During his tenure as chancellor of conservative Judaism's Jewish Theological Seminary of America, Ismar Schorsch spelled out what he saw as "the core values of Conservative Judaism" (Schorsch "The Sacred Cluster"). He suggests that the life of the American Conservative Jew "is a dialectic between homeland and exile. No matter how prosperous or assimilated, they betray an existential angst about anti-Semitism that denies them a complete sense of at-homeness anywhere in the diaspora." Empirically, his suggestion is correct not only for Conservative Jews but also for the overwhelming majority of those who identify as Jewish. Though few of them have personally experienced anti-Semitism, the majority are concerned about it. That "existential angst," however, is not sufficient to motivate to aliyah. The drive for that appears to lie in religio-ethnic ideologies and drives that are more deeply rooted and ingrained in Orthodox Judaism.

Selected Bibliography

- Cohen, Steven M. 1990. Israel-Diaspora Relations: A Survey of American Jewish Leaders. Ramat-Aviv, Israel: Israel-Diaspora Institute.
- Ellenson, David. 1996. "Envisioning Israel in the Liturgies of North American Liberal Judaism." In Envisioning Israel: The Changing Ideals and Images of North American Jews, edited by Allon Gal, 117–148. Detroit: Wayne State University Press.
- Rebhun, Uzi, and Chaim I. Waxman. 2000. "The 'Americanization' of Israel: A Demographic, Cultural and Political Evaluation." Israel Studies 5, no. 1 (Spring): 65–91.
- Tobin, Dodi, and Chaim I. Waxman. 2005. "The Transatlantic Commuter—Living in Israel, Working in the States." Jewish Action 66, no. 2 (Winter): 44–48.
- Waxman, Chaim I. 1989. American Aliya: Portrait of an Innovative Migration Movement. Detroit: Wayne State University Press.
- Waxman, Chaim I. 1996. "Weakening Ties: American Jewish Baby Boomers and Israel." In Envisioning Israel: The Changing Ideals and Images of North American Jews, edited by Gal Allon, 374–396. Detroit: Wayne State University Press.

The Portrayal of American Jews in Israeli Literature

Matt Silver

---

Throughout the first half century of Israeli statehood, the Israeli novel maintained a consistent Zionist position toward the American Diaspora. American Jewish life has rarely, if ever, been depicted in the Israeli novel as an intrinsically viable identity solution in modern Jewish life. Instead, it has been regarded as a mostly unhappy asylum for symbolically representative Israeli characters who are the self-declared or objective victims of cultural or political impasses in Israel.

Though some texts express sustained, explicit attacks on American Jewish life, more typically the criticism conveyed by Israeli novels that are wholly or partly set in the American Diaspora is implicit. Israeli authors who place their characters in the American Diaspora do not delve particularly deeply into the local landscape of, say, California or New York and focus instead on the characters' offshore ruminations about Israeli life. At best, the American Diaspora provides these characters with a margin of emotional respite and material comfort; but the plot focus remains placed on their ability, or inability, to reconnect with Israeli life. Passing references to loose ends and chronic problems in American life (e.g., political corruption in the Watergate era, race relations, and perceived excesses of 1960s protest movements) outbalance rather mechanical allusions to dynamics of pluralism, creativity, and pro-Israel commitment in American Judaism or American Jewish organizations.

Through the end of the 1990s, plot dynamics and character representation in Israeli literature were not structured in ways that might evoke a sense of positive creative tension, or partnership with American Jewry. Instead, Israeli authors regarded the pre-1948 halutz pioneering norms and the 1948, 1967, and 1973 wars as the prime constituent elements of Jewish identity. In moderately ironic or impatiently disinterested modes, they related to facets of American Jewish identity as being existentially subordinate to these Israel-based, Jewish-identity building blocks.

Analyzed briefly, works by three respected Israeli authors, Nathan Shaham, Eli Amir, and Hanoach Bartov, substantiate these generalizations about attitudes toward the American Diaspora in Israeli literature.

Shaham's tale "Streets of Ashkelon," which serves as the title of a collection of stories published in 1985, argumentatively segregates Israeli literature from Jewish creativity in the Diaspora, particularly America. The story's claim, implicit in its title, is that complex or sorrowful realities of Jewish existence cannot be rendered with honor and meaning in non-Jewish languages, in Gentile societies.

The narrator, a Holocaust survivor who struggles unsuccessfully for years to depict her life story and vision in prose, finally finds popular success with a sensitive memoir of her Warsaw childhood that elusively refrains from cataloguing Nazi barbarity. Her narration is laced with sarcastic jibes at the assimilated American Jewish intellectual set of New York as well as an acutely uncomfortable recognition that her own literary success owes much to the popularization of the Holocaust in American culture, as in a recent American TV mini-series (such popularization is dismissed as the "pornography of suffering" by one of the characters in the novella).

"Streets of Ashkelon" focuses remorselessly on the ambiguities of the intentions and ambitions of a survivor-writer in America. Shaham's plot construction damningly associates the circulation of Jewish truths in a commercialized Christian society with adulterous betrayal and dishonor. The narrator, an attractive, late-middle-aged woman, divulges graphic details about her past to a young, ambitious non-Jewish writer; in the bedroom, these horrible secrets arouse her lover, and he quickly incorporates them in a best seller whose mediocre literary quality is conveniently overlooked by opportunist American Jewish critics.

Although it raises profound, vexing questions about the status of Jewish creativity and experience in non-Jewish cultural settings, Shaham's story also reflects specific, rather stereotypical, perceptions of America and American Jewish life that are current in Israeli literature. American urban reality is presented as street violence, and American individualism is depicted as narcissism (the key minor character in the novella, also a survivor-writer, has lost her only child in a subway mugging; the Gentile Holocaust popularizer becomes interested in the subject while looking in a mirror, and so on).

Other tales in Shaham's 1985 collection accelerate this attack on the American Diaspora. One corrosive story, "Ask Not, Zion," which is set in a small middle American town, depicts the souring of a prosperous American Jewish community's initial welcoming of a young Israeli couple. The two visitors energetically serve the community's organizations and institutions, but their efforts unravel. Petty bickering and corruption in the American Jewish community, senseless street violence in the town, and dubious uncertainties in the character and past of the male Israeli visitor, breed tragedy. Just as the collection's title story argues that Jewish writing in the American Diaspora cannot culturally do justice to the truths of the Jewish past, this final tale in Shaham's book suggests that Israeli good-will ambassadors cannot practically serve American Jewish needs. The final tale in Shaham's work parallels critiques in post-World War II American Jewish literature, such as works written by the young Philip Roth; yet it also aggressively transplants in the American Jewish setting denial of the Diaspora motifs found in depictions of late 19th century and early 20th century East European Jewish life rendered by early generations of Hebrew writers.

In a more sustained, less polemical vein, the Israeli writer Hanoah Bartov has, in works set in the American Diaspora, associated his characters' emotional infidelities with crises in Israeli culture and Zionist ideology. His last novel, From End to End (2003), a moving depiction of an Israeli couple's lifelong relationship, is centered squarely in defining Israeli experiences such as the 1948 Independence War and kibbutz communes. The plot mechanics (including the heroine's tawdry affair with a sailor) superficially rely on American props, but the novel contains highly suggestive contrasts between American Jewish suburbanization in the 1950s compared with the Israeli setting of economic rationing, ma'abarot tent towns, and war expectation in that era. Such contrasts remain to be explored fully in Israeli fiction.

An earlier Bartov work, In the Middle of the Novel (1984), depicts a self-imposed, three-year American exile at the end of the life of a journalist-writer named Balfour Shuv, whose life experiences (childhood in an unmemorable Israeli town, an unimaginative, religious father, volunteer enlistment in the British army during World War II) are threaded throughout a number of Bartov's novels. Shuv spends his last three years in a depressed, drunken, angry funk, shuttling between houses of friends and relatives on the East and West coasts; from afar, he privately settles old scores with fixtures of his life in Israel, including a brother named Meir, a more successful writer. This unsuccessful American end to Shuv's life is deliberately depicted in a cloudy, indefinite manner. His son, a newly religious history graduate student who has no interest in America, and a former lover, an American Jewish woman whose knowledge of Israel is grounded superficially in Leon Uris's Exodus, recover secret tapes of Balfour Shuv's last reminiscences; but the creative relationship between this last testament of the writer's life and the American setting in which it was produced remains curiously mysterious to these two would-be literary executors.

Bartov's In the Middle of the Novel contains mildly ironic depictions of aging North American Jews who claim that their New World prosperity means nothing compared with their few years as pioneers in kibbutz communes in the pre-1948 period (characterizations that anticipate the later brilliant satire of the Israeli writer Meir Shalev) and brief, provocative criticisms of radicalized 1960s American Jewish culture. Yet the overall thrust of Bartov's fiction is to keep the American Diaspora at a distance, even when the protagonist is ostensibly situated in it during climactic stretches of a novel. Perhaps more than any Israeli writer of his generation, Bartov conjures the prevailing image in Israeli fiction of the American Diaspora as a melancholy halfway house for characters who are temporarily or permanently unable to come to terms with past or present iconic Israeli experiences.

More optimistic renderings of the American Diaspora do not challenge this basic sense that Israelis live in emotional exile in it. A telling recent text in this respect is Eli Amir's Shaul's Love (1998). The novel is unique because it describes the full or partial realization of the American Jewish dream and the full or partial breakdown of the Israeli social utopia, while remaining emotionally committed to life in Israel.

The protagonist, a computer expert born in a poor Jerusalem neighborhood to a Sephardic, seventh-generation Eretz Israel family, strikes gold in America by anticipating, and then participating in, the late 20th-century Silicon Valley high-tech boom. Shaul Bar Adon leaves Israel in the early 1960s for studies in Stanford after failing to realize the Israeli dream of Ashkenazi-Sephardic union. Shaul's engagement to the love of his life, Haya, is broken off because of the unaccommodating attitudes of her Holocaust survivor parents. Shaul finds unimaginable wealth in America, and his positive attitude toward Jewish rituals and norms there reflects his own optimistic personality and inclusive orientation toward Jewish experience. However, the embracing depictions of Passover seders and other aspects of American Judaism in Shaul's Love remain perfunctory. The focus of Shaul's emotional energy remains Israel. He dedicates his wealth toward projects that commemorate and promote inter-ethnic solidarity in Israeli culture, and the novel ends with his return to Jerusalem.

Generally, Amir's fiction (as seen in the novels Scapegoat [1983] and Farewell, Baghdad [1992]) depicts a search to integrate the past experiences and present needs of Jews from Arab lands in Israeli culture. Although consciously abandoning negative denial of the Diaspora themes, Shaul's Love conceptualizes the American Diaspora as a positive resource to be used in this existential search for Jewish solidarity and inter-ethnic union in Israel. Hence, like other Israeli novels, its orientation toward the American Diaspora is instrumental, not essentialist. The Israeli novel is unwilling or unable to conceptualize American Jewish-Israeli interaction as something more than a resource for Israel—that is, as an intrinsically valuable norm or identity endpoint.

Selected Bibliography

- Bartov, Hanoach. 1978. Whose Little Boy Are You? Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America.
- Shaham, Nathan. 1983. The Other Side of the Wall: Three Novellas. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America.
- Shaked, Gershon. 2000. Modern Hebrew Fiction. Bloomington: Indiana University Press
- Yudkin, Leon. 1992. Beyond Sequence: Current Israeli Fiction and Its Context. Northwood, UK: Symposium Press.

Latin America and the Caribbean

Jews in the Caribbean and the Guianas

Mordechai Arbell

---

General Population: 50,800,000

Jewish Population: 1,888

Percent of Population: 0.008 percent

Jewish Population by City: Puerto Rico, 2,500; Cuba, 700; Curaçao, 300; Jamaica, 300; the U.S. Virgin Islands–Saint Thomas, 300; Dominican Republic, 250–300; Suriname, 200–250; Bahamas, 200; Aruba, 150; Martinique, 130; Guadeloupe, 100; Barbados, 40; Haiti, 20–30; French Guiana–Cayenne, 20; Cayman Islands, 15–20; Trinidad and Tobago, 10

---

Historical Overview

The Spanish-Portuguese Jews saw in the Americas the promise of a new life, one free of the anti-Jewish legacy of Europe. Those who had been forcibly converted to Christianity, the “new Christians” or conversos (in Hebrew anusim), thought that by settling on the American continent they were putting a safe distance between themselves and the Inquisition that had been constantly hounding them. They fled the atmosphere that sought to discern the slightest sign of Jewish religious observance. The Inquisition, however, followed them to the New World.

Portuguese Brazil was one of the New World countries in which the New Christians concentrated. With the Dutch occupation of Bahia (Ciudad de San Salvador de la Bahia de Todos Santos) in Brazil in 1624, equal rights to Jews were proclaimed by Governor Wilkens. At least 200 New Christians returned to Judaism there and constituted the first group of authentic Jews in the New World. Unfortunately for these Jews, the Dutch occupation lasted only one year. In 1625, the Portuguese recaptured Bahia and initiated cruel vengeance against those who had reconverted.

When the Dutch captured Recife, Brazil, in 1631, the New Christians, well aware of what had happened in Bahia, did not rush to return to Judaism. But Portuguese Jews from Holland, Hamburg, and other places in Europe did settle there, and they formed organized Jewish communities in Recife and neighboring Olinda. In fact, they settled all over the Dutch Brazilian province of Pernambuco as well. Some of the Jewish settlers specialized in sugar plantations and cultivating other tropical products; others were merchants who traded with New Christians in Portuguese Brazil and the Spanish colonies in the Americas. Often their mercantile contacts were their own relatives.

The white population in Dutch Brazil reached 5,000 in the 1640s, a very impressive number for the colonies in America at that time. The number of Jews among them is contested by historians. Some maintain they were the majority of the white population; others put their number between 1,500 and 2,000. This active Jewish center attracted famous Amsterdam hakamim (rabbis)—among them Isaac Aboab da Fonseca and Moses Rafael d'Aguilar—to settle there. The number of Jews in Dutch Brazil was almost equal to the number of Jews in Amsterdam. All this came to an end with the Portuguese reoccupation of Dutch Brazil in 1654. After heroic Jewish defense against the Portuguese came the Jewish exodus from Recife (Pernambuco) to Amsterdam, the Guianas, and the Caribbean. Others went to New Amsterdam (New York)—laying the foundation of that community. The new Portuguese governor, Francisco Barreto de Menezes, was surprisingly lenient to the Jews. Though “the Jews who had been Christians, being subject to the Holy Inquisition” had to leave within a period of three months, he permitted them to retain all their movable property and their ships in Recife harbor. It follows that the Jewish exiles from Dutch Brazil could leave with a large part of their belongings.

Another important settlement site for New Christians was the Spanish colony of Jamaica. The governorship of this colony was given to Diego Colón, who managed to obtain the right of his father Cristóbal Colón (Christopher Columbus) to the island. Diego's son Louis succeeded his father, and the title was subsequently inherited by his sister Isabel Colón. During the governorship of the Colón family, permission was given for Portuguese New Christians to settle in Jamaica. The English occupation of the island came in 1655 under General Venables, and he decided to expel all the Spaniards to Santo Domingo and allow the Portuguese to remain. It is not surprising that after one year of English occupation many of these Portuguese petitioned to erect a synagogue in Port Royal, the capital of Jamaica at that time. Details about these crypto-Jews are extremely scarce, and their number is unknown. Before the English conquest they did not appear as Jews or New Christians, and not all of them returned to Judaism. Those who did readopt Judaism did not all do so at the same time. From sources available one may, however, assume that the first Jews arrived in Jamaica after 1530.

In the 17th century the European colonial powers became aware of the financial and economic possibilities of the Americas, and the Dutch, English, French, and Danish authorities initiated a policy of colonization for all the American territories not already occupied by Spain or Portugal. Their main interest was in the so-called “Wild Coast” (the Guianas) and the Caribbean islands.

The colonial powers saw in the Jews who had left Brazil a favored population for settling the Guianas. The Jews' success in establishing sugar plantations (both growing and marketing sugar), cultivating other tropical products, shipping, and banking as well as their knowledge of Spanish and Portuguese and their adaptability to tropical conditions (owing to their experience in Brazil), all resulted in a series of efforts to attract them.

Jews in French Guiana—Cayenne

On September 12, 1659, the Dutch West India Company (Amsterdam Chamber) granted David Nassy and his partners, Jewish exiles from Brazil, the right to be patroon (governor) of a Jewish colony in Cayenne (today French Guiana, at that time in the Netherlands' hands). The grant was for an exclusively Jewish settlement. The Jews were given “Liberties and Exemptions,” including freedom of conscience and the right to build a synagogue and open a school. This Jewish settlement was established in Remire, and the exiles from Brazil were joined by Spanish Jews arriving from Leghorn, Italy, directly or through the island of Tobago. At that time Tobago was the scene of armed clashes between Dutch and Latvian forces as well as cruel attacks by the Arawak Indians. The Jews who had intended to settle in Tobago went on to Cayenne. In a short time a sugar mill was built and a community founded. Apart from sugar cane, the Jews produced dyes from indigo and roucou and experimented with cacao and other tropical products. Remire was the scene of idyllic Jewish life, but this was cut short by a French invasion in 1663, headed by Lefebvre de la Barre and Alexandre Prouville de Tracy.

The Dutch quickly capitulated, but in the surrender document the French had to promise to give freedom of religion to the Jews in Remire, estimated at between 300 and 400 people. Nevertheless, most of them trekked to neighboring Suriname, at that time in English hands, and settled in what is called the “Jewish Savanna” (Joden Savanne in Dutch).

In 1667, the English general Henry Willoughby attacked Cayenne, occupied Remire, and destroyed the settlement. He also ordered that the French settlers be left to their fate and that the remaining Jews, estimated at 50–60 persons, be taken on board the English ships. When amazed English officers asked why French Christians were forced to fend for themselves while Jews were brought safely aboard, the general answered, “It is necessary for the Jews to be transported for reasons fit to be given to his Majesty.” In fact, the English needed the Jews for their sugar plantations in Suriname and Barbados.

In 1992, a group of about 20 Jewish families from North Africa and Suriname founded a community, numbering about 80 persons, in Cayenne. Jewish life is assisted by Habad.

Jews in Guiana: Pomeroun

The settlement of Pomeroun was typical of the growing competition for Jewish settlers in the entire area. Among the state papers of the then English secretary of state, John Thurloe, is a 1657 report written by the English agent in Leghorn, Charles Longland, in which he says:

It seems that the States of Holland are making a plantation Betwixt Surinam and Cartagena in the West Indies, wherein they go very wisely and politickly to work, aiming chiefly at a trade there with the Spanyard: for which purpose they have sent hether to invyte many families of Jews and granted them many privileges and immunities. Spanish is become now the Jews mother tongue, not only in these parts, but throughout the Turkish dominions, in which respect they will be very useful to the Dutch in their plantations; and many opportunities may present them to converse with the Spanyard . . .

The settlement mentioned in the letter is the one on the Pomeroun River named New Middleburgh in the Dutch colony of Essequibo (today in the Republic of Guyana, formerly British Guiana). Here again, Jews from Brazil and Spanish-Portuguese Jews from Amsterdam; Hamburg, Germany; Leghorn, Italy; and Salé in Morocco began to settle in 1657. The settlement’s products—high-quality refined sugar and vanilla prepared by a special technique—reached European markets and met with great success. This time, too, Jewish existence was short-lived. In 1666, an English attack destroyed the settlement and the Jews dispersed in the region, mainly to the Dutch island of Curaçao.

Jews in Suriname

In 1652, Francis Lord Willoughby of Parham founded an English colony on the Suriname River and gave it the name Willoughbyland. He was the governor of the English West Indies, stationed in Barbados. Very anxious to have Jewish settlers, he tried to bring Spanish-Portuguese Jews from England. Supposedly few arrived and settled in Torarica, the capital of Suriname at the time, which is now abandoned. The Jewish exiles coming from Cayenne joined the first settlers and formed an exclusively Jewish settlement on the banks of the Suriname River, “the Jewish Savanna.” The English were well aware that after receiving the generous Dutch grant of privileges in Cayenne, the Jews would only be ready to settle if similar privileges were offered to them. As a result, on August 17, 1665, a “Grant of Privileges by the Governor, Council and Assembly of Surinam” was issued. In this document “persons of the Hebrew Nation” in Suriname were considered English born, with full freedom of religion, observance of Sabbath, and permission to have synagogues, schools, cemeteries, and a tribunal of their own. The document is exceptional in the history of the Jews in the British territories. Full equal rights for the Jews in Jamaica and Barbados not obtained until the 19th century.

After a massive Dutch attack on Suriname, the English surrendered on March 6, 1667, and Suriname became Dutch. In the treaties between England and the Netherlands, all English subjects were to be free to depart from Suriname. The Dutch refused to recognize the Jews as English subjects and opposed their evacuation. To attract them the Dutch governor, Captain Julius Lichtenberg, signed on October 1, 1669, additional special privileges by which the Jews obtained freedom of decision on ecclesiastical affairs, judicial freedom for litigation between Jews, a statement that the debts on property that had been seized by the Inquisition should not be liable to punishment for nonpayment, permission to work on Sundays, and free passage on that day. As a result, it is assumed that only a small group of Jews left Suriname for Jamaica with the English.

In 1685, on a hill overlooking the Suriname River, a town was built called “Jerusalem on the Riverside.” It had an impressive synagogue, Berakha ve Shalom (its ruins today are still very impressive). Around 1694, the population of the Jewish Savanna was 570 Jews, and they employed 9,000 laborers in 40 plantations. In the 18th century, the number had grown to 2,000 Jews in 115 plantations, and they employed tens of thousands of laborers. Plantations became villages with biblical names, such as Mahanaim, Succoth, Beersheba, Gilgal, Goshen, Carmel, Dothan, Moria, and so on. Jews constituted more than 50 percent of the white population of Suriname.

With the decline in sugar prices and liberation of slaves, Jews started moving to the capital of Paramaribo, gradually abandoning the Jewish Savanna. There they were joined by Ashkenazi Jews from Germany and Rotterdam. A community of liberated slaves who had served the Jews was also formed to follow the Jewish religion; it took the name of Darkhei Yesharim (The Paths of the Just). The Jewish planters became shopkeepers, and their numbers began to decline.

One of the two synagogues in the capital Paramaribo, Zedek ve Shalom, founded in 1718, was transferred to the Israel Museum in Jerusalem. It had followed the Orthodox Sephardi rite. The other synagogue, Neve Shalom, founded in 1734, served the Ashkenazi community but used the Orthodox Sephardi rite; today it serves both communities.

The Jewish Savanna is abandoned. The ruins of the synagogue, however, still exist beside the gravestones of the cemetery. An older cemetery from the 17th century still exists in the nearby jungle called Casipoera.

At the end of the 20th century, there were 200–250 Jewish persons in Suriname. Their community periodical, Sim Shalom, appears in Dutch. Israel maintains normal diplomatic relations with Suriname.

Jews in Curaçao

In 1651, Jews started settling in the Jewish Quarter of Curaçao, several miles distant from the fortress that is now Willemstad, capital of Curaçao. The intention of the Dutch West India Company was to attract Jews from Dutch Brazil and to stem the flow of Jews from Brazil to Barbados. The Jews, headed by Isaac da Costa from Brazil, received the right to free exercise of their religion, the right to be protected, and the right to build a synagogue. Contrary to the situation prevailing in other Dutch possessions, the Jews had to accommodate themselves to some restrictions. They were treated as foreigners and were not even permitted to be within the fortress later than nine o'clock in the evening. The local authorities could not hide their distaste for the Jews. With Peter Stuyvesant's nomination as governor of Curaçao, he tried his best to limit the Jews' rights. (This anti-Jewish attitude persisted. Stuyvesant remained in charge of Curaçao even when nominated as governor of New Amsterdam.) All this could not prevent the Jews from transforming Curaçao into the central commercial center of the entire area. The proximity of Venezuela and Colombia facilitated the promotion of the so-called illicit trade with the Spanish colonies.

The Mikve Israel community was founded in 1659, and the Jewish cemetery was consecrated the same year. The first synagogue was dedicated in 1674 and coincided with the arrival of the first hakam (rabbi), Josiau Pardo of Salonika. The present-day synagogue was established in 1732.

Curaçao became the center of Jewish life in the Caribbean and was called "Mother of the Caribbean Jewish communities." The foundation of the yeshiva (rabbinical academy) Etz Haim ve Ohel Yahakob in 1674 gave spiritual guidance to the Jewish communities in the area. The bodies of Jews who died in places with no Jewish cemetery, such as Cuba, Puerto Rico, and Santo Domingo, were transported to the Jewish cemetery of Curaçao. The mohels of Curaçao attended to persons who arrived from Europe or other parts of the Americas with the aim of reconverting to Judaism. Some of the latter came directly from Spain and Portugal, among them a Dominican friar, a Franciscan father, and a Catholic priest. Jews coming from Portugal continued to be circumcised in Curaçao until 1821.

The Jewish population of Curaçao continued to grow. Jews came from Amsterdam and Bayonne, France, exiles arrived from Pomeronia and Martinique, and conversos moved there from Spain and Portugal. By 1729, the Jewish population exceeded 2,000, about half of the total white population of the island. For this small island, these numbers meant overpopulation and led to Jewish emigration to other areas, but those new communities still viewed Curaçao as their center.

In 1693, a party of 70 Curaçao Jews joined the Jews from Barbados in Newport, Rhode Island. The Curaçao community helped finance the building of the Newport synagogue, which is today the oldest Jewish house of worship in the United States.

That same year, a group of Leghorn Jews left Curaçao for the Venezuelan coast. There they founded a Dutch-Jewish enclave in Tucacas that existed with its community and synagogue until 1720, when it was captured by Spanish forces. The Tucacas Jews managed to flee to Curaçao.

Curaçao Jews settled in the Dutch islands of Saint Maarten and Aruba; in the towns of Coro, Barcelona, Barquisimeto, Carabobo, Valencia, Carora, and Puerto Cabello in Venezuela; in Baranquilla, Cartagena, Rio Hacha, and Santa Marta in Colombia; in Saint Thomas and Saint Croix in the Virgin Islands; in Cap Haitien in Haiti; in the Dominican Republic, Costa Rica, Panama, and Cuba; and in New York and New Orleans. In each location, they remained attached to Curaçao, which in turn was connected to them and was sensitive to their needs.

Shaarei Tzedek Ashkenazic Orthodox Jewish Community synagogue in Willemstad, Curaçao. (Photo by Jono David)

Today the communal importance of Curaçao has diminished and with it the Jewish population. Reform Judaism came to Curaçao in 1863 and the Reform Temple Emanuel was dedicated in 1867, causing a rift and dividing Curaçao into two communities. The dispute resulted in many Jews distancing themselves from the community. The conflict continued for almost 100 years and resulted in damage to Jewish life. To save the situation, in 1964 the two communities merged to form the United Netherlands Portuguese Congregation Mikve Israel-Emanuel, which adopted Reconstructionist principles. In the 20th century, Ashkenazi Jews began settling in Curaçao. In 1969, the Ashkenazi community of Shaarei Tzedek was founded there and an Ashkenazi synagogue was built. In the early 21st century, Curaçao has about 300 Jews, and Ashkenazi Jews are the majority.

Jews in Saint Eustatius

This very small island (10 kilometers long, 5 kilometers wide) is well situated geographically—400 kilometers south of Puerto Rico—so it could serve as the first station for ships crossing the Atlantic. It has a natural harbor in which more than 200 vessels could anchor. The Dutch used the island as a supply station between New Amsterdam in North America and New Holland (North Brazil) in South America. Jews began to settle on the island in 1722. By 1781, their number was estimated at 400 of a total of 800 free citizens. Jews came there from Amsterdam, Curaçao, Suriname, and North Africa. Whereas Curaçao specialized in commerce with the Spanish colonies in South America, Saint Eustatius ventured into global commerce. The Jewish merchants transformed it into the shopping mall of the Americas. It became the center of commerce between Europe and North and South America as well as between the different parts of the Americas: sugar from the French and Spanish colonies to Europe; meat from North America; flour from Scandinavia; corn from Venezuela; and raw materials, textiles, and porcelain from Europe. After 1760, between 1,800 and 2,700 ships were anchored at Saint Eustatius annually. In 1760 alone, the Saint Eustatius port received 3,551 ships, most of which were Jewish owned. The island became a center of stores and merchandise and was commonly called the “Golden Rock.” In 1737, the Jewish community of Honen Dalim was founded, and a synagogue was built on which Jewish life centered. The island’s undoing came when the Saint Eustatius Jews started to supply the American revolutionaries with arms and ammunition in their rebellion against England. The ships caught by the British off the coasts of Virginia and New England were Jewish owned. The future flag of the United States was recognized for the first time in Saint Eustatius. The British could not stem the flow of ships. Consequently, in 1781, the British admiral Rodney attacked and captured the island. All the Jewish men were arrested and exiled to other islands. All Jewish property was confiscated, and Jewish women and children were left penniless on the island. This action was severely condemned, even in the British Parliament. The exiled Saint Eustatius Jews found refuge in the Danish-held Virgin Islands. Some even reached Belize (British Honduras).

Jews in Aruba

The first permanent Jewish settler in Aruba was Moses de Salomo Levi Maduro in 1754, who was authorized to farm but not to raise cattle. He was joined by other Curaçao Jews. Between 1816 and 1826 they numbered 30 people. New immigrants from Eastern Europe reached Aruba in the 1920s. An Orthodox synagogue, Beth Israel, was founded in 1962. The new cemetery was established in 1942. Aruba currently has a Jewish population of some 200 people.

Jews in Sint Maarten (Saint Martin)

In the 18th century, there was a Sephardi Jewish population on Saint Martin. By the end of the century Jewish refugees settled on the island after the the English admiral Rodney destroyed the community in Saint Eustatius. In 1783, Jews found themselves numerous enough to form a community and build a synagogue. The congregation was short-lived: a disastrous hurricane and dwindling population brought an end to the community's existence.

Jews in Barbados

Spanish and Portuguese Jews from Dutch Brazil, Cayenne, Suriname, England, Hamburg, Germany, and Leghorn, Italy, came to Barbados a year after it was settled by the English in 1627. Jewish exiles from Dutch Brazil, recaptured by the Portuguese in 1654, were especially needed to transform the lagging economy of the impoverished island. The Jews introduced special modern methods of sugar refining in which Rafael de Mercado excelled. In 1654, the Jewish community of Bridgetown, the capital, was formed and the Nidhei Israel synagogue was built. Jews also developed commerce with the Spanish colonies using their knowledge of Spanish and the presence of their relatives living as conversos in those colonies.

The Jewish success stirred the enmity and envy of the local English colonists. This prompted the levy of special taxes on Jews and a decree prohibiting the Jews from employing Christian workers or slaves. They were also barred from having more than one slave, thus depriving them from of the opportunity to have plantations. The Jews, therefore, limited themselves to commerce in the towns of Bridgetown and Speightstown.

In 1739, the Jews left Speightstown after a mob of English colonists attacked and destroyed the Zemah David synagogue. In 1680, the Jews numbered 300, 2.5 percent of the white population; by 1750 they had increased to between 400 and 500, more than 3 percent of the white population.

Limitations on Jewish rights (Jews received full rights only in 1820) caused their gradual abandonment of the island. Jews left for the island of Nevis, for Newport, Rhode Island, and for England.

The Nidhei Israel synagogue was abandoned in 1928 when only one practicing Jew remained on the island. It was rededicated in 1987 by a group of Eastern European Jews and Jews from Trinidad who reached the island after World War II. The old Jewish cemetery containing some of the oldest Jewish graves on the American continent was also restored for use.

Barbadian Jews are organized in the Jewish Community Council, and by the end of the 20th century the population numbered 40 persons. Diplomatic relations between Israel and Barbados are normal.

Jews in the Nevis

In 1671, when a separate British colonial administration, independent of the British administration in Barbados, was installed on the island of Nevis, Jews began to settle there. By 1724, the Jews (about 70 individuals) were one-quarter of the white population in the capital, Charlestown. Jews also lived on the plantations.

Colonial wars caused a gradual depopulation of Nevis, however, and by the beginning of the 19th century there were no Jews on the island. The abandoned Jewish cemetery exists, standing next to the old Jewish school, which Alexander Hamilton attended. According to documents there was also a synagogue on the island.

Jews in Jamaica

The island of Jamaica was a Spanish colony. In the early 16th century, under the governorship of Columbus's granddaughter Isabel Colón and then her son Portugal Colón, permission was given to the "New Christians"—as Conversos were called—to settle on the island. Moreover, the Colón (Columbus) family governors did not install a tribunal of the Inquisition. The conversos, mostly from Portugal, settled in Santiago de la Vega (today called Spanish Town), but there is no estimate on the number of conversos who settled in Jamaica. In 1655, the English captured Jamaica, and the Portuguese conversos began returning to Judaism.

The Portuguese New Christians who had returned to Judaism were joined by Jews arriving directly from Spain and Portugal, sometimes passing first through France. The permission Oliver Cromwell gave for Jews to settle in England in 1656 also allowed Jews to settle in Jamaica. Jews from Amsterdam, along with those from Bordeaux and Bayonne, France, settled in Port Royal, the capital at that time.

British hopes for transforming Jamaica into the center of the Caribbean did not materialize. Therefore, to attract settlers, King Charles II signed the Windsor Proclamation, which awarded citizenship to those who would settle and plant in Jamaica. The arrival of Jews did turn Port Royal into a commercial center. In the words of Edward Long, for many years secretary of the governor: "The Jews' knowledge of foreign languages and intercourse with their brethren, dispersed over the Spanish and West Indian colonies, have contributed greatly to extend trade and increase the wealth of the island."

Port Royal also became the center of the buccaneer trading in which the Jews were very active. Jamaican authorities did not consider buccaneers to be outlaw pirates because they mainly attacked Spanish ships—the common enemy. Jews also excelled in the trade of gold and silver.

All of this came to an end on June 7, 1692, with a disastrous earthquake followed by a tidal wave that almost completely obliterated Port Royal, including its synagogue, Neve Zedek. The Jews moved to Santiago de la Vega, then to the newly built Kingston (the next capital), and then to Montego Bay, and in fact all over the island. From the 14 Jewish cemeteries found today in Jamaica, scholars know that Jewish communities existed also in Savanna la Mar, Port Antonio, Falmouth, Linstead, and elsewhere. Synagogues existed in Spanish Town and Montego Bay, but the main Jewish concentration later on was in Kingston. A mid-18th century census in Spanish Town records the white population as Christians, 700; soldiers, 240; and Jews, 350.

Gradually, Kingston became the center of Jewish life. The Spanish-Portuguese Jews were joined by Ashkenazi Jews who constituted the so-called English and German congregation. The two communities had separate synagogues, but efforts were made to amalgamate them. Finally, in 1921, the two communities merged into the United Congregation of Israelites and into the Shaarei Shalom (Gates of Peace) synagogue.

The compromise included:

- The present Sephardi ritual was to be maintained except for the introduction of Ashkenazi customs in taking out the Scrolls of the Law.
- On Simhat Torah eve, circuits with the Torah scrolls should take place.
- The synagogue floor would be covered by sand.

The service today is Progressive, semi-Conservative, and semi-Reform. Parts of the service are read in English, and an organ has been installed in the synagogue. The hymn "Bendigamos el Señor" (Blessed be the Lord) is sung in Spanish. However, all other Sephardi traditional customs and rites are gradually disappearing.

Although Jews in Jamaica had freedom of religion, a series of restrictions prevented them from holding public office and voting. In addition, they were liable for special taxation. A prolonged struggle for equal rights continued until 1831, when those rights were secured. All that time the Jews could be first-class merchants but second-class citizens. From 1831 Jews began to play a more active role in the social, political, and economic development of Jamaica. In 1849, 8 of the 47 members of the Assembly were Jews; in 1866, 13. The house of parliament then adjourned on Yom Kippur.

Population figures indicate that in 1700 there were some 400 Jews in a white population of 7,000; in 1881, 2,535 Jews out of 14,432 whites; in 1957, 1,600 Jews out of 13,000. Over time, however, Jews moved from Jamaica to England, Panama, and the United States, and by the mid-1990s the Jewish population numbered fewer than 300.

The only synagogue active in the early 21st century is Shaarei Shalom in Kingston. Israel and Jamaica have normal diplomatic relations.

Jews in Martinique

The first Jews settled in Martinique at the start of the 17th century, establishing themselves in Dutch commercial outposts on the island, despite its being French. In 1654, the governor of Martinique, M. de Parquet, overcame fierce opposition from the Catholic religious orders and admitted 300–400 Portuguese Jewish refugees from Dutch Brazil. These Jews founded plantations and sugar refineries and processed cacao and vanilla. The most famous of these Jews, Benjamin Dacosta de Andrade, found a method for transforming the cacao drink of the Indians of the continent into pellets and called them by the name of the drink: chocolate.

The Jesuit priests did not remain idle. They finally managed to convince the French king, Louis XIV, to issue the infamous Black Code, ordering the expulsion of the Jews from the French islands in 1685. Most of the Martinique Jews then settled on the Dutch island of Curaçao.

During the 1960s and 1970s, Jews from North Africa and France settled in the city of Fort de France and formed the Association Culturelle Israelite de la Martinique. It maintains a synagogue and a community center, a Talmud Torah, a youth club, and a burial society. There is a store that sells only kosher products. The Jewish population is estimated at about 130 persons.

Jews in Guadeloupe

The first Jewish group to settle the island consisted of three shiploads of refugees from Dutch Brazil in 1654, who were cordially received by the French governor of the island, M. Houel. The Jews initiated sugarcane plantations and sugar refineries, which accounted for the main exports. Civil unrest and ultimately English occupation caused an exodus of Jews to other Caribbean islands and Panama. Finally, the Black Code initiated by the Jesuit fathers and signed by Louis XIV of France ordered the expulsion of the Jews from all French islands in 1685. The only remnant of the first settlers is found in the story prevalent on the island that a Jewish refugee from Dutch Brazil named Pietre started a fish processing plant on the coast. The locals called it Pietre's Point, and it eventually became today's town of Pointe-à-Pitre.

In the second half of the 20th century, Jews from North Africa and France settled on the island. In 1988 the Or Sameah synagogue was founded, together with a community center, a Talmud Torah, a kosher store, and a cemetery under the name Communauté Culturelle Israelite de Guadeloupe. The current Jewish population is estimated at about 100 persons.

Jews in Haiti

The first Jews came to Haiti from Dutch Brazil after its occupation by Portugal in 1654. They used their expertise in sugar growing and dispersed all over the French colony, working in small plantations., most of the Jews left. Despite the Black Code, Jews from Bordeaux and Bayonne managed to obtain special permissions called lettres patentes and still settled in the colony.

In 1717, David Gradis, founder of the Gradis Company of Bordeaux and supplier to the French colonies, opened offices in Cap Francais (today Cap Haitien), Saint Louis, Fonds-de-Isle de Vaches, and Leogan, and placed his Jewish friends and relatives in them. Sephardi Jews from Curaçao settled in Cap Francais, where they had a circumciser and a religious leader. Other Curaçao Jews settled in Jacmel, Jeremie, Les Cayes, and Port-au-Prince. Another Jewish concentration was in Jeremie, consisting mostly of French Sephardi Jews.

One of the most prominent Jewish families was Mendes France, which had plantations and workshops all over the colony (one of their descendants was Pierre Mendès-France, prime minister of France in the 1950s). Another prominent family was de Pas. In 1714, Dr. Michel Lopez de Pas was nominated Medecin du Roy (king's physician) and in 1723 served in the Superior Council.

The governor of the French windward island, nominated in 1763, Jean-Baptiste Charles Henri Hector Comte d'Estaing, became famous for levying heavy taxes on the Jews and thus financing the building of roads and posts as well as maintaining the army with Jewish money. In 1765, the expulsion of the Jews from Cap Francais was averted at the last moment, when Compte d'Estaing understood that his anti-Jewish policy was not accepted by Paris.

As there was no special registration of Jews under the French administration, and no orderly Jewish congregations, it is difficult to assess the number of Jews living there. However, the Jews gradually left Haiti. The slave rebellion in 1804 did not cause a panicky exodus, as the new rulers were not anti-Jewish. Rather, the Jews abandoned Haiti for economic reasons.

In the beginning of the 20th century, Jews from Syria and Lebanon settled in Haiti and were joined by Eastern European Jews in the 1930s. The unsteady economic and political situation, however, caused an emigration of Jews, and by the end of the century, only 20–30 Jewish persons remained in Haiti. Haiti has normal relations with Israel.

Jews in the U.S. Virgin Islands: Saint Thomas and Saint Croix

On March, 11, 1671, the Danish West India Company was founded and took possession of the island of Saint Thomas. Danes, Dutch, English, French, Germans as well as a number of Jews settled there. A Portuguese Jew, Gabriel Milan, was nominated governor of the island on March, 10, 1684. His high-handedness alienated the planters, however, and he was denounced as a rebel. On March, 26, 1689, he was beheaded in Copenhagen. Various historians have accused the witnesses against him of anti-Semitism.

When the elector of Brandenburg entered as a partner of the Danes in Saint Thomas, in 1685 it was decided, upon his recommendation, that "Calvinists and Lutherans were to have free exercise of religion; Catholics and Jews were to be tolerated and allowed to hold private services, provided they permitted no scandals."

The island of Saint Croix was ruled by the Knights of Malta from 1651 to 1664 in the name of Louis XIV of France, but was abandoned and then finally purchased by the Danes in 1733. This resulted in the settlement, from 1740 on, of Portuguese Jewish families from France (Bordeaux, Bayonne). The assumption is that in the 1760s there was a synagogue in Saint Croix.

In 1796, the first synagogue was founded in Saint Thomas, where the Jewish cemetery dates from 1750. The Berakha ve Shalom ve Gemilut Hasadim (Blessing and Peace and Acts of Piety) synagogue was founded after Saint Eustatius was sacked by Admiral Rodney, and its Jewish refugees joined the French Jews in the Virgin Islands. The islands were attractive to Jews, and they were granted full rights on March 29, 1814. As of 1835, they were even permitted to intermarry with Gentiles.

Saint Thomas replaced Saint Eustatius as a commercial center. With its excellent harbor and strategic location it became a prosperous transshipment center, free port, and port of repair for sailing ships. Jews from Jamaica and Curaçao joined the existing community.

The 1837 census of the whites in Saint Thomas listed 250 Danes and Germans; 250 English, Scots, Irish, and Americans; 350 French and Italians; 150 Creoles; and 400 Jews, the largest group. In Saint Croix, 372 Jews were counted.

In the mid-19th century, winds of Jewish reform began blowing from Germany. The hakamim were ready to accept some changes without altering traditional Sephardi customs. This was not enough for the reformers, however. A new hakam, Nathan Nathan, from Jamaica was strictly anti-Reform. This led to quarrels and clashes and ultimately to the founding of a separate Reform congregation and the Reform Temple Beth Elohim (House of God). In 1875, a compromise solution was reached whereby the congregation became quasi-Reform, changing the Code of Laws approved by King Frederick VII in 1848, which stated that “the divine service shall continue to be of the Spanish and Portuguese Israelites.”

The year 1867 was one of calamity in Saint Thomas—a disastrous hurricane, an earthquake that brought a tidal wave, and epidemics damaged the island. The advent of steam shipping and finally the opening of the Panama Canal caused the Jews to abandon the island. Some Jews went to Florida in the United States, but the largest group moved to Panama. The current congregation in Saint Thomas is managed by American Jews who arrived after the United States acquired the islands (1917). The Jewish population today is put at 300; among them are three or four Portuguese Jewish families. The congregation representing the Jews in Saint Thomas is the Hebrew Congregation of Saint Thomas. In Saint Croix there is no organized community.

Jews in Trinidad and Tobago

At the beginning of the 17th century the Duchy of Courland (the two western provinces of Latvia) started settling Tobago, and in 1652 a settlement was founded—Jekabpills. Shortly afterward Dutch settlers founded the settlement of New Walchern on the island. The Dutch started bringing Sephardi Jews, mobilized in Leghorn, Italy, to the island—a shipload in 1658 of more than a hundred, another in 1659 with 120 people, and a third one in 1660 with 152.

The competition between the Latvians and the Dutch as well as ferocious attacks by the Arawak natives did not enable the Jews to form a permanent settlement, and they were reduced to the utmost poverty. In his poems the famous Spanish Jewish poet Daniel Levi de Barrios described the death of his wife Debora on the island.

Ultimately, some Jews managed to return to Amsterdam, and others reached Cayenne. Only a small number remained in Tobago, and they also gradually moved to other Caribbean islands.

