catered to other segments of society. He was particularly concerned with developing employment opportunities for as many people as possible and with using employment not only to help the Hasidim support themselves but also to advance the cause of the movement.

In 1954, in accordance with these ideas, Schneerson established an agricultural school in Kfar Habad in Israel, one of the movement's main centers around the world. The aim of this school was to help the community sustain itself economically through agriculture and to provide self-reliant labor for the Habad community in Israel. The training of young Habad Hasidim as agricultural laborers, as opposed to sending them to study in a yeshiva, was at the time quite a revolutionary thing to do in the Israeli Hasidic world. The school established under this initiative provided vocations for Habad Hasidim and others who might not have had an aptitude for the yeshiva environment. Schneerson was visionary in seeing that all the members of the community could play a role of some kind in building the movement, and indeed, that in order to grow, Habad needed more than scholars and rabbis. His policy of agricultural education permitted people to work the land, support their communities, and yet still play a role in the Hasidic community. The school reflected Schneerson's realistic concern about the needs of the Israeli Habad community. It also demonstrated a concern for the nonscholarly that was somewhat lacking in other branches of Hasidism.

Apart from catering for the committed Hasidic community, the facilities established under Schneerson's direction drew many immigrants to the movement, especially in the early years of his leadership. They came initially to learn a useful profession in a familiar environment, with others from East European backgrounds who spoke their language, but they were also exposed to the Habad philosophy and lifestyle. In addition to learning new professions, many also adopted the ideology of the movement and joined its ranks. In the early days of the movement, many new members were attracted in this way. In later years, the practice of training immigrants was effectively applied in Israel to large numbers of Sephardi Jews, many from Arab countries and largely discriminated against by both mainstream society and the predominantly Ashkenazi religious establishment. Habad was the only group to receive them with open arms. To this day, many older Yemenite and Moroccan Jews in Israel remain indebted to Habad and Schneerson for this, and many became committed Hasidim as a consequence of this outreach. The same is true of the many thousands of Russian Jews whom Habad helped to emigrate during the 1970s and the 1990s.

Worldwide, Habad's policy of self-sufficiency and self-employment led to a large number of innovative employment opportunities, many either previously unavailable or unnecessary. As local communities grew because of the work of Habad emissaries, it became necessary to provide certain necessities for the religious. Opportunity therefore existed for the establishment of kosher food outlets (including restaurants and fast food), matzo-baking programs, stores selling religious literature and paraphernalia, wigmakers, providers of kosher child care, and so forth. All of these services were necessary to maintain a religious community and were frequently previously unavailable in many areas. Such initiatives made it easier for non-Habad Jews to maintain a level of religious observance even if they did not subscribe completely to the Habad ideology. Schneerson was thus able to commence the "elevation of the sparks," a necessary component of the messianic doctrine at the core of Habad's outreach momentum.

Habad also contributed to the Jewish community by providing new synagogues, women's centers, yeshivas and study houses, drug rehabilitation centers, Internet services, summer camps, and public celebrations of Jewish festivals such as Hanukkah, Pesach, and Lag b'Omer. Outreach efforts included mitzvah-mobiles, worldwide public seders, Shabbat candle-lighting campaigns, toll-free telephone lectures, and holiday gifts and religious services for Israeli soldiers. Because all of these outreach efforts required people and money to implement, they brought employment for the community. Such efforts have given Habad a massive and powerful influence worldwide, quite disproportionate to its size.

The aforementioned organizations established by Schneerson during his early years as rebbe were attempts to mobilize all segments of the worldwide Habad community and to use each segment of the community—men, women, and children—in accordance with its capability and needs. He tried to provide employment, self-fulfillment, Jewish education, and a sense of community, while remaining steadfast to wider outreach goals. The strategy he undertook indicated that he did not demand a uniform brand of dedication or effort, but desired different Hasidic communities and individuals to participate in his movement and vision according to their disposition. This pluralism was evident in many of his projects.

Fund-raising

The Habad movement worldwide is dependent on its ability to draw funds from individual donors in each local community. Habad has been organized such that community initiatives are mostly locally sponsored, so each community must cultivate capable individuals and teams for fund-raising purposes. The mentality of many Habad Hasidim and the indication of success within the movement is therefore often focused on fund-raising ability. There are stories of young, inexperienced Hasidim, newly arrived in an area, who have both naively and brazenly approached wealthy individuals for sponsorship, with remarkable success in raising exorbitant amounts of money for their projects. This success has created a cargo-cult mentality, whereby the community relies heavily on funding that often arrives unexpectedly or from unusual sources, and huge projects may be started with no idea of where the funding for their completion will come from. The success of this outreach technique has contributed to the sense of a divinely ordained mission, as unexpected sources of funding often turn up to cover expenses when needed.

The lucrative potential of religious fund-raising has made Habad activists sensitive to fund-raising issues, with the result that for many, fund-raising has developed into a way of life. The Jewish world has been more inclined to donate to Habad projects than to other Jewish causes because of the success of the movement and its high public profile. The appeal of Habad to many wealthy Jews with post-Holocaust guilt and distant nostalgia for the old life was a result of Habad's ability to mix tradition with innovation and modern ways with ancient custom. Even benefactors inclined more to the Conservative or Reform segments of the Jewish world preferred to support Habad institutions because of their noticeable difference from the more modern Jewish movements: the product was more distinct, more tangibly Jewish, and more appealing to donors who wanted to see hard results from their charity dollars. The image of Habad as a modern form of Hasidism appealed to donors and conversely helped cement these images into Habad's own sense of identity.

Because the movement had solid achievements to show and was seen as acting for the benefit of Judaism as a whole, it attracted more donations from the local community and from wealthy donors. The donors were impressed by the results achieved by Habad's outreach projects, and many who had often desired to give were now able to do so, secure in the knowledge that their money would not be wasted. The cycle of donation that Habad has been able to establish began with the enthusiasm of Habad emissaries for hard work and their willingness to support ideals without remuneration, and ended in the strategic donor's recognition of the solid investment he or she was making to a truly charitable cause. In a domino effect, the availability of funds attracted more voluntarism and more activities as well as larger, more ambitious ventures. In 1992 alone, the movement as a whole is believed to have received more than $100 million in contributions.

The Habad policy of free services, free seating in synagogues, and free food at events was appealing to many donors. The services provided by Habad survived on the generosity of satisfied patrons, and therefore were a refreshing change from the distasteful practice in many synagogues of charging for these things. To many donors, the break with moneymaking religious practice was attractive for the resulting sense of spirituality and the refreshing separation of religious services and money. For wealthy donors, the issue was not the money but the cause. The spiritual appeal of Habad for many donors did not result purely from its refusal to charge for services. The sense of authenticity and the unapologetic Jewishness of the movement appealed to those who did not feel able to be as committed or open about their own observance of Jewish tradition.

The movement's activities were carried out on a shoestring budget, fired by an ideology that inspired a sense of true commitment and self-sacrifice. As Habad became more prosperous, and the availability of funds increased, the expansion did not create laziness, but opened up more opportunities for determined, trained, experienced activists. The movement's executors were not merely bureaucrats, but ideologues who would seek to use the charity in the most effective and innovative ways, with the consideration not based so much on impressing the donor, but on carrying out the will of the rebbe and his mission.

Unlike earlier generations, where fund-raising was a specialist activity, in Habad even community rabbis and activists have had to become proficient in the pursuit of funding for their projects. The fund-raising concept became part of the consciousness of Habad and was not an activity reserved for the rebbe. The effect of fund-raising on a large scale, with individual communities responsible for their own budgets, has created a very wealthy network of organizations and wealthy patrons who feel personal responsibility for them. Especially interesting is that each Habad emissary has become adept at community administration and human interaction in a profound way, and sometimes the schools and synagogue and yeshiva and mikvah and other services are the size of middle-size businesses or industries. It has been commented that were some of these emissaries industrialists or administrators in the free market, they would have had financial empires by now. In this context, their dedication to the welfare of the Jewish community is often more deeply appreciated.

Selected Bibliography

- Deutch, S. S. 1997. Larger Than Life: The Life and Times of the Lubavitcher Rebbe Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, vol. II. Brooklyn, NY: Chasidic Historical Productions.
- Ehrlich, M. A. 2004. The Messiah of Brooklyn: Understanding Lubavitch Hasidism Past and Present. Jersey City, NJ: KTAV.
- Fishkoff, Sue. 2005. The Rebbe's Army: Inside the World of Chabad-Lubavitch. New York: Schocken.
- Levin, D. B. 1988. History of Chabad in the U.S.A. 1900-1950 [Hebrew]. Brooklyn, NY: Kehos.
- Mintz, Jerome R. 1968. Legends of the Hasidim—An Introduction to Hasidic Culture and Oral Tradition in the New World. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Mintz, Jerome R. 1992. Hasidic People. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Africa

Jews in Africa

Saul Issroff with the assistance of Moshe Silberhaft

---

General Population: 775–900 million. It should be noted that population estimates for most African countries are variable; the effects of high mortality due to AIDS can result in lower life expectancy, higher infant mortality and death rates, lower population and growth rates, and more changes in the distribution of population by age and sex than would otherwise be expected.

Jewish Population: 87,200 (estimated)

Jewish Population by Country: South Africa, 72,000 (52,000 in Johannesburg and 17,000 in Cape Town); Morocco, 5,500; Tunisia, 1,100; Ghana, 800; Democratic Nairobi, 280; Zimbabwe, 200; Republic of Congo, 120; Botswana, 100; Egypt, 100; Mauritius, 65; Swaziland, 50; Algeria, 50–100; Madagascar, 40; Tanzania, 20; Ethiopia, unknown

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Waves of immigration from the Middle East and Southern and Eastern Europe account for the Jewish populations in Africa. For the past 50 years serious concerns over deteriorating personal and national security situations led to Jews immigrate to Israel, the United States, Canada, France, England, and Australia instead of African nations.

---

Historical Overview

According to Jewish biblical tradition, Jews descended from the patriarchs—Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob—went to Egypt. They were later expelled, passing through the desert on their way back to Palestine, which was periodically occupied by the pharaohs. Survivors of the destruction of the First Temple by Nebuchadnezzar in 586 BCE founded a Jewish military colony in Elephantine, Egypt.

In the fourth century BCE, after Alexander the Great's conquests, more extensive Jewish settlement occurred. He invited Jews to settle in Alexandria, which became a cultural center. The Old Testament was translated into Greek, the Septuagint translation.

By the second century BCE, Cyrene and Carthage had Jewish settlement. Some Jewish traditions remain in many areas today.

During Roman times, Jews were noted as far west as Gibraltar, and they had significant political and economic importance. At times this led to clashes with their neighbors, as in Alexandria. Jerusalem fell in 70 CE, and Zealots fled to Egypt where they fomented a Jewish revolt, capturing large parts of the countryside but not any urban areas. The Roman suppressed these uprisings. During the great revolt of 115–117 CE, uprisings spread along North Africa as far as Cyrene, and at times large areas of Egypt were under Jewish control before the revolt violently suppressed. With the rise of Christianity, further anti-Jewish riots occurred in Alexandria. In the sixth century, the Byzantines reoccupied North Africa and further suppression of the Jews occurred.

The ancient links between Jews from Abyssinia (Ethiopia) and active Jewish proselytizing on the coast and in the interior left traces of Jewish tradition and practice among the Ethiopians, Berbers, and some African tribes. In the seventh century, Arab invaders record only small scattered Jewish communities, and these lost the Greco-Roman influences and became Arabized in tradition and language. In Egypt Fostat (Old Cairo) was a Jewish town. In Tunisia Kairouan was a main center of rabbinic teaching from the 8th to the 11th centuries. Documents saved in the Cairo genizah describe the religious and social life of the Jews of this era. Sa'adia Gaon, a prominent rabbi and Jewish philosopher of the ninth and tenth centuries CE, was born in the Fayyum region of Egypt. Other Jews, writing mostly in Arabic, contributed significantly to medicine, science and philosophy.

In the 11th century, under Muslim rule, conditions for the Jews were generally good, but there were times of persecution. The Almohad Arabs in the 12th century prohibited the practice of Judaism in Morocco, and forcible conversion to Islam occurred.

Numerous Jews, including Moses Maimonides, went east to Egypt. A slow recovery of Jewish life in the west occurred after the Almohad rule diminished. The expulsions of the Jews from Spain in 1391 set off migrations of refugees; some were practicing Jews, but later this group included conversos who wanted to go back to Judaism. Migrations increased again after the Jews were expelled from Spain in 1492. Spanish Jews with their own customs, largely following the takkanah of Castile, lived alongside older Arab and Berber communities. In many places specific Jewish quarters were built, and Jews had to live under Muslim codes, were excluded from certain occupations, and had to wear specific clothing to identify them as Jews. In coastal ports they were often traders, especially with European merchants, and they were also sometimes envoys to European leaders. A few became influential as viziers or ministers of finance. The Jews had little influence in the interior, however.

Slightly better conditions prevailed in Egypt and the northeast, especially after Turkish domination in the 16th century. North African Jews emerged from an almost medieval status with growing European influence from the early 1800s in Algeria to Morocco in 1912.

A number of groups throughout Africa claim historical links with Jews. The most feasible claim is that of the Beta Israel of Ethiopia, recognized by the Israeli government as Jews in 1975, and many were airlifted to Israel. The Israeli Sephardi chief rabbi decided they were descendants of the 10 lost tribes, probably from the tribe of Dan, reinforced by many centuries of rabbinical responsa that discussed these issues. But historical and DNA evidence suggest different origins. The practices of the Beta Israel differ significantly from those of other forms of Judaism. For instance, they do not celebrate the festivals of Purim and Hanukkah.

The Lemba live in the Transvaal in Southern Africa. They were a migrant group that, according to oral tradition, originated in Saana (probably Yemen). The Lemba have some Jewish practices, such as constraints on intermarriage with non-Lemba, and they have a Y-DNA similarity in markers to Kohanim (a Y chromosome known as the Cohen modal haplotype).

In Mali, several thousand people in Timbuktu claim some form of Jewish ancestry. Moors and Jews, fleeing persecution in Spain, migrated south in the 14th century to Timbuktu (part of the Songhai empire). Among them was the Kehath (Ka'ti) family who founded three villages that still exist near Timbuktu. Askia Muhammed came to power in 1492 and forced Jews to convert to Islam or leave. After this Judaism became illegal in Mali.

In Nigeria, the Igbo (Ibo) may be descended from the southern and westward migrations of ancient Semitic peoples and later Jewish peoples from the Middle East into West Africa. There are three groups: Bnei Gat, said to have descended from tribe of Gat, the eighth son of Jacob; Bnei Zebulun, from the tribe of Zebulun the fifth son of Jacob; and Bnei Menashe. Bnei Ephraim are different from other Nigerian Jewish groups as they live among the Yoruba.

In western Ghana, the House of Israel community of Sefwi Wiawso and Sefwi Sui claim that their Sefwi ancestors are descendants of Jews who migrated south through Ivory Coast. The practice of Judaism in this community is recent and dates from the early 1970s.

The Abayudaya, a group founded in 1919, now consists of about 600 black Ugandans who practice Judaism in eastern Uganda. They observe Jewish holidays, sing Hebrew songs, observe kashruth, perform circumcisions, and keep the Sabbath, as they have for generations. In February 2002, they underwent a formal conversion led by five Conservative rabbis, but they are not recognized as Jewish by Orthodox rabbis. They receive aid from Israel and from a U.S. organization, Kulanu.

In Somalia, the Yibir (or Hebrew) tribe is looked down on as descendants of Israelites. Their sultan and his ancestors have been Muslim for 800 years, and they are believed to have come as Arabic-speaking teachers. There are about 25,000 Yibirs in Somalia, Ethiopia, Djibouti, and Kenya. They do not have traditions or knowledge of Judaism.

A tribe in Rusape, Zimbabwe, claims ancient Jewish tribal connections. The practice of Judaism in this small community dates from 1903.

Jews came to Eritrea from Yemen in the late 19th century, and a few European refugees arrived in the 1930s, some going to Israel after 1948. In October 1944, the British, administering both Eritrea and Palestine, removed 251 detainees from the Latrun internment camp and imprisoned them in Sambel. The British navy returned the survivors to Israel in July 1948. Virtually all the remaining Jews left during the violence of Eritrea's 30-year struggle for independence from Ethiopia. The 100-year-old synagogue is a simple building, and the cemetery has 150 graves. As of 2006, one Jew still lived in Asmara. Israel recognized independent Eritrea in 1993.

There was no Jewish settlement of any significance in south and east Africa until the 19th century. By 1880, South Africa had approximately 4,000 Jews, mainly Ashkenazi of English and German extraction. A large number of predominantly Lithuanian Jews, estimated at 40,000, migrated between 1880 and 1914, and another group of around 10,000 migrated during the 1920s. In the 1930s, about 7,000 German Jews went to South Africa. This community peaked at around 115,000 in the 1970s, but has diminished because of emigration to the United States, Australia, England, Canada, and Israel. In 2006, the Jewish population in South Africa was approximately 75,000. A small number of Sephardi Jews from the island of Rhodes went initially to the former Belgian Congo (now the Democratic Republic of Congo), then to southern Rhodesia, and after independence to South Africa.

Tanzania has a few dozen Jews but no organized community.

Botswana has about 100 Jews mainly in the capital, Gaborone. The community, formally constituted in 1994, is one of the few growing Jewish communities in Africa.

In 2007, about 40 Jews lived in Madagascar (a French colony until independence in 1960); they are members of Diaspora Jiosy Gasy (Diaspora Jewish Malagasy) and have mainly Zionist interests. In 1940, Hitler proposed deporting European Jews to Madagascar as a solution to the Jewish question. This was not a new plan; similar plans were suggested by the British, French, and Polish after World War I, and it is known that as early as 1885, Paul de Lagarde was keen on deporting Eastern European Jews to Madagascar. In 1926 and 1927, Poland and Japan each investigated the possibility of using Madagascar to solve their overpopulation problems. Adolf Eichmann prepared a report on Madagascar in early 1938, and in May 1940, while France was being taken, Hitler approved the idea of sending Jews to the African colony. The Madagascar Plan became technically unfeasible later that year when the Germans lost the Battle of Britain.

Mauritius is an island republic in the Indian Ocean. In 1941, approximately 1,600 Jewish refugees were refused entry to Palestine and deported to Mauritius (then a British colony). They were held as virtual prisoners for the remainder of the war, but were aided by the South African Jewish Board of Deputies. Many of the surviving refugees went to Israel after the war, arriving in Haifa on August 26, 1945. More than 127 of these internees died and are buried in St. Martin's cemetery. As of 2007, about 65 Jews live on Mauritius.

Mozambique (a Portuguese colony until gaining independence in 1975) has a small Jewish community. Ashkenazim and Sephardim migrated to Maputo (previously Lourenco Marques) and built a synagogue in 1926, and some Jewish refugees arrived during World War II. After independence civil war broke out, and most of the Jews left for South Africa. The synagogue was confiscated and the 100-year-old cemetery fell into disrepair. After 1990 a small number of Jews again arrived, mainly expatriates working for international relief organisations. A non-Jewish businessman facilitated the restoration of the synagogue and the cemetery. A few Portuguese-speaking Jews remain.

Swaziland has a small Jewish community of 50 people in the capital, Mbabane, including some Israelis, South African Jews, and descendents from World War II refugees. Key Jewish figures include Stanley Sapire, who served as chief justice of the Swazi Court of Appeal, and Rabbi Natan Gamedze, a Swazi prince who converted to Judaism and teaches in Tzafat, Israel.

Selected Bibliography

- Browning, Christopher. 1990. Encyclopedia of the Holocaust, edited by Israel Gutman, s.v. "Madagascar Plan," 936. New York: Macmillan Library Reference USA.
- Fisher, Ian. 2000 "Djibouti Journal: Somalia's 'Hebrews' See a Better Day." New York Times, August 15. <http://www.haruth.com/JewsSomalia.html> (accessed May 7, 2007).

- “Jews of Ghana.” Haruth Communication Web site. www.haruth.com/jw/JewsGhana.html (accessed May 7, 2007).
- Lapidot, Yehuda. “In Africa Exile.” The Irgun Site. <http://www.etzel.org.il/english/ac15.htm> (accessed April 2007).
- Levy, Samuel J. 1997–2003. “The Jews of Mozambique.” <http://www.saudades.org/jewsmoz.html> (accessed April 2007).
- Oded, Arye. 1974. “The Bayudaya of Uganda: A Portrait of an African Jewish Community.” Journal of Religion in Africa 6: 167–186.
- Oded, Arye. 1995. Religion and Politics in Uganda: A Study of Islam and Judaism. Nairobi, Kenya: East African Educational Publishers.
- Pitot, Genevieve. 2000. The Mauritian Shekel: The Story of Jewish Detainees in Mauritius, 1940–1945. Oxford, UK: Rowan and Lilienfield.
- Saks, David. 2004. “Contemporary Jewish Africa.” Jewish Affairs 59:2.
- Silberhaft, Moshe. 1998. Mauritius. Johannesburg: African Jewish Congress.
- Silberhaft, Moshe. 2005. “Launching the Jewish Community of Mauritius.” African Jewish Congress Web site. <http://www.africanjewishcongress.com/MAURITIUS.htm> (accessed May 15, 2008).
- Sobol, Richard, and Jeffrey A. Summit. 2005. Abayudaya: The Jews of Uganda. New York: Abbeville Press.
- Weiss, Mara. 2008. The Virtual History Tour: Ghana. Jewish Virtual Library. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/vjw/ghana.html (accessed May 7, 2007).

Migrations of Jews into West Africa

Ehav Eliyahu

---

Legends of Semitic Migrations into the Maghreb (North Africa)

According to most accounts, the earliest Israeli settlements in Africa were in places such as Egypt, Tunisia, and Ethiopia. Historians believe these settlements may have been in existence as early as the kingdoms of David and Solomon, as well as during the Assyrian invasion of northern Israel in 722 BCE and the Babylonian Captivity of Judah in 586 BCE in the Punic-Carthaginian age. These communities were augmented by subsequent arrivals of Jews after the destruction of the Second Jerusalem Temple in 70 CE, when 30,000 Jewish slaves were settled throughout Carthage by the Roman emperor Titus.

Africa is identified in various Jewish sources in connection with Tarshish and Ophir (Tamid, 32b, and the parallel passage where “African land” is evidently the same as Carthage). The Septuagint (Isaiah xxiii. 1) and Jerome (on Ezekiel xxvii.), who was taught by Jews—and very often the targum on the prophets—identify the Biblical Tarshish with Carthage, which was the birthplace of a number of rabbis mentioned in the Talmud. Africa, in the broader sense, is clearly indicated where mention is made of the 10 tribes having been driven into exile by the Assyrians and having journeyed into Africa (Mek., Bo, 17; Tosef., Shab. vii. 25; Deuteronomy R. v. 14; and especially Sanh. 94a). Connected with this is the idea that the river Sambation is in Africa. The Arabs, who also know the legend of the Beni Musa (Sons of Moses), agree with the Jews in placing their land in Africa.

Migrations into Sub-Saharan Africa

In later centuries Jews are believed to have settled in western Africa during the height of the Songhai, Mali, Ghana, and Kanem-Bornu empires. According to accounts from explorers of the region, several powerful Jewish families of the Songhai empire were of Jewish origin, until Askia Muhammad came to power and in 1492 decreed that all Jews either convert to Islam or leave the region.

According to certain records in Timbuktu, an older community was formed by a group of Egyptian Jews who traveled by way of the Sahel corridor through Chad into Mali. Another community was that of the Zuwa (Juwa) ruler of Koukiya (located near the Niger River), whose name is only known as Zuwa Alayman (or Zuwa min al Yaman) meaning “He comes from Yemen.” Local legends state that Zuwa Alayman was a member of one of the Jewish colonies transported from Yemen by the Abyssinians in the sixth century CE. Zuwa Alayman is said to have traveled into West Africa along with his brother, and eventually established a local Jewish community between Mali and northern Nigeria. Some accounts place West African Jewish communities in the Ondo forest of Dahomei south of Timbuktu; in the 1930s these groups still maintained a Torah scroll written in Aramaic that had been burned into parchment with a hot iron instead of ink so it could not be changed.

The decline of the Jewish communities of the West Africa-Maghreb most likely began with the influx of Arab invaders into North Africa starting in 640 CE and later into West Africa in the 1300s and 1400s CE. The Jewish Berber Queen Kahina Dahiyah Bint Thabitah ibn Tifan, who was also known as El Kahina, led the most notable uprising against the invasion. Believed to have been a descendent of the Israeli priestly class, El Kahina was able to lead North African Jews, Berbers, Christians, and Greeks alike against the invasion until her defeat at the hands of the Arab commander Hassan Ibn Numan.

In the 1600s, the restrictions on Jewish travel from North Africa lessened, allowing Jewish merchants such as Rabbi Mordecia Serour (1831–1880) to make trade expeditions between Morocco and Mali.

Selected Bibliography

- Gonen, Rivka. 2002. The Quest for Ten Lost Tribes of Israel: To the Ends of the Earth. Northville, NJ: Jason Aronson.
- Kati, Mahmud al-. 1999. Les Juifs à Tombouctou, or Jews of Timbuktu, Recueil de sources écrites relatives au commerce juif à Tombouctou au XIXe siècle, edited by by Ismael Diadie. Bamako, Mali: Editions Donniya.
- Margolis, Max, and Alexander Marx. 1947. History of the Jewish People. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America.
- Meek, C. K. 1925. Northern Tribes of Nigeria, vol. 1. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 66.

Jews in Algeria

Saul Issroff

---

General Population: 29 million

Jewish Population: 50–100

Jewish Population by City: Oran, Blida, Algiers

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Algeria gained independence from France in 1962 and the majority of Jews immigrated to Israel or France.

Languages Spoken: Arabic, French, Hebrew,

---

Historical Overview

10,000 BCE Berbers (or Imazighen) settled in Algeria.

1,000 BCE Carthaginians settle on the coast; Jews live in at least seven coastal cities.

200 BCE Carthage falls to the Romans. Emerging Berber kingdoms become independent. Some Berber tribes, notably those led by Queen Kahina, convert to Judaism before Islam spreads to the region. Jews live in many major Muslim cities as stated in early descriptions of Tahert, the Rustamid capital. Berbers are again independent in much of the western region.

5th–6th century CE Vandal conquests of Algeria mark the period. Under the later rule of eastern Byzantine Christians (Emperor Justinian I) Jews are subjected to social, religious, and economic restrictions.

665 CE The first Arab invasion fails.

688 CE The second Arab invasion succeeds; they conquer the Byzantines.

1142–1147 Massacres of Jews in Tlemcen, Bougie, Oran, and other cities.

1391 After Spanish riots, many Jews settle in Algeria. Settlement continues until 1492 in the cities of Oran, Algiers, Constantine, and Tlemcen.

1510 Algeria brought into the Ottoman Empire by a pirate, Khair ad Din (Barbarossa), who seizes Algiers on the pretext of defending it from the Spaniards.

1516 During the Turkish regency, Jews are subject to the statute of dhimmi.

1801–1805 The first and second Barbary Wars take place.

1830 France invades and Hussein Dey signs the act of capitulation.

1835–1839 Autonomy of Algerian Jewry is limited.

1841 Jewish courts (beth din) are abolished.

1845 Consistories (ecclesiastical offices) are formed in Algiers, Oran, and Constantine.

1870 Jews are granted French citizenship under the Crémieux decree.

1931 Jews make up less than 2 percent of Algeria's population.

1934 Muslims attack Jews in Constantine.

1940 Marshall Petain and the Vichy government repeal the Crémieux decree.

1943–1945 Algerian Jews participate in World War II in Tunisia, Italy, France, and Germany.

The Arab Period

Berber leaders such as Kusayla and Kahina resisted fiercely for some decades, but eventually adopted Islam en masse, then almost immediately expelled the Umayyad caliphate from Algeria and establishing an Ibadi state under the Rustamids. Shia Fatimids converted the Kutama of Kabylie to their cause, overthrew the Rustamids, and conquered Egypt. They left Algeria and Tunisia to their Zirid vassals. The Zirads rebelled and adopted Sunnism, and the Fatimids sent in a populous Arab tribe, the Banu Hilal, to weaken them, thus incidentally initiating the Arabization of the countryside. The Almoravids and Almohads, Berber dynasties from the west that were founded by religious reformers, brought a period of relative peace and development. However, with the collapse of the Almohads, Algeria became a battleground for their three successor states, the Algerian Zayyanids, Tunisian Hafsid, and Moroccan Marinids.

Until the 12th century, little is known of the history of the Jews of Algeria. In the black period of Almohads, Moroccan invaders persecuted, converted, and massacred Jews. Spanish rabbis imposed their authority on the local communities and included outstanding 14th- and 15th-century scholars, such as the Rav Yitzchak ben Sheshet Perfet (the Ribash) and Rav Shimon ben Zemah Duran (the Rashbatz).

Barbarossa subsequently recognized the Ottoman sultan's rule over the territory he controlled, and he was appointed the sultan's regent in the Maghreb. Piracy continued for three centuries and attacks on American vessels in the Mediterranean resulted in the First and Second Barbary Wars (1801–1805).

The Turkish Period

Under the Turkish regency in 1516 Jews were subject to the statute of dhimmi (laws for indigenous Jews and Christians). A particular dress was proscribed for them, the green and red chechia. They were not permitted to carry weapons or ride horses, only donkeys and mules. The Jews had a moukadem (a rabbinical court with authority over civil and penal law). They also collected taxes. At the same time, commercial activities of certain Jewish families expanded, reinforced by the arrival of Livornian Jews. Jewish merchants largely prospered under Ottoman rule. The millet system (legal courts for non-Muslim minorities) has a long history in the Middle East and is closely linked to Islamic rules for the treatment of non-Muslim minorities (dhimmi). Minorities were allowed to rule themselves with little interference from the Ottoman government.

The French Period

The French invaded Algeria in May 1830 and sent a regent to govern. The French attack was in response to Husseing Dey's demands that the French government pay large outstanding wheat debts to two Jewish merchants, Bacri and Busnach. The majority of the Constantine Jews welcomed the French arrival. On July 5, 1830, Hussein Dey signed the act of capitulation, ensuring the freedom of religion, property, and trade for all. Between 1835 and 1839, with the support of Louis Philippe, a commission to reform worship effectively limited the autonomy of Algerian Jewry.

The French restructured the Ottoman millet system. They distinguished French citizens (who had the vote, were subject to French laws, and had to do army service) from Jewish and Muslim indigenous people, who had their own laws and courts. Jewish courts (beth din) were abolished in 1841. In 1845, Consistories (ecclesiastical offices), similar to the French model, were formed in Algiers, Oran, and Constantine. French chief rabbis were appointed with the duty “to inculcate unconditional obedience to the laws, loyalty to France, and the obligation to defend it.” Jews were granted French citizenship, under the Crémieux decree of 1870, in response to French Jewish pressures. North African Jews were considered backward, and the perceived need was to modernize them. Algerian Jews took on French cultural attributes and many spoke French.

Anti-Semitic attacks were encouraged by the Dreyfus affair, the French political scandal of the 1890s and early 1900s that led to the unjust persecution of a Jewish military officer. In World War I, nearly all Algerian Jews supported France. By 1931, Algiers, Constantine, and Oran had Jewish populations of more than 7 percent, as did many smaller cities, such as Ghardaia and Setif. One smaller town, Messad, had a Jewish majority. Jews mainly supported the parties of the left. In 1934, Muslims, encouraged by Nazi Germany, attacked Jews in Constantine, killing 25 and injuring many others.

World War II

After the French-German armistice of June 1940, Marshall Petain and his Vichy government had considerable support among Europeans in the Maghreb. The law of October 7, 1940, repealed the Crémieux decree. On June 2, 1941, a second statute ordered a census of all Jews and their goods. The statute of August 14, 1941, applied discriminatory measures, such as dismissal of civil servants and teachers and limits on professionals and students. Preparations to set up a Judenrat (Jewish Council) were made. Many Algerian Jews were put into concentration camps. In Algiers Jews were prominent in the Resistance; some notable fighters were Jose Aboulke and Rene Moatti. They assisted the Allies in the successful invasion of Algeria in November 1942. Vichy administrators and discriminatory measures remained. The 1940 law was abolished, but the Crémieux decree was kept until October 1943. Many Jews took part in the fighting in Tunisia, Italy, France, and Germany between 1943 and 1945. After the war the Jews of Algeria regained their rights despite some opposition from anti-Semitic French bureaucrats such as Francois Darlan, the high commissioner for North Africa. After his assassination Jewish underground leaders were charged with collaborating with the assassins. Another Vichy leader, General Giraud, replaced Darlan. He repealed the racist laws, but reinstated the Crémieux decree. General de Gaulle took over and with some reluctance finally restored Jewish rights.

Contemporary Overview

Algerian Jews were subject to both Oriental and Western cultures. On November 1, 1954, before the Algerian war of independence, this rich culture became a trap. Jewish names and culture were strongly oriental. Algerian Jews were also very loyal to France. The 1961 referendum on self-determination was strongly supported in Jewish districts. After independence in 1962, the Algerian government again deprived Jews of their civil and economic rights. As a result, almost 130,000 Algerian Jews emigrated to France. An estimated 25,681 Algerian Jews went to Israel after 1948.

In 1994, the terrorist organization Armed Islamic Group declared its intention to eliminate Jews from Algeria. After the announcement, many of the rest left. The few remaining Jews live mainly in Algiers, although a few live in Oran and Blida. A single synagogue functions in Algiers, but there is no rabbi. All other synagogues have been taken over for use as mosques. The Jewish Communities of Algiers and Blida have offices of the Consistoire d'Algérie

Important Personalities

Following is a list of important Algerians of Jewish descent:

- Jacques Attali (born 1943), a French economist, writer, and scholar, who also served as adviser to the president of France from 1981 to 1991, was born in Algeria.
- Baruj Benacerraf (born in 1920 to an Algerian mother) an immunologist, won the 1980 Nobel Prize in Physiology or Medicine for discovering the major histocompatibility complex genes. His brother is Paul Benacerraf, a philosopher and mathematician.
- Claude Cohen-Tannoudji (born 1933), a physicist who won the 1997 Nobel Prize in Physics, was born in Constantine, Algeria.
- Robert Cohen (born 1930), was the World Bantamweight Boxing Champion from 1954 to 1956.
- Jacques Derrida (1930–2004) was an Algerian-born French literary critic and deconstructionist philosopher.
- Claude Lelouch, a film director, has an Algerian father.

Selected Bibliography

- Abitbol, Michel. 1990. Encyclopedia of the Holocaust. Vol. 1, s.v. "Algeria." New York: MacMillan, 18–22.
- "Aidez nous a etablir la liste des noms de famille des Juifs d'Algerie." <http://www.zlabia.com/http://www.zlabia.com/genealogie.htm> (accessed May 7, 2007).
- Ayoun, Richard. 1986. Problématique des conflits internes de la communauté Juive; Simon Kanouï, Président du Consistoire Israélite D'oran. Proceedings of the Ninth World Congress of Jewish Studies, August 4–12, Jerusalem: 75–82.
- Ayoun, Richard, and Bernard Cohen. 1982. Les juifs d'Algérie: 2000 ans d'histoire. [Jews of Algeria: 2000 Years of History]. Judaiques. Paris: JC Lattès.
- Bahloul, Joëlle. 1992. La maison de mémoire: ethnologie d'une demeure judéo-arabe en Algérie: (1937–1961) [The house of memory: ethnology of a Judeo-Arabic residence in Algeria: (1937–1961)]. Traversées. Paris: Éditions Métailié.
- Bard, Mitchell. 2008. "The Jews of Algeria." Jewish Virtual Library. <http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsourc/anti-semitism/algjews.html> (accessed May 7, 2007).
- Garrot, Henri. 1898. Les Juifs algériens, leurs origines [Algerian Jews, Their Origins]. Alger: Librairie Louis Relin.

Israel, Jonathan Irvine. 1994. "The Jews of Spanish Oran and their expulsion in 1669." Mediterranean Historical Review 9 (2): 235–255.

"The Jewish Communities of Algeria." The Shema Yisrael Torah Network Smicha Program Web site. <http://www.amyisrael.co.il/africa/algeria/> (accessed May 7, 2007).

"Rabbis of Algeria." 2004. Foundation for the Advancement of Sephardic Studies and Culture. <http://www.sephardicstudies.org/r-alg.html> (accessed May 7, 2007).

Schaub, Jean-Frederic. 1999. Les Juifs Du Roi D'Espagne. Paris: Hachette, 240.

Schwarzfuchs, Simon. 1981. Les Juifs D'Algérie Et La France (1830–1855). Jerusalem: Institut Ben Zvi.

"World Jewish Communities: Middle East and North Africa (Maghreb)." World Jewish Congress Web site. http://www.worldjewishcongress.org/comm\_middle.html# (accessed May 7, 2007).

Jews in Cape Verde

Carol S. Castiel

---

The story of the Jews of Cape Verde and their descendants has yet to be fully researched and documented, but it constitutes an important, little-known chapter in the history of the Jewish Diaspora. Evidence shows that from the period of the Spanish and Portuguese Inquisition through the 19th century, Cape Verde hosted Jews fleeing religious persecution or seeking greater economic stability. Although a minority in a predominantly Catholic country, Jewish settlers and their descendants have exerted—and continue to exert—a positive and enduring influence on the economic, political, and cultural life of the tiny African nation of approximately 500,000. In the early 20th century, the well-loved Jewish businessman and philanthropist, David Benoliel, was known to have literally fueled the economy of the tiny island of Boa Vista. He was the son of Abraham Benoliel and Esther Benathar Benoliel, natives of Rabat, Morocco. The first democratically elected prime minister of Cape Verde, in 1991, was Carlos Alberto Wahnnon de Carvalho Veiga, a prominent lawyer and great-grandson of Rachel and Isaac Wahnnon, Jews who came to Cape Verde via Gibraltar in the mid-1800s. Gardenia Benros, the great-great-grand daughter of Isaac Benros of Tangier, is a well-known Cape Verdean vocalist based in Boston, Massachusetts.

Jews settled in Cape Verde, an archipelago of 10 islands, about 300 miles off the coast of Senegal, West Africa, in two distinct waves. The first wave arrived with Portuguese colonialists who began settling the uninhabited islands in the mid-1400s. (The Portuguese subsequently ruled the islands for more than 500 years.) The Jews came as New Christians, or forced converts to Catholicism. Unlike Spain, Portugal did not expel its Jewish population at the start of the Inquisition; rather, Jews were baptized by force. Although many New Christians were known to have secretly practiced Judaism, the furtive nature of their identity has made it difficult for historians to accurately assess their numbers, impact, and legacy.

In contrast, it is much easier to verify and analyze the second wave of Jewish settlement, which occurred in the mid-1800s. Several small cemeteries that dot the archipelago are the most tangible reminders of the presence of Sephardi Jews hailing primarily from Moroccan cities of Tangier, Rabat, and Mogador (now Essaouira) and from Gibraltar. Their ancestors probably fled to Muslim Morocco after 1492 to escape the Inquisition. They began arriving in the Portuguese colony of Cape Verde after 1821, the year in which the Portuguese Inquisition was officially abolished. Jews could openly return to Portugal and its territories, like Cape Verde, Guinea-Bissau, Angola, São Tomé and Príncipe, and Mozambique, without fear of persecution. The tombstones have distinctive Sephardic names, such as Cohen, Levy, Benoliel, Benrós, Wahnnon, Benathar, Benchimol, Brigham, Auday, Anahory, Pinto, Maman, and Seruya. The marble headstones are typical of those found in Jewish cemeteries throughout Morocco. These families landed primarily on the islands of Santo Antao, São Vicente, Boa Vista, and São Tiago and engaged in international commerce, shipping, civil service, and other trades. The cordial relationship between Britain and Portugal during the 19th century facilitated the movement of Jews from Tangier to neighboring Gibraltar, from whence they proceeded to Cape Verde. The arrival of Jews in Cape Verde coincided with British settlement there, primarily on the island of São Vicente. The British were engaged in building the port and other related commercial activities.

Some scholars suggest that the exodus to Cape Verde may have been prompted, in part, by the Spanish-Moroccan war of 1859–1860, which caused many Jews from Tangier and Tetuan to seek safe haven in Gibraltar and the Portuguese territories. Another possible impetus cited for the Jewish emigration to Cape Verde was the depression of 1873. Hence, economic pressures in northern Morocco may have spurred many young Jewish men to seek opportunities in the Cape Verde Islands and elsewhere, namely Brazil and Argentina. In those days, the Junta, a democratically elected body representing the Jewish community in Tangier, established a special fund for eligible applicants that covered the cost of passage to these distant lands.

However, because the majority of the settlers were male, and their numbers were few relative to the larger non-Jewish community, widespread intermarriage with the predominantly Catholic population occurred. This frequent intermingling gradually weakened the settlers' affiliation with Jewish customs and rituals. Although many of the prominent families, such as the Cohens, the Levys, the Benoliels, and the Wahnons, married among themselves, more often than not, Jewish men married and had children with indigenous Portuguese or Cape Verdean women. Hence their offspring, while retaining the Sephardic name of the father, would not formally be considered Jewish.

Interestingly, many of the offspring of mixed marriages were not baptized, illustrating that neither spouse was particularly observant, or perhaps that a spirit of compromise prevailed in the face of differing customs. Some of the settlers had children out of wedlock. As a result of these circumstances, there are virtually no practicing Jews in Cape Verde today. The Jews and their descendants became so thoroughly assimilated in Cape Verde that former Cape Verdean minister of culture, Ondina Ferreira, said that one did not know where their "Jewishness" left off and their Cape Verdean identity began!

Regardless, in talking with the descendants, many of whom still bear the distinctive Sephardic names of their paternal forebears, one encounters a sense of pride and identity with their Jewish heritage. Daniel Brigham, a prominent businessman (now deceased) in the capital city, Praia, stated, “When I was 10 years old, I witnessed my grandfather’s traditional Jewish burial. Although I am not religious, I try to follow the Ten Commandments. I’d like to think I conform to the basic tenets of the Jewish faith. I am very proud of the fact that I have a Jewish rib.”

By definition, Cape Verde is a mixed-race nation. From its history as a slave trading post the country endured centuries of intermingling between Portuguese colonialists and Africans. When the Jews arrived in the 19th century, they added to the rich cauldron of cultures. And although the original Jews of Cape Verde no longer exist, their legacy lives on through their descendants on the archipelago and abroad. The four small cemeteries that dot the rocky landscape of Cape Verde are a tangible reminder of the once thriving community in a country that warmly welcomed them and to which they contributed in countless ways. Efforts to restore the dilapidated cemeteries and to document the presence of the Jews of Cape Verde continue under the auspices of the Cape Verde–Israel Friendship Society whose president is Januario Nascimento (a descendant of the Jewish family, the Audays) and Carol Castiel, representative in Washington, DC.

Selected Bibliography

- Benoliel, Israel. 1997. “Book Review of The Jews of Cape Verde: A Brief History.” Cimboa 4: 53.
- Castiel, Carol. 1995. “Cape Verde Hosts Jews.” Washington Jewish Week, January
- Castiel, Carol. 1995. Personal interview with Daniel Brigham.
- Castiel, Carol. 2000. “Recovering Jewish Heritage in the Cape Verde Islands.” In Proceedings of World Bank Symposium on Historic Cities and Sacred Places. Washington, DC: World Bank.

Jewish Community of the Democratic Republic of Congo

Moïse Rahmani

Translated by R. George Anticoni

---

General Population: 65,000,000

Jewish Population: 120

Percent of Population: Less than 0.0001 percent

Jewish Population by City: Kinshasa, 70–110 (not all are permanently resident, but they are members of synagogue); Lubumbashi, 4; Other, 10 (not permanently resident)

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Some Italian officers migrated in 1880s, followed by a few Ashkenazis from South Africa and Rhodesia. Immigrants between 1914 and 1939 were primarily from Rhodes, and between 1946 and 1956 they were mainly Syrian, Lebanese, and Egyptian. European immigrants were predominant in the 1960s.

Languages Spoken: French, English, Hebrew

---

Historical Overview

- 1880s First evidence of permanent Jewish presence
- 1885 Conference of Berlin recognizes the Kingdom of Congo as the property of King Leopold II of the Belgians.
- 1904 The town of Elisabethville (now Lubumbashi) is founded in the Katanga (now Shaba) region, and the first Jews arrive there.
- 1908 Leopold II cedes the country to Belgium.
- 1909 The first minyan (prayer group of 10 men) is formed in Elisabethville, Katanga.
- 1911 Statutes of Jewish Community of Katanga are filed.
- 1912 The Solbena Company, founded by Salomon Benatar and Maurice J. Alhadeff, arrives in Elisabethville.
- 1915 Oldest Sephardi tombstone, of Abraham Benatar, is found in the Elisabethville cemetery.
- 1930 There is an influx of Jews from Rhodes.
- 1937 Rabbi Moise M. Levy from Rhodes is engaged by the Jewish community
- 1946 Authorization is given for more than 50 survivors of the Shoah to enter the country from Rhodes.
- 1960 The country gains its independence from Belgium, and Katanga secedes. The unrest promotes Jewish emigration
- 1973 President Mobutu nationalizes foreign businesses without compensation. As a result, more Jews emigrate. Diplomatic ties with Israel are severed.
- 1975 President Mobutu restores remnants of confiscated assets to rightful owners.
- 1983 Diplomatic ties with Israel are restored.
- 1987 A silver jubilee celebration of the appointment of Rabbi Moise M. Levy is organized by leaders of other faiths in Lubumbashi.
- 1991 and 1993 Foreign-owned assets are pillaged.
- 2003 Financial restrictions cause the closure of Israeli embassy in Kinshasa.
- 2004 Robert Levi founds the Merchant Trust Bank, which specializes in micro-credits.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Former generations included doctors, shopkeepers, diamond merchants, and cutters. There were also some substantial industrial enterprises involving oil milling, soap production, textile factories, and raw material importing. A Jew founded the Merchant Trust Bank, the only Congolese bank with headquarters outside the capital in Lubumbashi.

Present Economic Conditions

In general, the large and medium-size Jewish-owned businesses of the past no longer exist. A few businesses survive, barely ticking over.

Religious Denominations and Communal Institutions

The synagogue in Kinshasa survives and has an active community that is 50 percent Sephardi and 50 percent Ashkenazi. Community activities include a library, film club, and conferences. The group also publishes a magazine, Kadima. The former synagogue in Lubumbashi stands empty, although the two cemeteries, which had been abandoned, have been renovated and the stolen tombstones are being replaced. There is no organized Jewish life in Lubumbashi, as only a handful of Jews live there and not on a permanent basis.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

The Jewish community in the Congo is shrinking and as of 2005 was reduced to about 120 persons. Political unrest and periodic lootings and pillaging at various times since independence have caused several waves of emigration to South Africa, Israel, and Europe.

Selected Bibliography

- Errera, Milantia Boula. 2000. Moïse Levy, un Rabbin a Congo (1937–1991). Brussels: Éditions La Longue Vue, Consistoire Israélite de Belgique.
- Rahmani, Moïse. 2002. Shalom Bwana, la Saga des Juifs du Congo. Paris: Éditions Romillat.
- Rahmani, Moïse. 2007. Les Juifs du Congo, entre raison et espoir. Brussels: European Sephardic Institute.
- Remy, Ilona. "Rabbi Rosen, Nigeria, Igbo Land and the Igbos." <http://members.aol.com/moreshetnet/igbo.html> (accessed April 2007).

Jewish Community in Egypt

Jeffrey S. Malka

Population of Egypt: 80 million

Jewish Population: Less than 30 persons in 2007

Percent of General Population: Less than 1 percent

Jewish Population by City: Less than 30, all in Cairo and Alexandria

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Sephardim came in the 12th century, 16th century, and 19th century. Ashkenazim (5,000) came mostly in late 19th century. There were also indigenous Egyptian Jews and Karaite Jews.

Languages Spoken: Historically, almost all Egyptian Jews were multilingual. French was the primary language. English, Italian, and Ladino were common. The indigenous Egyptian Jews and Karaites spoke Arabic at home. Ashkenazim all spoke French at home and some were fluent in Yiddish.

Historical Overview

- 1st millennium BCE Egypt has been part of Jewish history since the earliest of times. Joseph, Moses, Philo of Alexandria, the prophet Jeremiah, Moses ben Maimon (Maimonides), and the Sa'adia Gaon all lived in Egypt. After the Biblical Exodus, Jews returned to Egypt in 586 BCE and maintained an uninterrupted presence in that land ever since. There is even a local tradition that some Jews did not follow Moses and instead remained in Egypt settling in Asyut, where they formed a warrior tribe, thereby maintaining an uninterrupted Jewish presence in Egypt since the days of Joseph. Ben Ezra synagogue in old Cairo (Fostat-Goshen) is the world's oldest known synagogue. Believed to have been founded by Ezra the Scribe half a millennium before the common era, it stands, according to both Jewish and Coptic tradition, at the site where Moses was retrieved from the Nile by Pharaoh's daughter. The waters of the Nile still flood its basement.
- 1169 The medieval Jewish traveler Benjamin of Tudela mentions visiting the Ben Ezra synagogue in his 1169 travels.
- 1492 A wave of Sephardim exiles arrives from the Iberian Peninsula.
- 16th century Ashkenazim first arrive in Egypt when, as a sign of his favor, Sultan Süleyman the Magnificent grants Yosef ben Shlomo the unique privilege that Shlomo and his descendants would be perpetually exempt from taxation and have total religious freedom within his domains. In 1525, Shlomo, a Jew from Budapest, had delivered the keys of Budapest to the sultan's triumphant Ottoman armies. Fargeon reports that descendants of the Aleman family, as they became known, were still in Egypt as late as 1914, still taking advantage of their ancient tax exemption.
- 19th century Ashkenazim number about 5,000 and most arrive in the late 19th century, fleeing pogroms and anti-Semitism in Russia, Romania, and elsewhere. Economically, the mostly newly arrived Ashkenazim fare less well than the local Sephardim. Many live in Cairo's harat al barabra, though a number accumulate considerable wealth and move to the Cairo suburbs. Yiddish speaking, they maintain their own separate synagogues in Cairo, an Ashkenazic B'nai B'rith lodge (Loge Maimonide No. 366), a Yiddish theater, and a Yiddish radio station (that was still broadcasting as late as 1950). Founded in 1865, the main Ashkenazic synagogue in Cairo is located at Haret El Noubi, off Rue Farouk of the harat el barabra, and was known locally as the Temple de la rue Farouk. The 19th century also saw a large influx of Sephardim from other areas of the Ottoman Empire, mainly Aleppo, Baghdad, Izmir, Livorno, Salonica, and Tunis.
- 1948 About 70,000–80,000 Jews live in Egypt, approximately 55,000 in Cairo and most of the rest in Alexandria, although there are smaller communities in Port Said and smaller towns. Of these, 5,000 to 10,000 hold Egyptian citizenship, 40,000 are stateless, and 30,000 are foreign nationals (mostly Italian, French, British, and other), though most of those holding foreign nationality were born in Egypt.
- 1950s The long history of Jews in Egypt comes to a sad close in the 1950s under President Gamal Nasser when a second exodus takes place and most of the Jews of Egypt either flee or are expelled, forced to leave behind all their property, jewelry, and cash, which are confiscated.

2007 Less than 30 Jews remain in Egypt, most of advanced age.

Contemporary Overview

Religious Denominations

Twentieth-century Egyptian Jewry consisted of four main groups. The most populous were the Sephardim, who first came to Egypt in the 12th century, followed in order by the indigenous Egyptian Jews; the Ashkenazim, and the ancient Karaite. The Sephardim and Ashkenazim were largely Francophone in language and culture and were rarely fluent in Arabic. English, Italian, Yiddish, or Judeo-Spanish were also commonly spoken. The indigenous Jews and the Karaites, inhabitants of Egypt for more than a millennium, usually spoke Egyptian Arabic and wore Egyptian-style clothing. Even so, nearly all the Jews in Egypt felt themselves distinct from the surrounding Egyptian Arab culture. The indigenous Jews, inhabiting Egypt for centuries and Egyptian in both language and culture, numbered 20,000 and were mostly goldsmiths and merchants. Many lived in Cairo's harat al Yahud (Jewish lane) neighboring harat al barabra (foreigners' lane), and in Alexandria's port district. Karaite Jews, numbered about 5,000 in Egypt in 1947 lived primarily in Cairo, where they maintained separate synagogues. Karaites are an ancient Jewish sect that broke away from rabbinic Judaism in the first millennium CE. Rejecting rabbinic interpretations (such as the Talmud), their religion and practices depend on the written texts of the five books of Moses (kara'a means "to read" in Hebrew) and maintained their own separate synagogues.

In Egypt, both Karaites and rabbinic Jews considered Karaites a Jewish sect, although both groups banned marriage with each other's members. Although many lived elsewhere, the traditional home of the Karaites was in Cairo's harat al yahud al kar'in (Karaite Jewish lane), which adjoins the harat al yahud. They buried their dead in their separate half of the Jewish Bassatine cemetery of Cairo, separated by a wall from the portion used by the rabbinic Jews. This Arab-speaking community of mainly goldsmiths and jewelers also produced several notable poets and playwrights. Their last chief rabbi in Egypt was Tuvia Bakovitch (1934–1956). Like the rest of Egyptian Jewry, they, too, have left Egypt and can now be found mostly in the San Francisco area and elsewhere in the United States.

Egypt had two chief rabbinate, one in Cairo and the other in Alexandria. Jewish communities in smaller Egyptian towns reported to and were administered by one or the other of these chief rabbinate. Cairo's Jews formed three autonomous communities (Sephardic, Ashkenazic, and Karaite), each administered separately. In Alexandria there was one unified Jewish community that included the majority Sephardim, the Ashkenazim (who were just as numerous as in Cairo), and the fewer than two dozen Karaite Jews of Alexandria. In the mid-20th century, Alexandria had several grand synagogues, both private and community-based Jewish schools, a dozen Jewish benevolent societies, a B'nai B'rith Lodge, a 140-bed Jewish hospital, several Alexandria-based Jewish periodicals (Le Messenger Sioniste, La Revue Israelite d’Egypte, La Voix Juive, and La Tribune Juive), and a very active Jewish presence. After the 1950s Jewish exodus, Alexandria, ancient home of the first-century Jewish philosopher Philo, now has virtually no Jews left.

In Cairo, only one of three synagogues, Shaar Hashamayim, remains functioning (though only on Jewish holidays); it has been restored. Meyr Biton and Ben Ezra are no longer in use. It was in Ben Ezra synagogue’s genizah (storehouse of discarded sacred documents), however, that a treasure trove of ancient documents was found that have yielded so much information about medieval Jewish history, especially from around the 10th century.

Jewish Educational and Communal Institutions

Cairo’s huge Bassatine cemetery is the oldest Jewish cemetery in the world after the Mount of Olives. Long occupied by homeless squatters, it is in sad shape, and its marbles have been plundered and lost. Alexandria has three Jewish cemeteries, two in Chatby and one in Mazarita (sometimes called the Chatby 1 cemetery). All three Alexandria cemeteries are walled and have largely escaped vandalism. They are overgrown with vegetation at some times of the year, but the gravestones show only the ravages of time and weather.

Fewer than 30–40 Jews are left in Egypt, and all are extremely elderly. When they die, for the first time in millennia Egypt will have no Jews except for tourists. A remnant of the Jewish community center in Cairo persists under the presidency of the octogenarian Carmen Weinstein, but the vast majority of Egyptians have no memory of the recent existence of a Jewish community in Egypt.

View of Bassatine Cemetery in Cairo, Egypt, the oldest Jewish cemetery in the world after the Mount of Olives. (Daniel Kolman)

In the first half of the 20th century, the cosmopolitan, multilingual Jews of Egypt maintained 37 synagogues in Cairo alone, six B'nai B'rith lodges, several all-Jewish orchestras, three Jewish theaters (one in Yiddish), nearly a dozen Jewish newspapers in a variety of languages, a Jewish hospital that treated 43,000 patients in 1936, old-age homes, and numerous charitable organizations. In 1938, Cairo's Jewish community schools enrolled 8,462 children; approximately 51 percent of all Jewish children. Many other children enrolled in private Jewish schools, such as the Jabes or the Green schools and the Petit Lycée de Sakakini. Jewish aristocracy entertained and hobnobbed with both Egyptian and European royalty, and some served as government ministers and in other high government posts.

Selected Bibliography

- Beinin, Joel. 1998. The Dispersion of Egyptian Jewry: Culture, Politics, and the Formation of a Modern Diaspora. Los Angeles: University of California Press.
- Fargeon, Maurice, ed. 1938. Les Juifs en Egypte: Depuis le Origines jusqu'à ce jour [Jews in Egypt: From the Origins to this Day]. Cairo: Imprimerie Paul Barbey.
- Fargeon, Maurice, ed. 1942. Annuaire des Juifs d'Egypte et du proche orient [Annuary of the Jews of Egypt and the Near East]. Cairo: La Société des Editions Historiques Juives d'Egypte.
- Fargeon, Maurice, ed. 1984. Juifs d'Egypte: Images et Textes [Jews of Egypt: Images and Texts]. 2nd ed. Paris: Les Editions du Scribe.

Jews in Ethiopia

Shalva Weil

---

General Population: 77,000,000

Jewish Population: 12,000–30,000

Percent of Population: Less than 1 percent

Jewish Population by City: There is a large population of Jews in Addis Ababa.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: The origins of Ethiopian Jews, as they are known today, are unknown. although many theories have developed.

Languages Spoken: The Beta Israel spoke a Cushitic language, Agau, mixed with the two principal languages of the regions in which they resided: Amharic and Tigrinya.

---

Historical Overview

1st millennium BCE–1st millennium CE The origins of the Ethiopian Jews, as they are known today, are shrouded in mystery. According to some Ethiopian traditions, many inhabitants of the Kingdom of Aksum were Jewish before the advent of Christianity in the third to fourth centuries. The survival of Hebraic traces in the local Ethiopic Christianity is striking: the local population circumcises its male offspring near or on the eighth day after birth, they do not eat pork, women observe purity laws, and more. The popular Ethiopian belief, and indeed the most popular theory given by the Beta Israel themselves before their aliyah to Israel, is that they are descendants of Israelite henchmen who had arrived with Menelik, the son of the union of King Solomon and Queen Sheba in the Kingdom of Israel. A theory that has gained exceptional importance in Israel is that the Beta Israel are descendants of the tribe of Dan, one of the 10 lost tribes, which was exiled by the Assyrians in the eighth century BCE. In one of his Halachic response, Rabbi David ben Zimra (Radbaz) (1479–1573) referred to a Jew in Ethiopia as a member of the tribe of Dan. Other theories are that the Beta Israel were immigrants from Nubia or southern Arabia, or even an offshoot of Yemenite Jewry, or that they were children of Israel from Egypt, who had wandered south.

9th–12th centuries Legends and texts report the presence of Jews in Ethiopia, including those from the 9th-century traveler Eldad Ha-Dani (Eldad from the tribe of Dan) and the 12th-century traveler Benjamin of Tudela.

14th century Many academics today posit that the Beta Israel emerged as an identifiable Jewish group known as “Falassi” or “Falasha,” from the 14th century to the 16th century, who were different from the local populations. Early documentary evidence of a Judaized group opposing the Ethiopian Orthodox Church is found in a royal chronicle from the reign of Emperor Amde Zion (1314–1344), which refers to a war with a part of the Christian population that had abandoned Christianity in favor of people “like Jews,” who had “denied Christ, like the Jews who crucified him.” In the same century, a renegade monk, Qozmos, left the Christian clerics in Lake Tana and joined the Jews in opposition to local Christian armies.

15th–17th centuries From the period of Emperor Ishaq (1413–1438) until the reign of Susenyos (1607–1632), there are reports of “Ayhud,” who may have been “Jews,” but may also have been groups of other rebellious populations, who resisted conversion to Christianity. During this period Emperor Ishaq declares war on the Beta Israel, and they are defeated. They lose their rights to land (rist) and become a subjugated people. They are employed as blacksmiths, weavers, and potters, which are considered lowly professions, and they are accused of possessing buda, or magical evil eye powers. During this period, they adopt monasticism as a Beta Israel religious expression and develop a strict code of purity laws involving menstruating women, women in childbirth, burial, and restriction on contact with outsiders. During the reign of Emperor Sarsa Dengel (1563–1597), Gushen (d. 1594), a Beta Israel leader, initiates a hopeless raid in Woggera against the Christian emperor in 1587–1588. The belligerent attempt ends with the captivity of hundreds of Beta Israel, the massacre of some, and the enslavement of women and children. During the reign of Emperor Fasilades (1632–1637), Gondar becomes the political metropolis of the empire, and the situation of the Beta Israel improves somewhat. Local Beta Israel are employed in higher-ranked professions, such as carpenters and masons in the churches and royal castles; this practice is continued by Emperors Yohannes I and Iyasu I. In addition, the emperors recruit Beta Israel as soldiers for their personal armies. Some Beta Israel reach the ranks of azmach and bejrond and as a result are allowed to retain land rights. According to the Scottish traveler James Bruce, the Beta Israel built the roof of the palace of Emperor Iyasu II. They continue in their roles as craftsmen well into the 19th century. However, during this historical period, the Beta Israel's position once again deteriorates and their religion is in disarray.

19th century The encounter with the Western world begins as late as the 19th century. Protestant missionaries from the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews succeed in converting some Beta Israel to Christianity; they also bring into question the Beta Israel's religious practices, such as monasticism, sacrifices more or less as specified in the Bible, rigid purity laws, and more. Aragawi, an Amhara Christian, along with other Beta Israel-born native agents (such as Debtera Beroo Webe, Gebra Heiwot, and Hiob Negoosie), run the London Society mission in Ethiopia during the period 1864–1922, after Tewodros II imprisoned and thereafter expelled European missionaries from Ethiopia in 1863. In 1862, a band of Beta Israel, under the leadership of Abba Mahari, makes an abortive attempt at aliyah to the Holy Land, but it ends in tragedy.