Trinidad, being Spanish until 1797 and then passing into English hands, had no organized Jewish community. Several Jewish families from Curaçao settled on the island. The most prominent are the descendants of Ydelfonso Avinum de Lima Semah de Varencia, who arrived from Barcelona, Venezuela, and today are one of the most influential families in the island economy.

Jews in the Bahamas

The Bahamas were first settled by the English in 1620, but very few Jews settled there at that time. Still, a Jew, Moses Franks, served as attorney general and chief justice of the islands in the 18th century. After World War I a few Jewish families from Poland, Russia, and United Kingdom settled in Nassau, the capital. Later Jews came to Freeport on the Grand Bahamas Island.

In Nassau, there is a Conservative synagogue named for the converso Luis de Torres, who served as Columbus's interpreter and was the first European to set foot in the New World. In Freeport there is a Reform congregation. The two congregations make up the United Bahamas Hebrew Congregation.

The Jewish population numbers about 200. The Bahamas maintains normal relations with Israel.

Jews in the Cayman Islands

The very few Jews there have formed the Jewish Community of the Cayman Islands. In addition to the 15–20 Jewish residents, there are a number of Jews from abroad who spend part of the year in the islands owing to the financial and banking centers in them.

Jews in Cuba

Cuba was the country with the largest Jewish population in Central America and the Caribbean. Until the Castro revolution in 1959, the Jewish population on the island was estimated as approaching 15,000.

The Jewish history of Cuba before the liberation from Spain (1898) is a history of Jewish conversos, some of them illustrious and romantic figures. Cuban Jewish history is the oldest in the Americas, and it was in Cuba that the first converso landed—Luis de Torres (1453–1520), who is also considered the first European to set foot on the American continent (on November 2, 1492). He served as an interpreter for Columbus as he knew Spanish, Arabic, and Hebrew and was designated to translate at the planned meeting with the “Gran Khan” that Columbus anticipated. Torres was impressed by the custom of the Indian population to smoke tobacco. He settled in Cuba and started growing tobacco for export to Europe. He died in Cuba.

In 1516, Fray Juan Quevedo, bishop of Cuba, was nominated to control the conversos arriving in Cuba, and in 1520 he was in contact with the Inquisition. The first converso burned at the stake in Cuba was the wealthy merchant Francisco Gomez de Leon, followed by numerous Portuguese conversos.

The Jews of the Caribbean introduced, through the conversos, the sugarcane that became the main source of income for the country. Sugar production was headed by Hernand de Castro, who was linked to his Jewish family members in Curaçao and Jamaica.

One of the most romantic figures was the artist and poet Dolores de Dios Porta. After becoming famous, she moved to Paris, returned to Judaism, became a very observant Jewess, and died in Paris in 1869.

Most of the conversos assimilated into the local population, and there remained very few Jewish families, holding foreign citizenship—British, those coming from Jamaica; Dutch, those coming from Curaçao; and Danish, those of the Virgin Islands. Most of those Jews, too, assimilated into the local population.

The first Jewish congregation was formed by American Jewish soldiers who participated in the war of liberation of Cuba between Spain and the United States, in 1904. The congregation was later named United Hebrew Congregation. One of the main leaders was Sergeant Frank Steinhard, who became chairman of the Electric and Tramways Company in Cuba.

A second wave of Jewish settlers began in 1907 comprising Jews from Turkey—many of them from the town of Silivri. In 1914, they established the Shevet Ahim congregation.

After World War I Cuba served as a transit point for Jews from Eastern Europe waiting for visas to the United States. Some remained in Cuba. Those who stayed in Cuba formed, in 1925, the Centro Israelita de Cuba. In 1926, Jewish leftists formed the Centrol Cultural (Kultur Farain). The two main religious groups established the Orthodox Adat Yisrael and Kneset Yisrael in 1929. Jewish leftists formed the Centro Israelita.

With the advent of Nazism in Germany and in Europe, Jewish refugees arrived in Cuba. Their integration was extremely difficult, and they were often assisted by American Jewish organizations. The Cuban authorities were not sympathetic toward the refugees. The plight of the Havana-bound refugees was dramatized by the refugees from Germany aboard the St. Louis who were denied admission to Cuba and had to return to their tragic fate in Germany in April 1939.

Apart from the communal organization, most Cuban Jews were very active Zionists, under the roof of the Union Sionista de Cuba, which encompassed He-Halutz, Hashomer Hatzair, Maccabi, Betar, and WIZO (Women's International Zionist Organization). Some leftist groups made up the Asociacion Juvenil Judia de Cuba (Yugentfarain in Cuba) and Comite Judio Anti-Nazi, supporting the Soviet Union's fight against the Nazis, and the pro-Soviet Comite Israelita Cubano de Ayuda a los Aliados. Cuba also had an active B'nai B'rith chapter. In addition there were organized communities in Camaguey, Santiago de Cuba, Matanzas, Santa Clara, Artemisa, and Guantanamo.

Cuban Jews had a very active press, with many dailies, weeklies, and monthlies. In the beginning most were in Yiddish, but gradually they turned to using Spanish.

The first Jewish college was founded by the Sephardi Shevet Ahim in 1924—Talmud Tora Teodoro Herzl, and later on Colegio Yavne was founded. In 1943, the Yiddishists founded the colegio Shalom Aleijen. Most of the Jews, however, preferred to use the public schools.

The Cuban revolution of Fidel Castro was not directed against the Jews, but their economic stability was destroyed. The great majority of Cuban Jews emigrated, heading mostly to Miami and other cities in the United States. Some settled in Israel and in Panama.

The Cuban authorities maintain good relations with the community organized under the roof organization Comision Coordinadora de las Sociedades Religiosas Hebreas de Cuba. Under the community organization Casa de la Comunidad Hebra de Cuba there are four synagogues in Havana, two Sephardi and two Ashkenazi. The Patronato Synagogue also maintains a kosher kitchen. The Jewish school closed in 1975, but a Sunday school still operates. Kosher food and ritual items are imported. The Santiago de Cuba synagogue was rededicated in 1975.

The Jewish population at the end of the 20th century was about 700. Cuba voted in November 1947 against the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine. After maintaining normal relations with Israel, ties were severed in 1973 and not renewed.

Jews in Puerto Rico

The existence of conversos under Spanish rule has not yet been properly investigated. Upon the American occupation, however, there were no Jews on the island. Under the American rule, several American Jews were prominent there. In 1902, Leo Stants Rowe, codified the legal structure. Leo H. Hollander was the treasurer of the island in 1900 and introduced the Hollander Law on income tax. Robert Szold was attorney general 1914–1915, and Adolph Grant Wolf and A. Cecil Snyder were Supreme Court justices in the first half of the 20th century.

In 1941, the Jewish Welfare Board founded a center for Jewish soldiers, and a community center was established in 1942. In the 1950s and 1960s, Jews from the United States and Cuba settled mainly in the capital San Juan with others in Ponce and Mayaguez.

In San Juan there are two synagogues, one Conservative, the other Reform. There is also a community center. Chapters of Hadassah, B'nai B'rith, and Young Judea are active. Hebrew school classes are held in the community center. Kosher food is available. The Jewish population of Puerto Rico is estimated at 2,500.

Jews in the Dominican Republic

Jewish history in Santo Domingo begins early. The historian of Spanish rule there, Carlos Esteban Deive, writes, "Santo Domingo was during the first decade of the 16th century practically in Jewish or Converso hands, sent to the island by three persons—Bishop Juan Rodriguez de Fonseca, a Converso from Aragon; Lope de Conchillos, a Converso from the Jewish neighborhood of Calatayud and secretary to King Fernando; and Miguel Perez de Almazan, also king's secretary." The archives of the Inquisicion de Cartagena, Colombia, include several cases against conversos in Santo Domingo.

The destruction of the Jewish community of Saint Eustatius in 1785 and the British occupation of Curaçao in 1795 brought Jews holding Dutch citizenship to Santo Domingo, joined by Jews from Jamaica, Barbados, and Virgin Islands holding British or Danish citizenship. This angered the Spanish-Catholic hierarchy, led by the Archbishop Isidoro Rodriguez, which opened a series of instances of persecution and incitement starting in 1795.

With independence from Haiti, which had occupied Santo Domingo in 1841, a typical response of the first Dominican president, Pedro Santana, to a Spanish-instigated anti-Jewish petition from the city of La Vega states:

It is not the Dominican Nation that complains, you have been incited . . . The desire in the 19th century, in a free republic, to persecute peaceful individuals under the pretext of religion is a scandalous abuse of the teachings of Christ. Instead of listening to the voice of passions, listen to the voice of justice and gratitude . . . The Jews do not teach others their beliefs and do not conquer others for their religion . . .

In 1865, after the restoration from the second Spanish rule, the reconstituted Dominican government issued a document thanking Rafael de Mordecahi de Marchena and other Jews, Dutch subjects, for their help and supply of ammunition, for the fight for independence.

In 1881, the Dominican general and hero of the war against Spain, Gregorio Luperon, had a plan (unrealized) to invite Jews from the Ukraine suffering from pogroms to settle in the Dominican Republic.

The Caribbean Jews of Spanish-Portuguese origin who had settled in the Dominican Republic dispersed into various areas of the country, mainly in Santo Domingo, Puerto Plata, Monte Christi, and La Vega. They usually dealt in the purchase of agricultural products from the villages and supplied manufactured goods. They did not form an organized community, and during their second and third generations gradually assimilated into the local population. Local historians call this phenomenon the fusion of Sephardi and Dominicans. Dominicans of Jewish origin usually remain proud of their Jewish ancestry. Typical of this was President Francisco Henriquez y Carvajal, who took office in 1916. He was the son of a Jewish father and a converso mother and always mentioned his Jewish origin.

Many of the families that converted to Christianity became very prominent in Dominican life, among them the Naar, Senior, de Marchena, Lopez-Penha, Henriquez, Namias de Crasto, and de Castro families. Pedro Henriquez Urena became a major linguist; Federico Henriquez y Carvajal, writer of the play La Hija del Hebreo (The Daughter of the Jew); Haim Horacio Lopez-Penha, author of Los Paisanos de Jesus (Jesus' Countrymen); and the composer Enrique de Marchena, who wrote the symphony Hebraicum after his visit to Israel.

One of the historical moments in Dominican Jewish life came at the ill-fated Evian Conference that was convened in November 1938 to discuss the plight of refugees from Germany and Austria. The Dominican Republic was the only country to grant sanctuary to Jews, being ready to receive up to 100,000 Jewish refugees. For this purpose, the institution DORSA (Dominican Republic Settlement Association) was formed with the assistance of the Joint Distribution Committee. War conditions enabled only 663 refugees to reach the designated area of Sosua for their settlement. Several thousand Jews received Dominican visas but could not reach Sosua. With the visas, however, they could escape from the Holocaust.

There are two synagogues in the Dominican Republic, one in the capital Santo Domingo and the other in Sosua. A rabbi serves both of them. There is a Sunday school and a chapter of the International Council of Jewish Women. The bimonthly Shalom appears there. In Sosua, there is also a small Jewish museum.

Today there are about 250–300 Jews in the Republic. Israel and the Dominican Republic have full diplomatic relations.

Jews in Central America

Mordechai Arbell

---

General Population: 173,162,000

Jewish Population: 20,000

Percent of Population: 0.037 percent

Jewish Population by Country: Panama, 5,000; Costa Rica, 2,500; Guatemala, 900; Belize, 100; El Salvador, 100; Honduras, 100; Nicaragua, 100

---

Historical Overview

Jews in Guatemala

Inquisition documents, mainly from Mexico, mention the presence of Jewish conversos in Guatemala during the Spanish colonial period. The production of coffee and other tropical products attracted Jews from Germany who began settling in Guatemala in 1870. At the same time, Jews of Spanish-Portuguese origin from the Caribbean arrived in Guatemala. Of note among them was Jacobo Baiz (1843–1899), who became a close friend and adviser of President Rufino Barrios and represented the republic in the United States. A small community was formed, and prayer services were conducted in a private house.

At the beginning of the 20th century, new Jewish settlers started arriving from Mexico and Cuba and were joined by Jews from Eastern Europe and the Middle East. A new wave of German Jews arrived with the advent of Nazism in Germany.

Guatemala was one of the few countries in Latin America that had legislation aimed at excluding Jews. In 1932, an expulsion decree was enacted against “peddlers”—aimed against Jews. This was followed by a 1936 ban on immigration from “Asian countries,” among which Poland was included.

In 1933, 70 Jewish families of German origin resided in Guatemala. They had well-based social and economic conditions and were organized in an association for social help—Sociedad de Beneficencia–Hilfsverein, which was later called Sociedad Israelita de Guatemala–Beth El Reform. Fifty families of Oriental Jews were associated in the society Maguen David in 1923, and 150 families of Polish and Russian origin established the mutual aid society initially known as Ezra, which is called Centro Hebreo today.

The anti-Jewish legislation was abolished in 1939 with World War II, when the Jewish population numbered about 800. After the war, Guatemala adopted a pronounced pro-Jewish attitude. Jews obtained influential positions in the academic and industrial worlds. Under the initiative of Dr. Jorge Garcia Grandados, the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine recommended the establishment of the Jewish state in Palestine and under President Juan Jose Arevalo and Jorge Garcia Granados, Guatemala was the first country to recognize the State of Israel and the first to open an embassy in Jerusalem. Later, under the weight of international pressure, the embassy moved to Tel Aviv.

The umbrella organization Consejo Central de la Comunidad Judia de Guatemala encompasses three congregations—German, Oriental, and Eastern European, each with its own synagogue—a B'nai B'rith lodge, a Maccabi club, a branch of WIZO (the Women's International Zionist Organization), and a Jewish kindergarten. By the end of the 20th century, the Jewish population in Guatemala numbered around 1,200, most in Guatemala City and some in Quetzaltenango.

Jews in Belize

The Jewish history of Belize, formerly the colony of British Honduras, has not yet been thoroughly researched. It is known that after the destruction of the Jewish community on Saint Eustatius, several Jewish families settled in Belize at the end of the 18th century. The most prominent among them was the Bienveniste family. South of Belize City there is an old Jewish cemetery with tombstones dating from the 19th century where Jews from Hamburg are buried. Belize has been mentioned as a place of trade for Jamaican Jews. Worth mentioning among prominent Jewish citizens is Solly Wolffsohn (1855–1933), an exporter of Belize timber who was a member of the Municipal and Legislative Councils in Belize City.

In 1939, there was an effort by the newspaperman W. E. Simpson to open Belize to Jewish refugees and to form a Jewish state there. The British authorities, however, deported the 85 Jews who reached Belize. In 1940, another effort to settle Jews in Erictown was also frustrated.

In the early 21st century, there are very few Jewish families in Belize, and there is no organized community life. One of the Belize Jews serves as the honorary consul of Israel.

Jews in El Salvador

Except for the occasional transit of Portuguese conversos, there were almost no Jews in the country until the first half of the 19th century, when Sephardim from France settled in the town of Chalchuapa. They were joined by Jews from Alsace who moved to the capital, San Salvador, in the second half of the 19th century.

Dr. Juan Lindo, son of a Jewish father, Joaquin Fernandez Lindo, was president of El Salvador from January 1841 until February 1842. Nicknamed "The Fox," he was founder of the National University and the education system of El Salvador. The same Juan Lindo was president of Honduras 1847–1852 (a rare case of a person serving as president of two different countries).

Herbert de Sola, a Jewish entrepreneur from Panama, settled in El Salvador in 1896 and initiated the development of coffee plantations and the export of processed coffee to Europe and the United States. This main export item of El Salvador made the de Sola family one of the most prominent in the country. The family was joined by Sephardi families from Panama, Curaçao, and Saint Thomas in the Virgin Islands.

At the beginning of the 20th century, Jews from Germany and Eastern Europe began arriving. In 1976, there were some 370 Jews in El Salvador, but during the long civil war that followed many left the country. One of the community's most prominent leaders, Ernesto Liebes, who also served as honorary consul of Israel, was murdered by the guerillas. With the return of peace some families resettled in El Salvador. By the end of the 20th century there were about 120 to 150 Jews there.

The umbrella community organization is the Comunidad Israelita de El Salvador, established in 1944. A Jewish center was opened in 1945 and a synagogue in 1950. Since the 1980s, services have been conducted in a private house. A Zionist organization was established in 1945 and WIZO is also active there. Diplomatic relations with Israel are friendly, and El Salvador maintains an embassy in Jerusalem.

Jews in Honduras

Inquisitorial archives show that there were some Jewish conversos in Honduras during the Spanish colonial rule. Dr. Juan Lindo, son of a Jewish father, Don Joaquin Fernandez Lindo, was president of the republic from 1847 to 1852. He is remembered for establishing the country's educational system and for building schools even in the smallest villages. As mentioned previously, he had earlier served as president of El Salvador. With the arrival of Jews from Germany, communal life formed under the name Jewish Relief Committee of Honduras. In 1947, the Jews numbered 129, of whom 85 lived in the capital Tegucigalpa, and the others in San Pedro Sula, Tela, Ceiba, and Porto Cortes. Most were from Germany and the others from Eastern Europe. The only synagogue is in Tegucigalpa. By the end of the 20th century the Jewish population had diminished to fewer than 100. There is a WIZO chapter. Former president Ricardo Maduro is the son of a Jewish father and a member of the very prominent Levy Maduro family of the Caribbean and Panama.

Jews in Nicaragua

The first Jews arrived in Nicaragua in the mid-19th century from Germany and northern France, most of them coming after the European revolutions in 1848. After World War I they were joined by Jews from Central Europe, mainly from Hungary and Poland. Jews of the first immigration wave gradually lost contact with Judaism. Some were baptized, others assimilated.

In general the Jewish economic situation is satisfactory. Jews have been prominent in coffee plantations and industry, such as the Dreyfus and Teffel families.

Among the prominent citizens, of note is the newspaperman Adolph Delisle Straus, who died in New York in 1925. Originally from Bavaria, in 1867 he was a general in the Nicaraguan army. He represented the New York Times in Cuba and Mexico and was the only journalist in attendance at the execution of Emperor Maximilian in Mexico. Another prominent Jew was the writer Lazlo Pataki, who was very close to the Somoza family that governed Nicaragua in the 20th century.

In 1972, the Jewish population numbered 250. Most lived in the capital Managua, but others were in Leon, Granada, and Chinandega.

In the aftermath of the disastrous earthquake in 1972, in which most of Managua was destroyed, many Jews emigrated. With the advent of the Sandinista government in the last 10 years of the 20th century, the small synagogue was confiscated as well as other Jewish property. The Jewish community leaders were imprisoned, and most of the Jewish population left the country.

Until 1979, the central Jewish organization was Congregacion Israelita de Nicaragua. There was also a B'nai B'rith lodge and a WIZO chapter. After that year, the number of Jews dwindled to a mere 10 to 20 persons. With the ouster of the Sandinista regime, Israel and Nicaragua restored diplomatic relations.

Jews in Costa Rica

Although Jews from the Jamaica were visiting the Atlantic coast of Costa Rica at the end of the 17th century, it is doubtful whether any of them remained, as it was under Spanish control. The Jewish visits coincided with the fairs of cacao collecting at which Jews purchased cacao and sold European merchandise. The trade reached such proportions that a series of restrictive measures was taken, such as the 1740 formal prohibition against dealing with Jews.

The first Jewish settlers in Costa Rica were Sephardi Jews from Curaçao, Jamaica, Panama, and Saint Thomas in the Virgin Islands, who had reached Costa Rica by the mid-19th century. A short time after their arrival, those Jews occupied high socioeconomic positions in the society that received them very warmly. Most prominent among them were the Maduro, Piza, and Suasso families. After World War I, Jews immigrated to Costa Rica from Turkey, the Middle East, Poland, and other countries in Eastern Europe.

The Spanish-Portuguese Jews kept in close contact with the Jewish community of Panama. By the end of the 19th century, there were about 17 family clans of Sephardi Jews, who gradually became assimilated into Costa Rican society. As the number of Polish Jews grew, they built their own synagogue, purchased land for their cemetery, and gradually excluded Sephardi Jews from their religious life. The Costa Rican authorities, seeing themselves as inundated by Jewish peddlers from Poland, became more negative toward Jews. Consequently, Costa Rica became one of the few countries in Latin America that enacted anti-Jewish legislation in the 20th century. The decrees were mainly against Poles, and the word "Jews" was not mentioned. In 1934, 100 percent of the peddlers were Jewish and special taxes were levied against them. In 1936, legislation limiting the entry of Poles to Costa Rica was put into effect. Only after the 1948 civil war did the anti-Jewish tension abate.

The leading communal organization is the Centro Sionista de Costa Rica, founded in 1930, which publishes a monthly bulletin. The Centro includes WIZO and other Zionist groups, B'nai B'rith, and the Jewish Women's Welfare Organization. A Jewish sport center is the venue of Jewish athletics.

San Jose, the capital, has one synagogue, Shaarei Zion, served by a rabbi. There is a burial society and a Jewish cemetery. The Haim Weizmann School, a primary and secondary institution, is attended by most Jewish children.

Costa Rica maintains full and cordial relations with Israel and has an embassy in Jerusalem.

Jews in Panama

The isthmus of Panama serves as a transit route for merchandise and passengers between South and North America and has the easiest passage from the Atlantic to the Pacific Oceans. Historically, the connection between the oceans was through the Chagres River or by land through Las Cruces trail. Those routes were replaced by the Panama Canal. Although in the Spanish colony Jews and conversos were always present on the surface and maritime routes through Panama, they also used the routes of the Galleon Trade from the Philippines to the American continent, which brought merchandise from China, Japan, and Indonesia to be transhipped through the Atlantic to Europe. The Galleon Trade to a large extent was in converso hands.

The converso presence in the city of Panama, itself founded by the supposedly converso conquistador Pedro Arias (Pedrarias) de Avila, had a Jewish place of prayer or a synagogue, camouflaged on one of the main streets of "Panama the Old," at the beginning of the 17th century.

Similarly, in 1602, the governor of the province of Veraguas, which included Panama, Juan Lopez de Sequiera, founded the city of David (the third largest in Panama). He was suspected of naming it for King David owing to his Jewish origin.

The first Jewish presence in the modern era was a Jewish capitalist from Guadeloupe, Augustin Salomon who, together with the Baron de Thiery, obtained a concession to construct an interoceanic canal in 1835. This endeavor failed.

During the California gold rush (1849–1853), Panama was one of the routes from the Atlantic to the Pacific coasts of the United States. Some of the Jewish passengers traveling through Panama chose to remain there.

The disastrous year 1867 in Saint Thomas in the Danish Virgin Islands (today U.S. property), cursed by a hurricane, a tidal wave, and a cholera epidemic, sent a wave of Jews to Panama. They were joined by Jews, all of Spanish-Portuguese origin, from Jamaica, Curaçao, and other Caribbean islands.

In 1852, the Hebrew Benevolent Society existed in Panama. By May 1876, the Jews were numerous enough to found, under the leadership of Elias Nunez Martinez, the Kol Shearit Israel Burial and Charitable Society. In 1890, a Spanish-Portuguese congregation was formed in the city of Colon, Kahal Kadosh Yangakob (Yaakob). A synagogue was inaugurated in 1913. In Panama City a synagogue was inaugurated in 1935. The congregation had decided in 1926 to adopt the Reform prayer rite.

After the opening of the Panama Canal, Oriental Jews from Syria, Palestine, and North Africa began to settle in Panama and gradually became the majority of the Jewish population. Their congregation, Shevet Ahim, established its synagogue in 1945 following a strict Orthodox rite. They also founded the Agudat Ahim synagogue in Colon, and small communities in David, Chitré, and Santiago de Veraguas.

In the American Canal Zone, after World War I, under the leadership of Irwin Michlin, the Young Men's Hebrew Association society was founded for the Jewish employees of the Canal Zone and the American Jewish servicemen. Before World War II the Jewish Welfare Board formed a community and maintained a synagogue.

A small group of Ashkenazi Jews from Eastern Europe, joined by Jews from Cuba and Costa Rica, formed the Beth El congregation with its synagogue (Conservative). The Oriental and Ashkenazi Jews in Panama deal mainly in commerce, and some became prominent in the textile industry. The Spanish-Portuguese continued with the Caribbean tradition of plantations, agro industry, shipping, and banking.

David Bajer, a Jewish immigrant from Poland, stands at the gate to a synagogue in Panama City, about 1950. (United States Holocaust Memorial Museum)

Among the prominent Jews in Panama were the following: David Henry Brandon, the founder and commander of the Firemen's Corps of Panama; Herbert de Castro, founder of the Panama Philharmonic Orchestra; and the poet Edward Maduro Lindo, who wrote the words of the patriotic "March of Panama." In addition, Aida de Castro, known in Panama as the "angel of Palo Seco," with her husband, Dr. Ezra Hurwitz, organized the leper colony in Palo Seco, treating victims of the disease and helping to eradicate it. Max Shalom Delvalle served as vice president and in 1967 became president of the republic. His nephew, Eric Shalom Delvalle Maduro, was also president, 1987–1988.

The representative body of the Jewish community is the Consejo Central Comunitario Hebreo de Panama. Panama has active B'nai B'rith and WIZO chapters.

Because most of the Jewish population has moved to Panama City, the synagogues in Colon, David, and Balboa Canal Zone have been closed. In the early 21st century, there were three active synagogues in Panama: Kol Shearit Israel, Shevet Ahim, and Beth El. There is a mikvah, and kosher food is readily available. There are two Jewish high schools with a total enrollment of 1,300 students, a Hebrew cultural center, and a Jewish sports center. At the end of the 20th century, with the arrival of several hundred Jews from Israel, the Jewish population grew to some 7,000–8,000 persons.

Jews in Mexico

Mauricio Lulka Pipco and René Dayán-Shabot

---

General Population: 104,000,000

Jewish Population: Around 40,000

Percent of Population: 0.04 percent

Jewish Population by City: Mexico City metropolitan area, 37,000; Guadalajara, 550; Monterrey, 450; Cancún, 300; Tijuana, 200; other cities, 1,500

Languages Spoken: All speak Spanish. English, 72 percent; Hebrew, 39 percent; Yiddish, 17 percent; Arabic, 14 percent; Ladino, 4 percent

---

Historical Overview

1518 The first Jews arrive with Hernán Cortés in the land of the Aztecs, among them Hernando Alonso, who participates in the conquest of cities such as Guajuato and Tenochtitlan 1528 Hernando Alonso is burned in the stake accused of being Jewish.

1571 The Inquisition is officially established in New Spain. Religious intolerance and the strong feeling of being persecuted diminish the presence of Jews.

1640–1649 The Inquisition persecution becomes especially intense, targeting the Jewish leadership.

After 1650 Exogamy, the absence of a communitarian structure, and the new generation's lack of knowledge about their religion, finally leads to assimilation of the crypto-Jews.

1820 The Inquisition is officially abolished.

1821 Mexico declares its independence from Spain. There are no Jews in the country.

1856 Laws allowing non-Catholic minorities to immigrate, obtain citizenship, and have freedom of worship are issued.

1864 Maximilian of Habsburg, Archduke of Austria, arrives in Mexico and, with the support of Napoleon III, becomes emperor of Mexico. Some Jews from France, Alsace, Belgium, and Austria arrive with him.

- 1900s Escaping anti-Semitism, a wave of Jewish immigrants who become the basis of today's Jewish community, arrive in the country. The first immigrants come from the Balkans, Greece, Turkey, Bulgaria, Syria, and Lebanon; later, Jews from Central and East Europe arrive.
- 1912 Jews living in Mexico gather in a single organization called Sociedad de Beneficencia Alianza Monte Sinai to support immigrants coming to the country and to establish a Jewish cemetery, which indicates a strong commitment to remain in this land. The differences among Ashkenazi, Sephardic, and Oriental Jews—several languages (Yiddish, Ladino, Arabic), variations in the interpretation of liturgy, rituals, eating habits, and particular customs of each region, as well as an emphasis in religious, cultural, ideological, and/or political issues—results in their gathering according to their countries of origin, rites, and particular customs. Today, the Sociedad de Beneficencia Alianza Monte Sinai (Orthodox) gathers Jews from Damasco, Syria and Lebanon.
- 1922 The Comunidad Ashkenazi (Ashkenazi Community) (Orthodox) is established by Central and Eastern European Jews.
- 1923 The first synagogue in Justo Sierra No. 83 (Monte Sinai) is inaugurated.
- 1924 The first Jewish daily school (Colegio Israelita de México) is founded.
- 1924 Plutarco Elias Calles, the newly elected president of Mexico, issues an invitation to the Jewish people to come to Mexico as law-abiding citizens, stimulating in an immigration wave that lasts until 1930.
- 1929–1930 The economic depression sparks attacks against foreigners. In October 1930, the National Anti-Chinese and Anti-Jewish league was founded “to counteract the cruel and bleeding action of the Jews, which destroyed commerce and the economical activities of the Mexicans.” Protests are generalized against the presence of Jews in the commercial life of the country.
- 1931 President Pascual Ortiz Rubio issues a decree expelling Jewish peddlers from the Lagunilla Market and proclaims June 1 as National Commerce Day, a date in which unions and businessmen groups protest against the Jewish presence in the market places.
- 1935 Anti-Semitism is influenced by European fascism and Nazism racial stereotype, as well as by the local right-wing groups who oppose the socialist character of President Lázaro Cardenas's regime (1934–1940). Las Camisas Doradas (The Golden Shirts) an anti-Semitic and paramilitary unit is founded by former revolutionary generals at the northern city of Mexicali by the group Acción Revolucionaria Mexicanista. A couple of years later the government bans it.
- 1936 The new General Law of Population favors restrictive policies that limit immigration to those accepted groups that would be easily absorbed into the population and would protect the economic interests of the citizens. Thus, the entrance of Russians, Poles, Turks, Jews, Hungarians, and Gypsies is specially limited.
- 1938 The Comité Central Israelita de México is founded to help Jewish refugees from Europe and cover the needs of immigrants coming from different regions of the world; it becomes the official representation of the whole Jewish community in Mexico.

- 1938 The Orthodox Comunidad Maguén David is established by Jews from Aleppo, Syria.
- 1941 The Orthodox Comunidad Sefaradí is formally organized by Jews coming from Turkey, Greece, and the Balkans.
- 1944 As a partnership of the Comité Central and B'nai B'rith, Tribuna Israelita is created with the purpose of combating anti-Semitism.
- 1950 The Centro Deportivo Israelita (Jewish Sport Center) is established, as an institution that unites Jews from all the communities through sports and culture.
- 1957 Beth Israel Community Center (Conservative) is established by Jews from English-speaking countries who live in Mexico City.
- 1961 Bet-El Community (Conservative) is founded by Spanish-speaking Jews.
- 1963 The Yeshiva Keter Tora is founded
- 1965 The Nidje Israel Synagogue and Community Center of the Ashkenazi community is inaugurated as well as the Maguen David Synagogue.
- 1967 The Maguen David Youth Cultural Center is inaugurated
- 1968 The Lojamei Jerut, a Zionist youth movement of the Maguen David Community, is founded
- 1970 The Jewish School is founded in the city of Tijuana.
- 1971 The Ahaba Ve Shalom, a religious youth movement of the Maguen David Community, is founded.
- 1972 The Ashkenazi Community establishes the Bet Fila Cultural Center in Echegaray, State of Mexico.
- 1973 Beth Yaacov, a religious school for girls, is created.
- 1978 The Maguen David Hebrew School is inaugurated. The Maguen David Community inaugurates the Shaare Shalom Synagogue.
- 1979 The Yeshiva Keter Tora opens a high school and a women's school.
- 1989 The Maguen David Hebrew School opens its high school department. The Ashkenazi Kolel Bircas Shmuel is created.
- 1990 The Eliahu Fasja Synagogue of the Maguen David Community is inaugurated. The Jewish religion is officially registered.
- 1994 Kadima, an organization that helps integrate persons with disabilities into society, is created.
- 1997 Asociación Menorah, an organization to combat domestic violence, is founded, and Hatikva, an organization to help couples with infertility, is created
- 1999 Or Hajaim School of the Maguen David Community is created. Kol Hanisayon, an activity center for old people, is also established.
- 2002 Tribuna Israelita and the Tel Aviv University organize the 6th International Anti-Semitism Seminar in Mexico
- 2004 The International Jewish Movie Festival is inaugurated, with films regarding Jewish traditions, habits, culture, and perspectives.
- 2005 The Mexican Postal Service issues a stamp commemorating 100 years of the Jewish presence in Mexico.
- 2005 Tribuna Israelita publishes the book 60 Years After the Liberation of Auschwitz: Reflections of the Mexican Press, an anthology of more than 30 articles published in the national media by renowned Jewish and non-Jewish journalists and intellectuals.

2007 The Monte Sinaí Community inaugurates the Shar le Simcha Synagogue

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Job expectations in Mexico at the beginning of the 20th century, which were mostly agricultural, were uncertain. The economic situation of the immigrants was highly risky and limited because they arrived in the country without financial resources and with improper trade and professions for the Mexican environment.

At the beginning, most Jews were devoted to informal business as peddlers, an activity that required neither extensive knowledge of the language nor a great quantity of money. In the 1930s, the fact that they were only allowed limited trade in the marketplaces propitiated their participation in formal trade in stores downtown. The restriction to foreign trade because of the global crisis caused consumer goods to be manufactured locally, resulting in the creation of new industries and the diversification of activities. As a result, Jewish entrepreneurs made the transition from shops to small and eventually large industries, primarily in the textile and garment areas.

Thus, even though there were difficult years, a substantial economic growth was achieved, and Jews escalated to the middle and high social classes in Mexican society. The diversity among communities was also shown in the labor area. Among the Ashkenazim, a great number obtained higher education and became professionals; whereas the children of the Sephardic (including those from Middle East origin) basically continued with the commercial tradition.

The third generation, in general, gave birth to an intellectual, professional, and political class in the community. Nowadays, a significant number of Mexican Jews are active in several areas, such as industry and commerce, the academic world, politics, communications and the media, and the liberal arts, among others.

The active economic population (57 percent of the Jews compared with 42 percent of the national population) is primarily engaged in the following types of work: entrepreneur, 49.7 percent; private employee, 19.1 percent; professional practice, 18.2 percent; teacher, artist, and intellectual, 9.9 percent; private manager, 2.0 percent; and public servant, 1.1 percent.

Volunteer work is an important activity within the community. Around 25 percent of the Mexican Jews perform volunteer work in Jewish institutions and 5 percent in non-Jewish institutions.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Both at the community and individual levels, Jews have many opportunities to participate in Mexican society. Regarding visibility, there is no doubt that the Jewish community has a greater presence in the citizens' consultation bodies in several areas, such as social and economic development, human rights, and public safety.

Jews participate in several nongovernment organizations. At the same time, they also promote the creation of employment, training, education, and direct-help programs outside the community, as well as the construction of housing for marginal groups who live in high-risk zones, such as river and mountain slopes.

An increasing number of Jews excel in cultural areas, such as the fine arts, literature, dance, theater, movie, and television. There is a yearly Jewish Film Festival and a Jewish Theater Festival (Habima). The folkloric and contemporary Jewish dance festival, Aviv, stands out, and more than 1,500 kids and youngsters participate. At the same time, hundreds of activities at social and cultural level are held in community centers every week.

A variety of magazines and newspapers, reflect the different cultural, political, and ideological orientation of the communities.

Present Economic Conditions

The economic crisis that has lasted since 1976 in Mexico has caused a low growth in gross internal product. Since 1994, the economic crisis has especially affected a wide sector of the Jewish community. To help those in economic need, the community has taken the appropriate measures. Consequently, the number of scholarships granted to students from the Jewish school network increased. At the same time, they created Fundación Activa, an institution that supports an employment agency and the Activa Business Center for the purpose of economically reactivating unemployed or low-income people and training and advising entrepreneurs. All of these factors show the economic deterioration that affects Jews the same as the rest of the population.

Jewish Education

The extensive Mexican Jewish educational network includes a wide variety of options from which parents can choose the preferred system for their children: schools where Yiddish is taught, Montessori-type schools, Zionist Hebrew-oriented schools, schools of a religious nature, yeshivas, kollelim, and institutions where teaching is based on the English language. In spite of their methodological and ideological diversity, all of them are centered in Jewish values and teach Hebrew, and they adjust to the official programs dictated and recognized by Mexico's secretary of public education.

Today, more than 90 percent of the school-aged Jewish population (around 9,000 students) attends one of the 16 schools that integrate the educational network of the Jewish community in Mexico. Around 30 percent of the students receive some type of scholarship granted by the community. The schools are coordinated by Vaad Hajinuj, which also supports the Hebraic University, an institution of higher education responsible for the formation and the professional development of educators and specialists in Jewish studies who nurture the educational systems of Mexico. Around 37 percent of the community's children and youngsters participate in youth organizations (tнуot), which provide a proper frame for their integral development and reinforce their Mexican Jewish identity. As for university students, they are active in their corresponding higher education centers and organize, together with Tribuna Israelita, the Jewish cultural workshops that allow their fellow students deeper knowledge about Judaism in general and the community in Mexico in particular.

Religious Denominations and Assimilation

Most Mexican Jews define themselves as traditionalists. This means their Jewishness is basically expressed in their participation in Jewish institutions (schools and cultural organizations); in keeping certain religious rituals, like the annual attendance at synagogue during the High Holidays; or in keeping the religious celebration of significant moments in the Jewish life cycle, such as the berith milah, the bar or bath mitzvah, Jewish marriage, or burial rituals.

In the past few years, there has been a significant increase in religiousness, along with an increase in educational institutions of religious nature, for children as well as for adults. In a recent survey, when subjects were asked "As a Jew, you consider yourself . . .," the responses were as follows: very observant, 7.4 percent; observant, 17.3 percent; traditionalist, 62.3 percent; less observant, 8.5 percent; secular, 3.5 percent; and atheist, 1.0 percent.

Regarding religious practices, around 35 percent of Mexican Jews eat kosher food, supervised by three Orthodox communities: Maguén David, Ashkenazi, and Monte Sinai. In addition, 16 percent attend daily one of the 26 synagogues, kollelim, and/or midrashim; 49 percent attend Shabbat services; and 92 percent attend during the High Holidays (Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur).

Because of the community cohesion and the solid institutional organization, particularly the school network, the assimilation degree of Mexican Jews, measured through the mixed or exogamic marriages index, is one of the lowest in the whole Diaspora at 7.4 percent. In addition, 85 percent of interfaith marriage partners converted to Judaism, and 99 percent keep the Jewish religion at home.

Communal and Political Institutions

More than 93 percent of the Jewish families in Mexico are affiliated with a community from which they receive a great variety of services covering their needs, including religious, cultural, social, welfare, and safety services.

Through the years, divisions and separation according to their geographical origin became more flexible and permeable. This transformation can be seen in the increase in marriages between members of different communities, which today surpasses 40 percent. During the last decade of the 20th century, intercommunity relations have also increased considerably in many areas, as is shown by the creation of several institutions that provide services to all members of the Jewish community.

Total percentage of members per community:

Maguén David Community—25.8 percent

Alianza Monte Sinai Community—21.6 percent

Ashkenazi Community—20.1 percent

Sephardic Community—8.7 percent
Bet-El Community—8.6 percent
Jewish Sports Center (CDI)—3.3 percent
Beth Israel Community Center—1.5 percent
Guadalajara Jewish Community—1.4 percent
Monterrey Jewish Community—1.1 percent
Cancun Jewish Community—0.8 percent
Tijuana Jewish Community—0.4 percent
Nonaffiliated families—6.7 percent

The percentage of the CDI members refers only to those who are not members of any community.

Even though each community maintains autonomy and independence, they all gather in the Comité Central de la Comunidad Judía de México (Mexico's Jewish Community Central Committee or CCCJM), which is the only authorized representative institution for authorities, political parties, media, nongovernmental organizations, and religious, academic, and intellectual groups of the Mexican society as well as for the Jewish communities and institutions outside Mexico. Its main objective is ensuring the security of the Mexican Jewish community in all fields and preserving a real and positive image of the community.

The CCCJM has three operational branches: Tribuna Israelita, the institution responsible for combating anti-Semitism and establishing communication channels with different sectors of the Mexican society, especially human rights groups, media, religious, and academic and intellectual institutions and individuals; the Comité de Orden y Vigilancia, which is responsible for the physical safety of the Mexican Jews and their institutions; and the Comité de Acción Social, which provides help to members of the community who are victims of crime and insecurity.

A wide range of Jewish women's organizations is gathered in the Federación Femenina, which coordinates their cultural, philanthropic, and social assistance activities. The Consejo Mexicano de Mujeres Israelitas, the Voluntarias Judeo Mexicanas, WIZO, and Na'amat have established support programs for different national social sectors, mainly in the educational and health areas.

New challenges for the community include substance abuse, domestic violence, poverty, and health problems promoted the foundation of several intercommunal institutions. Among them are Umbral, an institution that deals with problems of addiction, such as smoking, alcoholism, illegal drugs, and eating disorders; Kadima, which is dedicated to socially integrating persons with disabilities; Fundación Menorah and Erej of Na'amat, which works to prevent domestic violence and assist its victims; the Eishel, which is a home for elderly people in the city of Cuernavaca with personalized services in medical care and social and cultural activities; as well as other institutions in Mexico City that provide services to elderly people who live at their own houses or with relatives. In the health area, Ose provides free or very low cost medication, as well as hospital services, for low-income people; Dam is an institution that collects blood and maintains blood banks in the main hospitals where members of the community seek attention; and Hatzala, which has five ambulances strategically set in various areas of the metropolitan zone of Mexico City, plus a group of volunteer paramedics that can arrive in a matter of minutes to help any member of the community who suffers an accident or illness that requires emergency treatment. All of these organizations are intercommunal. This means they were created to serve all members of the Jewish community, regardless of the sector to which they belong.

Anti-Semitism and Anti-Zionism

Even though anti-Semitism has never been an official policy in Mexico, there have been politicians who in different moments have made anti-Jewish declarations. The government has never supported formal discrimination or violent actions of significant dimension. Nevertheless anti-Semitism has been present in the Mexican society.

After eight years of intense lobbying, where the Central Committee and Tribuna Israelita played a fundamental role, in June 2003 President Vicente Fox promulgated the Federal Law to Prevent and Eliminate Discrimination, previously approved unanimously by the Congress and the Senate. Article No. 4 rejects anti-Semitism and xenophobia in any of its forms. This law represents a great step forward in recognizing Mexico as a plural and diverse society, where respect for differences must be the rule and not the exception. Nowadays anti-Semitism in Mexico, in particular from left-wing groups, expresses itself mainly through graffiti and in the mass media. As a result of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, negative opinion against the State of Israel increased.

Existential Problems of the Community

The Jewish Mexican community provides a deep feeling of belonging for its membership. This is undoubtedly reinforced by the community institutions that, since their origins, have tried, with relatively high success, to cover a great part of the individual's needs within a Jewish environment. A coordinated effort made by the families, schools, and community centers and institutions has been a key and essential factor in this task.

Nevertheless, the continuity of Jewish community in Mexico faces several challenges. First is the issue of poverty. The economic crisis through which the country is passing has affected the Jews, even though their cost of living is high with respect to that of much of the rest of the population. The number of families that are granted scholarships, medical assistance, and financial help has increased significantly since 1995.

Whoever wants to be part of the Jewish community has to cover membership fees and high tuition. To live in the zone where the community centers and schools are located requires the payment of costly rents. The communities and their institutions will have to implement creative solutions if they want to keep their members within the group and continue having a Jewish life.

Second is the issue of religious polarization. Since the last decade of the 20th century, there has been an increase in religiousness of some members of the Jewish Mexican community. At a macro level this implies a strengthening among the religious groups, which, even though they are not the majority, can cause conflicts and internal ideological struggles. On the other hand, at the micro level, it may mean the fragmentation of those families where only one member becomes religious. This could bring internal conflicts that are difficult to solve.

Contemporary Jewish Affairs

Demographics

Of the 40,000 Jews in Mexico, 60.4 percent are married, 29.1 percent are single, 5.6 percent are widowers, 4.1 percent are divorced, and 0.8 percent are unmarried couples. The divorce rate is around 21 percent. Family is the core of Jewish life in Mexico. Family relationships are strong and close; in general, children stay at their parents' home until they get married. The average family has 3.3 persons.

Zionism and Its Institutions and Israel

Zionism has exerted great influence at the community level. Nevertheless, in spite of the great identification with Israel (91 percent of Jews give great importance to Israel), the number of Mexican Jews who have made aliyah is relatively low: from 1948 to 2005, 4,000 people immigrated to Israel, and about half of them returned to Mexico.