1867 Professor Joseph Halevy (1827–1917), a representative from the normative Jewish world and a Semitic scholar from the Sorbonne, Paris, meets with the Beta Israel in Ethiopia.

1877 In a detailed report to the Alliance Israelite Universelle, who sponsored the trip, Halevy describes the religious practices of his fellow coreligionists, who have not been exposed to the Oral Law, as Jews knew it in the West, and recommends steps to improve the socioeconomic condition of the Beta Israel; no action is taken.

1888–1892 The Kifu-Qen, or Great Famine, hits Ethiopia, and many Beta Israel must either starve to death or convert to Christianity.

1900s–1930s Dr. Jacques Faitlovitch (1881–1953), a student of Professor Joseph Halevy at the Sorbonne, leaves Paris under the sponsorship of Baron Edmund de Rothschild for his first expedition to Ethiopia in 1904. During this visit, he surveys the situation of the Beta Israel and returns to Palestine and Europe in 1905 with two “Falasha” boys: Taamrat Emmanuel, whom he took out of a Swedish Protestant mission in Asmara, and Gete Hermias, whom he met in a village in Gondar. From the time of his first mission to Ethiopia until 1935, when he is prevented from visiting Ethiopia because of the fascist Italian occupation, Dr. Faitlovitch brings 25 young men out of Ethiopia places them in different Jewish Orthodox communities in Palestine and Europe. He believed the boys would return to Ethiopia and educate their brethren in the tenets of normative Judaism. These pupils included Yona Bogale, Hizkiahu Finkas (who died in Italy), Solomon Isaac (who died in Egypt on the way back to Ethiopia with Dr. Faitlovitch), Menguistu Yitzchak, Mekuria Tsegaya, and Taamrat Emmanuel, who later becomes the aide of Emperor Haile Selassie. Dr. Faitlovitch establishes a Falasha school in Addis Ababa in 1923, where some of these pupils later teach. His activities are curtailed by the Italian occupation of Ethiopia in 1935–1936. Emperor Haile Selassie is restored as emperor of Ethiopia in 1941 after a brief period in exile in Jerusalem.

- 1940s–1950s There is no mass emigration from Ethiopia among the Beta Israel after the State of Israel is established in 1948, as with other Jewish communities. Although a few emissaries are dispatched to Ethiopia from Palestine and Israel, there is no attempt to encourage them to make aliyah. In 1952 and again in 1956, Emperor Haile Selassie allows two groups of young Beta Israel pupils to study in a dormitory school, Kfar Batya, in Israel, on condition that they return. Only one or two of the students, who married local Israelis, remained in Israel.
- 1970s Emperor Haile Selassie is replaced by a revolutionary Marxist government headed by Mengistu Haile Mariam. Although the revolution includes land reform, the economic position of the Beta Israel in the villages does not really improve. In 1973, on the basis of the Halachic precedent by the Radbaz concluding that the “Falasha” are members of the lost tribe of Dan, Rabbi Ovadiah Yosef declares that they can be accepted as lost Israelites and thereby return to their historic homeland. In 1975, the Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Shlomo Goren also accepts the Ethiopian Jews into the fold.
- 1980s The Beta Israel begin to organize more seriously to immigrate, although emigration from Ethiopia is still prohibited. Until 1980, about 250 Beta Israel manage to reach Israel. In 1979, Ferede Akum, a Beta Israel from Tigray, arrives in the Sudan and is contacted by the Israeli Mossad. The idea of leaving Ethiopia through the Sudan is conceived. Beta Israel walk in the night led by guides, who take them to the Sudanese border, where they wait in refugee camps. An estimated 4,000 Beta Israel die on the way. Finally, in 1984–1985, Operation Moses takes place, in which 7,700 Beta Israel are airlifted from the Sudan to Israel. However, the operation is terminated suddenly by the embarrassed Sudanese government, after a speech by a Jewish Agency official in New York, which is picked up by an obscure Israeli newspaper and then quoted throughout the world. Operation Sheba, a few months later in 1985, mops up some 700 Beta Israel, who are stranded in the refugee camps in the Sudan. From Operation Sheba until 1989, when diplomatic relations are restored between Ethiopia and Israel, approximately 2,400 Beta Israel immigrate to Israel. International pressure, and in particular the intervention of American Jewish organizations, helps the “rescue” effort for the Beta Israel.
- 1990s In 1991, Operation Solomon brings 14,310 Jews out of Ethiopia to Israel in 33 consecutive flights over 36 hours during May 24–25, 1991, as the future of Mengistu Haile Mariam’s government hangs in the balance. Upon termination of Operation Solomon, different groups of Beta Israel begin to emerge, claiming the right to live in Israel. Some had been overlooked in Operation Solomon; others in remote areas had been forgotten. In 1992, the Jews of Qwara submit a list of 2,800 Beta Israel to the Jewish Agency; some of these are brought to Israel that year. From 1992 to 1998, the aliyah of the Jews of Qwara takes place at a slow pace of a few hundred a year; in 1999, on the basis of an Israeli government

- recommendation, some 1,200 additional Beta Israel from Qwara arrive in Israel. Several hundreds belonging to a group now being called “Felesmura,” whose ancestors converted to Christianity and now claim to be of the “seed of Israel,” are also brought to Israel that year. The Rubinstein committee (1991); the Tsaban committee (1992), established by Yair Tsaban, the Minister of Absorption; and the Handel committee (2001) set up commissions of enquiry to understand the history and demography of the Felesmura and to decide their fate. Because of political pressures and rabbinical decrees by various rabbis, including some of Israel’s chief rabbis, thousands of Felesmura have since migrated to Israel and converted to Judaism. More are waiting in Ethiopia in the hopes of emigrating.
- 2005 A compound for potential immigrants is still active in Addis Ababa; people designating themselves Felesmura or “Zera Israel” (the seed of Israel) live in neighborhoods in the vicinity. The compound is run by the North American Conference on Ethiopian Jewry (NACOEJ) and provides religious and educational services; the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) is responsible for health. At the end of 2005, NACOEJ is expelled from Ethiopia, and the compound is disbanded.
- 2006 About 105,000 Jews of Ethiopian origin reside in Israel, including Felesmura and others; more than 30 percent were born in Israel. This group includes Ethiopian Jews, who are known as Beta Israel (House of Israel), Israeletoch or Israelawi (Israelites), or Falasha in Ethiopia. It also includes non-Jewish Ethiopians who managed to immigrate to Israel as the seed of Israel and receive Israeli government benefits as new immigrants, as well as a larger group designated Felesmura, or descendants of Beta Israel, who converted in the past to Christianity. Sometimes the latter group is connoted Falashmura, reminiscent of the Torah-observant Falasha, as Beta Israel were once called. Today, both Felesmura and those non-Jews who have succeeded in entering Israel as Jews are converted to Judaism according to the laws of Halacha (Jewish legal law) and thereafter accepted as Jews. All these different groups of people are today emerging with a new ethnic identity and part of an ethnic group (eda) called “Ethiopian Jews” in Israel. In recent years and in the wake of globalization, transnational ties are manipulated and kept alive between communities of Beta Israel in Ethiopia and Israel. Israeli Ethiopians, particularly males, visit Ethiopia for several weeks each year. They visit kin and friends, spend money on shopping and leisure pursuits, and indulge in petty trading. A few have set up transnational homes or businesses in Ethiopia and Israel.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries

Although the Ethiopian community in Israel has achieved many successes in different fields, it is also beset with social and economic problems, both among new immigrants, who continue to arrive from Ethiopia, and among old-timers and their offspring, who may have been in the country 20–30 years. Most Ethiopian Jewish adults in Israel live below the poverty line. Some Ethiopians complain of racial discrimination; others cannot find suitable employment. Among the greatest changes undergone by the Ethiopian Jewish community in its transition from an underdeveloped society to a modern, Western society are those in the field of family and personal relations. Today, kinship among Ethiopian Jews is breaking down, thus causing anguish to more elderly and traditional Ethiopian Jews and exemplifying the generation gap. The ideology and laws of ritual impurity, observed in Ethiopia, are being modified. There are experimental new arrangements to deal with female impurity, such as dividing up apartments into pure and nonpure spaces instead of the female Ethiopian having to go off to a menstruating hut or isolate herself for a week each month, as in Ethiopia. Girls no longer marry at first puberty—it is illegal to marry in Israel before the age of 17. Married women are encouraged to go out to work to assist with the family income, and it is often easier for a woman than a man to find employment, particularly in the temporary, unskilled jobs in which the Ethiopian Jews tend to congregate. According to a source within the Israel Defence Forces, 48 percent of Ethiopian women of military age were serving in the army in February 2003.

Present Economic Conditions

For perhaps the first time, Beta Israel from rural backgrounds are handling money and managing bank accounts. A woman's salary may be paid straight into her bank account, or she may be earning more than her husband. Quarrels tend to break out between marriage partners, leading to violence against women. In 2006, in the space of seven months, seven women were murdered by their enraged husbands, making the number of murders against women the highest among ethnic groups in Israel.

A major reason for the high divorce rate among Beta Israel is the demasculinization experienced by Ethiopian Jewish men in Israel. The Israeli rabbinate has established a special department to deal with the Ethiopian divorce rate, which is far higher than that in the general population. According to statistics available, 30 percent of Ethiopian families are one-parent families, but the actual rate is higher and the situation more complicated as parts of one-parent families often align with other one-parent families, and thereby create other families.

Although Ethiopia has one of the poorest health systems in the world and infant mortality is one of the highest, in Israel Ethiopian Jew enjoy access to all health services, and infant mortality is very low. In 1996, the community staged a large strike opposite the prime minister's office, in which 20,000 Ethiopian Israelis object to the policy adopted by Israel's Red Cross (Magen David Adom) of discarding blood of Ethiopian Jews for fear it is HIV-positive. This policy has since been terminated, and a Commission of Enquiry was set up, chaired by Yitzchak Navon a past president of Israel. However, the Ethiopian Jews continue to have the highest proportion of HIV-positive members per ethnic group in Israel.

Jewish Education and Communal Institutions

The Ethiopian Jews were known as Beta Israel ("House of Israel"), Israeletoch or Israelawi ("Israelites"), or Falasha in Ethiopia. The latter designation, from the Semitic root “falas” (to intrude), was considered stigmatic and indicated their lowly outsider status.

Traditionally, the Beta Israel were monotheistic and practiced a Torah-based Judaism, without observing the Oral Law, or knowing the Talmud, known to other communities of Jews. The Beta Israel followed both the lunar and the solar calendar and observed a complex cycle of fasts and festivals, most prescribed in the Torah. They circumcised their boys on the eighth day, as did other Ethiopians, and refrained from work on the Sabbath. Some religious festivals known to other Jewish communities were not marked by the Beta Israel, such as Hanukkah or Purim (although they knew the Fast of Esther), but they, in their turn, celebrated certain days that are not marked by other Jews, such as the Sigd festival, which expresses yearning for Jerusalem and is marked 50 days after Yom Kippur. Ethiopic Christians influenced their religious practices, and many elements were in common to both religions, such as praying to Jerusalem, speaking the common liturgical language of Geez, and the longing for Israel and Zion.

According to an Israeli government decision, once the Israeli Chief Rabbinate accepted the Ethiopian Jews as Jews in every respect, they were eligible for aliyah (immigration). Nevertheless, until this day, Ethiopian Jews in Israel have to undergo conversion or special registration with one specific rabbi for purposes of marriage. Otherwise, they are afforded equality of rights and responsibilities in all spheres of life and, as immigrants, are entitled to subsidized public housing, free Hebrew tuition, an initial cash payment for “absorption,” and special educational advantages. Because of their background, they benefit from affirmative action in many fields, including mortgages, free loans, and a wide variety of educational programs tailored for the Ethiopian community. Ethiopian Israelis serve in the Israel Defence Forces or National Service.

In 1986, Ethiopian Jews in Israel staged a massive strike opposite the offices of the Israeli Chief Rabbinate in Jerusalem objecting to the symbolic conversion they had to undergo, which involved ritual immersion, but was considered insulting by members of the community. Today, all new immigrants have to undergo conversion, and there are still obstacles in registering marriages freely, despite several High Court law cases, including a 1995 High Court instruction to the Israel Rabbinate to make available several additional marriage registry offices for Ethiopian Jews. Kessotch (Ethiopian priests) still act as spiritual leaders for the older generations in the Ethiopian Jewish community. Some 15 young Modern Orthodox rabbis have been ordained in Israel. The younger generation of Ethiopian Jews is sometimes lost as to whom to consult on religious matters. Several Ethiopian Jewish synagogues have been built in cities in Israel, where there are large concentrations of Ethiopian Jews. Sometimes they run dual services—in Geez for the older generation and Hebrew for the younger Israeli Ethiopians.

The changing of the guard within the Ethiopian Jewish community in Israel has to do with a new, young, secular leadership replacing the older religious elite as well as the fact that several exceptional women have taken up positions of leadership. Some manage key Ethiopian associations responsible for raising substantial funds for the community, such as the Israel Association for Ethiopian Jews; multicultural programs in Elem, such as an organization for disattached youth; Fidel, which works to advance the education of Ethiopian Jews in Israel; and the National Project, which aims to raise massive funds for the improvement of Ethiopian populations in specified cities in Israel.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

Ethiopian Jews in Israel are a young ethnic group relative to the general Israeli Jewish population. The average age is 20.1 years, compared with 30.5 years in the general Jewish population. More than 20 percent of the Ethiopian Jewish community is born in Israel. The Ethiopian Jews in Israel have made enormous strides in their new Jewish homeland. One member, Adisu Messele, was elected member of Parliament in the Israeli Knesset on behalf of the Labour party. Three other Ethiopians were proposed as candidates by different political parties in the 2006 Israeli general elections, but narrowly missed being elected. Several Ethiopians are active politically on municipal councils. Members of the community have succeeded in attaining high-ranking jobs in the media, sports, and education and as models, singers, and actors. A steering committee for Ethiopian Jewish education, run by an Israeli Ethiopian, has special funding for selected projects and is funded by an arm of the ministry of education.

It is impossible to estimate how many potential Ethiopian Jews are waiting in Ethiopia to immigrate to Israel. Estimates range from 18,000 to 30,000. As soon as a certain number arrive in Israel, more people surface with immigration claims and proof of relatives in Israel. In July 2003, it was reported that 20,000 were waiting to come to Israel; by 2006, a similar number were still waiting despite the emigration of several thousands. An Israeli grassroots organization, From the Wing to South Zion, stages demonstrations in Israel and encourages the aliyah of the Felesmura. Ethiopian Jews have immigrated to Israel at a pace of 150 per month, but this quota has changed from period to period, according to Israeli government policy, national interests, and relations with Ethiopia. The compound in Gondar, which is still active in 2006, receives financial aid from NACOEJ, which helps run the school, synagogue, and mikvah (ritual bath) and supports the administration. The JDC runs the clinic on the compound. Officials from the Israeli Ministry of Interior process requests for immigration in consultation with the Jewish Agency. A few dozen Ethiopian Jews live in the United States, including a small enclave of young people in Harlem, New York.

Selected Bibliography

- Anteby-Yemini, Lisa. 2003. "Being an Oleh in a Global World: From Local-ethnic Community to Transnational Community." Hagar 4 (1-2): 141-154.
- Bruce, James. 1790. Travels to Discover the Source of the Nile. Edinburgh: Robinson.
- Kaplan, Steven. 1992. The Beta Israel (Falasha) in Ethiopia. New York: New York University Press.
- Leshem, Eleazar, and Osnat Zamir. 2004. Ethiopian Jews in Israel: Situation Report 1999-2004 [Hebrew]. Jerusalem: Meyers-Joint Brookdale Institute.
- Offer, Shira. 2004. "The Socio-Economic Integration of the Ethiopian Community in Israel." International Migration 42 (3): 29-55.

- Pankhurst, Richard D. 1997. "The Beta Israel (Falasha) in Their Ethiopian Setting." In Ethiopian Jews in the Limelight. Israel Social Science Research, edited by Shalva Weil, 1–12. Jerusalem: National Council of Jewish Women.
- Quirin, James. 1992. The Evolution of the Ethiopian Jews: A History of the Beta Israel (Falasha) to 1920. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Swirsky Barbara, and Joseph Kapela. 2005. Employment Status among Israelis of Ethiopian Origin [Hebrew]. Tel-Aviv: Adva Center, Information on Equality and Social Justice in Israel.
- Weil, Shalva. 1995. "Collective Designations and Collective Identity among Ethiopian Jews." Israel Social Science Research 10 (2): 25–40.
- Weil, Shalva. 1999. "Collective Rights and Perceived Inequality: The Case of Ethiopian Jews in Israel." In Divided Europeans: Understanding Ethnicities in Conflict, edited by T. Allen and J. Eade, 127–144. The Hague: Kluwer Law International.
- Weil, Shalva. 2004. "Ethiopian Jewish Women: Trends and Transformations in the Context of Trans-National Change." Nashim 8 (Fall): 73–86.
- Weil, Shalva. 2006. Encyclopedia Aethiopica, vol. 2, edited by S. Uhlig, s.v. "Gweshen." Wiesbaden, Germany: Verlag Otto Harrassowitz, 940.

Jews in Kenya

Saul Issroff

---

General Population: 34,256,000 (July 2005 estimate)

Jewish Population: 280

Percent of Population: Less than 0.0008 percent

Jewish Population by City: Mainly Nairobi

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: The Jewish population came predominantly from Lithuania, Germany, and the United Kingdom.

Languages Spoken: Swahili, English

---

Historical Overview

Kenya, previously known as British East Africa, was established as a Crown Colony in 1920. Jewish settlement began in the early 1900s. In August 1903, Britain offered the Zionists about 5,000 square miles (Guas Nigshu, Uasin Gishu plateau) in Kenya. This was known as the Uganda Scheme because at the time the land was in Uganda. Opposed by the international Jewish community and within the area itself, the scheme was rejected at the seventh Zionist Congress in 1905.

Nevertheless, several Jewish families immigrated to Kenya and founded the Nairobi Hebrew Congregation in 1904. They built a synagogue and purchased a burial ground. In 1913, 20 Jewish families lived in Nairobi. By 1926, there were 256 Jews among a European population of 12,509. By 1931, the number had risen to 305. A few were farmers; most were in business or the professions.

Members of the Berg family outside their home near Limuru, Kenya, in 1941. The Jewish family sought refuge there during World War II. (United States Holocaust Memorial Museum)

Kenya was a safe haven for World War II refugees. Some young German Jewish men, aided by the Hilfsverein der Deutschen Juden and a local refugee committee, had settled before the Holocaust. Another small group settled in 1939, training as farmers.

After the Holocaust, more Jews arrived in Kenya. In 1945 there were 150 families. In March 1947, the British set up a detention camp in Gilgil to hold captured members of Jewish underground organizations. The Jewish community of Kenya helped to improve the living conditions of the detainees. About 24 internees, including Yaakov Meridor, an underground leader, escaped. In July 1948, the remainder were released and sailed to Haifa.

In 1955, a new synagogue was built. As of 2006, about 280 Jews lived in Kenya, mostly in Nairobi. There is a burial society and a branch of Women's International Zionist Organization.

Notable Individuals among Kenyan Jewry

In addition to H. Fein, the first chairman of the Nairobi Hebrew Congregation, other pioneers included J. Marcus, Michael Hartz, Otto Markus, Abraham Block, M. W. London, and Simon Medicks. In 1906, Sammy and Gertie Jacobs founded S. Jacobs Pty Ltd—East Africa's largest department store. Before World War II, Herman Strauss and the Berg family provided homes and work for other refugees. Israel Somen, the president of the Board of Kenya Jewry, was elected mayor of Nairobi in 1957. Dr. Vera Somen is currently president of the Nairobi Hebrew congregation.

Relations with Israel

Kenyan–Israeli connections date back to Kenya’s struggle for independence. Israeli experts trained Kenyan leaders in the organization of the institutional bodies required for statehood and trained young people in agriculture. In addition, military and medical training were given.

After the 1973 Yom Kippur War, diplomatic relations between the two countries ceased, to be resumed only in 1988. Still, Kenyan connections proved invaluable in the successful rescue of Israeli hostages from Entebbe, Uganda, in 1976, when airplanes carrying the soldiers and freed hostages were permitted to land and refuel.

In 1998, after terrorists attacked the American Embassy in Nairobi, the Israel Defense Forces sent rescue teams. In November 2002, a car bomb attack on an Israeli-owned hotel in Kikambala killed 15 people, including 3 Israelis.

Selected Bibliography

- Carlebach, Julius. 1962. The Jews of Nairobi, 1903–1962 (5664–5722). Nairobi, Kenya: Nairobi Hebrew Congregation.
- Musiker, Naomi. 2004. “The Jews of Kenya.” Jewish Affairs 59 (2, Winter): 21–23.
- Salvadori, Cynthia. 2004. Glimpses of the Jews of Kenya: The Centennial Story of the Nairobi Hebrew Congregation, 1904–2004, 5664–5764. Nairobi, Kenya: Nairobi Hebrew Congregation.

Jews in Libya

Vivienne Roumani-Denn

---

Population of Libya: 6 million

Jewish Population: A single Jew is known to reside in Libya.

Percent of General Population: Less than 1 percent

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Jews arrived in Libya in about the third century BCE. The largest communities of Libyan Jews are now in Israel and Italy; there are smaller groups in the United Kingdom and the United States.

Languages Spoken: Libyan Jews spoke Judeo-Arabic, a dialect of Arabic that was written using Hebrew characters. Merchants also spoke Italian because of a history of trade with Italy, especially Livorno, even before the Italian occupation.

---

Historical Overview

Pre-300 BCE One tradition holds that Jews came to Cyrene as early as the time of Solomon.

300 BCE Jewish life in Libya can be traced with certainty to the third century BCE.

1st millennium BCE–1st millennium CE According to Flavius Josephus, Jews arrive in Cyrene at that time with Ptolemy, son of Lagos, a general of Alexander the Great and the first of the Ptolemaic pharaohs. Jews live in Libya continuously under Ptolemaic, Roman, Ottoman, Italian, British, and Arab rule, although little is known of the Jewish community between the time of the two Jewish revolts against the Romans (73 CE and 115 CE), which were brutally crushed, and the arrival in the 16th century of refugees from the Iberian expulsion, 16th century Jews expelled from Spain and Portugal arrive in Libya, some by way of Livorno. The communities in Tripolitania and Cyrenaica number several thousand in the mid-16th century, but Jewish education is limited. Jewish learning is reinvigorated at this time by the arrival of Rabbi Shimon Labi, a Kabbalist and poet (the author of the piyyut “Bar Yochai”).

18th century During the Ottoman period, the Jews suffer occasional persecution, especially under Ibrahim Sherif in 1704 and Ali Burghal II in 1795. Tripolitanian Jews begin to celebrate two additional Purim holidays, Purim Sherif, on the 23rd of Teveth, and Purim Burghal, on the 29th of Teveth, to commemorate their liberation.

19th century European influence on Jewish life in Libya begins in the 19th century. The Ottoman-appointed Libyan chief rabbi (hakham bashi) from 1874 to 1888, Eliyahu Hazan, encourages moderate change, including the introduction of secular education with the religious, to retain the religious character of the community while resisting European influence.

1890s The French Alliance Israelite Universelle, which the traditional community views as assimilationist, begins vocational schools in Tripoli in 1890, and includes some education for girls starting in 1895. Reforms in the Talmud Torah system, whereby students are grouped by age and ability, are introduced in 1893, but the subject matter remains religious only. Italian schools that continue through high school and include Hebrew language instruction are started in 1894.

1911 The Italian occupation of Libya begins, at which time there are about 21,000 Jews in the country; Libyan Jews initially prosper under the Italian occupation, often serving as intermediaries between the European and Arab and Berber communities because of their knowledge of the languages of both. Some Jews keep to traditional ways, and others adopt Italian dress and customs. A Libyan Arab living in Scotland writes, “As a child I remember asking why some women wore black, purple with silver stripes, and others wore just black, and was told that this denotes who was Jewish and who was Muslim. The men, I was told, were similarly distinguished; those wearing plain black baggy trousers were Muslim, those with silver stripes down the sides were Jewish.” A Jewish narrator in an oral history remarks, “In Tripoli those who . . . put on trousers, shirts, we said that he is dressed labes btelyan (a la Italian). Before the Italians came to Libya no one wore these modern clothes. You can see them . . . in pictures [in] the traditional garb, like the tarbush (Turkish hat) . . . women went with a big zdad (traditional dress), red and black colors and white.” During this time, the leaders of the Tripoli community, who are successful businessmen, favor the adoption of Italian culture in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. They are opposed by a group of young Zionists who see Jewish identity and Jewish education, especially study of the Hebrew language, as the path to modernity. Jews from Tripoli and Benghazi correspond with the Zionist congresses in Vienna as early as 1900. The traditional community members and the Rabbinate initially see both Italian culture and Zionism as threats, but by 1918 the Zionist perspective prevails over Europeanization, and the Rabbinate is supportive.

- 1910s–1920s The first Zionist organization is established in Tripoli, followed by the Circolo Sion in 1916, but it is only after 1919 that the organization experiences wide community support, and tensions between the various factions continue: an election for leadership of the Tripoli Jewish community in 1929 is annulled by the Italian governor Pietro Badoglio “for the sake of public order,” and the governor appoints a non-Jewish Italian as commissioner of the community. The first course in modern Hebrew is started in Tripoli in 1919. The development of Zionism is smoother in Benghazi, where a teacher from Jerusalem is recruited to teach modern Hebrew in 1915. The Herzl Association is established in Benghazi in 1919 to further Zionism. Badoglio, governor from 1928 to 1933, has a strongly negative view of the non-European Jews in Libya and seeks to “modernize” them.
- 1932 Jewish children are required to attend middle schools on Saturday, causing a crisis that is not resolved until 1933 when Italo Balbo replaces Badoglio as governor.
- 1938–1945 The alliance between Mussolini and Hitler leads to the imposition of racial laws in 1938, but because of the importance of the Jews to the economies of Tripoli and Benghazi, the racial laws are generally ignored under the governorship of Balbo until his death in 1940. Jews suffer greatly during the North African desert war of 1941–1943. Benghazi Jews view the British as liberators when they capture the city in February 1941. After the British withdrawal in April 1941, the Jews experience an Italian-led pogrom. In 1942, Jews with French passports are expelled to Tunisia, which subsequently comes under direct German occupation, and a large number of Libyan Jews are killed during Allied air raids in the battle for Tunisia. Additionally, 300 Libyan Jews with British passports are sent to internment camps in Italy, and many are subsequently sent to camps at Bergen-Belsen and Biberach. More than 5,000 Libyan Jews are sent to internment camps in the Libyan desert, where more than 500 die. According to Yad Vashem statistics, Libya had 650 Holocaust victims, more than 90 percent of the victims in North Africa.
- Late 1940s There was Arab hostility toward the Jews throughout the 20th century because Arabs identify the local Jews with the European colonizers and because of the rise of Arab nationalism. The Libyan Jewish communities receive valuable support after the Allied victory in North Africa through the presence of the Jewish Palestine Brigade, whose members strengthen the Zionist ideology and help establish schools. Local Arabs lead pogroms against Jews in Libya during the British postwar occupation in 1945: more than 100 Jews are killed in Tripolitania and five synagogues are destroyed. During another pogrom in 1948, the community is more prepared for self-defense and resists fiercely. More than 3,000 Jews leave illegally during this postwar period. In 1948 there are about 38,000 Jews in Libya.

- 1949 More than 30,000 Jews leave when the British permits emigration in 1949; most go to Israel
- 1951 The Jewish population at the time of Libyan independence at the end of 1951 numbers only about 5,000.
- 1950s–1960s Jews are unwelcome in the new University of Libya, which is established in Benghazi after independence; the few Jews who matriculate quickly leave. The 4,100 Jews remaining in Libya in June 1967 flee, mostly in an airlift to Italy, following Arab violence in the aftermath of the Arab-Israeli Six-Day war; two Jewish families are murdered during the riots. Only about 300 Jews remain in Libya at the time of Mu'ammad Gadhafi's coup in 1969, when the property of Jews who are not resident in Libya is confiscated.
- 1970 Only 90 Jews remain in Libya.
- 2002 The last known Jew dies in Libya, but in the same year an elderly Jewish woman is found to be living in the capital.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries

The Jews of Libya were mostly merchants, tradespeople, and craftsmen. Jews were also dominant in trade and in gold and silver work.

Jewish Education and Communal Institutions

Most Libyan Jews lived in Tripoli and its environs, and about 6,000 lived in and near Benghazi (Cyrenaica); very small communities of Jews lived in the countryside and the mountainous interior. The Jews of both Cyrenaica and Tripolitania were traditional, with general observance of the Sabbath and the dietary laws. Intermarriage was rare. Most Jews of Tripoli, who were typically poor and received support from the community, lived in one of the two Jewish quarters (haras). Wealthier members of the community, many of whom were European Jews, lived outside the Jewish quarters. There was no Jewish quarter in Benghazi, where the community consisted largely of middle-class merchants, and most Jews lived in a mixed neighborhood near the town square.

Jewish schools that teach Hebrew and some secular subjects open in Benghazi and Tripoli in 1943 with the assistance of soldiers from the Palestine Brigade. Talmud Torahs are also started in Benghazi and Tripoli. Italian Hebrew schools, both state-supported and private, are started in Tripoli, and the Alliance Israelite Universelle opens a school in 1946. The Yeshiva Naveh Shalom-Ozar Hatorah opens in Tripoli in 1946. The school in Benghazi closes in 1949 after the aliyah, as do most Jewish schools in Tripoli. An Italian school sponsored by the Italian consulate opens in Tripoli in 1950.

Today synagogues in Libya have been desecrated, and Jewish cemeteries have been paved over. The largest communities of Jews from Libya and their descendants live in Israel, where they are believed to number more than 100,000. (Many Libyan surnames are distinctive, but some immigrants changed their names after arriving in Israel, so good estimates are difficult to make.) There are synagogues in Netanya, Or Yehuda, Bat Yam, Ashkelon, Petah Tikvah, and Yaffo that follow the Libyan tradition, which differs in detail from that of other North African communities. For example, they include a unique cantillation for Torah reading and special piyyutim during prayer. The Babylonian Jewish Heritage Center in Or Yehuda contains a collection on Libyan Jewry; the Or Shalom Center in Bat Yam, which publishes the newsletter Ada in Hebrew, is planning to open a public collection. There is no organized Libyan Jewish community in Israel. The second largest community of Libyan Jews, numbering about 6,000, is in Italy. Much smaller numbers live in the United States, the United Kingdom, and other parts of Europe.

Selected Bibliography

- DeFelice, Renzo. 1985. Jews in an Arab Land: Libya, 1835–1970. Translated by Judith Roumani. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- Goldberg, Harvey E. 1990. Jewish Life in Muslim Libya: Rivals and Relatives. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Goldberg, Harvey E. 2003. "Libya." In The Jews of the Middle East and North Africa in Modern Times, edited by R. S. Simon, M. M. Laskier, and S. Regeur. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Ha-Cohen, Mordecai. 1980. The Book of Mordech: A Study of the Jews of Libya, edited and translated with introduction and commentaries by Harvey E. Goldberg. Philadelphia: Institute for the Study of Human Issues.
- Haggiag-Liluf, Yacov. 2005. Storia degli Ebrei di Libia. Or Yehuda, Israel: Centro di studi sull'Ebraismo Libico.
- Roumani, Maurice M. 1983. The Case of the Jews from Arab Countries: A Neglected Issue. 2nd ed. Tel Aviv, Israel: World Organization of Jews from Arab Countries.
- Roumani, Maurice M. 2007. The Jews of Libya: The Disruptions of Italian Colonialism, Arab Nationalism, Migration and Reconciliation. Brighton, UK: Sussex Academic Press.
- Roumani-Denn, Vivienne. The Last Jews of Libya Web site. <http://sunsite.berkeley.edu/Jews ofLibya/> (accessed May 2, 2007).
- Stillman, Norman A. 1991. The Jews of Arab Lands in Modern Times. New York: Jewish Publication Society.
- Tironi, Stefano. 2003. La comunita ebraica Tripolina tra la Libia et Roma (a transcript of an oral history). <http://www.morasha.it/tesi/trni/index.html> (accessed May 2, 2007).

Jewish Community in Morocco

Richard Gold

---

General Population: 33.25 million (2006)

Jewish Population: 5,500 (2006)

Percent of Population: 0.02 percent

Jewish Population by City: Casablanca, 4,000; Rabat, 300; Fez, 300; Marrakesh, 250; Tangier, 250; Meknes, 150; Agadir, 50; Tetouan, 25; Oujda, 25

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Palestinian Jews (second century BCE–third century CE), North African immigrants and indigenous Berber converts (fourth–eighth centuries), Arab Jews (9th–10th centuries), and Sephardic Jews (15th–16th centuries). Almost all Moroccan Jews today consider themselves Sephardic.

Languages Spoken: French, Moroccan Arabic. Some Moroccan Jews speak Hekatia, a form of Ladino.

Historical Overview

4th century BCE Jews arrive with Phoenician traders.

1st century CE Jews live in Roman cities in Morocco.

4th century CE Other Jews move inland from Cyrenaica (Libya), convert Berber tribes, and establish settlements in the foothills, mountains, and desert oases of Algeria and Morocco.

7th century CE A Jewish woman, the kahina (priestess), reputedly leads the Berber resistance in Algeria and Morocco and slows down the Arabs' westward movement through burning crops and evacuating villages.

8th century CE Idriss I founds the first Muslim state in Morocco. His authority extends over central and western Morocco, and he fights Christians and Jews who will not convert.

9th century CE Idriss II creates the city of Fez, developing it from a village that is believed to have been inhabited by a Jewish tribe. He invites Jews to live there together with Arabs.

11th and 12th centuries CE A Berber tribe from the Sahara desert, the Almoravids, creates an Islamic empire in Morocco and Spain. Jewish scholars migrate to the Almoravid empire, producing some of the religious writings associated with the golden age of the Jews.

12th century CE The Almohads, a Berber mountain people, develop a fundamentalist Islamic doctrine and build an empire that spreads from Spain to western Libya. They expel Jews from Marrakesh and try to eliminate their presence from Morocco.

1159–1165 CE Maimonides lives in the old city of Fez, where he begins writing his most important book, Guide for the Perplexed.

13th century CE The Merenids give preferential treatment to the Jews. Resentment of the sultan and his close ties to the Jews incites a pogrom in Fez in 1276.

1438 The Merenids force the Jews to move into a mellah, a fortified area adjoining the royal palace of Fez, to ensure their safety.

1472 The Wattasids neither encourage nor prevent tens of thousands of Jewish refugees from Spain and Portugal from entering Morocco in the late 15th and early 16th centuries.

16th and 17th centuries The Saadian Dynasty taxes the Jewish community heavily to finance military activities. Sultans give Jewish traders the monopoly over sugar exports. Jews play a key role in the caravan trade with sub-Saharan Africa.

1660s The first Alaouite Dynasty ruler, Moulay Rachid, captures the caravan routes in eastern and western Morocco, ensuring the cooperation of Jewish traders in financing the new empire.

- 1672 Moulay Ishmael completes the task of pacifying Morocco. Jews are protected from violence, although they are taxed highly. Jewish traders grow wealthy from increased trade with Europe and within Morocco.
- 1760s Muley Mohammed increases the economic and political importance of the Jews by populating coastal cities with Jewish traders. He installs Jews in the Portuguese city of Mazagan (El Jadida) and creates the port of Mogador (Essaouira).
- 1790 Moulay Yazid incites pogroms against the Jews throughout the country. He encouraged attacks on the mellahs of Tetouan and other cities. The Jews of Fez and Marrakesh are forced to leave their mellahs.
- February 1860 Spain invades the city of Tetouan. The entire city is pillaged to prevent the Spanish from benefiting from Jewish wealth. European consulates encourage the sultan to protect Jews in Tetouan and throughout the country.
- February 1864 Moses Montefiore of the British Anglo-Jewish Association negotiates a royal declaration affirming that the Jews will be treated as equals under the law, with justice and impartiality, and that anyone mistreating them will be prosecuted.
- Late 19th century While Jewish life in Morocco flourishes, the ability of the sultans to control the country and provide security for the Jews deteriorates. Many Moroccan Jews receive protection from European consulates. These “protégés” do not pay taxes and are immune from prosecution.
- March 30, 1912 Most of Morocco becomes a French protectorate. Spain is given control of Northwest Morocco.
- April 17, 1912 The sultan’s troops in Fez revolt against the French, and a crowd following them pillages the mellah. Jews abandon the mellah and take refuge in the sultan’s palace.
- August 1941 The Vichy government of France enacts laws that discriminate against Moroccan Jews. The Moroccan sultan, Mohammed V, tells Jewish leaders that in his opinion Vichy laws singling out the Jews are inconsistent with Moroccan law.
- May 1948 Arab armies launch their war against the new State of Israel. Sultan Mohammed V declares his support for the Arabs. In response to anti-Jewish rhetoric, Mohammed V warns Muslims not to hurt Moroccan Jews, reminding them that Jews have always been protected in Morocco and have always showed their devotion to the throne. He also warns Moroccan Jews not to support Zionists.
- June 1948 Tensions associated with the Israeli-Arab War, the beginnings of Moroccan Jewish emigration to Israel, and the struggle for independence from France contribute to two pogroms in the eastern towns of Oujda and Djerrada.
- 1950–1961 Jews emigrate during the period before Moroccan independence in 1956, when emigration to Israel is legal, as well as from 1956 until 1961, when emigration is illegal. As a result, the Jewish population drops from about 220,000 in 1952 to about 160,000 in 1960, according to censuses.
- 1955 Nationalist leaders from the Istiqlal Party meet with the World Jewish Congress. They state their intention, once Morocco becomes independent under the king, to guarantee the liberty of Moroccan Jews and their equality with other citizens and to allow their participation in representative organizations and the government.

1956 The new government's constitution ensures equality between Jews and Muslims. In the coming years, three Jews are eventually elected to parliament, including a rabbi from the heavily Jewish town of Sefrou. Jews begin to take the place of the French in the administration.

February 1961 Morocco's Jews join Muslims in a national day of mourning for King Mohammed V. Emigration continues to Israel until 1964 and then mainly to France and Canada.

1975 The dwindling Jewish community participates in the Green March, when 350,000 Moroccans march into the former Spanish Sahara to reclaim it for their country.

May 16, 2003 An Al Qaeda–related group bombs Jewish sites in Casablanca.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

In the 19th century, when the Jewish population was about 80,000, the Jewish community consisted of a tiny group of rich traders who were close to the sultan and Europeans; a somewhat larger middle-class group of small traders, jewelers, treasure hunters, and religious officials; and a large group of the relatively poor, including artisans and shopkeepers. In addition, there were many indigents, prostitutes, and beggars. By the 1980s, when the population had dropped to about 8,000, the Jewish community was made up of 30 percent affluent businesspeople, 30 percent small business and shop owners, 30 percent laborers and artisans, and 10 percent recipients of private and government assistance.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Many Moroccan Jews are proud of their Sephardic ancestry, which is reflected in their knowledge of Hekatia, a variation of Ladino that integrates some Arabic words. They also appreciate Andalucian music, which was imported from 16th-century Spain and is now played by both Muslims and Jews. Andalucian melodies and poetry are also used in prayer services. Jews have maintained their own social clubs, kosher restaurants, sports clubs, scouting troops, and summer camps. After Morocco's independence in 1956, Zionist groups were forced to go underground. Few Jews have national prominence, apart from some major industrialists and Andre Azoulay, who is economic adviser to the king.

Alternative Jewish Culture

Moroccan Jews are unique in their reverence for deceased learned and pious rabbis. Throughout Morocco, there are hundreds of Jewish "saints," as these rabbis are called, whose tombs are usually located in Jewish cemeteries. Some Jews make regular visits to the saints' tombs to pray for a better life. Once a year groups of Jews hold festivals, known as hiloulot, at the gravesite of the most important saints. Many hiloulot take place during the Jewish holiday of Lag B'Omer.

Present Economic Conditions

Morocco is a developing country with a gross domestic product per capita of $4,100 in 2005. It is struggling to decrease its dependence on agriculture, given the erratic rainfall. By liberalizing its economy, the Moroccan government has increased private investment, creating greater wealth for the urban areas. The few Jewish farmers moved to the urban areas as early as the 1950s. Most Jews have benefited from improving economic conditions, particularly the industrialists and shop owners. Unemployment, estimated at 11 percent in 2005, remains a problem, affecting Jews and Muslims. However, the few young Jews left in Morocco typically leave Morocco upon graduation from high school.

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

The French organization Alliance Israelite Universelle established its first secular school for Jews in the Moroccan city of Tetouan in 1862. By the 1950s, it had built a large network of schools throughout the country. Osar Hatorah, a New York-based Sephardic association, began to support religious schools in 1948. The Hasidic Lubavitch movement supported schools at about the same time. In 1950, the Moroccan High Institute for Hebrew Studies was created in Rabat to train rabbis. Almost all synagogues are Sephardic. Until the 20th century, minor differences between the religious practices of indigenous Berber Jews and the descendants of Andalucian Jews led them to establish separate synagogues. The wealthy Jews aspired to have their own family synagogues. Consequently, each Jewish community has many synagogues. In the 1980s, for instance, Casablanca had 34 working synagogues for its 8,000 Jews. Jewish civil law applies to Moroccan Jews, as interpreted by a beth din, a Jewish religious tribunal. Each major Jewish community has its own community committee. The Council of Jewish Communities of Morocco is the coordinating organ for all Jewish community committees.

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionism, and Existential Problems of the Community

Moroccan Muslims and Jews have limited social interaction, although both groups are strongly attached to Morocco. Prejudice against Jews exists side by side with warm, neighborly feelings. Many Moroccan Muslims feel betrayed by the Jews who emigrated, especially those who moved to Israel. Until independence in 1956, France created enmity between Jews and Muslims. These feelings were enhanced by Muslim solidarity with Palestinians and Jewish solidarity with Israel. For many years communications with Israel were prohibited. However, since the 1980s, King Hassan II and the current king, Mohamed VI, have encouraged Moroccan-born Israeli tourists to return for visits to Morocco. Mohamed VI, like his predecessors, has attempted to balance an interest in protecting his Jewish subjects with efforts to promote justice for the Palestinians. Moroccan Jews avoid discussing Israel in the presence of Muslims. The Moroccan Jewish community is getting smaller each year as a result of continued emigration to Europe, the Americas, and Israel. The problems in Israel and Palestine and the increasing power of a Moroccan Islamist political party make Jews in Morocco nervous. Unless political and religious groups make a sustained effort to affirm the place of Jews in Morocco, the pace of emigration is likely to increase.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

In 1950, there were more than 220,000 Jews. In 1971, there were 35,000. In 2006 there are less than 5,000. Many factors have contributed to this exodus. Moroccan Jews never had a strong commitment to political Zionism. Emigration to Israel in the 1950s was inspired by a fear of possible violence, the hope of finding more lucrative employment, and the despair of the poor. Zionist recruiters helped create a climate of fear between Jews and Muslims based on both fact and fiction. Urban Jewish leaders and the Moroccan government negotiated the emigration of Jews from the Berber areas of southern Morocco with Zionist recruiters and the Israeli government. In the face of increasing poverty and a second-class status in Moroccan society, these Jews were offered the hope of social improvement in Israel. During the 1967 and 1973 Israeli-Arab wars, many middle-class Jews left for France and Canada, rather than move to Israel. Jews who remained in Morocco were able to maintain their culture and communities and live in safety. Although the Moroccan kings have been genuinely committed to protecting the Jews, the Moroccan political parties never offered Jews a meaningful political role.

Selected Bibliography

- Bertram, Carel. 2000. "A Different Kind of Diaspora: Moroccan Jews Looking Back." Al Jadid Magazine 6 (33). <http://aljadid.org/art/0633bertram.html> (accessed May 2, 2007).
- Brown, Kenneth. 1976. People of Sale: Tradition and Change in a Moroccan City, 1830–1930. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.
- Gerber, Jane S. 1980. Jewish Society in Fez 1450–1700: Studies in Communal and Economic Life. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Kosansky, Oren. 2001. "Reading Jewish Fez: On the Cultural Identity of a Moroccan City." Journal of the International Institute 8 (3, Spring/Summer). <http://hdl.handle.net/2027/spo.4750978.0008.305> (accessed April 12, 2008).
- Laskier, Michael M. 1994. North African Jewry in the Twentieth Century: The Jews of Morocco, Tunisia, and Algeria. New York: New York University Press.
- Schroeter, Daniel J. 1988. Merchants of Essaouira: Urban Society and Imperialism in Southwestern Morocco, 1844–1886. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Stillman, Norman A. 1991. The Jews of Arab Lands in Modern Times. Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society.

The Sephardi Jewish Community in North Morocco

Tito Benady

---

The Portuguese occupied the city of Ceuta in north Morocco in 1414 and from there laid waste to the Muslim lands in the vicinity. In 1471, Chechuen was founded in the mountains 30 miles from Ceuta by fugitives from Granada, which at the time was being hard pressed by the Castilians. In 1485, Al-Mandari, a Granada nobleman, aware that his country would soon be overrun, decided to conduct a campaign against the Christians from Africa. To that end he founded the modern city of Tetuan in the fertile plain below Chechouen. Situated five miles from the river Martil, Tetuan became a center of corsair activity. The inhabitants sent ships to harass the Spaniards, and their activities brought prosperity to the city.

Tetuan was to become a stronghold of Spanish tradition. When the Jews were expelled from Spain in 1492, most of those who came to Morocco settled in Fez and Mekenes, but a number settled in Tetuan. The Jews in Tetuan conserved the traditions they had brought from Spain more completely than the other meqorashim (exiles) in Morocco. In 1609 when the Moriscos (Spaniards of Moslem descent) were also expelled, a considerable number settled there. Tetuan was sufficiently distant from the sultan's court to preserve a more liberal outlook and until Sidi Mohammed, who reigned from 1757 to 1790, consolidated his control over the north, it remained a Spanish-speaking enclave, where Jews lived in a more liberal climate than in central Morocco. They were allowed to build synagogues and make wine, in spite of the prohibition under sharia law.

The Jews of Tetuan maintained their Spanish traditions and dialect, called Haketia, which was 15th-century Spanish with some Hebrew and Arabic elements. They retained many 15th-century Castilian ballads, called cantares, which have been collected by Ramón Menéndez Pidal and other scholars. Some of the cantares date from after the expulsion from Spain and show that owing to their proximity to the Iberian Peninsula (less than 40 miles by sea) they remained in touch, probably through Spanish sailors and merchants who called at Tetuan.

The Sephardi Jews found a refuge in Morocco, but together with their Muslim neighbors they suffered from the unsettled state of the country. Dynastic struggle brought much suffering to the inhabitants and sometime massacres, looting, and rape. Although personally protected by the law they had the inferior position of dhimmi, that of protected subjects who worshiped God but denied the truth of the Koran. Among other things they had to abide by the sumptuary laws and wear black to distinguish them from the Muslims, who wore white or light-colored clothes. The Sephardi Jews were subject to a poll tax and had to remove their shoes when passing a mosque. In most of Morocco they were confined to certain "unpleasant" trades, which including tanning and cleaning cesspits, and they were not allowed to ride horses, only mules. Traditionally, they had to salt the heads of executed criminals, so the Jewish quarters were known as mellahs (mellah meaning salt); but the Jews of Tetuan used the Spanish term Judería.

The history of the early years of the Tetuan community is not well documented. In 1530, R. Hayim Bibas of Fez was appointed chief rabbi and founded a distinguished dynasty of rabbis. In 1665, the town suffered in the contest between the Filali and the Wattasy dynasties, and the magnificent Bibas synagogue was burned to the ground. By this time the activities of the corsairs had largely ended, but Tetuan became the Mediterranean port for exporting the produce of central Morocco, which was brought by caravan from Fez. The British occupation of Tangier from 1662 to 1684, and of Gibraltar after 1704, opened up new trading possibilities for the inhabitants. Tetuan also became the diplomatic capital of Morocco until the consuls were moved to Tangier by royal decree in 1772.

In 1727 an unnamed English visitor called Tetuan "the most agreeable town in all Barbary." It had 30,000 inhabitants, of which 5,000 were Jews, who lived in 170 houses. They had seven synagogues. The visitor approved of the quality of the wine, but found that the brandy contained too much aniseed. He stated that it was the only Spanish-speaking Jewish community in Morocco, which was not correct, as Larache was also Spanish-speaking and Tangier was becoming one.

The community continued to be affluent until it suffered a terrible catastrophe in 1791. Muley Yazid's accession to the throne, on the death of Sidi Mohammed (1789), led to a terrible massacre of the Moroccan Jews as they had refused to support him in his fight with his brother for the succession. Yazid sent 2,000 troops into the town to loot, murder, and rape. Dozens died. The Jews went to the doors of the mosque to petition the sultan, who seemingly relented and ordered attacks to cease. Similar scenes were later repeated in Arzila, Alcazarquivir, and Larache. Much to the relief of the Jews, Yazid, "the malicious one," was killed the following year.

Yazid was succeeded by his half-brother Sultan Moulay Hicham, who was then succeeded by Moulay Sulaiman in 1796. Sulaiman had little regard for his Jewish subjects. In August 1807, he ordered the Jews to abandon their mellah in the center of the town and move to a new quarter outside the walls. As the law did not allow them to build new synagogues, they henceforth had to make do with a number of rooms in private houses.

In 1859, incidents on the Ceuta border led to the Spanish occupation of Tetuan for two years. At the beginning many of the Jews took refuge abroad, in Gibraltar and southern Spain, but they soon returned and found themselves treated as equals by the Spanish military authorities. Jews formed part of the new town council, a privilege they lost when Moroccan rule was established again.

From then on, the economic position of the community deteriorated as trade moved to Tangier where the harbor could take larger vessels. In 1877, the Jews were described as petty traders and artisans (shoemakers, smiths, tailors, muleteers, and so on), but they mostly lived in abject poverty. One quarter lived on charitable relief. The Juderia was terribly overcrowded and most families lived in one room. They had six yeshivas and 16 small synagogues, inconvenient, ill-ventilated, and insufficiently lighted. It was reported that none was larger than 120 square feet.

These events alerted Jews abroad of the plight of the community. Assistance began to arrive, and the Alliance Israelite Universelle set up schools. Better education enabled many to move to Tangier or immigrate to Algiers, Spain, France, and South America. They were also able to reestablish communities in the Spanish presidios of Ceuta and Melilla. At the beginning of the 21st century, there were 800 Jews in Melilla and 400 in Ceuta. Ceuta was the last place in the Spanish dominions where Jews were allowed to live, as they were not been expelled from there until 1707.

In 1912, Spain occupied the north of Morocco in agreement with other European powers, and Tetuan became the capital of the protectorate. Many Jews from other towns moved there; in particular, the Jews of Chechuen moved there en masse. In spite of emigration the Tetuan community numbered 7,631 in 1951. But after Morocco became independent in 1956, mass emigration, mostly to Israel, meant that few Jews remained, and the community currently numbers less than 200.

There was a community in the port of Arzila that had been captured by Portugal in 1471, and 250 of the Jewish inhabitants were sold as slaves in Portugal but redeemed by Spanish Jews. The Portuguese allowed the Jews back in 1510 as they were needed as intermediaries to obtain supplies of food from Morocco. After the Portuguese were driven out in 1546, the community continued, although it had to pay an annual tax of 60 gold ducats. After 1956 most of the community moved to Tangier, and the last synagogue was closed in 1980.

The port of Larache, south of Arzila, also had a small Jewish community, which lived in its own Juderia, although it was in Spanish hands from 1610 to 1689. By 1900 the community numbered 2,000, but it has since ceased to exist. A number of Megorashim from Spain also settled in Alcazarquivir some 25 miles inland. In 1900 the community numbered 1,360, mostly craftspeople and shopkeepers, but they have all emigrated, and the community no longer exists.

The most important Jewish community in northern Morocco during the past two centuries has been Tangier. This city was captured by Portugal in 1471 and ceded to England in 1662 as part of the dowry of Catherine of Braganza when she married Charles II. When they arrived, the English found a few Jewish families in residence who proved indispensable in obtaining provisions for the garrison and acting as interpreters with the Moroccans. In 1677, it was felt dangerous to have Moroccan nationals within a garrison liable to sudden attacks, and they were expelled, but they were readmitted two years later. It is recorded that they were so poor that they could not afford a Sepher Torah for their synagogue.

A number of European Jews also arrived who were involved in supplying the garrison, and they formed a separate community with their own synagogue. Relations between the two communities was not good, and in 1675 the Europeans were put under herem (ban of excommunication) by the rabbis of Tetuan because they drank unsanctified wine and traded in salt pork, but Lord Inchiquin, the governor of Tangier, made them lift the herem.

The English abandoned Tangier in 1684, and a new Moroccan population was established. The first leader of the Jewish community was Abraham Benamor of Mekenes, but most of the Jews who settled in Tangier were from Tetuan. R Judah Hadida was appointed the first dayan in 1744.

During the 18th century, the trade of Tangier increased considerably, particularly after the consuls moved there from Tetuan in 1772. By the middle of the 19th century the community numbered some 2,500. The presence of the consuls protected the town from the ravages of Muley Yazid, but in 1844 French warships bombarded the town, and because no Jews were harmed, a special commemorative service was held every year known as the Purim de las bombas.

The building of a new harbor commenced in 1907, and in 1923 Tangier was declared an International Zone, under the control of the consuls of Britain, France, Spain and Italy. Its status made Tangier very affluent during World War II, and the Jewish community increased to 15,000. But since it was incorporated into Morocco in 1958, emigration to Israel, Canada, France, and South America has reduced the Jewish population considerably. Currently, only a few hundred Jews remain, and there is only one synagogue.

Selected Bibliography

- Bengio, Joseph. 1983. The Spanish-speaking Jews of Morocco. Tel Aviv, Israel: Beth Hatefusoth.
- Hirschberg, H. Z. 1967. "Jews and Jewish Affairs in the Relations between Great Britain and Morocco in the 18th Century." In Essays presented to Israel Brodie, edited by H. J. Zimmels, 153–181. London: Soncino Press.
- Hirschberg, H. Z. 1974–1989. A History of the Jews in North Africa. 2 vols. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Leibovici, Sarah. 1984. Chronique des Juifs de Tétouan (1860–1896). Paris: Maisonneuve Larose.
- Nahón, Zarita. 1977. Romances judeo-españoles de Tánger, edited by S. G. Armistead and J. H. Silverman. Madrid, Spain: Cátedra-Seminario Menéndez Pidal.

Jewish Community of Namibia

Richard Newman

---

General Population: 2,000,000

Jewish Population: 60

Percent of Population: 0.003 percent

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: German and Lithuanian origins

Languages Spoken: English, German, indigenous languages

---

Historical Overview

Late 15th century There may have been Jewish participation in the explorations of Prince Henry the Navigator in this region.

Middle of the 19th century The first known involvement of Jews in the uncharted territory of the vast area of the Namib occurs. The brothers Aaron and Elias de Pass, English Jews of Sephardic origin, while residing in Cape Town and along the Namaqualand coast, extend their considerable commercial and shipping enterprises north of the Garieb river.

- 1908 The area is colonized by German Imperial forces. The discovery of diamonds elicits attention and investment from German political and business sectors. Carl Fürstenberg, a German Jewish banker who developed the railroad system, contributed greatly to the expansion of the colony, as did Emil and, later, Walther Rathenau, in the fields of mining, farm irrigation, and improved administration.
- 1915 The main area of Jewish settlement in German South West Africa, grouped mainly in the coastal town of Swakopmund, never comprises more than 100 families. After the South Africa Campaign and the capitulation of the German Schutztruppen, Jewish and other alien families, who had been divided by internment and internal deportation at the Okanjande Internment Camp, are reunited. Most prefer to settle in the inland capital of Windhoek.

Important Personalities

In the 20th century, Simon “Sam” Cohen, was a pioneering force in a variety of areas such as transport and road and dam building. His service and generosity to the economy and the community earned him the title of “Uncrowned King of South West.” When the Cohen family withdrew from the Namibian economy and left the country, leadership of the Jewish community was assumed by Harold Pupkewitz, whose father, Max, was among the early Jewish settlers in the first decade of the 20th century.

Other prominent Jewish personalities were George Kerby, the Windhoek town clerk and engineer for three decades until 1953, whose parks and cemeteries are a living memory to his endeavors, as well as Windhoek mayors, Jack Levinson, Samuel Davis, and Dr. George May. Jack Drucker was mayor of Lüderitzbucht for nine years.

Advocate Israel Goldblatt, son of a noted Yiddishist, was prominent in the fight for South West Africa’s independence at the United Nations. One daughter, Karen Blum, was prominent in law in southern Africa. An elder daughter, Naomi Jacobson, became a well-known sculptor of southern African and Namibian leaders.

Religious Denominations and Communal Institutions

Swakopmund had no synagogue, although it did have a problematic cemetery that was perpetually covered by the shifting desert sands. However, the Jewish communities of the capital, Windhoek, and the small southern town of Keetmanshoop had each built a house of worship by 1924, as well as establishing cemeteries. The Windhoek synagogue was still in use at the beginning of the 21st century.

The scarcity of Jewish institutions and facilities made the practice of Orthodox Jewish life difficult at times. Especially in the smaller, outlying areas of Jewish settlement it was not always possible to procure kosher meat or to ensure rabbinic presence at life-cycle events. The women of the community showed special fortitude and strength, particularly during the 1918 influenza pandemic when 11 deaths were attributed to the outbreak, a high proportion for the fledgling community.

In 1917, a few years after its inception, the Windhoek Hebrew Congregation began its Minute Book, in which it is noted that the committee's main task was to find a spiritual leader who could perform the services of rabbi, teacher, shohet, and mohel. The most noteworthy were Rabbi M. L. Cohen, who was the first to occupy the pulpit of the 1924 Windhoek synagogue, and Rabbi Z.W. Rachman, who served the congregation from 1947 for 20 years. Initially, the congregation was affiliated to the Cape Town Hebrew Congregation, and in later years to the Johannesburg Beth Din.

The Windhoek Hebrew Congregation is under the leadership of Harold Pupke-witz, Nahum Gorelick, and Laurie Pieters. Services are held regularly, conducted by Zvi Gorelick who is the local teacher and officiates at life cycles. For the High Holy Days a rabbi is brought in from the Johannesburg-based African Jewish Congress, under the guidance of Rabbi Moshe Silberhaft.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

When the territory was mandated to South Africa by the League of Nations after World War I, the Jewish population, mainly from South Africa, grew about 500 people. It dwindled with the rise of nationalism and the war of independence, so that by the start of the 21st century the numbers had dropped to only a few dozen. The economic upswing after the transition to independence has brought some new Jewish settlement to the area.

Selected Bibliography

- De Saxe, Morris, ed. 1929. Jewry in South West Africa. In South African Jewish Year Book. Johannesburg: South Africa: South African Jewish Historical Society, 127
- Newman, Richard. 2008. The Jews of Namibia. Cape Town, South Africa: Windhoek Hebrew Congregation.

Jews in Nigeria

Remy Ilona

---

General population: 135,031,000

Jewish Population: 40,000

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Jews migrated to Nigeria from North Africa circa 500 CE. The majority of Jews are Igbo.

Languages: English (official), Hausa, Yoruba, Igbo (Ibo)

---

Contemporary Overview

Determining who is Jewish in Nigeria is problematic. Many of the Igbo people, whose ancestral land is in the southeast of Nigeria and who number more than 40 million, see themselves as Jews. Among these Igbos are thousands who were converted to Christianity by the colonialists but later renounced Christianity, formed synagogues, and now live as children of Israel (Jews). In Nigeria other tribal groups have also renounced Christianity and practice Judaism, including the Tiv, Ibibio, Urhobo, and Mada

The Igbo people have many Jewish traditions. Noam Katz, the current Israeli ambassador in Nigeria, and others point to their possible ancient Israelite origins. Most may be considered lapsed Jews. Small, but significant and very influential minorities of Igbos still practice the Igbo religion. They are difficult to categorize, but could be termed "Israelites before the advent of the rabbis."

The Igbos and other Nigerians have tiny synagogues in many cities. Kulanu, the nongovernmental organization that assists Diaspora groups, and its supporters equip these synagogues. One eminent Igbo is Avishai Agbai, a geologist who heads the Gihon Synagogue and Beth Knesset Siyahh Israel, Abuja.

Selected Bibliography

- Remy, Ilona. "Rabbi Rosen, Nigeria, Igbo Land and the Igbos. <http://members.aol.com/moreshetnet/igbo.html> (accessed April 2007).
- Remy Ilona and Ehav Eliyahu. 2004. Igbos, Jews in Afrika? Vol. 1. Abuja, Nigeria: Mega Press.

Jews in South Africa

Saul Issroff

General Population: 47,432,000 (July 2005 estimate)

Jewish Population: 77,262 (2003 estimate)

Percent of Population: 0.16289 percent

Jewish Population by City: Johannesburg, 52,000; Cape Town, 17,000; Durban, 2,750; Pretoria, 1,600; Port Elizabeth, 600; Bloemfontein, 132; East London, 180; remainder of the country, 3,000 (2003 estimate)

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Predominantly of Litvak (Lithuania, Latvia, Belarus) origin; the Jews embarked on ships at Libau (Courland) via the Poor Jews' Temporary Shelter, in London England. Smaller numbers arrived from England, Germany, Poland, and Ukraine. A small Sephardi community is from the island of Rhodes, and there has been some recent migration from Israel.