More than 83 percent of Mexican Jews have visited Israel. This has been possible thanks to several programs, such as trips organized by the Jewish schools at the end of 9th grade (the third year of high school) during the summer with the purpose of getting acquainted with Israel, its people, and its environment. Furthermore, other trips are made for specific projects, such as the ones of sports events—the Maccabi Games—or academic training, particularly for teachers in the Jewish schools, tourism, and hajshara (one year in Israel at the end of high school)

Attachment to Israel is also shown in other forms. Far beyond the properly Zionist institutions like the Sojnut (the Jewish Agency), the Federación Sionista (Zionist Federation), the Keren Kayemet, and Keren Hayesod, there are several organizations that are undoubtedly linked to Israel, such as Associations of Friends of Universities and Hospital of Israel and women's organizations, such as WIZO and Na'amat, among others. As part of their work they support different projects implemented in Israel and promote cultural, scientific, and technological interchange between Israel and Mexico.

Within the educational environment, Jewish schools consider the link with Israel as one of the key elements in their ideology. The field of informal education includes the tnuot (youth movements) of Zionist philosophy.

Selected Bibliography

- Bóksler Liwerant, Judit, ed. 1992. Imágenes de un encuentro. Mexico City: Tribuna Israelita, Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México.
- Della Pergola, Sergio, and Susana Lerner. 1992. La población judía de México: Perfil demográfico, social y cultural, pueblo palestino. Jerusalem: Universidad Hebrea de Jerusalem, Colegio de México, Asociación de Amigos de la Universidad Hebrea de Jerusalem.

- Gleizer, Daniela. 2000. México frente a la inmigración de refugiados judíos 1934–1940. Conaculta, Mexico: Fundación Cultural Eduardo Cohén.
- Gojman de Backal, Alice. 2000. Camisas, escudos y desfiles militares. Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica.
- Hamui Sutton, Alicia. 2003. “Transformación en la religiosidad de los judíos en México tradición, ortodoxia y fundamentalismo en la modernidad tardía.” PhD thesis, Universidad Iberoamericana, México.

History of Jewish Migration to Mexico

Adina Cimet

---

Jews arriving in Mexico from different places sought to acclimatize themselves to the new environment. Individually, they adapted as quickly as they could, but collectively, they faced an additional and even conflicting objective: they had to address the internal diversity of Jewish immigrants and negotiate their multiple cultural differences before they could constitute themselves as a group.

For all immigrants, settling in a new location requires some healing from past experiences and forging a new sense of belonging. Immigrant Jews arriving in Mexico in the late 19th and early 20th centuries therefore had two major goals: adapting to a new society and creating a new social entity from the different types of Jews who arrived in the new land. In the process, they built a community structure as complex as the old communal structures of Jewish Europe that had characterized and maintained Jewish living arrangements for centuries. Their amazing experiment as a Diaspora people was to be played over again in Mexico, coalescing their distinctive cultural differences and varied ideological perspectives into a common goal: identifying common needs through the organizations that help them sustain and express their distinct cultural, religious minority status.

The first immigrants to Mexico of the contemporary Jewish community were Oriental Jews: bold men who were followed by their brides and families. Oriental Jews from Syria and Sephardic Jews from Turkey arrived in Mexico in search of better economic conditions. Their main objective, after finding jobs and housing, was to satisfy their religious needs. Although there are three scattered groups in Mexico today (Venta Prieta, Hidalgo; Cholula, Guerrero; and to the north of Mexico City) that claim to have Marrano ancestry, these groups live independently of the community. They use a liturgy and traditions made up from residual oral Judaism that has been selectively mixed with Christian practices. Yet none of these groups has been acknowledged by the Jewish Orthodox establishment.

The Mexico of the 19th century was 99 percent Catholic. The Jews it received in the 1860s—mostly individuals and a few French, British, and Alsatian families—represented a mere 1 percent of the country’s population. Lured by the possibilities of economic development, they invested in retail enterprises. Yet these few were not successful in creating a coherent community. It was left to the poor Oriental immigrants from Syria, the Greek and Turkish Ladino-speaking Jews, and a few Ashkenazim who arrived without resources, languages, or professions to establish themselves in the new land. By 1912, they had inaugurated Monte Sinai, their first representative institution; a year later, this was followed by a Talmud Torah school and a cemetery.

With a few exceptions, the larger Ashkenazi immigration that followed began arriving in Mexico in the second decade of the last century, and they benefited from the welcome given to them by the few already established families. Like their predecessors, they sought a better livelihood as well as a haven from the strictures imposed by the old societies. At that time, all Jews cooperated with each other. The Jews who settled in Mexico arrived with diverse traditions, languages, life experiences, and expectations, but they shared a number of commonalities: their religion and their historical consciousness. But the most important forces that connected them soon became divisive: their interpretation of their existential experiences, expressed best in their communal languages—Yiddish, Hebrew, and Arabic—was emblematic of the differences that separated them. Although the commonalities helped them coalesce into a social entity, their internal differences were sufficiently marked to lead to organizational expansiveness. As a result, they established often parallel communal organizations to sustain the meanings of their Jewish life.

Some of the Ashkenazi immigrants hoped for a new political beginning in Mexico, adding an ideological component and a sense of mission to their endeavor. They therefore carried with them their rich ideological histories, which they transplanted to the new environment as soon as they disembarked from the ships that had left them on the shores of Veracruz. They published newsletters, created groups, and held meetings to enlighten others on their views concerning political developments in the rest of the world. After all, they knew Mexico had had its own revolution in 1910 and was therefore a fertile ground in which their ideals and dreams could be realized. If they had sympathized with socialist thought in their home countries—from folkism, to Bundism, to communism, for instance—they found a way to further their ideologies in the new territory, highlighting those messages that were particularly resonant. Those committed to the Zionist alternative as the better and more realistic choice for Jews, whether from the right or the left, similarly continued their political struggles, advocating for their goals. What could have been cultural and political dissonances were transplanted as new world views through which current experiences were interpreted. Thus, the entire gamut of ideological voices took root in the new community and set the stage for many debates that were played out within organizations, in the press, and among institutions.

But if Ashkenazim had ideologies to contend with, they had to thank the Oriental and Sephardic groups who had preceded them and created the elements necessary for Jewish cultural survival: synagogues and some emphasis on religious tradition. The pioneers had Orthodox concerns and used their religious affiliation and structures to attract others. Indeed, all other Jews had joined them at first, but soon differences in outlook asserted themselves and became a source of contention. As a result, each subgroup developed its own centers and independent organizations, each with its own hierarchy of power. Thus, from the first synagogue (1922), new splinter groups and new organizations were created. This provided immigrants with an opportunity to recreate themselves anew, with multiple new status roles for themselves.

The Ashkenazi group that broke off from the original stem in 1922 began its activities with the Nidjei Israel congregation and benevolent association. Soon, the Sephardic Jews also established their own organizations (1923). Each subgroup added to the network of self-help groups, financial funds, and education institutions, among others. The Ashkenazim built an important modern new Jewish school, the Yiddishe Shule (1922–1923), a day school instead of a Talmud Torah. Its modern curriculum revolved around Yiddish and Hebrew while incorporating all the educational requirements of the Mexican school system. The school ideology rejected the American idea of the afternoon schools as its goal was to assimilate the children to the host society as soon as possible. Other new schools reflected different ideologies (from the Zionist Tarbut school to the religious Yavne to the Folkist/Bundist Naye Yiddishe Shule) of the Ashkenazim. Each school reflected the prevailing value systems. Schools such as the Sephardic Tarbut catered to a particular subgroup separate from the Ashkenazi Tarbut. At present, the number of schools continues to grow, and there are nurseries, primary schools, religious yeshivas, and high schools—approximately a dozen schools in Mexico City alone. Nevertheless, all the parochial schools suffer from a chronic financial deficit: because they are not government subsidized, they rely exclusively on communal resources.

But education has not been the only area of growth and attention. Splintering continued in other areas. Tzedaka Umarpe from the Aleppo Jews, later Maguen David, was organized in 1938 as a community center. Before and during World War II, different segments of the Jewish community felt a need to have a general representative body that could act vis-à-vis the host society. As a result, a body overseeing all the communal groups was formed. The Central Committee therefore began as an antidefamation group and a public spokesperson for all Jews in Mexico.

By 1950s, there were some 53 Ashkenazi organizations reflecting the divergent interests of all political factions: self-help groups, newspapers, writers' associations, cultural groups, synagogues, loan associations, health associations, teachers associations, youth groups, and so on. Many of the politicians and intellectuals of the community felt a need for an umbrella organization for the Ashkenazi, because its many organizations threatened to weaken of the group as a whole. This led to the formation of the Kehillah (1957–1958). This centralized institution favored the creation of a new political elite within this sector, while it replicated in part the much older kehillah organizations that were the central structure of many communal arrangements in Eastern Europe. In this way all segments of the Jewish community in Mexico had developed their leadership; women acted most often as social benefactors and men oversaw finances, education, and the religious organizations. Even new religious types of affiliation, that is, Conservative Judaism, set a foot in this community. Eventually, all subcommunities developed their own power elites.

If most of the schools today have overcome their initial differences and serve as educational institutions for all the subgroups (i.e., some of the Ashkenazi schools have dropped Yiddish as a subject of their curriculum), minimizing cultural distinctions, the real coalescing force in the community is the CDI (Centro Deportivo Israelita), the Sports Center. Managed as a self-sufficient and self-supporting institution, it has never emphasized communal cultural peculiarities; instead, it has catered to all communal members, highlighting its identity through a strong connection with Israel and sports rather than with tradition, sectarian politics, or any other issue that could be faction driven. The institution has prided itself in serving as a center for all groups, minimizing tensions, and basing its rotating leadership on managerial principles rather than on power politics.

Although the community currently appears to have a rich and stable structural network, nevertheless it has undergone a number of power struggles with debilitating results. The interrelations of the members can therefore be characterized as a mixture of clashes and cooperation, often resulting in new institutions that either replace old ones or become altogether new entities. The pulse of communal life is constantly being reactivated.

Selected Bibliography

- Backal de Gojman, Alice, ed. 1993. Generaciones Judias en Mexico: La Kehila Ashkenazi (1922–1992) [Jewish Generations in Mexico: The Ashkenazi Kehillah 1922–1992]. Mexico: Comunidad Ashkenazi.
- Cimet, Adina. 1997. Ashkenazi Jews in Mexico: Ideologies in the Structuring of a Community. New York: SUNY Press.
- Cimet, Adina. 1997. "Incomplete Allowance: Jews as a Minority in Mexico." E.I.A.L., Estudios Interdisciplinarios de America Latina y el Caribe 8 (2): 105–124.
- Cimet, Adina. 1994. "Last Battles of Old World: Ideologies in the Race for Identity and Communal Power: Communists vs. Bundists vs. Zionists in Mexico, 1938–1951." E.I.A.L., Estudios Interdisciplinarios de America Latina y el Caribe 5 (2). Available at: http://www.tau.ac.il/eial/V\_2/singer.htm (accessed 15 May, 2008).
- Hamui de Halabe, Liz, ed. 1989. Los Judios de Alepo en Mexico [The Jews from Aleppo in Mexico]. Mexico City: Maguen David, A.C.

Contemporary Jewish Identity in Mexico

Adina Cimet

---

Given their awareness of cultural differences in a globalizing world, minorities have come to embody the evolution of identity complexities. With their abundant historic group experiences and multiple migrations, Jews constitute a useful example of a group that juggles multiple loyalties and identities within its cultural consciousness. Indeed, issues of multiple identities are an intrinsic part of Jewish history. In Mexico, where Jews arrived as a new minority, they sought to sustain their culture and self definition, while Mexican society was challenged to accept social difference. This challenge attains a novel perspective when analyzed through the angle of language use: one can see Yiddish used first as a particular minority Jewish language, then reproduced into the new terrain of the Jewish community in Mexico, and finally its demise with the coming generations.

The contemporary communal life of Jews in Mexico dates to the latter part of the 19th century, although it was not until well into the 20th century that the Jewish presence in Mexico was acknowledged. Although there were Jews in New Spain (as colonial Mexico was called) who arrived there as Marranos or New Christians, their survival was jeopardized by the Inquisition. Today's Mexican Jews settled primarily during the 20th century. Initially, they arrived from Syria and Turkey; later, they migrated from Eastern Europe and Russia (and even from the United States), searching for better economic conditions and a calmer life. Proximity to the United States allowed them to hope for a future new locale if and when the closed doors of the immigration policy (1920s) would be reversed. In Mexico, Jews settled and grouped by place of origin, common roots joining faith, values, and language use as foundations on which to create a community. Eventually, different conglomerates merged as they formed the first organizations designed to meet their immigrant needs: synagogues, cemeteries, and schools.

The Jews who settled in Mexico also shared minority languages as distinctive markers that united them. Most maintained for religious use some knowledge of biblical Hebrew, and among Eastern Europeans (the majority of Jews in the world until World War II), Yiddish was the dominant language of use. Although they were primarily based in Mexico City, where their largest concentration remains to this day, they also settled in Monterrey and Guadalajara. By the 1950s, the numbers of Mexican Jews reached between 35,000 and 45,000. Today, the population is estimated to number 50,000. This total includes two main subgroups: the various Ashkenazim of Eastern Europe and the Sephardim and Oriental Jews of that ancestry.

In Mexico, Jews made enormous efforts to adapt and integrate themselves, taking advantage of all that Mexican society offered them: education, work, and a growing middle class that could support much entrepreneurial activity. They offered all they carried with them, from ideologies, to world views, to entrepreneurship. They adapted to the country linguistically as quickly as possible, and the host society undisputedly allowed them to belong, albeit with the requisites they imposed, either openly or covertly. The second generation of Jews born in Mexico participates in almost all spheres of the economy and culture. Although their parents arrived and became peddlers, bakers, and tailors, they became teachers, workers, architects, engineers, doctors, psychologists, writers, entrepreneurs, scholars, and more. They are therefore represented in many professions and disciplines and have left their mark in many areas of social and intellectual activity.

However, with the opening of greater opportunities, Jews faced the unexpected difficulty of maintaining their own culture in a political environment that tolerated, but did not nurture, difference. Language use and language choice have been used as a measure to qualify the level of adaptation of a minority group. In the case of Jews, they score highly with their acquired skills. Yet this language change distances the minority from its own cultural tools. As a group, the Jewish community had a focused commitment to use its human and economic resources to sustain and develop its transplanted cultural inheritance. Yet the culture that Jews brought and tried to maintain did not reproduce itself in all its components. Their languages, their main tool for communication between themselves and with world Jewries, did not remain intact. After that change, some aspects of the minority culture suffered substantial erosion.

During the first 100 years of settlement in Mexico, the network of organizations Jews created—more than a dozen schools, an array of self-help groups, synagogues of all varieties and traditions, social organizations, and political groups—impressive as it is for a relatively small community, nevertheless masks the significant alterations that minority culture has experienced internally. Although change is to be expected as groups evolve over time, a distinction must be made between superficial adaptations and alterations that redefine the very essence of the community itself. Language is an essential cultural element that defines the identity of the group; its loss therefore has an indelible effect on the minority's cultural reproduction and self-definition. Jews in Mexico incorporated variety to their cultural background as they adapted to Mexican society and polity, but they shed or exchanged essential cultural elements in the process. In the case of their distancing from the Yiddish language, for most, the changes were both voluntarily accepted and socially encouraged, facilitated by the prevailing political and economic environment.

While the qualitative change that has occurred is hard to assess, it is visible everywhere. Today, communal languages are seldom heard socially or officially, and cultural production (e.g., newspapers, journals, books) in the minority languages has been largely abandoned in favor of Spanish in all Jewish cultural activities. This phenomenon, so emblematic of adaptation, is interpreted as evidence of the minority's success in merging with the majority society. It also indicates the degree to which the majority is willing to accept the minority. Seen through a different lens, this adaptation also reflects limits on the amount and quality of difference the host society accepts.

The loss of minority languages (in this case Yiddish) is a major loss. It reflects not only the weakened interest of the minority in ensuring its distinctive cultural survival but also the indifferences on the part of both the host and the minority in protecting linguistic diversity as part of national patrimony. The demise of minority languages mirrors the sociological tensions and asymmetries in the interrelations among groups, where the minorities, Jews as well as indigenous minorities, live subordinated cultural lives.

Perhaps the best way to gauge these changes and their social cost is to examine Jewish writers in Mexico, because they serve as barometers of communal and social integration and adaptation. Unlike their immigrant Ashkenazi predecessors, who wrote almost exclusively in Yiddish, for instance, the current generation of Ashkenazi writers writes exclusively in Spanish, catering to the mass cultural market of the broader society. In the past, the Ashkenazi group, greater in number and more ideologically committed to the beliefs and values of their original societies, felt a need to speak to and about world Jewry in their own language, linking themselves to other Jewish populations. Today, because Yiddish has been abandoned as a wide tool for communication and as the medium for cultural production, writers behave and write differently and address a different audience. These writers are unable to read or write in this minority language, but they have a larger readership. Status and rewards accrue to those using Spanish, recognitions to which they could not otherwise aspire.

This exchange in language use signals an impoverishment of the cultural output of the group itself. Because losing a lingua franca is a way of fragmenting the minority itself, Jews in Mexico, detached from this cultural language, remain Jews in the 21st century but have to make special efforts to communicate with their brethren throughout the world. They share in the historical experiences of identity formation with other Jews, but have no shared language in which to communicate their current existential paradigms. The connection to Israel—a most essential bonding force for Jews since the existence of the State of Israel—may nurture identity elements, but is not a substitute for the communicating process itself. The loss of a unifying minority language has created a major barrier to communicating with other Jewish populations all over the world. The consequences of this loss can now be only dimly projected. Regarding minority languages, the case of the Mexican Jewish community is but an illustration of a Jewish world wide condition.

Selected Bibliography

- Cimet, Adina. 1994. "The Case of Ashkenazi Jews in Mexico, 1940–1950: Nationalism and the Question of Languages." The Journal of Culture and Society 94 (2, July/August).
- Cimet, Adina. 1997. Ashkenazi Jews in Mexico; Ideologies in the Structuring of a Community. New York: SUNY Press.
- Cimet, Adina. 2000. "Ambivalence Acknowledged: Jewish Identities and Language Strategies in Contemporary Mexico." In The Collective and the Public in Latina America; Cultural Identities and Political Order, edited by Luis Roniger and Tamar Herzog, 273–284. Portland, OR: Sussex Academy Press.

Jews in Latin America

Gilbert W. Merkkx

---

General Population: 150,000,000

Jewish Population: 400,000

Jewish Population per Country (number and percent of the total population for that country): Argentina, 395,379, 1 percent; Brazil, 200,000, 1 percent; Mexico, 53,101, 0.05 percent; Uruguay, 30,743, 0.9 percent; Venezuela, 25,375, 0.09 percent; Chile, 20,900, 0.1 percent; Colombia, 3,436, 0.008 percent; Peru, 2,792, 0.01 percent; Costa Rica, 2,409, 0.06 percent

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Spanish and Portuguese immigrants, conversos, émigrés of the Spanish Moroccan wars, and émigrés from the Balkans and failing Ottoman Empire contributed to the Jewish population.

---

Historical Overview

Given the long and ultimately tragic history of Jews in the Iberian Peninsula (or Sepharad, as it was known in Hebrew) it was inevitable that they would be a presence in the Iberian colonies of what is now Latin America. As the Christian reconquest of Moorish Spain reached its final stages, waves of religious fervor led to the increased persecution of Jews. Repeated pogroms in the late 13th century forced many Jews to convert. In 1412–1415, the imposition of laws that forced many Jews to abandon their property and occupations led to another wave of conversions and the designation of a new social category, the “converso” or New Christian. Suspicions of the New Christians endured, and in 1480 the Spanish Inquisition began to investigate the sincerity of the converted.

The fateful year of 1492 was marked by three events of historic significance. First, the voyage of Christopher Columbus, financed by Queen Isabella with borrowed Jewish money, led to the European discovery of the Western Hemisphere. Second, the last Moorish bastion in Granada fell, ensuring the unification of Christian Spain. The third event occurred shortly thereafter when the Crown issued the Edict of Expulsion, requiring the remaining Jews in Spain to convert or be exiled. Some chose conversion, swelling the ranks of the New Christians. Many chose exile, leading to the establishment of substantial Sephardic communities in North Africa and the Turkish Empire. Others went to Portugal, which proved a short reprieve. In 1497, all Jews in Portugal were forcibly baptized, becoming another set of the converted, known as cristãos novos.

The conversos of Spain and Portugal remained under suspicion, however, and continued to be pursued by the Inquisition even if they were devout practicing Catholics. Conversos were also derogatively known as “Marranos” (literally, swine). New measures restricted activities by persons who could not prove “limpieza de sangre” (literally, clean blood, meaning not of Jewish descent). In 1501, Queen Isabella issued instructions prohibiting the migration of Moors, Jews, and New Christians to the New World. Given the worsening conditions in Iberia, the incentives for New Christians to reach the New World were high. Many conversos were able to purchase exemptions or find other ways to migrate.

How many of these conversos were actually crypto-Jews who continued to secretly practice their religion is not known and continues to be the subject of debate. The records of the Spanish Inquisition in the New World suggest that crypto-Jews were numerous in the minds of the inquisitors and included entire settlements. But without the ability to openly practice their religion, crypto-Jews were unable to pass their Judaism to later generations. Remnants of Jewish culture and family identity are still found in remote corners of New Spain, such as New Mexico, but the crypto-Jewish communities were absorbed by their host societies (as were individual Jews scattered throughout the rest of colonial Latin America). Small Sephardic communities established synagogues in Dutch Curaçao and Brazil during the Dutch occupation, but these also faded away over time.

The Jewish presence in Latin America was reintroduced in a more significant manner in the last half of the 19th century. Thousands of Sephardic Jews fleeing the Spanish-Moroccan wars of the late 1850s and early 1860s, as well as subsequent persecution after the Spanish withdrawal from Morocco, came to Brazil and Argentina and established congregations. The brief reign of Emperor Maximilian in Mexico (1864–1867) began a small migration of Alsatian Jews, which increased after the German annexation of Alsace after the 1870 Franco-Prussian War and was further encouraged by the stability of the Mexican regime of Porfirio Diaz (1876–1911). Toward the end of the 19th century, the military and financial collapse of the Ottoman Empire led to a sizable migration of Jews to Brazil and the Southern Cone. The Balkan wars, the Revolt of the Young Turks in 1908 (which led to compulsory military service for Jews), and the dismemberment of Turkey after World War I, all contributed to increased Sephardic migration. The Argentine national census of 1895 recorded slightly more than 6,000 Jews (some estimates suggest that the real numbers were closer to 10,000), who were probably mostly Sephardim.

Significant Ashkenazic migration to Latin America also begins in the late 19th century. The assassination of Czar Alexander II of Russia led to a series of state-sponsored programs and edicts that led Russian Jews to flee westward. These numbers increased with military conscription during the buildup to World War I. After World War I, the collapse of the German economy and the rise of anti-Semitism under the Third Reich led Jews to seek refuge in Latin America in unprecedented numbers. The number of Jews in Argentina, according to current estimates, jumped from about 15,000 in 1900 to more than 250,000 in 1940. Most of these new migrants were Ashkenazim.

After World War II, Jewish migration to Latin America tapered off quickly. Once the displaced survivors of the Holocaust had left, there no longer were numerically significant Jewish populations in Eastern and Western Europe to serve as the source of migration. The sizable Jewish communities inside the Soviet Union were not free to leave. Moreover, Israel and the United States, not Latin America, had become the destination of choice for Jews of the Diaspora.

The high point of Jewish population in Latin America and the Caribbean was probably reached about 1960, when approximately half a million Jews lived in the entire region. Conventional estimates at that time were much larger, and some suggested that half a million Jews were living in Argentina alone. However, more recent demographic research by Sergio Della Pergola and his associates suggest that the real numbers were much lower and the Jewish population in Argentina in 1960 was 310,000. After 1960, with low birthrates and growing out-migration to Israel, those numbers began to decline.

The Argentine Jewish community was the largest in Latin America, with about three-fifths of Latin American Jewry. Comprehensive estimates of the overall population at the end of 1982 suggested that there were 465,000 Jews in the region: 233,000 in Argentina, 100,000 in Brazil, 35,000 in Mexico, 30,000 in Uruguay, 20,000 in Chile, 20,000 in Venezuela, 7,000 in Colombia, and 5,000 in Peru. Numbers in the remaining countries of Latin America and the Caribbean were far smaller and totaled only another 15,000 combined.

The most recent estimates of the Jewish population in Latin America and the Caribbean, also by Della Pergola, put the total in 2002 at 412,200 persons. The largest decline in population was in the Argentine Jewish community, which had fallen to 195,000, less than two-thirds of its size in 1960. In contrast, the Mexican Jewish community had grown to 40,400. In countries that had growing economies and political stability, the Jewish communities were stable or grew slightly, and in countries marked by economic and political instability, there was a continuing exodus to Israel or the United States.

Contemporary Overview

The demographic evidence makes it clear that the Jewish communities in Latin America have not been a significant proportion of the local populations. Only in Argentina and Uruguay did the Jewish populations even come close to constituting 1 percent of the national population. However, in spite of their small numbers, Latin American Jews have been a significant presence in modern Latin America.

The visibility of Latin American Jews in national life has not been a function of cultural manifestations such as Jewish theater and literature, which seem to have had little impact on national culture in Latin America. This is in noteworthy contrast to the experience of the United States, where Jewish contributions to literature, theater, and film have been highly influential.

Also in contrast to the United States, Jews have not been a significant political force in Latin America, either collectively or as individuals. Jewish politicians have been more notable by their absence than by their presence. In Argentina, Uruguay, and Brazil some Jews had political careers, not because of, but in spite of being Jewish. Jews have at various times and in various countries also held important ministerial positions, but they were appointed for their abilities rather than their political influence.

Latin American Jews nonetheless have been a significant presence in two respects. First, the Jews in Latin America had extraordinary levels of upward social mobility compared with native populations and even other immigrant populations. This individual and collective social mobility led to a high percentage of successful entrepreneurs and professionals in the Jewish community. As a result, Jews have played an important role in the economic development and modernization of Latin America. Although Jews have not been dominant in important sectors of economic activity, they have been prominent and successful in many fields.

The second respect in which the Jewish presence in Latin America has been notable is as the symbolic target of national animosities. Anti-Semitism continues to permeate popular culture in Latin America, and it has been a staple in the nationalist diatribes of the extreme right. Ironically, some left-wing revolutionary movements of past decades in Latin America were also anti-Semitic, reflecting sympathies between the erstwhile guerrillas in Latin America and terrorist groups in Europe and the Middle East.

The Jewish role in Latin America is therefore marked by two paradoxes. One is the discrepancy between the relative success of Jews in climbing the social ladder and their minor role in politics and culture. A second paradox is the contrast between the relatively minor historical and demographic presence of Jews in modern Latin America and their exaggerated importance in the myths of extremist political rhetoric and popular culture.

Latin America and the Jewish Experience

The Jewish experience in Latin America is particularly interesting compared with Jewish experiences in the United States and Israel, cases with differing relationships between Jewish identity and national identity. In the United States, Jewish identity and national identity are discrete and unrelated. A Jew is no less an American and no more an American for being Jewish, and no more or less Jewish for being an American. In Israel, Jewish identity and national identity are in many respects identical. In contrast, in the Latin American republics national identity and Jewish identity have long been antithetical, contradictory, or problematically related, at least from the perspective of the majority populations. The fact that being Jewish is problematic in Latin America, but not in the United States or Israel, is a comment on the character of Latin American societies.

The persistence of anti-Semitism in popular Latin American culture contrasts remarkably with the decline of such prejudice in Europe and the United States. The roots of anti-Semitism in the medieval Christian tradition are clear, but far less apparent are the reasons for the survival of such stereotypes in countries and among groups in which Catholicism is actively practiced by only a small proportion of the populace and where the Jewish presence is small. Analogous to anti-Semitism, but without similar religious origins, is the persistence of other ethnic stereotypes hostile to supposedly "foreign" elements, as expressed in the extensive lexicon of racist and ethnic labels that are commonly used in Latin America. The pervasive hostility and suspicion with which minorities are characterized in Latin American popular culture, and the reluctance to extend national identity to minority group members, reflect more than Catholic tradition.

Anthropologists have attributed the Latin American suspicion of outsiders to the weakness of national institutions that provide citizens with equal protection under the law and a social safety net. In such a context, people rely more on extended family ties, clientelistic networks, religious congregations, or ethnic communities, and they rely less on public institutions. Also common in Latin America, as elsewhere in the less developed world, is a sense of inferiority with respect to the developed nations of Europe and North America. In Latin American popular culture, Jews are not only seen as outsiders but also as agents of international capital and the developed world. Thus, to the extent that Jews become the target of such national resentments, they are implicitly stripped of their standing as fellow citizens.

The link between anti-Semitism and the resentments born of underdevelopment suggests that the persistence of discrimination should be inversely correlated with the extent of economic development in different parts of Latin America. This appears in fact to describe the Jewish experience in Latin America. Jews fare better in the great metropolitan cities than in the provinces, and they fare better in countries with successful growth records than in those with stagnant or underdeveloped economies. Particularly interesting in this regard is the contrast between the deteriorating situation of the large Jewish community in Argentina and the contemporaneous improvement in the situation of Jews in Brazil. Each cycle of economic crisis in Argentina seems to generate new expressions of anti-Semitism, whereas the steadier trajectory of development in Brazil has been accompanied by a continued reduction of anti-Semitism.

Economic crises in Latin America, as elsewhere, are linked to political crises. This is a feature of Latin American politics that may have helped preclude the emergence of Jews as politicians. If ethnic communities are to be a factor in national politics, either collectively or through the advancement of their representatives, incentives for political participation must exist. The risks of political involvement by minority communities are high in societies in which democratic regimes are fragile and subject to replacement by authoritarian or populist regimes. Achievements obtained according to rules of competitive democracy are only as lasting as the democratic regime itself. Almost as fragile are the protections afforded by legal systems and their rights and procedures, which are liable to suspension by authoritarian regimes. The instability of democratic regimes in Latin America has been a disincentive to Jewish political participation and a factor contributing to the climate of uncertainty that hangs over Jewish communities.

The relatively hostile cultural environment of Latin America did not produce the cooperation among Jewish groups of different origins that might have been expected. Instead, the environment increased the saliency of ties of origin and culture. In 1891, for example, Sephardic Jews left the Congregación Israelita in Buenos Aires to establish their own Congregación Israelita Latina. Prior national origin and culture (Sephardic, German, Eastern European, Moroccan, or Turkish) divided Latin American Jewish communities far longer than their counterparts in the United States and Israel.

Also lingering in Latin America was a far more Orthodox religious tradition than found among most Jews in the United States and Israel. Assimilation to the host culture was more likely to result in the severing of ties to the Jewish community. Intermarriage with non-Jews also led to isolation from the Jewish community after it was banned in Argentina in the 1920s by both Sephardic and Ashkenazic rabbis. The ban was intended to prevent intermarriage with non-Jews, but it had the effect of contributing to a net loss of population. As a result, upward social mobility in Latin America for much of the 20th century had two negative consequences for Latin American Jews. Some upwardly mobile Jews lost their religious identity, whereas others maintained that identity but did so at the cost of being less socially integrated in the host society. By the mid-20th century, it seemed that the Jewish communities of Latin America were destined to become ever smaller, more Orthodox, and aged in membership.

In 1954, the few Conservative congregations in South America affiliated with the Conservative movement in the United States. This led to the establishment in the 1960s of the Seminario Rabínico in Buenos Aires, under the direction of Rabbi Marshall Meyer, a U.S. citizen. Since then, the Seminario Rabínico has produced a steady stream of rabbis who have assumed leadership roles in modernizing the Jewish communities of Latin America. Conservative congregations introduced mixed-sex seating and the use of Spanish or Portuguese for some parts of the service. A process for the conversion of non-Jews was established, stemming the loss of Jews. This led the Orthodox communities to initiate their own conversion process. Conservative and Reform congregations now attract adolescents and young married couples, which has stemmed the gradual aging that had marked Jewish congregations in the past.

Conclusion

The future of Latin America's Jewish communities appears to be somewhat problematic in countries marked by instability and ensured in countries with sustained economic growth and political stability. The return of populist political movements in several countries of the region, including Venezuela, Ecuador, Peru, and Bolivia, is a cause for concern for Jews in those nations. The highly stratified and particularistic nature of Latin American societies has sustained some national cultures that tend to be hostile toward all minority groups but have a particular animosity to those with foreign linkages. Maintaining both Jewish and national identity in such countries has been a major problem for Latin American Jewry, creating high incentives for aliyah, or migration to Israel. This context contributed to the Orthodoxy and insularity of Jewish communities through much of the 20th century, characteristics that have been undergoing significant changes. The establishment of professional training for rabbis and the modernization of religious practices have brightened the prospects for survival of the Jewish communities of Latin America.

Necessary preconditions for improving civic life in Latin America and concomitantly lessening prejudice against Jews include economic growth and the consolidation of pluralistic democracy. In recent decades, such conditions have characterized Brazil, Chile, Costa Rica, and Mexico, which have had stable Jewish populations. The consolidation of democracy in Uruguay, even in the absence of significant economic growth, has contributed to the stability of its Jewish community. The large Argentine Jewish community has lost numbers, but it remains large and viable. The Jewish communities of Latin America now constitute about 3.3 percent of world Jewry, and they will continue to survive as a small but significant element of the Jewish Diaspora.

Selected Bibliography

- Avni, Haim. 1986. Antisemitism under Democratic and Dictatorial Regimes: The Experience of Latin American Jewry. Jerusalem: Hebrew University, 59.
- Avni, Haim. 1991. Argentina and the Jews: A History of Jewish Immigration. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 267.
- Elkin, Judith Laikin. 1998. The Jews of Latin America. New York: Holmes and Meier, 339.
- Elkin, Judith Laikin, and Gilbert Merckx. 1987. The Jewish Presence in Latin America. Boston: Allen and Unwin, 338.

Jewish Identity in Latin American Fiction

Lois Barr

---

Several themes recur in Latin American fiction written by or about Jews: exile, alienation, dispersion, the quest for social justice, and the quest for a center—be it in Israel or a new Zion. Jewish writers struggle with their identity and the unique challenges that their circumstances present. Their work reveals identities that are fractured, assimilated, or defiantly Jewish. Their imagery, use of language, and world vision reflect their immigrant experience and their unique history in the various Latin American republics. At the same time, other writers present Jews by recycling age-old prejudices or presenting Jewish characters as martyrs and heroes who challenge the domination of the Catholic Church. Contemporary writer Jorge Luis Borges's stories present complex portraits of Jews in the Holocaust and take motifs from the Kabbalah. Carlos Fuentes and Homero Aridjis have written about the role of Jews in the Conquest period. So, although stories about Jews have left an indelible mark on Latin American literature, the Catholic society in which they are inserted has also left an indelible mark on their work.

The Period of Discovery and Colonization: 1492–1816

Because the exportation of the Spanish and Portuguese languages to the American colonies coincides with the cataclysmic expulsion of Jews from the Iberian Peninsula, it is impossible to speak of literature in those languages without speaking of its Jewish flavor and origins. Many of the explorers, conquerors, and settlers of those lands hoped they would be able to return to Judaism, but several decrees forbade non-Catholics from settling there. So Jews who wished to revert to their faith had to worship secretly. Some of the newly arrived passed on rituals from generation to generation, but most who had converted remained faithful to Catholicism and lost their identity as Jews. Yet all of them shared the language of the golden age writers, many of whom were of Jewish ancestry.

With the implantation of Catholicism in the territories of the conquest and the strictures imposed by the Inquisition, the identity of the Jew became part of the culture as the Judas figure, the killer of Christ, and the money lender. This stereotypical identification of Jews with usury continues in contemporary fiction. For example, an anti-Semitic work, La Bolsa/The Stock Market (1891) by José María Miró (Julián Martel), blames the moral and economic downfall of the Argentine nation on Jewish immigrants.

The institution that did the most to disseminate hatred of Jews was the Holy Office of the Inquisition. Three cases of secret Jews, imprisoned and executed at autos-de-fé, two in Mexico and one in Peru, left important vestiges in oral history and inspired operas, plays, poetry, and fiction. In Mexico the illustrious and politically important Carvajal family was burned at the stake.

A similar execution took place in Lima, Peru, in 1639. Francisco Maldonado Da Silva, a physician, was arrested for secretly practicing Judaism in Chile, then a remote outpost of the Spanish Empire. After 12 years of imprisonment, torture, and fierce interrogation, Maldonado not only refused to renounce Judaism, but he also circumcised himself in his cell and penned "Letters to the Jews of Rome." After a hunger strike rendered him thin enough to slip through the bars of his cell, he visited other prisoners to encourage them to remain steadfast in their faith. An eyewitness account says that when Maldonado was tied to the stake with many of his writings hanging around his neck, a great wind blew up and tore away the awning. The priest who saw this wrote that Maldonado's last words were, "God wanted to see me face to face" (Böhm 1984, 145).

Among the first writers in Portuguese-ruled Brazil were the poet Bento Teixeira (1560–1618), a New Christian, and playwright Antonio José da Silva (1705–1739), known as "The Jew," who died at the stake in Lisbon. According to Brazil's great novelist Moacyr Scliar (1937): "For two centuries the Jews were arrested, tortured and executed, until the end of the 18th century, when thanks to the new liberal spirit arising in Europe, Portugal ended the discrimination against Jews. Then the Marranos simply vanished, assimilated by Brazilian Society."

The Period of Independence: 1816–1872

With the war of independence and the development of modern nation states, the Inquisition was banned. The Holy Office was burned in Lima. As this once omnipotent institution became the object of hatred, the former victims became the symbol of new and liberal nations. In Mexico, Justo Sierra O'Reilly's La Hija del Judío (The Daughter of a Jew; 1848–1852) tells the story of a Christian girl whose forebears were Jewish. Here the voice of the Jew "serves as a symbolic voice to promote anticlericalism" (Lockhart 1997, xiii).

The most famous depiction of Jews in Latin America in the 19th century is in María, a canonical novel by Colombian Jorge Isaacs (1837–1895). Although critic Doris Summer has closely studied the Jewish elements in Isaacs's work, María is a Christian novel. Despite the heroine's Jewish parentage, she devotes her short life to worshipping her cousin Efraín and the Virgin Mary. Many works written in the 20th century would share Isaacs's interesting fusion of Jewish and Catholic elements.

Later in the century in Cuba, according to Judith Laikin Elkin, José Martí's identification of the Cuban struggle for independence with the struggle of the Jews for freedom, "eased the acculturation of Jewish immigrants" (90).

Immigration: 19th Century to World War II

Because of pogroms and famine in Eastern Europe and liberal immigration policies in many Latin American countries, by 1917 there were some 150,000 Jews living there (Elkin 1998, 68). Baron Maurice Hirsch, the railroad magnate who developed the Orient Express, established the Jewish Colonization Association in 1891 to bring Jews out of deprivation and back to the honorable work of tilling the soil. But radical cutbacks in immigration quotas and other setbacks meant he would not realize his hope of getting more than 3 million Jews out of Eastern Europe to farming communities in Argentina, Brazil, and Uruguay (Elkin 1998, 109). In 1910, on the centenary of the Argentine nation, a budding journalist and fiction writer was urged to write about his own experiences in the Jewish Colonies. So Alberto Gerchunoff (1884–1950) wrote Los Gauchos Judíos (Jewish Gauchos of the Pampas), the best-known novel about Jews in Argentina. He describes the hard life of agricultural colonists in the fertile Pampas in idyllic terms. In the first chapter, the ideology of the project is explained by an elder of the community. He promises Jews will regain God's grace by working the soil in Argentina because Zion is "wherever peace and happiness reign" (Aizenberg 2000, 43).

In Cervantine prose, Gerchunoff's novel extolls the Jews' legacy: the Castilian language, their gaucho neighbors, and hard work. Those three elements would give the newly arrived immigrants roots in Argentina. Los Gauchos Judíos has been translated into several languages, has been reread many times, and has inspired plays, musical reviews, and a feature film by Juan José Jusid. Moreover, contemporary writers recount and deconstruct the experience of the agricultural colonies in such important novels as O Centauro No Jardim (The Centaur in the Garden; 1980), by Brazilian Moacyr Scliar (1937) and La Logia del Umbral (The Doorway Conspiracy; 2001) by Argentine Ricardo Feierstein (1942), Criador de Palomas (The Dove Keeper, 1989) by Mario Goloboff (1939), and Complot (2004) by Perla Suez. To this day many Argentines proudly call themselves Jewish gauchos.

Despite the preponderance of literature on the topic, the agricultural colonies were a short-lived experiment, and most Jewish immigrants ended up in urban centers. There are many newspaper and fictional accounts about the travails of peddlers (Elkin 1998, 132), such as Cláper (1987), by Venezuelan Alicia Freilich Segal (b. 1939), and the novels of Peruvian Isaac Goldemberg (1945). For women with no capital and little education, prostitution became a means of supporting themselves. Zwi Migdal, a criminal ring, recruited heavily in Eastern Europe and brought young women, who often thought they were coming to be married, to work in brothels in Uruguay and Argentina. The Argentine Jewish community banned prostitutes and pimps from the Yiddish theater and the communal cemeteries. Finally, in 1930 the Jewish organizations pressured the government to bar prostitution and to deport the white slavers (Elkin 1998, 98), but the topic remained in works by Argentines César Tiempo (Israel Zeitlin; 1906–1980), Nora Glickman (b. 1944), Mario Szichman (b. 1945), and Pedro Orgambide (b. 1929).

The immigrants created a thriving Jewish press in Spanish, Portuguese, Yiddish, and Ladino, which gave many writers their entrée into the literary world. Cuba had an important Yiddish press; however, the Castro regime decimated the ranks of the middle class and all but destroyed the Jewish community there.

Contemporary Literature

Jewish writers have fought against social injustice in their writing and through political action. Bernardo Verbitsky's (1907–1979) Villa Miseria También es América

(The Slum Too Is America; 1957) is set in one of the shantytowns that ring Argentina's capital. The voices of squatters narrate their desperate lives as victims of the military, labor unions, and the police. Internationally known for essays, plays, and novels that critique General Augusto Pinochet and the parasitic effect of imperialism, Ariel Dorfman (b. 1942) has had to live outside Chile because of threats to his life. Testimony and fiction of the 1970s and 1980s attest to the great number of Jews who were disappeared in Argentina and Uruguay. The imprisonment of renowned newspaper editor of La Opinión, Jacobo Timerman, made worldwide news when Israeli operatives rescued him. Like Timerman, Mauricio Rosencof, a leader of the militant Uruguayan Tupamaros, wrote fiction and testimony about his imprisonment. With the return of democracy in the Southern Cone, investigative journalists such as Horacio Verbitsky document corruption in the Catholic Church and crimes against humanity by the military. Leftist poet Juan Gelman has crusaded for many years to recover the bodies of his son and daughter-in-law, who were disappeared and summarily executed, and to find his missing granddaughter.

The return of democracy in Argentina and throughout Latin America has not ended hardships for Jews. The 1994 bombings of the Israeli Embassy by militant Muslims and the 1994 bombing of the Asociación Mutual Argentina Israelita in Buenos Aires sent shock waves through Jewish institutions around Latin America. The perpetrators of those crimes escaped; moreover, the bungled investigations have traumatized and galvanized the Jewish community. At the same time, economic crises pushed Jews out of the middle class and into poverty in the 1980s and 1990s.

Through it all Jews still defend themselves with humor. Argentine short story writer Isidoro Blaisten (b. 1933) and novelists Silvia Plager (b. 1942), Ana María Shúa (b. 1951), and Alicia Steimberg (b. 1933) explore the neuroses and quirks of their Jewish protagonists. Eliahu Toker (b. 1934) has anthologized Jewish humor, and television comedian Tato Bores (Mauricio Borensztein; 1927–1996) kept hope alive for those who opposed the dictatorship while adding Yiddish words to the Argentine lexicon.

Zionist organizations in Latin America encourage young Jews to visit, make aliyah, or fight for Israel as in the tragic story of the protagonist in Peruvian writer Isaac Goldemberg's Tiempo al Tiempo (Play by Play; 1984). Novelists Silvia Plager (b. 1942), Mario Satz (b. 1944), and Ricardo Feierstein have written about Israel, and a literary journal, Noaj (1987), attests to the interest in Latin American Jewish writers in that country.

For economic, political, and social reasons several important writers have chosen to live abroad. Gelman lives in Mexico City, for example, and Spain has become home to many Argentine-born writers. In the United States, several Jewish writers devote themselves to university teaching. Mexican writer Ilan Stavans edits a series at the University of New Mexico Press devoted to translating Latin American Jewish works.

The writers who remain in Latin America struggle with many issues. Serious studies of identity crises, loneliness, and alienation are to be found in the works of Mexican Angelina Muñoz-Huberman (b. 1936), Brazilian Clarice Lispector

(b. 1925–1977), and Argentines such as Ana María Shúa (b. 1951), Bernardo Kordon (b. 1915), and Andrés Rivera (Marcos Ribak, b. 1928). In Alicia Steimberg's Cuando Digo Magdalena (Call Me Magdalena; 1992) an amnesiac narrator travels in and out of her Jewish identity. Amnesia and the Jews' strange mixture of cultural baggage is the theme of Ricardo Feierstein's Mestizo (1988). In many works Jewish and Catholic imagery and motifs create a strange fusion. Fortunately, such work finds a general readership and the success of young writers Diego Paszkowski (b. 1966) and Marcelo Birmajer (b. 1966) promises a future for Latin American Jewish fiction.

Conclusions

From their arrival as secret Jews to their current status as emancipated citizens, Jews have played an important role in forming the cultural identity of the countries in which they live. As global wanderers, Jewish writers reveal their fascination with linguistic issues. Some writers, such as Rosa Nissán (b. 1939), incorporate Ladino, and others incorporate Yiddish. Critic Saúl Sosnowski defined this life between languages and cultures as "life on the hyphen." Jewish writers in Latin America have to find their identity in that hyphen between their religion and their nationality or between their ethnic origins and the place they live.

In the most viable Jewish communities, those of Argentina, Brazil, Mexico, and Uruguay, Jews contribute far beyond their numbers in music, television and film and all genres of literature (Lockhart 1997; Goldemberg 1998). Santiago Kovadloff (b. 1942) and Margo Glantz (b. 1930) are members of the academies of letters of Argentina and Mexico, respectively. Mexican writer Angelina Muñoz-Huberman and Argentines Mario Goloboff and David Viñas occupy prominent positions as academics, while Steimberg and Manuela Fingueret (b. 1945) have held important bureaucratic positions in the diffusion of culture in Argentina. So Jews are insiders and outsiders. They occupy a precarious space for diversity that continues to exist there and bring readers remarkable stories about Jewish life in Latin America.

Selected Bibliography

- Aizenberg, Edna. 2000. Parricide on the Pampa? A New Study and Translation of Alberto Gerschunoff's Los Gauchos Judíos. Madrid: Iberoamericana.
- Barr, Lois Baer. 1995. Isaac Unbound: Patrirachal Traditions in the Latin American Jewish Novel. Tempe: Arizona State University Press.
- Böhm, Günter. 1984. La Historia de los Judíos de Chile. Santiago, Chile: Editorial Andrés Bello.
- Cohen, Martin A. 1973. The Martyr: The Story of a Secret Jew and the Mexican Inquisition in the Sixteenth Century. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America.
- Elkin, Judith Laikin. 1998. The Jews of Latin America. New York: Holmes & Meier.
- Goldemberg, Isaac. 1998. El Gran Libro de América Judía. San Juan: Editorial de la Universidad de Puerto Rico.
- Lockhart, Darrell B. 1997. Jewish Writers of Latin America: A Dictionary. New York: Garland Press.
- Scliar, Moacyr. "Reclaiming the text—or reclaiming voices?" The National Foundation for Jewish Culture, http://www2.jewishculture.org/publications/wtjf/publications\_wtjf\_scliar.html (accessed June 17, 2006).

Senkman, Leonardo. 1983. La Identidad Judia en la Literatura Argentina. Buenos Aires, Argentina: Editorial Pardes.

Sosnowski, Saúl. 1987. La Orilla Inminente. Buenos Aires, Argentina: Editorial Legasa.

Jewish Identity in Latin American Jewish Cinema

Darrell B. Lockhart

---

The historical and geographical vastness of the Jewish Diaspora in Latin America is well represented in cinema. Early manifestations of specifically Jewish themes in the cinema of Latin America emerged in the mid-1970s and continued through the 1980s with the production of a limited number of films. From the mid-1990s to the present there has been a small boom in Latin American Jewish cinema. Argentina, which is home to the largest Jewish population in Latin America, has produced a significant number of films that directly address issues of identity and sociohistorical reality for Jews. Likewise, there is a considerable quantity of films that deal with Jewish topics from other Latin American countries. As a whole, Latin American Jewish cinema takes up subject matter as diverse as the persecution of Jews by the Spanish Inquisition in the colonial era, immigration, Jewish prostitution, the Holocaust, and contemporary life for Jews in Latin American nations. Moreover, it tells the stories of Sephardic and Ashkenazic communities through a variety of cinematic genres, from documentary films to those based on historical events, literary works, or fictional scripts.

One of the first films in Latin America to focus on a specifically Jewish topic is the 1974 film El Santo Oficio (The Holy Office of the Inquisition) by Mexican director Arturo Ripstein, one of Mexico's most renowned directors. The film, based on historical fact, retells the persecution of the Carvajal family in 16th-century Mexico by the Spanish Inquisition. Betrayed by a family member and arrested for being Judaizers (those who secretly practice Judaism), the family is tortured and most of the members are burned at the stake in a public auto-da-fé in 1596. The most famous member of the family, Luis de Carvajal, el mozo (1567–1596), provided one of the first literary testimonies of Jewish life in Latin America in his memoirs, the letters addressed to family members he wrote during their imprisonment, and other documents. A second historical film that recalls the colonial era and the Inquisition is O Judeu (The Jew). The 1996 film by Brazilian director Jom Tob Azulay tells the story of Antônio José da Silva (1705–1739), who was born in Brazil and as a young boy was sent to Portugal along with his family under suspicion of being Judaizers. He was repeatedly harassed by the Inquisition, but in spite of that he became one of the most famous playwrights in 18th-century Portugal. Ultimately, his lifelong persecution by the authorities led to his death in an auto-da-fé in 1739.

Although the earliest stories of the Jewish presence in Latin America date back to the period of the European encounter with the Americas and colonial times, the contemporary history of Jewish communities begins in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. Jewish immigration to Argentina took place on a massive scale beginning in the late 19th century, due largely to the formation of the Jewish Colonization Association (JCA), which was founded in 1891 and funded by the railroad magnate and philanthropist Baron Maurice de Hirsch (Elkin 1998, 105–120). Under the auspices of the JCA Jews arrived by the thousands in Argentina and settled in agricultural colonies. This experience was made famous by the Argentine writer Alberto Gerchunoff (1884–1950) in his 1910 book Los Gauchos Judíos (The Jewish Gauchos of the Pampas), which narrates the author's memoirs of life in Moisésville, the most famous of the Jewish colonies. In 1975, the prominent film director Juan José Jusid adapted Gerchunoff's foundational text for the big screen, and although it does not adhere strictly to the original stories, it does portray the same idealized version of Jewish immigration to Argentina set forth by Gerchunoff.

More recently, a number of excellent documentary films have taken up the task of reconstructing the saga of Jewish immigration in Argentina and have done much to preserve this important component of national history. Among the most outstanding of these films is the 2004 documentary Legado (Legacy), directed by Vivián Imar and Marcelo Trotto. The film is composed almost entirely of archival film footage and is narrated mostly in Yiddish. It recovers the history of the first group of Jewish settlers who arrived in 1889 aboard the steamship Wesser and ultimately became some of the first Jewish gauchos. The film is remarkable in the way it captures the spirit of the moment through both visual and audio techniques and gives an accurate portrayal of the hardships and triumphs of the Jewish pioneers of the Pampas.

Similar to Legado, the 1996 documentary Un Beso a Esta Tierra (A Kiss to this Land), by filmmaker Daniel Goldberg, provides a glimpse into the story of Jewish immigration to Mexico in the 1920s and 1930s. Told in retrospect by aging immigrants—most of whom now reside in convalescent homes—the film retraces the immigrant experience through the voices of several individuals who share their stories with the camera. The director takes full advantage of archival footage, photographs, and personal testimonies to piece together the story of Jewish immigration to Mexico in an eloquent and affecting manner. The story of the diminishing Jewish community of Cuba is told in the brief documentary Havana Nagila: The Jews of Cuba (1995), directed by Laura Paull, which also comprises a series of interviews with members of the Cuban Jewish community in Havana. A more intimate look at Jewish Cuba is found in the 2002 documentary film Adio Kerida (Goodbye My Love), directed by Ruth Behar, a Sephardic Jew living in the United States who returns to the Cuba she left as a child in search of her family history on the island and as an exploration of Jewish identity in general.

The 1994 Mexican film Novia que te Vea (Like a Bride), directed by Guita Schyfter and based on the novel of the same title by Rosa Nissán, was both a critical and a commercial success. It was the recipient of five Ariel awards (the highest honor bestowed by the Mexican Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences) and is one of few films in Latin American Jewish cinema to represent contemporary Sephardic identity. It tells the story of two young Jewish girls, Oshi and Rifke, who are best friends growing up in Mexico City. The film does an excellent job of contrasting the differences between the Sephardic and Ashkenazic communities of the Mexican capital as well as portraying the isolation and marginalization of Jews within the dominant Hispano-Catholic society of Mexico. Issues as wide-ranging as Jewish tradition(s), Zionism, political activism, and feminism come to the fore in the film.

Several superb Latin American films treat different subjects that are simultaneously universal and unique to the Jewish Diaspora of Latin America. The often maligned topic of the trata de blancas or the Jewish white slave trade in Argentina is the central theme in the 1988 film El Camino del Sur (The Road South), directed by Juan Bautista Stagnaro. It is based on the history of countless young Jewish women who were deceived by the Zwi Migdal (a Jewish organized crime ring) into emigrating to Argentina under the false pretenses of legitimate marriages, but who were ultimately forced into prostitution upon arrival in the country. The subject of the Holocaust is powerfully articulated in the 1987 film Debajo del Mundo (Under the World), directed by Beda Docampo Feijóo, which chronicles the real-life story of a Polish family fleeing Nazi persecution and living on the brink of starvation and succumbing to the elements as they survived underground until they are able to escape to Argentina. Postwar Nazi infiltration in Argentina is dealt with in the 1986 film Pobre Mariposa (Poor Butterfly), directed by Raúl de la Torre.

Argentina is without a doubt the forerunner in the production of Jewish cinema in Latin America, especially within the period of 1994–2006. Director Daniel Burman is largely responsible for this small boom in Argentine Jewish cinema. His series of three films that deal directly with issues pertaining to the Jewish community of Buenos Aires have been groundbreaking both in stylistic and thematic terms. Esperando al Mesías (Waiting for the Messiah, 2000), El Abrazo Partido (Lost Embrace, 2004), and Derecho de Familia (Family Law, 2006), have all made a significant impact on Argentine cinema. His 2001 Siete Días en Once (Seven Days in Once) serves as documentary companion piece to his fictional films. The film traces the lives of several inhabitants of Buenos Aires's Jewish neighborhood (Once) over the course of seven days. It particularly addresses Jewish life in the Once—as do his other films—after the 1994 terrorist attack on the AMIA (Asociación Mutual Israelita Argentina, one of the major Jewish institutions of the city), which devastated the Argentine Jewish community. To commemorate the 10-year anniversary of the attack, in 2004 a group of 10 directors (including Burman) produced the film 18-J, which consists of 10 short films that deal with the terrorist attack, each of which takes on the topic from different perspectives. The title refers to July 18, 1994, the date the attack took place. The 1996 Sol de Otoño (Autumn Sun), directed by Eduardo Mignogna, was the first film to include a vision of post-AMIA Argentina, although it does not deal directly with the topic. Gabriel Lichtmann has joined the ranks of Burman as one of the most promising new directors. His Los Judíos en el Espacio, o ¿Por qué es diferente esta noche a las demás noches (Jews in Space, or Why Is This Night Different from All the Rest? 2006) is a family drama that scrutinizes issues of identity and religious belief.

Selected Bibliography

Elkin, Judith Laiken. 1998. The Jews of Latin America. New York: Holmes & Meier.

Jewish Studies as a Subject of Latin American Studies

Gilbert W. Merkkx

---

For much of the 20th century, scholars of Judaism tended to see Latin American Jews as a topic for Latin American studies, whereas scholars of Latin America tended to see Latin American Jews as a subject in Judaic studies. Although some scholarship on the Jewish experience in the region was produced by members of Jewish communities in Latin America and other parts of the Diaspora, the subject was largely absent from the mainstream discourse in Latin American studies. As a result the comprehensive guide to primary and secondary sources published by Martin Sable in 1978 drew more on sources in Hebrew, Yiddish, Spanish, Portuguese, Dutch, French, German, Italian, Hungarian, Polish, and Russian than on sources from the Latin American studies literature.

The rise of systematic research on Latin America's Jewish communities as a subject of intellectual significance began with the 1972 Experts Conference on Latin America and the Future of Its Jewish Communities, held in New York under the auspices of the Institute of Jewish Affairs. The conference was held at the end of a decade of rapid Latin American growth when the Vietnam War was drawing to a close, but the Cold War was very much alive.

Although the experts at the conference decried the lack of basic research, assertions about the issues confronting Latin American Jewry were not lacking. Among the opinions expressed were that Jewish communities of Latin America were growing and numbered nearly one million people; U.S. power in the region was shrinking in relative and absolute terms; and Latin American nationalism was a growing and impressive force. Some participants argued that the Jews were a powerful and influential force in Latin America. Others were concerned that the emergence of left-wing revolutionary violence posed a threat to Jewish communities, which were largely conservative, and these persons suggested that those communities would have to identify with the forces of revolutionary change or be left behind by history. The only participant who took strong issue with the views described was Natan Lerner, who argued that the marginality of Latin American Jewry had increased considerably over the previous decade.

In March 1982, a decade after the Experts Conference, a group of scholars attending the 1982 meetings of the Latin American Studies Association in Washington, DC, founded the Latin American Jewish Studies Association, which is dedicated to redressing the lack of attention given to the role of Jews in Latin America. At the same time, an entirely different group of scholars in Israel had begun pursuing research on Latin America from the perspective of comparative studies of world Jewry. In 1984, the University of New Mexico hosted a research conference on the Jewish experience in Latin America in Albuquerque, New Mexico, which brought together researchers from Israel, the United States, and Latin America. This event brought a new level of empirical knowledge to bear on the condition of the Jewish communities of Latin America and inspired still further research.

The research that emerged in the 1980s made it evident that many of the views expressed at the Experts Conference in 1972 were inaccurate and that the minority viewpoint Lerner expressed was essentially correct. The newer research revealed that Latin American Jews were far less numerous than was previously believed and that the survival of most Jewish communities in the region could not be taken for granted. In the decade after 1972, Latin America was dominated not by the forces of revolution but by the institutionalization of repression under military regimes. The influence of the United States did not wane; on the contrary, it seemed ever more in evidence. Nationalism as a determinant of public policy was decreasing and being replaced by economic neoliberalism. The major challenge to the survival of Jewish communities during the decade came not from revolutionary upheaval and nationalism but rather from military rule and the larger conditions of life in Latin American societies. The single exception was the case of Nicaragua, which in the 1980s had experienced a revolutionary regime.

The findings from research on the Jewish experience in Latin America offered a significant new perspective to Latin American studies, which before 1980 had tended to focus on issues of nationhood and nationalism, rather than on the experiences of minority groups. Examining the condition of Jews brought new understandings of a region marked by volatile social, economic, and political conditions. Because attitudes toward Jews served as a litmus test of civility, tolerance, and liberty of conscience, research on the experience of Jews in Latin America provided an insight into the real, as opposed to the idealized, character of societies in the Western Hemisphere.

Interest in the experiences of Jewish populations in Latin America grew rapidly in the 1980s, resulting in an exponentially growing body of research and analysis. The Latin American Jewish Studies Association grew in size and activity, hosting a continuing sequence of research conferences in subsequent years and sponsoring panels at meetings of the Latin American Studies Association.

Interest in the study of Latin American Jewry also grew in Israel, led by Professor Haim Avni and his associates at the Institute for Contemporary Jewry of the Hebrew University. This growth of interest was reinforced during the 1970s and early 1980s by a sharp rise in the rate of migration to Israel from Latin America, a migration fed by military repression, anti-Semitism, and persecution of intellectuals. After democracy was restored in most of Latin America during the 1980s, a revitalization of scholarship and debate on the Jewish experience began in Latin America itself, particularly in the important Jewish communities of Argentina, Brazil, and Uruguay.

By 1990, so much research had accumulated that Judith Laikin Elkin and Ana Lya Sater were able to compile a new annotated guide to the post-1970 literature covering hundreds of monographs, dissertations, and articles on Latin American Jewry. This material was grouped into 31 difference categories ranging from agricultural colonies to Zionism. The guide also provided an annotated list of some 220 Jewish publications from Latin America in seven U.S. archives and libraries.

Scholarship continued to proliferate. In 1995, Elkin published an essay in the Latin American Research Review covering 11 major research monographs or series of monographs published in the early 1990s. These included a seven-volume collection on the history of the Ashkenazic community of Mexico City from 1922 to 1992, as well as works on the Jewish communities of Buenos Aires, Cuba, Brazil, Suriname, colonial Mexico, and the Dutch colonies of the New World.

The semiannual publication of the Latin American Jewish Studies Association, Latin American Jewish Studies, includes reviews of recent scholarship and current bibliography. The association's Web site also provides access to several bibliographies covering the periods 1991–1996, 1997–1998, 1999–2000, and 2001–2004. These four bibliographies provide impressive evidence of the research productivity of Latin American Jewish studies. Over the entire period 1991–2004, 813 scholarly works are listed, which amounts to an average of 70 new books, monographs, and articles per year.

The Latin American Jewish Studies Association (LAJSA) remains the central organization for scholars in the Western Hemisphere who carry out research on the Jewish experience in Latin American and the Caribbean. After a quarter-century of existence, LAJSA's viability is unquestioned. The activities of the scholars whose work is chronicled in LAJSA's publications and bibliographies has established Latin American Jewish Studies as an important subfield of Latin American studies and, increasingly, of Jewish studies. Perhaps more important, LAJSA has created an intellectual community that spans the Western Hemisphere and Israel. The vacuum of research on Latin American Jewry that was decried at the Experts Conference of 1972 no longer exists.

Selected Bibliography

- Elkin, Judith Laikin, and Ana Lya Sater. 1990. Latin American Jewish Studies: An Annotated Guide to the Literature. New York: Greenwood Press.
- Proceedings of the Experts Conference on Latin America and the Future of Its Jewish Communities*. 1973. London: Institute of Jewish Affairs.
- Sable, Martin H. 1978. Latin American Jewry: A Research Guide. Cincinnati: Hebrew Union College.

Latin American Jewish Literature

Stephen A. Sadow

---

The Jews of Latin America live in a vast territory. They have a presence—sometimes substantial, sometimes minimal—in every Latin American country, a territory stretching from the Rio Grande and the Caribbean islands to Chilean Patagonia. Approximately 500,000 Jews live in Latin America, but this number is misleading. In reality, the Jewish population is fractured: there are about 200,000 Argentines, 110,000 Brazilians, 42,000 Mexicans, 22,000 Uruguayans, 22,000 Chileans, 16,000 Venezuelans, 3,000 Peruvian, and 3,000 Costa Ricans. Only 120 Jews live in El Salvador. For historical and geographical reasons, these Jewish communities are isolated from each other and differ in profound ways. Whereas Mexican Jews have tried to isolate themselves from the surrounding population, Argentine Jews have aggressively tried to join it. International organizations like the World Jewish Congress and the Joint Distribution Committee are in contact with Jewish communities in all Latin American countries.

Fleeing the Spanish and Portuguese Inquisitions, the first people of Jewish descent to arrive in the Americas in the 16th century were conversos (converts to Catholicism) or Marranos (Jews who carefully hid their Judaism). They were not in a position to produce literary works with Jewish content. In the 19th century, German-Jewish fortune seekers in Peru failed to produce any significant literature. In 1910, Jewish Latin American literature began in earnest with the publication in Argentina of Alberto Gerchunoff's Los Gauchos Judíos (The Jewish Gauchos of the Pampas), a collection of interrelated stories that rhapsodized the Jewish agricultural experiments on the dry Argentinean plains. In this work, Gerchunoff made it clear that Argentina, in spite of a harsh climate and occasional difficulties with non-Jews, was a fitting place for Jewish settlement.

Thereafter, Jewish writers in Latin America tended to meld Jewish culture with that of the country in which they live. With some exceptions, the preoccupations of Mexican Jewish writers differ from, say, those of the Argentineans or the Brazilians. Moreover, writers of Ashkenazi background emphasize different aspects of Judaism that do those whose heritage is Sephardic. Rather than inhibiting literary creation, these cross-cutting tensions are part of an extensive literature (or literatures) that include hundreds of authors and thousands of novels, short story collections, dramas and screenplays, and books of poetry. Although the first literature was written in Yiddish, Jewish writers in Latin America quickly shifted to Spanish and Portuguese.

Some personal experiences, though, are shared by virtually all Jewish Latin American writers, and these experiences are reflected in the literature. All have encountered anti-Semitism, sometimes in its most virulent forms. Most have lived for years under totalitarian regimes with anti-Jewish biases. The unsolved bombings of the Israeli embassy and the AMIA center in Buenos Aires left Jews with a perpetual sense of injustice and ongoing unease. On the other hand, the great majority of Jewish Latin American writers have had some formal Jewish education, ranging from that offered by religious day schools to cultural programs found at secular community centers. Because of the large aliyah (immigration) from Latin American countries, there are strong ties between Latin American writers and Israelis. Many writers are (or were) affiliated with Zionist groups; many have studied in Israel, lived there for a time, or visited frequently.

Thematically, identity and memory, spirituality, anti-Semitism, Israel, and, conversely, the pride of being Jewish, are dominant. Most pervasive are the issues of self- and community identity. In other words, how is it possible to be a Jewish citizen of a predominately Catholic Latin American country? The intensity of the issue varies from one country to another, but it is present in writings from all over Latin America. Many Jewish Argentinean writers have pondered whether it is even possible to be Argentinean and Jewish. In their literature, memories, real or fabricated, are the tools that help them find their individual and communal identity. Ricardo Feierstein has devoted a five novel saga to Argentinean Jewish identity. As David Schneiderman, the protagonist of Feierstein's Mestizo, tries to recover from stress-caused amnesia, he remembers not only his own past but also that of his forebearers in Europe. Ana María Shua reifies an extended Jewish family in Libro de las Memorias (The Book of Memories). The early Jewish colonization of the pampas is such a popular topic that many novels and short stories have been and continue to be written about it, as if their writers were boasting about Jewish roots in the Argentinean soil. Isaías Kremer has written dozens of stories about what it was like to live on the land. In a trilogy of novels, Susana Gertopan recreates immigrant family life in Asunción, Paraguay. In an autobiographical essay, Ilan Stavans describes the difficulties of growing up Jewish in Mexico City. In Caracas, Venezuela, Jacqueline Goldberg writes poetry about her identity as Jewish woman. Writing from Porto Alegre in southern Brazil, Moacyr Scliar has written what may be the ultimate Jewish identity novel. His O Centauro no Jardim (The Centaur in the Garden) is about a being who is half horse and half Jewish, a true hybrid. He must first come to terms with his divided self. Through surgeries, leg braces, and a centaur girlfriend who is not Jewish, he gradually sheds the horse part of his body and mind.

Moacyr Scliar, the Jewish Brazilian author, in 1989. (Beto Scliar)

In Mexico, Uruguay, and Argentina, literature dealing with the Sephardic experience in Latin America has begun to emerge. Argentinean Marcos Aguinis's masterwork, La Gesta del Marrano (The Marrano's Defiance), is a novel about a Jew who dies, refusing to renounce his beliefs before the Inquisition. Mexican Alberto Buzali writes disturbing short stories about the Inquisition in Mexico. Modern Sephardic is described in the fiction of Teresa Porzecanski, who focuses on Jews who came to Uruguay from Aleppo, Syria. Regina Kalach Atri of Mexico and Luis León of Argentina write in a style reminiscent of old Sephardic tales. The contemporary Sephardic community in Mexico is described lovingly by Rosa Nissán and with a combination of sarcasm and affection by Ivonne Saed.

More than elsewhere in Latin America, Jewish literature in Mexico has been concerned with spirituality, mysticism, and exile. Angelina Muñoz-Huberman, after discovering her own Marrano heritage, converted to Judaism and became a scholar of Jewish mysticism. Her output as a poet and novelist has been massive; she explores Kabbalah, feelings of exile, and Sephardic history from the Middle Ages to the present. Mysticism also imbues the writing of Ethel Kreuse and Esther Seligson, a Mexican novelist now living in Israel. The poet Gloria Gervitz wrestles with ancient Jewish questions. In Argentina, César Tiempo wrote many poems about the simple, direct faith of the working-class Jews of Buenos Aires. A native of Peru, Isaac Goldemberg's poetry expresses syncretism in which Jewish, Catholic, and indigenous ways of thinking seem to melt together.

The Holocaust is a pervasive theme in all of Latin American Jewish literature. Before World War II, many Jews arrived in Costa Rica, Bolivia, or anywhere else that would take them. After the war, survivors entered Argentina illegally; others went to Brazil, Uruguay, and Mexico and numerous other countries. Virtually all of these refugees had lost relatives in the Holocaust.

Born in Chile and now living in the United States, Marjorie Agosín wrote a book of letters in the form of poems to Anne Frank. The Argentinean poet Susana Grimberg has composed a cycle of poems based on Anne Frank's life. The Cuban poet José Kozer wrote poignant meditations on the Holocaust. Adina Darvasi, a Chilean who made aliyah to Israel, wrote a novel about the Chilean consul in Europe who saved her mother and many others. The Brazilian Roney Cytrynowicz produced a masterful short story about a man who survives the death camps by working as a sonderkommando, carrying the dead to the crematoriums, and who, in Brazil, became a doll maker, so that he could bring pleasure to little girls.

Similarly, the chronic anti-Semitism that has been omnipresent in Latin America since the Inquisition is a repeated theme in Jewish Latin American literature. From an expressionist perspective, Isaac Goldemberg has written novels and plays about the everyday antagonisms of the fictional town of San Sebastián. Marjorie Agosín (Chile/United States), Silvia Plager (Argentina), and Ariel Dorfman (Chile/United States) write of Nazis and fellow travelers in Chile.

Israel, both as a symbol and as a country, in and of itself, is an important theme in Latin American Jewish writing. Miryam Gover de Nasatsky fictionalized three crucial years of Theodor Herzl's life. Ricardo Feierstein's novel El Caramelo Descompuesto takes place in a kibbutz in Galilee. Enrique Amster's novel Marcela y Judith describes the dilemma of a woman torn between her commitment to Israel and her deep roots in Argentina. At the novel's end, she has left her Israeli lover and returned to her estranged husband in Buenos Aires. From the small Uruguayan city of Artigas, Raúl Hecht writes poignant poems for his daughter and grandson, now living in Israel. A group of Argentinean-born Israelis, José Pivín, José Luis Najenson, and Elías Scherbacovsky continue to write poems, short stories, and novels in Spanish. In his poetry, Pivín eloquently compares Israel with his native Santa Fe province.

Nevertheless, Jewish Latin American literature is not always so serious. A vibrant celebration of being Jewish and practicing Jewish holidays and rituals acts as a strong counterpoint. Much poetry is dedicated to the major Jewish holidays and ceremonies such as bar mitzvahs and weddings. The stories of Ilan Stavans and Sandro Cohen show the humorous and fanciful side of Jewish Mexican writing. The Peruvian José Adolph writes stories filled with exaggeration and often surprising distortion. From Brazil, Moacyr Scliar's short stories are often structured as jokes or games. In his early novels, Scliar displays the foibles and wisdom of the residents of Bom Fim, a neighborhood filled with droll characters and odd relationships—a bit of the “old county” in a corner of Brazil. In the tradition of Isaac Bashevis Singer, Marcelo Birmajer, in numerous novels and short stories, describes and dissects life in the predominantly Jewish Once neighborhood of Buenos Aires. Argentine novelist Paula Margules also pokes fun at Jewish foibles. First in Argentina, and later in France, poet and short story writer Saúl Yukiévich engaged in intricate word play in which form and sound are often more important than content. What is not present in this literature is the denigration of Jews or Jewish ways. Even self-deprecation is rare. The biting criticism of Philip Roth and the whining of Woody Allen are for the most part absent in these writings. Perhaps because so many writers identify heavily with Jewish culture and perhaps because they do not want to show readers from the majority culture a negative picture of Jewish life, until very recently, Jews have rarely been described in unflattering ways in this literature. Samuel Rovinski's stories show the Jews of Costa Rica as hard-working and loyal citizens. The Venezuelan Isaac Chacrón's characters tend to be aggressive and streetwise, but likable. In fact, in Feierstein's novels, the Jewish characters always win the brawls and street fights and defeat those who attack their European shtetls or, later, their Latin American neighborhoods

There are, of course, many committed Jewish Latin American writers who do not write about Jewish themes, but who prefer to write through a “Jewish perspective” or who believe their Judaism affects their way of thinking and hence their way of writing. Alicia Borinsky, born in Argentina, writes poems that are disjointed, puzzling, and profound. In Uruguay, Julia Galemire and Evelyn Kliman touch on Jewish themes but generally write poetry that is highly personal and carefully constructed.

Jewish Latin American literature is a mature literature both in the questions it asks and the answers it provides its readers. It has world-class writers who win important prizes and praise from the critics in their countries, neophytes whose work is tentative and surprising—and everything in between. Jewish Latin American literature constitutes a major contribution not only to Jewish literature but also to the literatures of the many countries in which it is written and, most important, to world literature.

Selected Bibliography

- Barr, Lois Baer. 1996. "The Jonah Experience: The Jews of Brazil According to Scliar." In The Jewish Diaspora in Latin America, edited by David Sheinin and Lois Baer Barr, 33–52. New York: Garland.
- Berman, Sabina. 1998. Bubbeh. Translated by Andrea G. Labinger. Pittsburgh: Latin American Literary Review Press.
- Borinsky, Alicia. 2002. All Night Movie. Chicago: Northwestern University Press.
- Cohen, Sara. 2000. Puertas de Paris. Buenos Aires: Emece, 70.
- Friedman, Edward H. 1996. "Theory in the Margin: Latin American Literature and the Jewish Subject." In The Jewish Diaspora in Latin America, edited by David Sheinin and Lois Baer Barr, 21–32. New York: Garland.
- Futoransky, Luisa. 1997. The Duration of the Voyage/La Duracion del Viaje. Selected Poems. Bilingual edition. Edited and translated by Jason Weiss. San Diego: Junction Press.
- Gardiol, Rita, ed. and trans. 1997. The Silver Candelabra & Other Stories: A Century of Jewish Argentine Writers. Pittsburgh: Latin American Literary Review Press.
- Glickman, Nora. 1996. "Discovering Self in History: Aída Bortnik and Gerardo Mario Goloboff." In The Jewish Diaspora in Latin America, edited by David Sheinin and Lois Baer Barr, 61–74. New York: Garland Publishing
- Lindstrom, Naomi. 1997. "The Role of Jewish Editors in Argentine Publishing, 1920–1940." AMILAT. Judaica Latinoamericana 3: 371–83.
- Vieira, Nelson H. 1996. "Outsiders and Insiders: Brazilian Jews and the Discourse of Alterity." In The Jewish Diaspora in Latin America, edited by David Sheinin and Lois Baer Barr, 101–116. New York: Garland.

Jews in Argentina

M. Avrum Ehrlich

---

General Population: 39,537,943

Jewish Population: Estimates range from 210,000 (American Jewish Committee) to 395,379 (World Jewish Congress).

Percent of Population: Approximately 1 percent

Jewish Population by City: Buenos Aires, 165,000; Cordobam, 10,000; Rosario, 9,000; Santa Fe, 5,000; small towns and rural areas, 21,000

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Spanish conversos, French immigrants in mid-1800s, Russian immigrants in late 1900s, the Syrian community, and Eastern European immigrants contributed to the Jewish population. Most were Ashkenazi, but about 15 percent were Sephardic.

Languages Spoken: Nearly all speak Spanish. Ladino and Yiddish are rarely spoken.

---

Historical Overview

1492 Conversos settle in Argentina after the expulsion from Spain. Most assimilate into the general population and by the mid-1800s, few Jews are left in Argentina.

- 1810 Argentina gains independence from Spain. Its first president, Bernardino Rivadavia, promotes freedom of immigration and respect for human rights and officially abolishes the Inquisition.
- Mid-1800s Jewish immigration begins in the mid-19th century with Jewish immigrants arriving from Western Europe, especially from France.
- 1860s A minyan meets for the High Holiday services and forms Congregacion Israelita de la Republica.
- 1889 Russian Jews numbering 824 arrive in Argentina on the S.S. Weser and buy land and establish a colony, which they name Moiseville; they become Argentine gauchos (cowboys).
- 1890s Immigrants fleeing poverty and pogroms in Russia and other Eastern Europe countries move to Argentina. These Jews become known as "Rusos" and become active in Argentinian society.
- 1900s Baron Maurice de Hirsch Baron founds the Jewish Colonization Association, which owns more than 600,000 hectares of land, populated by more than 200,000 Jews.
- 1906–1912 Jewish immigration increases at a rate of 13,000 immigrants per year. Most immigrants are Ashkenazi Jews from Europe, but some are Sephardic Jews from Morocco and the Ottoman Empire.
- 1918–1930 Antirevolutionary feelings develop into anti-Semitic acts.
- 1919 A general strike in Buenos Aires leads to a pogrom, beatings, and looting; rioters burn property belonging to Jews.
- 1920 More than 150,000 Jews are living in Argentina.
- 1927 Rabbi David Setton issues an edict against marriage to converts because of the deteriorating observance in the community of Buenos Aires.
- 1946 Juan Peron, a Nazi sympathizer with fascist leanings, rises to power.
- 1947 Peron halts Jewish immigration to Argentina and allows Argentina to become a haven for fleeing Nazis. He introduces compulsory Catholic religious instruction in public schools.
- 1949 Peron establishes diplomatic relations with Israel.
- 1955 Peron is overthrown, and this is followed by a wave of anti-Semitism.
- 1960 Adolf Eichmann is abducted from Buenos Aires to serve trial in Israel for Holocaust crimes.
- 1961 The Eichmann trial in Jerusalem arouses anti-Jewish sentiment in Argentina.
- 1976–1983 Under military rule, Jews are targeted for kidnapping and torture by the ruling junta; about 1,000 of the 9,000 known victims of state terrorism are Jews. It is alleged that the Israeli government had an agreement with the Argentine government to allow Jews arrested for political crimes to emigrate to Israel.
- 1983 Raul Alfonsin is democratically elected president. The Jewish population supports him and many Jews are appointed to high positions.
- 1988 President Menem helps pass a law against racism and anti-Semitism and orders the release of files relating to Argentina's role as a haven for Nazi war criminals.
- 1989 Carlos Saul Menem is elected president; despite his Arab origins he appoints many Jews to his government, visits Israel a number of times, and offers to help mediate the Israeli–Arab peace process.

- 1992 Attacks on the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires kill 32.
- 1992–present All communal institutions are protected by armed guards.
- 1994 The Buenos Aires Cemetery is vandalized. Bronze objects are stolen from more than 150 graves.
- 1994 Blasts at the Asociación Mutual Israelita Argentina (AMIA) blasts kill 87 and wound 100, including many communal leaders, and destroy the community archives.
- 2001 In December, economic riots cause the looting of many Jewish businesses in downtown Buenos Aires.
- January 6, 2002 Stones are thrown into the Berazategui Jewish cemetery in the Quilmes section of Buenos Aires, damaging gravestones.
- January 7, 2002 Stones are thrown at the Maccabi Sports Club in the San Miguel section of Buenos Aires, damaging cars.
- January 28, 2002 Swastikas are found painted on the building of the Holocaust Studies Foundation in Mendoza.
- 2005 An Argentine prosecutor says the AMIA bombing was carried out by a 21-year-old Lebanese suicide bomber who belonged to Hezbollah.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Former generations included gaucho cowboys in the Argentinean cattle country, then farmers, peddlers, artisans, family business owners; and shopkeepers, pharmacists, furriers, and middle-class businessmen. Argentinean Jews were one of the nation's most affluent Jewish communities. Jews have held a large stake in the country's fur, textile, chemical, electronics, auto, and banking industries. Both Banco Mercantile and Banco Comercial were founded by Jews.

The modern Jewish community focused on higher education and professions. Jews became involved in most sectors of Argentine society. Still they were unable to gain high ranks in the military, foreign ministry, and judiciary.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Cultural and religious organizations have flourished. Several cities have Jewish social clubs, Sociedad Hebraica for Ashkenazi Jews and Casa Sephardi for Sephardic Jews. The Maccabi Sport Federation is also active in Argentina. One of the world's four remaining Yiddish daily newspapers and theaters opened in Buenos Aires. Plays are performed in Yiddish, Spanish, and Hebrew in a number of Jewish theaters.

Jews are active in all sectors of Argentine society. Jews are prominent in the arts, film, music, and journalism, including writer Jacobo Timmerman, owner of a local newspaper who campaigned for human rights; Rene Epelbaum, who founded a protest group for mothers of political prisoners; pianist Daniel Barenboim; and Cesar Milstein, the 1984 Nobel Prize recipient in medicine.

Present Economic Conditions

Argentina was once one of the most successful Jewish communities. Some cannot believe its economic condition is presently so dire and believe the response from world Jewry is a test of its ability to survive future turmoil.

Because of the relatively high socioeconomic standing of the Jewish community, Argentinean Jews were also the first victims of the country's declining economy and a test case of new governmental economic policies. Since 2001, 10 percent of the community was beneath the poverty line ($12,000 a year for a family of four). Welfare cases were estimated at 25,000. The average old-age pension is $150 per month, although an individual needs an estimated $400 per month to survive. At least 1,700 Jewish families have lost their homes to creditors. Jews continue working into their 70s to earn a living existence. More than 4,500 Jewish pupils have dropped out of the country's Jewish school system. In 2005, approximately 20,000 people attended communal dinners on Rosh Hashanah at Jewish institutions throughout the country. Over 60,000 people have come to various community-based celebrations. Because of economic decline, Jewish institutional networks have been in disarray and institutions have lost membership and contributions. Pride, denial of the situation, and social embarrassment cause considerable outflow of communal association.

Well-educated young people cannot find jobs, but groups in Argentina are trying to eradicate this problem. In 1998, Banco Patricios collapsed, taking with it millions of Jewish dollars. The Banco Mayo also failed to help the situation as it, too, went bankrupt in 1999. Many once-wealthy Jewish organizations are now unable to give funding to charity groups. Some believe the Jewish leadership in Argentina is incompetent and corrupt. They also claim that the two Jewish-run banks that went bankrupt were linked closely to a corrupt government and mishandled the community's money, losing $26 million in communal assets overnight.

Religious Denominations

Buenos Aires has 50 Orthodox synagogues, 21 Conservative synagogues, and a few Reform synagogues. The level of religious observance lies between Conservative and Orthodox. Most of the synagogues were built before World War II and are still in use.

The Argentine branch of the Jewish Theological Seminary, the Conservative movement's rabbinical school, opened in 1962 in Buenos Aires. It trains Conservative rabbis from all over Argentina and Latin America. In 1992, the first woman was ordained by the seminary. The seminary acts as a center for interfaith dialogue, hosts a high school and a graduate school, and offers adult education lessons and seminars for the community.

Jewish Education and Communal Institutions

Much of Buenos Aires Jewish life centers around the Once district, where the Yesod Hadat synagogue was founded in 1932 by Jews from Aleppo, Syria. Others include Libertad, Argentina's oldest synagogue, and Congregacion Israelita de la Republica Argentina and its Jewish cultural center, which hosts concerts, lectures, and a high school. Founded in 1932, it houses a small Jewish museum, which has a collection of photographs and Jewish ritual objects. Other Jewish clubs include Hacoaj and CASA Sefardita, which have a range of sports and cultural activities.

Argentina has more than 70 Jewish educational institutions, including kindergartens, day schools, elementary and secondary schools. More than 60 percent of Jewish Argentine youth attend one of these institutions. In Buenos Aires alone, 17,000 Jewish children study in the Jewish educational system. There are 18 Jewish cemeteries in Argentina, seven are still in use.

Major organizations include the following:

- The DAIA (Delegacion de Asociaciones Israelitas Argentinas), founded in 1939 as the political arm of the Jewish community, protects Jewish rights and represents the community in the government.
- AMIA, originally an Ashkenazic mutual-aid society that provided health and human services to Argentina's Ashkenazi population, now serves the country's entire Jewish community. It is trying to pay off a $26 million debt.
- Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society (HIAS) has created several new programs to aid the community, including the HIAS Employment Visa Programs and New Online Job Bank to Assist Argentine Jews. HIAS also supports Jewish communities around the globe that wish to provide resettlement assistance to Argentine Jews during this unprecedented crisis.
- Chabad-Lubavitch, an international religious movement with local members offers religious and social services in seven main cities with approximately 15 centers in all, catering to the Jewish population according to its populations, with services such as synagogues, festival and Shabbat meals and activities, early childhood and preschool centers, heder schools, day schools, religious studies schools (metivta), yeshiva (religious boys' seminary), teachers' seminary, adult education classes, women's groups, libraries, day camps, summer and winter camps, teen clubs, mikvah, judaica shops, circumcision services, chevra kadisha funeral services, kosher meal planning, soup kitchens and food package distribution, drug rehabilitation and drug prevention centers, prison visitation, employment services, and medical services.
- World ORT (Russia-based Society for Trades and Agricultural Labour), ORT Argentina operates two burgeoning high schools, and 80 percent of Jewish high school students attend these schools.

Other institutions active in Argentina include the following:

- American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee
- Latin American Jewish Congress
- United Jewish Communities Argentinean Jewish relief
- Jewish Federations of North America
- Tzedaka Foundation
- The Federation of Jewish Community Centers of Argentina
- Israelite Congregation of Argentina

Demographic Movement and Emigration

The Jewish community is not growing, and many are immigrating to other countries. Since 1949 more than 45,000 Jews have immigrated to Israel from Argentina. The economic situation has caused about 10,000 Jews to leave Argentina in the past few years. About 6,000 immigrated to Israel. Other ports of immigration include Spanish-speaking countries or cities such as Miami, Florida. Some wish to come to the United States, Canada, or Australia. Long lines are reported at visa sections of several European consulates. Although poor, these immigrants are highly educated and skilled. A mass exodus of half of population in a decade is anticipated. After 9/11, immigration to the United States became more difficult, and Israel, with incentive packages including a grant of $2,500 per family and a heavily subsidized mortgage offered by Zionist organizations, became the easiest, more-attractive option for immigration.

Selected Bibliography

- "The Americas/Argentina." 2007. American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee Web site. http://www.jdc.org/p\_amer\_arg\_current.html (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Beker, Avi, ed. 1998. Jewish Communities of the World. Minneapolis: Lerner.
- "Chabad-Lubivitch Centers in 'Argentina.'" Chabad.org Web site. <http://www.chabad.org/centers/default.asp?country=Argentina> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Gerchunoff, Alberto. 1998. The Jewish Gauchos of the Pampas. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press.
- Jewish Federation Greater Vancouver Web site. http://www.jfgv.com/content\_display.html?ArticleID=126985 (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Jordan, Michael J. "Argentine Jews Tell of Misery, Ask Americans to Come to Aid." Jewish Federation of Greater Washington Web site. http://www.shalomdc.org/content\_display.html?ArticleID=71703 (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Lipman, Steve. 2001. "Argentine Jews Have Bags Packed." The Jewish Week. The Jewish Agency for Israel Web site. <http://www.jewishagency.org/JewishAgency/English/Home/About/Press+Room/Jewish+Agency+In+The+News/2001/jwdec28.htm+3.htm> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Tigay, Alan M., ed. 1994. The Jewish Traveler. Northvale, NJ: Jason Aronson.
- Weiner, Rebecca. "The Virtual Jewish History Tour: Argentina." Jewish Virtual Library Argentina. <http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsourc/vjw/Argentina.html> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Weisbrot, Robert. 1979. The Jews of Argentina from the Inquisition to Peron. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society.
- Zaidner, Michael, ed. 2000. "World Jewish Communities: Latin America: Argentina." In Jewish Travel Guide 2000. Portland, OR: Vallentine Mitchell.