Languages Spoken: Jews speak English, Afrikaans, some Hebrew, and Yiddish. There are 11 official languages in South Africa: Afrikaans (Afrikaans), English, Ndebele (isiNdebele), Northern Sotho (Sesotho sa Leboa), Sotho (Sesotho), Swati (siSwati), Tsonga (Xitsonga), Tswana (Setswana), Venda (Tshivenda), Xhosa (isiXhosa), and Zulu (isiZulu). There are eight nonofficial national languages: Fanagalo, Lobedu (Khilobedu), Northern Ndebele (Sindebele), Phuthi (Siphuthi), South African Sign Language, Khoe, Nama, San (Khoisan/Khoesan) languages. Older immigrant communities speak Hindi (Gujarati variety), Urdu, Tamil, Greek, Yiddish, Polish, Portuguese, French, and German.

Historical Overview

Jewish links to South Africa commenced in 1487 when Jews are involved as map-makers, navigators, and sailors in the Portuguese voyages of exploration around the Cape, en route to the profitable trading areas of Asia. The Portuguese never settled in the Cape, however.

South Africa was first colonized by the Dutch in 1652. Between 1795 and 1803, South Africa was ruled by the British, and between 1803 and 1806, it was ruled by the Batavian Republic. The British, to avert the possible seizure of the Cape by Napoleon, took control again in 1806. A group of Dutch settler families known as Boers (farmers), who opposed British rule and the associated antislavery legislation, started migrating into the hinterland in 1836, in what came to be known as the Great Trek. They later founded two Boer republics: the Orange River Colony and the Transvaal. Diamonds were discovered at Kimberley in 1869 and gold in Johannesburg in 1886. These discoveries brought an influx of fortune seekers, traders, and financiers from Europe and America. The Anglo Boer War (1899–1902) ended with the establishment of four self-governing colonies: the Cape, Natal, the Orange River Colony (after 1910, the Orange Free State), and the Transvaal. They joined in 1910 to form the Union of South Africa, which, in 1961, became an independent republic outside the British Commonwealth.

Jewish Migration in the Different Epochs

The religious freedom permitted under the short-lived Batavian Republic continued after 1806 under British rule. In 1820, the British government gave assisted passage and land grants to people willing to settle in the remote wilds of the eastern Cape Colony, people later known as the 1820 settlers. At least 16 Jews are known to have been part of this early settlement. Small numbers of Jews from Britain, Holland, and Germany continued to settle in the Cape Colony over the next 40 years. In the period up to 1870, there were progressively more English immigrants.

In the middle of the 19th century, German Jews, the “Merchant Pioneers,” became significant in developing inland areas. Between 1845 and 1870, Jews from Hesse-Cassel, in particular the Mosenthal family, were responsible for bringing about half the Jews (numbering a few thousand by 1870) to South Africa. Many became managers of the Mosenthals’ rapidly spreading enterprises or traded on their own account. The development of the largely untouched hinterland was mainly attributable to their endeavors. They were early pioneers in Bloemfontein, the capital of the Orange Free State. Many of these families with international trading connections took part in banking, trade financing, and insurance. They initiated major agricultural activities, including those of ostrich farming (feathers), Angora goat farming (mohair), and various industrial and mining enterprises. Few of these early families retain Jewish links.

After 1881, Jewish immigration from Russia increased rapidly. Major causes were economic deprivation, pogroms in the Ukraine (1881–1884), and other catastrophes—droughts, floods, deportation, and fires, particularly in Kovno Gubernia, a Lithuanian province within the Russian Empire, although there were no pogroms in Lithuania itself. There was a strong potential for success in South Africa—in particular on the emergent Kimberley diamond fields and later on the Witwatersrand goldfields around Johannesburg.

This immigration accelerated after 1895. Most were Lithuanian (Litvaks) from the then provinces of Kovno, Vilna, Grodno, and Northern Suwalki (East Prussia and later Poland) and Belorussia. With subagents of shipping agencies in the shtetlach (small towns), many Jews embarked initially, on small cargo boats under crude conditions, at the port of Libau (in Courland, now Latvia). Some immigrants came through Hamburg and Bremen. More than 47,000 Jews were enumerated in the first South African nationwide census of 1911.

At various times, attempts were made to limit the influx of Jews. In 1903, they were placed in the same category as Asiatics on the grounds that Yiddish was not a European language. This ruling was successfully challenged and reversed. About 15,000 Jews entered between 1925 and 1938.

In 1930, the Quota Act, without specifically mentioning Jews, but making “assimilability” a criterion for admission, limited the influx to a small number. The rise of Afrikaner nationalism, coupled with its overt Nazi sympathies, led to more severe restrictions. Between 1933 and 1936, only 3,600 Jews were permitted to enter and probably fewer than 500 entered during World War II.

Contributions Made by Individual Jews in These Different Epochs

After the expulsion of the Jews from Spain, Abraham ben Samuel Zacuto (1450–1525), a famous rabbi, court astronomer, historian, and mapmaker who was known as

The synagogue in Cape Town, South Africa, was erected in 1862 and was the city's first. (Brian Cooper)

“mathematician to the King,” went to Portugal as court astronomer to King John II. In 1496, he instructed Vasco da Gama before his voyage around the Cape.

Joseph Suasso de Lima (of Amsterdam), arriving in 1789, was a sworn translator who started the first Dutch newspaper in the Cape. A member of the Dutch Reformed Church, he nevertheless contributed to the building of the first synagogue.

Some early Jews during the period of British colonialism include Michiel Levy, a shopkeeper in the Boereplein (farmer’s town square) in 1806. Saul Solomon, a trader from St. Helena, founded the English press in Cape Town. He retained prominence in the Jewish community despite converting to Christianity. Dr. Siegfried Fraenkel was the first Jewish doctor and the first person to openly practice Judaism in Cape Town in 1810. Nathaniel Isaacs, nephew of Saul Solomon, was an intrepid Natal explorer who befriended the famous Zulu chief, Chaka.

Early British families include the De Pass family, who played a major part in establishing the shipping, sugar, and fishing industries. Maximillian Thalwitzer was a pioneer in sheep farming and the wool industry. The Norden, Norton, and Sloman families were leaders of the small number of Jews among the 1820 settlers. In 1841, Benjamin Norden founded the first Jewish congregation, Tikvath Israel, in Cape Town. Early families developing the hinterland in the middle to late 1800s include the Baumanns, Levisseurs, Ehrlichs, and Hamburger. They were early pioneers in Bloemfontein, the capital of the Orange Free State.

Sammy Marks (1844–1920) from Neustadt (Lithuania) is regarded as the forerunner of Lithuanian emigration. In partnership with his cousin, Isaac Lewis, he started the firm of Lewis and Marks. Commencing as hawkers, they became general dealers and were highly successful pioneer industrialists. Marks befriended President Paul Kruger. London-born Barney Barnato (Isaacs) was a partner of Cecil John Rhodes in forming the De Beers Diamond Mining Company. Control later passed (with the assistance of the Rothschilds) to the German Jewish family of Ernest Oppenheimer. Other notable mining pioneers include Sir Lionel Phillips and the Lippert and Albu brothers.

Emmanuel Mendelssohn, born in Pakosch near Posen, went to the Witwatersrand in 1887, established a newspaper and became President Kruger’s friend and publicist. He was a founder of the first Johannesburg community and organized the first Jewish burial. Max Langermann and Sir Harry Graumann were early mayors and pioneers of Johannesburg. Another contributor to civic life was Adolf Schauder, a mayor of Port Elizabeth, who pioneered mass housing schemes for the poor from the late 1930s onward. Many Jews were active in local and provincial councils. In the 1940s, Bertha Solomon, a barrister, became a member of Parliament and was active in promoting women’s rights and the welfare of the underprivileged. Dr. Henry Gluckman was minister of health (1945–1948) and a member of Parliament for 20 years. Solly Sachs and Katie Gelvan were among the many active trade-unionists.

Among the many notable Hebrew and Yiddish writers was the Witwatersrand pioneer and historian of Jewish life in early Johannesburg, Meyer Dovid Hersch (1858–1933). In addition, in the years Mahatma Gandhi lived in Johannesburg and Tolstoy Farm, his main supporters and advisers were Jews: Hermann Kallenbach, Henry S. L. Polak, Lewis Rich, and Sonia Schlesin (his private secretary).

In 1989, a reformist leadership under President Frederick Willem de Klerk commenced negotiations with the African National Congress, led by Nelson Mandela. Apartheid was abolished and, in 1994, black majority rule ensued. South Africa then rejoined the Commonwealth. As of 2006, the original four provinces became nine: Western Cape, Northern Cape, Eastern Cape, Free State, North West, KwaZulu/Natal (KZN), Mpumalanga, Gauteng, and Limpopo.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Agriculture crops include corn, wheat, sugarcane, fruits, vegetables, beef, poultry, mutton, wool, and dairy products. Industries include mining (South Africa is the world's largest producer of platinum, gold, chromium), automobile assembly, metalworking, machinery, textiles, iron and steel, chemicals, fertilizer, foodstuffs, and commercial ship repair.

Present Economic Conditions

South Africa is an emerging market economy with substantial natural resources; well-developed financial, legal, communications, and transport sectors; infrastructures; and a large stock exchange. There is a very high unemployment rate and significant poverty, however.

As an undeveloped country South Africa offered opportunities to early immigrants far better than anything they could have had in Eastern Europe. The traveling hawker, or smous, became an institution in the remote rural areas. Many settled in small towns as shopkeepers and tradespeople. A number of efficient entrepreneurial farmers were pioneers of the wool, ostrich feather, and citrus industries. Jews in the Eastern Cape town of Oudtshoorn played a major role in establishing the then lucrative ostrich feather industry, particularly after 1880. An influx of Jewish traders and farmers, largely of Lithuanian origin, were influential. The community grew to around 1,500 people by 1913, but with changing fashions and the outbreak of World War I, the industry declined. In many places, Jews were prominent in civic affairs, often becoming mayors.

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

The community is predominantly traditional. Orthodox, Reform, or Progressive Jewry account for less than 10 percent of the Jewish population, and secular Jews account for 12 percent. Some South African rabbis have had distinguished careers. Joseph Hertz, rabbi of the Witwatersrand Old Hebrew Congregation, Johannesburg, from 1898 to 1911, became chief rabbi of the British Empire until his death in 1946. Rabbi Judah Leib Landau, rabbi of the Johannesburg Hebrew Congregation from 1903 to 1915, succeeded Rabbi Hertz as chief rabbi of the combined Johannesburg congregations. Despite their differences, both were intellectual and spiritual leaders of high caliber. Rabbi Louis I. Rabinowitz, a fiery orator, scholarly author, and Zionist, was chief rabbi from 1945 until he went on aliyah in 1961. He became a deputy mayor of Jerusalem. In Cape Town, the Rabbi Joel Rabinowitz served for 23 years before becoming a gold assayer. The community was later dominated for more than 60 years by the Reverend A. P. Bender and Chief Rabbi Israel Abrahams. The United Jewish Progressive (Reform) Jewish Congregation was established in Johannesburg in 1933 with Rabbi Moses Cyrus Weiler as its spiritual leader until he retired to Jerusalem in the late 1950s. In 2005, Warren Goldstein, a lawyer, became the first South African-born chief rabbi of the Orthodox community.

In spite of a decline in total numbers, the community is now significantly stronger in terms of Jewish commitment and involvement. This was shown in the results of a 1998 attitudinal survey (Institute of Jewish Policy Research, London and the Kaplan Centre for Jewish Studies and Research, University of Cape Town) and confirmed in a 2005 survey (Kaplan Centre). The predominant affiliation is Orthodox (88 percent), the remainder being Reform (Progressive), with one small Masorti congregation in Johannesburg. The Lubavitch (Habad) movement and Ohr Somayach are strong in Johannesburg, as is the Bnei Akiva/Mizrachi movement. Aish HaTorah as well as various Haredi-oriented congregations, such as the Kollel Yad Shaul and Adass Yeshurun, are also active. Rates of marrying out of the faith are low. Religious identification is strong and growing. Johannesburg alone has more than 50 synagogues, including a proliferation of small ultra-Orthodox groups with small separate synagogues. The African Jewish Congress, administered by the South African Jewish Board of Deputies and affiliated with the World Jewish Congress, has an itinerant rabbi serving as rabbi for rural areas of South Africa and sub-Saharan African countries.

As communities grew, communal institutions were founded. In 1897, one year after the first Zionist Congress in Basel, Switzerland, the South African Zionist Federation was founded, remaining influential until around 1990. The major representative body was the South African Jewish Board of Deputies (SAJBD), started in the Transvaal in 1903 and in the Cape in 1904. These were based on the Anglo-Jewish model, but were founded primarily to make representations against anti-alien laws, which limited Jewish immigration. The Johannesburg Jewish Helping Hand and Burial Society (chevra kadisha) is well organized and controls most of the welfare organizations.

Some welfare organizations and schools run by the recently established ultra-Orthodox congregations have been criticized by some as an unnecessary drain on communal resources, but are welcomed by others as an indication of a vibrant communal diversity.

More than 80 percent of Jewish children attend Jewish day schools. King David in Johannesburg (founded in 1948) and Herzlia in Cape Town are the most successful. In Johannesburg, Beyachad Communal Centre (founded in 2000) houses the main civic and Zionist organisations. In Cape Town a campus houses the historic Gardens synagogue, the South African Jewish Museum, the Cape Town Holocaust Centre, the Gitlin Library, and the Albow Communal Centre. Jewish adult education is popular and well attended. The only formal Jewish higher education establishment is the internationally renowned Isaac and Jessie Kaplan Centre for Jewish Studies, established in 1980 at the University of Cape Town.

The distinctive characteristics of the South African Jewish community compared with other new world communities are as follows:

- A predominance of Litvaks (Jews from Lithuania, Latvia, and part of Belarus), which led to an unusually homogenous composition of the community;
- The very strong Zionist influence; and
- The amalgam of Anglo-Jewish form and Lithuanian spirit that characterizes the lay and religious communal institutions.

The communal infrastructure has long been well-organized and has a cohesive network of welfare, educational, Zionist, social, sporting, and political institutions. There has been a continuing deep commitment to Jewish life and to Israel.

Zionist Jewish youth movements have always been active in promoting Jewish identity. Habonim (Labour Zionist), previously the main movement, is now smaller than Bnei Akiva (Religious Zionist). Betar (Likud) and Netzer (Reform) are marginal.

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionism, Existential Problems of the Community

A disproportionate number of Jews were active in the struggle against apartheid, many choosing exile, but others were implicated in the notorious Treason Trial (1956–1961) and Rivonia Trial (1964) as colleagues of Nelson Mandela. Advocate Isie Maisels, later chairman of the South African Jewish Board of Deputies, was the leading barrister for the defendants. In the Rivonia Trial, however, Percy Yutar, also a prominent member of the Jewish community, was the state prosecutor.

Although the Jewish leadership never openly supported apartheid, they seldom actively opposed it. Some notable exceptions were the opposition leader Helen Suzman of the Progressive party, rabbis such as Ben Isaacson and the late chief rabbi, Cyril Harris, and his wife, Ann. In Harris's 1997 submission, on behalf of the Jewish community, to the Truth and Reconciliation Commission hearings, he acknowledged that the Jewish community should have done more to oppose apartheid. Efforts were, however, made to build bridges with black communities. Since the 1930s, the Union of Jewish Women and the United Sisterhood of the Progressive Jewish movement have been active in outreach work with the poorest sectors. Jewish businesspeople, together with Rabbi Harris and black leaders, formed Tikkun (1990s), to provide social uplift programs. Rabbi Harris used traditional Jewish ethics as a basis for activism on behalf of impoverished non-Jews. His eloquent presence at many public occasions led to an improved image of the Jewish community.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

Johannesburg remains the largest community with an estimated 55,000 Jews. The past half-century, however, has seen emigration supplant immigration. A significant number of South African Jews were volunteers at the time of the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948. Many went on aliyah to Israel between 1950 and 1970. The political environment during the apartheid era led to increased violence, little of it, however, directed specifically against Jews. Many young families, however, did not want to bring up children in this racist environment and, specifically, opposed conscription of their sons into an army defending apartheid. Other factors were declining standards of state services, such as health and education, and economic pessimism. Many wanted to live in broader environments with better economic and professional opportunities. Estimates are that about 40 percent of South African Jewish emigrants have gone to Australia, 20 percent to the United States, 15 percent to Israel, and 10 percent each to the United Kingdom and Canada. Table 1 shows population trends in the South African Jewish population since 1904.

This emigration has been countered to a small extent by recent immigrants from Israel, adjacent southern African countries, the United States, and the United Kingdom, some in commerce and industry and some to retire. In a 1998 survey (Kaplan Centre, UCT), over 10 percent of all respondents were previous emigrants who had returned, a figure confirmed by a follow-up survey in 2005 (Kaplan Centre 2005).

Until the fall of the apartheid government in 1994, Jews had formed part of a privileged minority dominating a multiracial society. Paradoxically, this led to Jews becoming prominent in the antiapartheid and liberation movements, while, at the same time, the organized community failed to openly denounce the injustices of the apartheid era. The abolition of apartheid brought to an end the entrenched privilege of South Africa's Jews.

Whites began to adapt to the new regime and, with a process of self-examination, confronted the past record of oppressive treatment of the blacks. In the first post-apartheid elections, Jews overwhelmingly supported the Democratic Party (later led by Tony Leon, a Jew), but a significant number voted for the African National Congress (ANC), which won the election with a large majority. Under the initial leadership of Nelson Mandela, the government was committed to nonracial and democratic policies. The Jewish community had a sense of security, despite the ongoing criminal violence. Political violence had all but ceased after the 1994 election.

The SAJBD has continued to monitor legislation and provide input in as far as it may influence Jews. One aspect was inclusion in the new constitution of a clause concerning freedom of expression laws that limits hate speech.

Table 1 South African Jewish Population Trends, 1904–2003

	1904	1911	1918	1926	1936	1951	1970	1980	2003
Johannesburg			20,085		38,939	53,423	61,325	65,846	52,000
Cape Town			9,100		16,284	20,446	25,640	26,977	17,000
Durban			1,644		2,849	4,482	5,990	5,930	2,750
Pretoria			1,698		2,677	3,228	3,750	3,487	1,600
Port Elizabeth			1,142		2,057	2,866	2,820	2,436	600
Bloemfontein			962		1,412	1,240	1,250	690	132
East London			432		782	1,115	800	641	180
Rest of country			19,642		19,263	14,609	9,570	5,875	3,000
TOTAL	38,101	46,919	54,705	72,169	84,263	101,409	111,155	111,882	77,262

Source: SA Jewish Board of Deputies and various SA Jewish Yearbooks.

Anti-Semitism

Anti-Semitism, as in all Diaspora communities, exists, but it is infrequent. Right-wing extremist activity is minimal. Some violent incidents have been organized by Islamic militants, such as the pipe bombing of Wynberg synagogue in Cape Town in 1998. South Africa has a Muslim population estimated at around 800,000, but this community is fragmented and few leaders are prepared to counter the prevalent anti-Jewish and anti-Israel extremism. There is also widespread pro-Palestinian support within the ruling ANC.

The ANC had close ties with the Palestinian Liberation Organization during the apartheid era, and ideologically is in a third or developing world camp, but it consistently includes support for Israel's right to exist, while supporting an independent Palestinian state. One of the first state visits by Palestinian President Abbas after the Hamas election victory in March 2006 was to South Africa, and it was suggested that the South African government mediate between the Palestinian state and Israel.

The 2001 Durban World Conference against Racism became noted for virulent anti-Semitism and anti-Israel pronouncements, both in the conference and outside. Local Muslim groups were active and strengthened alliances with international groups, and Israel became tagged as a racist and apartheid state. Virulent, crude, anti-Semitic publications such as the Protocols of the Elders of Zion were distributed together with Holocaust denial material. Harassment and abuse of Jewish and Israeli delegates occurred in a parallel nongovernmental organization (NGO) conference. The United States and Israel sent low-level delegations to the conference as a protest against the anti-Israel wording of the draft statement, and recalled their delegations before the end of the conference.

In 2002, a second major United Nations conference, the World Summit on Sustainable Development, held in Johannesburg, gave another opportunity for anti-Israel stances. The SAJBD, along with the World Jewish Congress, was well-prepared and used local people and resources to lobby major summit attendees. Representatives sat on the executive committee for the Global (NGO) Forum and the Interfaith Initiative. The outcome was that issues related to the Middle East had little impact.

The SAJBD has successfully countered anti-Semitic propaganda in a number of court actions. It currently monitors anti-Semitism and seeks to promote good relations with the government, meeting regularly with political leaders of all types.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Although small in numbers in relation to the world Jewish population, South African Jewry remains influential. Arieh Louis Pincus was a founder of El Al airlines, and treasurer of the Jewish Agency. In the 1990s, Mendel Kaplan was honorary president of Keren Hayesod, chairman of the board of governors of the Jewish Agency, chairman of the Jerusalem Foundation, and is current chairman of the World Jewish Congress.

Prominent Jewish writers have included the versatile and prolific author Sarah Gertrude Millin, who wrote 48 novels and several biographies. Nadine Gordimer

Nadine Gordimer is one of South Africa's most famous writers and one of its most acclaimed Jewish novelists. In 1991, Gordimer received the Nobel Prize for Literature, becoming the nation's first writer to be so honored. (United Nations) received the 1991 Nobel Prize for Literature. Dan Jacobson wrote on Jewish themes in a South African context. Henry Freeman Cohen founded the Rand Daily Mail in 1902; later editors who opposed the Nationalist government were Lewis Sowden and Benjamin Pogrud. Famous South African Jewish actors include Janet Suzman, Laurence Harvey (Hirsch Skikne), Sid James (Sidney Joel Cohen, comedian), and Sir Anthony Sher. In art, Moses Kottler, Lippy Lipschitz, Irma Stern, Sidney Goldblatt, and the contemporary William Kentridge are notable. David Goldblatt is a prominent photographer.

Almost every major medical center in the United States, the United Kingdom, Australia, and Israel has South African physicians in leading positions as teachers, researchers, and clinicians. Among many in South Africa, two stand out: Professor Frank Forman, of the University of Cape Town, and Moses Suzman, a Johannesburg physician. Sir Aaron Klug, who was born in Zelva, Lithuania, but educated in South Africa, won a Nobel Prize for Chemistry in 1982 (for the structure of biologically active substances). Sydney Brenner won a Nobel Prize for Medicine in 2002.

In the postapartheid era, several Jews have held cabinet positions. Lithuanian-born Joe Slovo was minister of Housing, Gill Marcus served as deputy minister of finance, and Ronnie Kasrils was deputy minister of defense, deputy minister of water affairs and forestry, and then deputy minister of intelligence.

Judge Arthur Chaskalson was appointed chief justice in 2001, holding the position until his retirement in 2005. Albie Sachs is a constitutional court judge. Distinguished Jewish lawyers and judges include Sir Sidney Kentridge and the British Law Lord Leonard Hoffman. Richard Goldstone, a Supreme Court judge, was later on the Constitutional Court and was chief prosecutor of the International War Crimes Commission (1994–1996).

Selected Bibliography

- Herrman, Louis. 1930. A History of the Jews in South Africa from the Earliest Times to 1895. Repr. Johannesburg: South African Jewish Board of Deputies, 1935.
- Issroff, Saul, ed. 2003–2007. "Southern Africa Jewish Genealogy SA-SIG:Bibliography," Jewish Gen Web site. www.jewishgen.org/SAfrica/bibliography/index.htm (accessed April 2007).
- Kaplan, Mendel. 2006. The Future of South African Jewry. Comments and Observations. Johannesburg, South Africa: Privately published.
- Kaplan, Mendel, and Marian Robertson. 1991. Founders and Followers—Johannesburg Jewry 1887–1915. Cape Town, South Africa: Vlaeberg.
- Saks, David. 2003. South African Jewry: A Contemporary Portrait. Policy Study no. 25. Jerusalem: Institute of the World Jewish Congress.
- Saron, Gustav, and Louis Hotz. 1955. The Jews in South Africa from the Earliest Times to 1895. Cape Town, South Africa: Geoffrey Cumberlege.
- Shain, Milton. 1983. Jewry and Cape Society: The Origins and Activities of the Jewish Board of Deputies for the Cape Colony. Cape Town, South Africa: Historical Publication Society.
- Shain, Milton. 1994. The Roots of Antisemitism in South Africa. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia.
- Shain, Milton, and Richard Mendelsohn. 2002. Memories, Realities and Dreams: Aspects of the South African Jewish Experience. Johannesburg, South Africa: Jonathan Ball.
- Shimoni, Gideon. 1980. Jews and Zionism. The South African Experience 1910–1967. Cape Town, South Africa: Oxford University Press.
- Shimoni, Gideon. 2003. Community and Conscience: The Jews in Apartheid South Africa. Tauber Institute for the Study of European Jewry Series. Cape Town, South Africa: University Press of New England.
- Sichel, Frieda. 1966. From Refugee to Citizen. Cape Town, South Africa: A. A. Balkema.
- "The South African Jewish Board of Deputies." Shema Yisrael Torah Network Web site. www.shemayisrael.co.il/sa/sajbd/sajbd.htm (accessed April 2007).

Jewish Community in Sudan

Jeffrey S. Malka

---

General Population: 40 million (2007)

Jewish Population: As of 2006, there were no Jews in Sudan.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Background: Almost all came from Egypt around the turn of the 20th century. The majority were Sephardim from the Mediterranean or Jews from Iraq. Ten percent were Ashkenazim who came to Egypt in the late 19th century and then moved to the Sudan.

Languages spoken: All spoke English. Many were multilingual and spoke Arabic, French, Italian, or Ladino.

---

Historical Overview

- 19th century Jews first venture into the Sudan in the late 19th century when a half dozen Jews from Egypt travel south to start businesses in what was then a dangerous and still-not-fully-charted African interior. These early settlers endure further hardships when they are taken prisoner by a fundamentalist Muslim leader known as the Mahdi. The Mahdi routs both British and Egyptian armies and rules the Sudan for 13 years until the British under General Kitchener finally defeat him in 1898.
- Early 1900s After the overthrow of the Mahdi, and under the security blanket of British rule, Jews stream into the country and a flourishing community develops. A young rabbi, Shlomo Malka, is recruited in 1906 from Tiberias, and a large synagogue seating a thousand on holidays is built and serves a united congregation of 90 percent Sephardim and 10 percent Ashkenazim living almost exclusively in the environs of Khartoum. Several Jewish institutions are created, including a large Jewish recreation club, Maccabi athletic teams, and the only B'nai B'rith lodge in the African interior. Jews are prominent in local businesses and rise to positions of leadership in British and other trading companies as well as in the legal and medical professions. Others are shopkeepers and the like.
- 1940s World War II has virtually no effect on the Sudan except for some import trade restrictions, control of which is delegated by the British governor to Eli Malka, then director of the largest British firm in the Red Sea area. Two Jewish families come to the Sudan as refugees: the Weiss from Vienna and a theater couple from Germany. Both are housed and supported by the Jewish community; the Austrians live in Rabbi Malka's home for a time.
- 1950 At this time, 1,000 Jews live in the Sudan, almost entirely in Khartoum and Omdurman. Prominent families include the Dweks, Gaon, Malka, Ishag, Goldenberg, Braunstein, and Ades.
- 1956 Sudan achieves independence, which results in a government progressively more Islamic and hostile to the local Jews.
- Late 1950s–1960s The rise in anti-Semitism leads to a mass exodus to England, Israel, Switzerland, and the United States. Jewish property remaining in Sudan is confiscated and the synagogue is destroyed. The Jewish cemetery in Khartoum is vandalized and desecrated, and many of the gravestones are overturned or broken. As a result many relatives arrange to transfer the remains of their rabbi and families for reburial in Israel within the Sudan section of Jerusalem's Givat Shaul cemetery. And yet, under American pressure, the Sudan government quietly acquiesces to temporary staging camps for fleeing Ethiopian Jews bound for Israel in operations Solomon and Moses.
- 1998 The United States bombs a nationalized but originally Jewish-owned pharmaceutical factory in Khartoum, suspecting that it is being used to produce chemical weapons.
- 2007 No Jews are left in Sudan.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries

Jews were involved almost entirely in major import/export trading companies. The rest were professionals (physicians, opticians, lawyers) or owned factories, and a few were small shopkeepers. In exile, many of the Sudan Jewish community prospered and had an influence well out of proportion to their numbers. They donated millions of dollars to Jewish and Israeli causes, revived the World Sephardic Federation, provided huge subsidies and scholarships to universities in Israel, owned and ran deluxe hotels and international firms in Israel and throughout the world, and were major contributors to Jewish and Sephardic causes wherever the need arose. The ancient Adli synagogue in Cairo was refurbished with a $700,000 grant from Nessim Gaon, the most prosperous exile of the Sudan community. Funds from Sudan Jews helped preserve the Bassatine cemetery in Cairo.

Jewish Education and Communal Institutions

The only remaining archival material concerning the Jewish community of the Sudan are the rabbinic records maintained by Rabbi Malka. Difficult to use because they are written in the Sephardic cursive script, they include copies of ketuboth of all Jewish marriages that occurred in the Sudan. An index of these marriage ketuboth appears in Malka's 1998 book Jacob's Children in the Land of the Mahdi, along with copies of the initial Jewish documents establishing the community.

Professor Nahem Ilan, of Touro University in Jerusalem, provides some additional insights into the community. He studied several hundred articles written by Rabbi Shlomo Malka and published in the Cairo Jewish periodical Al Shams (the Sun). The articles, which cover a broad range of religious, political, and social topics, provide a glimpse into the thinking of the time, particularly of what Dr. Ilan believes are Rabbi Malka's progressive views of modern Judaism, especially concerning women's issues and their role in Jewish society.

Selected Bibliography

Malka, Eli. 1998. Jacob's Children in the Land of the Mahdi: The Jews of the Sudan. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press.

The Sudan Jewish Community According to the Community Register

Nahem Ilan

---

A Jewish community existed in Sudan between the 1880s and the 1960s. At its peak, there were about 1,000 members; the vast majority lived in Omdurman and then in

Table 2 Types of Documents in the Community Register in Khartoum

	Ketuboth	Match-making	Engagements	Divorces	Conversions	Wills and Inheritance	Other	Total
No. of documents	109	25	7	15	11	5	9	181
%	60	14	4	8	6	3	5	100

Khartoum, and a small minority settled in Wad Madani, about 175 kilometers southeast to Khartoum. The most important source for its history is the community register (Pinkas), which is currently located at the Jewish National and University Library in Jerusalem and contains 181 documents. The register includes two volumes and records the time period of 1907–1965. Most of the entries are marriages, divorces, engagements, matchmaking, and conversions. Table 2 shows the types of documents in the community register in Khartoum.

There is no distinction between matchmaking and engagement, and it means an agreement signed before marriage. Generally, the writers used both names in the same document. In most cases, the agreement set a timeframe to hold the wedding, the amount of money to be given by parents of both the bride and her brothers, and the financial responsibilities of the groom. Occasionally, it also included a cancellation fee, to be paid to the community, either by one family or by both.

Most of the documents are written in Hebrew and Aramaic, although some are in Arabic. The rabbinical tribunal in Khartoum and its chief rabbi had an official authorization as marriage registrars. In the peak, there were about five weddings a year (1954, 1957, 1963).

The Significant Data Derived from the Register

Community Name

The community is described in various languages, suggesting that different names were in use at the same time, without a preference. Using one name or another did not affect the legal validity of a document.

Functionaries

The first five documents are signed by Rabbi Eliyahu Hazzan, a great scholar and an eminent leader, who led the Jewish community in Alexandria, Egypt, at the turn of the 20th century. In 1908 he went on a well-advertised trip to southern Egypt and Omdurman, Sudan. His visit to the few Jews who lived there at the time (about 60 people) was the founding event of the community and its institutions. Hazzan's reputation, and the collaboration with Rabbi Shlomo Malka in establishing the ad hoc conversions and wills tribunal, helped establish Malka's status within the local community. Ever since, Malka was considered the spiritual leader of the growing community, and he signed most of the documents in the register, until his death in the spring of 1949. In 1951, Rabbi Haim Refael Siboni signed a ketubah as "the scholar of the city." For a short period (1953–1955) ketuboth were signed by Matzliah Eliezra, matchmaker. Two ketuboth from 1956 do not mention who arranged them, and from 1957 to 1965 all documents were signed by Rabbi Massoud Elbaz. Other functionaries mentioned in three documents are president, treasurer, secretary, advisers and committee members, and the community scholar.

Population Distribution

Until 1919, 21 weddings took place in Omdurman, 2 in Khartoum, and 1 in Wad Madani. The last wedding in Omdurman took place in the winter of 1923. These findings go along with the reports about the community moving from Omdurman to Khartoum at the late 1910s. In 1918, a synagogue was established by Farag Shoua in a building he rented for this purpose. One ketubah states that a wedding took place in Al-Khartoum bahri, which was considered a separate town north of Khartoum, until a bridge over the Blue Nile was built in 1916, connecting the two.

Community Constitution

The various surnames indicate that the Jewish community in Sudan comprised people from diverse origins. Some names indicate specific origin, like Ades, Dwek, and Safdia, from Aleppo, Syria; Lupo from Turkey; Malka from Morocco; and Abboudi, El-Eini, and Sassoun from Iraq. Several documents include the citizenship of the bride or groom. Ashkenazi Jews were a minority in the community, about 10 percent, hence it is clear why their children married people from other origins soon after their arrival in the community.

Interaction with Other Communities

The community had a special relationship with the Egyptian Jewish community. The amounts of money mentioned in the ketuboth were given in Egyptian currency, and various customs are ascribed to the Egyptian tradition.

Wedding Customs and Ketubah Formulas

In most cases, weddings took place in synagogues, as was done in Egypt. ketuboth were written based on traditional formulas, but they were not identical to another. Often times, ketuboth stated that they were done according to the Alexandrian regulation.

The matchmaking agreement and ketuboth indicate the financial situation of the newlyweds and their parents, as well as wedding customs. Several matchmaking agreements allocated a certain amount to buy an apartment or a store. Some agreements included a list of items the bride's parents (usually her father) undertook to give to their daughter. This is mostly a standard version, yet sometimes amendments were made, depositing money in an account under the woman's name, purchasing securities for the bride, depositing dowry-postponed bills with the groom's family, giving the bride gems as part of her dowry, and using parts of it as a loan to the bride's father, in exchange for monthly interest, payable to the couple.

There was one outfit called badlat hammām (literally, bathing garment) that was worn for the mikvah, and a different outfit for the wedding itself, called in Arabic shawār. Except for one document, in which the bride assumes the responsibility to pay for it, most agreements mention the groom as the person who pays for the shawār.

A few ketuboth, and even fewer matchmaking agreements, mention the couple's age. The men were usually a few years older than their wives. The average age was mid-20s and on, namely after the groom is financially independent and capable of providing for a family. This is a typical characteristic of a modern community, whereas in traditional communities the marriage age was younger.

Interfaith Marriage and Conversion

The vast majority of community members maintained their Jewish identity. As time passed, marriage for love and independent choice of spouse became more common, matchmaking became rare, and parents' involvement in spouse selection decreased greatly. Conversion certificates testify that the process was done according to Jewish religious law, Conversion entries were made since late 1944, and they are also found in the register and in the synagogue's genizah. Those documents reflect three tendencies. First, the synagogue's spiritual leaders made sure to follow the Jewish law. Second, rabbis Malka and Elbaz were sensitive to changes that occurred in the community and in the Jewish world, and they expressed discretion and leadership in order to include everyone, even those who did not live their lives according to Jewish law and seemingly disconnected themselves from the community. Third, the rabbis' attitude made people feel part of the community, and soon the non-Jewish spouses chose to join it.

Currency

The register mentions currency from three countries: Great Britain (two ketuboth only, from 1915 to 1917, the first years of the community), Egypt, and Sudan. Many documents refer to kirsh sagh (genuine Egyptian kirsh). Sudan declared independence on January 1, 1956; one ketubah from that month mentions the amount in Egyptian pounds whereas from the next ketubah on the currency is always the Sudanese guinea.

Women's Status

Unlike the first years of the register, when men signed on behalf of the women, probably because of a lack of reading skills, in the 1920s women signed the ketubah copies themselves. A divorce agreement from 1909 deals with a woman who would live on her own and support herself for a few months (up to a year), without being divorced. Her ability to support herself is noteworthy, both because of the community's acceptance and her independent skills that did not require the husband's support. The condition to work specifically in Khartoum might imply supervising her; or it might imply protecting her, and keeping her part of the Khartoum community, the only active Jewish community at the time.

Several matchmaking and engagement agreements included a specific term to invest part of the dowry in an asset, to be registered under the bride's name, and to remain so registered even after her wedding, or to be deposited in a bank account under her name. This can be interpreted in two opposite manners: on one hand, it testifies to recognition of women as property owners, while maintaining their financial independence even after marriage; on the other hand, it might suggest how weak her status was, causing her parents to strengthen her financially, or else she might face difficulties supporting herself during a material crisis. In one match-making agreement the mother of the bride undertook to “bring up to her the piano she has at home,” which was done. This fits into the general impression that the Khartoum Jewry were among the financial and cultural elite.

Selected Bibliography

- Ilan, Nahem. 1999. “From Morocco to Sudan: Rabbi Solomon Malka—A Leader at a Time of Change” [Hebrew]. Pe'amim 80 (1999): 93–111.
- Ilan, Nahem. 2007. The Community Register Pinkas of the Jewish Community in Sudan. Oriens Judaicus Series. Jerusalem: Ben Zvi Institute.
- Malka, Eli S. 1997. Jacob's Children in the Land of the Mahdi: Jews of the Sudan. New York: Syracuse University Press.

Jews in Tunisia

Judith Roumani

---

General Population: 10 million

Jewish Population: 1,100

Percent of Population: 0.011 percent

Jewish Population by City: Most live in Tunis. There are some additional small communities, mainly in Jerba, Sfax, Sousse, and Nabeul.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Most Tunisian Jews have immigrated to France and Israel, though some have gone to French Polynesia.

Languages Spoken: Arabic, French

---

Historical Overview

The Jewish community of Tunisia is an extremely ancient one, dating back, possibly, to the destruction of the First Temple in Jerusalem (586 BCE). According to tradition, at that time a group of Kohanim fled westward, landing on the island of Djerba off southern Tunisia and founding a community that survives today. They are said to have brought with them a stone or stones from the First Temple that were incorporated into the Ghriba Synagogue, which was rebuilt in the 1920s. There is also a folk tradition about a door having been brought from the Temple to Djerba and giving the community its second name, Dighet. No material or documentary proof exists, but the community of Djerba has traditionally enjoyed great prestige as a center of mysticism and Jewish learning and publishing, and even today tourists and pilgrims flock to its synagogues.

- 1st century Around the time of the destruction of the Second Temple, numerous Jewish communities in North Africa come into being, including those of northern and coastal Tunisia. Jews had perhaps arrived even earlier together with Phoenician or Canaanite traders, the founders, with the mythical Queen Elisa (or Dido), of Carthage. A probable cultural syncretism between Jews and the local population had survived the destruction of Carthage by Rome in 146 BCE, and the Carthaginian rulers were replaced by Roman, eventually Christian, masters.
- 5th century Christianized Vandals drive out the Romans in the fifth century and are replaced by Byzantines in the sixth century. Jewish-Berber connections in the Maghreb (North Africa) had become close among the local populations after the defeat of the Jewish rebellion against the Romans in Cyrenaica to the east in the second century CE, after which many Jews from Cyrene had fled into the hinterland, far into the desert, and westward toward southern Morocco.
- 7th century The resistance to the Muslim invasions of the seventh century is led, according to legend, by a Jewish-Berber queen, Dahya or La Kahéna, who has become a symbol of national resistance in North Africa. After the triumph of Islam, Tunisian Jews become subject to dhimmi status, as elsewhere; they are tolerated yet subjected to humiliating restrictions. However, Tunisian Jewish merchants in the early centuries of Islam manage to achieve great prosperity, and cities in the center of the country, especially Kairouan, become centers of Jewish learning for about three centuries.
- 1057 Kairouan is destroyed by the Hillalian Bedouin and Jews are banned from the city until 1881.
- 1159 Almohad invasions in the rest of the country make Jewish life extremely difficult. The Hara or Jewish quarter of Tunis come into being about this time.
- 1228 Under the Hafsids, Jews regain a small measure of their former prosperity. Jewish life continues to be intermittently precarious in the Middle Ages and later.
- 1391 A different cultural note is seen with the arrival of Jewish exiles from the Spanish persecutions and the expulsion of 1492 and the arrival of Livornese Jews from central Italy, themselves largely descendants of exiles from Spain, in the 17th century. By the 18th century, an enormous cultural and material gulf exists between these new European arrivals—Spanish, Ladino, and Italian-speaking “Gorni” (from Livorno) or “Grana”—and the formerly prosperous indigenous Jews of Tunisia, who called themselves “Touansa.” The Grana are wealthy merchants with far-flung family-run trading networks, and the two groups keep apart, even refusing to accept the kashruth of each others’ butchers. They constitute two separate Jewish communities from 1710 until 1899.
- 1535 Spanish occupation of Tunisia.
- 1574 Turkish occupation of Tunisia
- 1736 Algerian occupation of Tunisia. With each invasion, Jews are robbed, killed, and sold into slavery.
- 19th century Three new colonial powers, the British, the French, and the Italians, all vie for influence in 19th-century Tunisia, until the 1857 execution of a humble

Tunisian Jew, Batou, or Batto Sfez, who has French nationality, which provides a pretext for French intervention with the weak regime of the Turkish-backed Bey of Tunis.

- 1857 France obliges the Bey to establish the Fundamental Pact of 1857 granting minorities freedom of religion, the right to own real estate, and the right to be tried by a court of one's own coreligionaries (among other rights).
- 1942–1943 World War II marks the beginning of the end for Tunisian Jewry. Tunisia briefly comes under Nazi control for six months in 1942, at which time the Jews suffer from roundups for forced labor camps, extortions, deportations, and executions. In addition, lives are lost in the Allied bombings.
- Late 1940s The Jewish population, on the eve of independence, is at its zenith between 80,000 and 105,000, just over 2 percent of the total population of Tunisia. Although some Jewish intellectuals, such as the novelist and sociologist Albert Memmi, support the movement for independence, the majority, correctly or not, view the prospect with trepidation.
- 1956 Tunisia gains its independence and follows a path of relative moderation among the Arab states. President Habib Bourguiba, uniquely among Arab leaders, allows emigration to Israel, maintains a position of independence vis-à-vis the Arab League and Nasserism, and puts forward a peace proposal for the Arab-Israeli conflict very early in 1965. After independence, Jewish-Muslim relations are better than elsewhere in the Arab world, and the government typically steps in to reassure the community after violent events. Although immigration to Israel or elsewhere is allowed, it is not encouraged, and in the early years of independence the government tries to discourage Jewish artisans, especially silversmiths, from departing.
- 1961 The Bizerte crisis between Tunisia and France sparks the emigration of Jews from that region, Tunisian Jews in the rest of the country largely remain.
- 1967 The Jewish population sinks to 20,000; about 40,000 have moved to Israel and the rest to France, French-speaking Canada, or other countries.
- 1967 The main synagogue of Tunis is partially burned during the Six-Day War, but the government repairs it at its own expense.
- 2002 A terrorist (Al Qaeda) bomb partially destroys the revered main synagogue of Djerba in 2002, killing 15, mainly German tourists. Once again, the government repairs the damage.
- 2004 The grand rabbi of Tunisia travels to Israel to be treated at the Hadassah Hospital. He dies there and is buried in Jerusalem.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

The majority who stayed on in Tunisia after independence were a few professionals and a larger number of businesspeople who were comfortably off. Typically, they are joined in the summer by Tunisian Jews who live in France but maintain summer homes or other connections in Tunisia.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

A group of modern Jewish writers, such as Albert Memmi and Raphaël Lévy (Ryvel), and younger writers, such as Marco Koskas and Nine Moati, have celebrated traditional Tunisian Jewish life in their fiction and poetry, memorials to a traditional way of life that vanished under the impact of modernization brought by the French and the new national state. They have continued in the French language a tradition of Tunisian Jewish literature in Judeo-Arabic, begun in the 19th century in oral, manuscript, and eventually published form. The use of themes and techniques from Tunisian Jewish and Muslim storytelling, humor, and nostalgia characterize their most recent work. Since independence, first one Jewish representative (Albert Bessis) and then another (André Barouch) served for a short time in the national parliament, and a Jewish senator was serving in 2006, Roger Bismüth (who is also president of the Jewish community), appointed by President Ben-Ali. There have also been a number of Jewish artists (e.g., Bernard Sberro, Victor Journo, Daniella Azria Wortman, Nello Levy, Lynda Memmi-Sandhaus, Rafael Uzan), singers (Leila Sfez, Habiba Msika, Banat Chamama, Cheikh Elafrif), and athletes (e.g., the boxers Young Perez and Sadok Bahri). In Israel, Tunisian Jews have risen to positions of prominence (e.g., Sylvan Shalom, foreign minister, and Shalom Cohen, Israel's first representative to Tunisia and ambassador to Egypt). Many lawyers, intellectuals, and doctors in France are of Tunisian Jewish origin. Over the years, three Jewish Francophone writers (Ryvel in 1931, Raoul Darmon in 1945, and Albert Memmi in 1953) have won the Prix de Carthage literary prize. In June 1984, President Bourguiba awarded Albert Memmi the Order of the Tunisian Republic for his writing on behalf of Tunisian culture.

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

From 1881 to 1956, when Tunisia was a French Protectorate, Tunisian Jews of both groups (Touansa and Grana) eagerly embraced French culture, and many had the opportunity to attend French-language Alliance Israélite Universelle schools from 1878 on. Though the two Jewish communities were not fully united until the 1940s, the differences between Touansa and Grana seem to fade as all became increasingly Europeanized. The Europeanization and secularization of Tunisian Jewry was opposed by the Touansa rabbis, who saw the process as a threat to traditional values, to the unique culture of Tunisian Jewry, and to religious observance. Thus, a new rift, one that continues to this day, opened within the community. As independence approached, however, Tunisian Jews feared that they would be marginalized in the coming new Muslim state. As elsewhere in the Maghreb, the forces of Jewish and Muslim nationalism, together with the end of the age of colonialism, pulled and pushed Jews to uproot themselves from their ancestral homes of many centuries.

The institutions of Tunisian Jewry have survived on a much smaller scale. As part of the then official policy for secularizing Tunisian society, the rabbinical court was abolished in 1957. In 1958, the elected Jewish community council that ran the community was likewise abolished and replaced by a smaller provisional committee appointed by the government. The last Alliance Israélite Universelle school closed in 1974. Since the 1970s the Habad rabbi Pinson and his wife have run the Jewish school of Tunis and provided many other Jewish services such as Brit Millah, filling the gaps in services that were formerly provided by the Jewish community.

About 11 synagogues are still functioning in Tunisia today. The two synagogues of Djerba also receive many visitors, especially for Lag B'Omer when at a special ceremony the menorah is paraded through the streets. This is an elaborate tiered wooden box (not really a candelabra) reminiscent in name and form of an amalgamation of the holy objects of the Temple of Jerusalem (whence the exiled ancestors of the Kohanim of Djerba are said to have come to found their community). For many years a Feuille de Miel (calendar with blessings and prayers for Rosh Hashanah) was published in Tunis for expatriates, and later it was published from Paris. Djerba itself was a center of Jewish religious publishing from 1904 to 1960, and it still supplies Sephardic communities with locally made Jewish ritual objects, such as silver items and talliths. Some new religious life may have infused the community through Djerba's becoming a focus of international Jewish heritage tourism and religious pilgrimage.

The Internet and renewed Jewish heritage tourism (a phenomenon also apparent in many parts of Europe where the Jewish population has dwindled) may in fact be granting a reprieve for the continuing life span of the ancient Jewish community of Tunisia. The expatriate Tunisian Jewish community is, meanwhile, actively regrouping elsewhere, due also in part to the Internet. Harissa.com, named after the typical Tunisian hot pepper sauce, is the Web site for the culture of Tunisian Jews, "les Tunes." A yeshiva established in Israel by Tunisian Jews (the Kise Rahamim Yeshiva in Bnai Brak, named in honor of a well-known contemporary rabbi, Rabbi Matsliah Mazouz) now trains and supplies rabbinical candidates for some European communities (e.g., Livorno) because of the continuing religious prestige of the Tunisian and especially Djerba community. In Netanya, Israel, a synagogue and cultural center describing itself as the world center of Tunisian Jewry is now being built.

In France, a Tunisian yeshiva, Hod Yoseph, is continuing the religious tradition by publishing an anthology of biographies of well-known Tunisian rabbis, which describe their great learning and high reputations as well as their struggle against the westernizing influence of the Alliance Israélite Universelle. Those included range from Rabbenu Hushiel, one of the four sages who reputedly fled in the eighth century from the deteriorating situation in Babylon to found new centers of Jewish learning in the West (Hushiel founded Mahdia and Kerouan after being kidnapped by pirates and ransomed by Tunisian Jews), to Rabbi Hai Taieb, and to the more modern Rabbi Matsliah Mazouz and Mordekhai Amiyess HaKohen. At the same time, contemporary secular Tunisian Jewish intellectuals based in France (such as Lucette Valensi), while sympathetic to the social and cohesive aspects of religious practice, have a firm allegiance to Jewish humanism.

Thus, the split between Tounsa (indigenous and more traditional and religious Jews) and Grana (European Jews of Spanish and Italian origin) did not totally disappear in the 1940s, but rather has metamorphosed into the contemporary Jewish dichotomy between the return to traditionalism and Orthodoxy (always the established form of Judaism in Tunisia, but often challenged in an informal way by the évolués) and secular, humanistic Judaism. In a way, history has come full circle since the arrival three centuries ago of the Livornese Jews and their westernizing, Europeanizing ways. In 2006, the rabbi of the Italian community of Livorno, Rabbi Didi, was from a family of Djerban origin, trained in Israel at the Tunisian yeshiva of Bnai Brak. Splintered, scattered, and dispersed, Tunisian Jewish life yet continues, albeit with multiple centers and ongoing discussion of the issues of tradition versus modernity.

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionism, and Existential Problems of the Community

There has been a general trend making life in Tunisia less hospitable to Jews, partly because of repercussions of the Middle East conflict and partly because of the government's policy of secularization. In the early years after independence, the Jewish Community Council elected by Jews was abolished, and in Tunis the old Hara or Jewish quarter, as well as the cemetery, were dismantled in the name of slum clearance. After Jewish protests, some of the remains from the old cemetery were moved to a new Jewish cemetery outside the city. Of the 14 ancient synagogues, one was to be preserved as a historic site, but bulldozers inexplicably came and demolished that one, too. It is hard to say whether the destruction of the Hara was anti-Semitic, a health measure (it was notoriously unsanitary), or simply insensitive to what today would be preserved as a cultural heritage site. Considering that Tunisia served for about a decade as the headquarters of the Arab League, and of the Palestinian Liberation Organization in exile, and is situated between two radical Arab states, Algeria and Libya, the situation remains relatively calm.

The Oslo Peace Process of the 1990s led to the establishment of mutual representatives in Tel Aviv and Tunis, the Tunisian representative having been withdrawn at the onset of the Second Palestinian Intifada. In the meantime, by the late 1990s, six joint Israeli-Tunisian research projects had been conducted by Israeli and Tunisian academics.

Selected Bibliography

- Awret, Irene. 1984. Days of Honey: The Tunisian Boyhood of Rafael Uzan. New York: Schocken Books.
- Enhaili, Aziz, and Oumelakheir Add. 2003. "State and Islamism in the Maghreb." MERIA Journal 7, no. 1 (March). <http://meria.idc.ac.il/journal/2003/issue1/jv7n1a6.html> (accessed May 15, 2008).
- Fein, Judith. 2001. "Festival in Djerba." Hadassah Magazine 82 (April): 28–32.
- Laskier, Michael M. 1994. North African Jewry in the Twentieth Century: The Jews of Morocco, Tunisia, and Algeria. New York: New York University Press.
- Laskier, Michael M. 2004. Israel and the Maghreb: From Statehood to Oslo. Gainesville: University Press of Florida.
- Or Shalom Center Web site [Hebrew]. <http://www.or-shalom.org.il/> (accessed May 2, 2007).
- Roumani, Judith. 1984. "The Portable Homeland of North African Jewish Fiction: Ryvel and Koskas." Prooftexts 4, no. 3 (September): 253–257.
- Roumani, Judith. 1985. "Storytelling in Tunisian Jewish Literature." Revue du Centre d'Etudes sur la Littérature Francophone de l'Afrique du Nord 4, no. 2 (February): 17–19.
- Soltes, Ori Z. 1996. Jews in the Cultural Fusion of Tunisia. Washington, DC: B'nai B'rith Klutznick National Jewish Museum & Embassy of Tunisia.

- Tironi, Stefano. 2001–2002. “La comunita ebraica Tripolina tra la Libia et Roma.” <http://www.morasha.it/tesi/trni/index.html> (accessed May 2, 2007).
- Udovitch Abraham, and Lucette Valensi. 1984. The Last Arab Jews: The Communities of Jerba, Tunisia. London: Harwood.
- Zohar, Zion, ed. 2005. Sephardic and Mizrahi Jewry from the Golden Age of Spain to Modern Times. New York: New York University Press.

Jews in Uganda

Saul Issroff

---

General Population: 27,616,000 (July 2005 estimate)

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: There is no original Jewish settlement. A Ugandan tribe, the Abayudaya, has a variant of Jewish ritual practice.

Languages Spoken: Luganda, Ateso, Swahili, English

---

Historical Overview

About 500 black Ugandans, the Abayudaya, practice Judaism in eastern Uganda. They observe Jewish holidays, sing Hebrew songs, observe kashruth, perform circumcisions, and keep the Sabbath, as they have for generations. They have synagogues, usually in mud huts, in four villages outside Mbale.

The community was founded by Semei Kakungulu in 1919. He read about Judaism after meeting several European Jews who worked for the British. During the 1920s, a European Jewish trader met Kakungulu and taught the community the theory and practice of the Jewish faith. From 1920 until 1992, approximately 15 Jews from the outside Jewish world visited the community.

In February 2002, about 600 Abayudaya underwent a formal conversion by five Conservative rabbis. Although the Orthodox do not regard the Abayudayu as Jewish, they regard themselves as Jewish despite harassment and discrimination. The community receives aid from the Israeli Embassy (now in Kenya) and several organizations, including Kulanu and some U.S. organizations.

Selected Bibliography

- Oded, Arye. 1974. “The Bayudaya of Uganda: A portrait of an African Jewish Community.” Journal of Religion in Africa 6: 167–186.
- Oded, Arye. 1995. Religion and Politics in Uganda: A Study of Islam and Judaism. Nairobi, Kenya: East African Educational Publishers.
- Oded, Arye. 2008. “A History of the Abayudaya Jews of Uganda.” Jewish Virtual Library Web site. <http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/Judaism/uganda1.html> (accessed May 7, 2007).
- Saks, David. 2004. “Contemporary Jewish Africa.” Jewish Affairs 59, no. 2: 10.
- Sobol, Richard, and Jeffrey A. Summit. 2005. Abayudaya: The Jews of Uganda. New York: Abbeville Press.

Jews in Zambia

Saul Issroff

General Population: 11,600,000

Jewish Population: 35 (estimate)

Percent of Population: less than 0.0001 percent

Jewish Population by City: Mainly in Lusaka

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Jews came to Zambia from Lithuania, Latvia, and the United Kingdom.

Languages Spoken: English and 78 other languages

Historical Overview

1891–1893 Northern Rhodesia is administered by the [British] South Africa Company.

1900 The first Jews arrive in Rhodesia.

1905 The first permanent Jewish congregation is established in Livingstone.

1921 The Jewish population is 110.

1923 The United Kingdom annexes Rhodesia.

1953 Northern and southern Rhodesia and Nyasaland (now Malawi) join to form the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

1955 The Jewish population is 1,200, and they are mainly located in Lusaka and the northern copperbelt towns.

1964 Rhodesia gains independence and the country's name is changed to Zambia. Zambia remains part of the British Commonwealth.

1968 The Jewish population is 500.

2006 Approximately 35 Jews remain in Zambia, mainly in Lusaka.

The earliest Jewish settlers in Livingstone and Broken Hill, although few in number, became prominent as traders and farmers (mainly cattle), in timber plantations, and in activities associated with copper mining.

A small number of Jewish refugees arrived in the country before and after the Holocaust. Northern Rhodesia was a potential refugee haven during World War II as it had no immigration restrictions and was constitutionally under the authority of Britain. The British Colonial Office was fully aware of its potential and seriously considered plans for fairly large-scale Jewish settlement. However, anti-Jewish prejudices among the settler population blocked settlement. Later, many Jews immigrated to South Africa, Southern Rhodesia, and Israel in the 1960s.

In 1978, the Council for Zambia Jewry was founded in Lusaka. There were two synagogues, in Lusaka and Ndola (recently closed).

Eminent Northern Rhodesian or Zambian Jews

Robert Gordon and Fischel Levitz were among the earliest traders. Among the earliest pioneers were Elie and Harry Susman (settled 1900) who, as traders and large-scale farmers, developed river and wagon transport to Barotseland and were associated with Harry Wulfohn. In 1914, the Susmans had the first claims on a copper mine (Nkana), but an attempt at starting a mining company failed, and the claim was sold for £250. The Susmans also had large timber concessions. Prominent Jewish mining pioneers included Sir Ernest Oppenheimer, Sir Edmund Davis, and Solly Joel, and they mostly operated out of London and Johannesburg.

Abe Galaun (b. Vornia, Lithuania 1914, d. London 2003), prominent in the meat and dairy business, was referred to by President Kaunda as “the man who feeds the nation.” He founded the Council for Zambian Jewry and was chairman of the Lusaka Hebrew Congregation. Marcus Grill, who was related to the Sossen and Susman families, was a pioneer trader, hotelier, and the first cinema operator in Northern Rhodesia.

Simon Zukas played an important part in the struggle for Zambia’s independence. Some South Africans of Jewish descent who were involved in antiapartheid movements lived in exile in Zambia.

Jews were mayors in Livingstone, Broken Hill, Kitwe, and Luanshya. Sir Roy Welensky was a leading political figure from the 1930s to the 1960s and served as prime minister of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland between 1956 and 1963. Maurice Rabb was elected to the national legislative assembly. S. W. Magnus was a prominent member of the Zambian parliament (1962 to 1968) and was appointed a high court judge in 1968. Michael Galaun is currently chairman of the Council for Zambia Jewry.

Stanley Fischer (b. 1943 in Mazabuka) was deputy-managing director of the International Monetary Fund and was subsequently appointed governor of the Bank of Israel in 2005. Denise Scott Brown (née Lakofski, b. Nkana 1931) is a notable international architect. Dr. Michael Lane, OBE, is a leader in HIV/AIDS treatment.

Israel and Zambia maintain full diplomatic relations.

Selected Bibliography

- Macmillan, Hugh, and Shapiro, Frank. 1999. Zion in Africa: The Jews of Zambia. London: I. B. Tauris.
- Saks, David. 2004. “Contemporary Jewish Africa. The African Jewish Congress and Its Affiliates.” Jewish Affairs 59: 2.
- Shapiro, Frank. 2002. Haven in Africa. Jerusalem: Gefen Publishing House.
- Sossen, Marion, ed. 2001. The Grills: Faces of a Family. London: Privately published.
- Susman, David. 2004. An African Shopkeeper. Vlaeberg, South Africa: Fernwood Press.
- Wigoder, G., et al., eds. 1971. Encyclopedia Judaica. New York: Macmillan Company.

Jews in Zimbabwe

Saul Issroff with the assistance of Dave Bloom

---

General Population: 13,000,000 (July 2005 estimate)

Jewish Population: 200 (estimate)

Percent of Population: less than 0.0001 percent

Jewish Population by City: mainly in Harare and Bulawayo

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Jews migrated from Lithuania, Latvia, and England, and a small Sephardi group migrated from the island of Rhodes.

Languages Spoken: Shona, Ndebele, English.

---

Historical Overview

1870s The first Jews arrive in the region. The earliest known Jewish settler was an English-born adventurer, David Montague Kisch. As manager and trader for the Tati gold mining concession, he befriends the king, Lobengula.

1875 Kisch moves to Pretoria, and in 1878 becomes auditor general of the Transvaal.

1889 The Chartered Company (British South African Company), under Cecil John Rhodes, controls much of the territory.

1890 The Pioneer Corps (with a number of Jews) occupies Mashonaland.

1894 The first synagogue is formed by 20 Jews in a tent in Bulawayo, Rhodesia.

1895 A second Jewish community is started in Salisbury (later known as Harare).

1898 The Central African Zionist Organization is established in Bulawayo.

Early 1900s Several Sephardic Jews arrive from the island of Rhodes.

1900 The Jewish population in Rhodesia is 400.

1901 Gwelo forms a third small congregation.

1921 The Jewish population in Rhodesia is 1,289.

1923 The United Kingdom annexes Southern Rhodesia from the [British] South Africa Company.

1930s Some German Jewish refugees are permitted to settle.

1943 The Zionist Council and the Jewish Board of Deputies are established.

1953 Southern Rhodesia and Northern Rhodesia (now Zambia) combine with Nyasaland (now Malawi) to form the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland (Central African Federation).

1961 The Jewish population is 7,060.

1965 A unilateral declaration of independence by the white minority government is not recognized by the United Kingdom.

1980 The independent state of Zimbabwe is formed, but the dictatorial rule of Robert Mugabe leads to an exodus of white farmers, economic shambles, and widespread shortages of food and fuel.

1987 The Jewish community numbers approximately 1,200.

Among the early Jewish settlers was Augustus Greite (1875), a trader in Bulawayo, who later returned to the Transvaal with ivory and ostrich feathers. Jews moved into the wild interior, the lands of the African tribes and the missionaries. Moss (Paddy) Cohen lost much of his trading activities as a result of Cecil Rhodes outwitting Lobengula and gaining land concessions. Alfred Beit and his cousin Lippert were of Sephardic origin, and with Barney (Isaacs) Barnato were Jewish partners of Rhodes. The Rothschild family also became partners.