Jews in Brazil

Jeffrey Lesser

General Population: 186,112,794

Jewish Population: 110,000

Percent of Population: 0.081 percent

Jewish Population by City: São Paulo, 60,000; Rio de Janeiro, 25,000–30,000; Porto Alegre, 10,000–12,000; Belo Horizonte, 5,000; Curitiba, 3,000; Santos, 1,500; Salvador, 1,000; Recife, 1,000

Historical Overview

16th century Although there is an important 16th-century Jewish presence in Brazil as a result of Portuguese colonial expansion, it would be inappropriate to characterize a “community” in the contemporary academic sense of the word. The Inquisition forces much Jewish practice underground and many of those characterized as “Jews” by Portuguese government officials and church leaders are actually the descendants of converted New Christians who had migrated to Brazil. Variouslly called Judaizantes, Marranos, conversos, and Cristãos Novos (New Christians), they move to Brazil in small numbers to escape the economic, social, and religious persecution of the Catholic Church and Portuguese Crown. Their presence, however, never encourages large-scale Jewish immigration to colonial Brazil, even though people defined as New Christians may make up as much as 20 percent of the white population of the colonial capital of Salvador, Bahia.

1630 The Dutch invade the Pernambuco region of northern Brazil. For some 30 years, most notably in the city of Recife, Jewish practice is permitted openly.

1654 After the Portuguese expel the Dutch, some practicing Jews become crypto-Jews, others move to Holland, and still others migrate to cities in the Portuguese Americas, notably Curaçao and New Amsterdam.

1824 Brazil’s gains independence and the official persecution of Jews begins. In the new empire, the Catholic Church remains established and non-Catholics are not permitted public exercise of their faith.

1872 Although the Brazilian census of this year records no Jewish inhabitants in Brazil, perhaps 2,000 Jews did settle in the empire as part of a general European migration to Brazil. These Jews make significant social and economic progress in the capital of Rio de Janeiro and form some communal institutions.

1881 The first formal proposal for planned Jewish colonization to Brazil is laid out but never acted on. At the end of the 19th century, Brazil’s Jewish population is small; it officially consists of only 300 people but the number is somewhat closer to 3,000.

Most Jews in late 19th-century Brazil are descendants of Ladino-speaking Sephardic North Africans (Maghribi). The Spanish-Moroccan War (1859–1860) may have been the catalyst for emigration, but many migrate to the Amazon region to participate in the emerging rubber economy of the early to mid-19th century. Most Moroccan Jews settle in Belém do Pará, although a smaller group goes to Rio de Janeiro. Many are multilingual—Arabic and Spanish are used for business, French and Hebrew are studied at the Alliance Israélite Universelle schools, and Haqitit (a Ladino dialect spoken in Morocco) is spoken at home—and this gave them a transnational perspective.

- 1890 More than 1,000 Maghribi Jews migrate to the state of Pará, at the mouth of the Amazon. They settle in small towns where they trade clothes, medicine, tobacco, and cachaca (a sugar cane-based liquor) for fish, Brazil nuts, rubber, and copaiba oil. Prosperity, however, is only one of the Amazon's attractions for Morocco's Jews: they soon discover they can easily obtain Brazilian naturalization certificates. Becoming Brazilian means the ability to return to Morocco with the sense of security a Brazilian passport would provide. In the late 19th and early 20th centuries, few European Jews go to Brazil as more desirable locations, such as the United States and Canada, have no barriers to Jewish entry.
- 1891 The Baron Maurice de Hirsch founds the Jewish Colonization Association (Idische kolonizatsye gezelschaft, IKA or ICA) with the specific purpose of aiding poverty-stricken East European and Balkan Jewry by establishing Jewish farming colonies in the Americas.
- 1901 The ICA begins to investigate expansion into the Brazilian state of Rio Grande do Sul because of its proximity to Argentina (where the ICA already has colonies) and that state government's desire for new colonists from Europe.
- 1904–1924 The ICA forms two Jewish agricultural colonies in Rio Grande do Sul. The East European Jewish colonists never amount to more than a few thousand people yet they are critical to orienting Jewish migration toward Brazil. This occurs for a number of reasons. First, the association enjoys the diplomatic support of a British government committed to ensuring emigrating East European Jewry will resettle outside the United Kingdom. Thus, in times of crisis, the Rio Grande do Sul government often finds the Jewish colonies represented by influential English diplomats. Furthermore, some of the ICA's directors are heavy investors in the Brazilian economy. Thus, the ICA provides legitimate refugee relief even while representing foreign interests in Brazil. As a result, a particularly strong relationship develops between the ICA and the Rio Grande do Sul government, which is interested in subsidizing and sponsoring agricultural colonization and encouraging foreign investment.
- 1913–1914 The pattern of immigration to Brazil, both general and Jewish, changes with the violence and dislocation of World War I. The number of migrants entering Brazil's ports falls by more than 50 percent and by another 60 percent the year after.
- 1918 Fewer than 20,000 immigrants enter Brazil, a low that is not be approached again until 1936. With the end of World War I, large numbers of people resume their migration in part because Brazil does not respond to its local nationalist movements with immigration quotas (as was the case in the United States and Argentina, among others). Between 1918 and 1919, the number of arrivals to Brazil's ports almost doubles, and in 1920 almost doubles again, reaching 69,000. These postwar immigrants differ from the prewar group in national origin and in their view of success and opportunity. Although Portuguese, Italian, Spanish, and German immigrants continue to predominate, two new groups enter in growing numbers: Japanese and Eastern Europeans.

1920 Jews make up about 45–50 percent of those immigrants arriving in Brazil from Eastern Europe. The upheavals created by the establishment of the new state of Poland encourage this emigration as do restrictive quotas in the United States, Argentina, and Canada.

1924–1934 East European immigration to Brazil increases almost 10 times. Like all Eastern Europeans, Jews reevaluate Brazil's potential as a country of resettlement as the economy seems increasingly prosperous in the face of a shift toward industrial development after World War I. By the mid-1920s, more than 10 percent of the Jews emigrating from Europe choose Brazil as their destination, and by the early 1930s the Jewish population of Brazil approaches 60,000. The Eastern European Jews who arrive in Brazil after World War I and the Russian Revolution settle primarily in the states of São Paulo, Rio Grande do Sul, and Rio de Janeiro and achieve a level of economic success matched by only a few other immigrant groups in Brazil, such as those from the Middle East and Japan. Jews, unlike most other immigrant groups to Brazil, rely on international relief organizations and new arrivals settle where aid is most available, generally in cities. This urban placement provides economic opportunities that are not available in rural Brazil. The ability to quickly earn an income, combined with the communal and ethnic-based nature of the immigration process leads Jewish immigrants into establishing burial societies, youth groups, schools, and synagogues. With the establishment of institutions, Jewish families are more likely to invest their time and capital in a Brazilian future.

In the 1920s and 1930s, an ever-increasing match between Eastern European economic skills and the demands of the Brazilian economy for commercial and industrial activity help Jews rise to positions of economic security, especially via peddling, textiles production, and sales. Between 1920 and 1930, about 30,000 Jews immigrate to Brazil, making it the third most important receiving country in the Americas after the United States and Argentina. In one five-year period almost 13 percent of all Jews leaving their countries of origin go to Brazil. These immigrants, for the most part, actively maintain many aspects of their premigration culture and are an extremely visible "other" in the mélange of immigrants who inhabit Brazil. The combination of economic success and cultural difference makes Jews particular targets of nativists after the Great Depression.

1934 Immigration quotas are established via a new constitution, and criticism of Jewish immigration becomes a regular component of political discourse. As popular and political nationalism grow, Jews find themselves singled out for negative treatment by the Brazilian government.

1935 Brazil begins to deny visas to Jews. The existence of Nazi ideology at the time makes anti-Semitism respectable throughout the Americas, and this surely plays a role in how Brazilian policy makers react when confronted with growing pressure to accept Jewish immigrants and refugees. Anti-Semitism is rampant among Brazilian intellectuals and federal policy makers in the 1930s. Yet only 11 percent more Jews, representing about 3,000 people, enter Brazil between 1920 and 1930 than did between 1930 and 1940. The growing public discourse opposing Jewish entry and the resulting prohibition on Jewish entrances neither stops Jewish entry nor particularly changes its pattern for a number of reasons. Complaints to U.S. senators and congresspersons and British and Canadian members of Parliament by Jewish tourists and businesspeople lead those governments to pressure Brazil to modify its restrictions. Furthermore, the appointment of former ambassador to the United States Oswaldo Aranha as Brazilian foreign minister helps a philo-Semitic vision of “the Jew” to gain credence within the government. From this perspective Central European Jewish refugees are seen as bringing skills and capital to Brazil. International pressure to accept refugees is matched by a change in perception among some of Brazil’s most important immigration policy makers.

- 1938 New rules regarding Jewish immigration reopen Brazil’s gates to such an extent that more Jews enter than in any of the 10 years previously.
- 1950s Post–World War II Jewish settlement expands when significant numbers of Middle Eastern Jews, notably from Egypt and Syria, settle in the country after the Suez Crisis. In Recife, the Dutch-era synagogue has been designated an official national landmark.

Contemporary Overview

Over the past century Brazil has had religious and cultural freedom within a hegemonic Catholic tradition. As a result the country is marked both by its multiculturalism and its widespread stereotypes (often positive) of the many different ethnic groups in the country. Brazilians of Middle Eastern, Japanese, and Jewish descent have particular visibility because members are often in the upper echelons of Brazilian economic, social, and cultural life. For example, the telenovela (nighttime soap opera) with the largest audience in 2006 included clichéd characters from each of these groups. One episode showed Jewish immigrants at a 1930 Shabbat service singing modern Israeli songs. Jews (and other ethnic minorities) are divided on how to respond to these types of portrayals.

Information from the Brazilian government’s 2000 census showed a Jewish population of 86,825, almost all of whom lived in urban areas. Some Jewish organizations in Brazil dispute this figure and place the number between 120,000 and 140,000. Probably the most reliable estimate comes from Israeli demographer Sergio Della Pergola, who placed the 2002 number at 97,300, a slight decline from the 1980 figure of 100,000. This makes Brazilian Jewry the 11th largest Jewish community in the world. The contemporary Jewish community was formed primarily after 1920. It is ethnically diverse, encompassing Ashkenazim (primarily of Polish and German descent) and Sephardim (the largest plurality is of Egyptian descent). The Lubavitch movement has had a particularly strong influence among Sephardic Jews. Most community leaders and scholars suggest that the population self-identifying as Jewish is diminishing in large part because of intermarriage.

The largest Jewish community is in São Paulo, Brazil's largest city with a Jewish population of about 60,000 out of a population of more than 10 million. The second largest Jewish community is in Rio de Janeiro (25,000–30,000 Jews out of a population of 5.85 million), the third largest is in Porto Alegre in the state of Rio Grande do Sul (10,000–12,000 Jews in a population of about 1.36 million). Other significant communities are in Belo Horizonte, Curitiba, Santos, Salvador and Recife.

As in many countries with relatively large Jewish populations, there are numerous nationwide and local community organizations seeking to represent Jews. The central body representing all the Jewish federations and communities in Brazil is the Confederação Israelita do Brazil (CONIB), founded in 1951. This umbrella body includes 200 organizations engaged in promoting Jewish and Zionist activities, as well as groups involved in Jewish education, culture, and charity. Most state-based Jewish federations have commissions dedicated to fighting racism, and the São Paulo-based Latin American Jewish Committee Section for Interreligious Affairs actively combats racial hatred with support from the Brazilian National Commission for Catholic-Jewish Dialogue, an affiliate of the National Conference of Brazilian Bishops. A police unit specializes in the investigation of racial crimes in São Paulo, and the Jewish Federation in that city has a permanent member on the advisory board. All major international Zionist organizations and Zionist youth movements are represented in Brazil. Brazilian Jews publish a number of newspapers and magazines in Portuguese and much Jewish activity takes place in Jewish community centers.

In the 1990s, as Brazil entered into a prolonged economic crisis, the economic situation of Jews in the middle class worsened noticeably. Jewish assistance organizations thus took on an important new role in helping to retrain Jews for new jobs and helping children and the elderly. Many of these organizations opened their doors to all Brazilians and thus became models of public assistance from nongovernment entities.

There is a strong sense of cultural Judaism in Brazil. Books about Jews and Jewish issues are published regularly, although they tend to be hagiographic or memorializing. Academic works tend to engage in debates about the varying interpretations of Brazilian immigration policy during World War II, especially over the seeming contradiction between secret decrees prohibiting the entry of Jews and the fact of an increase in Jewish immigration during the years those "bans" were in effect. Jewish studies is a growing field of research at major Brazilian universities and there has been a proliferation in master's and doctoral theses on Jewish topics. Jewish film festivals have become increasingly common in Brazil, and the winners of these festivals tend to go into regular release. Films like Promises (2001, directed by C. Bolado, B. Z. Goldberg, and J. Shapiro), The Syrian Bride (2004, directed by E. Riklis) and Free Zone (2005, directed by A. Gitai) played for months on the commercial circuit in São Paulo, Rio de Janeiro, Belo Horizonte, and Porto Alegre.

Brazilian Jewry, like many other Jewish communities in the Americas, has experienced a wave of Sephardism that has attracted interest from Jews (both Ashkenazi and Sephardi) and non-Jews. In Brazil, much of the cultural fascination has to do with the myth that most of the Portuguese explorers of Brazil were crypto-Jews or New Christians. This notion has made its way into elite and middle-class culture, including among Jews, and there has been a wave of conversion to Judaism among Brazilians claiming New Christian or crypto-Jewish ancestors. The interest in Judaism has also been spurred by the rapid growth of evangelical Protestantism and its pseudo-Zionist discourse.

Rabbi Henry Sobel of the Congregação Israelita Paulista (a synagogue affiliated with both the World Union for Progressive Judaism–Reform movement and the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism) is perhaps the best-known Jewish leader in Brazil. Since the 1960s he has taken an active stance against discrimination and poverty and has engaged in interreligious dialogue. In 2006, Sobel participated in the Halachic reburial of political militant Iara Iavelberg in São Paulo's Jewish cemetery. Iavelberg was murdered by Brazil's repressive forces in 1971 (when Brazil was under a brutal military dictatorship) but at the time Jewish community leaders accepted the government's claims that the death was a suicide and thus did not allow her a formal Jewish burial.

Rabbi Nilton Bonder of Rio de Janeiro's Congregação Judaica do Brasil, known as the "green rabbi," is a prize-winning and best-selling author who uses Jewish tradition and mysticism to discuss a wide variety of spiritual matters and social issues such as the environment. The Congregação Judaica do Brasil is affiliated with both the Conservative movement and the Jewish renewal movement influenced by Rabbi Zalman Schachter Shalomi and Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach.

In the nonreligious realm, Dr. Celso Lafer, one of Brazil's most important diplomats, served as minister of foreign affairs beginning in 2001 and continues to be an important consultant on political and economic affairs. José Mindlin, after his retirement from business, was secretary of culture in São Paulo and has become one of the leaders in the preservation of rare Brazilian books. Mindlin is one of three Jews who have been elected to Brazil's most prestigious intellectual group, the Brazilian Academy of Letters. The others are Arnaldo Niskier and the novelist Moacyr Scliar, whose books on Jewish life in Brazil are widely read, are translated internationally, and have been made into television shows and films. The Safra family, former owners of Banco Safra, is one of the most prominent Sephardic families in Brazil. Silvio Santos (born Senor Abravanel), one of Brazil's most popular television personalities, has increasingly asserted his Jewish identity publicly, even though his wife and daughter are evangelical Christians.

Although Brazil has a reputation as a haven for Nazis, anti-Semitic discourse is very low, and there is little open anti-Semitism. One factor explaining this is the limited contact between the relatively small community of Jews, on the one hand, and the mass of Brazil's impoverished urban and rural people, on the other. In addition, Jewish communal organizations are careful to keep internal Jewish issues (as opposed to those related to Israel) out of the spotlight. Furthermore, Brazil's strong rhetorical commitment to ethnic, cultural, and racial tolerance is backed up by law, making public anti-Semitism a potential crime.

Outright anti-Semitic movements in Brazil have attracted only a tiny number of participants. Some literature denying the Holocaust has been published in Brazil, almost all of it privately funded by the elderly Siegfried Ellwanger Castan, a wealthy industrialist. Castan's publishing company, Editôra Revisão, distributed an unknown quantity of free books to politicians all over Brazil, but there was no sign that they affected policy. Castan also reprinted a number of anti-Semitic books originally published in the 1920s, such as The Protocols of the Elders of Zion and Henry Ford's The International Jew. Castan's books are not available in any of the major bookstore chains, and this literature has been widely attacked, consequently receiving disproportionate publicity. Anti-Semitic and racist publications are banned by Brazil's antiracism laws (Brazilian Constitution of 1988, Article 5, paragraph XLII). A lawsuit against Castan that began in 2001 led to a series of convictions in 2005 at both the state and Brazilian Supreme Court levels.

The current president of Brazil, Lula da Silva, has a number of Jews in his inner circle, including his spokesperson, Andre Singer, and his most important assistant, Clara Ant. The Lula government, like the Cardoso government before it, takes a middle-road position on the Middle East. In 2002, the Brazilian government strongly supported the resolutions of the United Nations Security Council on the end of the occupation of Palestinian territories by Israel. The Brazilian government also supports the peaceful creation of a democratic state of Palestine, based on the Beirut Declaration by the League of Arab States and the proposals formulated by the so-called Quartet (United States, European Union, Russia, and the secretary general of the United Nations). Brazil is a member of the Rio Group, which has consistently called for an immediate cessation of all acts of terrorism, provocation, incitement, and destruction in the Middle East. In 2005, Lula was one of the signators of a World Jewish Congress document against anti-Semitism that was presented at the United Nations. Lula also participated in United Nation's Holocaust Memorial Day services at the Congregação Israelita Paulista, Latin America's largest synagogue.

Selected Bibliography

- Elkin, Judith Laikin. 1998. The Jews of Latin America. New York: Holmes & Meier.
- Lesser, Jeffrey. 1994. Welcoming the Undesirables: Brazil and the Jewish Question. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Liebman, Seymour B. 1982. New World Jewry, 1493–1825: Requiem for the Forgotten. New York: KTAV.
- Norman, Theodore. 1985. An Outstretched Arm: A History of the Jewish Colonization Association. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul.
- Novinsky, Anita. 1972. Cristãos Novos na Bahia. São Paulo: Editora Perspectiva.
- Vieira, Nelson, H. 1996. "Outsiders and Insiders: Brazilian Jews and the Discourse of Alterity." In The Jewish Diaspora in Latin America: New Studies on History and Literature, edited by David Sheinin and Lous Baer, 101–116. New York: Garland.
- Wischnitzer, Mark. 1948. To Dwell in Safety: The Story of Jewish Migration since 1800. Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society of America.

Brazil, Jews, and Transatlantic Trade

Joseph Abraham Levi

---

During the first 300 years of European expansion/migration to the Western Hemisphere, the early Jewish presence in Brazil (1500–1822) was mainly Sephardic, consisting of conversos or New Christians. As early as 1822, with the proclamation of the independent kingdom of Brazil, and since the establishment of the Brazilian republic in 1899, the descendants of these conversos or crypto-Jews were finally able to declare Jewish identity without fear of being persecuted for their religion or ethnic background.

The Sephardim—mainly of Portuguese origin, either as openly declared Jews or, as often was the case, as New Christians—had a decisive role in transatlantic trade before and after their expulsion from Dutch Brazil (1624–1654). For more than three centuries—that is, from 1492 to the middle of the 19th century—these Portuguese conversos, or crypto-Jews, of the Diaspora were instrumental in linking the Americas to the Old World and beyond.

With commercial ties spanning Canada, the North American colonies, and the Caribbean area to South America to the European ports of Lisbon, Porto, Amsterdam, Antwerp, London, and Hamburg, these businessmen of Jewish descent succeeded in maintaining a dominant economic position despite the many difficulties and restrictions they faced, at one time or the other, on both sides of the Atlantic.

Because of their historical background, which forced them to constantly migrate from one area to another, Portuguese Jews/conversos were in a sense the linking point among different peoples, languages, and cultures—the Dutch, English, Germans, French, and Spanish. Thus, their knowledge of more than one of these European languages and, of course, Portuguese, made them practically indispensable and welcomed everywhere they ventured. They would in fact remain the only middlemen who were capable of trading with any and all of the European powers at the same time, and at a very competitive price, thus turning a profit for all parties involved.

The departure, or rather, the forced exile of Sephardic Jews and conversos from former Dutch Brazil inaugurates a new era not only for the Sephardim but also for the entire world. Initiated when they were still in Brazil, trade and business, which followed Portuguese Jews and conversos everywhere they roamed, were now being propelled to many new and not-so-new directions, establishing, revitalizing, and/or reinforcing commercial links that will remain in force off and on until the middle of the 19th century.

As a consequence of the Iberian expulsions and forced conversion (1492; 1497), many Sephardim began a new Diaspora: some refugees reached the city-states of the Italian Peninsula (Mainly Livorno, Ferrara, Genoa, and Venice), Northern Europe—particularly Holland and, to a lesser degree, England—as well as the many lands under the Ottoman Empire (1342–1924), namely the Maghreb, the Balkans, today's Turkey, and Israel. In all of these places, then, Jews were, if not totally welcomed, at least tolerated and, of course, given permission to reside in their midst. Though not completely pro-Jewish, Holland was the most religiously tolerant European nation of the time. Amsterdam was a center of international trade and business and, given that Holland had few natural resources, anyone who could further business and trade was welcomed. The Jews, who traditionally also engaged in international trade, mainly because of the many restrictions that most European countries imposed on them, were thus allowed to live freely in the Netherlands, for fear that their expertise and business acumen would then go to other areas, namely England.

Many of the conversos who settled in Holland soon returned to Judaism. On the other hand, the Sephardim who decided to stay in the Iberian Peninsula, obviously disguised as New Christians, soon found themselves facing another kind of persecution: the establishment of the Inquisition (Portugal, 1536–1544 and 1547–1821; Spain, 1478–1808 and 1814–1834), which questioned the sincerity of their conversion to Christianity and, was often the case, accused them of Judaizing.

The New World, especially Portuguese-speaking America, gave the Sephardim and the New Christians alike a new hope: thus, they believed that if they put enough distance between themselves and the Holy Offices of the Inquisition they could finally start a new life, free from persecution and, most importantly, could continue practicing and/or openly return to their ancestral faith. In other words, the expulsion of the Sephardim from the Iberian Peninsula and the beginning of the Sephardic Diaspora east and west, were a necessary preamble for the imminent colonization of Portuguese America. In Brazil, the New Christians, either directly or indirectly, contributed to the socioeconomic formation of the future Portuguese colony. Ironically, their inferior social condition was counterbalanced by their economic supremacy.

Gradually, then, when the Dutch, English, and French began to establish their respective empires in the New World, Sephardim and New Christians living on their territories also began, in some way or the other, to live their lives as openly declared Jews, thus trying to obtain, if not full equality, at least some sort of recognition for their contributions to the welfare of the country in which they were living.

Many Marranos tried their lot in Mexico and Peru. Soon after, as early as 1570, Spanish America had its own Inquisition Office. Once again, the Sephardim returned to practicing Judaism in secret. In contrast, in Brazil, even if conditions were not ideal, openly declared Jews and crypto-Jews, mainly because of their economic weight, were, if not welcomed, at least tacitly tolerated. Furthermore, and more importantly, the Portuguese Inquisition was never established in Brazilian soil, though those suspected of heresy were immediately sent to Lisbon to await trial by the Holy Office of the Inquisition.

Already at the beginning of the 16th century, still disguised as New Christians, the Sephardim were instrumental in founding the newly formed Portuguese colony in the Americas, even if they could not disclose their true identity for at least a century. Almost all of them were involved in the cultivation of sugar cane in Brazil as well as the rest of the Americas, mainly the Caribbean area.

From Madeira and, in 1542, from São Tomé and Príncipe, Jews and New Christians introduced sugar cane and engenhos—that is, sugar plantations and mills—to Brazil and thence to the rest of the New World. Little by little, mainly owing to the transfer of funds from Europe (e.g., Holland, England, and France—where the exiled Sephardic communities had previously established themselves) to the Americas, Sephardim and New Christians living north of today's Brazil—the Caribbean area, Suriname, today's Guyana (formerly British Guiana), and French Guiana—began to publicly profess their religion and culture. In a few years, they managed to accumulate riches and settle among the population, though not completely assimilating to it. Most were landowners and plantation owners, and they also owned African slaves. As for Brazil, given that the New Christians were indispensable for the economic prosperity of the young Portuguese colony, the colonial authorities, though very reluctantly, turned a blind eye to the New Christian presence among them, even allowing Marranos to hold some administrative roles. The Portuguese knew the Jews would indeed defend the economic interests of their colony. This would explain why many New Christians began returning to Judaism in a very visible way. Therefore, the Portuguese Crown had to impose more moderation in the external manifestations of their religious fervor.

The same began to happen in the French islands of Martinique and Guadalupe, notwithstanding the strict laws prohibiting public worship other than Catholic mass. Needless to say, they feared that if the Jews were expelled or they voluntarily left the islands, the colony would experience a severe economic crisis.

Beginning in the middle of the 16th century, Brazil became the receptacle for the Sephardim, both openly declared Jews and crypto-Jews, the latter escaping the Iberian Inquisitions. Both Jews and Marranos played an important role in the economic formation and development of Brazil: they were instrumental in maintaining the economic-commercial progress of the Portuguese colony and its inhabitants. For instance, in 1611, during his return trip from Salvador da Bahia to Portugal, François Pyrard de Laval (ca. 1570–1621) mentions the presence of New Christians on board, stressing their richness, the result of only a few years of trade in the young Portuguese colony.

By 1624, most of the New Christians in Brazil were either owners of engenhos or businessmen, the latter involved in the import and export trade. The first city that fell into Dutch hands was Salvador da Bahia. In a year, the Jews of the Diaspora had turned this city into their safe haven. With the seizure of Recife in 1631, the Dutch took control of the northern part of Brazil. Jewish and New Christian migration followed immediately, mainly from Bahia, which was now under Portuguese control. In a few years, local trade was in Jewish hands, and in a relatively short time, the number of Jews was double that of the Christians. Recife was therefore named Ha-Kahal Kadosh (the Sacred Congregation).

The history of Dutch Brazil is tied to the historic-political events of the times, mainly the history of the Sephardic Diaspora in Holland and the rest of Europe, including the Spanish-Dutch War (1621–1648). During the first decades of the 17th century, Amsterdam was the Sephardic world capital. Its commercial ties linked it to other trade centers of the then-known world. However, because Portugal still belonged to Spain (1580–1640), Holland could not have commercial contacts with Portugal and its colonies, even if the latter managed to retain their Portuguese autonomy during the nefarious 60 years of annexation. In order to have trade relations with Brazil then, as it already was a great producer of sugar, Holland decided to seize this source of revenue. In 1624, the troops of the Dutch West India Company succeeded in defeating the Portuguese colonial forces. In a short time Salvador da Bahia was captured by the Dutch. The year after the Portuguese regained control over the town. Five years later, in 1630, the Dutch counterattacked and took over the captaincies of Pernambuco, Itamaracá, Paraíba, and Rio Grande do Norte.

With the Dutch occupation of Brazil (1624–1654) also came the law that guaranteed full liberty of religious expression. Thus, a great migration of Sephardim from Amsterdam arrived to other Brazilian cities under Dutch occupation. In a short time the Sephardim began arriving in large numbers, settling as far as the Rio de la Plata.

Bear in mind that among the members of the Dutch West India Company were a few Jewish shareholders whose health contributed to the very existence of the company. For instance, between 1623 and 1626 there were 18 shareholders of Judeo-Portuguese origin in the Dutch West India Company. In 1642, more than 600 Sephardim left Amsterdam for Dutch Brazil, mainly Recife, including Rabbi Isaac Aboab da Fonseca and Moses Rafael de Aguilar. A few Ashkenazim and other Jews of the Diaspora joined them in their new promised land, first in Salvador da Bahia and, after the Portuguese took over the area, Recife and surrounding areas. In a short time the Jewish community of Brazil, the first Jewish congregation of the New World, would eventually have a considerable number of members, and the numbers were surpassed only a century and a half later.

With Maurice of Nassau (1604–1679), governor of Dutch Brazil (1637–1644), a new era for the Jews of the Diaspora under Dutch rule began, one in which tolerance and freedom of religious expression were the norm. During his administration, which favored a free circulation of ideas, not only in the political and religious arena but also in the scientific field, many crypto-Jews openly returned to Judaism without fear of retaliations.

In a few years, Recife became an important center of Jewish life with two synagogues and centers of study. The first house of worship, Zur Israel, was inaugurated in 1636, whereas the second, Magen Abraham, opened the following year on Antônio Vaz Island. Other centers of Judaism appeared in Penedo, a fluvial city in the future state of Alagoas, and Paraíba.

Many of these Jews were traders doing business in both the Caribbean area and Amsterdam. Among them there were also teachers, lawyers, landowners, and plantation owners with their own engenhos. To the eyes of the tourists, as in the case of the famous Johannes Nieuhof (1618–1672), it was clear that the Jews were enjoying prosperity in Dutch Brazil.

In January 1638, the classis, the agent of the Dutch Reformed Church in Brazil, complained against the Jews of Recife for practicing their faith publicly not in one but in two different locales. The same year two Dutch ships brought 200 Jews. In 1642, another group arrived in the colony, this time headed by two hakam, or rather, rabbis, namely, the aforementioned Isaac Aboab de Fonseca and Moses Raphael de Aguilar.

Most of the Jewish immigrants were bilingual or at least had a basic knowledge of the Portuguese language so they could trade and maintain business ties with the region. Since their arrival, then, the Jewish population—almost all Sephardim of Portuguese origin—became indispensable to the Dutch authorities: the fact that they knew the Portuguese language and culture made them key elements for the economic prosperity of the young Dutch colony in Brazil, mainly in the production and export of sugar products. The slave trade, strictly tied to the cultivation and production of sugarcane, was in fact one of the reasons the Jews were welcomed or tolerated by the Dutch colonial authorities. For example, given their wealth, the Jews were able to sell African slaves on credit to other colonists.

Between 1645 and 1654, the number of Jews residing in Brazil was perhaps 1,000 or 1,500. Amsterdam's chief rabbi, Saul Levi Morteira (ca. 1597–1660), who belonged to the Sephardic community of Venice, in his unedited Providencia de Dios con Ysrael, y Verdad, y Eternidad de la Ley de Moseh y Nulidad de los demas Leyes, ascertains that with the expulsion of 1654 the number of Jews was reduced to a little more than 600.

At the onset of the 17th century, Brazil was the major producer of sugar in the world. Unfortunately, with the first Anglo-Dutch War (1652–1654) the Dutch were not able to protect Recife, which was captured on January 23, 1654. The surrounding cities of Mauritestad (Maurícia in Portuguese), Paraíba, Itamaricá, and Seara also fell into Portuguese hands. The departure of the Dutch marked, at least temporarily, the end of the Brazilian Jewish community. From then on Judaism went underground, as a clandestine religion, only to resurface 200 years later. Many Jews, Sephardic as well as Ashkenazi, returned to Amsterdam, the intellectual capital of the Jewish Diaspora. From the financial point of view, the Jews left Brazil completely ruined.

Selected Bibliography

- Finn, James. 1841. Sephardim; or, the History of the Jews in Spain and Portugal. London: J.G.F., and J. Rivington.
- Katz, Israel J., and M. Mitchell Serels, eds. 2000. Studies on the History of Portuguese Jews from Their Expulsion in 1497 through Their Dispersion. New York: Sepher-Hermon Press.
- Levi, Joseph Abraham, ed. 2002. Survival and Adaptation: The Portuguese Jewish Diaspora in Europe, Africa, and the New World. New York: Sepher-Hermon Press.
- Marcus, Jacob Rader. 1975. Early American Jewry. 2 vols. New York: Ktav.
- Markens, Joseph. 1888. The Hebrews in America. New York: Arno Press.
- Meijer, Jaap. 1954. Pioneers of Pauroma: Contributions to the Earliest History of the Jewish Colonization of America. Paramaribo, Brazil: Eldorado.

Jews in Peru

Carolyn Wolfenzon

---

General Population: 25 million

Jewish Population: 2,000

Percent of Population: 0.008 percent

Jewish Population by City: A few families live in Iquitos.

Ethnic Backgrounds: Russia, Romania, Germany, Poland, and Turkey

Languages Spoken: Spanish

---

Historical Overview

1821 Peru gains independence.

1840–1867 Prompted by a peak in guano production, which requires more workers, the Peruvian government promulgates laws offering incentives to new immigrants. Despite the country's preference for white Europeans, most arrivals are Asian, but an estimated 50,000 Europeans also enter Peru.

1848 Germany and Prussia adopt an official anti-Jewish policy as a result of the Vienna Congress's 1815 decision, which causes Jews to migrate to Peru. The Revolution of 1848 and the subsequent crisis it unleashes also motivate Jewish migration.

Mid-1800s Jewish immigration takes place in a series of waves.

1850 The presence of some 300 Jews is documented in Peru. Most of the recent immigrants are German, Russian, French, and English Jews who work as bankers, jewelers, businessmen, industry moguls, and representatives of European firms.

1850 The brothers Segismundo and Fernando Jacobi, brokers for the Rothschild family, arrive and build on the Jewish economic presence in the country. The brothers are the first to establish a foreign exchange office in Lima. Paul Acher founds the Peruvian Commercial Stock Market and is the first accredited stockbroker in Peru.

1850s Many Jewish-owned stores advertise in the newspaper El Comercio: Jacobo Stein y Cia (1852); José Cohen y Hermanos (1855), a store specializing in Cuban cigars and European cigarettes; G. G. Cohen y Cia, another importer of cigarettes; H. Brenner y Cia (1858), a haberdashery specializing in imported European fashion; Phailles y Blanc (1853), a candy store.

1858 Augusto Dreyfus, a French Jew and representative of the Banco Dreyfus Hermanos y Compañía (Dreyfus Brothers Bank and Company), arrives in Peru.

1868 Peruvian president José Balta and Nicolás de Piérola, the interior minister, sign an agreement with Dreyfus, giving the rights to the Peruvian guano to the banker in exchange for a large loan and relief of external debt. Peruvian cosigners join in violent opposition to Dreyfus, constituting the first occasion in post-colonial Peru that a person's Jewish origin is used as a point of attack in a public argument.

- 1861 The number of deaths of Jews in Peru totals 25. They are buried in an isolated area of the Cementerio Británico (British Cemetery), but there is a strong preoccupation with the lack of a Jewish cemetery.
- 1870 The Peruvian Jews officially constitute themselves as a community and name their organization the Sociedad de Beneficencia Israelita (The Society of Israelite Benevolence). Jacobo Herzberg is the group's first president. Their primary concern is preserving the Jewish customs for burying the dead.
- 1875 Enrique Meiggs provides a plot of land to form the Baquijano Cemetery, the first Jewish cemetery in Latin America.
- 1876 Wladyslaw Kluger constructs the railroad connecting Bolivia and Peru, one of the highest in the world.
- 1879 Peru goes to war with Chile and receives support from Jews. German Jew Gustavo Badt forms a battalion of soldiers (la Unidad Militar Huáscar) made up of family members, friends, and workers from his hacienda, Chacra Colorado. Captain Enrique Oppenheimer is wounded in the battle of San Juan y Miraflores. The Jacobi brothers, along with other businessmen, lend large sums of money to the Peruvian government.
- 1880 Some 200 Moroccan Jews arrive in Peru and live in the jungle until 1910.
- 1883 Peru loses the war with Chile. Jews who had lent money and resources to the government lose everything.
- 1887 The Jews start celebrating religious festivals in rented spaces and Masonic lodges. Before this, the community had been small enough to gather in the home of Moisés Moses and in the home dental office of David Señor de Castro, one of the few Sephardim who came to Peru in those years.
- End of 1800s The Jews of Lima have practically disappeared.
- 1900–1920 The second migratory wave of Jews to Peru leads to the resurgence of the Jewish community. The German Jews arriving in this wave join with the Society of 1870. Three independently functioning groups (Germans, Sephardim, and Ashkenazi) coexist, and each maintains its respective customs.
- 1922 The Sephardim organize themselves as the Sociedad de Beneficencia Israelita Sefardita (The Sephardim Society of Israelite Benevolence).
- 1923 Peru closes its borders to Asian immigrants, and President Sánchez Cerro (1930–1933) unveils a nationalist policy that limits all European immigration to professionals or those with sufficient economic resources. According to León Trahtemberg (Ser judío en el Perú, 40), at this time there are already 2,000 Jews (from Russia, Romania, Poland and Turkey) in Peru.
- 1926 The Ashkenazi form the Unión Israelita del Perú (Israelite Confederation of Peru) and elect Samuel Eidelman as their first president.
- 1929 The Great Depression causes many Jews to leave Lima for the provinces. Some become peddling cloth salesmen, until the government of Oscar Benavides (1933–1939) restricts traveling salesmen. This decree forces Jews to open their own bazaars. In the provinces, they are the first to adopt payment by credit. Because many of the vendors' purveyors are located in the capital, they travel frequently and thus form a network between Lima and the rest of the country. The most important communities are in the towns of Arequipa, Huancayo, Chiclayo, and Iquitos. Most of the inhabitants are speculators interested in the rubber market. They travel around the Amazon selling commodities in their nomadic markets. A number of these Jews served as mayor of Iquitos: Benjamín Medina (1877–1879), Víctor Israel (1917–1920), Salomón Joseph Deyfus (1952–1956), and Willy Benzaquén (1962–1963).

- 1930 German Jews continue to arrive; most of the new immigrants are musicians, engineers, and physicians. Two notable musicians are the director Theo Buchwald and Bronislaw Mitman, violinist and, later, director of the Music Corps of the Republican Guard. Intellectuals and scientists of this generation include Hans Horkheimer, archaeologist and professor of the University of Trujillo; pharmaceutical chemist Jacques Alcabas, director of the National University of Huamanga; and Kurt Mayer, a physician and director of the University of Trujillo.
- 1938 Theo Buchwald founds the National Symphonic Orchestra.
- 1939 German, Sephardic, and Ashkenazi cooperate for the first time to form campaigns to help the victims of the Shoah. They created the Comité de Protección de Ayuda al Inmigrante (Protection Committee to Help Immigrants) to receive Jewish refugees, help with job placement, and teach Spanish; the Asociación de Médicos Judíos (Association of Jewish Doctors), a group dedicated to providing free care to persons in precarious situations; and the Hogar del Inmigrante (Immigrant House), a modest apartment in the center of Lima where up to 30 Jews a month reside. The administrator, Sassone Sarfaty, budgets one sol a day to maintain each person.
- 1939–1945 The Protection Committee attempts to save Jews, to bring over 100 young Jewish orphans, and to bring potential colonists to build cooperative agrarian farms in the jungle. All attempts failed. The committee does succeed in obtaining 230 residency visas, as well as transportation to Peru, for European Jews during a period when the Peruvian Ministry of Foreign Affairs has prohibited its consulates worldwide from granting visas to Jews.
- 1940 Jews living in provinces begin migrating back to the capital. At this time, there are 1,200 Jews in the provinces and 4,000 in Lima. In the 1940s, the Comité Peruano Pro Palestina Hebrea (Pro Hebrew Palestine Peruvian Committee) is created to shift Peruvian public opinion in favor of the partition of Palestine.
- 1946 León Pinelo opens. It is the only Jewish high school in Peru.
- November 29, 1947 Peru votes in favor of partitioning Palestine.
- End of 1950s Almost no Jews are left in the provinces. They have either returned to Lima or left Peru. The exception is Iquitos, where a small community of Moroccan Jews (who had arrived from the jungles of Brazil) persists.
- 1960s The number of Jews in Lima reached its peak: 5,500.
- 1965 Hans Horkheimer is awarded the Orden del Sol (Order of the Sun) for his discovery of the Chancay Fortress and the Huaura Walls.
- 1980s Peruvian Jews of the second generation start to participate in politics as individual people (not in representation of the Peruvian Jewish Association). During Alan García's first presidential term, Jacobo Mishkin and Jayzuño Abramovich participate in governmental reforms.

- 1990–2000 Independent Peruvian Jews are involved during Alberto Fujimori's government. José Chlimper, Moisés Wolfenson, and Efraím Goldemberg hold important public roles. Some Jews oppose the regime, including Leon Trahtemberg, Gustavo Gorriti, and Roberto Lerner.
- 2000–2005 During Alejandro Toledo's regime, the activity of Jewish people continues: David Waisman is the vice president, and Jacques Rodrich and David Lemor also have important roles.
- 2006–2007 Two Jews participate in two different political campaigns. Isaac Meckler is closely involved in the Ollanta Humala campaign, and José Kleinberg participates in the Lourdes Flores campaign.

Contemporary Overview

Demographic Movement and Emigration

The development of the Peruvian Jewish community can be divided into three periods. The first encompasses the period from the end of the 1940s to the beginning of the 1970s; the second, during the 1980s, coincides with the first administration of Alan García Pérez (1985–1990); and the most recent period spans the 1990s until the present.

The 1950s were marked by the expansion of the community. The Jews purchased large communal locations (one in San Isidro, which today operates the León Pinelo School and hosts the three synagogues) and created volunteer organizations to help needy immigrants and Israel (the ORT and the Women's International Zionist Organization). During this period many large communitarian Jewish institutions were purchased, constructed, or moved: the León Pinelo School, the Union Israelita Synagogue, the Cultural Center Sharon, the Hanoar Hatzioni, the sports center Hebraica, Bikur Jolim-Jevra Kadisha and Aflantis (homes for the elderly), and the Israeli Embassy in Peru. This prosperity continued during the 1960s. At this time, most Jewish leaders were born and raised in Peru, and ties to Israel were quite strong. The Jewish communities in the provinces start to dwindle, and most of them moved to Lima, which had a population of 5,500 Jewish people at the end of the 1960s.

A massive reduction of the community characterized the 1980s, as described by León Trahtemberg in Demografía Judía del Perú (Peruvian Jewish Demographics). From the more than 5,000 Peruvian Jews at the end of 1960, the community shrank to 3,500 people. This 30 percent reduction, Trahtemberg maintains, is high, "because it occurred within a community living in a free country, where its members did not suffer persecution and generally enjoyed the strong economic situation" (Trahtemberg 1988, 23).

The decline is due in large part to the insecurity that arose from threats of the terrorist organizations Sendero Luminoso (Shining Path) and the Movimiento Revolucionario Túpac Amaru (MRTA). The Informe Final de la Comisión de la Verdad y Reconciliación (Final Report of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission) maintains that by the end of the 1980s, the Shining Path had killed close to 65,000 people, mainly farmers from the mountainous region of the country.

By the late 1980s to the early 1990s, Lima residents began to sense the presence of terrorism. The daily insecurity extended to the students at the León Pinelo

Interior of the Chabad Center in Lima, Peru. (Photo by Jono David)

School, which received numerous bomb threats. Armed groups constantly kidnapped businesspeople and held them for ransom, which they used to buy weapons and continue the civil war. Even though President Alan García (1985–1990) implemented a strict curfew, the kidnappings continued. In 1992, the Jewish-owned TV station Canal 2, Frecuencia Latina (owned by brothers Samuel and Mendel Winter and the then-majority partner Baruch Ivcher) was blasted with dynamite. In the face of this dangerous environment, many Jews decided to leave the country; the most common destinations were the United States, Israel, and Canada. From 1990 to 2001, during the 11 years of the Alberto Fujimori administration, the population of the Jewish community persistently declined. (Today, only 2,000 Jews live in Peru.)

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Almost all students graduating from the León Pinelo School typically enter the best universities in Lima and became professionals in their fields. The most popular fields are science, engineering, economics, and business administration, followed by the medical fields, especially medical science and psychology. Jewish businesspeople own some prosperous textile industries, fishing industries, and food industries.

Culture, Science, and the the Humanities

Samuel Geller arrived in Peru in 1929. He studied in Padua, Italy, and founded the Regional Hospital in Quillabamba, a rural community in Cuzco. In 1938, he moved to Ica, where he built a private clinic and worked for the public beneficence. Hans Ruhr arrived in Peru from Germany in 1934 and worked in one of the more poverty-stricken cities in Peru, Huancavelica. He conducted research on warts. Ruhr also founded the first private clinic in Huancayo City (1953). Among the most important doctors that have excelled in Lima are Marcos Roitman, who performed the first cardiac catheterization in Peru; Simon Kirschbaum, who is the current president of the Peruvian Society of Plastic Surgeons; Benjamin Alhalel, who cofounded the prestigious Cayetano Heredia University; Zuño Burstein, an important dermatologist and professor in his field at San Marcos University; Mayer Zaharia, the director of the Radioterapist Department at the Instituto de Enfermedades Neoplásicas. In psychiatry, two Jewish Peruvians are particularly well known: Saúl Peña and Moisés Lemlij. Well-known scientists include chemist Jacques Alcabes, dean of the Chemistry Department at the Huamanga University; biologist Abraham Vaisberg, dean of the Science Department at the Cayetano University; and physicist Barton Zwiebach, who currently works at Massachusetts Institute of Technology and is one of the most important scientists in the world.