The predominant Jewish settlement was by Eastern European Jews, mostly from Russia and Lithuania, in the territory of the British South African Company later known as Rhodesia. These settlers were traders. Rhodesian Jewry was always very active in regional and international Zionist activities. After World War II an economic upturn brings more Jews arrived from South Africa and England. Jews were among the active pioneers in transport, mining, hotel corporations, and cattle ranching.

Sir Roy Welensky (1907–1991) was the second and final prime minister of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. He was born in Salisbury to a Polish Jewish father and an Afrikaans mother and described himself as “half Jewish, half Afrikaner and 100% British.” The Honorable Abe Abrahamson was Rhodesian minister of treasury and local government in 1958, and was a member of Parliament from 1953 to 1965. His uncle, Leizer Abrahamson, died in May 2007, just after his 108th birthday, and was possibly the oldest Jew in Africa.

Jews were active in all professions and many established successful commercial and industrial businesses. A relatively small number were large-scale farmers, like the Goldberg family with their tea estates in the eastern highlands.

After the unilateral declaration of independence in 1965 an armed uprising by the Zimbabwe African National Union and the Zimbabwe African People’s Union against the white minority government led by Ian Smith led to a civil war. Subsequently, most of the Jewish population emigrated. On April 18, 1980, the independent Republic of Zimbabwe was declared. Salisbury, the capital, was renamed Harare.

In the 1990s the Jewish communities could no longer afford full-time rabbis, and local members ran services. As of 2007, fewer than 200 aging Jews live in Zimbabwe, predominately in Harare and Bulawayo. There are no Jews living in Kwe Kwe, Gweru, and Kadoma.

Both Ashkenazi (1895) and Sephardi (1931) synagogues exist in Harare, and Bulawayo has an Orthodox Ashkenazic community. The Ashkenazi and Sephardi synagogues combined in Harare, and Rabbi Nathan Asmoucha of Bulawayo is the sole rabbi.

The Zimbabwe Jewish Board of Deputies is the leading communal organization. Very few young Jews remain in Zimbabwe; most have immigrated to Israel or South Africa. Zionist youth movements have mostly ceased. Jewish day schools, Carmel in Bulawayo and Sharon in Harare, serve a very small number of local Jewish children but have large numbers of Indian and Black pupils. There is a Jewish aged home, Savyon Lodge in Bulawayo.

Anti-Semitism is almost nonexistent today, but the Palestinian Authority has an embassy that promotes their cause. Both Harare and Bulawayo communities established their own sports clubs in the 1950s as Jews were barred from membership of mainstream white-run clubs of the day.

The Bulawayo Hebrew Congregation (Ashkenazi) was established in 1894 in a tent with 20 members. On October 5, 2003, the day before Yom Kippur, the synagogue burned to the ground. The Torah was saved, and services are now mainly held at the Savyon Old age home. Jewish communal life endures.

The Harare (formerly Salisbury) Hebrew Congregation was founded on June 2, 1895, by 20 men and 2 women. Joe van Praagh, the first chairman, became the first Jewish mayor. In 1901, the first synagogue was built (70 members), but it grew fast and in 1920 a new synagogue was built. By 1964, the community had more than 500 families. A chevra kadisha, Hebrew School, youth groups, and Zionist organizations were established.

Jews began settling in Kadoma (Gatooma) in the early 1900s, and by 1930 the region had approximately 25 to 30 Jewish families. Their synagogue was erected in 1953, and in 1956, Robert Sternberg became mayor. Most of the community left, however, because of political and economic difficulties; fewer than 20 Jews remain.

In 1993, Israel and Zimbabwe established formal diplomatic relations. Since 1948, more than 700 Jews immigrated to Israel.

The current president of the Zimbabwe Jewish Board of Deputies is Peter Sternberg. Other prominent Jews include Professor Michael Gelfand, a world expert in tropical diseases, African medicine, and African culture. Rabbi Maurice Konviser, OBE, was the rabbi in Harare from 1935 to 1965. Harry and Ivor Pichanick were mayors of Salisbury. Dr. Ahrn Palley, a physician, and was also a member of Parliament representing the Liberal Party. In Bulawayo, Ben Baron was a leading lawyer and Phillip Baron, a physician. Nick Alhadeff, was also a chairman of the Jewish Board of Deputies. Dr. Kipps Rosen was a prominent physician and founder of the Sephardic Hebrew Congregation. Muriel Rosen was a member of Parliament.

Selected Bibliography

- Arnold, W. E. 1980. The Goldbergs of Leigh Ranch. Reading, UK: Books of Zimbabwe.
- Clingman, Paul. 2004. The Moon Can Wait. Biography of Hon. A. E. Abrahamson. New York: Penguin.
- Kosmin, Barry A. 1980. Majuta: A History of the Jewish Community of Zimbabwe, Gwelo, Zimbabwe: Mambo Press.
- Rosenthal, Eric. 1960. "Rhodesian Jewry and its Story." www.zjc.org.il/showpage.php?pageid=16 (accessed April 2007).

Australasia

Jews in Australia

Suzanne D. Rutland and Gary Eckstein

---

General Population: 20,090,437 (2006 census)

Jewish Population: 105,000 (official census)

Percent of Population: 0.5 percent

Jewish Population in Key Cities: Melbourne, 50,000; Sydney, 40,000; Perth, 7,000; Brisbane, 3,500; Gold Coast, 3,500; Adelaide, 1,000

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Until 1850, most Jews migrated from Britain as convicts and free settlers. Next, until the mid-1950s, Jews migrated from Europe as a result of various waves of migration; some came from Russia via China, Central European refugees arrived via Shanghai, and other refugees arrived from Egypt. Since 1960, most immigrants have been Russians, South Africans, and Israelis. Until the 1950s, migrants arrived by boat, but now most fly to Australia.

Languages Spoken: English, Yiddish, Russian, Hungarian, Hebrew

---

Historical Overview

1788 Jews arrive on the First Fleet from Britain as convicts in chains. Between 1788 and the end of transportation about 800 Jews are sent out as convicts, mostly male of Ashkenazi background. Some manage to enjoy a high level of success.

1817 Burial Society forms (Chevra Kadisha).

1828 Phillip Joseph Cohen arrives in Sydney. He is authorized to conduct Jewish marriages. The development of organized Jewish life has to wait for the arrival of free settlers from Britain. They come from well-known Sephardi families, such as the Montefiores.

1831 The first congregation forms and in 1837 begins to hold more regular services in rented rooms.

1844 The first purpose-built synagogue is opened in Sydney in 1844; shortly afterward synagogues are built in Hobart (1845) and Launceston (1846) in Tasmania, Melbourne (1848) in Victoria, and Adelaide (1848) in South Australia.

1848–1858 Gold rushes lead to Victorian Jewry growing from 300 to 3,000, and new congregations are established in the Victorian gold rush towns of Ballarat, Geelong, and Bendigo. For the first time continental Jews, especially from Germany, arrive in Australia.

1872 St. Kilda Hebrew Congregation opens in Melbourne, making it the third synagogue to be built there. Among its leaders are German Jews who prospered through the gold rushes; its first minister is also from Germany.

1878 The Great Synagogue opens in Sydney. Known as the “Cathedral Synagogue,” it remains the only synagogue in Sydney for more than 30 years and is very Anglo-Jewish in practice.

- 1880s Unlike the rest of the English-speaking world, only a small number of Jewish refugees from Czarist Russia find a refuge in Australia. Those Russian Jews who do find their way there have only a minimal impact on Australian Jewry. In Melbourne, the inner-city suburb of Carlton develops as the first area of settlement with a rich Yiddish and Zionist culture and a more Orthodox lifestyle.
- 1886 Margaret Synagogue is consecrated in Brisbane, marking the slow growth of the Jewish population in Queensland. It still serves the Brisbane Orthodox Jewish community today.
- 1895 The Hebrew Standard of Australasia, the oldest Jewish newspaper, is established. It is later renamed Australian Jewish Times and then Australian Jewish News. The newspaper, still in existence today, is the only Jewish paper serving Australian Jewry as a privately run and funded enterprise.
- 1902 The first Zionist organization is established. Zionism develops very slowly because there is strong opposition to the Zionist movement from assimilated Anglo-Jews.
- 1911 Kadimah, the first Yiddish organization, is formed in Carlton, Melbourne, and includes a Yiddish library and Yiddish theater. Kadimah develops slowly and acts as an important magnet attracting Polish Jews to Melbourne.
- 1917 The New South Wales Legislative Assembly closes on Yom Kippur because both the speaker, John Jacob Cohen, and the deputy speaker, Sir Daniel Levy are Jewish. This incident highlights the active political profile of Australian Jews until the 1980s.
- 1918 Sir John Monash is appointed commander-in-chief of the Australian army because of his brilliant tactics in tank battles in France during World War I. In August 1918, he is knighted in the field by the British king, George V, the first person to be so honored in 300 years. A university in Melbourne is named after him.
- 1923 The Council of Jewish Women is formed under the leadership of Dr. Fanny Reading. By 1929, it has established branches across Australia and holds its first federal conference. It continues to be the premier organization representing women's views and supporting local and Israeli fund-raising until the present.
- 1927 The Zionist Federation of Australia is formed with Sir John Monash as its first president.
- 1930 Sir Isaac Isaacs is appointed Australia's first Australian-born governor general. This is a high point demonstrating the prominent role Jews play in politics, law, medicine, and other professions.
- 1933 Adolph Hitler's assumption of power in Germany creates an enormous refugee problem. Australia is seen as a possible refuge, and the number of European Jewish refugees gradually increases, especially when the Australian Jewish Welfare Society is formed in 1936–1937 to help refugees resettle.
- 1938 The Evian Conference, called by President Franklin D. Roosevelt to deal with the refugee crisis after Hitler takes over Austria, is attended by 32 nations, including Australia whose refugee quota is 15,000 over 3 years. The Australian representative, Thomas W. White, says, "Australia does not have a racial problem and is not desirous of importing one," which is indicative of the inadequate response of the free world at Evian. The outbreak of war in September 1939 cuts off this migration: a total of around 9,000 refugees arrive, so the full quota is not filled.

- 1940 The Dunera arrives with 2,000 Jewish internees sent by Britain to internment camps in Australia.
- 1943 Moriah College, the first Jewish day school in Sydney, is founded. This is the beginnings of a strong day school movement in Australia. Later, Mount Scopus College opens in Melbourne in 1949, and by the 1980s it has become the largest private Jewish day school in the world.
- 1944 The Executive Council of Australian Jewry (ECAJ) is formed to assist postwar immigration to Australia and further the cause of a Jewish homeland in Palestine and B'nai B'rith as a social/cultural organization.
- 1946–1954 A total of 17,000 European survivors arrive in Australia. They completely change the nature of the Australian Jewish community, but Jews continue to constitute only 0.5 percent of the overall population because of anti-refugee hysteria. Both before and after the war, proposals to admit Jewish refugees are met with a hostile reception. Known as “anti-refo” feeling, this manifested itself in general newspapers and statements by some members of parliament.
- 1950s The community is transformed by the rapid growth of synagogues, Jewish schools, and cultural life.
- 1967 The Six-Day War has a great impact on the community and results in the formation of the Jewish Communal Appeal in Sydney. The Yom Kippur War further increases Jewish identification.
- 1970 The campaign for Soviet Jewry begins, and it continues through the 1970s and 1980s. Isi Leibler becomes a major figure on the international scene and is involved in the struggle for Soviet Jewry.
- 1985–1992 The campaign against the 1975 United Nations resolution “Zionism is Racism,” is led in Australia by Zionist Federation president Mark Leibler. The resolution is eventually rescinded in 1992.
- 1986 The Menzies Commission recognizes that Nazi criminals did enter Australia after the war. Some war crimes trials are held, but no one person is convicted, and the overall result is a failure.
- 1989 The disintegration of the Soviet Union leads to increased immigration from the former USSR until 1997. The 1990s also see increased immigration from South Africa
- 1994–2006 Moriah College moves to a new campus and develops into the largest Jewish day school in Australia. This is part of the ongoing diversification of the community, including the rapid growth of synagogues in the 1980s and 1990s, many due to the influence of the Lubavitch sect, Habad.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

The postwar migrants largely became self-employed: some established clothing factories and some entered property development. Since the 1980s, employment has been dominated by managerial and professional occupations, and a high rate of young Jews are completing tertiary studies. Most young Australian Jews enter the workforce with a university degree.

Jewish businesspeople, mainly refugees and survivors, continue their high profile in the business world, often being joined by their children. One outstanding example is shopping magnate Frank Lowy, who manages Westfield shopping centers in Australia, New Zealand, the United States, and the United Kingdom, with his three sons. Jews continue to make their contributions to the law, medicine, and academia: Justice James Spigelman serves as chief justice in New South Wales, and there are a large number of Jewish judges.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Constituting less than 0.5 percent of the overall Australian population, Jews have enjoyed a high level of acceptance and have made outstanding contributions to many aspects of Australian life. A number of leading Jews have become involved in aboriginal affairs, including Justice Marcus Einfeld and the late Ron Castan. Mark Leibler heads the Aboriginal Reconciliation body.

In the arts, Jews have made a substantial contribution. Founded by refugee Jews from Nazi Europe, Musica Aviva plays a key role in the Australian musical scene. Jewish composers and musicians include pianist Isadore Goodman, piano accordionist Herbie Marks, and composer George Dreyfus. Postwar Jewish writers include David Martin and Judah Waten. A second generation of writers, mostly children of Holocaust survivors, have begun writing about their parents' experiences, including Diane Armstrong, Mark Baker, Arnold Zable, and Elliot Perlman. Holocaust survivor Judy Cassab has become one of Australia's foremost female artists.

In the field of sport, Jews have played a role in the Australian obsession with sporting achievements. Among a long line of notable athletes, Myer Rosenblum (1907–2002) was a stand out in rugby (the Australian Wallabies), track and field, and tennis teams. Postwar and later immigrants brought a love of soccer that was previously uncommon in Australia. Peter Fuzes represented the national Soccerroos, and businessman Frank Lowy is involved in Football Federation Australia and once headed Soccer Australia.

Alternative Jewish Culture

Communities in Melbourne and Sydney offer a myriad of organizations that cater to the social and cultural needs of the community. In Melbourne there is the Theodor Herzl Club. In Sydney the Hakoah Club, located in Bondi, has the largest membership of any of the local Jewish organizations. A Jewish museum culture has developed with the Jewish Museum of Australia, and the Holocaust Museum in Melbourne, the Sydney Jewish Museum in Sydney, and the Holocaust Centre in Perth, becoming foci of Jewish activity.

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

In recent years, Australian Jewry has emerged as one of the most vibrant Jewish communities in the world. Most Jews have a strong sense of Jewish identity and a rich network of Jewish communal organizations.

Rates of attendance at Jewish schools are among the highest in the world with 17 schools in Australia: eight in Melbourne, five in Sydney, and one each in Perth, Adelaide, Brisbane, and the Gold Coast. The largest Jewish day schools, both nominally Orthodox, are Moriah College in Sydney (about 1,750 students) and Mount Scopus College, slightly smaller, in Melbourne. Melbourne schools represent a spectrum ranging from the secular Bundist Yiddish school, Sholem Aleichem, to the ultra-Orthodox Adass Israel and the Progressive King David. In Melbourne about 70 percent of Jewish children attend Jewish schools, a declining percentage, while in Sydney it is around 62 percent. Most of the remainder are catered for by part-time systems of Jewish education with Academy Board of Jewish Education being very effective in Sydney and offering Hebrew classes as an ethnic language at some government schools. Adult education facilities have developed rapidly through the Melton Adult Education Program, which is centered at the Jewish Museum of Australia in Melbourne and the Shalom Institute in Sydney.

Of the affiliated, about 80 percent join Modern Orthodox synagogues and schools, although only about 6 percent of Australian Jews are practicing Orthodox. About 20 percent affiliate with the Progressive movement. In recent years, Conservative Judaism has been introduced into Australian Jewry. The Progressive movement has not expanded as rapidly as none of the three newest waves of migrants—from the former Soviet Union, South Africa, or Israel—come from places with a strong a tradition of Reform Judaism. Habad has become a major religious force. The rapid growth of synagogues in the 1980s and 1990s is largely because of the expansion of Habad, although the Sephardi community has also grown in size. The nonaffiliated component of the community stands at about 30 percent. Children do not obtain regular Jewish education, although bar and bat mitzvah ceremonies are sometimes held, and some children participate in Jewish sporting teams.

The two main federal governing bodies are the Executive Council for Australian Jewry and the Zionist Federation of Australia. Other federal bodies include the National Council of Jewish Women, the Women's International Zionist Organization, the Federation of Australian Jewish Welfare Societies, Federal B'nai B'rith, Federal United Israel Appeal, and Federal Jewish National Fund. At the state level the various organizations are represented through boards of deputies (New South Wales, Queensland, and South Australia) and community councils (Victoria and Western Australia), while Canberra and Tasmania have community centers. The Zionist organizations are also represented through state Zionist councils. This multiplicity and complexity of organizations is a feature of Australian Jewry.

The main lobby group is the Australia/Israel and Jewish Affairs Council, formed in 1997 and headed by Mark Leibler in Melbourne. B'nai B'rith also has antidefamation units in both Melbourne and Sydney.

The Jewish contribution to the general political life in the country, however, has decreased. Michael Danby, representing the Labor Party for Melbourne Ports, is currently the only Jewish member of federal parliament. Jewish political activism continues to be concentrated in the Australian Labor Party.

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionism, and Existential Problems of the Community

Although Australian Jews have experienced a high level of acceptance, there have been ongoing attacks on individual Jews and Jewish communal institutions. The rate of such attacks has steadily increased since the early 1990s, when a quarter of Sydney synagogues were attacked by arson. There were further peaks in 2002 during the second intifada and again in 2006 with the second Lebanon war. Anti-Zionism has been a phenomenon on university campuses, and some individual Jews also contribute. The major problems facing the community today are assimilation and catering for the high proportion of elderly, many of whom are Holocaust survivors.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

Migration has continued from South Africa and Israel, but at a slower rate since 2001. Since 1997, migration from the former Soviet Union has ceased because the government ended the refugee status of Jews, and they no longer receive benefits from the Australian government. Migration continues to contribute to the population growth of the community. There is minimal emigration, but some Jews chose to live in Israel (aliyah).

Intermarriage is becoming more common in Australian Jewish society, although it is less frequent than in some comparable Diaspora countries. The rate of intermarriage for individuals is similar to that of Canada and lower than in the United States or most European countries, but it is steadily rising. The intermarried proportion of Australian Jews is approximately 22 percent in total and only slightly higher for men than for women. Among people under the age of 30, the intermarriage rate is estimated as approaching 35 percent.

Selected Bibliography

- Fagenblat, Michael, Melanie Landau, and Nathan Wolski, eds. 2006. New under the Sun: Jewish Australians on Religion, Politics and Culture. Melbourne, Australia: Black.
- Levey, Geoffrey Brahm, and Philip Mendes. 2004. Jews and Australian Politics. Brighton, UK: Sussex Academic Press.
- Levi, J. S., and G. F. J. Bergman. 2002. Australian Genesis: Jewish Convicts and Settlers, 1788–1860, new ed. Carlton, Australia: Melbourne University Press.
- Rubinstein, Hilary, and W. D. Rubinstein. 1991. Jews in Australia: A Thematic History. Melbourne, Australia: Heinemann.
- Rutland, Suzanne D. 2005. Jews in Australia, 2nd ed. Melbourne, Australia: Cambridge University Press.

Sephardi Jews in Australia

Myer Samra

---

Sephardim constitute approximately 5 percent of the 100,000 Jews in Australia today. Throughout the 19th century, Sephardi Jews from prominent families in Britain featured in the history of each colony established in Australia, although for much of the 20th century, immigration restrictions hindered the growth of the community.

Jacob Montefiore was 1 of 11 commissioners appointed to establish the colony of South Australia, founding the city of Adelaide in 1835. This was the first colony settled entirely without relying on convict labor. Although Montefiore himself did not settle there, Adelaide's civic leaders appreciated his ongoing interest in the development and progress of the colony, naming a prominent hill overlooking the city in his honor.

Jacob's brother, Joseph Barrow Montefiore, arrived in New South Wales in 1829, attracted by the colonial government's land grants to free settlers. Purchasing additional lands, he became a major pastoralist, while engaging in trade in several colonies. A founder of the Union Bank of Australia in the 1830s, he also became a trustee of the South Australian State Savings Bank in 1848.

Although Sir Moses Montefiore never visited Australia, he contributed to the building of the synagogue in Hobart, Tasmania, in 1845, and presented a Sepher Torah to the Melbourne Synagogue in 1854. In both Sydney and Melbourne, homes for the care of elderly Jews carry his name.

Solomon Mocatta, a shipbroker, served as lay minister of the Adelaide Hebrew Congregation from 1857. Frederick Pirani was appointed acting professor of mathematics at Melbourne University in 1874, and in 1893, he was elected to the New Zealand parliament. Henry Cohen Pirani worked as a journalist in Australia and New Zealand in the 1860s, before returning to Britain and writing several novels based on his experiences in the colonies, featuring members of their Jewish communities.

While interacting with other Jews in the colonies, the Sephardim were conscious of their distinctiveness and proud of their heritage. In 1846, J. M. Belisario of Melbourne wrote to the journal Voice of Jacob to correct the notion that all Jewish communities in the British Empire accepted the jurisdiction of the (Ashkenazi) chief rabbi of Britain, asserting that "the Spanish and Portuguese Congregation of this city is subject to its own Ecclesiastical and Civil Authorities, and to none other" (Aaron 1979, 24).

In Melbourne, Benjamin Farjeon and Henry Cohen Pirani attempted to form a Spanish and Portuguese congregation with the assistance of the Bevis Marks Synagogue in London. From 1854 to 1873, Sephardi Jews in Melbourne conducted services for the High Holy Days in a room within the Melbourne Synagogue. However, individuals who were not Sephardi joined these services to avoid the cost of a seat in the main synagogue, causing friction with the host congregation.

The first two Torah scrolls in the possession of the Perth Hebrew Congregation (established 1855) were gifts from members of the Montefiore clan, while Lady Rachel Ezra of Calcutta presented the Hobart Hebrew Congregation with a silver-cased Sepher Torah. After World War I, Perth received another Sepher Torah, presented by Pasha Moise de Cattaoui, head of the Jews of Cairo, to Rabbi David Freedman, who had been chaplain to Australia's Jewish troops in Egypt.

By the mid-19th century, several Baghdadi Jews had settled in Australia and New Zealand, extending the Baghdadi Jewish colonies then established across Asia. David Sassoon in Bombay received a request from Sydney for prayer books in the Baghdadi tradition. Rabbi Jacob Saphir, who visited Australia in 1861, identified a Baghdadi Jew, Saleh Khazzoum, who had settled in Sydney in 1854 as "a kind and generous friend who was my guide during my stay" in the city (Falk 1939, 49).

Isaac Zecharia, who had served as shohet to the Sassoons in Bombay, reached the goldfields in Ballarat, Victoria, in the 1860s. He served as minister for various congregations in Australia and New Zealand, establishing a Jewish burial society in Wellington in 1892. A Sydney resident published an account of the suffering of the Jews in Baghdad under the brutal governor Daud Pasha from 1817 to 1831, in Maggid Mesharim, a Judeo-Arabic journal from Calcutta in 1897.

Jewish immigration from non-European countries was severely restricted after the White Australia Policy was implemented in 1901. Whereas 161 Jewish males with Turkish citizenship were naturalized in Australia between 1881 and 1890, only 15 were naturalized between 1901 and 1940.

World War II and the establishment of Israel in 1948 dislodged Jewish communities throughout Asia and the Middle East. Jews from Singapore and Java were evacuated to Perth and Brisbane during the war, and others from Burma and India entered the country in the immediate postwar period. From 1948, however, Australia secretly implemented a policy excluding Jews from Asia and the Middle East, frustrating attempts by Baghdadi Jews in Asia to enter the country.

Although some Jews from Egypt were able to arrive in 1948, after the Suez Crisis of 1956 Egyptian Jewish refugees had difficulty obtaining Australian settler permits. Sydney Einfeld, president of the Australian Jewish Welfare Society, wrote "We are finding it almost impossible to get a single visa for our people in Egypt, even those of European origin and are in peril of their lives" (Samra 1987, 129). However, representations and rallies in Adelaide on behalf of Egyptian Jews persuaded the government to admit individuals with relatives in Australia.

Around 400 Egyptian Jews settled in Adelaide and contributed substantially to both the Jewish and the general community. Henry Ninio served as president of the Reform Beit Shalom Synagogue in 1983 and was lord mayor of Adelaide from 1993 to 1997. The founder of a chain of perfumeries, Ninio was honoured by the French government for services to perfume and the French community.

Ninio's daughter Jacqueline was the first Australian woman to be ordained as a rabbi, serving the Temple Emanuel, Sydney. His brother Albert has been president of the Orthodox Adelaide Hebrew Congregation and president of B'nai B'rith in Adelaide. Other prominent Egyptian Jews include Albert Bolaffi, who was president of the South Australia Zionist Federation and Victor Ades, president of the South Australian Board of Deputies from 1963 to 1970. Adelaide's Jewish kindergarten was named in his honor.

Although Sephardi Jews in Adelaide and Perth have participated in the mainstream Jewish community, Sydney and Melbourne have nurtured distinct Sephardi institutions. From 1947, Sephardi Jews in Sydney organized High Holy Day services in rented premises. Aaron Aaron, a great-grandson of Saleh Khazzoum born in Calcutta, founded the NSW Association of Sephardim in 1954, to promote Sephardi settlement and to establish a synagogue that followed the Sephardi rites familiar to its members. It gained lukewarm support from the wider Jewish community as they were unfamiliar with Sephardi Jews and uncertain of their claimed identity.

During the 1960s, political links between Reuben Aaron OBE and Sir William Aston, the Liberal member of State Parliament representing the electorate where most Jews resided, helped some Sephardim to immigrate. The late 1960s and early 1970s saw many Baghdadi immigrants from Singapore and Bombay, followed later by a continuing stream of Jews of various backgrounds from Israel.

The Sephardi Synagogue in the Sydney suburb of Woollahra was consecrated in 1962. Its first minister, Rabbi Simon Silas, joined the congregation in 1963 and remained its spiritual head until 1980. Silas was born in Calcutta, India, and his wife was from Egypt. Together they represented the two main cultural elements of the local community, the Egyptian Jews and those of Baghdadi origin.

Although other Sephardi congregations have arisen—the Eastern Jewish Association in 1960, Bet Yosef in 1992, Rambam in 1993, and Baba Sali in 1994—the Sephardi Synagogue remains the central focus of Sephardi ritual in Sydney. Only the Sephardi Synagogue has its own premises; the other congregations hold services in accommodations rented from various Jewish groups. The Sephardi Synagogue originally had a congregation comprising Baghdadi and Egyptian Jews, but over the years the more assimilated Egyptians have tended to drift away, many joining Reform congregations. The synagogue has also attracted some of the more recent immigrants from Israel. The Eastern Jewish Association's membership is made up of Baghdadi Jews from across Asia, but it has an aging nucleus from Calcutta and Rangoon, India.

Bet Yosef operates from a hall of Adath Yisroel. Initially accommodating Baghdadi and Israeli Jews (many of Moroccan background), its membership is now mainly

Australian prime minister Malcolm Fraser (second from left) dedicates a painting entitled Moses, by Louis Kahan, at the opening of the Sassoon Yehudah Sephardi Synagogue in East Malvern, 1977. It was the first time an Australian prime minister officially inaugurated a synagogue. (Courtesy Gad Ben-Meir)

Baghdadi. Rambam has catered to Hebrew-speaking Israelis and has a significant Moroccan influence. After several transformations, it is now effectively Lubavitch run. Baba Sali, which also served Israeli-Moroccan Jews, ceased functioning in 2003, when its host synagogue reclaimed its premises, and the health of the founder, Rabbi Yosef Ben-David, deteriorated.

In Melbourne, the Sephardi Association of Victoria was formed in 1965, modeled on Sydney's experience. In 1977, Prime Minister Malcolm Fraser inaugurated its Sassoon Yehudah Sephardi Synagogue in East Malvern, some distance from the heart of Jewish Melbourne. In 1994 it moved to the Jewish hub, East St. Kilda. This congregation attracts Jews from many countries, particularly from Egypt, and Baghdadi Jews. Melbourne has hosted a number of additional Sephardi congregations. Rabbi Ezra Douek established 'Od Yosef Hai in the premises of Adass Yisroel, and the Rambam congregation is located on the grounds of the Lubavitch-affiliated Yeshiva College.

With no distinctive Sephardi educational facilities, children adopt the normative customs and liturgy of their Ashkenazi friends, and marriage with Ashkenazim is commonplace. The absence of many youthful faces in Australia's Sephardi congregations is noticeable, growth coming from the new Israeli settlers and sojourners.

Although 50 years ago Sephardi immigrants were unwelcome in Australia, many have contributed substantially to the cultural life of their adopted country. They have been conspicuous in rabbinical positions—in Ashkenazi congregations as well as Sephardi ones—and in the kosher foods industry. Several have achieved distinction in public administration, the law, philanthropy, music, architecture, and the arts.

Selected Bibliography

- Barda, Rachel M. 2006. "The Migration Experience of the Jews of Egypt to Australia, 1948–1967: A Model of Acculturation." PhD thesis, University of Sydney.
- Gale, Naomi. 2005. The Sephardim of Sydney: Coping with Political Processes and Social Pressures. Brighton, UK: Sussex Academic.
- Goultman, Rodney. 1993. "A Jew and Coloured Too! Immigration of 'Jews of Middle Eastern Origin' to Australia, 1949–58." Immigrants and Minorities, 12 (1): 75–91.
- Rutland, Suzanne. 1984. "Egyptian Jews in Adelaide: A Case Study in Oral History." Oral History Association of Australia Journal. 6:19–24.
- Samra, Myer. 1987. "Yisrael Rhammana: Constructions of Identity Among Iraqi Jews in Sydney, Australia." PhD thesis, University of Sydney.

Conversion to Judaism in the Sydney Jewish Community

Raymond Apple

---

The Sydney beth din, established under the auspices of the British chief rabbi in about 1876 and reorganized with greater independence in 1905, handles conversions for the whole of Australia and New Zealand, with the exception of Melbourne, which has its own beth din. It accepts 30 to 50 conversion applications per year. Some arise out of an ideological attraction to Judaism, but many converts have a previous involvement with Jewish life, for example, a Reform convert or the children of a Reform convert who ask for their Jewish status to be regularized, children of a Jewish father and a non-Jewish mother who have discovered they are not Halachically Jewish, or people with Jewish ancestry who seek to return to their Jewish roots. A uniquely Australian phenomenon is to find a person whose family has lived in Australia for generations but uncovers evidence that an ancestor was a Jewish convict transported to Australia as long ago as the late 18th century and who now wishes to resume the Jewish identity that was hidden or abandoned.

Until the reorganization of the beth din in 1905, conversion applications had to be submitted to the chief rabbi in London for approval. If approved, the candidate underwent immersion in Sydney—sometimes at a quiet spot in Sydney Harbour or occasionally in a private mikvah maintained by a pious family. (There was no official community mikvah until the late 1920s or early 1930s.) Even when the beth din was permitted to make its own decisions about accepting converts, a lay committee carried out interviews and investigated the background of the candidate until the early 1940s when the rabbi of the Great Synagogue refused to work with the lay committee, and it was subsequently disbanded.

Thereafter, members of the beth din undertook all steps necessary to consider and handle applications, though Sydney, like all batei din, faced the problem of converts who later drifted away from Judaism and in some cases resumed their former religion. As most Australian Jews were not strictly Orthodox, the converts who joined the community often tended to emulate the Jews they saw around them, though others maintained a high level of religious observance and some became religious officials and even rabbis.

Jews in Fiji

Steve Hall

---

General Population: 917,000 (2007)

Jewish Population: Approximately 60 Jews

Percent of Population: Less than 1 percent

Jewish Population in Key Cities: Most Jews live in Suva (the capital).

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Migrations in the 19th and early 20th centuries were from India, other Asian countries, and Australia. Modern migration are mainly business and alternative-lifestyle migrations.

Languages Spoken: English

---

Historical Overview

Henry Mark, at the age of 20, was the first Jew to settle in Fiji in 1881. He came from Australia and set up extensive commercial enterprises throughout the region. Jews from India, the Middle East, and other places in Asia joined Mark. In three cemeteries in Fiji, Momi (private cemetery), Ovalau Island (Levuka), and Suva (old cemetery), Jewish inscriptions can be found on the tombstones dating back to the first Jewish settlers in the 1800s. The Australian Jewish Historical Society in Victoria, Australia, stores the records of inscriptions on Jewish tombstones in Fiji.

Contemporary Overview

Nearly all Jews in the Fiji Islands live in the capital city of Suva. A Fiji Jewish Association was recently set up, which gave some organization to the Jews living there, but religious life remains limited for these Jews.

Missionaries converted the ethnic Fijians to Christianity, although the Indian population remains either Hindu or Muslim. There has been extensive contact, however, between ethnic Fijians and Israelis, as the Fiji armed forces (almost exclusively ethnic Fijian) have served for decades in peacekeeping or peace monitoring roles along Israel's borders. Israel and Fiji enjoy full diplomatic relations. In May 2002, Fiji's prime minister, Laisenia Qarase, agreed with the Israeli ambassador, H. E. Ruth Kahanoff, that the two countries should strengthen their relations even though they are so far apart geographically. The Israeli ambassador in Canberra, Australia, represents Israeli interests in Fiji. There is also an Israeli embassy in Suva, which serves as a point of identification for visiting Jewish tourists or businesspeople, both from Israel and elsewhere. The ambassador holds an annual Passover Seder, which accommodates 50 to 60 people. Kosher food is imported from Australia.

Selected Bibliography

Cowen, Ida. 1971. Jews in Remote Corners of the World. New York: Prentice Hall.

Kosher Delight: Your Online Jewish Magazine Web site. www.kosherdelight.com/Fiji.htm (accessed April 22, 2007).

Schoffman, Stuart. 2007. "More Than a Refuge: The View from Jerusalem." JUF News, Jewish United Fund Web site. www.juf.org/news\_public\_affairs/article.asp?key=5283 (accessed April 22, 2007).

"Fiji: The Jewish Community." 2005. International Association of Jewish Genealogical Societies: Jewish Cemetery Project. Jewish Gen.org Web site. www.jewishgen.org/cemetery/asia-pac-ind/fiji.html (accessed April 22, 2007).

Jews in French Polynesia

Stephen Levine

---

General Population: 250,000

Jewish Population: 150 (estimate)

Percent of Population: Less than one percent

Jewish Population by Key Cities: Most are in Papeete

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Most of the Jewish population is from France, but most previously migrated from Algeria to France.

Languages Spoken: French, English, Hebrew

---

Contemporary Overview

Most of the population of French Polynesia is Christian, although there are Jewish businesspeople from France who have migrated to the territory and established businesses of one kind or another—some in the tourism sector (restaurants, for instance) and others in import-export of one kind or another. The largest number of Jews in the territory is to be found in the capital, Papeete, on the main island of Tahiti. This group of Jews—largely Sephardim from Algeria—began to migrate to Tahiti in the 1980s. Having left Algeria for France, they were not disinclined to migrate elsewhere if there were good opportunities available to them. When one of their number went to Tahiti and found the environment congenial, others duly followed. The group is close-knit, and Friday night and Saturday services are held in their small, beautiful synagogue in Papeete. The synagogue is within walking distance of the members' homes and apartments. There is no rabbi; the members run the services themselves. There is a high level of Sabbath observance, involving synagogue attendance and subsequent family meals together, and families make a strong effort to pass on their traditions to the next generation.

The community is distinct from the surrounding population—both the European (i.e., French) and the Polynesian (i.e., the indigenous population of the territory). Their position as outsiders is conspicuous, given the high degree of Christian observance among the Polynesian community. There is some resentment from Polynesians against the Jewish community for their commercial success—which can be interpreted as exploiting the local population and the territory's resources—and for their detachment from the local community and its concerns. As the main issue in French Polynesia involves efforts by Polynesians to gain greater autonomy, including eventual independence, Polynesian perceptions of the Jews as both outsiders and French people makes their future as a community less secure.

Selected Bibliography

- Cowen, Ida. 1971. Jews in Remote Corners of the World. New York: Prentice Hall.
- “French Polynesia (Primarily Tahiti): The Jewish Community.” International Association of Jewish Genealogical Societies: Jewish Cemetery Project. Jewish Gen.org Web site. www.jewishgen.org/cemetery/asia-pac-ind/tahiti.html (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Golub, Alex. 2006. “Jewish in Polynesia.” Inside Higher Ed Web site. <http://www.insidehighered.com/views/2006/04/17/golub> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Lucotte, Gerard. 2003. “Paternal European Ancestry in French Polynesia Detected by Y-Chromosome Haplotypes.” Human Biology 75 (1): 129–133.

Jews in New Zealand

Stephen Levine

---

General Population: 4,100,000

Jewish Population: According to the 2001 census, there were 6,336 Jews; generally estimated today at 6,500.

Percent of Population: Less than 1 percent

Jewish Population by City: Auckland and Wellington

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Originally, Jewish immigrants to New Zealand were British. This was followed by pre- and postwar European immigration and then Hungarian, Russian, and South African immigration. There is a current trend of New Zealand Jews emigrating to Australia. New Zealand Jewish community members also immigrate in high numbers to Israel.

Languages Spoken: English, Russian, Hungarian

---

Historical Overview

1840 The Auckland Jewish community is founded.

1840s Jews are on the first ships arriving to Wellington, the site destined to become the future capital of an independent state. Some Jews settle in the north, in Auckland, before the formal establishment of a British colony in 1840. New Zealand's Jewish population grows together with the British settlement in the country during the 19th century.

1841 The first Jewish marriage is recorded.

1843 The first organized Jewish service in Wellington is conducted on January 7, 1843 (the synagogue portion is parsha Bo) by the newly arrived leader of that community, Abraham Hort. Some of Hort's family had preceded him to New Zealand.

1848 There are 61 Jews in a New Zealand colony of 16,000 settlers.

1860s New Zealand's first synagogues are built in the South Island communities of Hokitika and Dunedin. Other synagogues are erected in the small South Island provincial towns of Timaru and Nelson. Of these communal efforts little if anything remain. Other signs of abandoned Jewish life include, of course, grave-stones in South Island cemeteries.

1863 Julius Vogel, an open and identified Jew, is elected to the New Zealand Parliament.

1925 Francis Henry Dillon Bell, Abraham Hort's grandson, becomes New Zealand's prime minister.

1950s New Zealand's Reform or Progressive congregations are established in Auckland (Beth Shalom) and Wellington (Temple Sinai).

1956 The Hungarian uprising brings further groups of Jews to New Zealand.

1970s and 1980s The relaxation of restrictions against emigration by the Soviet Union in due course brings hundreds of ex-Soviet Jewish families to New Zealand.

In New Zealand, from colonial times to the present, the Jewish community has never had the capacity to grow to become a significant demographic element nationwide. Although census data and communal records document a Jewish population representing less than 1 percent of the total, nevertheless the Jews of New Zealand have managed to maintain an identity and a presence while contributing in important ways to the settlement, development, and prosperity of the country.

Jewish life has been geographically concentrated, limited for the most part to a few urban or provincial centers, in a country with a low population density and a significant farming sector. The largest Jewish communities in New Zealand are found in the country's main cities, Auckland and Wellington, although over the years there have been Jewish communities elsewhere in the country.

The broad demographic trend in New Zealand has been for the population to move north—from the South Island to the North Island and, within the North Island, from the southern part to Auckland and its environs. Jews have also followed these trends, leading to a less balanced distribution of Jews and Jewish communities. The congregations in Dunedin and Christchurch are the longest-lasting South Island communities. They retained at least nominal Orthodoxy until the late 20th century before moving first to Reform and then to virtual disappearance.

The Jews of the North Island have consolidated themselves in Auckland and Wellington. A synagogue in Hastings disappeared and mini communities in other provincial cities (including Palmerston North and Hamilton) have not developed. The Auckland and Wellington Orthodox congregations, established in the 19th century, have evolved over the years, expanding communal facilities while at the same time adapting to changing membership numbers.

The history of New Zealand Jewry is also a record of changing patterns of worldwide Jewish migration. The earliest Jews came from Britain to settle in a lightly populated colony. Subsequent emigration to a self-governing New Zealand came from the European continent in response to growing anti-Semitism. New Zealand did not take a welcoming attitude toward Jews seeking a refuge from Nazism, however, and only a small number of Jews were admitted to the country during the pre-war period or even subsequently. There is little doubt that anti-Jewish prejudice, though seldom publicly expressed, played an important part in decisions taken by immigration officials to deny entry. Even some of those who were admitted to New Zealand after fleeing Germany were classified as “enemy aliens”: their activities were restricted, their professional qualifications unrecognized, and their actions subject to some surveillance.

Even so, over a period of decades (encompassing two world wars) New Zealand’s predominantly Anglo-Jewish community acquired a more pluralistic character, as Jews from continental Europe brought different cultural interests and culinary tastes as well as distinct languages, traditions, and customs. The Hungarian uprising of 1956 brought further groups of Jews to the country, and Soviet Union’s relaxation of restrictions against emigration in due course brought hundreds of ex-Soviet Jewish families to New Zealand during the 1970s and 1980s. The failure of the New Zealand Jewish population to grow as a result of these developments reflects the tendency of many migrants to subsequently move on to Australia as well as the lack of Jewish background (and linguistic obstacles) among many of the Jewish émigrés from formerly communist states, who were not religiously observant. The 1990s brought Jews from South Africa, many of whom followed the same path as earlier waves of migrants—living in New Zealand, their first destination, for a while before moving on to countries with more dynamic economies or (for some) larger and more vibrant Jewish communities.

Against this broad background of more or less stable Jewish numbers—with immigration balanced against emigration and assimilation—the Jews of New Zealand have made contributions to the country out of proportion to their size. In the 19th century, one of New Zealand’s most significant public figures, Julius Vogel, became, first, New Zealand’s treasurer (a position he held for 10 years, as governments came and went) and then, subsequently, the country’s premier—a position he held twice (from 1873–1875, and again in 1876), giving New Zealand a Jewish head of government at a time when Jews had few opportunities for political advancement anywhere else.

When Vogel was first elected to the New Zealand Parliament (in 1863) his Jewish identity was in evidence, as he took the oath while wearing a hat with his hand on the Jewish Bible—the Five Books of Moses. A knighthood was conferred upon him during a visit to England in May 1875. Subsequently, Sir Julius Vogel can lay claim to being New Zealand’s first diplomat: he was appointed the colony’s overseas representative—the agent-general—to London in 1876, a position he held until 1880.

New Zealand has had another premier with Jewish origins. Abraham Hort’s third daughter, Margaret, married Sir Francis Dillon Bell, and one of their sons, Francis Henry Dillon Bell, became both mayor of Auckland and prime minister of New Zealand. His appointment in May 1925 to the highest position in the New Julius Vogel was New Zealand's only practicing Jewish prime minister.

(Alexander Turnbull Library/National Library of New Zealand)

Zealand government was the first time a New Zealand-born person had attained that position in what was then still a very new country, a nation of immigrants.

Other Jews have also held high elective office. The first mayor of Auckland (the country's largest city), Philip Phillips, was Jewish. In the 20th century, Sir Dove-Meyer Robinson served for many years as Auckland's mayor, while Wellington also had a Jew as its mayor, Ian Lawrence. In general, little attention is paid in New Zealand by either the public or the news media to the religious affiliations or practices of the country's politicians, either in local government or at the national level.

Many Jews have contributed to New Zealand's civic life in a variety of ways. Abraham Hort was involved in forming the Wellington Fire Brigade. His grandson, William Hort Levin, played the central role in establishing Wellington's Public Library, a major amenity to this day, as well as the city's harbour board. The town of Levin, north of Wellington, is named for him. The long-serving Wellington rabbi, Herman Van Staveren—the community's rabbi for more than 50 years—was regularly elected to the Wellington Hospital Board. Sir Michael Myers reached the highest post in the New Zealand judicial hierarchy, serving with distinction as the country's chief justice from 1929 to 1946, representing New Zealand, along with its prime minister, at the founding of the United Nations at the 1945 postwar conference in San Francisco. It is also relevant to note that these activities were complemented by congregational and community involvements, as Michael Myers also served as president of the Wellington Hebrew Congregation and president of the Wellington Jewish Social Club.

Important contributions to New Zealand's commercial life were also made by Jewish residents of the country. In international terms perhaps the most significant of these came from members of the Nathan family. The Nathan family, beginning with Joseph Edward Nathan (who arrived in New Zealand in 1856), established commercial activities that culminated in the creation of a product registered as Glaxo in 1906. Today, Glaxo is one of the largest pharmaceutical companies in the world. Joseph Edward Nathan (who was president of the Wellington Hebrew Congregation) served as president of Wellington's chamber of commerce, and other Jews likewise have held that position. Another company with an international reputation, Fisher and Paykel, manufacturers of various household appliances, was founded in 1934 by two New Zealand Jews, Woolf Fisher and Maurice Paykel.

New Zealand's Jews also supported moves to establish a Jewish homeland in the land of Israel, and some members of the community migrated there during the pre-state period. The only president of the State of Israel to visit New Zealand, Chaim Herzog, said during his 1986 visit that New Zealand Jewry had the highest rate of aliyah (migration to Israel) of any English-speaking country. The New Zealand government's stance toward Israel has been more equivocal, its attitude oscillating from warm support at the outset to a much more critical stance, reflecting, in part, New Zealand's dependence on oil and trade, which gives its relations with Arab nations an importance and sensitivity not matched by the country's relations with Israel. The Jewish community's decades-long support for Israel was reflected in its provision of funds to purchase a home for the Israeli ambassador in the early 1980s. The home was sold, however, when Israel downgraded its representation to New Zealand in 2002, reflecting both Israeli budgetary constraints and the cooling of relations between the two countries.

Contemporary Overview

The New Zealand Jewish community comprises about 6,000 people, principally located in two North Island urban areas, Wellington (the New Zealand capital) and Auckland (the country's largest city). The community includes religious institutions (both Orthodox and Progressive/Reform) and other communal facilities. There is relatively little anti-Semitism, although relations between New Zealand and Israel at times contribute to a degree of anxiety among some members of the Jewish community.

New Zealand's Jews are not strongly distinguished from New Zealand society. Most Jews are of Ashkenazic background, and a high proportion of native-born New Zealand Jews have their family origins in the United Kingdom. New Zealand's Jews face little if any overt discrimination and share the same broad interests as the rest of New Zealand society (including, for instance, a passion for the national game, rugby football). Few Jews in New Zealand are outwardly distinguishable from non-Jews (i.e., most Jewish men do not wear a yarmulke, or kipa, outside the synagogue). There is no resident Habad community and there are no yeshivas (Jewish seminaries) in New Zealand. There are also usually no Hasidim living in New Zealand (apart from occasional visits from overseas yeshiva students and the presence, in Auckland, of a Habad rabbi who had previously served as rabbi to the Wellington Hebrew Congregation).

Orthodox congregations are maintained in Auckland and Wellington, and substantial synagogue and communal facilities are available to the members. Each congregation offers kosher foods for its members through the operations of a kosher shop. Nearly all of the kosher food available in New Zealand is imported from other countries, principally Australia, Israel, and the United States. The Orthodox congregations in these two cities also run Jewish day schools that have educational and child care facilities beginning from preschool age up until high school. At the other end of the generational spectrum, facilities are also available for elderly members of the community, involving care for senior citizens (including the provision of kosher food). The Orthodox congregations also have a chevra kadisha (burial society), and there are Jewish sections in the municipal cemeteries in at least the largest cities.

Progressive (or Reform) congregations are well-established in both Auckland and Wellington. In New Zealand's South Island, there are smaller groups of Jews and, in general, the absence of sufficient numbers to provide more than a nominal network of activities. Jewish visitors to New Zealand increase the numbers available to take part in communal activities, however, and this is particularly the case in the South Island, which is especially attractive to tourists. For instance, the resort town of Queenstown, renowned for its ski fields and other scenic attractions, hosts a very large Passover Seder for the first night of the holiday, attended by many of the young Israelis enjoying a holiday there.

There is substantial assimilation among New Zealand's Jews, as the social and cultural barriers separating them from the largely secular (or only nominally Christian) non-Jewish population are very few. Although many may identify as Jews (in terms of background) there is a high proportion of noninvolved Jews in the country, particularly among the younger population. Many of the more actively committed young Jews of New Zealand leave the country to live a more satisfying Jewish life with like-minded people, migrating either to Israel or to the Jewish communities of Australia (principally Melbourne, Sydney, and Perth). There is also considerable migration to Australia among older Jews, and retirement communities of ex-New Zealanders are found along Australia's east coast (in the state of Queensland).

As with New Zealand generally, so, too, the country's Jews are to some extent dependent on support from the wider world. Organized New Zealand Jewry, always aware of the small numbers of congregants and community members, give support to would-be immigrants, providing advice, employment opportunities (if possible), and even financial support (if necessary, though within limits). As noted, much of the country's kosher food (including its beef) is imported from Australia. Often, for a berith (a circumcision), it is necessary to bring in a mohel (the person who performs the circumcision) for this commandment to be carried out correctly (that is, according to Jewish law). The country's rabbis are and always have been imports as well; whether Orthodox or Progressive, rabbinical appointees have had to be brought in from the United Kingdom, the United States, South Africa, and Israel.

The New Zealand Jewish community, although small, seeks to take a full part in international Jewish activities. In this the community resembles the country and its regime, seeking to play a role in world affairs larger than might be expected given its size and remote location. Both Orthodox and Progressive congregations maintain international linkages and affiliations. The Orthodox congregations, for instance, use rabbinical courts (beth din) in Australia when necessary, and consider themselves broadly subject to the authority of the chief rabbi of the commonwealth, situated in London.

The organized community is substantially pro-Israel, and Zionist organizations of various kinds (including the Women's International Zionist's Organization and a nationwide Zionist Federation) are an important part of New Zealand Jewry's communal framework. From pre-state times to the present the Jewish National Fund has been a part of New Zealand Jewish life, and blue boxes (for donations) are found in many homes and gifts of trees (to be planted in Israel) are an integral part of honoring people (both Jewish and non-Jewish) on special occasions.

The nationwide monthly Jewish newspaper, the New Zealand Jewish Chronicle, is published under the auspices of the Zionist Federation; it prints stories from and about Israel (as well as about local community functions and activities). Prayers for the State of Israel and the Israel Defense Forces are an accepted part of synagogue services. There may also be prayers for fallen Israeli soldiers as part of Yizkor (memorial) services. The Orthodox and Progressive Jewish communities often join together for commemorations of Israeli Independence Day (Yom Ha'atzmaut), attended by resident Israelis (who in many instances are not formally members of any congregation and frequently may be little involved in communal affairs). There are also communal commemorations of Yom Hashoah (Holocaust Remembrance Day) attended by Holocaust survivors (and their descendants) who live in New Zealand.

Congregations generally offer prayers for the government of New Zealand (and for the British royal family, whose head is also the New Zealand sovereign or head of state). The prayer with which the New Zealand Parliament opens its daily proceedings, however, is not inclusive of the country's Jewish population, as it is an overtly Christian prayer. A challenge to this prayer from a number of New Zealand Jews has taken the form of a petition calling for the language of the prayer to be revised. The petition is under consideration by a parliamentary committee.

There is, at present, no resident Israeli ambassador to New Zealand. After the 2005 New Zealand election the two governments agreed to reestablish an embassy in Wellington and the return of a resident ambassador is anticipated. The Muslim population of New Zealand has been growing, but thus far there has been little if any conflict between Muslim and Jewish communities. On the contrary, the two communities have at times offered mutual support in difficult circumstances and, more broadly, there is a commitment (among some communal leaders) to at least intermittent dialogue. There is also dialogue among some Christian and Jewish leaders, sustained through the existence of local and nationwide councils of Christians and Jews. A historic moment occurred in May 1995 when, on Jerusalem Day (Yom Yerushalayim), a silver medal from the State of Israel was presented to the Catholic Archbishop of New Zealand, Cardinal Thomas Williams, to commemorate the Vatican's recognition of the State of Israel, and at the same time serving as a token of appreciation for the friendship between New Zealand's Catholic and Jewish populations.

New Zealand's Jews currently play little role in the country's politics. No major city has a Jewish mayor, and there are presently no Jewish members of Parliament.

There are, however, Jewish participants in New Zealand cultural activities, including members of the national orchestra. Jews are also among the scholars at the country's universities. From time to time the Jewish communities devote themselves to Jewish cultural and scholarly activities, inviting overseas speakers and artists and organizing concerts, lecture programs, film series, and other such functions. There are also distinctive programs for young people, including holiday camps and youth groups (such as Bnei Akiva and Habonim) as well as study/experience programs (ranging from a few weeks to an entire year) in Israel. These programs attract Jewish participants across the entire country and from all sectors, including Orthodox, Progressive, nonaffiliated, and Israeli. There are also Jewish youth groups at New Zealand's universities.

The Jewish community is represented as a whole by the New Zealand Jewish Council, formed to represent and defend all of the country's Jewry in the public arena. In addition, regional councils in Wellington and Auckland (and, at times, in the South Island city of Christchurch) try to respond to locally based problems (such as anti-Israel or anti-Jewish letters to the editor).

In 2004, desecrations of Jewish cemeteries in Wellington led to a parliamentary resolution, unanimously passed, deploring the incidents and denouncing anti-Semitism. At other times Jews have complained of anti-Semitism on radio talk programs as well as statements showing a lack of understanding of the events of the Holocaust. A newspaper cartoon that criticized the 2006 war in Lebanon by showing a desecrated Torah scroll aroused particularly strong feeling.

Selected Bibliography

- Beaglehole, Ann. 1986. A Small Price to Pay: Refugees from Hitler in New Zealand, 1936–1946. Wellington, New Zealand: Allen and Unwin.
- Gluckman, Ann, and Laurie Gluckman, eds. 1990, 1993. Identity and Involvement: Auckland Jewry, Past and Present. 2 vols. Palmerston North, New Zealand: Dunmore Press.
- Goldman, Lazarus Morris. 1958. The History of the Jews in New Zealand. Wellington, New Zealand: A. H. and A. W. Reed.
- Levine, Stephen, ed. 1995. A Standard for the People: The 150th Anniversary of the Wellington Hebrew Congregation, 1843–1993. Christchurch, New Zealand: Hazard Press.
- Levine, Stephen. 1999. The New Zealand Jewish Community. Lanham, MD: Lexington Books.
- Levine, Stephen. 2007. "Jews" Te Ara: the Encyclopedia of New Zealand. <http://www.TeAra.govt.nz/NewZealanders/NewZealandPeoples/Jews/en> (accessed May 7, 2007).
- Weiss, Mara. 2008. The Jewish Virtual History Tour: New Zealand. http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/vjw/New\_Zealand.html (accessed May 7, 2007).
- Wittman, Livia. 1998. Interactive Identities: Jewish Women in New Zealand. Palmerston North, New Zealand: Dunmore Press.

Contributions of Jewish Individuals in New Zealand: 1840s to the Present

Leonard Bell

---

The numbers of people officially identified as Jewish living in New Zealand has always been small: 61 in 1848, 326 in 1861, 1,611 in 1901 (when the population of New Zealand was about a million), 3,611 in 1951 (of a total population of about 2 million), 6,636 in 2001 (of a total population of about 4 million), to about 8,500 in the 2006 census—so small, actually and relatively, that non-New Zealanders have expressed surprise on learning there are any Jews in the country at all. Yet Jews have contributed to and affected New Zealand society and culture in politics, the professions and commerce, education, the arts, and public or civic service, both in the past and present and out of all proportion to their numbers. A recent book on the makers of New Zealand, though, included just one person of Jewish birth, Julius Vogel, in its list of the supposedly top 100 personages in New Zealand history, and he was not identified as Jewish.

Julius Vogel (1835–1899) was a journalist and newspaper editor before becoming one of the most important and influential parliamentarians; he served as treasurer and then prime minister in 1869–1876, a crucial period of colonization in which immigration was boosted and huge investment was made in public infrastructure, for which Vogel was primarily responsible. Other publically prominent politicians, whether in national, city, or local government, include Samuel Shrimski (1828–1902), Arthur Myers (1867–1926), Mark Silverstone (1883–1951), Ernest Davis (1872–1962), and Dove-Meyer Robinson (1901–1989). Shrimski, sometime mayor of Omaru, a member of Parliament from 1876, and a member of Legislative Council is best remembered for his educational and human rights concerns—for instance, he vigorously opposed compulsory religious instruction (effectively meaning Christian instruction) in state-funded schools and passionately defending the human rights of Chinese fellow residents in a racist political climate. Myers, also a prominent businessman, was an innovative and highly regarded mayor of Auckland, the largest city in New Zealand, from 1905 to 1909, and then a member of Parliament and sometime cabinet minister, including finance minister, from 1910 to 1921. Auckland has had four other Jewish mayors: Philip Aaron Phillips (1871–1874), Ernest Davis (1935–1941), Colin Kay (1980–1983), and, most notably and often controversially, the longest-serving Dove-Meyer Robinson (1959–1965 and 1968–1980). Popularly known as “Robbie,” he was a colorful, politically independent character, prescient and far-sighted in environmental matters, most notably in measures protecting the city’s stunning harbors from sewerage contamination. Davis, another “man of the people,” made a big mark, as a brewery tycoon, a philanthropist in diverse local affairs, and an early and influential supporter of the emerging Labour Party. Jews featured prominently in developing the labour movement and the Labour Party in the early 20th century. For instance, Mark Silverstone, who initially advocated revolutionary socialism, in fact worked to unify the labour movement across the “left” spectrum. A promoter and teacher of worker’s education, the economically astute Silverstone was appointed to the board of directors of the Reserve Bank when Labour first won the government in 1935.

If anything linked these politically diverse people it was their good citizenship. Numerous Jews have been particularly active in local government, civic service, and public philanthropy. For example, Lulah Baume (1871–1934) promoted public education for all, was involved in women’s and children’s rights organizations, and advanced women’s participation in national and local politics. These activists were motivated by their sense of right rather than party affiliation. Another pioneering women’s rights advocate was Ethel Benjamin (1875–1943), New Zealand’s first woman lawyer and the first (1897) to appear as counsel in any case in the British Empire. The legal profession has had many prominent Jews, including two chief justices: Michael Myers (1873–1950), who served from 1929 to 1946, also had a major role in framing the constitution of the International Court of Justice, and Thomas Eichelbaum (born 1931), who served from 1989 to 1999.

There were also prominent Jews in the field of medicine. For instance, Louis Barnett (1865–1946), who was the first New Zealander to become a member of the Royal College of Surgeons, was an eminent surgeon and long-time professor of surgery at Otago University. Peter Gluckman (b.1949), founder and director of the Liggins Institute at the University of Auckland, is one of the world’s leading medical researchers, notably in fetal development and brain cell activity.

Influential Jewish academics would be too numerous to list. The historian Peter Munz (1922–2006) and the Marxist-informed economist, Wolfgang Rosenberg (1915–2004), founder of the radical political periodical, The New Zealand Monthly Review, were both refugees from Nazism and were both influential and at times provocative, inside and outside academia. The most famous internationally would be the philosopher Karl Popper (1902–1994), another refugee. He lived in New Zealand from 1937 to 1945 where his impact was enormous, and where he wrote his most influential book, The Open Society and its Enemies (1945). Other major writers include the poet Charles Brasch (1909–1973), who founded Landfall, still the most important literary periodical in New Zealand, in 1947 and remained its editor until 1966. In addition, Karl Wolfskehl (1869–1948) spent the last 10 years of his life in Auckland, where, continuing to write in German, he produced three major poem cycles as well as individual poems, published as Sang aus dem Exil [Songs from Exile] in 1950.

In the visual arts, the most renowned figures have been in the fields of photography, architecture, and film. Frank Hofmann (1916–1989) introduced the ideas and practices of Central European modernist “New Photography” to New Zealand, while Marti Friedlander (born 1928) is still highly productive and has garnered increasing international recognition. Frederick Newman (1900–1964), who had worked in Austria, France, and the Soviet Union before World War II, is best known as the architect of many of New Zealand’s postwar hydroelectric power stations, the largest manmade structures in the country then. Henry Kulka (1909–1971), long-time architect for Fletchers, the biggest housing construction company then, and designer (privately) of many superb domestic dwellings, had been the closest associate in Austria of Adolf Loos, the preeminent Central European modernist architect and polemicist.

The major personalities of Jewish descent in film would include the director Vincent Ward (born 1956), who has worked in Hollywood as well as in Australasia and whose mother was a refugee from Germany. In addition, the producer (also president of the Auckland Hebrew Congregation) John Barnett (born 1945) has been a most influential figure in film and television over the past 25 years as a founder of South Pacific Pictures, the owner of the country's largest film and television production company, the producer of a succession of award-winning and financially highly successful movies (including Whale Rider), and promoter of New Zealand film globally.

New Zealand music was transformed by Jewish refugees from Nazism, including the composer Georg Tintner (1917–1999). In addition, Frederick Turnovsky (1916–1994) founded a number of chamber music societies beginning in 1950, was a founding member of the New Zealand Opera Company in 1953 and the Arts Advisory Council in 1960, and was a promoter and benefactor of the arts generally. The latter was facilitated by his successes as a manufacturer (of leather goods) and a businessman (he was the first New Zealander to become a member of Lloyds). His commercial acumen led to his leadership roles in the Manufacturers Federation and various national development entities, culminating in his chairmanship of the state's Development Finance Corporation from 1973 to 1976.

Of the many successful and publicly prominent businessman and merchants it is sufficient to note just a few of the most prominent. David Nathan (1816–1886) was an early settler in Auckland and founder of what became a family business dynasty. Bendix Hallenstein (1835–1905), a pioneer clothing manufacturer in Dunedin and founder of the still-operating nationwide clothing chain, Hallensteins, was also an enlightened employer and was politically active, locally and nationally. Woolf Fisher (1912–1975), with Maurice Paykel (1916–2002), created in 1934 the now internationally well-known Fisher and Paykel, manufacturers of washing machines, refrigerators, and other electrical goods, including the world's first dishwasher geared to kosher requirements. Nathan and Fisher, like Turnovsky and the other prominent Jewish businessmen listed here, were public benefactors, believing that those with the financial means should assist socially beneficial causes.

The historically most important rabbis, who were also significantly involved and well-known in the wider society, were Hermann van Staveren (1849–1930), head of Wellington's Orthodox congregation from 1878 to 1930, and otherwise engaged in various hospital and charitable boards, and Alexander Astor (1900–1988), Auckland's Orthodox leader from 1931 to 1971, who was active in societies addressing the welfare of women and children, the disabled, and the disadvantaged. In these respects, Lesley Max (born 1945) is an important and influential figure in New Zealand now. She directs the Pacific Foundation for Health, Education, and Parent Support, geared primarily to assisting and mentoring disadvantaged children so that they can realize their potential; a dedication that she links directly to the Jewish tradition of justice for all.

The question of who is, or can be, regarded as Jewish is problematic. For instance, Francis Henry Dillon Bell (1851–1936) was one of the most dominant and multitalented men in the country's public life: prominent lawyer; founder of the Colonial Law Journal; Wellington's mayor in the 1890s; sometime chief justice; member of Parliament; cabinet minister; and acting prime minister in 1921, 1923–1924, and in 1925, before becoming, briefly, the first New Zealand-born prime minister. He had a Quaker father and a Jewish mother who had disconnected from Judaism, yet his Jewish lineage was known and regarded as important for his social being. And the present National Party "shadow" finance minister and leader of his party, John Key (born 1961), though reportedly christened in the Anglican Church, had a Jewish mother, Ruth Lazar, who was a refugee from Nazism as a teenager.

Selected Bibliography

- Bade, James, ed. 1998. Out of the Shadow of War: The German Connection with New Zealand in the Twentieth Century. Melbourne, Australia: Oxford University Press.
- Dalziel, Raewyn. 1986. Julius Vogel: Business Politician. Auckland, New Zealand: Auckland University Press & Oxford University Press.
- Dictionary of New Zealand Biography*. 1990–2000. 5 vols. Wellington, New Zealand: Department of Internal Affairs.
- Goldman, Lazarus Morris. 1957. The History of the Jews in New Zealand. Wellington, New Zealand: A.H. & A.W. Reed.
- Kerr, Donald, ed. 2003. Enduring Legacy: Charles Brasch, Patron, Poet & Collector. Dunedin, New Zealand: University of Otago Press.
- Max, Lesley. 1990. Children: An Endangered Species? How the Needs of New Zealand Children Are Being Neglected: A Call for Action. Auckland, New Zealand: Penguin.
- Turnovsky, Fred. 1990. Turnovsky: Fifty Years in New Zealand. Wellington, New Zealand: Allen & Unwin.

North America

Jews in North America

M. Avrum Ehrlich

---

General Population: United States, 282,125,000; Canada, 32,813,544

Percent of Population: United States, 2.2 percent (6,155,000 people); Canada, 1.2 percent (393,660 people)

Jewish Population by State/Province: United States: Alabama, 9,000; Alaska, 3,400; Arizona, 81,500; Arkansas, 1,700; California, 999,000; Colorado, 73,000; Connecticut, 111,000; Delaware, 13,500; District of Columbia, 25,500; Florida, 620,000; Georgia, 93,500; Hawaii, 7,000; Idaho, 1,100; Illinois, 270,000; Indiana, 17,500; Iowa, 6,100; Kansas, 14,000; Kentucky, 11,500; Louisiana, 16,000; Maine, 9,300; Maryland, 213,000; Massachusetts, 275,000; Michigan, 110,000; Minnesota, 42,000; Mississippi, 1,500; Missouri, 62,500; Montana, 800; Nebraska, 7,000; Nevada, 77,000; New Hampshire, 10,000; New Jersey, 485,000; New Mexico, 11,500; New York, 1,657,000; North Carolina, 26,500; North Dakota, 450; Ohio, 149,000; Oklahoma, 5,000; Oregon, 32,000; Pennsylvania, 282,000; Rhode Island, 16,000; South Carolina, 11,500; South Dakota, 300; Tennessee, 18,000; Texas, 131,000; Utah, 4,500; Vermont, 5,500; Virginia, 66,000; Washington, 43,000; West Virginia, 2,300; Wisconsin, 28,000; Wyoming, 400. Canada: Newfoundland and Labrador, 140; Prince Edward Island, 55; Nova Scotia, 2,120; New Brunswick, 670; Quebec, 89,915; Ontario, 190,795; Manitoba, 13,040; Saskatchewan, 865; Alberta, 11,085; British Columbia, 21,230; Yukon Territory, 35; Northwest Territories, 25

---

As Eastern Europe became too inhospitable to Jews, the waves of immigration to North America increased and Jewish people and culture, born and nurtured in several unique circumstances was relocated to new shores. These Jews met other earlier waves of Portuguese and Spanish Jewish migrants and fused to create a new Jewish identity, singular to North America. This relocation and transformation is a remarkable story. North America's Jews are going through what will likely be considered a golden age. More remarkable is that the North American experience is not unique; it was one of many such relocations and blossoming having taken place in Jewish history. An ominous question could be asked: When or if Jewish life in America fades, as it has in other countries, what migration and relocation routes are available? This possibility lurking under the surface may be a factor in Jewish people's attitudes toward Israel and other regions of the world.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

The blossoming of North American Jewry has taken place on a number of levels. Most important are the attainments of individuals who are of the Jewish faith or ethnicity in business or intellectual endeavors. Whatever may be attributed to the achievements in sciences, arts, literature, cinematography, computing, industry, and trade, it is without question an outstanding expression of Jewish peoplehood. Other achievements may be attributed to national-level and community-level

Jewish organizations and cooperation and still others to the political influence of the American Jewish lobby.

The achievements of the Jewish community in North America have become symbols throughout North American popular culture. Jewish directors and producers have dominated the film industry, large Jewish corporations are perhaps known as the engines driving society's economic situation, and so on. The freedom for North American Jews to declare their Jewishness and to observe Jewish custom and religion has created in North American society one of the most successful chapters in the history of the Jewish Diaspora. At the same time, some may wonder if the Jews in North America have led such successful lives as a result of embracing Jewish heritage, or succumbing to a basically national desire to live the American dream.

Nevertheless, Jewish contributions to North American culture are great. Perhaps some of the strength lies in the power of the numerous U.S. and Canadian Jewish organizations that are located throughout North America and represent powerful, accountable, and organized bodies that maintain a primary focus on the concerns of North American Jews. In North America, there are approximately 5,300 such organizations and committees. In spite of this, internal community involvement in North American society is often at the expense of cultural and social interaction in general society.

Present Economic Conditions

Jews in North America generally represent a wealthy class of citizens, a class that has reached the upper echelons of society. North American Jews are well educated, active members of society. They hold positions in government and business and are powerful and influential. Although, presently it seems not to be the case, in previous decades in the United States and Canada, Jewish philanthropic organizations have been important in developing educational, cultural, and religious programs and science and technology businesses, and they have been active across a host of other disciplines and industries. However, with heightened global economic tensions and numerous other factors philanthropic organizations may not feel confident about their previous level of philanthropic involvement. The rising cost of living and the costs of providing community activities and education, which are vital to the continued success and strength of the community is very high, and although groups like the United Jewish Communities have been successful in raising amounts as high as $860 million to provide such services, costs may be a burden for many.

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

In Canada, Jewish education is widespread. Around 90 percent of Jewish children in Canada receive a Jewish education, either through a Jewish day school, a yeshiva day school, or a supplementary Jewish education program. Enrollment is lowest among Conservative, Reform, and nondenominationally affiliated Jews. Orthodox Jews represent the largest group active in Jewish education and religious activity. As many as 100 percent of Orthodox Jews in America have received some Jewish education, and up to 99 percent are involved in yeshiva day schools. Informal Jewish education in North America is a focus of the Jewish community, and activities such as summer camps, youth groups, and trips to Israel provide a group-oriented approach to learning about the Jewish heritage. At the same time, funding issues limit the scope of programs offered, and difficulties recruiting qualified educators have become a major cause of the shrinking size of the Jewish community in North America.

Active organizations exist, such as the Coalition for the Advancement in Jewish Education, the Jewish Education Service of North America, and the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education, although their level of impact on the problems continually facing the community may not be clear, they have been established within the past 15 years to address what is deemed a crisis in Jewish education.

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionism, and Existential Problems within the Community

North America's Jews seem to share a strong connection with Israel, but at the same time many now believe anti-Semitism in North America is disguised as anti-Israelism. North American Jews have a strong perception of anti-Semitism, although there are fewer reports of real experiences with anti-Semitism than in many other countries. In any case, anti-Semitic activity is on the rise in North America. In the United States, anti-Semitic incidents have tripled, and in Canada, incidents seem to be rising at 3 percent a year. Several different factors and groups are mainly responsible: neo-Nazi activity, hate campaigns by other hate groups on the extreme Right, the growing support for Islamic fundamentalist activity, and the sentiments of anti-Israelism.

Jews in Canada

Avi Goldberg, Randal F. Schnoor, and Morton Weinfeld

---

General Population: 30,007,094

Jewish Population: 329,995 (by religion), 348,605 (by ethnic origin)

Percent of Population: Approximately 1.1 percent

Jewish Population by City: Toronto, 179,100; Montreal, 92,975; Vancouver, 22,590; Winnipeg, 14,790; Ottawa, 13,445; Calgary, 7,950; Edmonton, 4,920

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: The Jewish population is represented by British immigrants in mid-1700s; Russian, Polish, and Romanian immigrants in late 1800s; European Holocaust survivors in the late 1940s; North African immigrants (primarily from Morocco) in 1950s; Soviet/Russian, Israeli, and South African immigrants in the 1970s and 1980s; and Russian, Ethiopian, and Latin American immigrants in the 1990s and 2000s.

Languages Spoken: English, French, Hebrew, Yiddish, Russian, Spanish

---

Historical Overview

1608 Samuel de Champlain founds the French colony of New France, located in what is now the Quebec region of Canada.

- 1760 After the British gain control of Montreal, a small Jewish population surfaces in the area. Several prominent Jews are members of the British military at this time: Emmanuel de Cordova, Aaron Hart, Hananiel Garcia, and Isaac Miramer.
- 1768 Canada's first synagogue, Shearith Israel, is built in Montreal. The Jewish population numbers only around 200.
- 1840s Jews from Western and Central Europe establish small communities in Hamilton, Kingston, and Toronto.
- 1847 Abraham de Sola arrives in Montreal to serve as the city's spiritual leader, a position he holds with prominence for 35 years.
- 1850s The gold rush on the West Coast brings small numbers of Jewish traders, merchants, and wholesalers to British Columbia.
- 1862 Congregation Emanu-El is completed in Victoria, British Columbia. It is the oldest synagogue in continuous operation in Canada and has been established as a Canadian Heritage Site.
- 1870s The Canadian Jewish population exceeds 1000. Jews live primarily in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.
- 1880–1900 Canada receives approximately 10,000 Jewish immigrants. Sizable numbers of Russians, Poles, and Romanians bring a distinctively Eastern European flavor to the growing community.
- 1890s A number of anti-Semitic articles are published during the Dreyfus Affair in Montreal's French-language La Vérité and English-language True Witness and Daily Chronicle newspapers.
- Early 1900s Daily Yiddish newspapers make their appearance in all three major Canadian cities: Montreal's Keneder Adler, Toronto's Yiddisher Zhurnal, and Winnipeg's Dos Yiddishe Vort.
- 1900–1910 In this period, 52,000 Jewish immigrants enter the country. Most are from Russia and Eastern Europe. The settlement is concentrated in the larger metropolitan areas, such as Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Ottawa, and Vancouver.
- 1919 The Canadian Jewish Congress is founded to serve as a voice for the growing Jewish population.
- 1922 Canada's Jewish Immigrant Aid Society is founded.
- 1930s The Canadian Government imposes severe restrictions on immigration, refusing entry of any Jewish refugees fleeing Nazism in Europe.
- Late 1940s The Canadian government liberalizes its immigration policy. Approximately 40,000 Holocaust survivors immigrate to Canada, settling primarily in Montreal.
- Late 1950s North African Jews immigrate to Montreal and Quebec City where they have the advantage of speaking the French language. The 1956 Hungarian uprising brings about the emigration of approximately 4,000 Jews to Toronto.
- 1970 Bora Laskin becomes the first Jew appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada.
- 1970s and 1980s Soviet/ Russian, South African, and Israeli Jews begin to arrive in Canada in significant numbers. Because of political instability in Quebec, several thousand Jews move from Montreal to Toronto.

- 1984 James Keegstra, a high school teacher in Alberta, is charged under the Canadian anti-hate law with unlawfully promoting anti-Semitism.
- December 12, 2003 Irwin Cotler is appointed minister of justice and attorney general of Canada.
- January 2004 The Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy is founded.
- March 19–21, 2004 A weekend-long rash of anti-Semitic vandalism is perpetrated on a Toronto Jewish cemetery, a Jewish school, and a number of area synagogues.
- April 4, 2004 A Jewish school in the Saint-Laurent neighborhood of Montreal is set on fire by an arsonist.
- March 1, 2006 Marshall Rothstein is appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Contemporary Overview

Industries, Trades, and Professions

Canada's economy is strong and Canadian Jews are disproportionately employed across, and influential within, the full spectrum of professional, business, and human service sectors. Jewish professional success flows from high levels of postsecondary education relative to the Canadian average, and from sustainable subeconomies built on commercial interaction between predominantly Jewish industries and clients. Whereas Jews were historically excluded from Canada's wealthiest economic and social circles, the 21st-century Canadian economy counts Jewish chief executive officers among its top companies. Demonstrating the success of Canada's Jews in entering Canada's contemporary economic elite, 20 percent of individuals appearing on a list of the wealthiest Canadians in 2000 were Jewish.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Jews contribute to culture in their own communities by holding annual Jewish music, film, and food festivals; by producing Jewish theater and art; and by publishing Jewish periodicals in multiple languages. Beyond the community, Jews influence Canadian culture through individual artists whose work, at times, has expressed a Jewish sensibility. Prominent Jewish authors and poets, such as Leonard Cohen, Matt Cohen, Anne Michaels, and Naim Kattan, produce work that is critically acclaimed within Canadian cultural communities.

Jews are well-represented in Canadian universities in the sciences, social sciences, and humanities and have also been instrumental in developing Canada's entertainment and media industries. Names like the Asper family of CanWest Global, Garth Drabinsky, Harold Greenberg of Astral, Robert Lantos of Alliance Atlantis, Moses Znaimer, and film director David Cronenberg, among others, have made innovative contributions to Canadian television, theater, and film production.

Religious Denominations

Canadian Jews belong to synagogues affiliated with the Orthodox, Conservative, Reform, and Reconstruction movements. Though 11 percent of all Jews in 2001 called themselves secular or atheist, many of these still engaged in practices such as fasting on Yom Kippur or hosting a Passover seder. Across all categories of Jewish identification, ritual observance is significantly higher among Jews in Canada than among those in the United States.

Although ultra-Orthodox communities thrive in Montreal and Toronto, Jews in Vancouver, Edmonton, and Toronto can also join synagogues that offer a traditional-egalitarian religious space. Hybrid synagogues like Or Shalom in Vancouver and the First Narayever in Toronto have grappled directly with the challenges of integrating nontraditional Jewish families (same-sex and intermarried couples) into their minyanim.

Jewish Education and Communal Institutions

Jewish education systems are well-attended across Canada, and a variety of institutions coexist within many Canadian Jewish communities. Religious and cultural orientations of Canada's Jewish schools include Yiddishist, Zionist, Hasidic, and Modern Orthodox. Illustrating the connection between Canadian Jews and Jewish education, it was estimated that 90 percent of Jewish children in Toronto in 1990 had received some form of Jewish education.

Jews in Canada are represented by a professionalized national network of communal organizations, with the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) standing as the leading Jewish organization in Canada. The CJC has a loose regional structure and holds triennial conventions and elections in which regional constituent organizations participate. B'nai Brith, a national fraternal organization made up of individual lodges, has challenged the CJC's jurisdiction by aggressively petitioning the Canadian government on matters relating to anti-Semitism and human rights. The Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy works to increase the level of nonpartisan professional advocacy for Israel and for other Jewish causes directed toward the Canadian government and media.

The bulk of Jewish communal organization takes place at the local level. In Canadian cities, welfare federations are responsible for collecting general communal funds and disbursing them to a variety of service, social, cultural, and recreational agencies. Federations are run by volunteer lay boards and professional staff, and involvement in communal governance yields status and influence within the community.

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionism, and Existential Problems of the Community

Canada's criminal code and constitution set "reasonable limits" to speech that willfully promotes hatred against identifiable groups, and early in the 21st century, many studies of Canadian attitudes demonstrate declining levels of negative attitudes toward Jews. Despite the existence of empirical data to the contrary, Canadian Jews still report feeling anti-Semitism in their country. In a 2003 survey, about 30 percent of respondents reported that they had experienced actual anti-Semitism in public places in the previous three years.

Reflecting global political developments, the new battleground for anti-Semitism in Canada centers on the Middle East, as Jews in Canada have wondered whether criticism of the State of Israel has become a “respectable” way for non-Jews to engage in an anti-Jewish discourse. In 2003, 30 percent of Canadians expressed sympathy for Israel, 20 percent for the Palestinians, and 47 percent did not know. These data conform to a decades-long shift away from higher support for Israel within the general Canadian populace.

University campuses have been the site at which many of the Jewish community’s concerns have played out. At York University in Toronto and Concordia University in Montreal, student organizations that promote Palestinian human rights have verbally clashed with Jewish student organizations and have drawn international headlines with protest tactics and messages that have blurred the line between criticism of Israeli government policy and the denial of the legitimacy of the Jewish state. Most Jews in Canada interpret these events as new forms of anti-Semitism in consequence if not in motivation.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

Canada’s Jewish communities maintain a comfortable balance between ethnic particularism and full participation in the wider society. Assimilation remains a concern for Jewish community leaders, but intermarriage rates are less prevalent among Jews in than among other ethnic groups. With higher rates of individuals over the age of 65 than in the overall Canadian average, an aging population challenges assimilation as a top demographic concern for Jewish communities. The social service needs of rapidly aging populations in Winnipeg and Montreal are putting increasing pressure on Jewish leaders and organizations to respond.

Internal Jewish migration has established Toronto as the Jewish city in Canada. The declining Jewish population in Montreal, due to the ebbs and flows of the nationalist movement in Quebec, has been a bitter pill for community leaders to swallow, leaving them searching existentially and practically for ways to ensure a confident future for Jews in the city that historically symbolized the center of Canadian Jewish life. Although Toronto’s Jewish community is vibrant, it is conceivable that the shifting of political and economic energy to western Canada, which is occurring in the wider Canadian society, will find its equivalent within the Jewish geographic landscape as well.

Selected Bibliography

- Abella, Irving, and Harold Troper. 2000. None is Too Many: Canada and the Jews of Europe, 1933–1948. 3rd ed. Toronto: Key Porter.
- Klein, Ruth, and Frank Dimant, eds. 2001. From Immigration to Integration. The Canadian Jewish Experience: A Millenium Edition. Toronto: Institute for International Affairs, B’nai Brith Canada.
- Menkis, Richard, and Norman Ravvin, eds. 2004. The Canadian Jewish Studies Reader. Calgary, Alberta, Canada: Red Deer Press.
- Tulchinsky, Gerald. 1992. Taking Root: The Origins of the Canadian Jewish Community. Toronto: Lester.
- Tulchinsky, Gerald. 1998. Branching Out: The Transformation of the Canadian Jewish Community. Toronto: Stoddart.
- Weinfeld, Morton. 2001. Like Everyone Else . . . But Different: The Paradoxical Success of Canadian Jews. Toronto: McClelland Stewart.

Judeo-Portuguese in the Anglo-American Colonies

Joseph Abraham Levi

---

The year 1954 marked the tricentenary of Jewish presence on North America soil. During the first half of the 17th century, there were reportedly 12 Jews residing in the Dutch, British, and French colonies of North America as well as the crypto-Jews (Marranos) of the Spanish provinces of Florida and New Mexico.

Aside from a short English occupation (1763–1783), Florida belonged to Spain between 1513 and 1819, when it was finally ceded to the United States. New Mexico belonged to the Mexican territory under Spanish rule. With the independence of Mexico in 1821, New Mexico became part of the new Mexican state until the United States seized the territory after the Mexican War (1846–1848). Later, with the Gadsen Purchase (1853–1859), the United States bought the area for $10 million.

When the first Jews arrived in the Dutch colony of New Amsterdam in 1654, the number of Europeans living along the Atlantic coast, from present-day Maine to Florida, was still very small: almost 75,000. New Amsterdam was founded in 1626 by the West India Company, which had many Jewish stockholders who were particularly involved in the financial and administrative sector of the company. In 1654, New Amsterdam, which was famous for being an important center of fur trade and for the easy accessibility of its harbor, had almost 8,000 inhabitants.

Despite the fact that the island was under Dutch possession, most of the inhabitants of New Amsterdam were British citizens. The theocratic colonies to the north of New Amsterdam, including Plymouth and Massachusetts Bay, where Protestantism was the norm, had no Jewish residents. The future state of Connecticut, for example, did not receive its first contingent of Jews in 1635.

Generally speaking, Jewish presence in the Anglo-American colonies can be divided into four phases of immigration: (1) the Iberian, that is, the Sephardic communities of the Portuguese and Spanish Diasporas; (2) the Ashkenazi of German language and culture; (3) the Ashkenazi of the Slavic-Romanian/Moldavian and/or Hungarian areas; and (4) the Judeo-American, which began in 1921 and ended in with the conclusion of World War II.

The first phase, the Iberian, covering almost two centuries (ca. 1654–1840) and is also seen as the rise and decline of Sephardic Jewry. In fact, one of the major differences between the North American diasporic communities and their counterparts in the Caribbean and South America rests on the fact that the latter two were completely dominated by the Sephardim—and there was only a small Ashkenazi presence. In contrast, although nearly all were of Sephardic origin, the Jews of the North American colonies eventually saw their supremacy threatened by the Ashkenazim who, starting from the middle of the 19th century, became the uncontested leaders of the North American arena, a position they have retained to this day. Incidentally, concrete evidence points to the fact that since their arrival on American soil, most of the Ashkenazi discriminated against the Sephardim—as well as any other Jewish branch different from the Ashkenazi—considering them inferior and, very often, as if they were not Jewish at all.

The first period can further be divided into two phases: the colonial period (1654–1776)—which can also be subdivided in the Dutch period (1654–1664) and the English period (1664–1776)—and the first national period (1776–1884). The Dutch period (1654–1664), witnessed the first presence of Jews of the Diaspora on North American soil. During the Dutch period, the Sephardic community was the model of Judaism in the Dutch colony, and this model was also adopted by the Ashkenazi. The English period starts with the British occupation and ends with the Declaration of Independence in 1776. Already, during the first decades of the 18th century, the ethnic component of the North American Jews will see some changes: from now on it will be Ashkenazi, first of German language and culture, and then Slavic, Baltic, Romanian/Moldavian, and/or Hungarian. However, the Sephardic rite—be it Portuguese, Spanish, or Ladino (Judeo-Portuguese and/or Judeo-Spanish)—at least until the middle of the 19th century, will remain the norm for many New York synagogues, thus becoming the pillar of local Jewish communities.

The second phase, the Ashkenazi of German origin, which starts in 1841 and ends in 1920, is also known as the rise and dominance of the German Jew. The Napoleonic wars in Europe (1804–1814) prompted massive immigrations of German Ashkenazim to the United States. Already in 1825 the German Ashkenazi separated from the Shearit Israel of New York and formed the B'nai Jerusalem, the first congregation of Ashkenazi rite of the city, thus becoming the center for the Jewish community of German language during the entire 19th century.

The third phase is almost concomitant with the second period, lasting for more than half a century (ca. 1852–1920). It saw the rise to power of the Ashkenazim of Slavic, Baltic, Romanian/Moldavian, and/or Hungarian origin, followed by their political decline.

The first contacts of Holland with North America date back to 1609 when the United Company of the East Indies gave the English captain Henry Hudson the task of finding a route to Asia through the polar seas. Departing from Texel, Holland, Hudson arrived in North America in 1611 where he encountered the river that later bore his name. The following year, sponsored by the English, Hudson reached the straight and bay of Hudson; hence, the English claimed the area as theirs.

Hudson's accounts, particularly his commentaries on the possibility of establishing a lucrative fur trade in this area, piqued the attention of 13 Dutch businessmen, who soon received a royal decree granting them full commercial rights over New Amsterdam, which at this time was made up of New Amsterdam proper and would soon become the headquarters for all operations, as well as present-day New England and eastern Canada. Fort Nassau, New Amsterdam, built in 1614, was the second permanent European colony in North America. Jamestown, Virginia, founded in 1607 by John Smith (ca. 1580–1631) and other English settlers sponsored by the London Company, was the first.

Many of the shareholders of the company were Jews, and it is mainly thanks to their financial support that Holland succeeded in maintaining this small colony in North America. For nine years the Dutch continued their fur trade with the indigenous populations, thus increasing the company's profits. In 1621, the peninsula of Manhattan was bought for 60 Dutch florins. In 1625, another fort was built in Manhattan, Amsterdam. To avoid confusions, the city next to it was therefore named New Amsterdam. During the next 20 years, this little hamlet would grow into a full-blown colonial settlement with more than 2,000 inhabitants. In 1664, 15,000 people lived in the capital. In the same year, however, England took over the entire Dutch colony. In exchange Holland received Suriname on April 15, 1668, which had already been in Dutch hands since 1657. Obviously, the Dutch were more interested in the revenues from the sugar plantations and the incipient transatlantic slave trade than in a small, though lucrative, European colony in North America. Religiously speaking, New York soon became the pattern of the new nation: a confluence of peoples and religions coexisting in the name of freedom from any kind of oppression.

Many scholars who used to believe, and some still believe, more than 5,000 Jews lived in Brazil during the time of Dutch occupation (1637–1644). According to the Portuguese historian Luís de Meneses, third Count of Ericeira (1632–1690), who, in his História de Portugal Restaurado (History of Restored Portugal, 1679), gives as one of the major reasons for Recife falling so easily into Portuguese hands the fact that the Jews, for fear of losing their capital, implored the Dutch to surrender to the Portuguese. Meneses thus pointed at the “cowardliness” of the Jewish people, always ready to defend their own interests, at the cost of the entire population.

Obviously, the reasons for the total subjugation of the Dutch to the Portuguese forces are many. Since December 20, 1653, a Portuguese fleet had been anchored along the coast of Recife and the city was also surrounded by the Portuguese army. Furthermore, thanks to the Anglo-Dutch Wars (1652–1654), the Dutch lacked all mechanisms of defense. On January 15, 1654, protected by the Portuguese navy, the Governor of Pernambuco, Francisco Barreto de Menezes, decided to attack the Dutch fortifications along the coast. In a few days the forts of Altenar, Amélia, Cinco Ponto, and Rego fell into Portuguese hands.

Among the terms of the Dutch capitulation—signed on January 26, 1654—Artigo 4 guaranteed the settlers now residing in Portuguese land full equality, as if they were Portuguese subjects. As for their religion, they had to be treated as any foreigner living in Portugal. However, according to Artigo 6, those who did not wish to remain in the Portuguese colony and who resided in Recife or Maurícia, had up to three months to leave the territory. In 1654, the Portuguese Crown named Francisco Barreto de Menezes (1616–1688) governor of Pernambuco and, in 1656, governor general of Brazil, holding office in this capacity until 1663, when he finally returned to Portugal. The governor of Pernambuco treated the Jews now under his jurisdiction very magnanimously, seeing that their human rights were guaranteed and respected at all times. In fact Barreto's attitude toward the Jews was absolutely exemplary, to such a degree that in the history of the Sephardic Diaspora Governor Barreto de Menezes will also be known as ha-sidei umot ha-olam (the just Gentile of the world).

Twenty-three Jews, together with a group of Dutch Calvinists—also known as Netherlanders, among whom was the famous Calvinist pastor and preacher from the island of Itamaracá, Pernambuco, Dominus Johannes Polhemiu—arrived in New Amsterdam in September 1654. These 23 Jews were members of six families, guided by 4 men and 2 widows: Abram Ysrael de Piza (or Dias), David Israel (Faro), Assar (Asher) Levy, Moses Lumbroso (Ambrosius), Judith Mercado (Judicq de Mereda), and Ricke Nunes. These diasporic Jews were thus divided: 4 men, 6 women, and 13 children or adolescents up to age 12 years.

In November 1654, another contingent of Brazilian Jews left Recife on the frigate Valck destined for Martinique; however, a violent storm, forced them to cast anchor in Jamaica, a territory that still belonged to the Spanish. The Brazilian Jews were imprisoned by the local colonial authorities. On November 14, representatives of the Dutch Jewish community asked the king of Spain and the Dutch consul in Cadiz and San Sebastian to intervene on behalf of their coreligionists who were unjustly detained. Because most of the prisoners were Dutch citizens—either from Amsterdam or born in the Dutch colony of Brazil—the ill-fated Jews should have been immune to the Spanish Inquisition. Moreover, thanks to an earlier peace agreement between the two European nations, these Jews were de facto free men and women.

During this time the Jews in Jamaica were indeed numerous; their presence is in fact attested since the beginning of the 16th century. Right after Jamaica was turned over to England in 1655, all those who practiced Judaism were protected by the laws of Oliver Cromwell (1599–1658), the English ruler. Cromwell knew very well that Jewish presence in British America was going to be advantageous to England, both on a short-term and a long-term basis, namely: trade between the Caribbean and the North American colonies, as well as reinforcement against Spanish threats in the area. Having the Jews as their allies, fierce enemies of the Spanish, was undoubtedly going to give England ammunition in conquering lands under Spanish occupation, the ultimate dream of the British colonial empire. Cromwell skillfully used the Jews to increase British economic power in the West Indies, particularly in newly acquired Jamaica. As for the Jews, they willfully accepted the idea of being thus used.

Jews who wished to leave the Portuguese colony could take along their wealth; hence, they desired to transport as much as they could. Unfortunately, the governor could not meet their demands, and the only concession he could grant them was the guaranteed protection to Christians (both Catholic and Protestants) and Jews—the latter born into the faith—who, given that they were still waiting for appropriate transportation, happened to still reside in Portuguese soil past the due date.

As for the “heretics,” or rather, Christians who by their own free will converted to Judaism, as well as the conversos—Sephardic Jews who were either forced to or willingly converted to Christianity for fear of repercussions or expulsion—they were vulnerable to the Portuguese Inquisition. Unfortunately, Governor Barreto did not have any authority over the latter institution; thus, he could not offer them any kind of immunity. The sons of these heretics, that is, the crypto-Jews (Marranos) who returned to Judaism, for the very fact of being born into the faith before their arrival to Brazil, or because they were originally from the former Dutch colony in Brazil, were completely immune to any inquisitorial threats. It was thanks to Governor Barreto, who put at their disposal Portuguese ships for their return to Holland, that all those who openly professed Judaism could safely leave Brazil. All in all, almost 150 Jews left former Dutch Brazil destined for Holland and thence back to the New World, this time directed toward the Dutch Antilles, Suriname, and Dutch North America (New Amsterdam).

The year 1654 is therefore the beginning of the first European settlement on North American soil, which also included a group of Dutch Jews. The land that was colonized was New Amsterdam, future New York City, a colony that then belonged to the Dutch empire. A few days before September 7, 1654, the French vessel St. Cathrien, commanded by Captain Jacques de la Motthe, dropped anchor in the docks of New Amsterdam. Among the Dutch refugees there were 23 Jews—men, women, and their children, all from Recife.

The controversy over the origin of this ship is still very much alive. Scholars favor different and contradictory theories, as in the case of the controversy over the departure for Jamaica and thence to Spain, the problems concerning the aforementioned letters of protest, and the innumerable references to Jews with the same name in New Amsterdam to disprove its Brazilian provenance.

Nevertheless, it is known that Captain de la Motthe declared that the Dutch refugees left Cape Santo António, a promontory in the Bay of Salvador da Bahia, then called António Vaz, where the Dutch built the fort of Maurícia, which was linked by bridge to Recife, the only port at the time. The archives of the New York court contain reference to a dispute between two passengers on board of the St. Cathrien, which mentions the passage between Gamonike and New Amsterdam. One would have to assume, then, that this vessel came from Jamaica or that at least it called at the port of this island. Most likely Gamonike is a corruption of the French word Jamaïque (Jamaica). Samuel Oppenheim, however, suggested that the word Gamonike, also written Gamoniké, is the incorrect rendering of Tamarica or Tamaraca, present-day Itamaracá, a province to the north of Pernambuco, and, he did succeed at locating Cabo Santo António. Egon Wolff and Freida Wolff do not agree with this interpretation of events. After performing serious investigations, even if ultimately not being able to propose an alternative place to Jamaica, the Wolffs concluded that these 23 Jews arrived in New Amsterdam from Suriname. According to these scholars the shipwrecked Jews of the Valck were prisoners and not free citizens, as were their coreligionists in Gamonike, the latter being deeply involved in the local and international/transcontinental trade. However, the explanations offered are not very clear.

Most likely Cape Santo António—“C. de S. Anthonio” in the documents of the time—is not the Brazilian promontory, but rather, its homonym off the coast of Cuba, someplace near Jamaica and Mexico. In fact, right after the Jews arrive in New Amsterdam, an intense correspondence between the Spanish Crown and the Dutch colonial authorities began. The reason of the dispute apparently was the capture of a Spanish vessel by Dutch corsairs. The maps of the time show that the aforementioned Cape Santo António, off the Cuban coast, is in a strategic location between the West Indies, the route to New Amsterdam, and the Gulf of Mexico. The fact that the Jews were on board a French ship confirms the theory that they sailed from the West Indies, a place under strong French influence. As for the reasons why these Jews left Jamaica perhaps the political situation of the time, the ever-present English hostilities, and, most of all, piracy, were mainly responsible for their departure. In fact, the strategic position of the island made it a very coveted place, particularly by unscrupulous pirates and corsairs—mainly of Spanish, French, and/or Dutch origin—always looking for easy booty. Furthermore, both the Historie ofte Jaelyck Verhael van de Verricht ighen der Gerctroveerde West Indische Compagnie and the Descripcion de las Indias Occidentales de Antonio de Herrera mention the Cuban Cape Santo António. In addition, none of the Dutch documents of the time confirm that these Jews were originally from Brazil. On the contrary, all the references testify that they came from the West Indies.

As for the 1644 diasporic Jews, at least two of them, Jacob Barsimson and Solomon Pietersen, asked the authorities to allow these refugees to remain in the Dutch colony. Besides them, many Amsterdam Jews, among whom stand out the parnasim—that is, the elders of the Portuguese Jewish Community, the Nação Portuguesa—and those with commercial interests in the Dutch West India Company, testified on behalf of these 23 Jews.

Many were the letters of protest, written by members of the Dutch Jewish community, against the abuses and, most of all, the fact that Peter Stuyvesant (1611–1672) governor of the Dutch colony in North America and Curaçao, did not respect the former concessions bestowed on the Jews residing in the Dutch territories overseas, from Brazil and Curaçao to New Amsterdam.

A few years after their arrival in North America in 1655, the Jews united with their coreligionists residing in the area, thus forming the first Jewish community in New Amsterdam. Even if protected by Dutch laws, mainly regarding civil and political matters, Jews still did not have the right to publicly profess their religion. The ancient biases and prejudices were then being transplanted in the New World, and the Jews were thus prevented from serving the Lord, either in a synagogue or in public congregations.

Jews and Portuguese (also known by their collective name Nação Portuguesa (Portuguese nation)—maybe because at this time the two were almost synonymous—were also not allowed to have commercial ties with Fort Orange and South River, in present-day Albany and Delaware, respectively. Furthermore, members of both ethnic-religious groups could not hold any public office, nor could they be retailers. The only concessions were that they could practice their religion at home and that they had the right to build a house anywhere in New Amsterdam (Letter of the Director of the Dutch West India Company to Peter Stuyvesant, May 13, 1656).

Most certainly, then, the first Jews who settled in New Amsterdam came directly from Brazil, though stopping first at Cape Santo António, in all likelihood in present-day Cuba. Furthermore, there is a chance that another group of Jews, possibly many, also came from the Caribbean, tired of the abuses and commercial restrictions that the Europeans imposed upon them, and finally arrived at the shores of New Amsterdam.

As for the Brazilian refugees, it is possible that they either fell into Portuguese hands on January 15, 1654, or that between January and August of the same year they found refuge in Gamonike, perhaps present-day Jamaica, whence they finally reached the coast of New Amsterdam.

Chronologically speaking, though, these “Dutch” Jews were not the first Jews in North American soil. Before their arrival a few Jews were recorded in New Amsterdam, as well as in the Anglo-American colonies of Maine, Massachusetts, Maryland, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Virginia, and the Carolinas. In 1652, a small group of Dutch soldiers, more than half Jews, was sent to New Amsterdam by the Dutch West India Company.

A 1658 document states that the Portuguese Jew Jacob Lumbrozo (d. 1666) was found guilty of blasphemy. The colony of Maryland, founded in 1634, adopted religious freedom for all its citizens; however—as in any other Anglo-American dependency—this privilege was only directed at Christian denominations and not to Judaism. Nevertheless, Lumbrozo, maybe because of his enormous wealth and, above all, given the fact that he was also a doctor and a businessman, managed to avoid punishment. In fact, on September 10, 1663, Lumbrozo also received full Maryland citizenship. Nevertheless, Maryland was among the last states to grant full civil and legal rights to its Jewish subjects.

In 1685, as a consequence of the Nantes Code, that is, the Code Noir, many Jews and Huguenots took refuge first in England and then to either the Anglo-American colonies or, farther north, to Canada. A few others went to the Antilles—mainly the Bahamas and Jamaica—and/or Brazil.

Selected Bibliography

- Cohen, Martin A., and Abraham J. Peck, eds. 1993. Sephardim in the Americas. Studies in Culture and History. Tuscaloosa: American Jewish Archives, University of Alabama Press.
- Daly, Charles Patrick. 1893. The Settlement of the Jews in North America, edited by Max James Kohler. New York: Philip Cowen.
- Finn, James. 1841. Sephardim; or, the History of the Jews in Spain and Portugal. London: J.G.F., and J. Rivington.
- Katz, Israel J., and M. Mitchell Serels, eds. 2000. Studies on the History of Portuguese Jews from Their Expulsion in 1497 Through Their Dispersion. New York: Sepher-Hermon Press.
- Levi, Joseph Abraham, ed. 2002. Survival and Adaptation: The Portuguese Jewish Diaspora in Europe, Africa, and the New World. New York: Sepher-Hermon Press.
- Marcus, Jacob Rader. 1975. Early American Jewry. 2 vols. New York: Ktav.
- Markens, Joseph. 1888. The Hebrews in America. New York: Arno Press.
- Masserman, Paul, and Max Baker. 1932. The Jews Come to America. New York: Bloch.
- Meijer, Jaap. 1954. Pioneers of Pauroma. Contributions to the Earliest History of the Jewish Colonization of America. Paramaribo: Eldorado.
- Oppenheim, Samuel. 1909. “The Early History of the Jews in New York, 1654–1664. Some New Matter on the Subject.” Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society 18: 1–91.
- Pool, David de Sola. 1952. Portraits Etched in Stone; Early Jewish Settlers 1682–1831. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Scopino, Aldorigo Joseph, Jr., ed. 1997. The Struggle for Religious Freedom in America. Carlisle, UK: Discovery Enterprises.
- Wiznitzer, [Aharon] Arnold. 1954. “The Exodus from Brazil and Arrival in New Amsterdam of the Jewish Pilgrim Fathers.” Publications of the Jewish American Historical Society 44, no. 12: 80–97.

- Wiznitzer, [Aharon] Arnold. 1954. "The Number of Jews in Dutch Brazil, 1630–1654." Jewish Social Studies 16, no. 24: 107–114.
- Wolff, Egon, and Frieda Wolff. 1978. "Mistaken Identities of Signatories of the Congregation Zur Israel, Recife." Studia Rosenthaliana 12: 91–107.
- Wolff, Egon, and Frieda Wolff. 1981. "The Problem of the First Jewish Settlers in New Amsterdam, 1654." Studia Rosenthaliana 8: 169–177.
- Wolff, Egon, and Frieda Wolff. 1981. "The Twenty-Three Jewish Settlers of New Amsterdam." Studia Rosenthaliana 8: 169–177.

Sephardi and Middle Eastern Jews in the United States

Marc D. Angel

---

The early Jewish communities in North America were established by Sephardic Jews of the Western Sephardic tradition. They were descended from crypto-Jews of the Iberian Peninsula who had returned to Judaism in Western Europe, notably in Amsterdam. Some had been living in South America and the Caribbean Islands before arriving in North America; others came directly from Europe.

The first Jewish congregation—Shearith Israel—was founded in 1654 in New Amsterdam (which became New York in 1664). This remained the only Jewish community on the continent until the mid-18th century, when congregations were formed in Savannah, Georgia; Charleston, South Carolina; Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; and Newport, Rhode Island. Another congregation was established in Richmond, Virginia, shortly after the American Revolutionary War.

Although there is evidence of a crypto-Jewish presence in the American Southwest during the 17th century, there were no openly practicing Jewish congregations. Jewish traditions, such as they existed, were maintained secretly.

Although the first six congregations followed the Sephardic rite, a relatively large number of Ashkenazim were also members. The two groups worked together, married each other, and were buried side by side in Jewish cemeteries. The Jewish population was small, and the Jews recognized the need to maintain unified communities.

The colonial congregations laid the foundations for American Jewish life. They struggled for and won civil rights; they participated actively in the political and economic life of the colonies. Jews fought in and supported the cause of the American Revolution and felt honored to be among the founding generation of the United States.

During the 19th century, the vast majority of Jewish immigrants to the United States were of Ashkenazic background. German Jews arrived in large numbers mid-century, and masses of East European Jews arrived during the 1880s and thereafter. Many new congregations sprouted up throughout the United States, all of them

Ashkenazic. By the latter 19th century, Reform congregations began to flourish, and by the early 20th century the Conservative movement was underway. The ancient Sephardic congregations in New York and Philadelphia maintained the Sephardic custom (and do so to this day); the congregation in Newport, which had faded after the American Revolution, revived during the late 19th century; most of its members were Ashkenazic, and the Ashkenazic rite became dominant. The congregations in Savannah, Charleston, and Richmond also became Ashkenazic Reform congregations.

During the first quarter of the 20th century, approximately 35,000 Sephardim arrived in the United States, primarily from Turkey, Greece, Yugoslavia, and Syria. By 1926, it was estimated that 50,000–60,000 Sephardim were living in the United States, about 40,000 of them in New York City. The primary area of settlement for most Sephardim during this period was New York's Lower East Side. By the 1920s, the more affluent Sephardim moved to other neighborhoods throughout New York, such as, Harlem, New Lots, West Bronx, Bay Parkway, and Flatbush.

Sephardic congregations also developed throughout the United States, including Seattle; Portland, Oregon; San Francisco; Los Angeles; Savannah; Atlanta; Miami; Chicago; Indianapolis; Detroit; Rochester, New York; and Highland Park, New Jersey. As a rule, Sephardic congregations followed their own traditions and did not affiliate with the Reform or Conservative movements. Because Sephardim tended to traditionalism, those congregations that chose to affiliate with a national movement joined the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America. Indeed, the Orthodox Union was founded through the efforts of the Sephardic rabbi of Shearith Israel in New York, Dr. Henry Pereira Mendes. Mendes served as the Union's first president.

The Sephardic arrivals were not a monolithic group. Turkish and Balkan Sephardim spoke Judeo-Spanish, Greek Jews spoke Greek, and Syrian Jews spoke Arabic. Sephardim formed congregations and benevolent societies based on their cities of origin in the old countries. During the first half of the 20th century, there was a vibrant cultural life in Judeo-Spanish, and a number of Ladino weekly newspapers appeared over the years. The first was La America, edited by Moise Gadol, which ran from 1910 to 1924. The most successful was La Vara, which ran from 1922 to 1948. These newspapers not only included news reports, but also opinion pieces, humor, poetry, and fiction. Judeo-Spanish dramatic presentations were also popular, as were programs featuring Ladino songs and stories.

Sephardim of Judeo-Spanish and Greek backgrounds experienced a loosening of sociological bonds as they became more Americanized. Although members of the immigrant generation tended to live in neighborhoods with high concentration of fellow Sephardim, this tendency diminished in subsequent generations. By the late 1950s and 1960s, Sephardim—like other middle-class Americans—were moving to newer sections of town or to the suburbs. Most were receiving university educations. By the 1970s and 1980s, most Sephardim of Judeo-Spanish background did not live within easy walking distance of synagogues of their own tradition. Members of the third (and subsequent) generations no longer speak Judeo-Spanish, or did so with little fluency. Many married Ashkenazic—or even non-Jewish—spouses. In spite of these trends, though, Sephardic congregations of Judeo-Spanish origin continue to flourish, and several have recently enjoyed a revival of interest and activity. They have attracted non-Sephardic members who find the Sephardic traditions to be beautiful and meaningful.

Syrian Jews have tended to remain concentrated in particular neighborhoods. Although Arabic is seldom spoken fluently by the younger generations, Syrian Jews have succeeded in maintaining their traditions and have a strong infrastructure of synagogues, schools, and social agencies. They have significant concentrations in Flatbush (Brooklyn, New York) and Deal, New Jersey, and there is a growing community in Aventura, Florida. Syrian Jews have been the most cohesive Sephardic group over the generations in America.

By the end of the 20th century, the Greek Jewish community had essentially blended in with other Sephardim. One synagogue of Greek tradition continues to operate on the Lower East Side of New York, but it is more of a museum than a living community.

During the 1930s and 1940s, a trickle of Sephardim were among the European Jewish refugees from fascist Italy, Nazi Germany, and other European countries that came under Nazi occupation. During the 1950s and 1960s, a wave of Middle Eastern Jews arrived, primarily from Arab countries and Israel. Large centers emerged in the New York area and in Los Angeles, and others were scattered throughout the country. During the 1970s and 1980s, thousands of Iranian Jews sought haven in America, and many settled in New York and Los Angeles. During this period, thousands of Bukharian Jews arrived among the immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

The American Sephardic/Middle Eastern Jewish community has grown to 250,000–300,000. They are a highly diverse group, including people whose families have been in America 350 years as well as those who have recently arrived. Many are straying from their Sephardic and Jewish roots, while others are growing more intense in their religious and cultural commitments.

Since the early 20th century, attempts were made to form national organizations for the promotion of Sephardic life. Among these were the Federation of Oriental Jews (1912), The Union of Sephardic Congregations (1929), and the Central Sephardic Jewish Community of America (1941). They enjoyed limited success, and only the Union continues today. It publishes Sephardic prayer books (translated and edited by Rabbi David de Sola Pool) and other works of religious interest. In 1972, the American Sephardi Federation (ASF) was organized, and it continues to operate from headquarters at the Center for Jewish History in New York City. Sephardic House, a national cultural organization founded in 1978, became the cultural arm of ASF in the early 2000s.

Sephardim have played a growing role in American Jewish life, although they are still generally underrepresented in communal and national Jewish organizations. The dominant Ashkenazic community—itself quite diverse—has made varying degrees of effort to understand Sephardic culture and to include Sephardim in their Jewish consciousness. On their part, many Sephardim have felt more comfortable working within their own communities than in the broader Jewish community.

Jews of Sephardic/Middle Eastern background have made significant contributions to American life. Among the most prominent were Uriah P. Levy, who rose to the rank of commodore in the American Navy during the 19th century; the 19th-century poet, Emma Lazarus, whose poem "The New Colossus" is affixed to the Statue of Liberty; and Justice Benjamin Nathan Cardozo, who served on the United States Supreme Court (1932–1938). Sephardic/Middle Eastern Jews can be found today as heads of major American corporations, civic office holders, respected members of the liberal professions and academia, and leading patrons of the arts.

The Sephardic/Middle Eastern population in the United States has been increasing; rates of Sephardic/Ashkenazic marriages are rising; and Sephardim and Sephardic culture are gaining more prominence in the general community. It is to be expected, then, that the Sephardic/Middle Eastern component of American Jewry will grow in significance in coming years.

Selected Bibliography

- Angel, Marc D. 1982. La America: The Sephardic Experience in the United States. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society.
- Sutton, Joseph A. D. 1979. Magic Carpet: Aleppo in Flatbush. New York: Thayer Jacoby.

Jewish Women of the Early American West

Jeanee Abrams

---

Jewish women in the early American West were central to the region's economic, political, social, and cultural growth and development. These women were often strong-minded and independent and played an integral role in settling American's western frontier as well as promoting Jewish continuity as they built new lives in a region that offered them a host of possibilities. Some were the wives, daughters, and sisters of the members of Jewish merchant elite who had the means and leisure time available for prominent involvement in civil life and social welfare issues, largely through work in women's clubs and organizations. But many more western Jewish women performed daily work within their households that not only often contributed to family income but also played a part in founding the philanthropic institutions, houses of worship, schools, and libraries that helped civilize the raw West and constructing communities where social order and Jewish family life could flourish.

Within five years of the beginning of the gold rush in 1848, more than 5,000 Jews migrated to California in search of opportunity, joining members of a variety of religious and ethnic groups. After 1858, when most of the California mining sites had been appropriated, gold seekers migrated to new strikes in Colorado, Nevada, Montana, Idaho, and Oregon. Jews also fanned out across other nearby states and by 1920 numbered about 300,000 in the West.

Particularly in early western boomtowns, where growth was often rapid and chaotic and the number of women was small, mutual assistance was critical and western women often enjoyed more equal status than women in other regions of the country. Domestic skills, for example, commanded top dollar and encouraged many women to become seamstresses and food purveyors or to pursue hotel and boarding house ventures. These paths were successfully followed by western Jewish women like Mary Ann Cohen Magnin in California, the guiding hand behind the upscale women's clothing store, I. Magnin and Company; Anna Freudenthal Solomon in Arizona, who ran a successful hotel for nearly 25 years; Jeanette Hirsch Meier of Portland, Oregon, who after her husband's death presided over the largest department store in the far West; and Regina Moch of Nevada, who operated a thriving restaurant, which supported her after the death of her husband in a local fire.

As time passed, the innovative environment of the West offered western Jewish women the possibility of greater access to higher education, professional positions, and entry into formal politics. Jewish women benefited from the region's generally liberal attitude toward education for females, where in 1900 the percentage of young women enrolled in high school was the highest in the West and the University of California became a coed institution as early as the 1870s. It is noteworthy that women's suffrage came earliest to the American West. By 1900, women could vote in Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, and Idaho, and by the passage of the Nineteenth Amendment to the Constitution in 1920, women in every western state, with the exception of New Mexico, had already been enfranchised. Unsurprisingly, in the second half of the 19th and early 20th century, Jewish women across America were highly visible in the vanguard of social welfare and progressive reform endeavors, commerce, higher education, and the professions, as well as in the maintenance of Jewish life. However, considering their modest numbers, the level of involvement of Jewish female pioneers in the early American West is particularly striking.

The region produced many notable figures, including Frances Wisebart Jacobs, Denver's "Mother of Charities" and the impetus behind the founding of the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives (NJH) in 1899 as well as the Charity Organization Society, forerunner of the national United Way; educator Mary Goldsmith Prag, the first Jewish woman to serve on San Francisco's Board of Education, and her daughter Florence Prag Kahn, the first Jewish congresswoman in America; Seraphine Eppstein Pisko, who became the executive director of NJH in 1911, probably the first Jewish woman in the United States to head a national organization; pioneer social worker Ida Loewenberg of Oregon; Felice Cohn, one of Nevada's earliest female lawyers, who played a major role in the state's suffrage movement; writer Selina Solomons, the activist president of San Francisco's Votes-for Women-Club, and journalist Belle Fligelman Winestone, who were instrumental in securing the right of women to vote in Montana and California, respectively; Jessica Peixotto, who Florence Prag Kahn was the first Jewish woman to sit in the U.S. Congress. Widowed in 1924, she was elected to replace her husband as a Republican U.S. representative from California. She served until 1937.

(Library of Congress)

received a PhD at the turn of the century and in 1918 became first female full professor at the University of California-Los Angeles.

The West offered unprecedented opportunity to Jews, and Jewish women were quick to take advantage of new opportunities. Given their often relatively small numbers within western communities, their influence was significant, and they pushed public boundaries in ways their eastern counterparts often did not. Many Jewish women and men arrived in the West just as settlements were being founded or soon after, easing their social, political, and social integration. They were often welcomed as partners in building a new social order. Yet even as they were part of the larger western community, on the whole early western Jewish women retained their distinctive religious and ethnic times. Jewish women were not only activists who contributed to the West's overall development, but they also contributed fundamentally to developing and maintaining Jewish communal life and played an especially critical role in sustaining Jewish identity. The migration of Jewish women to western communities often heralded the organization of Jewish institutions. Most western Jewish communities featured Ladies' Hebrew Benevolent Societies, which were dedicated to charitable projects, and many women, such as Therese Marx Ferrin in Arizona and Bertha Frank Meyers in Wyoming, were instrumental in building synagogues and the fund-raising apparatus to carry on these religious institutions. They played a pivotal part in sustaining and transmitting Judaism both in their roles within the home and in their support of synagogues, religious schools, and Jewish and general philanthropic endeavors. As active community builders in a variety of domestic roles in 19th-century American frontier settlements, Jewish women in the West were poised to take advantage of unprecedented opportunities in a new and dynamic region, where they had new political rights, greater freedom, and options that were not yet always available elsewhere in the country.

Selected Bibliography

- Abrams, Jeanne. 2006. Jewish Women Pioneering the Frontier Trail: A History in the West. New York: New York University Press.
- Kahn, Ava F., ed. 2002. Jewish Life in the American West. Los Angeles: Autry Museum of Western Heritage.
- Toll, William. 1998. "Pioneer Jewish Men and Women of the American West." In Creating American Jews: Conversations about Identity, edited by Karen S. Mittleman. Philadelphia: National Museum of American Jewish History.

Great American Jewish Thinkers and Their Attitudes toward Diaspora

S. Daniel Breslauer

---

American Jewish thinkers from colonial times through the present, whether Zionist or non-Zionist, have sought to understand their lives in the Diaspora and their relationship to the land of Israel as an ideal, to the condition of Jews throughout the world, and, since the late 19th century, to the idea of an independent Jewish state, expressing their views in often controversial and emotional ways precisely because they affirmed the Diaspora as a positive factor in Jewish existence. Much of the writing concerning views of the Diaspora focuses on American Zionism and its distinctiveness from conventional Zionism (Cohen 1975; Ursofsky 1975; Cohen and Liebman 1990). Almost unanimously, American Jews "reject the Israeli notions of exile" and find the traditional Zionist view of Diaspora life to be "precarious, distorted, and incomplete" unacceptable (Cohen and Liebman 1990, 93). Differences among views have been associated with the major religious movements in American Judaism—the Reform movement that came to prominence in the 19th century; the Conservative movement and the Orthodox movement, both of which developed in the beginning of the 20th century; and the Reconstructionist movement, which although initiated in the beginning of the 20th century grew to fruition only in the latter half of it. More recently the idea of Diaspora or exile has been advanced as a central motif in human self-understanding and postmodern theories of identity (see the discussion in Anderson 1983 and Biale et al. 1998). Despite this diversity, the vast majority of American thinkers affirmed the value of the Jewish Diaspora. From the earliest Jewish leaders in the New World through contemporary American Jewish thinkers life in the Diaspora generally, and in the American Diaspora in particular, has been affirmed as an integral part of Jewish existence. During the colonial period through the American Civil War, the general view espoused considered Diaspora Judaism a valid replacement for the ancient Israel-centered faith, as American Jewish leaders became impatient with the "Palestinian messengers" in America (Baron 1971, 158–266). American Jews hailed America as a new Zion, and their places of worship as a new Jerusalem. This trend has continued and, especially among Reform Jewish thinkers, has found recent proponents. Later generations of Jewish thinkers, including Reform, Conservative, Orthodox, and Reconstructionist, tempered this positive view of Diaspora with an acknowledgment of the importance of the land of Israel and the historical memories of the Jewish people. American Jews became reluctant to reject Zionism after the creation of the State of Israel in 1948. Even so, an affirmation of Zionism was usually combined with a declaration of appreciation, loyalty, and validation for Jewish life outside the land of Israel and particularly for the Diaspora Jewish community within the United States. This legitimation of the Diaspora took many forms. Some thinkers emphasized the creativity of Jews in the Diaspora; others saluted the international perspective and universalism cultivated by those living outside Israel, and still others considered landlessness a political benefit for the Jewish people. Finally, more recent thinkers have claimed to find in the sense of exile and alienation cultivated by Diaspora living an expression of an existential reality. All modern people can be considered in exile and displaced persons. As such, the Jew in Diaspora symbolizes the marginalization necessary for true moral perspectives. This view has evoked criticism.

Emma Lazarus (1849–1887), best known for her poem “The New Colossus,” which is inscribed at the base of the Statue of Liberty, wrote a poem on the Jewish New Year celebration of 1882 in which she envisioned the Jewish Diaspora flowing in two directions—homeward toward Zion and westward toward the United States (Lazarus 1882, 51–52). Lazarus’s writings and activism emphasized both of these views of the Jewish dispersion. She celebrated the new life Jews were building in the New World. She rejected Longfellow’s poem concerning the “dead” Jews in the Newport Jewish cemetery and imagined a creative, positive future for American Jewry. She also considered the Jewish Diaspora to be a community of interrelated people for whom the more prosperous (those in the United States, for example)

Portrait of Jewish American poet, essayist, and proto-Zionist Emma Lazarus.
(Library of Congress)

had responsibility for those undergoing suffering (those in Russia, for example). She wrote poems and prose epistles and met with European leaders to advocate improving the condition of Jews, creating a Jewish national homeland in Palestine, and facilitating immigration to the United States. These themes recur throughout the history of American Jewish thinking about Diaspora.

Reform thinkers in the 19th century, like Max Lilienthal (1815–1882); Isaac Mayer Wise (1819–1900), who was credited with “founding” American Reform Judaism and creating its central institutions; and Max Kohler (1843–1926), who succeeded Isaac Meyer Wise as president of the Reform rabbinical seminary, Hebrew Union College, claimed that America was the new Zion because the soul of Judaism was spiritual not nationalistic. These thinkers were resolutely anti-Zionist and advocated Diaspora Judaism as the sole expression of true Judaic values (see the citations in Plaut 1965). Later Reform thinkers modified this view. By the 1970s, Reform Jews had accepted Zionism while still maintaining a positive affirmation of the creativity of the Jewish Diaspora in America. Rabbi Eugene Borowitz (b. 1924) provides a good example of contemporary Reform Jewish thinking about the Diaspora and Zionism. Borowitz, like Lazarus, recognizes the need for a Jewish home to which refugees from oppression can turn. He sees God’s saving hand in the success of the Jewish state against its enemies. Nevertheless, he claims that the true creativity of Judaism lies in the Diaspora. Only the covenant with God provides Jews with their religious identity, and the most energetic and legitimate expression of that covenant is being carried out by the Jews living outside the Land of Israel. The Diaspora is typified by confident survival; separate, holy living as expressed by carrying out God’s commandments; and service to humanity (Borowitz 1975). Support for the Jews living in Israel represents one way Diaspora Jews fulfill their obligations to other Jews, but other duties also serve this purpose. Borowitz emphasizes the desirability of a Jewish Diaspora as part of the divine plan.

Unlike the Reform movement in American Judaism, the Conservative movement and the closely related Reconstructionist movement (begun by Rabbi Mordecai M. Kaplan, 1881–1983, and breaking from the Conservative movement when it established its own seminary in 1968) maintained the centrality of the Land of Israel and the Zionist ideal almost from its inception. Despite differences of perspective, thinkers from this movement affirmed the necessity for and importance of a Jewish state in Israel. These thinkers also agreed that a strong and creative Jewish Diaspora was also essential for the survival of the Jewish people. The differences between Conservative Jewish thinkers, however, were not inconsequential. Comparing the thinking of Mordecai Kaplan and Abraham Joshua Heschel (1907–1972) shows those differences.

Kaplan maintained that the Jewish people had evolved a religion of “ethical nationhood”—an idea he expressed in his earliest writings but developed most fully in a book devoted to it exclusively (Kaplan 1970). Kaplan argued that modern Jews have lost their sense of communal unity. Because they can choose their beliefs, practices, and expressions of Jewish identity, Jews no longer recognize their communal responsibilities. In the past, common behavioral and ideological norms unified all Jews. Kaplan believed modernity had destroyed that type of unity. Jews needed to construct a new bond to unite the disparate individuals of modern times. He thought involvement in the affairs of the Jewish state would create such a bond and provide a locus of common concern that Jews living in that state or outside it would share.

Because Kaplan considered American democracy the hallmark of modernity he also emphasized that this new Jewish unity would be marked by democratic inclusiveness. He called for a world Jewish organization involving all Jews, wherever they lived, in the policies of the Jewish state. Diaspora Jews need to cultivate a sense of awareness of their unity and spiritual identity with each other and with Jews in Israel. Creating a democratic polity that gives voice both to those within and outside Israel will stimulate that awareness. Diaspora is a fact of Jewish existence with which the State of Israel must reckon. The creation of a transnational constitution for a transnational unity would be an example of an ideal of international cooperation that Jews could give to humanity—it would be a lesson for non-Jews no less than Jews.