The Jewish community in Lima has an important theater group, Teatro Hebraica, which has been active since 1961 and has promoted culture inside and outside the community. Two authors have excelled: Herman Zwillich and Isaac Goldemberg. In music, Theo Buchwald was the director of the National Symphonic Orchestra in 1938, and most of the musicians that played with him were Jews: Bronislav Mitman (Rodolfo Holzman, Adolfo Berger, Max Bremer, and Edgard Heyman, among others. During the 1950s, Boris Ackerman and Boris Roseznic, both from Romania, composed two popular Creole waltzes. In art, Moico Yaker is the most famous Jewish painter.

Current Economic Problems

In 2000, at the end of Fujimori's presidency, an event unprecedented in the Jewish community occurred: the Banco del Nuevo Mundo and the NBK Bank failed. Most of the stockholders were Jewish (Vitaly Franco and Isaac and Jaco Levy were the principal stockholders). Because of these failures, thousands of Jewish and non-Jewish investors lost their entire life savings. Despite knowing that the banks were at the point of collapse, the partners convinced Jewish investors and the treasuries of Jewish organizations to deposit their funds in the doomed banks. The theft perpetrated by Jews upon fellow Jews was noted in the national press. For the first time in the history of the Peruvian Jewish community, the principal investors from the implicated banks were categorically expelled from the community; the ban went as far as to deny them entrance to the synagogues and participation in religious ceremonies.

Jewish Education, Communal and Political Institutions

During the Jewish expansion of the 1950s, the Jews promoted Zionism through several youth movements dedicated to supporting a Jewish state in Israel: the Unión Macabi Universal, Hashomer, Betar, and the Hanoar Hatzioni. These last two groups were the most popular and set the example for the following generations of Zionists. The Hanoar Hatzioni, whose first presidents were José Lemor and Alberto Niego, still exists today and plays an important role in the life of Jewish youth; the organization operates as an independent entity within the León Pinelo School. This school, which opened in 1946, is still the only Jewish high school in Lima.

Religious Denominations

Peru has three synagogues: The Sociedad de Beneficencia Israelita 1870, whose interim president is George Gruenberg; the Union Israelita del Peru, whose president is Herman Blanc; and the Sephardic Synagogue, whose president is Jack Falkon.

Political Scandals and Anti-Semitism

Despite the reduction of the Jewish population in Peru during the past two and a half decades, Jews currently play a larger role in Peruvian politics and the national press than in any previous moment. However, most of those who have participated in the political arena have been connected to scandal and corruption. This has resulted in a negative effect on the overall image of the Jewish community in Peru. During the administration of Alberto Fujimori, Efraín Goldemberg was the economic minister and first minister, José Chlimper was the agriculture minister, and Moisés Wolfenson—owner of La razón and El Chino, one of the most important tabloids of the Fujimori regime—was a congressman. Goldemberg was placed under house arrest after the discovery of certain irregularities in his role as minister. For their part, the brothers Moisés and Alex Wolfenson were first detained and later incarcerated after it was discovered that they accepted large sums of money in return for publishing news reports dictated by Fujimori and his right-hand man Vladimiro Montesinos. Similarly, the Winter brothers were also accused of corruption and running their channel as a propaganda organ for the Fujimori administration. As with the Wolfensons, the Winters were jailed for several years.

The Jewish presence in Peruvian politics continued to expand during the administration of Alejandro Toledo (2001–2006), who appointed David Waisman as vice president and David Lemor as production minister. However, Toledo's wife, Eliane Karp, a Belgian Jew, continued to damage the image of Jews in Peru. She was accused of inappropriately spending government funds for personal vacations. Karp did not wait for the end of her husband's administration; she fled to Tel Aviv to evade any legal repercussions of the possible irregularities in her role as a public functionary.

Recent Political Issues

In July 2005, Issac Mekler (then president of the Peruvian Jewish Association) faced severe criticism in the Peruvian press. Three candidates were running for the 2006 presidential elections: ex-president Alan García Pérez (who ultimately won the race and was sworn in July 28, 2006), the Unidad Nacional candidate, Lourdes Flores; and Ollanta Humala, an ex-soldier and member of the recently created Peruvian Nationalist Party (Partido Nacionalista del Perú). Even though Humala presented an openly anti-Semitic, anti-Chilean, and anti-white position—lobbying, for example, for the eradication of all residents who were not of the “copper race” (raza cobriza)—Mekler not only personally decided to support Humala's candidacy for the 2006 elections and run for Congress as a member of his political party, but he also pledged the support of the Jewish organization he represented.

Mekler's support of Humala earned him the expulsion from his post as president of the Peruvian Jewish Association and condemnation from the Peruvian press. The expression "the Jewish Ollanta lobby," which promoted the idea that the Jewish community would support any candidate as long as he or she was not a menace against their properties, became a common headline. For the media, it was difficult to see how a Jew could support Humala, a blatant enemy of anyone who was not a mestizo. Humala had publicly affirmed that Jews were not Peruvian, that they should not own newspapers or other media, and that they must be expelled from the country. Humala's claims notwithstanding, Mekler is currently the representative in Congress for Humala's party.

Selected Bibliography

- Böhm, Günter. 1985. Judíos en el Perú durante el siglo XIX. Santiago: Universite de Chile.
- "Índice de Contenido General." Verdad y Reconciliación Web site [in Spanish]. <http://www.cverdad.org.pe/ifinal/index.php> (accessed May 3, 2007).
- "Lobby judío con Ollanta." 2005. Unidad de Investigación del diario Expreso. December 22. <http://www.libreopinion.com/members/mnsdp/expreso.html> (accessed May 3, 2007).
- Mitrani, Henry, ed. 2006. Ser judío en el Perú. Múltiples presencias de la cultura judío-peruana. Lima: Fondo Editorial del Congreso del Perú.
- Polémica en el Perú por un empleo de la primera dama." 2002. Clarín. August 14. <http://www.clarin.com/diario/2002/08/14/i-02101.htm> (accessed May 3, 2007).
- Trahtemberg, León. 1987. La inmigración judía al Perú: 1848–1948. Lima, Peru: Asociación Judía de Beneficencia y Culto de 1870.
- Trahtemberg, León. 1988. Demografía judía del Perú: un estudio demográfico vocacional y de actitudes hacia lo judaico de la comunidad judía de Lima. Lima, Peru: Unión Mundial ORT.
- Trahtemberg, León. 1989. Los judíos de Lima y las provincias del Perú. Lima, Peru: Unión Israelita del Perú.
- Weinfeld, Eduardo, ed. 1951. Enciclopedia Judaica Castellana. Vol. 3. Mexico City: Editorial Enciclopedia Judaica Castellana, 430–431.

Concept of the Jew in Peruvian Literature

Carolyn Wolfenzon

---

The Franco-Peruvian author Flora Tristán recorded the Jewish presence at the birth of the Peruvian Republic in her book Peregrinaciones de una paria (1833–1834) (Peregrinations of a Pariah). The narrator describes the city of Arequipa, complete with the names of several French Jews who were living there at the time, and recounts the performance of a Catholic religious drama in the Plaza de las Mercedes. Tristán retells the simple plot of the drama: a Catholic attempts to convert Jews and Muslims. The Jews stay faithful to their religion; for this, they are beaten, ridiculed, robbed, and finally publicly stripped in the plaza. Jesus appears at the Last Supper, accompanied by a Jew who tries to pass as an Apostle. This is Judas. "There are thirteen place settings. A Jew, hoping to take advantage of the meal, stealthily slips into the unoccupied thirteenth seat. Jesus has broken the bread and passed the wine to the guests when he becomes aware of the fraud. The guests immediately throw the Jew from his seat and the soldiers hang him" (251). As this occurs, Tristán tells us, the Arequipeño audience enjoys the spectacle. Tristán uses this common street performance to criticize the form in which the Catholic Church educated Peruvians.

The Argentinean author Juana Manuela Gorriti, who lived in Peru, published the story "La quena" (1845) in the Revista de Lima. This story tells the tale of the doomed love between the mestizo son of an Inca princess and a wealthy white woman from Lima. "La quena", which is set in Cuzco, is a variation on the indigenous drama Ollantay, but in Gorriti's version, it is not the Incan laws that impede the protagonists' relationship, but rather a Jew, who is represented as a detestable subterranean-dwelling creature: "he was an old man with a repugnant aspect, and his vulture eyes, curved nose and thin lips betrayed the lineage of Jacob's degenerate race" (45). In his underground world, the Jew prepares devilish potions at the request of his clients: "At the bottom of that black cave, in the gloomy glow of the flames, he had created two demons arranging for the damnation of a soul" (45).

In the 20th century, the most memorable Jewish character is perhaps Saúl Zuratas, the protagonist of Mario Vargas Llosa's El hablador (The Storyteller, 1987). Zuratas is the son of a Jew, Don Salomón Zuratas, and a criolla from Talara. Saúl complains that the Jews of Lima never accepted his mother even though she converted to Judaism, "the community did not accept her, not so much because she was a goie but because she was a criolla from Talara, a simple woman, without education who hardly knew how to read. Because the Jews of Lima had turned into a group of bourgeoisie" (14). Vargas Llosa's narrates the anthropology student Zuratas's process of immersion in the life of a Machiguenga tribe in the Peruvian jungle; he ultimately becomes that tribe's storyteller. Vargas Llosa presents the Jew as a physically deformed and horrible being: a half-moon shaped birthmark covers his face from his eyes to his mouth—the reason for his nickname Mascarita (little masked one)—but at the same time, he is an intelligent being worried about that Peruvian other: the indigenous people. In a critique of the Peruvian government's lack of attention to the development of the jungle tribes, Zuratas, the Jew, ends up justly representing the most radically other of Peruvian society.

Within the community, the first Jew to write about Jewish themes was the Polish immigrant Herman Zwilich, with his humorous chronicles En serio y en broma, a selection of articles published between 1942 and 1966 in the monthly communal magazine Nosotros. In El vendedor de chismes (The Gossip Seller), his second book, he recreates the feeling of immigrants, the conformation of Jewish institutions in Peru, and the narrow line each Jew walked in daily life.

José B. Adolph is the only Jewish writer from the next generation, and the most prolific one in any period. Born in Stuttgart, Germany, Adolph moved to Peru in 1938 and still lives and writes in Lima. He is the most outstanding author in the Peruvian science fiction tradition. Among his narrative works of that genre are Mañana, las ratas (1977), La verdad sobre Dios y JBA (2001), and one collection of short stories—Hasta que la muerte (1971). Even though he has not focused on the representation of Jews in his futuristic literature, he is the author of a novel—Ningún Dios, part of the trilogy De mujeres y heridas (2000)—in which the main characters are Jews. The core idea of that fiction is a comparison between the systematic killings of the Peruvian terrorist group Shining Path and the genocide perpetrated by German Nazism. The parallel, in Adolph's words, shows the lowest point in the history of left-wing politics in Peru.

The most widely known Peruvian Jewish novelist is Isaac Goldemberg (b. 1945), and his best-known novel is La vida a plazos de Jacobo Lerner (1978), which takes place in Peru between 1923 and 1935. The novel not only represents the Peruvian Jewish community but also the Peru of that epoch. The story is constructed as a series of unconnected fragments, a collage of voices of distinct protagonists in which passages from communitarian magazines are also included. The author recreates the racist and classist environment of the Sánchez Cerro period. Jacobo Lerner, the Jew, embodies a great number of the stereotypes usually adopted by the hegemonic group to represent the other. Jacobo is a Russian immigrant who is only interested in making money. He travels from Lima to Chepén and leaves behind Virginia, a pregnant criolla. He feigns ignorance of the existence of his son Efraín and returns to Lima, where he opens a brothel. Alone and sick, Jacobo slowly dies, and his son, who falls victim to a serious illness, ends up crazy and misunderstood by his norteño relatives. Jacobo dies without leaving behind any Jewish decedents, and he is rejected by a chorus of voices on his deathbed. Jacobo is associated with sickness—his cursed inheritance is blamed for disrupting the life of his son—because of his Jewish origin and his apparently perverse sexuality. The author rewrote and republished the novel in 2001, with the title El nombre del padre. The main change in the second version is the crucial role of the Holocaust in the actions of Jacobo and his Jewish friends, as well as the fact that Efraín has a significant new name—Jesus. Unlike the original Efraín, the new one does not die at the end of the narrative, but lives on to celebrate his bar mitzvah.

Goldemberg's fiction shows how complicated and difficult it is to be Jewish and Peruvian—in Lima or the provinces. His novels recreate the problem of this double identity through children of interracial or interreligious marriages, as occurs in Tiempo al tiempo. In this, his second novel, Marquitos Karushansky Ávila, during a game of soccer, narrates the discrimination he feels as much from the Catholics as from the Jews. The protagonist spends half of the game sitting on the bench, feeling the pain of marginalization. Like Jacobo Lerner, Karushansky is a border character. His decision to make the aliyah to Israel does not solve his identity problems: Karushansky Ávila shoots himself in the mouth; he cannot integrate himself, either here or there.

Selected Bibliography

Adolph, José B. 2000. Ningún Dios. In De mujeres y heridas. Lima, Peru: Mosca Azul Editores, 2000.

- Goldemberg, Isaac. 1980. La vida a plazos de Jacobo Lerner. Hanover, NH: Ediciones del Norte.
- Goldemberg, Isaac. 1984. Tiempo al tiempo. Hanover, NH: Ediciones del Norte.
- Goldemberg, Isaac. 2001. El nombre del padre. Lima, Peru: Alfaguara, 2001.
- Gorriti, Juana Manuela. 1992. La quena. Obras completas. Tomo IV. Salta, Argentina: Banco del Noreste.
- Tristán, Flora. 2003. Peregrinaciones de una paria [Peregrinations of a Pariah]. Lima, Peru: Fondo Editorial UNMS.
- Vargas Llosa, Mario. 1991. El hablador [The storyteller]. Barcelona, Spain: Seix Barral.
- Zwilich, Herman. 1966. En serio y en broma. Lima, Peru: Cuadernos Peruano-Israelíes.

Jews in Suriname

Wieke Vink

---

Historical Overview

The Surinamese Jews account for a unique chapter in the history of the Jewish Diaspora. The Jewish colonists who first settled in Suriname in mid-17th century were an important, albeit small, community set in a slave society and colonial order. The establishment of a Jewish planter's community with a high degree of autonomy and full freedom of worship was unique in its time. In the slave society of Suriname, the Jews belonged to the upper strata of colonial whites. As planters and, later, colonial officials, Jews played an important role in the colonization and further development of Suriname as a Dutch colony.

Although there is no consensus on the exact date of first settlement, it is certain that Jews voluntarily migrated to Suriname on a regular basis from the 1650s onward. Early Jewish migration to Suriname mainly consisted of Sephardi Jews, generally referred to as Portuguese Jews in Suriname. Some came from Amsterdam, whereas others first settled in other colonies of the New World (Brazil, Cayenne, Essequibo) before migrating to Suriname. According to census records, approximately 230 men, women, and children constituted the Surinamese Jewish community in 1684. In subsequent years, the number of Sephardi and Ashkenazi, the latter generally referred to as High German Jews, increased rapidly. Initially, Ashkenazi Jews were incorporated into the Sephardi community. It was not until 1735 that a separate Ashkenazi community was established. Halfway into the 19th century, large-scale migration to Suriname came to an end, and the size of the Surinamese Jewish community stabilized at around 1,400 individuals, divided into two equally sized communities.

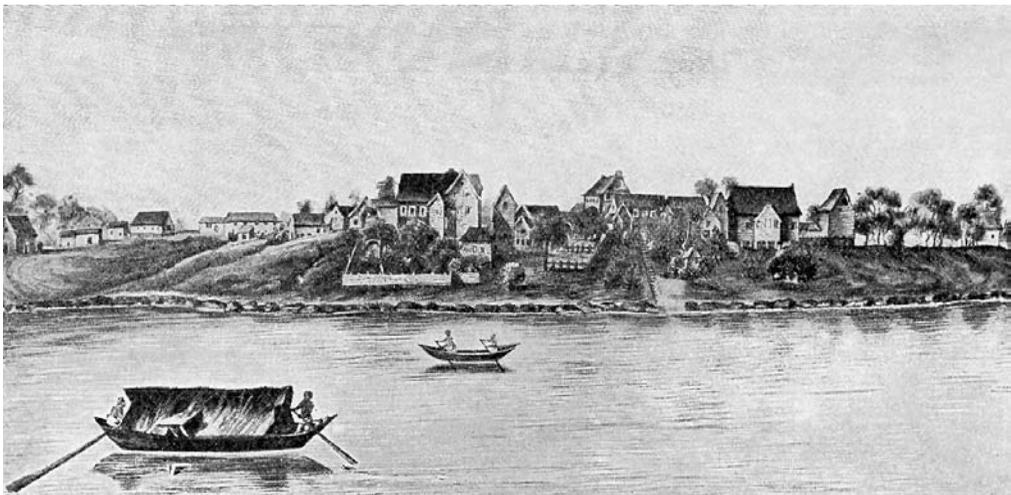

At its peak in the early 18th century, the Surinamese Jews accounted for approximately half of the total white population of Suriname. Over time, this ratio would decline to about a third by the 19th century. Suriname's extremely uneven ratio of slaves to free whites (between 33:1 in the plantation district and 16:1 in Suriname as a whole in 1791) and the fact that the Sephardi Jews owned a large portion of the plantations (about 28 percent in 1737, 18 percent in 1770, and 12 percent in 1793) made the Jews an important socioeconomic group in Suriname. A small group of around 100 Surinamese Jews were the so-called colored or mulatto Jews, that is, the offspring of white Jewish men and Afro-Surinamese women, either slave or free. Children of these relationships were incorporated into the community, albeit as second-rate members called congregants, until the mid-19th century. Full membership was granted to “colored” Jews in 1841.

The planter’s community in Jodensavanne (Jewish Savannah) and Paramaribo, the capital city and colonial administrative center, were the two main sites of Jewish settlement in Suriname. Jodensavanne was the heart of Sephardi life in Suriname during the 17th and 18th century. In contrast to the Sephardi Jews, Ashkenazi Jews were never involved in the plantation industry at a large scale. They settled in Paramaribo and earned a living in small trade and crafts, such as, goldsmiths, bakers, butchers, and carpenters.

Until 1825, the constitutional position of Jewish communities in Suriname was based on a set of privileges granted to the Sephardi Jews in 1665. These privileges included freedom of worship, the right to administer their own form of civil law, and permission to draw up wills and perform marriages according to Jewish customs. In general, the Surinamese Jews were faced with little anti-Semitism, although some conflicts occurred, most notably on some of the Jewish privileges such as the right to open their shops and trade on Sundays, which was withdrawn in 1718. In 1825, all privileges and exceptionalities applied to Jewish residents in the Dutch West Indian colonies were withdrawn, and Jews were given equal rights as non-Jewish colonists.

The late 18th century marks a turning point in Surinamese Jewish history. Years of war against the maroons (escaped slaves) had further destabilized an already declining plantation sector in Suriname. After the financial crisis at the Amsterdam stock exchange between 1772 and 1773, many planters could not settle their debts and had to sell their estates. At the turn of the 18th to 19th century, an estimated two-thirds of the Jewish population lived in poverty. By the end of the 18th century, Jodensavanne—the symbol of Sephardi planter's community—had been deserted by most of its inhabitants, and Sephardi community life was reallocated to the multicultural environment of Paramaribo.

Engraving of the Jewish colony in Suriname known as Jodensavanne, from a 17th-century print. (Isadore Singer, ed. The Jewish Encyclopedia, 1901)

The socioeconomic distinction between the Ashkenazi and Sephardi disappeared over the course of the 19th century. Starting in the 1780s, Sephardi Jews became increasingly impoverished because of the collapse of the plantation economy, while Ashkenazi Jews showed improvement of their average wealth. With the demise of the plantations, the Sephardi moved to Paramaribo, where they came to share the same environment as the Ashkenazi, who had always lived and worked in Paramaribo. From then on both Sephardi and Ashkenazi Jews tried to make a living in Paramaribo's urban colonial environment. In 1845, the Jews found employment in small trade (36 percent), crafts (23 percent), and administrative jobs (26 percent) held at the offices of plantation directors, commercial establishments, and the colonial administration.

Although the Surinamese Jews would decline in numbers, from approximately 1,370 in 1845 to 670 in 1921, they gained political power. Given the full civil rights granted to them in 1825, the Jews were now eligible for high positions in the Suriname's colonial civil service. More than half of the elected members of the Colonial Assembly in the 1890s were Jews.

Since the 1950s, many Surinamese Jews have migrated to Holland, the United States, and Israel. The many mixed relationships caused a further decrease of the Jewish communities in Suriname. To join forces, and in an attempt to preserve the Surinamese Jewish community, the Ashkenazi and Sephardi congregations merged in 1998. Today only an extremely small community remains, thriving on the efforts of a few families.

Selected Bibliography

- Cohen, Robert, ed. 1982. The Jewish Nation in Suriname: Historical Essays. Amsterdam: Emmering.
- Cohen, Robert. 1991. Jews in Another Environment: Suriname in the Second Half of the Eighteenth Century. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Marcus, Jacob R., and Stanly F. Chyet, eds. 1974. Historical Essay on the Colony of Surinam 1788. New York: KTAV.
- Van Lier, Rudolf A. J. 1971. Frontier Society: A Social Analysis of the History of Suriname. The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff.
- Vink, Wieke. In press. Creole Jews: Negotiating Community in Colonial Suriname. Leiden, Netherlands: KITLV Press.

Jews in Uruguay

Avram Hein

---

General Population: 3,431,932 (2006)

Jewish Population: 19,500 (2001)

Percent of Population: 0.57 percent

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Eighty-nine percent of the community is of European descent (Ashkenazim) and the remaining 11 percent are Sephardim (of Spanish descent) or Mizrahim (from the Middle East). In the early 20th century, 75 percent of the population was Sephardi or Mizrahi.

---

Historical Overview

16th century There are traces of some Conversos but no complete records are available; it appears that any Jews from this time assimilated into non-Jewish society.

1726 The governor of Montevideo calls upon the first settlers to “be not inferior nor of Moorish or Jewish race.”

1770 This is the first record of Jewish settlement, although it takes several more decades for Uruguay to achieve a greater level of openness conducive to Jewish immigration.

1911 The Zionist movement begins activities in Uruguay with protests in support of the Balfour Declaration, against the pogroms of the 1920s, and against Arab riots in Palestine in 1928–1929.

1912 More Jews arrive in Uruguay, and the first recorded minyan is held. These new immigrants, mostly from Eastern Europe, are economically better off and form the foundations of the present-day Jewish community in Montevideo.

1917 About 1,700 Jews reside in Montevideo, three-quarters of whom are Sephardi/Mizrahi.

Jews organize under ideological lines. Some members of the Ashkenazi Jewish community form the Kultur Verein Morris Vintschevsky to spread Yiddish culture. The organization founds schools, a public library, and a theater troupe. The organization also operates a soup kitchen and founds a free loan society. It is affiliated with the Yiddish-speaking section of the Communist Party in the Soviet Union. A branch of Poalei Zion (the socialist branch of the Zionist movement) is also organized in Montevideo. Before World War II, the major organizations are Ezra, Hevra Kadisha Ashkenazit, and the Sephardic Hesed Shel Emet. They maintain the community’s cemetery and provide social services.

1918–1939 Between World War I and World War II, the Jewish population increases by 21,500 due to immigration. Uruguay serves as a transit point to Argentina between 1925 and 1928, leading to an increase in the Ashkenazi population.

1919 Separation of church and state is introduced in Uruguay. Nevertheless, Uruguay had been very welcoming to its Jewish newcomers since the late 19th century.

- 1929 The Jewish Socialist Party (Bund) is established in Uruguay. It founds schools and focuses on maintaining Yiddish as the language of the workers. It provides workers with the opportunity to live a “Jewish” lifestyle outside the religious framework.
- 1930 Incidents of Jews being refused at the port of Montevideo are reported.
- 1930s–1950 There are several failed attempts to create Jewish agricultural settlements in Uruguay.
- 1939–1940 Immigration restrictions are imposed. Hence, although 2,200 Jews immigrate in 1939, only 373 arrive in 1940.
- 1942 Religious and secular functions of the Jewish community are separated. Most expression of Jewish identity in Uruguay is cultural and Zionist and not religious. This is partly because of Uruguay’s melting pot ideology and the secular orientation of many of its immigrants. There is a strong subgroup of secular leftists who maintain their own cemetery because they refuse to be buried according to the requirements of Jewish law.
- 1945 The umbrella organization Concejo Central Sionist is formed.
After World War II, displaced people and Holocaust survivors come to Uruguay.
- 1960 The Federación Sionista Territorial Unificado, an arm of the Jewish Agency for Israel in charge of aliyah (Jewish immigration to Israel), is founded.
- 1960s Left-wing Jews and non-Jews in Montevideo are attacked and marked with swastikas.
- 1981 Three men are arrested on charges of firebombing a synagogue and throwing rocks at other Jewish targets in Montevideo.
- 1990 A lone gunman attacks members of the Jewish community. The public is shocked and the perpetrator is imprisoned under strict security measures.

Contemporary Overview

Present Economic Conditions

Uruguay’s economic crisis has led to a diminished quality of social services, although international aide organizations, such as the American Joint Distribution Committee and other humanitarian nongovernmental organizations have been assisting the Uruguayan Jewish community. In May 2003, the four main religious communities joined together to form a new umbrella group, called Fundacion Tzedakah Uruguay, using the Argentinian model to provide relief and welfare to members of the Jewish community in economic distress. According to a 2003 report, 22 percent of the adult Jewish population is classified as “poor” and another 40.5 percent are “vulnerable” (Luxner 2003). The economic crisis affects all members of Uruguayan society and does not appear to disproportionately affect the Jewish population. In some way, they may be better off than the non-Jewish population because of the possibility of emigration to Israel and global Jewish philanthropic organizations. In 2002, the World Zionist Congress declared Uruguay’s Jewish community to be in a state of emergency (Hein 2003).

Most members of the Jewish community before the economic crisis were comfortably middle class. Despite the strong institutional structure and high enrollment in Jewish schools, Uruguay is “a nation that espoused and largely practiced an American-style commitment to the melting pot” (Freedman 2003).

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

The umbrella organization of the Jewish community is the Comité Central Israelita del Uruguay. More than 60 religious and cultural groups, Zionist organizations, youth movements, women’s organizations, and other groups are part of the umbrella organization (Tal 2005, 286). The Comité Central Israelita was formed in 1940, after significant tension in the Jewish community and the collapse of the European Jewish organizations. It expelled the pro-Soviet linke and united the different ethnic groups that made up the Jewish community. Now controlled by centrist leaders, the Zionist groups gained hegemony over the old progressive groups, and the community today is unequivocally Zionist. In the 1950s, the Jewish establishment kehillah organization took upon themselves to “clean up the Jewish street” by expelling the linke. In the long term, however, while ridding the organization of ties with the revolutionary and radical parties of the 1960s and 1970s, it disconnected the radicals and their children from the mainstream Jewish community. Their children joined non-Jewish leftist groups—many of which have become Zionist and anti-Semitic.

Uruguayan religious life includes Polish-Russian, German, Hungarian, and Sephardic groups. There are 14 Orthodox synagogues and a Conservative synagogue (the German community) in Uruguay. Chabad is not formally a member of the umbrella organization, although there is a Chabad House in Montevideo. The Conservative community is strengthened by the nearby Seminario Rabinico Latinamericano in Argentina (Hein 2003). Two Orthodox and two Conservative rabbis deal with communal needs, in addition to the unaffiliated Chabad. Kosher food is readily available, both locally produced and important (World Jewish Congress). About half of Israel’s annual beef imports comes from Uruguay (Kraft 1998). Yet, while Uruguay has 20 synagogues, only 6 hold weekly Shabbat services and only one functions on a daily basis (Luxner 2003).

There are three kindergartens, three elementary schools, and two Jewish high schools in Montevideo that serve 1,700 students. In addition, there is an Orthodox high school which includes a synagogue and kollel. Between one third (World Jewish Congress no date) and 70 percent of Jewish youth are enrolled in a Jewish school (Tal 2005, 286). Four schools teach courses in both Spanish and Hebrew (World Jewish Congress no date). Zionist youth groups are very strong in Uruguay (Zimmer 2003, 11). They include B’nai Akiva, Hashomer Hatzair, HaNoar HaTzioni, and Betar (Hein 2003).

Jewish life in Uruguay is centered in Montevideo, which has a Jewish museum, a Jewish cemetery, monuments to victims of the terror attack on the AMIA Building in Argentina, Israeli soldiers, and a Holocaust memorial. Next to the opera house (Téatro Solis) is a square named after Golda Meir. Jewish university students are served by Montevideo's Hillel, founded in 2001 (Hein 2003), the first Hillel founded in Latin America (Luxner 2003). Montevideo is also the home of ORT Uruguay, the largest private university in the country. Eighty percent of the graduates from Jewish high schools study at ORT, which also provides certification and courses for adult Jewish education, teachers, communal leaders, and Jewish communal professionals. ORT Uruguay also provides computer and information technology services to Uruguayan Jewish schools.

Some sites of interest include the Albert Einstein Monument in Montevideo; the Hebrew Integral School; and several synagogues, such as the Rabbi Meir Ba'al Hanes Sepharadic Synagogue, The New Israel Congregation, Vaad Hair Institute, the Polish Synagogue, and Yavne Synagogue. In 1994, a Holocaust memorial was inaugurated by the Uruguayan government in Montevideo.

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionism, and Existential Problems of the Community

Uruguay opened its first diplomatic mission in Israel in Tel Aviv in 1951 and moved it to Jerusalem in 1956, upgrading it to an embassy. In 1980, however, along with several other countries, Uruguay moved its embassy out of Jerusalem to Tel Aviv (Clairborne 1980).

Demographic Movement and Emigration

In 2004, 20,000 Jews resided in Uruguay, making up approximately 0.67 percent of the total population (Tal 2005, 155, 265). Despite a presence in Uruguay since at least the 18th century Latin America's economic crisis at the beginning of the 21st century has led to a decline in the population, and much of the community has immigrated to Israel, Spain, and North America. Before Uruguay's economic crisis, more than 40,000 Jews called Uruguay their home. More than 95 percent of the Jewish population lives in Montevideo (Hein 2003). A few hundred families live in Paysande, Salto, and Punta del Este, and in small towns in the interior of the country (World Jewish Congress, no date).

In 1970, the Jewish population stood at 55,000, but by 1972, the population had already declined to 48,000 (Elkin 1980, 210). Although it is possible that the abatement of the crisis may lead to some reverse migration, it is highly unlikely that this Jewish emigration will abate, as it has been a feature of Uruguayan life since the 1970s.

Almost 1,000 Jews immigrated to Israel from Uruguay in 2002–2003, following a general trend of Jewish exodus from Latin America (Tal 2005, 180). The Jewish Agency set up an office in Montevideo to facilitate aliyah (Zimmer 2003). Others have moved to Spain and the United States.

Selected Bibliography

- Elkin, Judith Laikin. 1980. Jews of the Latin American Republics. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Freedman, Samuel G. 2003. "A Treasure Hunt for Lost Memories." The New York Times on the web. <http://www.wehaitians.com/a%20treasure%20hunt%20for%20lost%20memories.html> (accessed April 22, 2007).

- Hein, Avi. 2003. "Uruguay." Jewish Virtual Library. <http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/vjw/Uruguay.html> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Institute for Jewish Policy Research and American Jewish Committee. 1996. "Uruguay." <http://www.axt.org.uk/antidem/archive/archive1/uruguay/uruguay.htm> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Kraft, Dina. 1998. "Uruguay president pushes for trade with Israel." March 30. Associated Press.
- Tal, Rami, ed. 2005. The Jewish People Policy Planning Institute Annual Assessment 2004–2005: The Jewish People between Thriving and Decline. Jerusalem: Gefen.
- "Uruguay." 1972. Encyclopaedia Judaica, Vol. 16. Jerusalem: Keter.
- "World Jewish Communities—Latin America: Uruguay." http://www.worldjewishcongress.org/communities/latinamerica/comm\_uruguay.html (accessed April 22, 2007).

Jews in Venezuela

Carlos Colina

---

General Population: 27,030,656

Jewish Population: Estimates range from 25,000 (Confederation of Jewish Associations of Venezuela) to 15,000 (World Jewish Congress)

Percent of Population: Approximately 0.08 percent

Jewish Population by City: Caracas, 10,000; Maracaibo, 2,500; Porlamar, 2,000; Valencia, 1,000

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Spanish conversos, Moroccans, and Middle Easterns in the beginning of the 20th century; Eastern Europeans since the 1930s and after World War II; and Israeli, Canadian, and American business entrepreneurs after the oil boom. The community is almost evenly divided between Ashkenazim and Sepharadim.

Languages Spoken: Nearly all speak Spanish. Ladino/Hakitia and Yiddish are rarely spoken.

---

Historical Overview

1620 Anousim sett in Venezuela after the Spanish conquest of New Andalusia and in the port city of Tucacas. Most assimilate into the general population, and by the middle of the 1600s, few Jews are left in Venezuela, but Jews from Curaçao continue traveling to Venezuela to trade. Some may have settled in the mainland, although there are no records left.

1802 Simón Bolívar, Venezuela's liberator, finds refuge and material support for his army in the homes of Jews from Curaçao, like Mordechai Ricardo and brothers Ricardo and Abraham Meza, who offer help to Bolívar in his fight against the Spanish Army

1819–1821 The ties between Jews in Curaçao and Venezuela increase more dramatically when the new Venezuela constitution calls for religious freedom.

1820 The first Jewish family settles in the town of Coro, the oldest city in the Americas and an United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization Heritage Site. The town has a Jewish cemetery that still exists.

1844 Groups of Jews from Morocco come to the port city of Barcelona.

- 1870 The government of Antonio Guzmán Blanco becomes very interested in attracting immigrants to Venezuela, in the form of permanent labor contracts. Abraham Lasry, Enrique Levy, and Alejandro Mondolfi act as the consular agents in southwestern Europe.
- 1875 The Jews of Barcelona are granted permission to establish a Jewish cemetery, which has disappeared now.
- 1884 A large group of Jews starts to arrive in the country from Morocco, especially from Tétouan, Casablanca, Fés, and Melilla.
- 1894 The first Sepher Torah arrives in Caracas, where the religious services are held at the house of the Pariente brothers.
- 1907 Enrique Levy is among the founders of the Israeli Beneficial Society, an association of Moroccan Jews.
- 1916 The Jewish community obtains its first graveyard in Caracas in an area that has expanded into the General Cemetery of Southern Caracas.
- 1919 Alejandro Mondolfi becomes the president of the assembly that founds the Asociación Israelita de Venezuela, the institution that groups the Sephardic community of Venezuela.
- 1921 Jewish immigrants from Russia and Poland form the Sociedad Israelita Ashkenazit de Caracas.
- 1931 The Hacóaj Sports Club is founded
- 1933 Saúl Angel founds the magazine Israel.
- 1934 Venezuela imposes specific restrictions on Jewish immigration, which remain in effect until after the 1950s.
- 1935 The Maccabi Community Club is founded
- 1939 The government of General Eleazar López Contreras permits the arrival of a group of Jews escaping from Germany in the vessels Caribia and Königstein, which had been banned from docking in several ports of the Americas.
- 1941 The Talmud Torá school is founded in Caracas.
- 1942 The Asociación Unión Hebreo-Polaca is founded.
- 1943 The newspaper Mundo Israelita is founded by Moisés Sananes and Eduardo Katz. It is refounded in 1973 as Nuevo Mundo Israelita by the merger of the magazines Maguen, Unión, and Mundo Israelita.
- 1945–1946 A large group of Holocaust survivors arrive from Romania, Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Greece, Austria, and Germany. Many of these newly arrived immigrants change their family names and use their fluency in German to enter the country and avoid the restrictions.
- 1946 The Moral y Luces Herzl-Bialik school is founded, which has evolved into the base of the community educational system.
- 1947 Venezuela votes in the United Nations in favor of the partition of Palestine and is among the first countries that recognizes the State of Israel
- 1950 The Jewish community has grown to around 6,000 people, even in the face of immigration restrictions. The Unión Israelita de Caracas is founded. Menachem Begin visits Venezuela.
- 1956 After Morocco declares its independence, a large numbers of Jews come from Casablanca, Tétouan, Tangier, Melilla, Ceuta, and other cities in Northern Africa, where Spanish is the prevailing language.

- 1958 After the fall of dictator Marcos Pérez Jiménez, more than 1,000 Jews immigrate to Venezuela from Egypt, Lebanon, Syria, Greece, Turkey, Persia, and some even from Israel. Golda Meir visits Venezuela.
- 1962 Confederation of Jewish Associations of Venezuela (CAIV), the umbrella organization that groups all the Jewish associations in Venezuela, is founded.
- 1968 Yitzhak Rabin visits Venezuela.
- 1975 The Hogar Javad Lubavitch is founded. The Instituto Venezolano de Investigaciones Científicas (IVIC) signs a cooperation agreement with the Chaim Weizmann Research Institute. The Moral y Luces Herzl-Bialik school receives the Zalman Shazar Award for the best Jewish school in Latin America.
- 1980 Baruj Benacerraf, a Venezuelan-born U.S. scientist, is awarded the Nobel Prize in Medicine.
- 1982 The Center for Sephardic Studies is founded.
- 1983 The Colegio Sinai, a school for Haredi Sephardim, is founded.
- 1986 Yitzhkan Navon visits Venezuela. The community organizes the sixth Pan American Maccabi Games in Caracas.
- 1989 Yitzhak Rabin visits Venezuela.
- 1990 The synagogue Or Meir is founded in Margarita Island.
- 1992 The Israeli chief rabbi, Meir Lau, visits Venezuela.
- 1995 Shimon Peres visits Venezuela. A new cemetery, Gan Menujá, is founded in an annex of Cementerio del Este. The Venezuelan Post Authority issues stamps commemorating the independence of Israel.
- 1996 Ivonne Attas, a Jew born in Damascus and a former soap opera star, is elected mayor of the municipality of Baruta, in Caracas. She is succeeded in 2000 by Henrique Capriles Radonski, a descendant of Holocaust survivors.
- 1998 The largest mall in South America, Centro Sambil, opens in Caracas. It was developed by Constructora Sambil, owned by Salomón Cohen
- 1998 The Sepharadi Museum Morris E. Curiel is founded in Caracas. CAIV organizes the first Latin American Cultural Jewish Congress.
- 2005 Jonathan Jakubowicz breaks all records by having his opera prima, Secuestro Express, become the best-selling Venezuelan movie of all times. Movie critics expected it to be the Venezuelan candidate to the Oscars, but the Venezuelan government rejected it because it portrays a kidnapping in Caracas and shows the underbelly of the city.
- 2006 The conflict between Israel and Hizbollah brings unrest to Venezuela, where members of the Arab community, supported by members of the Venezuelan government, march toward the Israeli embassy and burn Israeli flags in the streets.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Former generations included door-to-door retailers, jewelers, small family businesses, shops, and pharmacies. Venezuelan Jews are considered one of the nation's most affluent communities. Jews have developed the country's textile, chemical, construction, and banking sectors. Banco del Caribe, Banco de Venezuela and BancoFondoComún were founded by Jews. The modern Jewish community has focused more on higher education and has involved in most sectors of Venezuelan society. Still, they have been unable to gain high ranks in the military, foreign ministry, and judiciary.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Cultural organizations concentrate in Caracas, where there is a social club, Club Social y Deportivo Hebraica, for Ashkenazi and Sephardic Jews. The community has a weekly newspaper, Nuevo Mundo Israelita. Prominent Venezuelan Jews in the arts include Isaac Chocrón, playwright, and writer; Irene Pressner, plastic artist, recipient of the Great Prize of the Museum of Latin American Art in 2006; Sofía Imber, founder of the Caracas Museum of Contemporary Art; Moisés Kaufman, author of The Laramie Project and Gross Indecency: The Three Trials of Oscar Wilde; Offer Zaks, world-renowned dancer; Margot Benacerraf, founder of the Cinemateca Nacional; Elia Schneider, a movie director famous for films that depict gang and mafia issues in Venezuela; Salomón Jabukowicz, director of Secuestro Express, the most viewed Venezuelan movie of all times; Ilan Chester, singer and songwriter; and Rosalinda Serfaty, television actress.

Present Economic Conditions

Venezuela is home to one of the most successful Jewish communities. Most of the community belongs to the middle or upper class, and some very wealthy families control large companies like Locatel, the largest drugstore chain; Unifot, the largest chain of photo labs; Rolda, manufacturer of cosmetics; Grupo Sambil, which is responsible for building most of the malls in Venezuela, including the largest in Latin America; Punto de Fábrica, a chain of home decor retailer stores; Quinta Leonor and Mundo Graffiti, chains of department stores, and Almacenes Toledo, a chain of textile megastores. Many families own small businesses, such as furniture retailers or jewelry stores. The youngest generations have also followed professional careers in fields such as medicine, economics, and law.

Religious Denominations

Venezuela has 19 synagogues, 16 in Caracas and one each in Maracaibo, Valencia, and Porlamar. All are Orthodox. Chabad Lubavitch is expanding its activities in Venezuela.

Communal and Political Institutions

The oldest Jewish organization in Venezuela is Asociación Israelita de Venezuela, which was founded in the 1920s by Sephardic Jews. Caracas also has a significant Ashkenazi population, represented by Unión Israelita de Caracas founded in 1950; the ultra-Orthodox Rabinato de Venezuela; and a Hasidic congregation, Jabad Lubavitch de Venezuela. The community also has several Zionist organizations based in Caracas. The Confederación de Asociaciones Israelitas de Venezuela, associated with the World Jewish Congress, is the umbrella organization for all the communities in addition to Zionist organizations like the Jewish National Fund. Venezuela also hosts the Women's International Zionist Organization; Maccabi events; Zionist youth groups, such as Federación Zionista, Keren Kayemet Leisrael, and Keren Hayesod; and charitable action groups, such as Fraternidad Hebrea B'nai B'rith de Venezuela, ORT Venezuela, and others.

In 1946, the Colegio Moral y Luces Herzl-Bialik school was established. Student enrollment numbers are around 2,000. The school spans kindergarten to 12th grade, and the whole community takes an active role in the institution's affairs. The school's reputation for outstanding academic standards has attracted non-Jewish students as well, who make up around 10 percent of the school's student population. There are also Colegio Sinai, Yeshiva Ketaná, Beth Yaacov and Colegio Or Jabad, schools serving the most religious families, and one in Maracaibo, Colegio Hispano Hebreo Bilú.

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionism, and Existential Problems of the Community

There have been rare outbursts of anti-Semitism in Venezuela. In the 1930s, the government placed restrictions on Jewish immigration to the country, which remained in place until the end of the 1950s. Even today, few Jews engage in politics and are mostly absent from public administration and service. Recently, Venezuela's president, Hugo Chávez, made remarks that were considered anti-Semitic by some in the international community. Venezuelan Jewry, apparently not wanting to draw negative publicity, said they were taken out of context. Chávez also recalled the business attaché to Israel. Venezuelan Jews continue to maintain strong ties with Israel, and many volunteered in Israel during the Six-Day and Yom Kippur wars. In 1947, at the United Nations, Venezuela voted in favor of establishing a Jewish state, and the diplomatic ties between the countries have been close since then.