Abraham Heschel agreed with Kaplan that the relation of Diaspora Jews to those in Israel is a model all nations could use (Heschel 1967). For Heschel, however, Diaspora Judaism provides a spiritual unity and sense of communal responsibility rather than political identity. He writes of Israel as the trunk of a tree whose branches are the Diaspora—just as the trunk will die if the branches wither, so, too, the Jews of Israel need the Jews of the dispersion. Although Israel satisfies the needs of the Jewish community and polity, Judaism as cultivated within and outside Israel answers the needs of the individual. Heschel rejects political identity as the basis of Jewish unity and speaks of “dual residence” rather than “dual citizenship.” Jews may reside in more than one place; their political affiliation is less central than their acceptance of responsibility for all other Jews. This universal concern for all Jews stimulates what he calls “new concepts in international relations”—based on shared responsibility despite different political affiliations (Heschel 1967, 210).

Abraham Heschel, 20th-century Jewish theologian. (Library of Congress)

A more recent look at Diaspora sees it in existential terms. Zionism was wrong to reject Diaspora Judaism because creative and vibrant Jewish identities flourished in exile (see Boyarin 1992). Many writers identify modernity with a sense of alienation, marginality, and exile. When, as Michael Gluzman (1998, 235) points out, “exile turned into an emblem of modernism,” the Jew became the ideal representative of the modern condition. From this perspective, Jews have an advantage in the world created in the late 20th century: they have a model by which to understand and cope with spiritual dislocation. Other writers, however, reject this valorization of Diaspora because traditionally Jews look upon exile as an evil that will be eventually be overcome (Galinsky 1998). The debate between these two views suggests the importance of Diaspora as a modern concept and its tension with traditional Jewish conceptions of exile.

Selected Bibliography

- Anderson, Benedict. 1983 Imagined Communities: Reflections on the Origin and Spread of Nationalism. New York: Verso.
- Baron, Salo. 1971. Steeled by Adversity: Essays and Addresses on American Jewish Life. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America.
- Borowitz, Eugene B. 1975. “The Jewish People Concept as It Affects Jewish Life in the Diaspora.” Journal of Ecumenical Studies 12: 553–586.
- Boyarin, Jonathan. 1992. Storm from Paradise: The Politics of Jewish Memory. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Cohen, Naomi W. 1975. American Jews and the Zionist Idea. New York: Ktav.
- Cohen, Steven M., and Charles S. Liebman. 1990. Two Worlds of Judaism: The Israel and American Experiences. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Galchinsky, Michael. 1998. “Scattered Seeds: A Dialogue of Diasporas.” In Insider/Outsider: American Jews and Multiculturalism, edited by David Biale, Michael Galchinsky, and Susan Heschel, 185–211. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Gluzman, Michael. 1998. “Modernism and Exile: A View from the Margins.” In Insider/Outsider: American Jews and Multiculturalism, edited by David Biale, Michael Galchinsky, and Susan Heschel Berkeley, 231–253. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Heschel, Abraham Joshua. 1967. The Insecurity of Freedom: Essays on Human Existence. New York: Farrar Straus and Giroux.
- Kaplan, Mordecai Menahem. 1970. The Religion of Ethical Nationhood: Judaism's Contribution to World Peace. New York: Macmillan Company.
- Lazarus, Emma. 1882. Songs of a Semite: The Dance to Death and Other Poems. Repr. Upper Saddle River, NJ: The Gregg Press, 1970.
- Plaut, W. Gunther. 1965. The Growth of Reform Judaism: American and European Sources until 1948. New York: World Union for Progressive Judaism.
- Urofsky, Melvin I. 1975. American Zionism from Herzl to the Holocaust. Garden City, NY: Doubleday Anchor.

The Jewish Diaspora in America: Social Integration, Political Liberalism, and Attachment to Homeland

Uzi Rebhun

---

The United States accounts for approximately two-thirds of contemporary Diaspora Jewry. Its Jewish community had already become a paramount demographic pillar in the late 19th and early 20th centuries owing to the mass immigration of East European Jews into the country. After overcoming various social barriers, these immigrants, and especially their descendants, experienced unprecedented upward mobility and successfully integrated into the social mainstream. Today, Jews in the United States are highly concentrated in the upper strata of the socio-economic ladder. They hold key positions in the political arena and are salient in the national media and major cultural industries. Thus, they have significantly contributed to the greatness of this country (Lipset and Raab 1995).

These processes of integration and mobility have encouraged certain general characteristics among the Jews, such as an emphasis on self-fulfillment, individualism, and materialism as well as a distancing from communal commitments. Moreover, the environment in which Jews operate, including schools, workplaces, residential neighborhoods, and places of entertainment, is composed of people of different faiths. Such intensive interactions are likely to involve informal social ties that can develop into intimate or even formal familial relationships.

As they attempt to integrate into the local structural mainstream, many Jews wish to maintain distinctive ethnic and religious behaviors. This apparent tension affects various domains of the multifaceted structure of Jewish identification. An important component most relevant to the discussion of Jewish Diasporism is the relationship to the “homeland,” namely Israel. Since its establishment in 1948, Israel has constituted a major anchor of social, cultural, and political connection and an important base for Jewish communal life in the United States. Not only is it seen as a component of institutional affiliation, but it is often conceptualized as a distinct measure of Zionism and “Israeliness.” Attachment to Israel further involves the aspect of dual commitment to place of residence and country of ancestry.

A Scientific Context

Because of large-scale labor migration and other types of international movements, ethnonational Diasporas are growing elements in many countries, not only in the West, but also in such labor migration countries as the Persian Gulf states, a factor likely to continue into the early 21st century. Not only is the number of Diasporas increasing, but members of ethnic minorities are also experiencing cultural revival in their host countries, strengthening communal activities, and expanding political and financial ties to their homeland. Host countries do not demand full assimilation and are today more open and sympathetic toward close mutual relationships between ethnic minorities and their countries of origin. The increasing legitimacy given by homelands to their Diasporas is likely to result in a more equal loyalty and relationships between the different segments of a given people (Sheffer 2001).

In the second context, that of developments in the role of ethnicity and religiosity among white Americans, different perceptions are to be found, ranging from assimilation to cultural revival. Evidence in support of the former school of thought, which largely coincides with the classical models of conformity and melting pot, consists of the reduced structural and cultural cohesion in the modern achievement-oriented social environment of the United States. This includes, inter alia, upward social mobility among different white ethnics, residential proximity of people with different faiths, large-scale intermarriage, the adoption of local fashions and tastes, and major holidays becoming part of the national civilian culture. A counterargument posits the persistence of ethnocultural cohesion. Ethnicity is strongly anchored in American society; numerous social and political institutions serve specific groups, and different ethnic groups are still characterized by significant distinctions regarding many structural attributes. Ethnicity is a functional element for survival needs and a structural framework providing opportunities for members of a given group.

In a somewhat moderate version of assimilation, Herbert Gans discusses symbolic ethnicity and religiosity. According to this perception, the new ethnic behaviors and affiliations, though more publicly visible than earlier ones, are nonetheless merely symbolic expressions of concern with group consciousness. Among white Americans, these forms of identification reflect aspirations for self-fulfillment but lack structural cohesion and are detached from the practice of an ongoing ethnoreligious culture. Hence, they neither demand strong commitment nor do they penetrate everyday lifestyles. Beside rites-of-passage events and home-centered ceremonies through family dinners on major holidays, this symbolic identification includes strengthening ties to an "old country" and making pilgrimage to religious sites. Similarly, according to Matthew F. Jacobson in his monograph Special Sorrows (1995), occasional ethnoreligious expressions among people of Diasporic nationalism are likely to be translated into political activism during times of unrest overseas.

The third context is largely embodied in the terms "exile" and "Diaspora," which are used alternatively to refer to Jews who live outside the State of Israel. Normally, exile has a negative connotation; it suggests displacement from a homeland, residence under a foreign government, and social and economic hardship. Exile is a negative existence as against the unequivocal ideal of Zion. By contrast, the term "Diaspora" is used to express a more neutral perception, or even sympathy, to Jewish existence outside its sovereign state.

During the British Mandate and in the first years after the foundation of Israel, many Israelis held an assertive attitude toward negating the exile and were hostile to stories of Jewish success in America. Today, many Israelis still view the Diaspora as a "reflection of Jewish weakness [and of] an unhealthy economic and social life," seeing the unprecedentedly high "figures of assimilation and intermarriage among America Jews as proof of the failure of Jewish life in the Diaspora" (Beker 2000).

Nevertheless, individualism and materialism are important in modern society, and with the expanding phenomenon of emigration from Israel there is more openness and tolerance toward the Jewish Diaspora today. On the other hand, the opposite extreme attitudes may also be found among Diaspora Jews. Given the socioeconomic achievements of American Jews, Jacob Neusner has argued that rather than Israel, America is the Jews' Promised Land. Similarly, the non-Jewish British historian Paul Johnson observed "that the expansion and consolidation of United States Jewry in modern times was as important in Jewish history as the creation of Israel itself; in some ways more important" (as cited in Beker August 21, 2000). As Beker summarizes this view, Israel provides the Jewish people with political sovereignty and serves as a home for communities at risk; yet, from a historical perspective, Jews have never been so influential in shaping the policies of the world's greatest superpower.

Most Jews, both in Israel and in the United States, would probably locate themselves somewhere between these extremes of the "Israel-Diaspora" continuum. In this regard, it should be noted that an overwhelming majority (96 percent) of Israelis feel a sense of connection to their fellow Jews around the world. Likewise, about two-thirds of Israelis recognize the importance of Diaspora Jews for the survival of Israel, and an even larger number share the "reciprocal proposition that the Jewish people in the Diaspora would not be able to survive without the existence of the State of Israel" (Levy et al. 1997). A recent survey among American Jews reveals that slightly more than half agreed to the statement according to which Israel is essential for Jewish life in America, and three-quarters rejected the argument that Israel no longer needs the philanthropy of American Jews (Cohen 1999).

Socioeconomic Mobility and Family Patterns

Geographic Mobility and Dispersion

Around the middle of the 20th century, well after the termination of the mass immigration to the United States, the Jews were still heavily concentrated in the northeastern part of the country; approximately two-thirds of the Jewish population lived in the Northeast, although the Northeast as a whole represented slightly more than one-quarter of the total American population (Figure 1). The Midwest was the second preferred area of settlement: 14 percent of America's Jews lived in the Midwest, although the Midwest population was 29 percent of the total U.S. population. A relatively small proportion of Jews lived in the South (8 percent) and the West (9 percent); these areas represented 31 percent and 14 percent of the overall U.S. population, respectively. At this stage, Jews began to move westward, but not to the same extent as did the non-Jewish population.

This movement developed primarily during the second half of the 20th century. During the 1950s and 1960s, the Northeast began to lose something of its attractiveness for the Jews, and this tendency accelerated over the next three decades until, by 2000, only 43 percent of the total Jewish population was to be found in the Northeast. True, among the overall American population the percentage of those living in the Northeast also declined, but that decrease was much more moderate. During the period 1950–2000, the proportion of Jews living in the Midwest decreased by about one-fifth to 12 percent. By contrast, the proportion of the Jewish population in the South and the West grew by a factor of two and a half. Whereas in 1950, in these two regions together lived only 18 percent of the Jewish population of the United States, by 2000 already 45 percent of the Jews were concentrated there and were equally divided between the two regions. Although non-Jews also move within the country, recently the Jewish pace of movement has been greater. This has resulted in the growing similarity of their geographical distribution to that of the American population in general. The index of dissimilarity between the geographical distribution of Jews and that of the total American population, indicating the percentage of people from one group that would need to alter their place of residence in order to resemble the geographic dispersion of the second group, reached a high of 41 percent in 1950 and has been constantly decreasing, to 37 percent in 1970 and 24 percent in 2000.

Figure 1 Distribution of Jewish and Total Population in the United States by Region, 1950 and 2000

Alongside these changes in geographic distribution, the Jewish population has become more widely dispersed. A substantial portion of the growth of Jewish population during the 1940s and 1950s occurred outside the traditional regions of Jewish settlement. Concomitantly, the proportion of Jews living in large metropolitan areas declined. Hence, today one finds a larger number of concentrations of Jewish population, but each one contains a smaller number of Jews.

The decline in Jewish population density is further reflected in the subjective evaluations by Jews of the ethnoreligious character of their neighborhoods (Figure 2). In 1970, some two-thirds of all Jews in the United States said that they lived in neighborhoods that were “somewhat” or “very” Jewish, whereas in 1990 this was true for only 38 percent. This tendency away from Jewish residential clustering consistently appears from the three complementary perspectives of intergenerational change, as seen in the variations between different generational cohorts at a given time; periodic change, as seen in the differences between similar generational groups at different points of time; and life-cycle change, as the same cohort passes from one stage of life to the next. Overall, through different types of migration and dispersion, Jews have consistently enhanced their physical proximity to the non-Jewish population. This indicates a spatial integration of Jews within the host society that may often be a preliminary stage to different types of assimilation.

Educational Achievement, Occupational Composition, and Income

The extraordinary social and economic mobility of Jews was abetted by the fact that achieved, rather than ascribed, characteristics determine the status of the individual in modern American society, and this is coupled with the recognition of education as a central social value. Perhaps more than any other ethnic or religious group in the United States, the Jews have exploited their civil freedom and economic opportunities to become concentrated within the upper layers of the educational and professional structure (Lipset and Raab 1995). The Jews are the group with the highest educational level in the United States today, and among the outstanding groups in the history of the world.

Substantial differences in the education level of Jews and Americans in general were already evident in the mid-20th century (Table 3). More than twice as many Jews as non-Jews aged 25 and over were college graduates (17 percent and 7 percent, respectively). These differences were maintained in subsequent years, so that in 1970 one-third of Jews had college degrees versus 11 percent among the overall white population. In 2000 this proportion rose to 62 percent and 26 percent, respectively. The differences in terms of those with advanced academic degrees are even more striking. Overall, even though both Jews and the overall white population have raised their educational levels, over the past three decades the pace of

Figure 2 Jewish Character of Residential Neighborhoods: American Jews, 1970 and 1990

Table 3 Percentage with Academic Education Among Jews and Total Whites Aged 25 Years and Older, 1957, 1970, and 2000

Year	Jewish Population	Total White Population	Ratio of Jews to Whites
1957 <sup>a</sup>	17.3	7.0	2.42
1970 <sup>b</sup>	32.9	11.3	2.91
2000 <sup>c</sup>	62.2	26.1	2.38

<sup>a</sup>Goldstein 1969, 1981.

<sup>b</sup>For Jews, the authors' own data analysis of the 1970–1971 NJPS; for total white population, Goldstein 1981.

<sup>c</sup>For Jews, the authors' own data analysis of the 2000–2001 NJPS; for total white population, U.S. Census Bureau: American FactFinder.

employed in white collar jobs (including professional, managerial, and clerical and sales positions), whereas the corresponding percentage among all American men was only 35 percent. By 1970, the proportion in these positions among both subgroups had increased to 89 percent and 42 percent, respectively. Since then the proportion of white collar workers among Jewish men remained stable, but among all employed white men it continued to increase to slightly more than half in 2000. The recent tendencies among Jews may indicate an increase in the number of craft-people and service workers, deriving either from changing economic opportunities or changing value systems and life styles. However, within the broad category of white collar workers, the gap between Jews and non-Jews in the percentage of professionals has increased, while the percentage of those employed in managerial positions has converged. Overall, the ratio of Jews to total population in white collar occupations declined from 2.18 in 1957 to 2.12 in 1970, and down to 1.74 in 2000. Among women, differences between Jews and total whites also declined; the respective ratios were 1.51, 1.42, and 1.22 (Table 4).

In accordance with the different employment structures of Jews and (non-Hispanic) whites, the income level of Jews is higher. Nevertheless, the increase in higher education among total whites and the decrease in differences in occupational composition have reduced the Jewish income advantage. The difference in median real income (before taxes) between Jewish households and urban, non-Hispanic white households diminished by nearly half—from $15,748 in 1969 to $8,570 in 1989 (Walters and Wilder 1997). The decrease in the income advantage of Jews was observed in different types of households, according to age, gender, and number of working members in the household. This tendency of narrowing income gaps between Jews and non-Jews continued over the last decade of the 20th century from a 34 percent difference in the median income of Jews and all U.S. households in 1990 to a 29 percent difference in 2000 (Kotler-Berkowitz et al. 2003).

The occupational structure of the Jews indicates absolute freedom in the choice of occupation and kinds of economic activity. The tendency toward less ethnic con-change was greater among total whites, thereby narrowing somewhat the differentials between the two subpopulations. It should be noted that both Jewish men and women participate in this process, albeit the pace of change was far more rapid among the latter, thus reducing the differences in level of education by gender among American Jews.

Education is closely related to occupation. Thus, it is not surprising to find a considerable concentration of Jews in the upper strata of the employment hierarchy (Table 4). Already in the late 1950s slightly more than three-quarters of Jewish men were centration and greater heterogeneity among members of the second and third generation of Jewish immigrants turned again into concentration because “the Jews begin to reach the upper limit of occupational mobility relatively early” (Glazer 1958, 146). These patterns of concentration may distinguish Jews from other Americans by a large measure of structural unity. As Goldscheider and Zuckerman argue in The Transformation of the Jews (5), this profile not only enhances the interaction of Jews with one another, but it also makes them partners in political goals, economic interests, social values, and cultural styles, which may strengthen Jewish cohesion. Likewise, there has been a reduction in the percentage of Jewish households with a low income, which may facilitate a greater degree of communal involvement (Walters and Wilder 1997). Alternatively, a more concerned perception will focus on the question of what will happen at the end of this social mobility. The tendency toward greater socioeconomic homogeneity between Jews and the total population reduces the relative advantage of the former, and hence their status and power in various social and political arenas. This may also lead to a certain degree of economic uncertainty, with all the implications that may have on organizational involvement and contributions to Jewish causes. One ought to follow the interrelationships between the human resources and relative economic wealth of the Jews and their group identification, while also taking note of the fluid macro conditions in the American economy.

Interfaith Marriage

An inevitable result of structural integration is amalgamation, that is, marital assimilation. The frequency of mixed marriage is a central test of the degree of cultural and spiritual integration between the ethnoreligious components of a given society. Because marriage is an enduring and extremely intimate phenomenon, mixed marriages are an excellent expression of social distance enabling assessment of social boundaries between subpopulations as well as the willingness of

Table 4 Percentage in White-Collar Occupations among Jews and Total Whites Aged 25 Years and Older by Sex, 1957, 1970, and 2000

Year	Jewish Population	Total White Population	Ratio of Jews to Whites
1957 <sup>a</sup>
Men	77.5	35.5	2.18
Professionals	(20.3)	(9.9)	(2.05)
Women	82.7	54.9	1.51
Professionals	(15.5)	(12.2)	(1.27)
1970 <sup>b</sup>
Men	89.2	42.0	2.12
Professionals	(31.7)	(15.0)	(2.11)
Women	92.8	65.1	1.42
Professionals	(30.8)	(16.3)	(1.89)
2000 <sup>c</sup>
Men	89.4	51.3	1.74
Professionals	(53.0)	(19.8)	(2.67)
Women	92.3	75.6	1.22
Professionals	(51.4)	(28.5)	(1.80)

<sup>a</sup>Source: Goldstein 1969. Population aged 18 years and older; total population includes nonwhites.

<sup>b</sup>Source: For Jews, the author's data analysis of the 1970–1971 NJPS; for total white population, Goldstein 1981. Total white population includes persons aged 16 years and older.

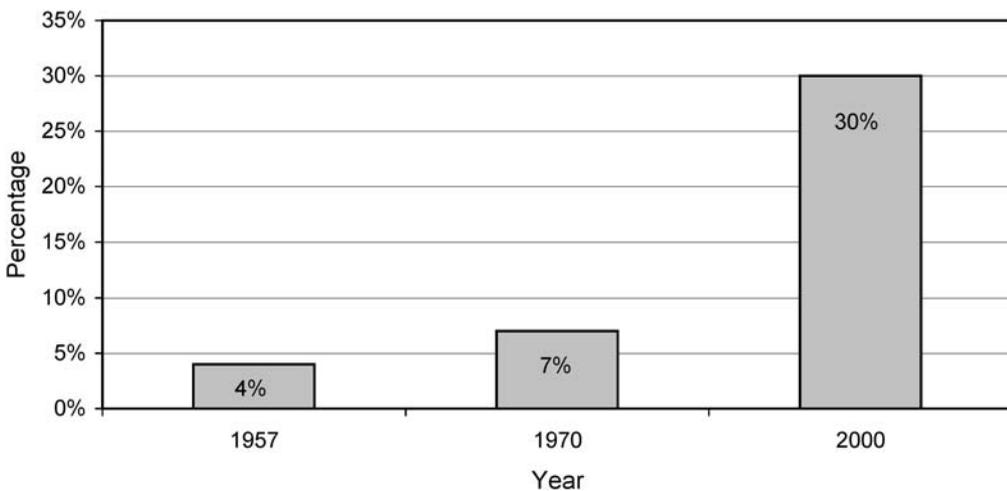

<sup>c</sup>Source: Chiswick 2005.

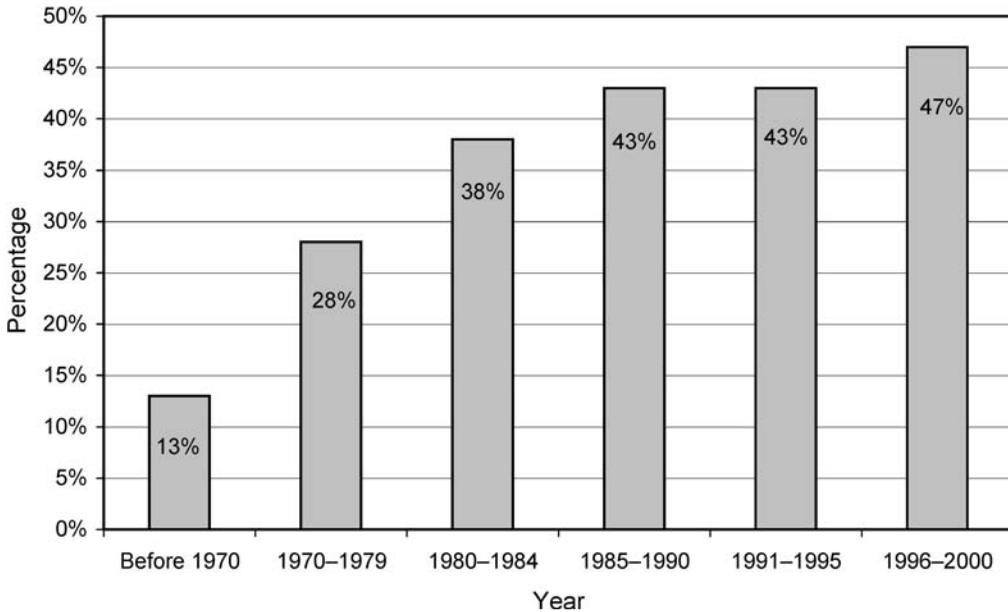

members of a group and those outside it to accept one another in long-term and equal relationships.

Until the middle of the 20th century, mixed marriage was a rare phenomenon among American Jews. The involvement and integration of Jews within the general society did not ipso facto involve assimilation. Only some 4 percent of all Jews who were married in 1957 had a spouse who was not born Jewish and had not converted to Judaism. By 1970, this rate had increased to about 7 percent. However, this average reflects very different patterns according to marriage cohort, varying from 2 percent among those who married during the first quarter of the century, to a maximum of more than one-fifth among those who had married during the preceding five years, that is, 1965–1970. Jewish heterogamy increased over the next three decades, reaching an overall level of 31 percent of all currently married Jews in 2000 (Figure 3). Again, there is a distinct difference depending on year of marriage (Figure 4): intermarriage rates increased from 13 percent among those married before 1970 to as high as 47 percent of those married in 1996–2001 (Kotler-Berkowitz et al. 2003). This suggests that marriage to people of a different faith had become the norm rather than the exception, representing the abandonment of a long history of endogamous marriage among Jews.

The increase in mixed marriages reflects social and spiritual changes among American Jews, which were part of a wider all-American phenomenon. These include, among other things, an increase in secularism and a weakening of religious commitment; an increasing emphasis on individualism, including the individual freedom in the choice of a marriage partner; the feasibility of civil marriage; and the increasingly salient role of all women in Western society, which has greatly increased the tendency of Jewish women to intermarry and contributed disproportionately to the overall growth of this phenomenon among American Jews. From a demographic-structural viewpoint, the mid-20th century was characterized by great fluctuations in birthrates, from a low during the late 1930s and early 1940s to the subsequent postwar baby boom. Those born during these years reached marriageable age during the past three decades and, as bridegrooms are on the average several years older than brides, this created a gender imbalance in the Jewish marriage market.

Figure 3 Jewish Intermarriage in the United States, 1957, 1970, and 2000

Figure 4 Jewish Inter-marriage in the United States by Year of Marriage

Several individual characteristics also constitute determinants of endogamous versus mixed marriage (Figure 5). The increase in the number of mixed marriages among the later marriage cohorts corresponds to the growing tendency toward exogamy among young people, which are also found in later generations in the United States. Despite the growing tendency of Jewish women toward mixed marriages, at the close of the 20th century the overall Jewish population was still characterized by a lower rate of mixed marriage among women than among men. All other things being equal, the high socioeconomic status of belonging to a professional occupation and having high income reduces the probability of mixed marriage. The arrival of a large number of Jews at the highest social and economic levels increases the frequency of contacts among Jews and creates an amenable environment for various kinds of social contacts, including marriage. The high educational and professional profiles of increasing numbers of Jews also influence the similarity of worldviews and attitudes in the political and cultural realm, as well as types of preferred leisure activities, which may modify the levels of mixed marriage.

Differences in marriage patterns also exist in relation to geographic characteristics. The intermarriage rate in the West is almost twice as high as in the Northeast. Surprisingly, it has recently become clear that there is a tendency toward higher rates of mixed marriage in places with high Jewish density (Figure 5). This somewhat unexpected finding can be explained by the fact that the largest concentrations of

Figure 5 A Schematic Presentation of the Direction of Factors Involved in the Sociodemographic Causes and Religioethnic Consequences of Jewish Mixed Marriage in the United States

Source: Adapted from Rebhun and DellaPergola 1998; Rebhun 1999.

Jews are also the main centers of large non-Jewish populations, which are to an increasing extent the metropolises of the West and are no longer the highly concentrated urban areas of traditional Jewish settlement, such as New York. And even within these cities of traditional settlement themselves, the Jewish population is far more scattered than it was in the past, a situation that increases the intensity of social contact between Jews and non-Jews. Moreover, the recently developed areas of the western United States are characterized by cultural diversity and supportive, progressive attitudes toward social mixing and unions between people of different origins.

The high rate of mixed marriage among Jews reflects successful integration and acceptance by the majority society. It also carries definite implications for group continuity. From a demographic-quantitative perspective, mixed marriage seemingly does not have a direct impact on the size of the Jewish population: the number of Jews leaving Judaism is very similar to the number of those joining it. Nevertheless, it does have long-term effects, as only about one-third of the offspring of the mixed couples are raised as Jews, a far lower number than is necessary for generational replacement of the Jewish side. Moreover, from a cultural-qualitative perspective, mixed marriages weaken the connection through reduced communal involvement and group values. Along a wide spectrum of identificational patterns, whether religious observance, institutional affiliation, or involvement in informal Jewish social networks, it is clear that mixed marriage erodes Jewish cohesion (Figure 5).

American Jewish Liberalism

Explanations of Jewish Liberalism

The spectrum of worldviews and ideologies found in the United States today regarding political, social, and economic issues may be classified along a continuum ranging from liberalism to conservatism. Each outlook, liberal or conservative, has in turn moderate and radical variants, and in the middle are those who define themselves as middle of the road. Ideology, as an attitudinal structure, serves to interpret and construct political reality.

Traditionally, Jews played an active and even outstanding role in the leadership of liberal and socialist movements and parties in the United States. A significant portion of them adhered to a liberal political ideology, or one leaning toward the socialist Left. The deep roots of Jewish liberalism, and its part in the Jewish self-definition, extends throughout the entire 20th century. Although there is a broad consensus regarding the liberal profile of most of the Jews, social scientists offer a variety of interpretations for this phenomenon. One theory explains it in terms of a historical development, in that the contents of this ideology served the Jews well, in the practical sense (Cohen 1958; Walzer 1986). From the time of the French Revolution, Jews have found their allies in liberal circles, as they did in circles of the radical socialist Left that developed from the end of the 19th century both in Europe and the United States. Jews understood that they could advance in societies with liberal regimes, in which social and economic mobility was determined by achievement, and discrimination was legally forbidden. Classical liberalism emphasized the principle of individualism that legitimized the rights of minorities, including the Jews, and encouraged their full integration within local society. Because liberalism is also at the center of the American ethos, loyalty to its principles provides Jews with the means for proving their full identification with the United States.

A second theory sees the source of Jewish liberalism in Judaism's religious values. Three basic principles connect religion with the social agenda: the study of Torah that leads to intellectualism, universalism and tolerance; charity (tzedakah) as a Jewish imperative that brings in its wake support for the welfare state, rights of minorities, and progressive taxation; and a this-worldly emphasis, expressed in a dynamic approach that fosters activism and the desire to shape and improve society (Fuchs 1956). More generally, Jewish values and the religious characteristics of its communal life are strong predictors of Jewish liberalism (Legge 1995). The third explanation (first suggested in 1960) is sociological, and it suggests that the source of Jewish liberalism lies in the dissonance between the Jews' high socioeconomic attainments and the limited degree of their social acceptance (Lipset 1960). This lack of consistency in Jewish status creates a feeling of marginality that is translated into support for liberal and even radical movements that challenge the social order and the cultural establishment that oppresses them. Yet a fourth theory concerning the political socialization of the Jews claims the transmission from one generation to another of the pro-liberal historical lesson; "We propose that the contemporary ideology of Jewish elites is a product of political socialization. Jewish liberalism is part of a family of liberalism that developed in response to European conditions. The tradition persists despite the changes that have taken place in American society in recent years" (Lerner et al. 1989, 331). The liberal tradition is thus transmitted from one generation to another through the institution of the family, which functions as the primary agent of socialization. If the elites, whose socioeconomic status gives them interests that on occasion contradict the liberal outlook, nevertheless identify with it, all the more so for other social classes.

The fifth theory, the sociocultural one, interprets liberalism as the reaction of Jews who desire the option of education and modernity but reject its implications (Liebman 1973). The source of Jewish liberalism lies in the values of those Jews who, while alienated from the religious tradition, find themselves interacting with other Jews, and this interaction plays an important role in their liberalism. The Jewish commitment is not toward liberalism, which has a message that is essentially one of internationalism, welfare society policy, and civil liberties, but toward enlightenment and the optimistic belief that human reason can create a good and progressive society that does not grant religion a role in the decisions of the state. Yet another theory sketches a framework of political behavior based on a perception of Jewish political interests (Medding 1977). These include both micro-political interests, namely of survival (in the case of American Jews, this means primarily the physical existence of the State of Israel), full participation in social life, religious freedom and patterns of particularist-group organization, and economic interests matching their occupational structure as well as macro-political interests, namely those relating to issues of legislation and organization of the social order in such a way as to allow the realization of the micro-political interests and guarantee their continuity.

Trends in Political Orientation and Voting Patterns

How did the liberal ideology of American Jews find expression in political action and voting patterns in presidential elections? The political preferences of American Jews during the 20th century were fashioned largely by developments within the American political scene (Rosenberg and Howe 1976). It should be noted that Jews are a very politically aware group, and their rate of participation in presidential elections (80 percent) is much higher than that of the general population (50 percent). Thus the total number of Jewish voters comes to about 4 percent of the total electorate, even though their proportion in the overall population is less than 3 percent (Fischer 1981). Moreover, the concentration of Jews in six of the largest states with large numbers of electoral votes (New York, California, New Jersey, Florida, Illinois, and Pennsylvania), enhances the importance of the Jewish vote and renders the Jews a sector to be courted by politicians. Contributions to political parties give the Jews economic power, and the fact that they occupy focal positions in the shaping of public opinion—in teaching, the written and electronic media, and the legal and political systems—strengthens their position as an influential political factor (Fischer 1981; Lefkowitz 1993).

Since the end of World War I, an increasingly large proportion of Jews has voted for the Democratic Party, their rate of support reaching its peak in the 1930s and 1940s, when more than 90 percent of the Jews gave their vote to Franklin Delano Roosevelt. In those days the platform of the Democratic Party, in both foreign policy (involvement in World War II and later support for creating the State of Israel) and domestic policy (massive involvement in social and economic life and laying the foundations for the modern welfare state), corresponded with Jewish interests. A liberal-democratic coalition developed comprising various ethnic groups, including Jews, blacks, and Italians, whose common interest was protecting the weaker members of society and helping marginal groups. During the early 1960s, cooperation and an alliance between Democratic Jews and blacks strengthened in connection with the struggle for civil rights.

In all of the elections from 1932 on (with the exception of the 1980 election after President Jimmy Carter's term), between 65 percent and 90 percent of American Jews voted for the Democratic candidate; in every election from 1924 on, Jews voted for the Democrats at a rate of about 25 percent more than the rest of the population (Lefkowitz 1993; New York Times 1996; CNN 2000; Pew Research Center 2004). Notwithstanding the considerable increase in support for the Republican Party in the 1972 elections, in which 35 percent of the Jews voted for Richard Nixon (at the end of his first term as president, during which he had demonstrated a sympathetic approach to Israel), the Democratic candidate George McGovern nevertheless received the majority of the Jewish vote.

Since the late 1960s, a certain decline in Jewish support for the Democratic Party has taken place. Several factors led to this change: (1) the awareness of black people has grown, as has tension with whites in general, including Jews, over issues of quotas, affirmative action, and the accomplishment-based system (Lipset 1972; Rosenberg and Howe 1976); (2) the crisis in secular liberal thought after World War II and the turn toward extreme Leftism, as opposed to traditional liberalism, were involved in the growth of the New Left. The American Left as a whole was flooded by radical elements opposed to the establishment and was distanced from Jews to the point of hostility toward Jewish interests (in reality, after the Six-Day War, this hostility included Israel as well, which was now understood to be an established state with substantial economic and political resources, that is, from the United States and its Jews) as opposed to growing sympathy for the Arabs and Palestinians, who were now seen as weak, unfortunate, and underdeveloped (Lipset 1971); (3) the ascent of the New Right and the Religious Right whose pro-Israel bias saw the state in religious terms as the stronghold of opposition to the undemocratic Arab world, alongside alliance with the United States in its struggle against communism; (4) the breakdown of the liberal-Democratic coalition that was created in the days of Roosevelt and the New Deal and served as the basis for the consensus and cooperation in the liberal camp that championed a social policy of a socialist orientation (Kristol 1988); and (5) the number of independent candidates, who were mostly breakaways from the Democratic party, grew (Schneider 1981).

Despite the aforementioned tendencies, some of which are related to more transient developments in the overall social and economic configuration of the United States, the Democrats retained the support of a definite majority of American Jews. Among other ethnic groups and age groups, the move toward the Republican Party was far greater. The fluctuations in the political support of American Jews were influenced by worries regarding support of Israel, racial politics, and the empowerment of religion in public life. The growth in Jewish support of the Republican Party that began in 1972 declined between 1980 and 2000. The two presidential elections of 1996 and 2000 gave evidence of the ongoing liberal tendency, as 8 of every 10 Jews gave their vote to the Democratic presidential candidate. The feeling that Jewish life in the United States is relatively secure did not weaken the sense of a need to support the universal interests of equality and social justice. Alternatively, it can be argued that despite their social integration, the Jews have maintained a high degree of awareness of belonging to a uniquely defined subgroup, perhaps involving some degree of uncertainty about “the security of their own achievements” as well as “skepticism regarding the Republican Party’s willingness to accept as permanent the ‘Civil Rights revolution’” (Kristol 1990, 112). The elections of 2004 revealed a slight reverse in Jewish political preference: 25 percent of Jewish voters voted for George W. Bush, up from 19 percent in 2000 (Pew Research Center 2004). Future presidential elections will show whether this was a passing phenomenon reflecting support for Bush policies against terrorism or a real shift in Jewish political behavior associated with the structural changes of a growing proportion of Orthodox Jews and the increasing rate of Jews living in interfaith households as well as changes in self-interest toward more materialistic economic and specific public policy (Windmueller 2003).

Political Orientation and Sociodemographic Attributes

In 2000, slightly more than half (56.5 percent) of the Jews in the United States held a liberal (including extremely liberal and slightly liberal) political stance; the remaining Jewish population was equally split between those who described themselves as being in the center of the political map (middle of the road), and conservative (including extremely conservative and slightly conservative [Table 5]). This political profile is quite different from that of the overall American population, which is characterized by a definite tendency toward being conservative (42 percent) or middle of the road (28 percent), and only 29 percent hold a liberal political stand (author’s online data analysis of the 2000 American National Election Study).

Within America’s Jewish community there are also interesting differences in political attitudes based on demographic and socioeconomic characteristics. Fewer Jewish men than Jewish women have liberal political orientations (50.9 percent versus 61.6 percent, respectively); a relatively high proportion of the men described themselves as being conservative. This difference may be explained, among other things, by the greater interaction of Jewish men with their non-Jewish counterparts in the workplace or residential neighborhoods. There is also correlation between age and political ideology: younger Jews, especially those in their thirties and early forties, tend more toward the liberal end of the American political map.

Insofar as political ideology reflects a wider worldview relating to issues of social justice, equal rights, the institution of marriage, and so on, one may assume that a higher proportion of the married will be middle of the road or conservative as opposed to the unmarried, who will have more liberal political tendencies. These conjectures are confirmed by empirical evidence: whereas 21.5 percent of the married people were middle of the road and another 24.9 percent described themselves as conservative, the corresponding figures among the unmarried (singles) were 19.7 percent and 18.7 percent, respectively (Table 5). Among the former group, only 53.6 percent were liberal, versus 61.6 percent among the unmarried. The fact that a more liberal political ideology is likely to be correlated with a break with traditional social relations, among other things in relation to the institution of marriage, is expressed in the high percentage (61.1 percent) of liberal Jews among the divorced and separated. Dismantling the family framework is justified by adopting and

Table 5 The American Jewish Population (Aged 18 Years and Older) by Sociodemographic Characteristics and Political Orientation, 2000 (in Percent)

Sociodemographic Characteristics	Political Orientation <sup>a</sup>
	Liberal	Middle of the Road	Conservative
Political orientation	56.5	21.1	22.4
Gender
Male	50.9	22.3	26.8
Female	61.6	20.1	18.3
Age
18–29 years	56.2	22.1	21.7
30–44 years	59.4	19.4	21.3
45–64 years	55.1	18.5	26.3
65+ years	55.9	26.0	18.2
Region of residence
Northeast	53.0	21.7	25.3
Midwest	58.6	19.0	22.4
South	55.7	22.7	21.6
West	63.2	19.3	17.4
Marital status
Married	53.6	21.5	24.9
Single	61.6	19.7	18.7
Divorced/separated	61.1	19.2	19.7
Widowed	57.7	24.8	17.5
Education
High school or less	43.5	23.8	32.7
1–3 years of college	53.0	22.2	24.7
Baccalaureate degree	58.6	21.2	20.2
Advanced degree	64.8	18.4	16.8
Occupation
Blue collar	36.5	25.9	37.6
Clerical/sales	54.7	19.3	26.0
Managers	51.6	22.9	25.5
Professional	61.3	18.6	20.1
Annual income
Up to $30,000	60.8	15.9	23.3
$30,000–$59,999	60.2	17.1	22.8
$60,000–$99,999	63.7	19.3	17.0
$100,000 and over	52.6	23.2	24.2

<sup>a</sup>Liberal includes extremely liberal, liberal, and slightly liberal; conservative includes extremely conservative, conservative, and slightly conservative.

Source: The author's data analysis of the 2000 NJPS.

adhering to a liberal worldview as a mechanism of psychological self-strengthening (cognitive dissonance).

Higher education increases the probability of adhering to liberal positions (Table 5). As education is a key factor in occupational mobility, it implies professional status, which is also associated with a liberal political orientation. By contrast, people in the highest income category are disproportionately middle of the road and conservative; it is likely that many of these are self-employed businesspeople who work in high-technological industries with their political preference reflecting a somewhat capitalist-oriented economic view.

American Jewry and Israel

Israel in the Mind of American Jews

The establishment of the State of Israel introduced a new dimension into American Jewish existence. The attitude toward Israel in American Jewish consciousness and identification has undergone transformations since then—particularly after the Six-Day War, in the wake of both external and internal events on the Israeli political front since the late 1970s, and in light of internal social tendencies within the local Jewish community. As background to an analysis of these processes one should note, as Alan Ezrachi suggested, that most American Jews were born in the United States and therefore have no personal memories or nostalgia connected with Israel, which is conceptualized not as an “old country” but rather as a “symbolic homeland.” Moreover, the attitude to Israel is not necessarily a function of knowledge or familiarity with it: most American Jews are not acquainted with the various trends within Israeli culture or with its political life, their support of Israel being a symbol of Jewish self-identification; nor does it have anything in common, generally speaking, with Zionism or with a Jewish national self-definition (Cohen 1987).

Israel is perhaps the largest part of the symbolic core of American-Jewish religion and identity, support of Israel being a central component in defining the boundaries of the American-Jewish collective and consensus. From a functional viewpoint, Israel contributes to the cohesion and definition of the Jewish collective, as it does to personal identity. To borrow from Edward Shils’ concept regarding center and periphery, the importance of Israel lies in its being an elective center for those Jews who see themselves as Zionists and express concern for Israel. Such an approach is consistent with the perception of Israel as a major factor in the framework of Jewish macropolitical interests.

A considerable portion of the personal, and in particular institutional, Jewish time (which is quite limited) is connected with Israel: meetings, consultations, and lobbying among bodies that help Israel on the local, national and international level; campus activity; demonstrations; reading newspapers and listening to news about Israel; and visiting Israel. There is also extensive involvement with Israel in the Jewish educational system as a tool for deepening Jewish identity. As they attempt to shape secular patterns of identity and interest in their ethnoreligious group, American Jews have found that their relationship to Jewish organizations and institutions—and through their means also support of Israel, both material and emotional—serves as a central element of identity and continuity (Goldscheider 1989). Attitudes to Israel are likewise motivated by bureaucratic considerations, as they provide legitimacy for the Jewish-American organizational structure that provides employment, power, and prestige to those close to it.

Many Jews perceive Israel as a home and a refuge. “Many American Jews see Israel in the psychological sense as a ‘parachute’ or ‘safety net,’ in the event that American society will again not see them as desirable citizens” (author’s translation of Goldscheider 1989, 40). But Israel is much more than a physical and psychological haven for American Jews: it is also a home port for Jews from all over the world, such as the Jews of the Soviet Union and other oppressed communities, that helps alleviate the guilt feelings of American Jews for not doing enough to bring them to the United States. Israel as home connotes security. The feeling that Israel is a haven of security appears primarily among the older Jewish population in urban areas. Support for Israel is always a kind of counterbalance against the limitations of acceptance into American society. But today there seems to be greater acceptance by the surrounding society, and American Jews are less troubled by the issue of their dual loyalty to the United States and Israel (Don-Yehiya 1991).

Over the course of time, after the extraordinary romance after the Six-Day War, a certain distancing and weakening has become evident in the connection between American Jews and Israel. This has become particularly noticeable since the end of the 1970s, and it may be attributed to several causes: (1) as a liberal social-democratic public, American Jews were more comfortable with the Labor Party that had been in power continuously from the creation of the state until the political turnabout of 1977, with the election of Menachem Begin as prime minister; (2) over the course of time, more representatives of Oriental Jewry have penetrated the political leadership, which made it more difficult for them to find a common language with American Jewry and led to a certain degree of distance and alienation; (3) the Lebanon War of 1982 led the Jewish establishment to draw a distinction between support of and loyalty to Israel, which remained strong, and their support of a current government’s policy, which was no longer automatic (in general, American Jews today feel freer to adopt independent views with regard to Israel and to criticize Israel’s positions and policies; this is truer of the Jewish public generally, among younger people, and among those who are more politically liberal than it is of the Jewish leadership) (Don-Yehiya 1991); (4) there is discomfort with Israel’s handling of the Palestinian uprisings, both the previous one of the late 1980s and early 1990s and the present Intifada; (5) tension surrounds the issues of “Who is a Jew?” and the lack of recognition by the Israeli rabbinic establishment of the Conservative and Reform movements in Israel (the ideologies with which an absolute majority of American Jews identify); and (6) there have been other incidents, such as the Irangate affair, the relations between Israel and South Africa during the apartheid period, and the Pollard affair, in which an American Jew working for an American intelligence agency was discovered to be spying for Israel.

American Jews distinguish between support for Israel and adherence to the classical Zionist position, meaning immigration (aliyah) to Israel. They likewise distinguish between concern for Israel and support for Israel’s policies. Nevertheless, at times of unrest overseas, identification with their symbolic homeland strengthens and, during the period since the outbreak of Al-Aksa Intifada in September 2000, there has been a renewal of political and public activity on behalf of Israel and a strengthening of Jewish identification generally. Thus, for example, the proportion of American Jews who identify to a certain or a considerable degree with Israel grew from 72 percent in January 2001 to 82 percent in October 2006 (Ha'aretz 2001). Likewise, the year 2001, despite the economic difficulties in the world and specifically in the United States, was one of the most successful years ever for State of Israel Bonds, which succeeded in raising the highest ever sum—21 percent greater than that of the previous year (Basok 2002). The State of Israel Bonds organization sells government bonds to private people and institutions, the monies received going to Israel's development budget, thereby expressing the connection between the purchasers and the State of Israel. Nevertheless, the voices of reservation and discomfort with some of Israel's activities in the West Bank and Gaza have not been silent.

Patterns of Identification and Intergenerational Differences

The distancing from Israel is also a consequence of intergenerational changes and transformations in the demographic and social profile of American Jews. Members of younger generations have not needed to deal with the challenges of their own absorption as Jews into American society. They did not live through the terrible period of the Holocaust, nor did they experience the great excitement of the creation of the State of Israel. Recent years have been characterized by increasing rates of intermarriage and the weakening of relations to Jewish institutions and organizations, which cannot but eventually lead to erosion in American Jews' support for Israel.

To the question, "How emotionally attached are you to Israel?" slightly less than 30 percent of Jews below the age of 45 reported a very strong attachment to Israel, as opposed to 40 percent among the elderly (Table 6). At the other end of the identification spectrum, 15.3 percent of the youngest group reported no emotional attachment to Israel, a proportion that decreases with increase in age, to only 7.9 percent among the oldest group. Similarly, approximately one-fourth (23.3 percent) of the youngest Jews stated that caring about Israel is not at all important, or perhaps only a bit important, to being Jewish as opposed to a far lower rate (13.3 percent) among the older group. One and a half times as many elderly, compared with the youngest, consider caring about Israel to be strongly involved with being Jewish—61.2 percent and 41.2 percent, respectively.

Also in the behavioral area, a smaller percentage of younger people have visited Israel at least once. This difference, of course, reflects the cumulative effect of the opportunities for traveling abroad that naturally increase with age—among other factors this is due to better economic conditions, more free income, and the lessened responsibility for small children. It should be noted, however, that a comparison with earlier empirical evidences (not shown here) suggests that in each age group the rate of those who had ever visited Israel increased over time. Because there is a strong and positive relationship between visits to Israel and emotional attachment, there are evidently polarizing processes among young Jews in which one segment weakens the emotional and behavioral relations to Israel and another segment

Table 6 Ties to Israel, by Age: American Jews in 2000

Ties to Isarel	Age
	Total	18–29	30–44	45–64	65+
Attachment to Israel
Not at all	10.9	15.3	14.3	8.6	7.9
Not very	20.2	23.3	24.6	21.2	12.9
Somewhat	37.3	31.8	34.6	40.0	39.7
Very	31.6	29.5	26.5	30.1	39.5
Being Jewish: Caring about Israel
Not at all	7.1	8.9	8.3	6.6	5.3
A little	12.2	14.4	16.7	11.1	8.0
Somewhat	35.4	35.6	39.9	39.6	25.5
A lot	45.3	41.2	35.1	42.7	61.2
Visits to Israel
No visits	61.5	67.4	67.5	64.6	48.0
One visit	21.2	16.8	18.2	18.2	30.9
Two visits	6.7	6.4	4.2	6.8	9.1
Three visits or more	10.6	9.4	10.1	10.4	12.0

Source: The author's data analysis of the 2000 NJPS.

strengthens them, thereby somewhat modifying the overall process of the eroding identification with Israel.

The weakening in the relationship with Israel is further documented by comparative data from the late 1980s until 1997 (Cohen 1999). These findings indicate a decline in the intensity of emotional ties to Israel and in the degree of closeness to Israeli Jewish people. In the area of philanthropy, contributions to Israel have experienced a recent drop; there are several indexes of this, including the overall sum given to Israel (in real terms adjusted for inflation) and the percentage of the total amount of money given to Israel as against that given for the needs of the local community. Part of the explanation of these transformations in philanthropy is rooted in the feeling that today Israel is capable of caring for its own needs, and that the local community poses critical challenges in ensuring group continuity. Even though Israel still plays a leading role in the feeling of group belonging, the overall changes by age group and over time lead to the conclusion that American Jews today are more distant from Israel than in the past.

Scenarios for Future Developments

Whether judged by their residential preferences, educational and occupational composition, or tendency toward interfaith marriage, it is clearly evident that Jews are successfully integrated into the social American mainstream. At the same time, however, they exhibit a unique political orientation different from that of the general American population; as Milton Himmelfarb has noted, Jews enjoy an economic status similar to that of the Episcopalian WASPs (white Anglo-Saxon Protestants), but their voting patterns resemble those of low-income Hispanics (Kristol 1990). The various interpretations proposed for Jewish liberalism are based on their history, the values of Jewish religion, or their characteristics as a minority group. This suggests that Jews in early 21st-century America maintain their support for universal interests such as quality and social justice. From a different point of view, it can be argued that despite their social integration, Jews maintain their consciousness of belonging to a defined minority with some degree of uncertainty about the security of their social achievements.

Most American Jews, as well as their predecessors, were neither born in Israel nor have ever lived there, yet Israel constitutes a major component in their multifaceted Jewish identity and their organized communal activities. Over time, the expressive and instrumental ties to Israel have somewhat weakened. This results, among other things, from social and political changes in Israel, as well as from intergenerational change, as an increasing number of American Jews have not witnessed the major events in world Jewry of the past half century, including the Holocaust, the establishment of the State of Israel and the Six-Day War. Despite these trends, a significant proportion of American Jews feel a definite and even strong attachment to Israel, which strengthens, albeit temporarily, at times of crisis in their symbolic homeland.

In the very near future, the dominant minority relations between American Jews and Israel is anticipated to change. Assuming no unanticipated, dramatic change, the different demographic behaviors of the two communities, identificational trends, and the magnitude of international migration, by the end of the first decade of the new century a plurality of the total world Jewish population should live in Israel, and an absolute majority by the middle of the century. These demographic evaluations, together with the increasing military and economic strength of Israel and, by contrast, the domestic challenges of ethnoreligious continuity confronting American Jewry, are expected to enhance Israel's position in the long-standing partnership between the two major pillars of world Jewry. Likewise, from a local point view, even if the number of American Jews remains stable, the total American population is constantly rising, including ethnic groups such as the Muslims; thus, the decline in the relative size of the Jewish population might result in a relative weakening of their electoral power and their political influence and lobbying for Israel.

As their integration into the general society becomes even deeper, a growing number of Jews view America as their homeland. This growth may well continue in the aftermath of the 9/11 terrorist attacks because of local pressures, either latent or visible, for stronger and more explicit expressions of national American identity on the part of members of ethnonational Diaspora communities. As the term "Diaspora" embodies a certain degree of attachment to another place, the frequency of its usage may decline somewhat. Under such circumstances, the issue of dual loyalty to America and another homeland may arise, and this could become relevant for Jews, particularly if Israeli policies and those of the United States are at odds, given the continued instability in the Middle East.

Finally, the social structural changes and the alterations in the relationship of American Jews to Israel have important policy implications. The Jewish community must adjust its organizational patterns and activities to mesh with the dynamic social and cultural preferences and lifestyles formed by the open and pluralistic mood in early 21st-century America. Under such circumstances, Jewish identificational patterns may be transfigured, but a strong and coherent attachment to the Jewish heritage must maintain its distinctiveness from other faiths. The legitimacy of ethnic and religious differences, which is part of the ethos of today's multicultural United States, must turn these complicated challenges into new opportunities to ensure the strength and long-standing vitality of the American Jewish Diaspora.

Selected Bibliography

- "After the Disaster: Support for Israel—Listening Carefully to the Government." 2001. Ha'aretz, November 16, 7A.
- Basok, Motti. 2002. "Peak in Bonds' Sales in 2001—About 1.1 Billion Dollars." Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper, January 2, C2.
- Beker, Avi. 2000. "Lieberman and the Jewish Condition." Jerusalem Post, August 21, 6.
- Cohen, Steven M. 1987. Ties and Tensions: The 1986 Survey of American Jewish Attitudes toward Israel and Israelis. New York: American Jewish Committee.
- Cohen, Steven M. 1999. "Did American Jews Really Grow More Distant from Israel, 1983–1997? A Reconsideration." In Envisioning Israel: The Changing Ideals and Images of North American Jews, edited by Allon Gal, 352–373. Beer-Sheva and Jerusalem: Ben-Gurion University of the Negev Press and Publishing House of the World Zionist Organization.
- Cohen, Warner. 1958. "The Politics of American Jews." In The Jews: Social Patterns of an American Group, edited by Marshall Sklare, 614–626. New York: Free Press.
- Don-Yehiya, Eliezer. 1991. "Solidarity and Autonomy in Israel-Diaspora Relations." In Israel and Diaspora Jewry: Ideological and Political Perspectives, edited by Eliezer Don-Yehiya, 9–27. Ramat Gan, Israel: Bar-Ilan University Press.
- Fischer, Alan M. 1981. "Jewish Political Shift? Erosion, Yes; Conversion, No." In Party Coalitions in the 1980s, edited by Seymour M. Lipset, 327–340. San Francisco: Institute for Contemporary Studies.
- Fuchs, Lawrence. 1956. The Political Behavior of American Jews. Glencoe, IL: Free Press.
- Glazar, Nathan. 1958. "The American Jews and the Attendance of Middle Class Rank: Some Trends and Explanations." In The Jews: Social Patterns of an American Group, edited by Marshall Sklare, 138–146. New York: Free Press.
- Goldscheider, Calvin. 1989. "'Who is a Jew'—Why Are American Jews in Uproar?" [Hebrew]. Gesher: Journal of Jewish Affairs 119: 37–45.
- Goldscheider, Calvin, and Alan S. Zuckerman. 1985. The Transformation of the Jews. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Jacobson, Matthew F. 1995. Special Sorrows: The Diasporic Imagination of Irish, Polish, and Jewish Immigrants in the United States. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Kotler-Berkowitz, Laurence A., et al. 2003. The National Jewish Population Survey 2000–01: Strength, Challenge and Diversity in the American Jewish Population. New York: United Jewish Communities.
- Kristol, Irving. 1988. "Liberalism and American Jews." Commentary (October): 19–23.
- Kristol, Irving. 1990. "The Liberal Tradition of American Jews." In American Pluralism and the Jewish Community, edited by Seymour M. Lipset, 109–116. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers.
- Lefkowitz, Jay P. 1993. "Jewish Voters and the Democrats." Commentary 95 (April): 38–41.

- Legge, Jerome S. 1995. "Explaining Jewish Liberalism in the United States: An Exploration of Socioeconomic, Religious, and Communal Living Variables." Social Science Quarterly 76: 124–141.
- Lerner, Robert, Althea K. Nagai, and Stanley Rothman. 1989. "Marginality and Liberalism among Jewish Elites." Public Opinion Quarterly 53: 330–352.
- Levy, Shlomit, Hanna Levinsohn, and Elihu Katz. 1997. "Beliefs, Observances and Social Interaction among Israeli Jews." In The Jewishness of Israel, edited by Charles S. Liebman and Elihu Katz, 1–37. Albany, NY: SUNY Press.
- Liebman, Charles S. 1973. The Ambivalent American Jew: Politics, Religion and Family in American Jewish Life. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America.
- Lipset, Seymour M. 1960. Political Man: The Social Basis of Politics. Garden City, NY: Doubleday.
- Lipset, Seymour M. 1971. "The Socialism of Fools: The Left, The Jews and Israel." In The New Left and the Jews, edited by Mordechai S. Chertoff, 103–131. New York: Pitman Publishing Corporation.
- Lipset, Seymour M. 1972. Group Life in America: A Task Force Report. New York: The American Jewish Committee.
- Lipset, Seymour M., and Earl Raab. 1995. Jews and the New American Scene. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Medding, Peter Y. 1977. "Towards a General Theory of Jewish Political Interests and Behaviour." The Jewish Journal of Sociology 19: 115–144.
- Pew Research Center. 2004. Religion and the Presidential Vote. Washington, DC: Pew Research Center.
- Rosenberg, Bernard, and Irving Howe. 1976. "Are the Jews Turning toward the Right?" In The New Conservatives: A Critique from the Left, edited by Irving Howe and Lewis A. Coser, 64–89. New York: New American Library.
- Schneider, William. 1981. "Democrats and Republicans, Liberals and Conservatives." In Party Coalitions in the 1980s, edited by Seymour M. Lipset, 179–231. San Francisco: Institute for Contemporary Studies.
- Sheffer, Gabriel. 2001. "Israelis, Israel and the Jewish Diaspora in the Last Decade" [Hebrew]. Kivunim Hadashim (New Directions): Journal of Zionism and Judaism 5: 148–170.
- Walters, William H., and Esther I. Wilder. 1997. "American Jewish Household Income, 1969 and 1989." Journal of Economic and Social Measurement 23: 197–212.
- Walzer, Michael. 1986. "Is Liberalism (Still) Good for the Jews?" Moment (March): 13–19.
- Windmueller, Steven. 2003. Are American Jews Becoming Republic? Insights into Jewish Political Behavior. Jerusalem Viewpoints, No. 509. Jerusalem: Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs.

American Jews and Radicalism

Gerald Sorin

---

Jews have been overrepresented in most radical movements in America, including socialism and communism, since as early the 1890s. Although the vast majority of Jewish Americans have not been radicals, an important minority helped shape the American Left in the modern period. Jews, although only 3 percent of the population of the United States, provided about 15 percent of the membership of the Socialist Party (SP) through the 1920s and about 40 percent of the Communist Party (CPUSA) rank and file in the 1930s. And right through the beginning of the 21st century, despite their remarkable social mobility, a substantial proportion of Jewish Americans continued to adhere to the political philosophy of left-liberalism.

The leadership of radical movements has also been disproportionately Jewish. Morris Hillquit and Victor Berger, each of whom served as national chair of the SP after World War I, were Jews. And the only Socialists ever elected to Congress were Jews: Berger from Milwaukee and Meyer London from New York.

The SP's most successful institutions were also Jewish. There was, first and foremost, The Jewish Daily Forward, which had a circulation of nearly 300,000, making it the largest Socialist paper in America. The Forward was, in addition, a major financial contributor to SP causes and election campaigns. Also closely tied to the SP was the Arbeiter Ring or Workmen's Circle, a mutual-aid organization of Jewish laborers that grew to more than 80,000 members by 1924. The United Hebrew Trades, a confederation of largely Jewish labor unions, was also saturated in socialism. This was especially true for the needle-workers' unions, like the International Ladies Garment Workers and the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, whose leaders, including David Dubinsky and Sidney Hillman, were affiliated with the SP.

The CPUSA was also often led by Jews, including Benjamin Gitlow and Jay Lovestone (born Jacob Liebstein), both of whom served as the party's general secretaries in the late 1920s. And throughout the 1930s and 1940s, more than 33 percent of the Central Committee of the CPUSA were of Jewish background. Moreover, the Freiheit, the party's Yiddish-language paper, was not only the first Communist daily published in the United States, but it had, for some time, an even larger circulation than the English-language Daily Worker. The Jewish People's Fraternal Order was the largest ethnic bloc in the CPUSA's umbrella organization, the International Workers' Order. Several unions with huge Jewish memberships were strongly influenced by communism, including the American Federation of Teachers and the Fur and Leather Workers' Union, whose president, Ben Gold, was a Jew and an avowed Communist.

Jewish radical movements in America were in large part products of two or three generations of East European Jewish immigration. The great mass of gainfully employed Jews in Eastern Europe had been small businesspeople and independent craftspeople for generations. The development of working-class consciousness among them began in earnest only in the late 19th century when large numbers of petit bourgeois Jews suffered precipitous economic displacement and were forced to work for wages. The making of the Jewish working class continued, and intensified, with immigration to the larger American cities, where most Jewish newcomers confronted an even more highly industrialized environment than they had begun to experience in Eastern Europe. Subjected to intense economic pressures, living in poverty, and uprooted from a traditional way of life, the immigrants were also exposed, especially in New York and several other large cities, to a growing left-wing culture. Here the implications of Jewish proletarianization were articulated and reinforced by the activities of a remarkable group of radical intellectuals and organizers—Jewish young men and women, mostly former students—who provided leadership and a persuasive and attractive socialist critique of capitalism.

Born in 1901, the SP attracted Jews in increasing and disproportionate numbers. In 1908, Jews made up about 39 percent of SP membership in Manhattan and the Bronx, New York. At the very same time the socialist-led Workingmen's Circle was also enrolling record numbers of Jews. And by 1908, the organization boasted 10,000 Jewish members, the vast majority of whom were sympathetic to socialism.

Even more important to the socialist movement was the Jewish Daily Forward, edited by Abraham Cahan at its founding in 1897, and again from 1903 to 1951. The Forward quickly changed the somewhat formal language of the paper to the Yiddish of the streets and shops. If "you want the public to read this paper and assimilate Socialism," Cahan told his staff, "you've got to write of things of everyday life, in terms of what they see and feel." Despite their cosmopolitanism and class-war vocabulary, then, the "liberated" radical leaders and Jewish labor militants did not secede from the ethnic community. Union organizers, intellectuals, journalists, and political activists, in their efforts to mobilize the Jewish proletariat, tried to synthesize the essential values of Jewish culture with the modern goals and values of the socialist movement. They consistently wove biblical references, Talmudic aphorisms, and prophetic injunctions into their socialist appeals. They wrote and spoke particularly about the concept of tzedakah (righteousness and social justice), and implicitly drew on the obligation of tikkun olam, the commandment to repair or improve the world. In all they emphasized communal responsibility and secular messianism. And they helped Jewish workers in their struggle to create new identities out of traditional materials in a modern context.

Visions of proletarian solidarity would dim over time to be overshadowed by the remarkable upward mobility of Jewish immigrants and their children. In the meantime, the Socialists furnished the Jewish labor movement with important vehicles of worker education and mobilization—the United Hebrew Trades, the Workmen's Circle, and the Jewish Daily Forward. With these institutions the East European immigrants built the first consciously Jewish power base in America. With that base, the socialist movement, between 1909 and 1917, set out, often successfully, through strikes and union-building to solve some of the more practical problems of the workers.

One of the more remarkable dimensions of American political culture from 1917 to about 1924 was Jewish attraction to the Soviet revolution. The Communist regime in Moscow seemed eager to recruit Jewish talent, and the hope of progress and modernity inherent in Communist ideology found resonance in Jewish political life in America. It was estimated that in the 1920s, Jews in the United States gave 4–5 percent of their votes to Communist candidates, at the same time they were giving approximately 12–15 percent to Socialists, both figures substantially higher than the national average. About 15 percent of the members of the CPUSA in the 1920s were Jewish. And in 1924 a small but determined Communist group, with the help of numerous sympathizers, had gained control of three locals of the heavily Jewish International Ladies Garment Workers Union.

Abetted by the "united front" policy of making alliance with other left-leaning and liberal groups (which in New York were also disproportionately Jewish) and a strategy of infiltrating Jewish organizations, the Communist Party increased its Jewish membership to an estimated 40 percent during the Depression. Yet by the mid-1920s, much of the enthusiasm of the Jews for Communism was already dissipating. Lenin had earlier ordered an end to anti-Semitic movements in Russia and the Ukraine that had left 75,000 Jews dead between 1918 and 1920. But this did not exempt the Jewish bourgeoisie from being considered “class enemies” of the revolution; and the general antibourgeois, antireligious policies of the Soviets under Stalin continued to create desperate conditions for Russian Jewry, including the wanton destruction of Jewish cultural and religious institutions and the imprisonment of thousands of Jewish leaders.

The ravages against Jews in the Soviet Union, coupled with the drive of Communists in the United States to co-opt Jewish unions and cultural institutions, continued to diminish Communism’s mystique. And between 1926 and 1930 the Jewish unions distanced themselves from the more radical left-wingers, and so did the vast majority of ordinary Jews. Communist support of Arab riots in Palestine in 1929, the purge trials of the 1930s in Moscow, and the Non-Aggression Pact between Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union in 1939, also cut into Jewish support of the Communists. CPUSA membership dropped by more than a third in 1939; and most of those who departed were Jews, virtually all of whom had been attracted to the party in the 1930s because they believed it to be the only effective enemy of fascism.

Many Jewish writers had also had leftist leanings in this era. Yiddish-speaking secularists such as Chaim Zhitlowsky; a champion of Jewish cultural nationalism, Nachman Syrkin, the foremost spokesman for labor Zionism; Shmuel Niger, the literary critic; and Hayim Greenberg, essayist and editor, constituted a small cadre of Yiddish intellectuals who manifested a strong interest in Jewish national resurgence, but most expected that resurgence to come associated with, or through a synthesis with socialism. Sidney Hook, Horace Kallen, Harry Wolfson, Lewis Mumford, and others associated with Elliot Cohen’s Menorah Journal were also inclined to support a “humanistic social order.” And a third group of Jewish writers on the left, the New York Intellectuals; included Philip Rahv, Lionel and Diana Trilling, Meyer Shapiro, Harold Rosenberg and Irving Howe. They expressed themselves mainly through The Partisan Review and later Dissent magazine, and they were held together by their utter revulsion against the Soviet experiment under Stalin, with which some of them had initially flirted; but they clearly maintained their socialist sensibilities, especially in the face of the strident anti-Semitism of the Right in the 1930s. If this last group of cosmopolitan intellectuals were on their way to losing varying degrees of their Jewish identity, there was still something familiarly Jewish in their penchant for a kind of Talmudic argumentation in their assumption of the inherent worth of intellectual pursuits and in their left-leaning proclivities.

A good number of Jewish writers of fiction were also on the left in the 1930s, several had been radicalized by the Depression and its attack on the American Dream. Henry Roth joined the CPUSA in 1933. Mike Gold who had joined some 10 years earlier became even more enthusiastic in the 1930s, especially about enlisting writers and artists for the revolutionary struggle. And Daniel Fuchs, Samuel Ornitz, and Edward Dahlberg, under the influence of the socialist realism school, were harshly judgmental of the low level of class consciousness and the high level of materialism and exploitation they perceived in American and Jewish society.

These accounts hint at the temporary character of Jewish radicalism. And indeed, by the middle of the 20th century, with the decline of anti-Semitism, the intensification of Jewish economic and social mobility, increasing acculturation, and even assimilation, and given the excesses of the Communists here and abroad, Jewish political values changed. Jewish movement to the Democratic Party began as early as 1912, but loyalty consistently manifested itself most powerfully in the 1930s during the Depression and New Deal (sometimes called by its enemies the “Jew Deal”). The Socialist Party lost virtually its entire Jewish mass base in 1936 when Socialist union leaders like David Dubinsky and Sidney Hillman took the lead in forming the American Labor Party in New York, and gave their backing to Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Continued support for Roosevelt’s programs led many one-time Jewish Socialists, and even Communists, to become liberal Democrats. And Jews, whether former socialists or not, gave Roosevelt an extraordinary proportion of their votes, always hovering around 90 percent; and they were the only ethnic group in the United States to increase its support for him and the liberal policies of his administration over the four elections through 1944.

Jews continued to be a unique force in American politics, often exhibiting the capacity to vote and act beyond both their class interest and the narrow interests of their group. In the early 1960s, even as the Jews proved to be the most economically successful ethnic group in America, a substantial percentage of the radical New Left was Jewish. And the Jewish presence, and indeed leadership, in the movements for civil rights and women’s equality, and against the Vietnam War, was manifestly obvious. Later, emerging tensions between blacks and Jews, partly generated by different economic and social mobility rates and partly by the politics of ethnic identity, increasingly challenged what had actually been a relatively uneasy and unequal alliance from the start. And the New Left’s increasing hostility toward Israel discouraged an enduring revival of radicalism in the Jewish American community. Nonetheless, the political vision of Jews, even into the fourth generation, remained focused on social justice, urban welfare, civil rights, civil liberties, and internationalism. These values reflected a distinctive American faith that was equated with the left wing of the Democratic Party. But it was a faith held so tenaciously by Jews, a substantial majority of whom were still connected to the traditions of communal responsibility, mutual aid, tzedakah, and tikkun olam, that liberalism could be seen as the political ideology of Jewish American ethnicity.

Selected Bibliography

- Frankel, Jonathan. 1981. Prophecy and Politics: Socialism, Nationalism and the Russian Jew, 1862–1917. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Glazer, Nathan. 1961. The Social Bases of American Communism. New York: Harcourt Brace.
- Howe, Irving. 1976. World of Our Fathers: The Journey of the East European Jews to America and the Life They Found and Made. New York: Harcourt, Brace Jovanovich.
- Moore, Deborah Dash. 1981. At Home in America: Second Generation Jews in New York. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Sorin, Gerald. 1985. The Prophetic Minority: American Jewish Immigrant Radicals, 1880–1920. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

American Jewry's Response to the Holocaust

Rafael Medoff

---

Adolf Hitler's rise to power in Germany in 1933 filled American Jews with apprehension, but Jewish leaders were divided over how to respond. Some major U.S. Jewish organizations, notably the American Jewish Committee and B'nai B'rith, opposed anti-Nazi rallies and boycotts. They preferred that Jewish intervention be limited to behind-the-scenes contacts with political officials, far from the public limelight. These groups were dominated by German-born or German-descended American Jews, who feared that public Jewish protests could arouse domestic anti-Semitism and endanger the socioeconomic success they had attained in America.

The American Jewish Congress, which had been established as an activist and nationalist alternative to the American Jewish Committee, was dominated by Jews of East European origin or descent who were less acculturated and thus more comfortable raising Jewish concerns in the public arena. The American Jewish Congress's founder and leader, Rabbi Dr. Stephen S. Wise, derided his American Jewish Committee rivals as "sh-sh Jews" because of their timidity in speaking out against the rising tide of anti-Semitism in Europe. During the 1930s, the American Jewish Congress organized "Stop Hitler Now" rallies and led the movement to boycott German goods.

Rabbi Wise was the most prominent and influential Jewish leader of the era. A dynamic speaker and energetic organizer, he also cochaired the World Jewish Congress and was prominent in the Reform rabbinate. In addition, his early support of Franklin Roosevelt and the New Deal gave Wise greater access to the White House than other Jewish leaders enjoyed.

Along with Wise's power and prestige came conflicts of conscience. He was privately disappointed by Roosevelt's refusal to criticize the persecution of German Jews, but said nothing publicly so as not to embarrass the president. Wise opposed a planned Senate resolution in 1933 expressing sympathy with German Jewry, for fear it would implicitly cast aspersions on Roosevelt. Wise initially refrained from endorsing a boycott of German goods in deference to the administration's opposition to the boycott, although he soon reversed his position in response to pressure from the American Jewish Congress rank and file.

Many German Jews hoped to escape Hitler by immigrating to the United States, but the Roosevelt administration, most of Congress, and most of the public opposed such an influx. American Jewish leaders believed there was no chance of changing that sentiment. Nativists had designed the U.S. immigration quota system to reduce immigration from the countries from which undesired immigrants, especially Jews and Catholics, had previously come in large numbers. The annual quota for Germany and Austria combined was 27,370 and for Poland was 6,542. Even those meager allotments were almost always underfilled, because the State Department actively discouraged would-be immigrants through a maze of requirements that many applicants were unable to fulfill. During the period of the Nazi genocide, from late 1941 until early 1945, only 10 percent of the quotas from Axis-controlled European countries were used—meaning that almost 190,000 quota places were unfilled.

Zionist Stephen Wise, one of the founders of the American Jewish Congress, 1928. (Library of Congress)

Jewish leaders refrained from seeking any liberalization of America's tight immigration quotas. They feared any effort to bring in more refugees would arouse domestic anti-Semitism and could provoke Congressional restrictionists to further tighten the quotas. Proposals to settle refugees in American-controlled territories not governed by the immigration quota system, such as the Virgin Islands and Alaska, were blocked by the administration. Mainstream Jewish leaders declined to endorse those proposals.

Many American Jews saw British Mandatory Palestine as the answer to the German Jewish crisis, but in 1939, London severely restricted Jewish immigration in response to Palestinian Arab violence. American Jewish leaders opposed the British restrictions, but refrained from protesting vigorously because of their sympathy for England's stance against Hitler. Rabbi Wise believed American Jews should "march shoulder to shoulder with England in the war against fascism, even if the Zionist cause suffered." Some Jewish groups feared a public ruckus over Palestine might be perceived as a Jewish attempt to drag America into overseas conflicts.

The refugee crisis intensified in the spring of 1938 after the German annexation of Austria, but a U.S.-hosted international refugee conference, held in Evian, France, that summer offered little hope. The attendees reaffirmed their unwillingness to liberalize their immigration quotas. Jewish leaders refrained from directly criticizing the U.S. stance at the conference.

In November 1938, Nazi storm troopers carried out the nationwide Kristallnacht pogrom against Germany's Jews. Roosevelt recalled America's ambassador from Berlin and extended the visitors' visas of the 12–15,000 German Jewish citizens who were temporarily in the United States, but he opposed increasing immigration. In the months to follow, the Wagner-Rogers bill to admit 20,000 German Jewish refugee children outside the quotas was debated in Congress, but ultimately buried in subcommittee. The S.S. St. Louis, a German steamship carrying 930 Jewish refugees, was turned back from America's shore in June 1939. Jewish organizations refrained from publicly protesting. The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, the community's main vehicle for overseas relief aid, arranged for the refugees to be taken in by four European countries, but most were sent to countries that were overrun by the Germans the following year.

Despite the hardships of the Depression, American Jewish financial aid to European Jews grew during the Hitler years. The Joint Distribution Committee increased its charitable assistance to endangered communities in the 1930s and financed the sheltering and emigration of Jews during the war period. The American Zionist women's organization Hadassah financed Youth Aliyah, a program that brought young European Jews to Palestine. The Vaad ha-Hatzala, an American Orthodox relief group, was established in 1939 to aid Polish rabbis and students who fled to Lithuania after the German invasion of Poland.

Throughout 1941–1942, Allied governments and American Jewish leaders received reports of massacres of Jews in German-occupied territories. An August 1942 telegram from the World Jewish Congress representative in Switzerland, Gerhart Riegner, reported Hitler's intention to systematically annihilate all of Europe's Jews. At the State Department's request, Rabbi Wise refrained from publicizing the Riegner telegram while U.S. officials sought to authenticate the information. Three months later, the administration confirmed the information and Wise made it public. At a meeting with Jewish leaders in December, Roosevelt condemned the mass murders, but offered no practical measures to aid the refugees.

Resigning themselves to the seemingly hopeless situation, American Jewish leaders initially accepted the president's contention that nothing could be done to aid European Jewry except to win the war. By early 1943, dissident voices began questioning the Jewish leadership's stance. Periodicals such as The Reconstructionist and The Jewish Spectator urged Jewish leaders to actively challenge Allied refugee policy. Students at Conservative Judaism's Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) organized a Jewish-Christian inter-seminary conference to raise public awareness and promote rescue. The JTS students also persuaded the Synagogue Council of America—the umbrella group for Orthodox, Conservative, and Reform synagogues—to undertake a seven-week nationwide campaign among synagogues to publicize the plight of Jews in Europe. This effort concluded with a day of memorial meetings in synagogues and churches around the country to publicize the massacres.

The most significant of the dissident protest groups was led by Hillel Kook, a Zionist emissary from Palestine who used the pseudonym Peter Bergson. The Bergson Group promoted rescue of refugees through unorthodox tactics. It sponsored more than 200 newspaper advertisements; lobbied Congress; staged a theatrical pageant called "We Will Never Die," which was viewed by audiences totaling over 100,000; and organized public rallies, including a march by 400 rabbis in Washington, DC, just before Yom Kippur in 1943. It also mobilized numerous intellectuals, entertainers, and other celebrities to call for rescue.

Some Jewish leaders feared Bergson's vociferous protests might spoil American Jewry's relations with the administration or provoke anti-Semitism. Some were also concerned that Bergson was usurping the Jewish leadership in the eyes of the public. Rabbi Wise and other Jewish leaders tried to persuade the prominent supporters of Bergson's group to sever their ties and urged U.S. officials to get rid of Bergson by drafting or deporting him.

At the same time, the Jewish leadership undertook its own efforts to promote rescue. In March 1943, eight major Jewish organizations established the Joint Emergency Committee on European Jewish Affairs. It organized protest meetings around the country, and its leaders met with Allied officials. However, when the U.S. and Britain announced plans to hold a conference in Bermuda on the refugee problem, the Joint Emergency Committee's request to attend was denied. Like the Evian conference of 1938, the Bermuda gathering consisted largely of officials reiterating their governments' existing positions.

Bermuda shocked many American Jews, more than 90 percent of whom had voted for Roosevelt each time he ran for reelection. As immigrants or children of immigrants, they appreciated the protection Roosevelt's social and economic policies afforded the working class. Their support for the president was cemented by his criticism of Hitler and his aid to England, especially when most Republicans embraced isolationism. But in the wake of Bermuda and the closure of Palestine, there was growing uneasiness in the community over the Allies' refugee policy.

In response, grassroots American Zionist activists in the summer of 1943 rebuffed Wise's accommodationist approach toward the British and elevated the more militant Abba Hillel Silver to the leadership of their movement. Under Silver, Jewish and Christian Zionists around the country held rallies and lobbied U.S. officials to press the British to open Palestine. American Zionists regarded Palestine as the only real answer to the persecution of Europe's Jews.

In the autumn of 1943, the Bergson group initiated a Congressional resolution calling for creation of a government agency to rescue refugees. The hearings over the resolution became a matter of major controversy when State Department official Breckinridge Long gave wildly misleading testimony about the number of refugees who had already been admitted into the United States. The resulting criticism from the media, Jewish groups, and members of Congress gave the resolution additional momentum. In December, it was unanimously approved by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Meanwhile, senior aides to Treasury Secretary Henry Morgenthau, Jr. discovered that State Department officials had been blocking transmission of Holocaust-related information to the United States and obstructing rescue opportunities.

They presented Morgenthau with a report exposing the State Department's actions and urged him to bring it to the president.

Morgenthau and the other Jews in Roosevelt's inner circle usually refrained from raising issues of Jewish concern with the president. Advisers such as Samuel Rosenman, Ben Cohen, and Supreme Court Justice Felix Frankfurter believed it was inappropriate to bring narrow Jewish matters into the Oval Office. But the evidence uncovered by his staff changed Morgenthau's mind, and the impending congressional action on rescue gave him crucial leverage. At a meeting in January 1944, Morgenthau persuaded Roosevelt to avoid a public controversy over refugees by preempting Congress and creating a rescue agency. Days later, Roosevelt established the War Refugee Board.

Although understaffed and given meager funding, the board achieved much. It moved Jews out of dangerous regions, pressured Hungary to end deportations to Auschwitz, and sheltered Jews in places such as Budapest, where it financed the work of Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg. Altogether, the board's efforts played a major role in saving about 200,000 Jews and 20,000 non-Jews.

The board sought to temporarily shelter refugees in the United States, but the president agreed to admit just one token group of 982. Board officials were likewise unsuccessful in their appeals to the War Department to bomb the railways leading to Auschwitz or the gas chambers. A number of Jewish leaders also privately urged the administration to undertake such bombings, but they were rebuffed. The War Department claimed such raids would constitute an unjustified diversion of military resources, even though U.S. bombers repeatedly bombed German oil factories less than five miles from the gas chambers.

Throughout the Hitler years, the Roosevelt administration refrained from seriously addressing Jewish requests to aid refugees except under sustained political pressure. Some Jewish leaders regarded the exercise of such pressure as an unconscionable breach of the community's traditional support for Roosevelt. Others in the Jewish leadership were too set in older modes of thinking to conceive new strategies for political action. "Of course the [Joint] Emergency Committee is inactive now," one American Jewish Committee leader wrote to a critic in 1943. "It is inactive because there isn't a single thing that I can think of it should do." At a time of unprecedented crisis, American Jews did not have many leaders who understood what should be done. Dissidents tried to fill that vacuum and succeeded in arousing public opinion and helping to bring about the creation of the War Refugee Board. Ultimately, however, the dissidents lacked the financial, political, and organizational resources to accomplish what a fully energized Jewish establishment might have achieved.

Selected Bibliography

- Feingold, Henry L. 1995. Bearing Witness: How America and Its Jews Responded to the Holocaust. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press.
- Lookstein, Haskel. 1985. Were We Our Brothers' Keepers? The Public Response of American Jews to the Holocaust, 1938-1944. Bridgeport, CT: Hartmore House.

- Penkower, Monty Noam. 1994. The Holocaust and Israel Reborn: From Catastrophe to Sovereignty. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Wyman, David S. 1984. The Abandonment of the Jews: America and the Holocaust, 1941–1945. New York: Pantheon.
- Wyman, David S., and Rafael Medoff. 2002. A Race Against Death: Peter Bergson, America, and the Holocaust. New York: The New Press.

History of the Habad Movement in the United States

M. Avrum Ehrlich

---

One of the ironies about Habad Hasidism in the United States is that the movement's sixth rebbe, Rabbi YY Schneerson had fervently discouraged the emigration of his Hasidim from Russia. Swearing blood oaths never to leave, he and the hard core leadership of the movement were eventually forced to flee to the United States in the 1940s, leaving a lot of activists there who were killed, deported, or repressed under the Soviet regime. While Soviet Hasidism hibernated, the American branch of this Russian Hasidic sect thrived in the United States and around the world. Many Hasidim had left Russia during Rabbi Shalom Dob Ber Schneerson's leadership or departed against Rabbi YY Schneerson's instructions or managed to flee when Rabbi YY Schneerson himself escaped, and they became the ideological and cultural infrastructure for the movement's resurgence. After a 20-year struggle against Soviet policy toward religion, Rabbi YY Schneerson came to the realization that he could do very little more for Russian Jewry; his position in Poland was dangerous and was not effective. He had maintained contact with Hasidim abroad, particularly in the United States, and despite the fact that America was portrayed among Orthodoxy by the derogatory term "the treife medina" (the impure country), it soon became a safe haven for Jewry and Hasidism. In the late 19th century, Habad Hasidim started to migrate to the United States, particularly the breakaway group of malkhim. During RaSHaB and Rabbi Schneerson's leadership, however, a steady flow of Hasidim arrived in the United States and created a loose framework of cooperation.

Rabbi Schneerson first visited America in 1929 and made up his mind to emigrate some time later. In 1940, he made his escape from Europe having been granted visa and safe passage for his entourage through war-torn Europe. He arrived in New York for the second time, settled there, and began to rebuild the Habad movement. His rise to eminence in the United States occurred in a number of stages until he achieved a status of consensus as the sole Habad rebbe presiding over the international Habad headquarters in New York. His rise to fame was by virtue of his lineage as sole successor of the Lubavitch dynasty coupled with his managerial talents, which were in great demand in the leadership turmoil of Soviet Russia. Were it not for Schneerson's dedication to public Jewish observance, which landed him in a Soviet prison with a death sentence lingering over his head, he might never have drawn the world's attention to his leadership. When Schneerson was arrested by the NKVD (People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs) Communist police in May 1927, the efforts to get him released and repeal the death penalty passed upon him, catapulted him to international fame.

Headquarters of the Habad-Lubavitch Hasidic movement, located in the Crown Heights section of Brooklyn, New York. (iStockphoto)

He became the focus of American Jewish and general political efforts. Although he spent only three weeks in Leningrad's Spalerno jail this was enough to gain him world renown as a Jewish activist and hero. Because of his enhanced status, complicated political and legal procedures demanding a collective effort from many people in both the Habad community and the American political arena were orchestrated on his behalf, securing his exit from war-torn Europe, along with his entourage of aides and relatives, to the shores of America.

His status was compared with that of the pope or a head of a religious hierarchy. On his first visit to America he met many senators and even President Hoover and was thus seen as a Jewish religious leader of the highest caliber. This served him in his own internal leadership status, attracting the attention and admiration of the various offshoots of Habad Hasidim in the United States, who subsequently recognized his leadership.

Habad Hasidim immigrated to many countries, including Western European countries, particularly France and Britain. They also made inroads into the United States, Canada, South Africa, Australia, and of course, pre-state Israel.

When he entered office, Rabbi Schneerson made efforts to consolidate his leadership over these Habad communities. He wrote extensively to many international communities and cultivated relationships with senior activists in each community. In 1929–1930, he traveled extensively to the United States and Israel and formed alliances with the Habad Hasidim there. They appeared to be willing to accept his leadership from New York. Over time, Schneerson sent out communiques to other, smaller Habad communities, and most of those also came to accept his leadership.

Many of his contacts around the world were former students in the Lubavitch yeshivas who had since emigrated; some had even taken up rabbinic posts in communities throughout the United States. In 1923, Rabbi Schneerson wrote from Rostov to David Shifrin, a hasid in the United States, directing him, among other things, to establish a Habad organization there and offering specific and detailed advice on how this should be done. He continued his correspondence with other people directing them on different issues, including R' L.M. Lakshin, who had studied in the yeshiva of Lubavitch and had become a prominent American rabbi. In his letters he instructed that study groups and a society to help the absorption of migrant Hasidim should be established. He encouraged the study of Judaism and Hasidism in the day-to-day lives of the Hasidic faithful and members of these organizations. He asked that lists of all synagogues and study houses in every city, even the smallest, should be compiled as data. He paid attention to details of the American administration, suggesting that one person should be singled out for each task required, particularly for writing letters so as to endow them with a personal touch and sense of continuity. His instructions indicate the importance with which he viewed the duty of letter writing and network building.

The Habad organizations that were created in the United States in the 1930s relied on a constituency of sympathizers from the larger population of Jews around the United States. These people were Americans of Russian or Hasidic descent with affiliations to certain synagogues called nusakh ha-Ari synagogues. These Hasidic-oriented synagogues consisted of members with a Habadic background of some sort. The style of prayer they used was based on a formula that had been standardized by the movement's founder, Rabbi Shneur Zalman, into a siddur and used by Habad Hasidim and associated groups. The synagogues established might have had only minimal connections to the official Habad movement, but their historic and perhaps ritual affiliations were tied up with Habad culture. Although worshippers might have distanced themselves from their Habadic origins, some maintained varying degree of commitment or loose affiliations and sympathies for the movement. These synagogues and communities numbered approximately 200. They were used as a foundation for Habad activities and propaganda throughout the 1920s and 1930s.

Rabbi Schneerson sought to utilize to the fullest the network of his yeshiva graduates and their strong fraternal bonds. As many traveled abroad he established a mutual help society in the United States. He himself arranged a temimim Old-Boys Society in Russia under the tutelage of his father, which helped graduates in the Soviet Union.

The numbers of Habad Hasidim and graduates from the Tomhei Temimim yeshiva who had immigrated to the United States in the 1920s and 1930s, had been lower than the immigration of other Hasidic groups, because of Rabbi YY Schneerson's insistence that they remain in Russia. Despite this, there were sufficient numbers to warrant their coordination. By 1926, Rabbi Schneerson had corresponded with R' Eli Simpson and had encouraged him to establish the organization Ahi Temimim, which was effectively an old boys' network. It arranged to collect money and provided a spiritual force for Habad Hasidim and expatriates of the Habad yeshivas. The aims of ahi temimim were to unite all ex-Lubavitch yeshiva students, to learn Hasidut, to support each other materially and spiritually, and to help the Habad movement in the United States and Europe, with particular attention to the yeshiva in Warsaw. Finally the organization was to help the Habad rebbe in every way (i.e., financially).

This organization was both strategically clever and utilized an extensive network of people and their sense of allegiance to assist one another. It achieved a record of success by helping Habad scholars immigrate and then acclimatize to American society by finding them employment and a social network. In return, the Habad movement developed a sense of cohesion and community that revolved around their respect for Rabbi Schneerson. With a constant flow of Jews to America, the need for community leadership and religious functionaries, teachers, slaughterers, and rabbis increased. Members of the Habad network helped one another to gain access to these positions and these new arrivals became, in time, influential people themselves and contributed to the movement's growth. In this way Schneerson established himself as a rabbi and venerated leader of people who were themselves venerated. His leadership was thus enhanced even before he reached American shores.

The first Habad institution in the U.S was called Agudat Hasidim Anshei Habad (ACHACH or the Union of Hasidim—people of Habad), which was established in 1924. The organization's primary aim was to unite people of Hasidic origin in brotherly support. Despite the fact that this organization had a board of directors of some 60 rabbis (or community activists) from around the United States and Canada, its general membership was loose and in practical terms the organization was ineffective. It was eventually dissolved in 1952 to make way for a new organization that united the various institutions that had been established until then, particularly Agudat Hasidei Habad (AGuCH or Union of Habad Hasidim).

AGuCH was officially established in 1940, but it had functioned unofficially since the 1930s and had for the most part cooperated with ACHACH. Its constitution advocated renewing Habad Hasidic consciousness in the new land and promised help in organizing study groups for Habad affiliates. The organization collected money for Rabbi Schneerson for his work on behalf of Soviet Jewry and helped him gather public support during his arrests in Soviet Russia. The organization was instrumental in bringing Schneerson to the United States, first on a visit and later to live. AGuCH became the basic instrument for Habad's activities around the world, particularly under Schneerson's leadership.

Many non-Lubavitch Hasidim of Habad orientation lived in the United States, both Hasidim or Hasidic affiliates who traced their allegiance to the various dynasties of Bobruisk and Nezhin, and Malakhim, who, although they did not have affiliations to European hasidism were Habad affiliates. The existence of a Bobruisk community was well known and there was a network of ari synagogues with a Habadic affiliation.

The Lubavitch followers of Rabbi Schneerson, however, were slower to immigrate to the United States because their rebbe had instructed them not to. Hence, it may be assumed that the Habad Hasidic organizations of ACHACH and AGuCH comprised Habad Hasidim from various Habad dynasties other than Lubavitch. This is evident from the names of these organizations—“Union of Habad Hasidim” and “Union of Hasidim—People of Habad—” which contain no reference to the partisanship of the various offshoots and dynasties, and the name “Lubavitch” does not appear either. This might have occurred because of the lack of Lubavitch influence on the organization at its initial creation or to intentionally to endow the organization with broad acceptability, so as to attract as wide an association as possible. In any way one looks at it, it still indicates the desire to attract different varieties of Habad associates. It is appropriate to note that in contrast to the aforementioned policy, the contemporary Habad movement makes no effort to disguise its Lubavitch affiliation. Today the terms “Lubavitch” and “Habad” are commonly interchanged in general conversation and official documents. This contrasts with the politically sensitive attitude of the 1930s Habad organizations toward the various offshoots and their desire to maintain a nonpartisan umbrella organization for common activities.

Interesting questions still remain: Sid these organizations comprise and represent different Habad dynasties? Was the Lubavitch component in these organizations always the strongest element or did it only later gain dominance?

Divisions between sects were mended and disappeared over time, particularly by the end of Rabbi Schneerson's 1929 visit to the United States when he appeared to convince his critics of his integrity. He was received on that first visit by thousands of people and hailed as a Jewish hero of international standing. The reception for him took place at the docks and had been advertised as a massive Jewish event, as a Jewish hero and zaddik was arriving. Many dignitaries and rabbis came to meet him. Pictures of Schneerson were printed in bulk and distributed so as to show what he stood for. Articles were written about him, and in general he gained a large public reception. After these events the movement appeared to become both more united and more supportive of Schneerson as their undisputed leader. This is apparent from a number of sources, including letterheads from official Habad stationery, newspaper articles, letters and advertisements indicating stepped-up Habad activities.

On arrival, Rabbi Schneerson went to pains to reiterate the need for internal unity and solidarity. This he had also expressed in letters and communiques. It was likely that he was referring to the need for unity among the dynastic divisions within Habad. The complete lack of any mention of the term “Lubavitch” in institutional contexts is remarkable considering the fact that there were attempts to bring none other than the Lubavitcher rebbe to preside over them. A feasible explanation is, as mentioned, a deliberate effort to avoid partisan politics. If this is so then a certain paragraph in the AGuCH constitution that reiterates the commitment to the Habad movement “over and above partisanship and politics” could be understood in reference to internal Habad politics and partisanship in the movement itself. Schneerson even made kindly gestures toward the Malakhim breakaway sect, indicating his attitude of inclusiveness.

More regular Habad activities began to take place on Jewish and Hasidic festivals according to Rabbi Schneerson’s instructions. There were public advertisements of these events in the Jewish press. Preparations to establish a yeshiva were made, and this was eventually inaugurated with 20 students in East Flatbush on the day and in honor of Schneerson’s second arrival in New York.

The amalgamation of the American Habad movement was possible, not necessarily because of the magnitude of Rabbi Schneerson’s leadership as much as the weakness of the Habad movement and its limited American representation. This left American Hasidism with little realistic choice but to merge in unity under a single rebbe. The destruction of European Jewry left the remnant of Hasidim in the United States and in the Holy Land as the largest surviving group. The lack of any viable alternative to Schneerson’s leadership was the main reason for this unanimous election. Even if descendants of other Habad rebbes could be located and brought to the United States, their stature and public exposure could not compare with that of Schneerson.

Rabbi Schneerson came with some of his family and aides. He proceeded to initiate the same organizational activities as he had done in Russia. Although he was sick he was nevertheless unrelenting. He appointed his close aides and relatives to administrative functions including his older son-in-law, Rabbi Shmaryahu Gurary. He worked through the existing institutions while creating new organizations for different duties.

He remained for a time in a hotel until a synagogue and house were purchased for him at 770 Eastern Parkway in the then upper-class neighborhood of Crown Heights, Brooklyn. The neighborhood comprised well-to-do middle-class Americans and Jews; among the latter were recognized scholars and Hasidic rebbes. From there, he began his consolidation of the movement. The home at 770 became the world headquarters for the Habad movement, drawing attention and support from Habad elements worldwide.

Rabbi Schneerson’s time in the United States was short-lived—he passed away in 1950—but his accomplishments in reconsolidating the Habad movement were mostly due to his own personal efforts and vision. He left the movement at a potential crossroads: to continue on without a rebbe, to appoint an officer or officers in charge of the movement but not a rebbe per se, or to appoint a rebbe with full rights and privileges that accompany that status.

Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, his youngest son-in-law, emerged as the next Habad-Lubavitch Rebbe and developed the Habad movement in unprecedented terms to what it is today, with thousands of centers and disciples around the United States and in every country where even small groups of Jews live or visit. The movement is unparalleled in the history of Jewish life and is a unique Diaspora phenomenon.

Selected Bibliography

- Berger, Rhonda Edna. 1977. An Exploration into the Lubavitcher Hasidic Leadership Alliance Network. New York: Yivo Institute for Jewish Research.
- Deutch, Shaul Shimon. 1997. Larger than Life: The Life and Times of the Lubavitcher Rebbe Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson. Brooklyn, NY: Chasidic Historical Productions.
- Ehrlich, M. Avrum. 2004. The Messiah of Brooklyn: Understanding Lubavitch Hasidism Past and Present. Jersey City, NJ: KTAV.
- Fishkoff, Sue. 2005. The Rebbes Army: Inside the World of CHabad-Lubavitch. New York: Schocken.
- Mintz, Jerome R. 1968. Legends of the Hasidim—An Introduction to Hasidic Culture and Oral Tradition in the New World. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Mintz, Jerome R. 1992. Hasidic People. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Modern Jewish Orthodoxy in America

Chaim I. Waxman

---

The Orthodox make up about 10 percent of American Jewry, but for a variety of reasons, their significance far exceeds their actual numbers. The condition of American Orthodox Judaism underwent radical changes from the end of the 19th to the beginning of the 21st century. In 1887, Rabbi Moses Weinberger (1854–1940), who emigrated from Hungary to New York City in 1880, wrote a pamphlet in Yiddish, Jews and Judaism in New York, which was a broad, stinging critique of the condition of traditional Judaism in New York. Weinberger warned those who anticipated becoming rabbis in the United States that the chances of successfully fulfilling their rabbinic aspirations were poor to nil, and they might be better off remaining in Europe. Likewise, Rabbi Jacob David Wilowsky (1845–1913), an outstanding Talmudic scholar and communal rabbi in Slutsk, Belarus, addressed a meeting of the Union of Orthodox Congregations, in New York City in 1901, and was quoted as condemning any Jew who came to America, “for here, Judaism . . . is trodden under foot. It was not only home that the Jews left behind them in Europe; it was their Torah, their Talmud, their Yeshebahs [sic], their Chocomim [sic]” (American Hebrew 1901).

Orthodox attitudes changed during the early decades of the century. Immigration from Eastern Europe between 1881 and 1923–1926 significantly increased the size of the Jewish population in the United States as whole, especially in the Middle Atlantic states (New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania). The dramatic increase in the Jewish population and the fact that the only form of Judaism known to most of the immigrants was the Orthodox version meant the early decades of the 20th century were viewed as very positive for American Orthodox Judaism. Orthodox Jewry founded a number of educational institutions, including elementary and secondary day schools and, in 1928, Yeshiva College, which was later transformed into Yeshiva University. Increasing numbers of Orthodox Jews were convinced that Orthodoxy was the wave of the future in American Judaism.

During the 1940s, however, it became increasingly apparent that larger numbers of second-generation Jewish youth were defecting from the Orthodoxy of their parents and, as sociologists W. Lloyd Warner and Leo Srole suggested, the rate of defection from religious tradition among second-generation Jews was much more obvious than the defections among other groups. As a result, the religious subsystem was in a state of disintegration. Some 10 years later, Marshall Sklare, the dean of American Jewish sociology, averred that “Orthodox adherents have succeeded in achieving the goal of institutional perpetuation only to a limited extent; the history of their movement in this country can be written in terms of a case study of institutional decay” (Sklare 1955). Although he limited his observation to institutional decline, there was strong evidence indicating that the Orthodox were also declining in numbers and, as recently as the mid-1970s, it appeared they would continue to decline.

A combination of processes changed much of this. For example, there was what the historian Jeffrey Gurock calls “the winnowing of American Orthodoxy”; that is, although the first half of the century witnessed defections from Orthodoxy, the community that was left was much more religiously committed and active. In addition, there was increased Jewish immigration from Europe just before and after the Holocaust, which included a disproportionate number of Orthodox—even a number of rabbinic leaders who had been heads of advanced rabbinical seminaries, yeshivot gedolot, in Eastern Europe, as well as many members and some leaders of a variety of Hasidic sects, perhaps most notably, those of Habad-Lubavitch and Satmar. Together, they inspired the reestablishment of Orthodoxy as they conceived it, including their advanced yeshivas, in a number of major American cities and their environs.

A major effort in this venture was the establishment of the National Society for Hebrew Day Schools, Torah Umesorah, which was founded in 1944 by Rabbi Shraga Feivel Mendelowitz. The society’s objective was encourage and help found Jewish day schools—elementary and high schools that would provide intensive Jewish education along with a quality secular curriculum—in cities and neighborhoods across the country. The number of day schools grew tenfold and enrollments grew almost as much between the years 1940 and 1965; the rate of growth accelerated between then and 1975. These day schools and yeshiva high schools were located in 33 states across the country and, by 1975, every city in the United States with a Jewish population had at least one day school, as did four of five cities with a Jewish population of between 5,000 and 7,500. Among cities with smaller Jewish populations, one of four with a population of 1,000 Jews had a Jewish day school.

Although day schools had been viewed as parochial and shunned by the non-Orthodox, they subsequently became recognized as valued institutions within Conservative and Reform Judaism as well. Although the rate of day school education among the Orthodox continues to far outpace the rates among the non-Orthodox, by the 1990s, non-Orthodox day schools were the fastest-growing phenomenon in the American Jewish community as a whole. In part, the increased enrollments have been spurred by growing empirical evidence indicating that day school education correlates with almost all measures of Jewish identity and identification, and for many of those measures, the correlation is much higher than it is with other types of Jewish education.

During the second half of the 20th century, a series of vibrant Orthodox Jewish suburban communities developed across North America. Much of their success is a result of the combination of the socioeconomic affluence of their constituents as well as the religious commitments that require them to live within a single neighborhood. Orthodox religious law prohibits driving on the Sabbath, setting the framework for a communal structure in which its members are in close physical proximity with one another.

Some Orthodox Jews who were sufficiently modern so as to have achieved relatively high educational and economic status, and who internalized modern conceptions of aesthetics and social organization, moved to the suburbs and built small communities that subsequently attracted larger numbers of Orthodox Jews once communal foundations existed. In contrast to the stereotype of Orthodox Jews as concentrated in the lower socioeconomic strata, many are fairly affluent. As a group, their annual family incomes continue to be lower than Conservative and Reform Jews, but compared with the North American population, they have above-average incomes.

During the late 1970s and 1980s, American Orthodoxy took a turn to the right in the sense of becoming more punctilious in ritual observance, as a result of both internal and larger societal developments. Demographics played a role in that the ultra-Orthodox or Haredi component of the American Orthodox population increased and became a highly significant proportion of the consumers of kosher food, and manufacturers had to cater their wares to their demands. In addition, many of them, especially the Hasidic portion of the community assumed leading roles in producing kosher foods and, naturally, introduced their more stringent standards into those areas. Today the entire Orthodox population has little option but to comply with the more rigorous standards. It is the old capitalist law of supply and demand at work.

Another source of the increased punctiliousness lies in the impact of the vast network of day schools, yeshiva high schools, post-high school yeshivas, and kollelim in cities throughout the United States since World War II, as already discussed. There has been a radical increase in both the extent of and levels of traditional Jewish learning among Orthodox Jews in the United States, to the point where at least 12 years of yeshiva day school education is the norm, and a significant number of the graduates of those institutions continue their studies for a year or more in yeshivas and seminaries in Israel or the United States.

There has been a dramatic increase in adult Jewish learning in the Orthodox community, as is evident in the popularity of the Art-Scroll Schottenstein Edition of the Talmud as well as translations of many other Judaica texts. It is also suggested by the remarkable increase in attendance at the celebrations of the Siyum Hashas, the conclusion of the seven-year cycle of daily Talmud study. The first public Siyum Hashas was held in 1968 and attended by about 700 people. The figures rose to 3,200 in 1975; more than 5,000 in 1982; about 26,000 in 1991; 70,000, which includes those who participated via satellite, in 1997; and more than 100,000, including participants via satellite, in March 2005.

Evidence suggests that increased Jewish knowledge leads to a greater awareness of Halacha/traditional Jewish law to changes in behaviors that may have been widespread in the community but are not Halachically sanctioned. For example, during the first half of the 20th century, many Orthodox synagogues held dinners and balls that included mixed-gender dancing, frequently with nonspouses. Likewise, it was quite typical for Orthodox Jews to eat dairy, fish, or meals at restaurants that had no kashruth supervision. With increased Jewish knowledge, such behavior is now much less common and widely frowned upon in the American Orthodox community.

In addition, socioeconomics and technological developments play a role. This is most obvious in the food industry where food production has become much more complex. Products with ingredients that were well-known in the past and may not have required special supervision, frequently require supervision today because the ingredients are much less well-known. Also, the increased socioeconomic status of the Orthodox affords them the ability to be much more punctilious than they had previously been.

Finally, American society as whole has become much more overtly religious since the 1970s, and the forces of “strong religion” have been on the rise in America and many other societies. Therefore, it is no surprise that American Orthodox Jews became more overtly Orthodox and punctilious in their behavior.

The Orthodox continued to strengthen their ties with Israel during the second half of the 20th century, and the empirical evidence shows that, by all measures, the extent of Orthodox Jews’ attachments to Israel greatly exceeds that among the non-Orthodox, and differences between them are sharpest with respect to the most demanding measures of involvement with Israel, be it receptivity to aliyah (immigration to Israel) rather than simply having pro-Israel feelings, having closer ties with individual Israelis, or possessing fluency in Hebrew rather than just a rudimentary knowledge of it. In addition, although emotional ties to Israel have weakened among non-Orthodox baby boomers, they have intensified among Orthodox baby boomers. Some of this may be because Orthodoxy has been the only officially recognized form of Judaism in Israel, a factor that may also have contributed somewhat to the distancing of the other segments of American Jewry from Israel. However, the intensification of emotional ties to Israel is more likely because Orthodox Jews travel to Israel more so than do others. Indeed, it is a norm today within the Orthodox community, especially among the Modern Orthodox, that yeshiva high school graduates go to Israel to spend a year learning in a yeshiva or seminary.

Another industry that has developed dramatically since World War II is that of English-language Orthodox publishing. The largest publishing company is ArtScroll and Mesorah Publications, pioneered by Rabbis Nosson Scherman and Meir Zlotowitz, which publishes a wide array of translations, including its very popular prayer book, the ArtScroll Siddur, as well as hagiographic biographies, commentaries, and a range of children’s books, among others. Critics have argued that ArtScroll censors its books to present only haredi, or strict theological accounts and perspectives, but, by the turn of the century, most observers agree that, whatever its faults, ArtScroll revolutionized Jewish learning in America and raised its level to unprecedented heights by bringing many remote sacred texts to the attention of the public at large in attractive editions. In addition, it played a key role in popularizing daily Talmud study by publishing an English-language translation of the Talmud. One public manifestation of this phenomenon was a series of major celebrations, comprising more than 25,000 Jews who completed the entire Talmud by studying a page each day for approximately seven and a half years. In September 1997, the 10th celebration of Siyum Hashas (completion of the Shas [Talmud]) sponsored by Agudath Israel included a satellite hookup to both Madison Square Garden in New York and the Nassau Coliseum in Nassau County, New York.

By the close of the century, it not only seemed acceptable to be Orthodox, but it almost appeared to be the popular way to be Jewish. As suggested, this dramatic turn was precipitated by a variety of internally Jewish as well as broader societal developments. Among the more dramatic manifestations of this phenomenon were the nomination of Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, a public and proud Orthodox Jew, for the vice presidency of the United States on the Democratic ticket in the 2000 election campaign; and the election of Orthodox Jews to mayorships of American cities in which Orthodox Jews are not the majority, including Lawrence, New York; Springfield, Englewood, Lakewood, and Teaneck, New Jersey; and Miami Beach, Florida. Clearly, not all American Orthodox Jews feel completely at home in America; on the other hand, being Orthodox no longer has the stigma it once did, and Orthodox attitudes toward America have become much more positive. As for their impact on American Judaism, their influence is much greater than their actual numbers, in part because they are much more intensively and extensively involved in dimensions of Jewish identity and identification, such as performing rituals, belonging to synagogues, attaining Jewish knowledge, making charitable donations to Jewish causes, visiting Israel, and expressing international concern for Jews.

Selected Bibliography

- Gurock, Jeffrey S. 1997. American Jewish Orthodoxy in Historical Perspective. Hoboken, NJ: Ktav.
- Gurock, Jeffrey S. 2005. Judaism's Encounter with American Sports. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Sarna, Jonathan D., ed. 1982. People Walk on Their Heads: Moses Weinberger's Jews and Judaism in New York. New York: Holmes and Meier.
- Sklare, Marshall. 1955. Conservative Judaism: An American Religious Movement. Glencoe, IL: Free Press.
- Warner, W. Lloyd, and Leo Srole. 1945. The Social Systems of American Ethnic Groups. Yankee City Series, vol. 3. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Waxman, Chaim I. 2003. "From Institutional Decay to Primary Day: American Orthodox Jewry Since World War II." American Jewish History 91, nos. 3 & 4 (September and December): 405–421.

Denomination and Jewish Identity in America

Chaim I. Waxman

---

American Judaism comprises a number of different branches that can be properly labeled “denominations,” in that each has its own rabbinic seminary or seminaries, rabbinic organization or organizations, and synagogue or temple organizations. The major American Jewish denominations are Reform, Conservative, and Orthodox. In addition, both Reconstructionist and Traditional Judaism have rabbinic seminaries and rabbinic organizations, but they represent very small percentages of America’s Jews. About 2 percent of affiliated American Jews identify as Reconstructionists. Traditional Judaism is much smaller and is essentially made up of traditionalist Conservative Jews who are opposed to what is viewed as the modernist strides of Conservative Judaism and modernist Orthodox Jews who are opposed to what is viewed the shift to fundamentalism within Orthodox Judaism.

Ostensibly, denominational choice is simply a reflection of one’s position on a continuum ranging from religious traditionalist to religious modernist: the Orthodox are the most traditional, the Reform the most modern, and the Conservative somewhere in between. This was, in fact, the way many Jews viewed it, and it was well expressed in typical responses given to Marshall Sklare when people were asked what they mean when they say they are Conservative: “Now—I’d guess you’d call it middle of the road, as far as [not] being as strict as the Orthodox, yet not quite as Reformed as the Reformed,” or “I don’t like the old-fashioned type, or the Reform. I’m between the two of them” (Sklare 1972, 208).

Evidence indicates that denominational affiliation is actually complex and reflects much more. Income status has historically been related to denominational status, and it was frequently the case that denomination was as much a reflection of income status as of religious ideology: the higher income status was Reform, the middle was Conservative, and the lower was Orthodox. This has changed somewhat, but it is still the case that the Reform have annual family incomes of about $10,000 more than do the Conservative who, in turn, have similarly higher incomes than the Orthodox (Waxman 2001, 34–35).

Denomination correlates with synagogue membership: the Orthodox are most likely to belong and the Reform least likely. Denomination also clearly correlates with ritual performance. Table 7, for example, shows the correlation between denomination and frequency of synagogue attendance: the Orthodox have the highest and Reform the lowest. The same pattern manifests itself with respect to having a Passover Seder and fasting on Yom Kippur.

Denomination also correlates with a variety of family factors, such as marital status, including intermarriage, and number of children. Of the three major denominations, the Orthodox have the highest percentage of married and the lowest percentage of divorced, separated, single, and never married. For the Reform, it is the opposite, and the Conservative are between but more similar to the Reform.

Table 7 Percent of Synagogue Attendance by Denomination, NJPS 2001

	Orthodox	Conservative	Reform
Less than once a month	23	58	72
About once a month	9	15	15
2–3 times a month	7	12	8
About once a week	28	11	5
Several times a week	11	3	1
Every day	22	1	—
Total	100	100	100

The Orthodox also have the highest rate (96 percent) of in-married, compared with 87 percent for Conservative and 74 percent for Reform marrieds. The Orthodox also have the highest number of children per household; the Conservative have fewer and are much closer to the Reform, who have the lowest.

The Orthodox are much more likely to contribute philanthropically to Jewish causes, to be members of a Jewish community center and other Jewish organizations, to read Jewish newspapers and books, to use Jewish audio and visual material, and to use the Internet for Jewish information. Reform Jews are least likely to do any of these. Visits to Israel and emotional attachment to Israel also correlate with denomination.

Finally, denomination correlates with a series of attitudes toward Jewishness and Jewish peoplehood. For example, whereas more than 90 percent of Orthodox strongly agree that they have a strong sense of belonging to the Jewish people, only 74 percent of Conservative and 56 percent of Reform do. Orthodox are more likely than Conservative and Reform to agree that Jews in United States and Jews elsewhere share a common destiny. Orthodox are also most likely to have a very positive feeling about being Jewish and to strongly agree that they have a clear sense of what being Jewish means to them.

Although the data do not indicate which is cause and which is effect, that is, whether identifying with a particular denomination leads one to have a stronger sense of religious and ethnic identity or, rather, it is the strength of one religious and ethnic identity that leads one to identify with a particular denomination, it is quite clear that there is a high correlation between denomination and Jewish identity, and denominational identification is not related to matters solely within the religious realm. The more modern one is, the greater one's sense of one's own autonomy and self-determination, and the less they will subject themselves to authority beyond themselves, be it theological or group authority, and the less they feel loyalty to groups beyond themselves, be they religious or ethnic groups. It would appear that this also has implications for Diaspora groups in terms of the degree to which individuals feel themselves to be a part of such groups.

Selected Bibliography

Elazar, Daniel J., and Rela M. Geffen. 2000. The Conservative Movement in Judaism: Dilemmas and Opportunities. Albany: State University of New York Press.

- Kaplan, Dana Evan. 2003. American Reform Judaism. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press.
- Lazerwitz, Bernard, J. Alan Winter, Arnold Dashefsky, and Ephraim Tabory. 1997. Jewish Choices: American Jewish Denominationalism. Albany, NY: State University of New York Press.
- Liebman, Charles S., and Steven M. Cohen. 1990. Two Worlds of Judaism: The Israeli and American Experiences. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Sarna, Jonathan D. 2004. American Judaism. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Syrian Jews in New York

Sarina Roffe

---

The Jews from Aleppo and Damascus, Syria, immigrated to the United States as part of the vast immigration from the region spurred by economic decline and political changes in their status. In the years before and after World War I, approximately 20,000 Jews from the region were processed through Ellis Island and settled in New York. Most settled in Brooklyn, where they established a communal infrastructure of synagogues, mikvahs, yeshivas, social service organizations, community centers, and a variety of support groups. Today, this community has grown to include Sephardic Jews from Egypt, Morocco, Turkey, Lebanon, Iraq, and other countries who live in New York and New Jersey. All of these groups have agreed to be under the umbrella of Aleppan rabbinic leadership.

The community is unique in that it has remained cohesive and retained much of its Middle Eastern culture, such as naming practices, religious observance, and respect for its spiritual leaders, while at the same time assimilating in terms of dress, education, and language. Unlike other Jewish communities in America, the Syrian and Near Eastern Community—dubbed “Aleppo in Flatbush”—has a low intermarriage rate, estimated at less than 5 percent, because of a rabbinical edict that forbids marriage to converts who convert only for the purpose of marriage.

Initial Settlement

The Syrian Jewish community in New York originally consisted of two groups, Jews from Aleppo and Jews from Damascus. At first the convergence of the two groups was not easy. The Aleppan Jews thought themselves superior, largely because of their history in Aleppo as a center of Jewish learning. The Aleppans, or Halabis, followed the traditions of Aram Soba. The Damascene Jews, or shammies, prayed in a different house of worship. The two groups lived side by side, socialized and intermarried.

In 1911, a dozen or so Syrian Jews, united under the name Kehillat Shaare Sedek, formed a burial society and built a synagogue on the Lower East Side. A Talmud Torah for the children opened from 3 p.m. to 6 p.m. daily and on Sunday mornings. Members of the community, most of them businessmen, taught the classes. There was no rabbinical leadership until the arrival in 1910 of Rabbi Yitzhak Shalom zt'l, who helped thousands of Aleppan immigrants as they established themselves in the New World. By the mid-1920s, the community moved en masse to the Bensonhurst area of Brooklyn.

Rabbinical Leadership

In 1933, Rabbi Jacob S. Kassin, a Talmudic and Kabbalistic scholar, was hired as chief rabbi of the Brooklyn community by a committee led by the late Aleppo-born Raymond Beyda, Rabbi Yitzhak Shalom, and Shlomo Grazi. As chief rabbi of Brooklyn's Syrian Jewish community, Rabbi Jacob Kassin handled all aspects of the community's spiritual growth from the Talmud Torah and synagogue services to life cycle events. Rabbi Jacob ran the beth din, decided cases, and established the community's Rabbinical Council. Rabbi Kassin reorganized the Kahal (congregation) and established a firm and stable foundation that carries the community today. Rabbi Kassin resisted modernization yet supported accommodation of American conditions.

During his 62-year tenure, Kassin revived Sephardic heritage, culture, tradition, and customs, as well as an awareness of Sephardic identity and Judeo-Arabic culture. During a time when many large Jewish communities were weakened by intermarriage, Brooklyn's Syrian community was strengthened. One of Kassin's most significant contributions was his decision to issue a takkanah against marriage to converts in 1935.

Occupations

When the Syrian Jews came to America, they were limited in what they could do to support their families. Most had no more than an eighth-grade education, and they did not know Yiddish or English, so factory jobs were not desirable. Many became peddlers, an occupation that allowed them to observe the Sabbath, or small shopkeepers. They sold household items, linens, doilies, curtains, and tablecloths. Both commercial and kin ties bound the immigrants from Aleppo and those who remained in Syria.

It was common for Aleppan men with rabbinic training to work as merchants, rather than as judges or full-time scholars, considering it ideal to earn a living through secular means. Unlike East European Jews, who chose education as the path to success, Syrian Jews believed trade rather than secular education was the road to socioeconomic mobility. Therefore, Syrian Jews opened family-operated retail establishments and favored employing other members of the community.

Some Syrian Jews formed wholesale companies or began to manufacture clothing. Importing children's clothing from the Far East became a tremendous source of income, particularly in the years before and after World War II. Evidence of this is found today as the owners of manufacturing companies such as Catton Bros. (children's clothing), Baby Togs, Jet Set, and Jordache jeans all bear Syrian surnames.

Some opened stores at beach resorts up and down the East Coast where they sold linens, handkerchiefs, and tablecloths and later expanded to include souvenirs, costume jewelry, sweatshirts, and T-shirts. These summer store ventures declined by the 1980s, when the community became more observant as a whole.

After World War II, Syrians expanded from the garment business into the electronics business and opened chains of stores like Nobody Beats the Wiz or wholesale outlets like Soundesign. Republic National Bank was owned by an Aleppan, as well as chain stores like Duane Reade, Rainbow Shops, and others. Before long the shoe and blue jean industries were dominated by Syrian Jews who sold to K-Mart, Wal-Mart, Sears, and J.C. Penney stores.

As of 2006, most community members seek professional careers or careers in businesses that allow them to not work on the Sabbath, such as wholesale industry. Although retail is still a thriving career choice, to be successful a college degree is still preferred for substantive growth to occur.

Communal Institutions

As the Syrian Jewish community grew, it established its own clearly defined infrastructure. The community established a cemetery (first in Queens, then on Staten Island), two synagogues, a Talmud Torah (a place for Jewish learning), and a ritual bath on 67th Street near 20th Avenue. The Damascene Jews prayed at Ahi Ezer Synagogue, and the Aleppan Jews prayed at Magen David Synagogue, which was built in 1921. Their cohesiveness is evidenced by a multitude of synagogues, yeshivas, high schools, mikvahs (ritual baths), a community center, social service organization, an old age home, and several community-subsidized senior citizen apartment buildings.

Parents, concerned that their culture and religion not be compromised by secular influences, control social liaisons and marriages. Religious observance of kashruth, holidays and the Sabbath, as well as tzedakah, hesed, and other mitzvah, is expected.

Sephardic Bikur Holim, the community social service agency, operates in a modern building and handles government entitlements, mental health referrals, career services, and medical referrals, to name a few. Teen volunteer programs encourage chesid in terms of tutoring, visits to the elderly, delivering challah on Friday afternoons, and delivering food to the elderly and homebound. Other services include blood donation, big brother/big sister program, health screenings, respite for expectant mothers on bed rest, a kosher soup kitchen, and free clothing for children donated by community manufacturers. Support groups are operated regularly to cover issues such as surviving cancer, smoking, caregiving for the sick, parenting, infertility, socialization for children, and issues related to parenting a child with a disability.

To help businesspeople succeed, a community institution—Sephardic Angel Fund—operates on the model of the Small Business Administration. Successful businesspeople are matched with young entrepreneurs and help them with business plans, budgets, achievable goals, and funding.

The Sephardic Community Federation was formed in 2003 as a political action committee to oversee donations by community members to political campaigns, apply for government funding of community institutions, and lobby for legislation that benefits the community as a whole.

Education

Until the late 1950s, most Syrian children attended public school, and boys received their Hebrew education from a Talmud Torah (a place for Jewish learning), at the k'nees (Arabic for synagogue). The first Syrian Jewish day schools—Magen David Yeshiva, which was primarily Aleppan, and Ahi Ezer Yeshiva, which primarily served the Damascene Syrian community—opened in the mid-1950s.

Talmud Torah education, with its after-school Jewish study programs, was virtually eliminated from the community by the late 1960s. Yeshiva education reduced non-Jewish influences and marked a turning point in the religious educational system. This gradually influenced more Syrian Jews to become more observant than the previous generation, a trend that has continued until today. As the community grew, other yeshivas opened to meet the demand for different religious and educational philosophies as well as economic situations. Today there are more than a dozen community yeshivas, as well as high schools.

Most parents in the first and second generations did not consider a college education necessary or desirable for their children. Many feared secular influences and as most sons went into family businesses, the argument for higher education as an economic necessity was nil. Over time the attitude toward higher education was reversed and today most young people from the community seek careers by attending college. The community now boasts painters, artists, dentists, psychiatrists, physicians, attorneys, writers, decorators, real estate professionals, journalists, bankers, photographers, social workers, and even a Harvard physics professor. Many of these professionals remain in the community where the community's cohesive nature guarantees a strong client base.

Where They Live

The insular nature of the community causes them to live together in the same neighborhoods, shop in the same shops, and vacation together. This continues their strong tradition of intramarriage.

After leaving their initial residences on the Lower East Side, the Syrian Jews first lived in Bensonhurst, Brooklyn. As they began to prosper, the wealthier members purchased homes in the Ocean Parkway section of Brooklyn in the 1950s. In just a few years, the entire community had abandoned Bensonhurst and became clustered around Ocean Parkway.

As the community grew, so did its wealth. In the late 1950s, the community opened Shaare Zion Congregation, with a magnificent domed sanctuary and social hall in Brooklyn on Ocean Parkway between Avenue T and Avenue U. Just a block away, Ahi Ezer opened its doors with another large synagogue. Dozens of smaller synagogues have opened in the ensuing years to accommodate the community's growth and to absorb Egyptians, Lebanese, Persians, Iranians, Moroccans, and eventually, the last of the Syrian Jews who were permitted to emigrate in the early 1990s.

Takkanah: Rabbinic Edict against Marriage to Converts

In 1935, Rabbi Kassin and four other community rabbis signed a takkanah, or rabbinical edict, against marriage to converts who converted solely for the purpose of marriage. Such marriages were not to be recognized or accepted by the community. The edict was based on an earlier edict issued in Buenos Aires by Rabbi David Setton. Rabbi Kassin was particularly concerned about the sincerity of the conversions and the need to guard Jews against assimilation. The takkanah was reaffirmed in February 1946, May 1972, June 1984, and November 2006, when it was signed by both the rabbi and president of each community synagogue, yeshiva, and community organization. The signatures to the takkanah indicated that it had community agreement and, more importantly, community enforcement. The issue of conversions of adopted children was not addressed by the takkanah and appeared never to have arisen.

In the takkanah, the term “protect our identity and religious integrity” is used as justification for the takkanah, implying that marriage with a convert or non-Jew would compromise the identity of Syrian Jews as well as their motivation to practice religious Judaism. Saying the community had to preserve its “religious integrity” assumed that those who converted for the purpose of marriage were not sincere and that their influence would cause a community downfall.

The original takkanah also took away the right of community rabbis to perform conversions of people who wanted to marry into the community. The consequences of transgressing the takkanah included having the marriage of a Syrian Jew and a convert publicly announced; advising community members not to allow marriage to the children of converts, whether male or female; denial of burial in the community cemetery; and refusal to allow the children of converts to attend a community yeshiva or to have their bar mitzvahs in a community synagogue.