Relations between Venezuelan Arabs and Venezuelan Jews have ebbed and flowed in different periods. In the beginning of the 20th century, Arabs and Jews were frequently business partners, perhaps because both groups shared a common language, Arabic. Yet President Chavez has shown strong support for the Palestinian cause and supports Hezbollah and Iran in their stance against Israel. During the recent conflict with Hezbollah, a group of Arab-Venezuelans and supporters of the Venezuelan government marched toward the Israeli Embassy, painted graffiti on the walls, and burned Israeli flags near the embassy and on the walls near Tiferet Israel Synagogue. Still, the younger generation of Venezuelans does not seem to care much about the Arab-Israeli conflict, and even today is possible to see Arab patisseries in the neighborhood of Catia in Caracas where some Jewish men buy sweets and drink coffee at the same table with Arabs, Greeks, and Armenians.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

Most of the community lives in Caracas. Countries of origin are mostly Morocco, Poland, Turkey, Hungary, Syria, Austria, Greece, Romania, and Iran. There has been a small but continuous decline in the community, as many younger couples make aliyah or emigrate to Florida or Spain, like many descendants of other immigrants have done recently because of the economic and political instability of Venezuela. Still, a small number returns and some Israelis, Americans, or South Americans come for business and after a certain time decide to stay, thus balancing the decline a bit.

Selected Bibliography

Corcos, Joseph. 1897. A Synopsis of the History of the Jews of Curaçao. Curaçao: Imprenta de la Libreria.

Jabad Lubavitch de Venezuela Web site [in Spanish]. <http://www.jabadve.com> (accessed May 3, 2007).

Nuevo Mundo Israelita, digital version [in Spanish]. <http://www.nmidigital.com> (accessed May 3, 2007).

Middle East

Jews in the Middle East

M. Avrum Ehrlich and David Straub

---

Countries (excluding Israel): Bahrain, Iran, Iraq, Kuwait, Lebanon, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Turkey, United Arab Emirates, and Yemen

General Population: 193,000,000 (2007)

Jewish Population of the Middle East: 40,000–50,000

Percent of Population: Less than 1 percent

Population of Jews by Country: Turkey, 17,000; Iran, 12,000–20,000; Yemen, 200; Iraq, 100; Syria, 100; Bahrain, 36

Languages Spoken: Judeo Arabic, Hebrew, and Arabic

---

Overview of the Middle East

Diaspora consciousness plays a significant role in the maturation of the Jewish people from their infancy. The earliest Diasporas in the second millennium BCE were divided between Egypt and the Middle East. The biblical patriarchs were immigrants and emigrants to and from these regions. The concept of exile and wandering, home, homelessness, and belonging are integrally sown from the histories and cultures of these regions into the biblical characters of Abraham; Jacob; Joseph and his brothers; and, of course, Moses, an Egyptian leader. The Hebrew people's relations with the kings and peoples of Assyria and Babylon forge a steady theme through the five books of Moses, the prophets and writings that compose the Old Testament. The New Testament reaffirms this Diaspora consciousness in its tales of the wandering apostles. David spent time in exile, as did Jeremiah, Ezra, and Nehemiah. Jonah is exiled in Nineveh, and the book of Esther takes place in the exile of Persia. Many of the psalms refer to exile; the famous "by the rivers of Babylon, where we sat down and cried as we remember Zion," puts into perspective the antiquity of the Diaspora experience in the Jewish consciousness. Jeremiah's warning, "[B]ecause you all walk after the imaginations of your own heart . . . I will cast you out of this land into a land that you don't know . . . which doesn't show you favour," gives the reason of sinfulness and the reason for the Diaspora and return to God as the solution for it. It is most likely that the Bible not only refers to the idea of exile in passing but also was very likely composed as a response to the early exilic experiences of its writers and editors and as a theological address to it.

The durability of the Jewish Diaspora, community life, national and religious identity, and homeland yearnings seems to have been forged because of the trickling rate of Hebrew migration from the Land of Israel to Babylon, allowing the first wave to put down the framework for the next. No doubt there was a high level of migrant assimilation into the surrounding culture, but as new waves of Jewish refugees arrived from the war-torn Jewish homeland, they reinforced a sense of identity and reinvigorated the older communities. Most important for the development of the psychological and theological instruments to deal with exile and homelessness was the return of Jews from the first dispersion in Babylon back to Jerusalem. A theology of exile was constructed and implanted into the biblical texts that were put together after this phase. Future waves of migration took this message with them as they joined older communities. The effect was the emergence of a unique fusion of ideas and cultures and an early sense of trans-territorial and religious connectedness among the already widespread Jewish people.

The first formal dispersion took place from 722 to 586 BCE as a result of Assyria's defeat of the northern tribes of Israel: some dispersed to Persia, Nineveh, Resen, Calah, and Ashur, and some moved further east. Some moved to Antioch and Rezep in Syria, and others to Alexandria and Elephantine in Egypt. The initial wave of Judean deportees to Babylonia occurred in 597 BCE by officers of Nebuchadnezzar II, king of Babylon. The Judean king Jehoiakin was imprisoned and 10,000 metal workers exiled. The second wave occurred 11 years later, after the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 BCE. From the fifth to the second centuries BCE, Jews returned from Babylon to rebuild the Temple in Jerusalem; during this time the Bible is edited, compiled, and canonized, and the emerging religious leadership taught it as the word of God. The next period of mass migration occurred from 359–338 BCE, when Persia dispersed rebellious Israelites to Babylon, Mahoza, Cutha, Sura, Nippur, Pumbedita, and Susiana. Communities and traders move further eastward, and legends of the lost tribes of Israel emerged from the speculated fate of these exiles. The collapse of the Persian Empire and Alexander the Great's (356–323 BCE) imperial conquests permitted Jews to expand throughout the Hellenistic world, so that, by the second century BCE, Jews had spread from North Africa to India.

In the second century BCE, an independent Jewish kingdom had been established, but fratricidal infighting brought civil war, and in the first century BCE Judea fell under Roman subservience. In the first century CE, the people of Judea took up arms against the Romans, resulting in the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem and the dispersion of Jews across the Roman world. Jews were recorded in large numbers in cities throughout the Roman, and subsequently Byzantine, cities of the Middle East. In response to the creation of a Diaspora, Jews were forced to alter their religious traditions, and from the second to sixth centuries the Jewish communities and scholarship of Babylon produce the Babylonian Talmud. The Christian takeover of Byzantium in the fourth century marked the beginning of centuries of horrific persecution of Jews throughout the empire.

To the south, on the Arabian Peninsula, Jewish communities were widespread, and there were even instances of the mass conversion of non-Jews. The most notable example of this was in the early sixth century in the Himyarite kingdom in modern Yemen, where the last Tubba Himyarite king is reported to have converted to Judaism and waged war against the Christian Ethiopians, who eventually routed the Himyarites. In the seventh century, Jewish tribes resisted Muhammad and his followers as the Prophet consolidated the territory surrounding Mecca and Medina during the creation of the first Islamic Empire. In the 620s in Medina, three Jewish tribes—the Banu Nadir, Banu Qurayza, and Banu Qaynuqa—were divided and conquered during Muhammad's takeover of the city, and in 629, Muhammad routed the Jews of the Khaybar Oasis, located nearly 100 miles northwest of Medina. Muhammad's successors would later expunge Arabia of its Jewry through conversions and expulsions, and with the exception of a Jewish presence in Yemen that has survived up to the present day, few Jewish communities are known to have inhabited the Arabian Peninsula after the first millennium of the common era. Throughout the northern regions of the Middle East, in particular the former Byzantine territories, the establishment of the Arab caliphs in the seventh century marked a period of relative tolerance and legal protections, although Jews were officially discriminated against and instances of anti-Semitic violence occurred. Jews suffered greatly in 1096 during the First Crusade, when Christians inflicted horrific bloodletting of Jews and Muslims along the Mediterranean coast. During the successive Crusades, Jewish populations were massacred and synagogues were leveled.

The Ottoman Turks' rise to power in the Middle East in the 14th century and their benevolence toward Jews turned the region into the primary destination for European Jewish refugees. From the 1370s to the 1490s, waves of Jews expelled from Hungary, France, Italy, Germany, Spain, and Portugal settled in Ottoman lands at the invitation of the sultans. Jewish communities flourished in Jerusalem, Damascus, Egypt, and across Anatolia; Constantinople had a population of tens of thousands of Jews and dozens of synagogues. Under the Ottomans Jews were permitted to live in organized communities that had a large degree of autonomy and were represented by a chief rabbi. Many court physicians, diplomats, and wealthy entrepreneurs were Jews, and Jewish culture and literature flourished across the empire. As the Ottoman Empire entered a period of decline, the goodwill bestowed on Jews was occasionally violated by malicious rulers; such was the case with the massacre of Jews during the reign of Ibrahim I (1640–649). In the 19th century, the Ottoman Empire began to splinter, until the empire was completely dissolved after World War I. From this point on, the fortunes of Jewish communities in the Middle East depended on the political and cultural nuances of each individual state.

In the late 19th century, the Zionist movement was founded to resettle Jews in the lands of the ancient Israelites. In 1896, Theodor Herzl published The Jewish State, and by the end of the century communities from across the Diaspora had made aliyah and founded settlements across Palestine. The British acquisition of Palestine after World War I led to hopes that a Jewish homeland would soon be created, but conflict with the Arab occupants of the region and infighting among the Jewish militias brought violence rather than independence. Rabid anti-Semitism on behalf of European fascists in the 1930s brought an influx of Jewish refugees to the Eretz Israel and further violence with the Arabs. The strong ambivalence many European Jews had for immigrating to the Holy Land was transformed into fervent support for Zionism among the survivors of the Holocaust after World War II. The creation of an independent Israel in 1948 marked the highest point in Judaic history in the Middle East in 2,000 years. Jews from across the region, and the world, left their homelands to make aliyah. At the same time, the Arab-Israeli wars heightened anti-Semitism in the region, which was only exacerbated after Israel's occupation of Arab lands in 1967. The creation of a Jewish state brought religious and linguistic revival, an indefatigable pride in the Jewish race, and an unparalleled degree of security, yet outside of Israel the remaining Jewish communities in the Middle East were decimated by migration and frequently found themselves victims of anti-Israeli and anti-Semitic violence. The future for the remaining Jewish communities in the Middle East outside of Israel remains bleak, as emigration and an aging population takes its toll on Diaspora communities.

Israelites and Judeans in Assyria in Ancient Times

Ran Zadok

---

The documentation for Israelites and Judeans in Upper Mesopotamia, notably Assyria proper and the Habur and Harran regions, is meager, but the ever-increasing corpus of cuneiform documents enables scholars to evaluate and to some extent quantify the evidence for their presence. Israelites are recorded there from ca. 710 BCE, that is, about a decade after the fall of Samaria, and Judeans after the deportation by Sennacherib in 701 BCE. The identification of Israelites-Judeans in Assyrian sources is difficult. Direct evidence for them in Assyrian sources is scanty. Very few individuals are explicitly designated as “Samaritans.” From the context (one Samaritan is mentioned in a letter from Gozan where two bearers of Yahwistic names are recorded) it seems that the Samaritans were deported Israelites rather than inhabitants of the province of Samaria.

All the common individuals who can be regarded as Israelites-Judeans in Assyrian sources are identified as such only according to their names. The most reliable criterion for their identification is the occurrence of the theophoric element Yhw in an individual’s name. This theophoric element is written Ia-(a-)u (with variants) in Assyrian cuneiform. People bearing names with the theophoric element Yhw are definitely Israelites-Judeans, seeing that no other ethnic group in the pre-Hellenistic Near East worshiped Yhw. Another typical Israelite-Judean name is, for instance, Hoshea. This name is not exclusively Israelite-Judean, but can alternatively originate from south Transjordan, notably Ammon. However, for all we know, no exiles were deported from southern Transjordan (Ammon, Moab, and Edom) to Upper Mesopotamia. Situated on the fringe of the Arabian-Syrian desert under constant threat from the Arabian nomads, these kingdoms were faithful vassals of Assyria: they owed their security and prosperity to the pax Assyriaca. At best there might have been a negligible number of corvée workers and auxiliary troops from there in Assyria proper, but they hardly settled there.

The pertinent statistical sample consists of about 80 Israelites-Judeans in the general Neo-Assyrian prosopographical pool of about 11,000 individuals. In Ostraca, seals and bullae from the kingdom of Israel dated ca. 850–720 BCE indicate that only 36 percent of the individuals bear Yahwistic names. Therefore, it stands to reason that the list of about 80 Israelite-Judean individuals is far from complete.

The earliest Israelites in Assyria proper are the 13–15 members of a Samarian troop of charioteers stationed at Calah, probably in 710–708 BCE. Like other specialized warriors from conquered lands, this Samarian troop was incorporated into the Assyrian army. Several other individuals in the last decade of the eighth BCE, who can be identified as Israelites according to their names and connections, also belonged to the military establishment according to documents from Calah and Nineveh. Paqaha (Pekah) refers to two individuals: an estate manager and a master builder. It is likely they were Israelites, too, but as the name is also explicable in Aramaic terms, it cannot be excluded that they may have been Arameans. Mannu-kî-Arbail was sold as a slave to an Assyrian in 700 BCE. Judging from his Assyrian name, he was probably born in Assyria, but his father, Ahiyau, must have been an Israelite.

More than 50 individuals recorded in Assyrian sources between 701 and 602 BCE are either Israelites or Judeans. Most are recorded in the documentation from the new capital of Nineveh and less in Calah and Assur, as well as in small settlements whose location is unknown. On the whole about 75 percent are recorded in Assyria proper and about 25 percent on the Habur (in Gozan and Dur-Katlimmu), where they were deported according to the Old Testament, as well as in the region between Gozan and Harran. There is no doubt that this ratio is due to the nature of the Neo-Assyrian documentation that originates mostly from the urban centers of Assyria proper. At least one letter may refer to Israelites in the Habur region: Arihi, an official based in Laqe, asks another official whether to tax the grain of the Samaritans. The name Sakuua, which is recorded in Dur-Katlimmu, may be the same as Skwy

An officer conducts two Judeans to the king during the Assyrian conquest of the Jewish fortified town of Lachish. From the Palace of Sennacherib at Nineveh, eighth century BCE. (Erich Lessing/Art Resource, NY)

(with an initial lateral Sin). The latter (father of Hnn) is recorded in Tel Michal (in the southwestern Sharon near Herzliya) in the fourth century BCE (or rather in the fifth century) and may refer to a Samarian as the site probably belonged to the province of Samaria then.

Judah is associated with one individual: a certain A-du-ni-ih-a (the seah of Judah is mentioned in Nineveh in 660–659 BCE). Was he a Judean merchant who came to Nineveh on business? All of the Israelites-Judeans are mentioned in Neo-Assyrian cuneiform tablets, except for one, who is recorded on a tablet written in Aramaic. A few individuals belonged to the military establishment (a cohort commander, an archer, and a bodyguard), but the occupations of most individuals are not reported as many of them played the passive role of witnesses. But this indicates that they were basically free citizens. Moreover, some sold slaves, one acted as a guarantor of an estate manager, and others were involved in transactions.

Several Israelites-Judeans from Dur-Katlimmu engaged in agriculture at the very end of the seventh century BCE under Babylonian rule a few years before the first Babylonian deportation from Judah. A father and his son from Maalanate in the Gozan-Harran region were also employed in agriculture seeing that they sold straw in 665 BCE. No Israelites-Judeans climbed up the higher socioeconomic echelon, and none acted as a senior official. Some were minor functionaries (in charge of livestock and perhaps poultry in Gozan and a foreman from Assur). Hoshea, who was sold to an estate manager, was presumably a debt-slave if to judge from the fact that he had two wives. An Aramean from Gozan (or its region) was obliged to hand over the female slave Dayyana to Hoshea. Perhaps they were related. A somewhat clearer case for cohesion among Israelites-Judeans may be the fact that their fields in or near Dur-Katlimmu were located not far from each other.

The occurrence of several Israelite-Judean witnesses in the same deeds may also indicate a certain degree of social cohesion. However, it is very likely that most of the descendants of the exiles from Israel (Northern Kingdom) and Judah in the period preceding the Josianic reform did not resist the Assyrian declared policy of absorbing the numerous deportees. In the almost total absence of filiation in the neo-Assyrian record, it is impossible to trace a continuity of the Israelites and Judeans during the three or four generations, at least on the level of the individual. In other words: it cannot be demonstrated whether the Israelites-Judeans residing on the Habur in the last decade of the seventh century BCE were descendants of the Israelite-Judean exiles 120–180 years earlier or whether they originated from recent waves of unrecorded deportations.

There is ample evidence for immigration from Upper Mesopotamia to Babylonia: so far more than 150 individuals with Assyrian names or explicitly defined as Assyrians are recorded in Chaldean and Achaemenid Babylonia. A cohesive group of Assyrians is recorded in the archive of Ishar-taribi from Sippar, the Babylonian temple city that was close to Upper Mesopotamia, with connections to Hindanu on the Middle Euphrates and Rusapu near the Habur. It stands to reason that at least one Judean family, that of Iashe-iama (Isaiah), who is recorded at Sippar (531–530 BCE), might have arrived from Assyria or another part of Upper Mesopotamia in view of the Assyrian name of his daughter.

Selected Bibliography

- Becking, B. 1992. The Fall of Samaria. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Dalley, S. 1985. "Foreign Chariotry and Cavalry in the Armies of Tiglath-Pileser III and Sargon II." Iraq 47: 31–48.
- Younger, K. Lawson, Jr. 1998. "The Deportations of the Israelites." Journal of Biblical Literature 117: 201–227.
- Zadok, R. 2002. The Earliest Diaspora: Israelites and Judeans in Pre-Hellenistic Mesopotamia. Tel Aviv: Diaspora Research Institute, 7–26, 48–50.

Judeans in Babylonia in Ancient Times

Ran Zadok

---

Judeans were deported from Judah to Babylonia in two major waves by the officers of Nebuchadnezzar II, king of Babylon. The first wave took place in 597 BCE. It was headed by King Jehoiakin and included 10,000 metal workers. The second wave occurred 11 years later, after the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 BCE. This deportation included mostly the urban elite, notably the population of Jerusalem. This information is based on the account of the Old Testament (2 Kings, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel), which is supplemented with some details by Flavius Josephus. What follows is based mainly on Babylonian sources.

There is considerable extra-biblical evidence for the continuous presence of the exiles in Babylonia. Unlike the Old Testament, these external sources by their very nature do not allow scholars to present a continuous historical narrative, but they are sufficient for reconstructing a profile of the Judeans in the Babylonian Diaspora during 270 years (ca. 620–350 BCE). Regarding the settlement of the exiles in Babylonia, Jehoiakin was held hostage in Babylon. He is mentioned there, together with his sons and other Judeans of his retinue. His title is "the son of the King of Judah." He was considered the legitimate Judean ruler by the Babylonian authorities.

There is some evidence for the presence of Israelites or Judeans in and around Babylonia before the deportations. At least two such individuals are recorded there, one (Girrema) is mentioned in the Babylonian city of Nippur in 623 BCE, that is, 26 years before the first deportation. He is mentioned in a transaction of the Ebabbarra temple of Sippar (northern Babylonia). This temple bought sheep and goats in central or south Babylonia. The possibility that Girrema arrived from Upper Mesopotamia, where Israelites and Judeans had been found since ca. 732 BCE, cannot be excluded, the more so since several Judeans or Israelites resided just northwest of Babylonia on the Lower Habur river, which came under Babylonian control after the demise of the Assyrian Empire. They are recorded in deeds from there in 602 BCE, just five years before the first deportation. There is good reason for thinking that among the people who migrated from Assyria to Babylonia in that period there were also Israelites and Judeans. Hundreds of Assyrian immigrants and their descendants are recorded in Babylonia between the seventh and fifth century BCE. According to the Babylonian documents, the Judean deportees were settled in northern and central Babylonia. Several hundred Judeans are recorded in these documents.

Regarding the identification of the Judeans in Babylonian documents, most of the evidence is indirect and implicit. The gentilic "Judean" (Yahu:da:yu) is recorded just once: only King Jehoiakin is explicitly defined as a Judean in the Babylonian sources. All the common individuals who can be regarded as Judeans in Babylonian sources are identified as such only according to their names. The most reliable criterion for their identification is the occurrence of the theophoric element Yhw in an individual's name. This theophoric element is written in two different ways in Babylonian cuneiform: Ia-a-hu-u (mostly as the first component in theophorous names) and Ia-a-ma (exclusively as the final element of such names). Both spellings have variants. People bearing names with the theophoric element Yhw are definitely Judeans, seeing that no other ethnic group in the pre-Hellenistic Near East worshiped Yhw. Other typical, but not exclusive Judean names are Hoshea, Shab-betai, and Simon.

The identification of Judeans in the abundant general documentation from first millennium Babylonia is with various degrees of plausibility. It is very difficult to distinguish between Hebrew names and Phoenician ones. Yet most of the 200 or so individuals identified as Judeans bore Yahwistic names or were blood relatives of persons having such names (the percentage of homonymous individuals, who may be physically identical with each other, is negligible in Babylonia). This statistical sample has about 50 percent Yahwistic names, a proportion comparable to that of the lists in Ezra-Nehemiah, but lower than in Elephantine. This may encourage the assumption that the numbers of most of the Judeans in the huge Neo/Late-Babylonian corpus were rounded up. Unlike other ethnic groups, the identification of Judean names is relatively easy, the occurrence of the element Yhw being a particular boon. On the other hand, most of the other ethnic groups lack reliable criteria for identification, the more so since gentilics occur quite rarely. For example, it is difficult to distinguish between Arameans and Arabians, and therefore scholars have to be content with the general definition of "West Semites."

As was already stated, almost all the information comes from Babylonian sources and is dictated by their types. This documentation consists of two main types of archives, namely temple archives and private archives. Royal archives are very rare in Babylonia. Only one small royal archive has been discovered there. Fortunately, King Jehoiakin and his dependents are recorded in this royal archive. The temple archives belong to the temple complexes of several Babylonian cities. The private archives were kept by long-established Babylonian families. All these archives include only clay tablets. They were written by Babylonians for Babylonians. Foreigners, namely non-Babylonians, did not write in cuneiform in Babylonia. The profession of the cuneiform scribe, which required a long training and considerable skill, was open only to autochthonous Babylonians. Therefore, one cannot speak of Judean or any foreign archives from Babylonia. What has been discovered are just by-products of a Babylonian scribal activity. It is very likely that the Judeans, like most of the other foreigners and a growing number of Babylonians, wrote in Aramaic on perishable materials, namely parchments and possibly papyri. Since the clay tablets were written by and for Babylonians, the Babylonians are overrepresented in the documentation. Almost all the recorded transactions are between Babylonian parties, or at least one party is Babylonian. Therefore foreigners, including Judeans, are severely underrepresented in the Babylonian documentation. Hardly any foreign population group in Babylonia passes the 2 percent barrier in the general statistics. Therefore, the impressive Judean sample at our disposal is necessarily fragmentary. The actual percentage of the foreigners was probably much higher than what has been obtained from the rich documentation, the more so because the countryside was predominantly Aramean and the population of Babylon serving as the winter residence of the Achaemenid king included many Persian courtiers and officials. In addition, the geographical distribution of the recorded Judeans is dictated by the provenance of the documentation.

Both the temple and the private archives are basically urban. Therefore the countryside is poorly represented. Only one archive is an exception to this general rule. The owners of the Murashu archive from Nippur conducted most of their transactions in the region of Nippur in central Babylonia. This archive exceptionally does not record almost exclusively members of the Babylonian elite, but it offers a fair representation of foreigners, including Judeans. In fact, until a decade ago it was thought that most of the Judeans in Babylonia resided in the Nippur region. This distorted view is now corrected, thanks to the discovery of a new archive from the colony of Yahudu (Judah) near Babylon and Borsippa.

Judeans resided or were active in most of the temple cities of central and northern Babylonia. They dwelt in the capital Babylon, Borsippa, Kish, Nippur, Isin, Marad, Sippar, and Opis, as well as in many small settlements in central Babylonia. Very few Judeans resided in southern Babylonia despite the rich Babylonian documentation from there (for instance, no more than four are recorded in Erech and its region, and none are mentioned at Ur). This geographical distribution accords well with the situation in later periods, namely the Parthian and Sassanian ones. Shushan, where two Judeans are mentioned, refers to the Achaemenid capital of Susa in Elam rather to a homonymous settlement in Babylonia. The exiles were brought to existing settlements, but some founded new colonies as implied by the name Tel-Aviv, where Ezekiel was active. Tel-Aviv renders Akkadian Til-abubi, namely "the mound of the deluge," a general term for an uninhabited place, which was colonized by deportees. This process of colonization and development was initiated by the crown and served its interests. Judeans resided in old and new villages together with other foreigners, notably Phoenicians and Philistines. These groups originated from neighboring regions and spoke mutually intelligible dialects. Problems of oral communication became less acute in the second generation of the exiles. All the long-established foreigners and their offspring acquired the Aramaic language that was the vernacular of Babylonia then. At least the village of Yahudu in central Babylonia (presumably not far from Babylon and Borsippa) must have originally been a Judean colony. Yahudu does not refer to Jerusalem: the background and details of the transactions conducted there leave no doubt that it was situated in Babylonia. Almost all the recorded Judeans are freemen. The notion that the deportees automatically became slaves is merely based on later analogies. Even the few Judean slaves who are recorded might have been debt-slaves. The number of Judean slaves and other dependents employed in the temple and royal sectors is very low, whereas many Judeans acted as witnesses and possessed seals, an indication that they were likely freemen. The exiles were employed by both the temple and the private sectors, which were in urgent need of workers. Exchange of workers and other resources between the crown and other sectors was a phenomenon of Babylonian management and economics.

Most Judeans engaged in agriculture as holders of small plots ("bow-lands"), lessees of fields (along canals), tenants, gardeners, and shepherds, but one has to bear in mind that this is dictated by the documentation, which is mostly about grain fields and palm groves. The almost total lack of information about Judean artisans is also to be ascribed to the nature of the documentation. Several tenants leased considerable tracts of land along canals. A group of Judeans promised Murashu in lieu of payment of their debt, 40 workmen to work on his estate for a month (Murashu had to pay the workmen wages). Their activity resembles that of the later and modern sarkal or "the head of the work," that is, a representative of the cultivators in southern Iraq, superintending their land and supplying workforce.

In later generations some Judeans became fishermen, an occupation that was unknown in Judah, which had neither watercourses nor seas with fish. It should be remembered that not only was fishing a new occupation for Judeans in Babylonia, but the character of the agricultural activity in the Babylonian alluvium, which was based on irrigated palm groves, was also entirely different from that in Judah. The adaptation of the deportees to their new environment was dictated by economic necessity and advocated by the Judean leadership in exile, who followed Jeremiah's recommendation (29:5) to build houses and plant gardens (gnwt is related to ganatu, which designates palm groves in Babylonian documents). These pragmatic leaders encouraged their people to be incorporated into the economic activity in Babylonia and stood up against some anti-Babylonian elements among the first generation of the deportees, whose activity could have endangered the community, as is made clear by the account in Ezekiel.

Most Judeans did not reach the higher socioeconomic echelon. Few Judeans acted as minor functionaries, for example, a rent collector of certain canals, a tax collector of a private firm and an overseer of the king's poultry. The high official Nehemiah from the capital Susa was an exception. Several royal merchants or commercial agents are mentioned, but this occupation was mainly in the hands of other foreigners. A Judean traveled from Sippar to Humadeshu in Persis, presumably on business.

It is noteworthy that relatively many Judeans were employed as alphabet scribes, who wrote in Aramaic script, in contradistinction to the exclusively Babylonian scribes writing on clay. The relatively new profession of alphabet scribes was open to foreigners. Since the seventh century BCE at the latest, these scribes wrote in Aramaic, the lingua franca of the three successive empires, namely the Assyrian, Neo-Babylonian, and Achaemenid. But why are Judeans and not Arameans or other West Semites overrepresented in this profession? Is it because literacy was widespread in Judah in the late pre-exilic period (that is to say, shortly before the destruction of the First Temple in view of the rich epigraphic find from Judah, especially ostraca and bullae)? One Judean, who belonged to the organization of the alphabet scribes of the army in or near Nippur, served with his fully equipped and armored horse in the army (in Erech).

The Judeans were organized in clans. Descendants of the deportees belonged to several big clans in the Nippur region. Scholars can follow their social ties and economic activity during three or four generations. A certain degree of social cohesion can be observed among the Judeans even many generations after the deportations. For instance, a Judean contractor hired agricultural workers who belonged to his own ethnic group. Most of these workers probably belonged to his own clan.

As is well known, the exilic period was crucial for the crystallization of Jewish religious law. Regrettably, the extra-biblical information about the religious character of the exiles in Babylonia is minimal as the documentation is exclusively economic. It is noteworthy that none of the documents where Judeans are recorded were issued on Saturday or during Jewish holidays, nor do such documents contain an oath to pagan deities. None of the few seals used by Judean signatories or witnesses of the deeds has a pagan scene on it. Moreover, the Judean onomasticon, that is to say the names borne by Judeans in the fifth century BCE, reveals to some extent a religious revival: there are more Yahwistic names in this period than in the preceding generation. This is gained by analyzing the genealogies. This revival is compatible with the restorative tendencies of Ezra and Nehemiah, who lived in the same age and hailed from the Diaspora.

The meager evidence for mixed marriages in Babylonia is presumably the exception rather than the rule. This phenomenon existed but was exceptional in Egypt, notably in Elephantine, in this period as well. After all, the Babylonian deeds, which were written for Babylonians, would have recorded only marriages where at least one party was Babylonian. The Judean marriage agreements were written on perishable materials and are not preserved. The only recorded mixed marriage is between a Babylonian and the daughter of a deceased affluent Judean (she was given in marriage by her mother and her older brother). This accords well with the fact that mixed marriages in Judah in the same period were practiced primarily by members of prominent circles, who had intensive social contacts with their pagan equals.

The exiles and their descendants preserved their separate and distinct identity even in Babylonia, which had a very ancient and prestigious cultural tradition, not only because of their strong religious heritage, but also because of the segregation of the Babylonian society. Unlike the Assyrians, who had a declared policy of absorbing the numerous deportees, the citizens of the Babylonian temple cities, namely the urban elite, did not mix with foreigners. They never gave their own daughters in marriage to non-Babylonians, but they themselves did marry foreign girls. This asymmetry is understandable if one takes into account that members of the Babylonian elite formed the most prestigious group in Babylonia, whereas the foreign deportees were at the bottom of the social scale. This situation was not significantly changed with the passage of time. The Judean social coherence, cohesion, and nonassimilation were enhanced by the fact that the Babylonian elite discouraged assimilation. A historical problem seems to be created by the comparison between the very low percentage of the Judean exiles in the general population of Achaemenid Babylonia (less than 1 percent) and their demographic strength in later Babylonia (one million Jews in Parthian Babylonia according to Josephus and a Jewish majority in parts of northern Babylonia according to the Babylonian Talmud). Yet two considerations lessen this problem: the first is the extreme underrepresentation of the Judeans in the Babylonian sources, and the second is the fact that the Jewish mission took place in Babylonia like in other parts of the Diaspora in the post-Achaemenid periods, especially under the tolerant Parthian rule. Proselytes are indeed recorded in the Babylonian Talmud.

Selected Bibliography

- Alon, Gedaliah, and Levi, Gershon, eds. 1989. The Jews in Their Land in the Talmudic Age (70–640 C.E.). Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Gafni, I. 1990. The Jews of Babylonia in the Talmudic Era: A Social and Cultural History [Hebrew]. Jerusalem: Zalman Shazar Center.
- Neusner, Jacob. 1965–1970. A History of the Jews in Babylonia. 5 vols. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill Academic Publishers.
- Neusner, Jacob. 2002. A History of the Jews in Babylonia: The Parthian Period. Binghamton, NY: Global.
- Zadok, R. 2002. The Earliest Diaspora: Israelites and Judeans in Pre-Hellenistic Mesopotamia. Tel Aviv, Jerusalem: Tel Aviv University.

Jewish Leadership in the Babylonian Diaspora: Second–Sixth Centuries

Geoffrey Herman

---

The foremost leader in Babylonian Jewry in the Sasanian era (224–651 CE) was the exilarchate. Based in the empire's capital, the exilarchate was the official representative of the Babylonian Jews before the crown. Rabbinic literature is the main source so the image of the exilarch reflects the exilarch's mixed relationship with the rabbis. The rabbis criticized the exilarchate as a symbol of Persian cultural assimilation and for the lack of identity with rabbinic ideals, but the role was also the focus of Babylonian Jewish patriotism vis-à-vis Palestine.

The Title

The title “exilarch” is English for what is known in the Aramaic sources: Resh Galuta. The term often appears in the collective: de-Bei-Resh Galuta, or (de-)Bei Nesiah, in the sense of a clan. The title alludes to its special affinity to Babylonia—the Exile, par excellence, from biblical times, thereby evoking the biblical past of this community. The alternative designation, de-Bei Nesiah, uses the Aramaic form of the Hebrew term Nasi—the supreme political leader. This title may refer to the exilarch's claim to be scions of the biblical house of David.

Source

The Palestinian Talmud (PT) and Babylonian Talmud (BT) are the contemporary sources on the Sasanian exilarchate for the third to fifth centuries CE. They do not, however, provide a great deal of reliable information, as they are only peripherally concerned with the exilarchate. Although geonic sources (7th–11th centuries CE), especially the Epistle of Rav Sherira Gaon and Seder 'Olam Zuta (SOZ), have also served many scholars in the past, they possess almost no independent historical value on the Sasanian exilarchate. Useful indirect contemporary sources include Persian epigraphic sources on the Sasanian empire and Syriac sources on Persian Christianity. The latter, particularly when relating to the catholicos, the Christian leader of equivalent status to the exilarch, offers a valuable comparative aspect for the fourth to fifth centuries CE and helps fill the void in knowledge on the exilarchate for the fifth to seventh centuries CE when the Talmudic sources run out. The historical portrayal of the exilarchate is largely determined by the methodological approach toward the sources. The popular portrayal of the exilarchate generally found in earlier scholarly literature is largely the result of a historicizing tendency prevalent among many scholars of ancient rabbinic literature, coupled with a certain romanticism and a lack of attention to the complex makeup of the BT, which incorporates diverse chronological and geographical strata and refashions earlier traditions. A critical reading of both the Talmudic and geonic sources, sensitive to their nature, genre, and inherent biases, yields notable differences, and is the basis for the following survey.

Origins

There can be no certainty about the beginnings of the exilarchate. The critical reading of the rabbinic sources points toward the last third of the third century CE as the period when scholars can say with reasonable certainty that an exilarchate existed, and it was probably within this timeframe that it first emerged. It probably began with the advancement of an influential Jewish clan to a position of representation during the reign of King Šāpūr I (241–271 CE), who was tolerant of non-Zoroastrian minorities. Rabbinic literature, accepting the exilarchal claim to descent through the Davidic line of Zerubabel in uninterrupted succession, saw no difficulty in anachronistically depicting the exilarchs alongside much earlier rabbinic figures.

Location

Location played a key role in the emergence and the authority of the exilarchate. The same was true for the catholicos, and the comparison is illustrative. In the late third or early fourth century, the bishop of the winter capital city—a city usually called Seleucia by the Christians, Weh-Ardašīr by the Persians, and Meḥoza by the Jews—first achieved hegemony over the Christian population of the entire Sasanian Empire. Seleucia essentially maintained this primacy for Persian Christianity throughout the Sasanian era. With regard to the exilarchate the situation is only a little more complex. Two Babylonian cities, Nehardea and Meḥoza, are consistently associated with the exilarchate. Both of these cities were close to the powers that be, Meḥoza, founded in the early third century, was both the provincial capital and the royal winter capital city. Its centrality is self-evident. Nehardea, a more ancient city, was in the vicinity of Pērōz Šāpūr, the next most important administrative and military city in the region. Nehardea and Meḥoza were linked by the Royal Canal (Nehar Malka) and probably belonged within the same Sasanian administrative district (šahrestān), also called Weh-Ardašīr, which extended along the Royal Canal. There are some indications that the direct influence of the exilarch over the Jewish communities was confined to the šahrestān of Weh-Ardašīr, neatly reflecting Weh-Ardašīr's position as a provincial capital. At the same time, the notion of the exilarch as a central monarchical authority over the entire Jewish community of Babylonia (or the Sasanian Empire) reflected the position of Weh-Ardašīr as the royal capital.

The exilarchs are depicted in the BT as wealthy and Persianized. Their duties would have assumed a reasonable acquaintance with Persian language and culture and a capacity to function in Persian high society. Their location—in the wealthy, urbanized, and more Persianized setting of the capital city also supports this characterization. Rabbinic sources reflect and comment on this reality, both subtly through the incorporation of Persian loanwords in exilarchate-related traditions, and directly through stories and anecdotes. Stories (e.g., BT Giṭin 14a-b; BT Qiddu-shin 70a-b; BT Berakhot 46b) describe the exilarchal circle as possessing Persian names, using Persian language, wearing Persian dress, and preferring Persian table etiquette. The luxurious lifestyle of the exilarch included horses, golden carriages, silk garments, gardens, and servants. Food is central to this image. Wild prey was served on his table. He is depicted as hosting banquets with multiple courses for large numbers of guests. Rabbis were among his guests.

Only a few rabbis are regularly associated with the exilarch. Some of these, however, are of considerable importance. Some might have been under the employ of the exilarchate, possibly as judges. The exilarchate would claim judicial hegemony and exclusivity. In addition echoes of the exilarchal prerogatives are heard in the realms of corporal and even capital punishment. The royal patronage apparently enjoyed by the exilarchate may have favored the judicial claim and acquiesced to the punitive powers the exilarchate exercised. However, an examination of the Talmudic evidence on the judiciary indicates that the exilarchate's claim to judicial power was part of an ongoing polemic over hegemony within Babylonian Jewry and was contested. The punitive powers described in the Talmud, which often seem extrajudicial, may have been limited, possibly to the regional jurisdiction of Weh-Ardašīr.

The rabbis' attitude toward the exilarchate was not uniform. In some sources there is neutral discussion relating to the exilarch; elsewhere there are expressions of pride and enthusiasm. More common, however, are critical and hostile comments. Many stories portray the exilarch as antagonistic toward the rabbis and their knowledge and treating them in a high-handed manner. The criticism fits into four principle categories: regional-Halachic, sociocultural, religious, and ideological, although there is some overlap between the categories.

First, there was criticism based on regional and Halachic differences with the exilarch symbolizing the local rabbinic law, or where representative rabbis from that region, such as Rav Naḥman, were treated as representing the exilarch. Disparaging anecdotes originating in places such as Kafri, Pumbedita, and Nehardea were aimed against Meḥoza. The focus was Halachic and the association between the local rabbinic school and the exilarchate was intended to delegitimize the rabbinical traditions of the locale.

Second, sociocultural condemnation stemmed from the perceived Persian lifestyle of the exilarchs and their ostentatiousness. This criticism reflected a broader conscious cultural conflict between rabbinic and nonrabbinic value systems and between varying approaches toward the assimilation of Persian cultural traits. The social differences between urban Meḥoza and the more peripheral Jewish centers accentuated the Halachic differences between the distinct geographical regions as already mentioned.

Third, religious criticism was based on the claim that the exilarchs did not conform to the rabbinic lifestyle, rules, and values. They were judged as lax in the observance of Sabbath and dietary laws. Religious and social censure merged in the allegations that their lifestyle was not commensurate with the sober condition of postdestruction exile and expectancy for redemption.

Fourth, the ideological criticism was based on a challenge to the leadership claims of the exilarchate. It appears to have been rooted in the anti-rulership tradition prevalent in rabbinic literature, which has biblical roots and expressed particular reserve concerning Gentile court affairs. It focused on the exilarchs' use and abuse of power, especially toward rabbis, often drawing allusions from the Bible. It also questioned, from a theological perspective, the existence of a Jewish "king" before the redemption. An exilarchate was not legitimate before the redemption or actually impeded this redemption (BT Sanhedrin 38a).

This criticism was articulated creatively through anecdotes describing encounters between rabbis and exilarchs or through the exegesis of suggestive scriptural verses. The banquet was a common setting for the interaction between rabbis and exilarch. Rav Sheshet was called on to respond when an exilarch declared before him: "You sages might be wise, but the Persians are more expert than you in table etiquette" (BT Berakhot 46b). Elsewhere Rav Sheshet demonstrated that a limb torn from a living animal was served on the exilarch's table (BT Giṭin 67b). Rav Hisda (PT Sota 9: 15 [24c]; BT Giṭin 7a) evoked a verse from Ezeiel 21, 31 "Thus sayeth the Lord, remove the turban and lift off the crown" in what seemed to be a challenge to the monarchical aspirations of the exilarchate. Rav Ḥisda, a rabbi of priestly descent, interpreted "turban" as symbolizing the high priesthood, and "crown" for the monarchy. He asserted that the exilarchate was advancing his "monarchic" pretensions despite the absence of an accompanying high priesthood. Monarchy and high priesthood must rise or fall together.

The symbolism of the exilarchate for Babylonian Jewry found its more positive manifestation in the realm of Babylonia's competition and polemic with Palestine. This dynamic of regional authority and rivalry mirrored the broader reality of two world-reaching empires in constant conflict. In the course of the Sasanian period, the prestige of the Babylonian Jewish Diaspora community grew until it began to view itself as equal or superior to the Jewish homeland. The exilarch would now come to embody Babylonia's alleged ascendancy over Palestine. The representative leaders of the two Jewish communities were believed to descend from the ancient Judahite royal line. The following literary and historical progression probably occurred. Patriarchal assertions of Davidic ancestry are first attested in the third century CE. An equal claim echoed forth from the exilarchate at some point in time. A series of separate but probably interdependent rabbinic anecdotes feature Judah I, the typological patriarch of rabbinic literature, and his contemporary, R. Hiyya, a key Babylonian rabbi who had migrated to Palestine (PT Kilayim 9. 4 [with parallels]; BT Horayot 11b; BT Sanhedrin 38a). R. Hiyya's two sons also feature in some of these traditions. The earliest trace would appear to have been in Palestinian sources originating in the rivalry between the disciple circles of R. Hiyya and Judah I. Within these stories, R. Hiyya and his sons functioned as a foil for the patriarch. The role of the exilarch was to symbolically affirm the superiority of Babylonian lineage. The earliest echoes of these traditions, then, would appear to reflect local Palestinian struggles over religious influence. This superiority of lineage then serves in the BT as a basis to assert the judicial superiority of Babylonia over Palestine (BT Sanhedrin 5a-b). In BT Sanhedrin 38a, however, the exilarch is, in fact, condemned alongside the patriarch. A story of a plot to depose the patriarch from the leadership of the rabbinic academy (BT Horayot 1b3–14a) also appears to address the rivalry between Babylonia and Palestine through its leadership but focusing on the tensions within the academy. One can read here how R. Meir and R. Natan conspired to overthrow the second-century Palestinian patriarch, Simeon b. Gamaliel. The story refers to R. Natan, a Babylonian rabbi, acquiring a position of eminence within the academy by virtue of his father's status. Geonic commentators believed his father was the exilarch. This story may be addressing the issue of exilarchal involvement in the world of the academies.

The history of the exilarchate during the latter part of the Sasanian era is no less enigmatic than the beginning. As the Talmuds reached completion the principle source is lost. Geonic sources provide sporadic cases of persecution in the late fifth century, including the execution of an exilarch in 470–471 CE, and SOZ describes in some detail an unsuccessful Jewish revolt led by an exilarch named Mar Zuṭra, that resulted in his execution. Some have viewed this period as a whole as falling under the shadow of religious persecution. The historical credibility of SOZ, however, has been questioned and the persecution appears to have been limited in duration. One should not, then, be too hasty in interpreting this lacuna in the source material as signaling the end of the exilarchate. The condition of Persian Christianity in this period, and in particular, the experience of the catholicate, is suggestive and serves to neutralize the lacrimoneous narrative based on the geonic sources. With respect to the relations between religion and state in the late Sasanian era, a more balanced picture is evident, suggesting the continued existence of representative leadership of religious minorities for most of this period.

Selected Bibliography

- Beer, Moshe. 1976. The Babylonian Exilarchate in the Arsacid and Sassanian Periods [Hebrew]. Tel Aviv, Israel: Dvir.
- Goodblatt, David. 1994. The Monarchic Principle. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck, 277–311.
- Herman, Geoffrey. 1996. “The Relations between Rav Huna and Rav Hisda” [Hebrew with English abstract]. Zion 61 (3): 263–279.
- Herman, Geoffrey. 2005. “The Babylonian Exilarchate in the Sasanian Era” [Hebrew with English abstract]. PhD thesis, Hebrew University.
- Lazarus, Felix. 1890. “Die Häupter der Vertriebenen.” Jahrbücher für jüdische Geschichte und Literatur X: 1–183.
- Neusner, Jacob. 1986. Israel's Politics in Sasanian Iran: Jewish Self-Government in Talmudic Times. Lanham, MD: University Press of America.