The community insists the takkanah has held it together and strengthened it, but there are no verifiable demographics to support this theory. Many community members have moved to other environs where there is less stringent observation of their religious observance and practice. Syrian and Near Eastern communities have strong presences in Los Angeles, Seattle, Atlanta, Miami, and Chicago, to name a few, where there is no takkanah against marriage to converts.

Conclusion

In 2007, the Sephardic communities of New York and New Jersey were estimated at approximately 80,000 individuals. Family size averages four to five children per couple, all of whom attend yeshiva, where there is a dual curriculum. Because of the large size of extended families, weddings and bar mitzvahs tend to be very large; 400 people is considered a small affair in a community where weddings can include up to a thousand people.

Families who have been in the United States for three or four generations tend to be more assimilated, especially in terms of education. Newer immigrants, such as the last few thousand Syrians that arrived in the early 1990s, tend to cling to Old World values such as having their daughters marry before they finish high school.

Over time, the community has become much more religious and fragmented. Limitations to yeshiva size caused more yeshivas to open, each with their own value system. Some yeshivas extend their stringent rules (use of television, computers, which newspapers could be read) to home life and places where children could socialize. Some would only allow children to socialize within the school itself. The more centrist yeshivas, such as Magen David and Yeshiva of Flatbush, both of which are coed, practice Modern Orthodoxy.

The lack of a professional class in the community's early years caused a reliance on Ashkenazi teachers, whose influence over time on Sephardic yeshiva education has caused a loss of Judeo-Arabic culture and tolerance. Yet the community's presence and cohesiveness is impressive, even compared with religious Ashkenazic Orthodox communities. It has a strong infrastructure that meets the everyday needs of all community members.

Selected Bibliography

- Deshen, Shlomo, and Walter Zenner. 1982. Jewish Societies in the Middle East: Community, Culture, and Authority. Lanham, MD: University Press of America.
- Roffé, Sarina. 2006. "An Analysis of Brooklyn's Rabbinical Takana Prohibiting Syrian and Near Eastern Jews from Marrying Converts." Master's thesis, Touro College.
- The Spirit of Aleppo*. 1986. Sephardic Archives, Sephardic Community Center.
- Sutton, Joseph A. D. 1979. Magic Carpet: Aleppo-in-Flatbush. New York: Thayer-Jacoby.
- Sutton, Joseph S. 1988. Aleppo Chronicles. New York: Thayer-Jacoby.
- Zemer, Moshe. 1988. "The Rabbinic Ban on Conversions in Argentina," Judaism 37: 84–96.
- Zenner, Walter P. 2000. A Global Community: The Jews from Aleppo, Syria. Detroit: Wayne State University Press.
- Zenner, Walter P. 2000. "Reinterpretation of a Tradition by a Transnational Elite: The Rabbis of the Aleppan Diaspora." Unpublished paper.

Jewish Women's Contributions to Contemporary American and Jewish Life

Sylvia Barack Fishman

---

Jewish women's lives in 20th- and 21st-century America altered patterns of historical Jewish antecedents, partaking of culture-wide social trends, especially first-wave feminism, obtaining the right to vote (suffrage), and second-wave feminism, beginning in the 1960s, which aimed to guarantee women educational, occupational, political, and social equality. These transformations affected demographic realities—education, occupation, marital status, fertility levels, and social networks. Equally dramatically, Jewish women successfully worked to expand their roles in the realms of Judaic scholarship, religious leadership, Jewish life-cycle events, liturgy, synagogues, Jewish organizations, voluntarism, and philanthropy. Jewish women provided much of the leadership and grassroots support for feminism and feminist changes. Women's activism also revitalized Jewish connections within the lives of Jewish women and men.

Educational Achievement, Feminism, and Labor-Force Participation

Sweeping social changes provided impetus and context for transformations in women's roles. Twentieth-century Jewish girls and women took advantage of American educational opportunities far more than women of other ethnoreligious groups: in New York in 1910, at a time when Jews made up about 19 percent of the population, 40 percent of the women enrolled in night school were Jewish. By 1934, more than 50 percent of New York female college students were Jewish. American Jewish women continued to pursue disproportionately high levels of secular education throughout the 20th century. In the 1960s, Jewish women emerged as feminist leaders, from Betty Friedan, whose critical book The Feminine Mystique (1963) became the bible of the movement, to feminist activists with Jewish connections like Gloria Steinem, Bella Abzug, Shulamith Firestone, Vivian Gornick, and many others. On a grassroots level, Jewish women were among the most likely to join feminist consciousness-raising sessions and to change their lives in accordance with feminist ideals of independence, assertiveness, and self-actualization. Before second-wave feminism Jews were the ethnoreligious group most likely to acquiesce

Few Jewish women played as important a role in the rise of the feminist movement as Betty Friedan, author of The Feminine Mystique (1963), and cofounder of the National Organization for Women. (Library of Congress) to the American middle-class norm of homemaker-mothers, dropping out of labor force with the birth of their first child and devoting their excellent educations to volunteer work. However, with the advent of second-wave feminism in the 1960s Jewish women increasingly began to take jobs for pay outside the home. By the year 2000, four of five American Jewish women under age 65 across the spectrum of American Judaism had completed a bachelor's degree and more than one of three had a graduate or professional degrees. Today, most American Jewish women are employed for pay even when they have young children at home. Indeed, except for the ultra-Orthodox, religiously traditional women are as likely as other groups of American Jewish women to have earned advanced degrees and to work outside the home in a professional capacity.

Jewish Feminism

Feminism with a distinctive Jewish focus became differentiated from the generalized movement in the late 1960s and early 1970s, and it was part of an overall Jewish awakening. Exploration of Judaism as a religious culture from a feminist perspective was encouraged by the protest movements and youth culture, which advocated "doing your own thing," including celebrating ethnic differences. This was reinforced by American Jewish feelings of pride immediately after the 1967 war in the Middle East. In a parallel development, American Jewish intellectuals and artists had become extremely influential and were increasingly exploring and emphasizing their own Jewishness. Jewish feminists began to turn their attention toward the Judaic cultural heritage and contemporary Jewish societies and institutions with the publication of Trude Weiss-Rosmarin's "The Unfreedom of Jewish Women" (Jewish Spectator, October 1970), which examined "the inequality of Jewish marriage laws"; and Rachel Adler's "The Jew Who Wasn't There" (Davka, Summer 1971), which contrasted male and female models of Jewish piety. In the early 1970s, Jewish women's prayer and study groups were being formed in St. Louis, Baltimore, Cambridge, Massachusetts, and New York. Women from the New York Havurah (one of the new egalitarian worship and study groups that developed on college campuses and spread into Jewish communal settings) evolved into Ezrat Nashim, made up primarily of women who identified as Conservative Jews and were interested in Jewish women's scholarly and public leadership roles. For many, the impact of Jewish feminism was epitomized by the movement of women into public religious leadership roles: In 1972, the Reform movement ordained the first female rabbi, followed in 1974 by the Reconstructionist movement. In 1985, urged on by Ezrat Nashim and a determined group of rabbis, the Conservative movement's first woman rabbi was ordained. Today, women are a large proportion of rabbinical and cantorial candidates, and they serve as professionals in numerous Conservative, Reconstructionist, and Reform American congregations.

A Spectrum of Transformed Judaisms

The two most sweeping impacts of changing women's roles center on the relationship of women to their Jewish cultural and intellectual heritage: (1) the inclusion of females in Jewish education; and (2) the inclusion of gender and women's issues in research. For much of Diaspora Jewish history boys marked their bar mitzvah with celebrations, and girls seldom did. Boys were far more likely to be sent to religious schools than girls, and many girls received no formal Jewish education. In contrast, when bat mitzvah celebrations became ubiquitous in American communities across the denominational spectrum, the gender gap narrowed, disappeared, and by the turn of the 21st century had actually reversed itself—today, girls are slightly more likely than boys to be enrolled in Jewish educational activities at the elementary school ages, and dramatically more likely to continue through the teen years. In Orthodox communities, it has for several decades been normative for girls to attend Jewish day schools for 12 years and then a one-year program of advanced Jewish study in Israel between high school and college. In non-Orthodox, adult, Jewish educational settings, women now outnumber men two to one.

Increasing numbers of women are Judaic studies scholars, teaching and publishing in fields ranging from the Bible, the Ancient Near East, rabbinics, Jewish history, ancient and modern Hebrew literature, Jewish thought, Zionism, Israel studies, and the sociology of contemporary Jewish communities. Moreover, Judaic studies fields themselves have been transformed by insights provided when gender becomes an analytical tool. Paying attention to the lives and sometimes the writings of women in historical Jewish societies has added more than an understanding of women—it has deepened the overall comprehension of the Jewish experience, including the centrality of Jewish domestic life to the transmission of Jewish culture historically.

Jewish Women as Brokers of Increased Jewish Engagement

Over the past half-century, the increasing involvement of American Jewish women in public Judaism, including synagogue and ritual settings, and their increasing access to Judaic texts, has generated new levels of excitement and participation for men and women. Mature women studying Hebrew, trope Torah and Haftorah reading, and Jewish history in preparation for adult bat mitzvahs, for example, have often been the impetus for innovative synagogue and communal educational programs—programs that are open to all. Women in Reform temples proudly donning Israeli hand-crafted kipot (head coverings) and tallitot (prayer shawls) have reintroduced this distinctive ritual garb in environments that discouraged them for decades. Contemporary feminist scholarship has shown how important women's domestic Judaism was in many earlier periods of Jewish history. In a change from past patterns, sociological study of the American Jewish community shows that today women's involvement is powerfully influential in rescuing public Jewish rituals and customs, along with Jewish texts and traditions. In sociological language, women increasingly serve as "brokers," connecting not only other women but also men to their Jewish cultural heritage.

Selected Bibliography

Baskin, Judith, ed. 1991. The Jewish Woman in Historical Perspective. Detroit: Wayne State University Press.

- Fishman, Sylvia Barack. 1993. A Breath of Life: Feminism in the American Jewish Community. New York: Free Press.
- Friedan, Betty. 1963. The Feminine Mystique. New York: Norton.
- Kaplan, Marion. 1991. The Making of the Jewish Middle Class: Women, Family and Identity in Imperial Germany. New York: Oxford University Press.

Jewish Renewal in America

Shaul Magid

---

The Jewish Renewal movement is one of the most recent and creative expressions of Judaism's continued attempt to mold itself to the contours of modernity. It is, in many respects, an indigenous American religious movement, but is expanding into a global Jewish phenomenon. This multifaceted development in contemporary Judaism is hard to categorize. It has the audacity of a reformation, the passion of a revival, and the optimism of a renaissance. Its critique and reconstruction of Judaism not only occupies the realm of ideas but also reaches down to the organizational structure of Judaism in the Diaspora.

For most of the 20th century Judaism in America has developed along denominational lines. Each denomination has its own autonomy, its own rabbinical academies, and its own fund-raising apparatus. The disestablishment clause in America has enabled American Judaism to develop its own institutional and spiritual apparatus without any serious threat of the hegemony of one community over the other. Renewal emerged from this denominational bedrock but has challenged the denominational structure. It is, perhaps, the prelude to, or first fruits of a postdenominational Judaism in America, growing out of the dissatisfaction many Jews have with the present ideological and practical structure of Judaism in the Diaspora (North America in particular).

Origins

Many factors contribute to the breakdown or transformation of denominational Judaism in America and the emergence of a new approach to religion and culture. Three of the most prominent direct factors are (1) the maturation of American Jews who did not experience firsthand the devastation of European Jewry in the Holocaust; (2) the rise of a generation of Jews (many second-generation Americans) who were disaffected from the materialism and spiritual vacuity of mid-to-late 20th-century American Jewish life; and (3) the shock waves of the American counterculture, including the importation of Far Eastern religions to the American continent. More specifically, it is impossible to pinpoint the beginning of Jewish Renewal in one seemingly benign event.

In 1948, the sixth Lubavitcher rebbe, Rabbi Yosef Schneerson (d. 1950) decided to inaugurate the missionary wing of his movement (only missionizing to Jews) by sending emissaries to college campuses. He asked two young disciples, Zalman Schachter (later Schachter-Shalomi) (b. 1924) and Shlomo Carlebach (1924–1994) to attend a Hanukkah party at Brandeis University (which opened its door that very year) in a suburb of Boston, Massachusetts. Schachter-Shalomi and Carlebach took various Hasidic books, tapes, and religious paraphernalia and attended the party intending to spread the message of traditional Judaism. Both were raised in Europe, studied there, and were refugees from the war, Carlebach escaping before the war and Schachter-Shalomi afterward. What they experienced that winter night at Brandeis University was the extent to which young American Jews lived in an intellectual universe that left no room for tradition the way they envisioned it. They both understood the extent to which unadulterated Hasidism simply could not be sold to an American audience raised on liberal democratic ideals. Schachter-Shalomi and Carlebach did different things with that realization, both of which contributed to Jewish Renewal, but the spark of what would become a new Jewish movement may have been ignited that evening. The first fruits of Schachter-Shalomi's meditation on those and other events was published as Fragments of a Future Scroll in 1975.

Influences

In many ways Jewish Renewal is a good example of late 20th-century religious syncretism in America. It does not intend to start a new American religion or subreligion (like Scientology, Mormonism, Southern Baptism, or Seventh-Day Adventism). Yet, in opposition to other extant Jewish denominations, it freely adopts ideas and practices from other religions, incorporating them into its developing Jewish model of worship. It is theologically anti-Orthodox (in the more formal use of the term) and seeks to create a spiritual context that can be used by Jews and non-Jews alike. In this sense, it is very much a product of American life in that it exercises a kind of eclectic creativity, reaching beyond the confines of its own tradition, fully taking advantage of a society where freedom of religious expression is a matter of law.

The influences of Jewish Renewal are not limited to Judaism. Influences include an amalgam of classical Jewish pietism, medieval Kabbalah, Hasidism, the western instantiation of Buddhism, Islamic Sufism, Christian monasticism, American pragmatism, Jewish Reconstructionism, religious existentialism, and progressive American political activism and environmentalism.

The most direct and prominent influence on Jewish Renewal is Hasidism, a Jewish pietism from the late 18th-century Eastern Europe that transformed world Jewry in the past two centuries. Both Schachter-Shalomi and Carlebach were trained in the Hasidic tradition and used Hasidic literature as the basis of their Renewal approach. Schachter-Shalomi, who is the architect of this movement, views the message of Hasidism as one that can be revamped, revalued, and de- and re-contextualized to complement an era of Jewish inclusiveness and tolerance. In many ways Martin Buber's modernization of Hasidism as Jewish existentialism plays an important role here, as does Abraham Joshua Heschel's use of Hasidism as a source for his theology of pathos. In his writings Schachter-Shalomi acknowledges his debt to Buber and Heschel yet seeks to take their initiative in a different direction. He does not relate to Hasidism as a movement, but as an approach to Judaism, something that can be revalued and used to express contemporary sensibilities. Although Hasidism is a usable model for this movement, some Renewal thinkers also view Hasidism as limited because of its unwillingness to extend its provocative teachings to their logical conclusion. This logical conclusion, what Schachter-Shalomi calls a “paradigm shift,” is the ideological foundation of Jewish Renewal and will be discussed later.

Although American Judaisms have become fully comfortable with American life in the 20th century, in many respects the particularistic nature of Judaism and its relationship to peoplehood have prevented it from engaging in global issues as part of its devotional life. Reform and Reconstructionist Judaisms do contribute to global concerns, but their social activism is not as integrated into their devotional practices as in Renewal. A good example is the environmental movement in America. One of Renewal’s original leaders, Arthur Waskow, has played a prominent role in contemporary environmentalism. His most popular works on these ideas are Seasons of Our Joy: A Modern Guide to the Jewish Holidays (1982) and Torah of the Earth: Exploring 4000 Years of Ecology and Jewish Thought (2000).

Another major area of Jewish Renewal is ecumenism and the use of other religious traditions and teachings to enhance and revise existing Jewish practice. Although modern American Judaisms often engage in ecumenical dialogue (before 9/11 almost exclusively with Christians) they usually do not integrate the practices of other religions into their religious life. This speaks to the cautious way in which modern Judaisms view the “other,” even in a free democratic society. Schachter-Shalomi is an ordained Sufi teacher and many of Jewish Renewal’s constituency practice and teach various forms of meditation, either adapted to Jewish sensibilities or not. This raises yet another internal debate in this community that is common in fledgling religious movements. Should external influences be “Judaized” or made “kosher” or should other rituals and traditions be practiced without any Judaizing process? Elat Hayyim, the Jewish Renewal retreat center in upstate New York, holds regular meditation retreats as well as more traditional Jewish festival retreats and workshops. Serious engagement with other religious traditions, including inviting masters of other religious disciplines to speak at seminars and retreats and adapting some of their practices, illustrates Renewal’s attempt to break out of the insular framework of traditional and even progressive Judaism.

Another important influence on Jewish Renewal is American pragmatism viewed through the lens of Mordecai Kaplan’s Reconstructionist Judaism. Reconstructionism argues that Judaism is, first and foremost, a civilization. Jewish law is viewed as a system of folkways that Jews developed to give themselves a unique identity as a people. These folkways are essential to maintain and protect as the people’s identity is dependent on them. However, Jewish ritual and practice must conform to the sensibilities of the people and not be foisted upon them as “commandment.” This notion of Jewish practice came to be known as “post-Halachic” Judaism, a Judaism devoted to practice but one not based on unalterable and commanded law. Kaplan’s battle was with liberal Reform Judaism, which he believed had abandoned law and practice completely, and with Conservative and Orthodox Judaism, which were, in his view, living a law that was outdated, both in form and substance. Kaplan's influences included John Dewey and Emile Durkheim. His approach was rational and pragmatic and not generally metaphysical.

Another important factor in Renewal is its engagement with Islam. Renewal members, Schachter-Shalomi in particular, were early and continuous supporters of dialogue with Palestinian Muslims, mostly Sufis, and were quite successful in opening lines of communication between Jews and Muslims on matters of spirituality and politics. This was the case in the 1960s when there was almost no serious Jewish-Muslim dialogue. As progressive leftists, most sympathize with the plight of the Palestinian civilian population and view Israel as an occupying power in the territories. Organizations like the New Jewish Agenda, the Abraham Fund, and Seeds of Peace, while not formally a part of Jewish Renewal, are influenced by it. Renewal's stance on the crisis in the Middle East illustrates where it opts out of a fervent messianism (severing it from its Lubavitch Hasidic roots that now, with the Jewish settler movement, represent the most virulent examples of Jewish messianism) and rejects the ultra- or hypernationalism so common in Diaspora Judaism. Instead, Renewal lobbies for a softer utopian vision where barriers between peoples are to be made more transparent rather than more opaque.

Ideology

Jewish Renewal is founded on a reformist ideology couched in a revivalist pietism. Like many such movements in the history of religions, its agenda is both apostolic and subversive. Its claim to have retrieved an internal meaning of Judaism is used to counter the status quo of what Judaism has become. In this sense it is also, to use more contemporary language, countercultural. The reformist predilection of Jewish Renewal is captured in the aforementioned paradigm shift. The idea is not new, but is creatively adapted to the contours of the contemporary world. The basic notion of paradigm shift is that history can be divided into distinct historical epochs, each of which contains particular spiritual paths, even within one particular religious tradition. An analysis of the messianism of Jewish Renewal, born from a tempered reading of contemporary Lubavitch (Hasidic) messianism, is a desideratum in scholarship. What is also important here is that this doctrine was also foundational for the heretical Jewish movement of Sabbatai Zevi in the 17th century.

Impact

The impact of Jewish Renewal is already profound yet, given that we are still in the midst of its full disclosure, still somewhat unknown. It is important to note that although Renewal was fed by the Baal Teshuva movement (new returnees to Judaism) in the late 1960s to mid-1970s (on this see Janet Aviad, Return to Judaism [1983]), Renewal is not a part of that movement—in fact, in many ways it is its opposite. The Baal Teshuva movement was a movement of disenchanting Diaspora and Israeli youth who turned back to traditional Judaism as an alternative to the vacuous materialistic lives of their upbringing. The endgame of this movement was a return to Orthodoxy and a basic rejection of Western values. Renewal is not a return to the past but a reconstruction of a future built on tradition but not bound to it. Although many young Jewish seekers passed through Renewal on their way to Orthodoxy, those that stayed created a Judaism that was decidedly not Orthodox and not accepting of the hegemonic claims of Orthodoxy's leadership.

Jewish Renewal has affected all Jewish denominations in North America, from Orthodoxy to Reform. Orthodoxy absorbed Renewal's focus of joyful worship and the music of Carlebach (who really was not formally part of Renewal, but floated freely between Jewish communities), some of the Hasidic teachings of Schachter-Shalomi, and the use of meditation and contemplative prayer developed by some Renewal members. Conservative and Reform Jewish communities in North America have seen the rise of smaller prayer quorums (called havurah-style communities) emerge in their larger synagogues by members who desire a more intimate and less formal prayer service. Classes in Hasidism and meditation exist in many suburban American synagogues, largely because of the impact of members who attended Renewal retreats and brought the message of Renewal to their own communities. Secular Jews who had only negative views of Judaism as antiquated and irrelevant have found Renewal sympathetic to their needs and supportive of their own secular Jewish choices. Some of these Jews have found a political home in Renewal because it represents their politics and is decidedly and openly "Jewish," but is not patriarchal, overly nationalistic, or xenophobic. In short, Jewish Renewal is leading a grassroots renaissance in Judaism, undermining tradition while espousing it, offering a progressive message that better suits the pre-multiculturalism of Reform and offers a non-Orthodox piety and meta-legal alternative to Conservative Judaism.

The recent JewBu (Jewish-Buddhist) phenomenon is, in many ways, an extension of Jewish Renewal. This largely amorphous community consists of Jews who have taken on Buddhism as a religious and spiritual path, some attaining high ranks in Buddhist circles, who have taken their vocation and turned back to Judaism in an attempt to integrate Buddhist practice with Jewish worship. These practitioners and teachers have had an impact on Jewish communities by giving workshops throughout America and in Israel.

There has been a tendency to conflate Jewish Renewal and Neo-Hasidism. They are, in fact, quite different. Neo-Hasidism was originally a literary movement among enlightened and ex-traditional Jews in the early part of the 20th century who used Hasidism as a template for a kind of modern Jewish romanticism. Figures such as the Hebrew and Yiddish writer Yehuda Leib Peretz, the novelist and poet Shalom Ash, and the philosopher Martin Buber are counted among this circle. Contemporary Neo-Hasidism is, perhaps, a second wave of that phenomenon, one that adopts the general tenor of Hasidic spirituality as a resource for contemporary Judaism. One example of Neo-Hasidism would be the appearance of secular and contemporary adaptations of Hasidic music among some Israeli musicians in the 1970s. Unlike Jewish Renewal, present-day Neo-Hasidism has no discernible ideology, nor is it a constructive critique of Jewish life. It is primarily an artistic utilization and romanticization of a deeply theological movement. Religiously, it adopts certain Hasidim modes of worship to enhance Jewish ritual and practice. Neo-Hasidism is popular in all Jewish denominations as it does not demand any reordering of fundamental principles. It largely exists in the popularity of Hasidic texts and more prominently in music accompanying the liturgy. In this respect, the father of second-wave Neo-Hasidism is Carlebach whose music and Hasidic teachings have inspired Jews throughout the world. In opposition to Schachter-Shalomi and Jewish Renewal, Carlebach and Neo-Hasidism have no real ideological or organizational agenda. Although Jewish Renewal surely is a part of the more amorphous Neo-Hasidism, it is not identical to it.

Jewish Renewal in Israel is just taking root, and it is still too early to tell how it will affect Israeli society. Orthodoxy's hegemony in Israel and the deeply rooted secularism of Israeli Zionism will force Renewal to alter its diasporic message. Renewal communities are beginning to emerge in Israel, joining secular Israel's fascination with Far Eastern spirituality with Neo-Hasidic Jewish ritual and worship. Festivals held in rural areas on Jewish festivals like Rosh Hashanah (Jewish New Year) complete with drum circles, meditation, dancing, and the sounding of the shofar (ram's horn) are becoming commonplace. A new Israeli Renewal is surely emerging but, to date, it is still in its embryonic stages.

Selected Bibliography

- Magid, Shaul. 2004. "Rainbow Hasidism in America—The Maturation of Jewish Renewal—A Review Essay." The Reconstructionist, Spring.
- Magid, Shaul. 2006. "Jewish Renewal, American Spiritualism, and Postmonotheistic Theology." Tikkun Magazine, May/June.
- Schachter-Shalomi, Zalman. 1993. Paradigm Shift. Northvale, NJ: Aronson.
- Schachter-Shalomi, Zalman. 2003. Wrapped in a Holy Flame. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass.
- Schachter-Shalomi, Zalman, with Daniel Seigel. 2005. Credo of a Modern Kabbalist. Victoria, BC, Canada: Trafford Publishing.
- Weissler, Chava. 2005. "Meanings of the Shekhina in the Jewish Renewal Movement." Nashim 10.

Jewish Studies in American Universities

Judith R. Baskin

---

Jewish studies, also called Judaic studies, is the academic teaching of aspects of Jewish religion, history, philosophy, and culture, as well as associated languages and literatures, at the undergraduate and graduate level in institutions of higher education. The significant expansion of Jewish studies in American universities is a relatively recent phenomenon. Although the Hebrew language was included in the curriculum of several of the earliest colleges to be established on the North American continent in the 17th and 18th centuries, it was taught as part of a theologically oriented curriculum designed to help potential Christian clergymen understand their religious heritage. Some instructors, such as Judah Monis, who taught at Harvard University between 1722 and 1760, were Jews or of Jewish heritage.

Jewish studies at American universities were truly established in the 1890s under the influence of the Wissenschaft des Judentums. This post-Enlightenment European Jewish movement, dedicated to promoting the rational, scientific, and critical study of Jewish religion, history, and culture, reshaped Jewish learning into an academic endeavor that was compatible with the scientific methodologies of the German university. Although pervasive anti-Semitism tended to deny Jewish studies a secure place in the European university curriculum, Wissenschaft found an institutional home in the academic rabbinic seminaries of Central Europe. In late 19th-century United States, however, chairs in Jewish studies were established in a number of major secular universities, most often with the active financial support of members of local Jewish communities.

Many of the founders of these positions, who tended to be connected with Reform Judaism, hoped that recognition of the centrality of Jewish knowledge and scholarship in the development of Western thought would hasten Gentile acceptance of American Jews. Certainly, the establishment of these positions, often in Semitic languages and literatures, played a role in legitimizing the Jewish and Judaic presence in American life and delivered the message that the Jewish literary and cultural heritage belonged in the university curriculum.

There was a rapid growth in Jewish studies in North American colleges and universities in the last third of the 20th century. The traumas of the Six-Day War in 1967 and the Yom Kippur War in 1973, as well as increasing discussion of the Shoah, inspired in many Jewish young people a desire to learn more about their identities and heritage. The unprecedented number of Jewish baby boomers who descended on college campuses beginning in the mid-1960s also played a role, as did the growing number of Jews in the professoriat. Another factor was the assertiveness of other ethnic groups on the American campus, including African Americans and Latinos, in advocating for academic courses that explored and analyzed their particular historical and cultural backgrounds. Jewish students and faculty, who were rediscovering the richness of their own tradition, pressed universities to offer academic courses on the Jewish experience. The establishment of the Association for Jewish Studies in 1969 was another indication of the growth of academic Jewish studies in late 20th-century North America. By 2005, this organization had more than 1,500 members, most of whom were teaching in institutions of higher education.

A wide variety of organizational and structural approaches in the teaching of Jewish studies, depending on individual circumstance in any given institution, characterizes the field in North America. In recent years, the free-standing Jewish or Judaic studies program or department that awards undergraduate and graduate degrees in Jewish/Judaic studies has become common. A significant number of Jewish studies programs require Hebrew language and literature study for undergraduate majors and graduate students. In some cases students must study Classical Hebrew language and texts; in others, Modern Hebrew is required. The result has been a proliferation of Hebrew language study across North American institutions of higher education to a degree that would certainly not have occurred without the linkage of Hebrew to Jewish studies. Several Jewish studies programs also offer instruction in Yiddish language and literature.

Before the 1970s, most scholars and teachers of Jewish studies in North America were men, many of whom had moved into the academic world after completing rabbinic training. A noteworthy change in Jewish studies in North America in the decades between 1975 and 2005 is the number of women who have entered the field and climbed the academic ladder from graduate students to professors in every area of Jewish studies scholarship. Concurrently, teaching and scholarship in Jewish studies have become more aware of gender as an intellectual category of analysis and the necessity to consider the constructions and consequences of gender in explicating the Jewish experience.

Jewish studies have continued to thrive and expand in a variety of North American institutions of higher learning in the first decade of the 21st century, in significant part through the philanthropy of individual donors. The growth of personal wealth in this era, together with increasing communal concern about strengthening of Jewish identity at a formative period in young people's lives, has led to a proliferation of endowed faculty positions, programs, and Jewish studies centers, both at public and private research universities that offer graduate degrees, and at institutions with a primary focus on undergraduate education. Certainly not all positions in Jewish studies in North America are dependent on outside funding. However, the investment of philanthropic resources to finance Jewish studies has been a significant boon for colleges and universities and for the field itself.

Although definitive data as to the number of positions, programs, and departments was not available in 2006, an unofficial listing of directors and chairs of academic Jewish studies entities of one kind or another numbered over 70 individuals. Information from recent Jewish population surveys indicates that as many as 40 percent of Jewish undergraduates in North America have taken at least one course in Jewish studies.

Changing demographics in the early 21st century indicate an ongoing decline in the absolute numbers of Jews in the larger population, including student populations. The future of Jewish studies in North American universities will depend on the field's continuing appeal to a larger constituency. In 2006, numerous students who took courses and chose undergraduate majors and graduate training in Jewish studies were non-Jews who came to the field out of intellectual curiosity. Similarly, increasing numbers of scholars and faculty members who research in Jewish studies are not themselves Jews.

Selected Bibliography

- Biale, David, M. Galchinsky, and S. Heschel, eds. 1998. Insider/Outsider: American Jews and Multiculturalism. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Davidman, Lynn, and S. Tenenbaum, eds. 1994. Feminist Perspectives on Jewish Studies. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Garber, Zev, ed. 2000. Academic Approaches to Teaching Jewish Studies. Lanham, MD: University Press of America.
- Ritterband, Paul, and H. S. Wechsler. 1994. Jewish Learning in American Universities: The First Century. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

American Christian Attitudes to the Jewish Diaspora

Yaakov Ariel

---

Since the 17th century, Christian thinkers in America have expressed themselves extensively on the role of the Jews in God's plans for humanity, including the purpose of the Jewish dispersion among the nations and the prospect of the Jewish restoration to Zion. Those issues have occupied American Christians more than Christians in most other nations. In contrast to other Christians, American Protestants have paid little attention to traditional Christian claims that the Christian Church inherited God's promises to Israel. Especially Puritan, Pietist, and evangelical writers, have looked upon the Jews as heirs to biblical Israel and as a people that were destined to regain their position as a favored nation in their ancestral homeland. At the same time, Puritan ministers welcomed Jewish settlement in America because they expected the Jews to spread to all corners of the earth before the messianic times unfolded. They also welcomed the opportunity to evangelize Jews.

While viewing the Jews as heirs to biblical Israel, the Puritans understood their own experience in America in biblical terms, viewing their migration from Europe to America as equivalent to the exodus of the children of Israel from Egypt, and their arrival in New England as the settlement of Canaan. Looking upon themselves as a community in covenant with God and as builders of a new Zion they wished to create a perfect Christian society that would serve as a light unto the nations, and they paid little attention to the actual realities of the Zion on the Eastern shores of the Mediterranean. This attitude changed at the turn of the 19th century. After the French Revolution and the Napoleonic Wars, a new interest spread among American Protestants in the prospect of the imminent arrival of the Messiah as well as in the possible millennial meaning of political events taking place in Europe and the Near East. The developments in Palestine encouraged theologians, such as George Bush, a congregational minister and professor at New York University, to claim that the Jewish return to Palestine was imminent.

Although Americans were influenced in their relation to the Jews by their millennial faith, Jews were more welcomed in America than in most other Christian nations. They did not rid themselves easily of stereotypical images of Jews, but the Protestant biblical faith made Christians more accepting of Jews and Jews have therefore found a friendlier and more accepting Christian atmosphere in America.

Different American Christian groups followed different paths. Joseph Smith, founder of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, followed in the footsteps of the Puritans, viewing America as Zion. In the Book of Mormon, which the Latter-day Saints consider to be part of the canon of sacred scriptures, America is promoted as the Promised Land, blessed by Jesus himself. Smith, however, also considered the Zion in the Eastern shore of the Mediterranean to be a Promised Land for the Jews. Although Smith expected the descendents of Joseph, identified with the Latter-day Saints, to congregate in the American Zion at the fullness of time, he believed the Jews would accept the Christian Mormon faith before the Messiah arrived and would congregate in their ancestral homeland, the Zion in the East. In 1841, Smith sent an envoy, Orson Hyde, an elder of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, to bless the Holy Land and pray for an end to the Jewish dispersion.

William Miller, a Baptist minister who stirred a large movement of millennial expectations in America in the 1830s–1840s, took very little interest in the Jews, their dispersion, and the prospect of their restoration to Zion. The Adventist Church, which carries the Millerite messianic tradition, has also seen no importance in the dispersion of the Jews or in their return to Zion. In the Adventist understanding, the messianic event happens in Heaven and there has been no meaning to such terms as “Diaspora” or “Zion.” A similar understanding has been adopted by the Watchtower Tract Society, whose members are known as Jehovah’s Witnesses.

Mainstream conservative Protestants, on the other hand, have deepened their interest in the prospect of Jewish national restoration. In the later decades of the 19th century and during the 20th century, millions of conservative Protestants have adopted a messianic faith named dispensationalism, which divides human history into distinct eras, for each of which God has a different plan for humanity. Meshing well with the conservative Protestant critique of contemporary culture, dispensationalism has served as a philosophy of history that explains where humanity is heading and how the various political, social, and cultural developments fit with God’s plans. The adoption of the dispensationalist messianic faith in America of the latter decades of the 19th century by conservative Protestants has strengthened their understanding that the Jews were destined to go back to Palestine and build a commonwealth there. The large influence of dispensational millennialism on the American mind, however, did not create a movement that called upon the Jews to leave America and move to Palestine. If anything, it helped facilitate the acceptance of Jews in mostly Christian America. However, Jews were supposed to return to their ancestral homeland in the fullness of time in “unbelief,” without having accepted Jesus as their Savior, and establish a political entity there. Dispensationalists and evangelicals, in general, have therefore offered support to the Zionist movement and the State of Israel and have derived much reassurance from the development of the Jewish national movement in the 20th century.

Parallel to the rise of a conservative evangelical camp in American Protestantism, a liberal wing has also developed within American Christianity, which took a very different approach to the Jews and their diasporic existence. The liberals adopted a progressive millennial faith, which insisted that humans should not wait for divine intervention and the arrival of a Messiah to solve the problems of the earth, but should work toward building the Kingdom of God on Earth on their own. The liberals therefore did not consider the Jews to play a crucial role in the events that would bring about the messianic age. However, the liberal relation to Jews also went through a historical transformation in the 1930s–1980s, which has affected their relation to the Jewish diasporic existence and to the prospect of the Jewish restoration to Palestine. Moving away from the traditional replacement theology, Reinhold Niebuhr, a proponent of Christian realism, was one of the first Christian leaders to suggest that Jews were not in need of the Christian Gospel, but had a spiritual and moral tradition of their own to sustain them. In the 1930s, Niebuhr raised his voice against the persecution of Jews in Europe, and in the 1940s, he and other liberal Protestant ministries organized to promote the establishment of an independent Jewish state in Palestine. Niebuhr's pioneering advocacy of a fundamental change toward Judaism and the Jewish people gained more ground in America in the 1950s–1960s, gradually becoming the norm among mainline Christian leaders. During the 1960s–1980s, major American churches have adopted resolutions that recognize the Jews as a legitimate religious community in covenant with God. They do not view the Jewish dispersion among the nations as a punishment by God for refusing to accept Jesus as their Messiah. If anything, they have asserted that Jews have been victims of Christian persecution.

Since the 1950s, American Catholicism has also gone through major changes in its relation to the Jewish Diaspora. Abandonment of old-time Catholic understanding of the Jews as a dispersed people began in America even before the Ecumenical Catholic Council of Vatican II in the early 1960s. As early as the 1890s, James Cardinal Gibbons supported the Zionist initiative. Although a number of Catholic priests, such as Father Charles Coughlin, promoted anti-Semitic propaganda in the 1930s, and in the 1940s American Catholic leaders rejected attempts to build a Jewish state in the Holy Land, by the 1950s American Catholics stood in the forefront of Jewish-Christian dialogue in America, became supporters of Israel, and came to view Jewish dispersion as a historical development rather than a justified punishment.

After the Six-Day War in 1967, evangelical Christians became Israel's most ardent supporters, while liberal American liberals were less than pleased by Israeli policies. However, both liberals and conservatives collaborated with Jews in the 1970s–1980s in the struggle to allow Soviet Jews to leave the Soviet Union and immigrate to Israel or America.

In sum, American Christian thinkers have paid much attention to the fate of the Jews. The strong influence of Puritan, Pietist, and evangelical theology on American Christians has worked to change and transform old Christian attitudes toward the dispersion of the Jews. Although some American Christians continue to hold to replacement theology, most have given up on that component of the Christian faith and have come to see the Jewish dispersion in new light.

Selected Bibliography

- Ariel, Yaakov. 1991. On Behalf of Israel: American Fundamentalist Attitudes towards Jews and Zionism. New York: Carlson.
- Cherry, Conrad. 1998. God's New Israel. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Dinnerstein, Leonard. 1991. Anti-Semitism in America. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Feldman, Egal. 1990. Dual Destinies. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Grose, Peter. 1983. Israel in the Mind of America. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.
- Malachy, Yona. 1978. American Fundamentalism and Israel. Jerusalem: Hebrew University.
- Weber, Timothy P. 2004. On the Road to Armageddon. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Academic.

American Zionist Activities and Organizations

Matt Silver

---

History of Zionist Organization Dynamics in America

The origins of organized Zionist activities in the United States are found in the turmoil that upset Jewish life in Eastern Europe in the 1880s and in the array of political movements and parties that coalesced during this formative moment of Jewish politics. The idea of Jewish nationalism was not on the minds of the mass of Jewish immigrants who streamed into the United States as a result of poverty and persecution in Eastern Europe and who sought opportunity and a new life in the Golde-nah Medinah of America. Nonetheless, the Hibat Zion Eretz Israel settlement movement, which consolidated in Eastern Europe in the early 1880s, won followers in the United States; and in the middle of that decade, when Joseph Isaac Bluestone and Aaron Simcha Bernstein founded a Hoveve Zion society in New York, Zionism in this pre-Herzlian period gained marginal organized footing in the United States.

Before Herzl issued his programmatic call for a Jewish state in 1896, notions of Jewish return and resettlement of the ancestral homeland of Eretz Israel occasionally surfaced in the writings and activities of American Jewish religious and lay leaders, and philo-Semites. However, whether a figure such as the New York–based publicist and politician Mordechai Noah can be considered a forerunner of organized Zionism in America is open to debate (Noah's famous call for organized Jewish settlement related to upstate New York, not the Holy Land). The leading religious figure of mid-19th-century Jewish America, Rabbi Isaac Leeser of Philadelphia, displayed considerable sympathy toward schemes to empower Jewish restoration in Eretz Israel; but such an inclination led to no genuine organized activity. Nor did fringe figures, such as the Jewish convert Michael Boaz Israel, originally Warder Cresson, who endured extreme personal hardship while pursuing dreams of Jewish restoration in Eretz Israel, generate any viable form of organized pre-Herzlian Zionism.

With the publication of Herzl's manifesto, organized Zionist societies began to sprout in localities across the United States. One city that led this emerging Zionist movement was Baltimore, where one local Jewish leader, Dr. Aaron Friedenwald delivered addresses in support of the Hibat Zion movement a few years before Herzl's appearance (Friedenwald's son Harry, along with Harry's childhood Baltimore friend Henrietta Szold, were destined to become leaders of organized Zionism in America). Baltimore sent an official delegate (Dr. Shepsal Schaeffer) to the First Zionist Congress in Basel, Switzerland; he was joined by three other Americans at this landmark Zionist event.

Undeniably, however, organized Zionism in America developed with a tempo and character that disappointed Jewish nationalists in Europe. Before World War I, the movement in America was hampered by internal dissent and leadership issues.

More seriously, the ideology of Jewish nationalism was perceived widely in American Jewish communities as being at variance with accepted norms and patterns. Even before Herzl's rise, variations on the theme of "America is Zion" had been developed in synagogues and by Jewish publicists. As world Zionism organized under Herzl's charismatic leadership, organized Jewish movements in America, such as Reform Judaism, adopted an explicit anti-Zionist position, objecting to the conceptualization of Jewish identity in national terms and stressing civic and patriotic commitments to the United States.

The Federation of American Zionists (FAZ) was founded in New York on July 4–5, 1898, and affiliated with the World Zionist Organization. Richard Gottheil, a professor of Semitic languages at Columbia University, was the first FAZ president (he was succeeded by Baltimore ophthalmologist Harry Friedenwald in 1904). From its start, the FAZ enjoyed no better than a sporadic organizational record. In its first year, it grew from 25 to 125 local societies, and 10,000 persons paid the shekel membership fee. Such membership surges before World War I proved to be short-lived. For instance, between 1898 and 1914, an estimated three-fourths of Zionist societies in New York operated for no longer than two years. Citing inept administration, lack of funds, ideological rivalry with anti-Zionist groups, and other factors, American Zionism historian Melvin Urofsky concludes that pre-World War I Zionism in America could hardly claim to have been a success.

This situation changed dramatically during World War I. Wartime dislocation and America's prolonged status as a neutral state encouraged the world Zionist movement to headquarter temporarily in the United States, under the guise of the Provisional Executive Committee for General Zionist Affairs. The general wartime climate, which was favorable to ideas of self-determination and the rights of small peoples, contributed to the growing popularity of Zionism in America; and the status of Zionism was boosted immeasurably after the British issued the Balfour Declaration in November 1917, supporting the creation of a Jewish national home in Palestine. Sociologically, the stage was set in America for a newly assertive Zionist movement thanks to the mass immigration of around 2 million Russian Jews between the early 1880s and early 1920s. Unlike their German Jewish predecessors in the United States, these East European Jews tended to conceptualize Jewish identity issues in collective terms, and they were more receptive to Zionist ideas.

As much as any other factor, scholars attribute the impressive growth of American Zionism in this period to the leadership of Louis Brandeis, who presided over the reorganization of the movement as the Zionist Organization of America (ZOA, founded in 1918). In prewar years, while rising to fame in America as a "people's attorney," Brandeis had negligible affiliation with Jewish life. His conversion to the Zionist cause can be attributed to a number of factors: his admiration of the democratic capacity and communal cohesion of masses of East European Jewish immigrants, criticism of prevailing "melting pot" ideologies to which Brandeis was exposed partly via contacts with Horace Kallen, and possibly also feelings of estrangement from Boston's elite Brahmin society and various opportunities attendant to ethnic leadership in the United States. Whatever his innermost motives, Brandeis's leadership had an electric, galvanizing effect on American Zionism.

Louis Brandeis became chairman of the Federation of American Zionists in 1914.
(Library of Congress)

Brandeis's well-known Zionist slogan—"To be good Americans, we must be better Jews, and to be better Jews, we must become Zionists"—significantly allayed double loyalty anxieties among Zionist-inclined American Jews. Continuing with his Zionist efforts even after he was confirmed as a Justice to the Supreme Court in June 1916, Brandeis instilled discipline and enthusiasm in the ZOA. Flanked by impressive American Jewish associates such as jurists Julian Mack and Felix Frankfurter, Brandeis presided over a ZOA that claimed some 200,000 members at the end of the war and sponsored significant medical relief and economic reconstruction efforts in British-controlled Palestine.

Organized Zionism flagged in America during the interwar period, as a result of general isolationist trends in American culture and the concurrent Americanization of Jewish immigrants. In the immediate postwar years, the ZOA under Brandeis's leadership engaged in a debilitating power struggle against Chaim Weizmann and his followers. Among other demands, Brandeis called for the depoliticization of the Zionist movement and for strict control over its finances. When his platform was roundly defeated at the ZOA Cleveland Convention in 1921, Brandeis and his associates dramatically resigned from their posts in the organization, and their departure marked the start of decline in ZOA activity and membership. In the last year of the 1920s, ZOA membership stood at a paltry 18,000 shekel-paying members.

Hadassah, the Woman's Zionist Organization of America, stood out as a notable exception to this trend of American Zionist decline in the interwar period. Hadassah, founded in 1912, drew upon American Progressive influences, wartime transformations in gender roles, and the vision and leadership of Henrietta Szold while focusing its activity on social welfare and medical projects in Mandatory Palestine. In the period when ZOA rosters thinned, Hadassah's membership leapt from 11,000 in 1922 to 27,000 in 1932. During the later Depression years, Hadassah continued to grow (it had 86,000 registered members in 1942), and it responded cogently to the crisis in Europe by redirecting its efforts to the “Youth Aliyah” program for resettling young Jewish Holocaust refugees in the Yishuv.

Henrietta Szold, one of the founders of Hadassah, and president of the American Zionist Medical Unit. (Library of Congress)

In the interwar period, world Zionist leaders, most notably Chaim Weizmann, reasoned that American Zionism might be reenergized via the mobilization of wealthy American Jews who were mostly of Central European origins. During the war years, men like banker Jacob Schiff and attorney and Jewish communal leader Louis Marshall operated as “non-Zionists” in that they refused to affiliate formally with Jewish nationalism out of opposition to the Jewish state formula. These American non-Zionists nonetheless devoted considerable time and resources to educational and economic development projects in Mandatory Palestine; and through the 1920s, Weizmann negotiated arduously with Marshall, finally reaching an agreement for Zionist/non-Zionist collaboration in the expanded Jewish Agency. In the 1930s, the practical effects of this effort were largely nullified by the Great Depression, but the importance of this group of “non-Zionists” toward the rejuvenation of organized Zionist activity in America was illustrated at the end of the decade and then in the World War II years.

In response to the Holocaust, sympathy for the Jewish state formula soared among Jews in America. When well-established American Jewish organizations, such as the American Jewish Committee, abandoned the old non-Zionist opposition to political Zionism and supported calls for the establishment of a Jewish commonwealth or state in Eretz Israel at the 1942 Biltmore Conference and the 1943 American Jewish Conference, Zionism became an accepted component of organized American Jewish communal life.

By the end of World War II, distinctions between non-Zionists and Zionists no longer seemed tenable. In impressive efforts of political lobbying and marshalling of resources for the Jewish state-in-the-making, American Jews en masse became supporters of the Jewish state formula. The new tone was set at the American Jewish Conference by impassioned Zionists such as Cleveland Rabbi Abba Hillel Silver; groups like the American Council for Judaism, which upheld old anti-Zionist positions, were roundly rejected as fringe elements.

Current Zionist Organization Dynamics in America

After the establishment of the Jewish state in 1948, Zionism in a general sense of pro-Israel activity became a mainstay in a vast array of American Jewish organizations. Some such organizations focus primarily on pro-Israel activity, either by providing resources or by advocating in favor of foreign policy initiatives favorable to Israel; other organizations undertake pro-Israel activities as one component of their work. Though it is difficult to generalize about the intensity level of activities implemented by all these organizations, in a broad sense there has been some fluctuation in commitment levels to Israel in historical periods subsequent to 1948. Some studies point to relative disinterest in Israel affairs among American Jewish communities in the 1950s; generally, there is a consensus that pro-Israel activity accelerated during the 1967 Six-Day War; recently, some studies have pointed to the waning of organized American Jewish commitment to Israel as a consequence of disputes about Israeli policy in territories won in the 1967 war, "Who is a Jew" debates, and other factors. However, on the whole, as already discussed, the pre-1948 dynamics created a situation in which pro-Israel orientations are consensual in American Jewish life, and hence Zionism became integrated as a vital component in organized communal activity. In fact, some scholars have suggested that organizational activity in Israel's support has become an ideological staple in the "civil religion" of American Jewry.

Compared with the immediate, post-1948 period, pro-Israel organizational activity in the United States became a far more sophisticated and professional endeavor by the final years of the 20th century. As much as any other organization, the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) symbolizes this transition. As it took shape as a pro-Israel lobby on Capitol Hill toward the mid-1950s, the organization's work was largely that of one energetic American Zionist, I. L. Kenen. By the early 1980s, AIPAC had left these humble origins far behind. Its success mobilizing U.S. government support for Israel fascinated observers who ruminated about the "Jewish lobby" as a model ethnic interest group in the United States, just as scholars wondered whether AIPAC's command of tens of thousands of members and its impressive professional management represented a qualitative change toward a new Jewish politics in the Diaspora.

Despite the quantitative leaps in the budgets and scope of activities of pro-Israel American Jewish organizations and qualitative changes in terms of professionalism and lobbying specialization, organized Zionist activity in the United States has followed a consistent set of guidelines since Israel's establishment in 1948. These guidelines could never have been formulated in a contractual agreement between American Jewish organizations and the State of Israel, but they have nonetheless been well understood by American Jews and Israelis. The 1950 exchange of letters between American Jewish Committee president Jacob Blaustein and Israel prime minister David Ben-Gurion was one noted attempt to clarify these guidelines—but in actual fact, the rules really required no explicit elaboration.

Zionism in the American Jewish context in no way precludes U.S. citizenship commitment and patriotic devotion to America. Rather than aliyah immigration, pro-Israel organizations in America have demonstrated their commitment to Zionism via philanthropy and concerted lobbying and advocacy efforts in Washington and elsewhere in the United States. Significant conceptual debates about the meaning of Jewish identity and experience continue to divide Zionists in America and Israel (for instance, American Zionist organizations have long resisted the conception of Jewish life in America as galut, exile), but among the American Jewish organizations themselves there is little controversy about the conceptualization of Zionism as the mandate to undertake pro-Israel philanthropic and advocacy activities.

A strong indication of the impact of Zionism on organized American Jewish life is the number of member organizations of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations that deal substantively with pro-Israel activity. A partial list of these organizations follows (the Conference has 52 member organizations):

- Ameinu: The successor of the Labor Zionist Alliance, Ameinu has a 100-year history and works for a progressive Israel and America.
- America-Israel Friendship League: A nonprofit organization dedicated to strengthening ties between the two democratic states, the United States and Israel.
- American Friends of Likud: A group supporting the right-wing party that has been a leading force in Israeli politics since 1977.
- American Israel Public Affairs Committee: The prominent force of advocacy in support of Israel in the United States, AIPAC has 100,000 members in all 50 states.
- American Zionist Movement: The American affiliate of the World Zionist Organization, the AZM is a coalition of Zionist groups and individuals
- Americans for Peace Now: The American support branch of the Israeli peace movement Shalom Achshav
- AMIT: This group supports Israeli youth from diverse backgrounds and bolsters frameworks of academic achievement, religious values, and Zionist commitment,
- Association of Reform Zionists of America/World Union North America: The Zionist arm of the Reform movement and an affiliate of the Union for Reform Judaism.
- Bnai Zion: Founded in 1908, Bnai Zion is a charitable organization that supports humanitarian projects in Israel and the United States.

- Development Corporation for Israel/State of Israel Bonds: Since 1951, Israel Bonds sales have helped Israel's Finance Ministry support projects in key sectors. Bond sales have exceeded $25 billion.
- Emunah of America: Chapters and divisions around the United States support Israel's largest religious Zionist educational and social welfare organization.
- Friends of the Israel Defense Forces: Supports social, educational, and recreational programs and facilities for Israeli soldiers and supports bereaved relatives of fallen soldiers.
- Hadassah, Women's Zionist Organization of America: The largest women's and the largest Zionist membership organization in the United States, Hadassah has more than 300,000 members.
- Jewish National Fund: The JNF was created by the fifth Zionist Congress in 1901 as a national fund to purchase land in Palestine. Over the past century, the JNF has planted more than 240 million trees and developed more than a quarter million acres of land throughout Israel
- Mercaz USA: The Zionist membership organization of the Conservative movement, Mercaz USA represents Conservative Jewry within the World Zionist Organization.
- NA'AMAT USA: This group has pursued its goal of supporting the women and children of Israel for the past 80 years.
- National Committee for Labor Israel: Supports Israel's labor sphere; working with the American labor movement and Jewish communities, the organization supports Labor Zionist institutions.
- Religious Zionists of America: The American branch of the World Mizrachi/Hapoel Hamizrachi movement, the RZA cultivates religious Zionist commitments among American Jews. The RZA supports affiliate religious Zionist organizations, including the Bnei Akiva youth movement.
- WIZO: The Women's International Zionist Organization is a nonpartisan movement dedicated to the advancement of the status of women, support of all sectors of Israeli society, and encouragement of Jewish education in Israel and the Diaspora
- Zionist Organization of America: The ZOA has a national membership of 30,000 and chapters across the United States. Today, it works to strengthen U.S.–Israeli relations via educational activities, public affairs programs, and Israel advocacy on Capitol Hill, campuses, and elsewhere

Selected Bibliography

- Berman, Aaron. 1990. Nazism, the Jews and American Zionism 1933–1948. Detroit: Wayne State University Press.
- Kaufman, Menahem, 1991. An Ambiguous Partnership: Non-Zionists and Zionists in America, 1939–1948. Jerusalem: Magnes Press.
- Rosenthal, Steven. 2001. Irreconcilable Differences? The Waning of the American Jewish Love Affair with Israel. Hanover, NJ: Brandeis University Press.
- Urofsky, Melvin. 1975. American Zionism from Herzl to the Holocaust. Garden City, NY: Anchor Press.

American Jews and the State of Israel

Chaim I. Waxman

---

Before the Six-Day War of June 1967, Israel played a rather limited role in the lives of American Jewry and the organized American Jewish community. Beginning with the eve of that war, Israel became an integral, if not the central component of the organized American Jewish community. In the listing of National Jewish Organizations published at the end of each volume of the American Jewish Year Book, the centrality of Israel in the listed objectives and activities of most of them is readily apparent. Communal leaders have largely been strongly pro-Israel and actively involved with the society and its people; most state that they feel very close to Israel, visit Israel, and identify as Zionists. In one survey (Cohen 1990), more than half stated that, at some time, they seriously considered living in Israel.

Israel has also become an integral part of the synagogue service of American Jewish denominations. Most standard American Jewish prayer books now incorporate some prayers for the State of Israel as part of the weekly service. Thus, the official prayer book of the American Reform Movement, Sha'arei Tefillah (Gates of Prayer), published in 1975, is radically different from its predecessor, the Union Prayer Book, in many ways, not the least being its inclusion of a prayer for the State of Israel as part of the weekly and holiday service. The movement's holiday liturgy, as set down in Gates of the Seasons (1983), incorporates Israel's Independence Day, Yom Ha'atzmaut, into the religious calendar and the ritual service. The Weekday Prayer Book, sponsored by the Conservative Judaism's rabbinic organization, the Rabbinic Assembly, was published in 1961 and included a new, third Al Hanisim prayer, for Yom Ha'atzmaut, in the same part of the service where there are Al Hanisim prayers for the miracles of Hanukkah and Purim. In 1985, the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism published Siddur Sim Shalom: A Prayerbook for Shabbat, Festivals, and Weekdays, which includes the Tefila lishlom Hamedina, the prayer for the welfare of the State of Israel, as part of the prayer service. Although the most popular edition of the Orthodox Art-Scroll siddur does not contain any reference to the State of Israel, the Rabbinical Council of America edition, representing centrist/Modern Orthodoxy, does. In addition, there is an abundance of data substantiating that the Orthodox have the most extensive and deepest attachments to Israel.

Israel has also become increasingly central in the realm of American Jewish education. If, in 1968, Israel was taught as a separate subject in less than half of all Jewish schools, including all-day, weekday afternoon, and one-day-a-week schools under Orthodox, Conservative, Reform, communal, and secular auspices, by 1974, almost two-thirds of the school curricula listed Israel as a separate subject and reported increased attention paid to Israel in all subject areas. Anecdotal evidence and personal observation convey the strong impression that this pattern has further intensified over the years. As for the role of Israel in American Jewish education, its increased importance is evidenced in a wide variety of ways, not the least of them being that Israel is today a major source for curriculum materials in the field of Jewish education. In certain respects, the biblical vision, ki mitzion tetzei tora (From Zion shall Torah flow), has been realized, for example, in the publication of Judaica and a wide variety of Jewish curriculum materials.

Although Israel plays a central role in the organized Jewish community, its significance to the American Jewish population appears to be declining. The American Jewish community and the American Jewish population are definitely not one and the same with all of their major differences. Indeed, although the overwhelming majority of American Jews assert that their Jewishness is important to them, a majority are not affiliated with the American Jewish community. They are not members in any Jewish organization; they do not subscribe to any Jewish publication; and they are not members in any synagogue or temple—even those they do not attend.

As for their connections with Israel, evidence suggests that although most American Jews identify as pro-Israel, more than two-thirds have never visited Israel and about 40 percent have no intentions of ever visiting there. More than half state that they are only somewhat or not at all emotionally attached to Israel, and Israel is of less emotional significance to younger Jews than it is to their elders.

Despite mass communications, the Internet, and the so-called “global village,” most American Jews are quite uninformed about even some of the very basic features of Israeli society and culture. This has implications, not only for Israel but also for the American Jewish community. The two are mutually dependent on one another. Israel may need American Jewry’s economic and political support, but the American Jewish community needs Israel, if for nothing other than to legitimate many of its institutions and organizations. As American Jews are distanced from Israel they are distanced from the community as well, and vice versa.

One communal manifestation of the distancing from Israel is in declining philanthropic contributions. American Jews are contributing far less to Israel. The central philanthropic agency of the American Jewish community is the United Jewish Communities (UJC), which emerged from a merging of what had previously been the Council of Jewish Federations, the United Israel Appeal, and the United Jewish Appeal (UJA). The community’s fund-raising activities have long been centralized in a combined UJA-Federation appeal, and the cause of Israel has also helped raise funds for local communal needs. Aside from special “Israel Emergency Appeals,” such as those undertaken in the summer of 2006 as a result of the Hezbollah rocket attacks on northern Israel, the proportion of UJC funds going to Israel has declined over the years. In addition, the amount of philanthropic giving in the community has also declined. Both Israel and the organized American Jewish community have been adversely affected by the distancing from Israel.

As for the source of the emotional distancing from Israel, it appears to be rooted in a broader phenomenon in American Jewry and, indeed, in modern society, namely, declining communal involvement as individualism and personalism have increased. The declining emotional attachment to Israel among American Jews appears to be part of their broader, overall declining sense of peoplehood. This also manifests itself in the decreasing numbers who agree that Jews in the United States and Jews around the world share a common destiny and in decreasing numbers who admit “a strong sense of belonging to the Jewish people.” Although the reasons for this are complex, it may be attributed partly to the increased rates of intermarriage in the United States. Numerous studies indicate that the non-Jewish spouses of intermarried couples, children of intermarriages, and even converts identify less with Jewish peoplehood than with Jewish religion.

In addition, for several decades, in the United States social scientists have been writing of a decreasing sense of community and civic involvement and increasing individualization and atomization in American society. More recently, Robert Putnam argued, with considerable supportive data, that Americans are increasingly detached from social groups such as community groups and are less likely to be involved in civic activities. They are less likely to join PTAs, unions, political parties, and a host of other social groups, and this, he argues has serious implications for the future of American society. Most recently, it has been found that Americans have fewer close friends today (two friends), than they had a decade ago (three friends), and the number who say they have no one to discuss important matters with has doubled to one in four. The weakening bonds of friendship result in, among other things, fewer people turning to friends for help in crises, fewer neighborhood watchers to prevent crime, fewer visitors for the hospitalized, and a declining number of participants in community groups.

Among the religiously traditional, on the other hand, the ties to Israel are very strong and have been intensifying. More than 70 percent say they are very emotionally attached to Israel; more than 80 percent have been to Israel at least once; and 25 percent of the Orthodox respondents who visited Israel did so more than five times, which far exceeds the percentages of the non-Orthodox.

In addition, the percentage of Orthodox among American olim, immigrants to Israel, has increased significantly, and it is currently suggested that about 80 percent are Orthodox. In addition to the ideological motivation for aliyah, there are social-psychological, economic, and structural factors that contribute to the higher rate of aliyah among the Orthodox. They are more typically individuals whose Jewishness takes precedence over other aspects of their identities, and their aliyah is an attempt to more fully live their lives as Jews within the family of Jews. In addition, there is strong evidence that the Orthodox are disproportionately affected by the high cost of Jewish living—they have larger families and lower incomes than the non-Orthodox, and their ideological commitments compel them to join synagogue, to send their children to private day schools, and to contribute to a variety of other Jewish communal institutions. As a result, the major organization promoting American aliyah, Nefesh B'Nefesh, and the American branch of the Israel Aliya Center are now directing their messages to Orthodox families with small children, the most likely candidates for aliyah, and emphasizing the economic incentive of aliyah. Although their income will invariably be lower in Israel, their “costs of Jewish living,” including synagogue memberships and yeshiva tuitions, will be substantially lower. When this is coupled with what appears to be a growing pattern, namely one of the heads of family among American olim retaining his or her employment in the United States and commuting from Israel at varying intervals, the economic incentive of aliyah among American Orthodox is even greater.

Along these lines, the American Orthodox educational structure socializes, explicitly or implicitly, to stronger ties to Israel, if not aliyah, via a pattern that has developed since the second half of the 1950s. Today, it is almost a norm for both male and female Orthodox high school graduates to spend a year or more of study in Israel. The figures vary, but in a number of the Israeli institutions in which these students study there is an aliyah rate of about 20 percent. In addition, evidence strongly suggests that the experience also intensifies attachment to Israel for those who do not make aliyah.