Jews in Iran

Irena Vladimirska

---

General Population: 68,688,433 (CIA figures)

Jewish Population: Estimates range from 30,000–40,000 (CIA figures)

Percent of Population: Less than 1 percent

Main Cities Populated by Jews: Tehran, Shiraz, Hamedan, Isfahan, Nadawand, Babul

Migration Routes and Ethnic Background: Sephardic Jews of Persian Empire, Bukharian Jews, Caucasus Jews, and a small Ashkenazi community arrived during World War II.

Language Spoken: Nearly all speak Persian; Judeo-Persian or Bukharian dialects are also often spoken.

---

Historical Overview

732–722 BCE In the first Babylonian Captivity, Jewish citizens of Gil'ad and eastern Galilee are resettled to the territory of Assyria by Tiglath-Pileser the 3rd; Jews from the territory of the Israeli kingdom are resettled to the territory of Mesopotamia and Midia several years later.

598–587 BCE The Jewish population of Iran increases considerably because of Nebuchadnezzar's conquest of the Judean kingdom. Jews settle in the inner provinces of Babylonia, such as Ecbatana and Shushan.

539–423 BCE Under the rule of Cyrus (539–530 BCE), Darius (521–486 BCE), and Xerxes (486–423 BCE), Jews are guaranteed their religious, social, and political rights as subjects of Achaemenid Empire.

30–50 CE Philo of Alexandria (20 BCE–50 CE), in his book Embassy to Gaius, and Flavius Josephus (37 CE–100 CE) in his The Wars of the Jews, repeatedly mention a - great number of Jews in all provinces of Midia, Babylonia, Elam, and Parfia. Numerous Jews make pilgrimage to Jerusalem during festivals of Sukkoth, Passover, and Shavuot.

- 224–642 The Babylonian Talmud is completed. It describes not only the ritual life of the Jewish community of the empire but also provides information on ordinary life in the Jewish communities of Midia, Elam, Susiana, and Khuzestan.
- 642 Iran becomes part of the Omayyad and Abbasid Caliphates. The juridical status of Jews as other non-Muslim minorities is defined as dhimmi' (subjects of Muslim state with restricted juridical, civil, and property rights).
- 762 Baghdad becomes the capital of the Abbasid Caliphate and the main center of international trade. The Jewish populations of Baghdad, Ahvaz, Isfahan, and Shiraz grow considerably. Numerous Jewish traders play an important role in commerce and become financial advisers and bankers of caliphs and viziers.
- 1258–1336 The Abbasid Caliphate is conquered by the grandson of Genghis Khan, Kulagu Khan who founds his protectorate over its territory. All the differences between Muslims and non-Muslims become irrelevant and Jews received a unique opportunity to become part of the administrative and cultural elite. The numerous Jewish administrators include Sa'd al Davla ibn Hibbat Allah ibn Munasib Ebheri (1240–1291), grand vizier of Il-Khan, and Rashid al Davla (Rashid ad Din) (1244–1318), who converted to Islam, became great vizier, and defined internal and external policy of the Ilkhane Caliphate.
- 1639 Shah Abbas, the first of the Sefavid dynasty (1571–1639), orders the Jews of the empire to wear special head covers. Practically all synagogues are closed and the study of Jewish religious literature is strictly forbidden.
- 1839 The Jewish community of Mashhad is forcefully converted to Islam; a year later, they leave for the territory of contemporary Turkmenistan and return to Judaism.
- 1898 The first Alliance school opens in Teheran.
- 1904 Five additional Alliance schools are opened in Hamadan, Isfahan, Senna, Shiraz, and Kermanshah.
- 1906 The first Iranian constitution is adopted. The constitution guarantees the Jews of Iran social, political, and economic equality.
- 1917–1918 The "Society on Studying of Hebrew" is organized in Iran, and the first Jewish publishing house opens in the capital city of Teheran. The first textbook on studying Hebrew is published and two periodicals on Judeo-Persian language, Ha Geula and Ha Haim, appear.
- 1919 An international Zionist branch organization opens in Teheran.
- 1944 A network of religious Jewish schools is established—Otzar ha Torah—as well as the youth Zionist organizations Ha Halutz, Ha Halutz ha Dati, and Bnei Akiva.
- 1958 The first Jewish hospital opens in Teheran.
- 1979 A religious revolution in Iran causes mass immigration of Jews to Israel and the United States. The head of the Jewish community of Iran is sentenced to death and executed. All the Jews are obliged to have a special indication mark in their passports; shops that belong to Jews are marked as well.

August 1980 Jews are deprived of the right to vote or elect Jewish deputies to the Iranian parliament.

1983 Ten leaders of the Iranian Jewish community are executed; Jewish property is confiscated, and every kind of connection with Israel or Zionist organizations is prohibited.

February 1994 Feizolla Mehubad, a member of the council of the Jewish community of Teheran, is executed for an attempt to establish a connection with his relatives in Israel.

1999 On the eve of the Passover holiday, 13 Jews from Shiraz and Isfahan are arrested and accused of spying for Israel. Among those arrested are a university professor, a teacher of Jewish schools, and a 16-year old boy. They are sentenced to prison (terms between 4 and 13 years). In 2002 all of the accused are released.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Traditionally, Jews of Iran were professionally involved in trade and handicrafts. During the rule of Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi (1941–1978), economic conditions of Jews improved, and many Jews found employment as government bureaucrats. The Jewish community of Teheran reached 40,000 members; most of them were businesspeople, doctors, pharmacists, and scientists. The Teheran Jewish College of Education trained teachers for Jewish schools. Literature on Jewish culture and tradition was published in Farsi and Hebrew.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

From 1948 until the Iranian revolution of 1978, Jewish cultural and educational organizations flourished and educational and publishing networks grew. In Teheran the Jewish periodicals Sinai, Alami Yahud, and Rahnamayie Yahud were published. In 1960, the Jewish society of Teheran was established; the society coordinated the activity of several Jewish organizations, such as Teheran Charity Center, Society of Jewish Women, ORT, and the Society of Jewish Intelligentsia of Iran. The Jewish Community of Teheran became a member of the World Confederation of Sephardi Jewish Communities.

Present Economic Conditions

In 1978, before the Islamic revolution, the Jewish population of Iran reached 80,000. Jews of Iran were the second largest Jewish community in the Middle East, after Israel, and were concentrated mostly in large cities such as Teheran, Isfahan, and Shiraz. The economic position of more than 80 percent of Jews was satisfactory, and 10 percent of Jews associated themselves with large Iranian manufactures and traders. After the revolution most Jewish property was confiscated and nationalized; the approximate value of this property was more than US$1 billion.

Jewish Education and Communal Institutions

According to available official information there are only 27 active synagogues left in Iran, 11 of them in Teheran. Synagogues play an important role as the Jewish community centers are where Jews feel considerably safe. There are three active Jewish primary schools, all of them located in Teheran. At the head of the schools stand Muslim religious authority, and among pupils can be found some Muslims. Pupils study the Torah in the Persian language; on Fridays, members of the volunteer Jewish organization Otzar ha-Torah give Hebrew lessons. There are two Jewish secondary schools and two colleges, all of them in Teheran.

The Jewish community of Teheran has a Jewish community hospital and a home for elderly Jewish citizens. Jewish cultural, student, youth, and women's organizations are officially registered, but their activity is controlled by Muslim religious authorities.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

For a period of 30 years (1948–1978), more than 61,000 Iranian Jews, mostly poor community members and members of different Zionist organizations, left for Israel. Between 1979 and 1984, an additional 55,000 Jews left Iran: more than 15,000 resettled in United States, about 11,000 immigrated to Israel, and the rest immigrated to Europe, Britain, and Canada. According to 2002 population estimates, the number of Jews in Iran is between 30,000 and 40,000 persons; most Jews live in Teheran, Isfahan, and Shiraz. The Jews of Iran are united by the Council of Jewish Communities.

Selected Bibliography

- Bahrampour, Tara. 2000. To See and See Again: A Life in Iran and America. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Brauer, Erich, and Raphael Patai. 1993. The Jews of Kurdistan. Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press.
- Goldberg, Harvey Ellis. 1996. Sephardi and Middle Eastern Jewries: History and Culture in the Modern Era. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Goldin, Farideh. 2004. Wedding Song: Memoirs of an Iranian Jewish Women. Hanover, NH: University Press of New England.
- International Sephardic Leadership Council. 2006. "Situation on the Plight of the Jews in Iran." www.sephardiccouncil.org/iran.html (accessed April 20, 2008).
- "The Jews of Iran." Jewish Virtual Library. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/anti-semitism/iranjews.html (accessed April 20, 2008).
- Lewis, Bernard. 1987. The Jews of Islam. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Sanasarian, Eliz. 2000. Religious Minorities in Iran. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Sykes, Ella Constance. 1910. Persia and Its People. Boston, MA: Adamant Media Corporation.

Jews in Iraq and Zionism

Esther Meir-Glitzenstein

---

Zionism: 1921–1941

Organized Zionist activity in Iraq began in the early 1920s, after the British conquest of Iraq during World War I. A Zionist organization was established in Baghdad. Members studied modern Hebrew, read Hebrew books and newspapers, held conversations and discussions, and engaged in sporting activities. The central figure in this activity was Aaron Sasson, who also ran a Hebrew school called Pardes Hayeladim. The active Zionists were drawn from the lower middle-class, traditional Jews who had been exposed to the early stages of the European Enlightenment and the Hebrew Haskalah. This organization was the product of local initiative, reflecting the growing Westernization of the Jewish community and the inroads of nationalist ideas. The ties between these local activists and the international Zionist movement were limited mainly to collecting funds and distributing aliyah certificates. In the early 1930s, a few dozen teenagers, influenced by teachers from Palestine on the faculties of schools in Iraq, established a Zionist organization (Ahiever). Some of these young people immigrated to Palestine, where they joined the rural settlement movement. This group disbanded after being discovered by the Iraqi authorities.

In the early 1920s, there were about 90,000 Jews in Iraq—the overwhelming majority of them in Baghdad, the rest in Basra, Mosul, and several dozen other cities, towns, and villages all over the country. They had been granted equal rights, including suffrage and eligibility for parliament. At that time the Jewish problem did not exist in Iraq, so the Jews had no need for the Zionist solution. By the 1930s, however, Jews were gradually being excluded from positions of political and economic influence, and their access to higher education was being restricted. During this period all Zionist activity was declared illegal.

While in Europe the authorities had sanctioned and sometimes even approved Zionist movements, primarily because their solution to the Jewish problem involved the Jews' removal from Europe, in Islamic countries Zionist activity encountered opposition, as it transplanted the Jewish problem into the very heart of the Islamic world. As the enormity of the problem became clearer, especially after the escalating bloodshed events between Jews and Arabs in Palestine during the 1920s and the 1930s, public and official opposition to Zionism intensified in Iraq. The charter the British granted to the Zionist Organization in Baghdad in 1921 was revoked after one year, and continued Zionist activity required discreet conduct and an absence of publicity. The bloodshed events of 1929 in Palestine triggered anti-Zionist demonstrations in Iraq; at the end of that year the Zionists were told to cease all activities, and teachers from Palestine were forced to leave. During the years of the Arab Revolt in Palestine (1936–1939), there were anti-Jewish demonstrations and grenade attacks against Jewish communal institutions and social clubs, and a number of Jews were murdered. The Farhud, a pogrom against the Jews of Baghdad on June 1–2, 1941, erupted in the context of anticolonialism, but it was also the culmination of the steady growth of anti-Semitism. The attempts of the Jewish social and intellectual elite to integrate into the political and social structure of Iraq suffered a major setback. Some people began looking for other solutions, such as emigration, or joined revolutionary movements like communism and Zionism.

Throughout this period, the Jewish population at large had a sympathetic attitude toward Zionism, though it was seen primarily as a solution for the poverty-stricken and persecuted Jews of Eastern Europe, not for Iraqi Jewry. The Iraqi rabbinic establishment never attacked Zionism because in Iraq secularization had never led to a loss of Jewish identity or the relinquishing of the Jewish community, so the secular character of Zionism was not perceived as a threat to Jewish identity. The Jewish communal leadership, on the other hand, related to Zionism cautiously and with some reservations, although it took no direct action against it. During the 1930s, motivated by concerns for the community's safety, communal leaders condemned Zionism, emphasizing their loyalty to Iraq and to Arab nationalism. In the 1940s, they were increasingly afraid the authorities might uncover the activities of the Zionist underground and bring disaster upon the community as a whole, but they still did not act against it.

As the position of Iraqi Jewry deteriorated, Zionist policy underwent an equally dramatic transformation. Faced with the extermination of European Jewry, which was going on at that same time, the Jewish leadership in Palestine concluded that the future of Zionism depended on finding alternative sources for potential immigrants. This realization led the Zionist leadership to reevaluate their attitude toward the Jews of Islamic countries and to formulate the "One Million Plan," whose primary goals were the immigration of one million Jews—Holocaust survivors and Jews from Arab countries—and the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine.

In an attempt to win over Jewish communities previously ideologically and culturally remote from Zionism, and thereby generate their mass immigration to Palestine, the Zionists established a network of organizations throughout the Middle East and North Africa. This included a new Zionist organization in Iraq, which existed from 1942 to 1951. The basis for its activity was a commonality of interests between Zionism, which was looking for an alternative source of potential immigrants, and Iraqi Jewry, which was trying to find a solution to the problem of survival in light of the imminent threat of additional pogroms.

The Zionist Mission to Iraq: 1942–1951

Zionist activities in Iraq started up again in the spring of 1942, directed by emissaries from the Mossad le-Aliyah Bet. They set up a branch of the pioneer movement Hehalutz, ran the Haganah self-defense organization, and organized clandestine immigration to Palestine.

Because Zionism was illegal in Iraq, it operated as an underground movement. Most activities took place in the basements of Jewish homes in Baghdad, and it was difficult to arrange large gatherings, trips, and outings; to set up training camps; or to conduct drills in the use of firearms. The young people knew that if they were caught by the authorities, they and their families would be subject to imprisonment and heavy fines. In these circumstances, only a single Zionist movement, Hehalutz, was established, and it prevented the establishment of any competing Zionist movements. Very soon Zionist branches were established in Basra and Mosul.

Zionist activity began with the teaching of Hebrew. The Hebrew library of the Ahiever organization, which had closed in 1937, was reopened; dozens of groups were established for the study of Hebrew, Jewish history, Zionist ideology, and other subjects. Membership, only a few hundred in 1942, reached around 2,000 by the middle of 1948. During its 10 years of activity, several thousand teenagers and young adults participated in the movement's programs.

Activities were directed by emissaries sent from Palestine, assisted by a council comprising emissaries and representatives of the local movement. They set up a number of standing committees responsible for activities related to education, culture, printing, fund-raising, and preparing candidates for illegal immigration to Palestine. They held regular conventions once a year on Passover, which were attended by representatives from various branches throughout the country.

After World War II, the pioneer movement found it increasingly difficult to maintain regular communication with Palestine and was also subjected to increasing pressure by the local authorities. Enthusiasm for Zionism among Jewish youth weakened, as the possibilities for stealing across the border into Palestine became fewer and fewer and the Communist Party—whose proposed solution to the Jewish problem did not involve uprooting oneself from Iraq—became more active. In addition, the leadership of the Yishuv in Palestine, preoccupied with attending to the Holocaust survivors in Europe, gave low priority to activities in Iraq, which caused disappointment and grumbling among movement members. These factors led many members of long standing to leave the movement.

As long-time members were leaving, Zionist activity expanded in other sectors. The Hehalutz Hatza'ir youth movement gained new members from among the teenagers in the poor sections of the Jewish quarter of Baghdad, while also increasing its influence among the youth of the wealthier neighborhoods (Battawin and Karrada). Branches of the Zionist movement were also established in dozens of towns and villages throughout Iraq, including the Kurdish area in the north. The culture of the Jewish community in this area was Kurdish in many respects—religious, traditional, and conservative and less well educated and less assimilated than those of central and southern Iraq. Among the Jews of Kurdistan, religious and mystical ties to the Land of Israel, as well as belief in the messianic redemption, were also stronger.

The establishment of these branches was extremely important. They strengthened ties among the different Jewish communities of Iraq and established two-way communication between the Jews of Baghdad and the Jews of the provincial cities, towns, and even remote villages.

After the State of Israel was established, Iraqi Jewry experienced a new wave of persecution, officially sanctioned and well organized. In the middle of July 1948, the Iraqi parliament made Zionism, like communism and anarchism, a criminal offense, carrying a sentence ranging from seven years' imprisonment to death. Jews found their freedom of movement restricted and emigration almost totally outlawed. Heavy fines were imposed on wealthy members of the community, and hundreds of Jews were arrested, imprisoned, or fined for the “crime” of maintaining ties with relatives or friends in Israel. In September 1948, Shafiq Ades, a Jewish millionaire, was executed after being convicted of selling surplus military equipment to the Israeli army. This event severely undermined Iraqi Jewry’s sense of security.

Illegal Immigration (Aliyah)

Throughout the 1940s Iraqi Jews immigrated illegally to Palestine. This aliyah had to contend not only with the British ban on entering the country, under the terms of the White Paper (May 1939), but also with the Iraqi ban on emigration, instituted in the mid-1930s. In the summer of 1941, after the pogrom in Baghdad, hundreds of Jewish youths arrived in Palestine by way of Syria and Transjordan. Beginning in 1942, Aliyah Bet agents took an active role in organizing this immigration, involving themselves in all its stages from the initial selection of the individuals in Iraq up to the moment when they finally crossed the border into Palestine.

During World War II, the route most frequently used for the illegal immigration passed through Syria and Lebanon. Hundreds of individuals traveled to these countries on various pretexts—medical treatment, studies, or sightseeing—and then continued on to Palestine. After Syria gained its independence in 1946, however, this was no longer possible. From then until the establishment of Israel, the main route from Iraq to Palestine passed through Transjordan. Transportation was arranged through Arab smugglers and could involve serious mishaps: some emigrants were abandoned along the way, others were robbed, and still others were caught and jailed. On one occasion two emigrants were killed in a traffic accident. This route was used primarily by members of the Zionist movement who had been waiting to leave for months; their departure was essential for maintaining the attraction of the Zionist movement. In 1947, several dozen young people, using forged passports, arrived in Palestine on planes that landed at the Lod airport; another hundred or so arrived on two clandestine flights.

According to the 1948–1949 census, there were approximately 9,000 Jews of Iraqi origin in Israel in November 1948, of whom approximately 3,000 had immigrated between 1941 and 1948.

The Defence Force (Haganah)

The Haganah in Iraq, an underground organization that operated between 1942 and 1951, was devoted to defending the Jewish community in the event of further pogroms. Founded by emissaries from the Yishuv in Palestine, it had several hundred members, both Zionists and non-Zionists. Its headquarters were in Baghdad, and there were branches in Basra and Kirkuk. The organization’s weapons and ammunition—primarily handguns, grenades, and Molotov cocktails—were brought in from Palestine, but as time went on they were purchased from arms smugglers within Iraq itself. In many cases these were weapons stolen from British army bases after British forces had evacuated the region.

The Haganah had a hierarchical structure. There was an emissary from Palestine at the top, the instructors in the middle, and the rank-and-file members at its base. In 1945, a defense strategy was developed for protecting the main Jewish population centers in Baghdad against any attempt by a frenzied mob to break into the Jewish quarter and massacre its inhabitants. The goal of the plan was to stop the rioters' advance and hold on until help could arrive. Wireless communications were to play a central role in transferring information to the Yishuv and calling for assistance. If the Iraqi authorities were to take part in an attack on the Jewish quarter, the Haganah would have no effective response other than a struggle to the death, following the examples of Masada and the Warsaw ghetto.

The Haganah's activities were dangerous, because their exposure and especially the discovery of their weapon caches might lead to their being labeled a terrorist organization, thereby endangering the entire Jewish community. Likewise, any irresponsible use of firearms might be seen as a provocation and cause riots. Both the Haganah high command in Palestine and the members of the local organization were fully aware of this dilemma. Nevertheless, they believed disbanding the Haganah, especially after the Holocaust, would be tantamount to abandoning Iraqi Jewry, leaving them defenseless in the event of a possible pogrom.

From Persecution to Emigration, and from Emigration to Expulsion

In October 1949, the Iraqi secret police arrested and interrogated dozens of Zionist underground members. The investigators, however, failed to uncover the Zionist organization, because the underground succeeded in smuggling many of its members to Iran and from there to Israel. By the end of December 1949, this flight to Iran had reached massive proportions, and thousands of Jews left Iraq. After trying and failing to stanch the illegal exodus, the Iraqi authorities decided to legalize and regulate it, on the assumption that only a few thousand young people would want to emigrate. On March 9, 1950, the Iraqi parliament passed a law authorizing Jewish emigration for a period of one year, on condition that emigrants surrender their Iraqi citizenship and promise never to return. In fact, the number of Jews who left Iraq far exceeded the government's expectations: more than 90 percent of the community (124,000) moved to Israel.

In the final stages of this operation, Iraqi Jewry was struck by a heavy and unexpected blow. On March 10, 1951, exactly one year after the passage of the law permitting Iraqi Jews to relinquish their citizenship, the government froze Jewish assets, leaving the Jews destitute. A short time later, the Zionist underground in Iraq came to an end after two Israeli emissaries (Mordechai Ben-Porat and Yehuda Tajar) were captured by the Iraqi secret police. This resulted in the arrest of dozens of members of Hehalutz, the Haganah, and the intelligence network run by the Israeli emissaries. Two members of the Zionist underground, Yosef Basri, who headed an Israeli spying network, and Haganah member Shalom Saleh, were hanged after being convicted of committing terrorist acts against Jews to encourage them to immigrate to Israel.

Selected Bibliography

- Moshe, Gat. 1997. The Jewish Exodus from Iraq 1948–1951. London: Frank Cass.
- Nissim, Kazzaz. 1991. Ha-yehudim be-Iraq ba-me'á ha-esrim [The Jews in Iraq in the Twentieth Century]. Jerusalem: Ben-Zvi Institute.
- Nissim, Rejwan. 1985. The Jews of Iraq, 3000 Years of History and Culture. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson.

Jews in the Ottoman Empire

Marc D. Angel

---

Historical Overview

When Spain expelled its Jews in 1492, thousands found haven in the domains of the Ottoman Empire. Jews had been living in the empire centuries earlier, but the influx of Sephardim led to the emergence of a major new center of Sephardic civilization. Throughout Turkey and the Balkans, as well as in the land of Israel, Sephardic culture prevailed among the Jews; Judeo-Spanish was their mother tongue. Sephardim established significant communities, large and small, in such places as Istanbul, Izmir, Bursa, Salonika, Edirne, Rhodes, Monastir, Safed, and Jerusalem.

As the Ottoman Empire expanded to include lands in the Middle East and North Africa, Jews of Arabic-speaking background represented an important segment of Ottoman Jewry. Some Ashkenazic and Romaniote communities also existed. This essay, though, will focus on the Judeo-Spanish-speaking Sephardim, heirs to medieval Iberian Jewry.

During the 16th century, the Sephardim reestablished their communities along the patterns that had existed in Spain and Portugal. They built synagogues and schools, operated their own court system, and published texts in their own language. They functioned as autonomous communities, a tolerated minority within the larger Islamic Ottoman Empire. Jewish officials represented Jewish interests to the Ottoman government and were responsible for collecting and transmitting taxes from the Jews.

Sephardim maintained a vibrant intellectual tradition. Rabbinic sages published classic works in Jewish law (e.g., the Shulhan Arukh by Rabbi Yosef Karo), Kabbalah (e.g., the works of Rabbis Moses Cordovero and Hayyim Vital), midrash (e.g., the Ein Yaacov by Rabbi Yaacov Ibn Haviv), ethics (e.g., Reishith Hokhma by Rabbi Eliyahu de Vidas), biblical commentary (e.g., the commentaries of Rabbi Moshe Alsheikh), and poetry (e.g., the hymns of Rabbis Shelomo Alkabets and Israel Najara). This period also witnessed a flowering of rabbinic responsa literature and the publication of some philosophical works.

Sephardim distinguished themselves as doctors, merchants, international traders, and civil servants. By the mid-17th century, though, the Ottoman Empire underwent military and economic setbacks and began a long period of decline. This obviously affected all residents of the empire, including Jews.

As external conditions worsened, Jews also suffered enormously from the episode of Sabbatai Zevi, a charismatic personality born in Izmir who claimed to be the Messiah. He and his devoted followers convinced much of Ottoman Jewry (and world Jewry as well) that he would be revealed as Messiah in 1666. When Sabbatai Zevi proved to be a false messiah (he converted to Islam under threat by the Sultan!), the Jewish community was spiritually devastated.

By the late 17th century, then, the Sephardim of the Ottoman Empire were in a precarious state. Their financial condition had dropped precipitously. Their spiritual life was in shambles. Observers of Jewish life during the 18th and 19th centuries almost invariably described the Jews as impoverished, politically powerless, and apathetic. Although the Jews always had an elite group of scholars and wealthy businessmen, the masses had sunk into poverty and relative ignorance.

Yet, in spite of their material and political hardships, the Jews maintained a rich inner life that reinforced their sense of self-worth and dignity. They drew strength from their religious faith and traditions. They saw themselves as members of the chosen—albeit persecuted—people of Israel, destined to teach the world about the one true God. They also took pride in their specific Sephardic heritage. A popular belief among Sephardim was that they descended from the aristocracy of ancient Judea, which had been exiled to Spain from the Holy Land.

Sephardic culture stressed the virtue of interiority—building a strong inner life. The rabbis and pietists taught the virtue of hitbodedut, meditation. Kabbalistic beliefs and practices were widespread, further underscoring the role of spirituality and inwardness. Sephardic sages fostered a religious worldview that pointed out the transience of earthly life and the centrality of the world to come. An otherworldly, somewhat fatalistic, philosophy emerged.

Folk culture stressed the virtues of self-reliance, resignation in the face of suffering, and trust in God. A midrashic/Kabbalistic worldview prevailed in which respectful piety was preferred to philosophic speculation.

Synagogue customs inculcated respect for others and honor for oneself. For example, when a man was called to the Torah during synagogue services, his younger relatives stood in his honor. As he walked toward the reader's desk, congregants would call out "bekhavod" (with honor). When his portion was completed, his children and grandchildren kissed his hand and received his blessing. These customs not only conveyed honor to the man but also to his family.

Family solidarity was evident in the custom of naming children. Traditionally, the firstborn son and daughter were named after the father's parents, the second-born son and daughter after the mother's parents, and subsequent children after relatives alternating from the father's to the mother's family. Sharing names is a source of gratification and identification with the family.

Sephardic culture was also characterized by a remarkable optimism and sense of happiness. Judeo-Spanish folk singing was ubiquitous, and many of the romanceros sang of love, the beauties of nature, and other powerful emotions. These songs not only served to bring pleasure but also to stimulate the imagination and poetic sensitivities. Women tended to be best versed in the melodies and words of the Ladino folk songs. At family gatherings and celebrations, men and women sang these songs together.

Sephardic prayer services were generally chanted to upbeat melodies, led by the hazan and accompanied enthusiastically by the congregation. Some of the hymns were sung in Ladino, so that everyone would be able to understand the words.

Even the poorest Jews stressed neatness and aesthetics, colorful presentation of foods, and proper etiquette. Everyday life, no matter how dismal it may have seemed, was filled with celebration, humor, laughter, and hopes for a better time.

Sephardic life stressed balance and eschewed extremism. It fostered a worldview in which religion was an integral part of life—not an enterprise separated from the real world of business, emotions, and interpersonal relations. Its ideal was a religious humanism in which Jews served the Lord with piety, and at the same time were engaged in the universal concerns of humankind. Sephardim tended to maintain traditional communities and did not fragment into different religious movements as did the Ashkenazim of Europe and America.

The Sephardim of the Ottoman Empire created an extensive literature in Ladino (Judeo-Spanish). Printed in Rashi script, Ladino publications included translations of the Bible, prayer books, and other Hebrew texts, for example, Hovot ha-Levavot and selections from the Shulhan Arukh. Many original works—mostly on religious themes—also appeared. In 1730, the first volume of the Me'am Lo'ez was published in Istanbul. Envisioned as a comprehensive biblical commentary, its first several volumes were prepared by Rabbi Yaacov Huli. After his death, other rabbis continued the project, completing volumes on the entire Torah, as well as some of the books of the prophets and writings. The Me'am Lo'ez was eminently popular, being written in a congenial style in the vernacular language of the masses of Sephardim.

During the 19th century, numerous Ladino newspapers appeared throughout the Ottoman Empire, featuring news, essays, poetry, fiction, and humor. Dramatic works were translated into or composed in Ladino and were performed to enthusiastic audiences. Novels in Ladino were also very popular. The religious and secular literature of the period reflected the confrontation with modernity and the renewed sense of Jewish nationalism, that is, Zionism. During the early 20th century, some Ladino publications began to be printed in Latin letters.

The Alliance Israelite Universelle opened many schools throughout the Ottoman Empire, beginning in the 1860s. The goal was to provide a modern education where the French language and culture would predominate. Alliance graduates tended to prefer French to Judeo-Spanish and saw themselves as more modern (i.e., Westernized) than those who attended traditional communal schools. Within the Sephardic communities, dissension arose between traditionalists and progressives in many areas, not just educational policy.

The Ottoman Empire came to an end in 1923. By that time thousands of Sephardim had immigrated to the United States, the Land of Israel, Europe, Africa, and South America. Judeo-Spanish civilization continued to flourish in the new lands for several generations; but by the end of the 20th century, Judeo-Spanish was the mother tongue of only a few elderly Sephardim. Although there has been a revival of interest in Sephardic culture in general, and Judeo-Spanish folklore and literature in particular, Judeo-Spanish has effectively reached the end of its course as a living language.

For nearly 500 years, Sephardim maintained a unique Judeo-Spanish civilization. Their values, ideals, and worldview continue to have relevance to those interested in Jewish history and culture.

Selected Bibliography

- Angel, Marc D. 1991. Voices in Exile: A Study in Sephardic Intellectual History. Hoboken, NJ: Ktav.
- Angel, Marc D. 2006. Foundations of Sephardic Spirituality: The Inner Life of Jews of the Ottoman Empire. Woodstock, IL: Jewish Lights Publishing.
- Benbassa, Esther, and Aron Rodrigue. 2000. Sephardi Jewry: A History of the Judeo-Spanish Community 14th–20th Centuries. Berkeley: University of California Press.

The Sabbatean Movement in the Ottoman Empire

M. Avrum Ehrlich

---

The Ottoman Empire lasted from 1299 to 1920 and as it grew embraced different religions and cultures under its sovereignty. The Ottomans had a long history of tolerance and an open-door policy for Jews from Spain and, later, from Russia. To accommodate them and other groups it developed the Koranic concept of the dhimmi to ensure the development of a method of Islamic rule that was tolerant to different cultures. It translated into a system of minority administrations known as the “millet system,” whereby religious groups could rule their own people with minimal interference, while ensuring Ottoman hegemony and efficient tax collection. This system was partially successful but also left much dissatisfaction. Perhaps Sabbateanism was a form of Jewish protest against the corruption of mainstream millet leadership—which was invariably controlled by the rabbinate. Perhaps the millet system ordained by the sultan to facilitate the orderly control of minority religions bolstered an intolerant local leadership that ignored pluralism and the subtleties of religious subgroups, causing them to be stifled to such a degree that it made conversion to Islam one of the preferable remedies.

Sabbateanism developed to explain the teachings and actions of Sabbatai Zevi (Shabbetai Zvi), who declared his messianism in 1666 and soon afterward allegedly converted to Islam, leaving a large and far-flung flock in the Ottoman Empire and beyond very confused. He and his followers combined the study of Lurianic Kabbalah with overt messianism and a unique relationship with the Ottoman Empire. The aberration of Jewish law as taught by his disciples was justified with mystical rationale as an important step in the messianic redemption. Thus, disobedience to Jewish religious law became acceptable and even encouraged in the sect, while followers purported to have a desire for holiness, and a belief in God and the Messiah. Abandoning tradition seemed to legitimize and even encourage assimilatory thinking as a religious tenet, something that had been strongly condemned by the rabbinic leadership until that time. Sabbateanism witnessed a group of Zevi's adherents converting to Islam (known as the Donme) but other followers converted to Catholicism (Frankism), and it is considered likely that other arguably assimilatory efforts (such as Haskalla, Reform, Secular Zionism) were either inspired by Sabbatean doctrine or underwent the same processes that led to its development. Assimilation seems to be a common thread among these groups. For many believers who rejected Zevi's messiahship after his apostasy, the issues he extolled nevertheless still remained relevant. They were ideas that had been repressed by the traditional leadership but had been given credibility by the Sabbatean movement, and even though it took on extreme expression by Zevi's conversion to Islam, the ideas remained intact. Had Zevi and his followers not taken such extreme measures the ideas expressed would never have reached a critical mass, but clearly there existed pent-up feelings and dissatisfaction in Jewish life that needed to be vented, and it fell on these events to bring them to the fore. Indeed, many Jews wished to remain loyal to their religious, traditional, family, and emotional heritage but also had reservations about their lives under existing conditions. The all-permeating legal demands of ritual Jewish law (Halacha) were stifling, and the introverted stance of the Jewish community and its fear of engaging the wider society did not suit the ambitious nature of many Jews. The lack of a living Hebrew culture, the absence of Jewish national symbols, and the sense that Jews were not able to entirely share the pride and empathy of other Turks in the sovereignty of the Ottoman Empire were frustrating. Many sought a way to integrate into the larger society and sought a national identity while not giving up their essential Jewish belief systems and the culture dear to them. Sabbateanism emerged to provide doctrinal solutions for these people. The doctrines emerging did not remain the heritage of a closed group. Although the assimilation doctrine was not always conducive to group building, it was an important enough idea to proliferate, and it did so leaving few traceable links to its Sabbatean source.

The Donme are the descendents of a small group of people who, emulating Zevi, converted to Islam. Some will argue that they had been forced to convert to Islam like their leader had and the theological conviction in support of the conversion developed only afterward. The term "Donme" is Turkish for an insincere conversion to Islam—apostate. The Donme community combined many Jewish practices in private while demonstrating Islamic practices in public. Although enclined in religious doctrine, the essential direction of the theology was toward assimilation. Interestingly, this idea still possesses religious significance. Nevertheless, it is likely that conversion to Islam had practical motives also. Those seeking tax havens and better economic treatment sought to join the Donme community and be recognized as Muslims; in this way they could, on the one hand, remain Jewish at heart, and on the other hand, enjoy tax benefits reserved to Muslims. It is also likely that those who had converted to Islam for pragmatic reasons before Zevi's mystical apostasy later joined Donme communities feeling more comfortable there than in a purely Islamic environment.

In many respects this resembled (or inspired) a later declaration by Moses Mendelsohn to be a “Jew in the home and a German in the street,” or rather in this earlier context “to be a Muslim on the street and a Jew in private.” The influences of Sabbateanism can be detected in Mendelsohn’s sentiments and within the highly assimilatory program of the Enlightenment. But overt rejection of tradition would have been impossible in the strongly traditional structures of the 17th century, and therefore, the Donme intuitively garbed their ideas with religious/doctrinal overtones and elaborate rituals and symbolism at least until the onset of public secularism permitted its essential nature to become public.

The Donme are notoriously secretive, this becoming a major tenet of their doctrine. This was likely because of fear of the Ottoman authorities and because they wished to preserve the many benefits they enjoyed as Muslims while knowing they were not entirely Muslim in practice. Without a doubt they also feared the criticism and vengeance of Jewish Orthodoxy, which might try to spoil their situation if too much be known. Converting to Islam offered a way to break out of the millet community structure forced on minority communities by the Sultan.

Under such a system the Jewish religious leadership of the Empire—the “Haham Basi”—appointed rabbinic leaders, collected taxes, decided community policy and religious law, and meted out justice. However disagreeable his religious decisions were for minority Jewish groups, all were required to abide by its policy. By converting to Islam, however, one would no longer be required to heed the Jewish hierarchy and could more easily form independent community structures. Clearly, motives existed for conversion: to be relieved from religious tyranny and to become a part of a broad thinking and aspiring Empire.

The Donme answered to various names, such as “Maaminim” (Hebrew for “believers”), “Avdeti” (Arabic for “heretics”), “Selanikli” (from Salonika), and Sabetayci (Sabbetai). By the 19th century, three strains of Donme had emerged, each with its own distinct classes and its own kahal/synagogues, and they were particularly represented in the Donme stronghold of Salonica.

1. Izmirim (otherwise known as Kapanci) were the original followers of Sabbatai Zevi, named after his hometown of Izmir. The Izmiris were successful in trade and prominent in the intelligentsia—they formed the aristocracy of Donme society under the name “Cavellers.” They were highly assimilated into Ottoman society and spoke Turkish.
2. The Yakoviyim followed Zevi’s brother Jacob, believing him to be Zevi’s incarnation. They were represented in lower and middle classes of Ottoman society and were commonly bureaucrats in Ottoman government.
3. The Konyoses (otherwise known as Karakash) followed one of Zevi’s disciples, Baruchia Russo, believing him to be Zevi’s incarnation. They were the poorest of the Donme, spoke Judeo-Spanish, and were generally artisans and workers. Part of this group is believed to still practice religious rites in modern Turkey, and they are known as fanatical fundamentalists by the rest of the Donme.

If the Donme conversion to Islam is interpreted not so much as an embrace of Islamic religious doctrine but as the desire to assimilate into the dominant society, then one may assume that with the easing of Islamic norms in modern Turkey, the Donme would not fight to remain loyal to Islam but rather would adopt new practices. And although Islam does not permit the interrogation of converts and was required to accept them without question, the Donme were traditionally suspected of lacking conviction. This suspicion proved justified, as demonstrated by the ease with which Donme slipped into secularism after the Tanzimat reforms introduced by foreign pressures around the 1840s. Taxation of minorities was eased and conversion out of Islam was permitted, signaling a process of secularization and unprecedented levels of tolerance for other worldviews on a de jure basis. Evangelical Christian groups became more active in the empire, and some even exerted their strong influence on Sabbateanism, which combined Christian influences of the inquisition and influences of British millenarians making headway in the Ottoman Empire. The Donme community certainly felt less obliged to observe strict Islam and at liberty to pursue greater assimilation into an even broader system, while the reforms allowed many to return to Judaism. By that time Jews were also seeking broader cultural and ideological paradigms and a return to earlier forms so sectarianism was unnecessary. Religion was no longer the predominant superstructure for society, but rather a component of it; they and others identified the umbrella structure of nationalism and tolerant secular government to be the preferred paradigm permitting diverse practices and culture. It became obvious that conversion to Christianity was also not as progressive as the embrace of secularism and nationalism.

Sabbatean Evolution

Sabbateanism developed in the atmosphere of defeat that the Ottomans suffered at the gates of Vienna in 1683. It is likely that the atmosphere in the empire affected the growth of the movement. The Sultans quickly understood that if the empire did not embrace Western techniques and adopt the best of the enlightened sciences, including engineering, medicine, and modern scientific method, they would continue to lose wars. But it was more than a century and a half later before sultans like Mahmut II in 1826 started movements to openly adopt Western culture. In 1839, Sultan Abdul Mecid extended equal citizenship to all the citizens of the empire, without religious or ethnic distinction, ensuring that all citizens could bear witness in court even against a Muslim, could hold government office, and could serve in the high ranks of the army. The Donme were important beneficiaries of this process, growing and enjoying swift assimilation into Ottoman life.

On the other front, the relationship of the Donme to the Jews was tense. Their need to defend themselves from religious Jewish polemic inspired the rapid spread of print and encouraged scholarship and the continued study of Jewish mysticism and theological literature. At the same time, the Jewish religious authorities banned the study of mysticism and repressed Sabbatean influence while turning inward. Some attribute the decline of Ottoman Jewry to the crisis born in the wake of Sabbatai Zevi's messianic claims and apostasy. Sabbatean or messianic expectations are believed to have neutralized the entrepreneurial spirit of many believers who expected to be magically whisked away from exile to redemption. This view does not accurately depict the sociological structures of messianic groups and is unlikely to be the entire cause for the economic degeneration of Ottoman Jewry. On the contrary, communities of believers and minority sects are often able to develop strong networks and loyalties that allow them to strengthen their economic activity. Further, contrary to common thinking that messianics are dreamy-eyed and unworldly, messianic beliefs are often rooted in strong cultural and social networks and provide both an excellent infrastructure and motivation for commerce. This was the case with the Donme. Perhaps the mainstream Jewish communities, which were influenced by Sabbatean thinking but remained under rabbinic leadership, went through a greater crisis as they were required to go to great lengths to weed out the potentially heretical elements still active in their midst.

It is this process that was damaging for Ottoman Jewry. The efforts to censor certain religious and Kabbalistic texts is well documented, and the oppression of the imaginative faculties, freedom, and creativity of community members left its mark on Ottoman Jewry. Ties with undesirable elements were cut, suspicions and paranoia raged against those who were believed to be secret Sabbateans, and the community turned inward, leaving a sense of depression among the Ottoman Jewish communities. In the meantime, other minorities of the empire became more adept in their commercial dealings and were helped by their religious structures, particularly the Greek Orthodox and Armenian Orthodox churches. The Donme who converted to Islam were now free of the Jewish millet control over their activities and quickly emerged as an important and functional community in the wider society. The repressed Jewish communities were probably relieved to find alternatives to their oppressive leadership in secularism, and so, indirectly, the oppression brought on by rabbinic reactions to Sabbateanism also influenced Jewish support for the Young Turk Revolution.

In a fascinating instance of a Jewish class conflict, in 1840s Izmir, the poorer Jews reacted to the extortion of the wealthy meat merchants who charged them high meat taxes, first by embargoing them and finally by eating nonkosher meat. A more extreme act was the mass conversion of 80 families to Protestantism and the preparedness of another 2,000 to do the same, so as to avoid the millet authority of the Jewish leadership and its taxes and oppression. Although no overt mention of Sabbateanism is found, it seems more than coincidental that this occurred in Zevi's home town and that the consumption of nonkosher meat was a Sabbatean practice. The fact that so many people were willing to convert out of Judaism is almost Sabbatean/Frankist in style. One might view this as a testament to the effects and influences Sabbateanism was having on the Jewish communities and how it legitimized the break with ritual law and endorsed assimilation for motives of personal benefit. Even though the Jewish community broke with overt Sabbateanism, precedents were set and the infrastructure was in place for Jews to exit the observance of ritual law. This correlated with its freedom from the often oppressive practices of the religious leadership and was reinforced by the success of the Donme communities in the general society and their gradual reacceptance by mainstream Jewish elements.

The greatest change for the Donme community occurred during the Balkan Wars in the years leading up to World War I when Salonica passed over to Greek hands. At this point many Donme resettled in Turkish Istanbul and set up schools and communities that have left a mark on Turkish society till today. However, the forced transfer of Turks from Salonica to Turkey in 1924 was the final blow to the Donme stronghold and changed the course of Donme history. Although many attempted a rapprochement with the Jewish community that would allow them to remain in Salonica as Jews not as Turks, their efforts were rejected. Rabbinic refusal to accept them back remarkably saved them from extinction along with the rest of Salonican Jewry during the Nazi occupation of Greece. Other Donme are alleged to have converted to Christianity so as to remain in Salonica, but the Greek public opinion viewed the Donme as more harmful than other Turks and sought their absolute expulsion. Therefore, it is unclear to what extent conversion to Christianity helped them and to what extent those that remained were saved from destruction under the Nazi occupation. From the 1940s, there began a strong assimilatory trend among the Donme who resettled in Turkey. Efforts to preserve their secrecy were intensified, probably resulting from having witnessed the destruction of Greek Jewry and fear that the same could happen to them in the wake of Turkish cooperation with the Nazi regime. Fear of growing Islamic antagonism to the perceived Donme role in the overthrow of the sultan and establishment of a secular state in Turkey further forced Donme affiliates to underplay their prominence and community network.

Though the Donme were never officially deemed to be a separate group, there were signs that this might change when the 1960 census registered them as a distinct group, primarily for taxation purposes. At the time it was believed there were approximately 20,000 Donme members in Turkey. Some estimate their numbers to be around 50,000–60,000 today; others estimate it at 100,000. They are believed to be very prosperous but highly assimilated, and only a small minority are Sabbatean in the religious sense. They generally refer to themselves as “Salonicians” not as Sabbateans. They are extremely nonreligious. The enmity of Islamic fundamentalism toward them is one of the strongest factors in the preservation of their distinct ethnic memory. Because of the high intermarriage rate, the phenomenon of half-Donme is becoming increasingly well known. There have been recent efforts by partisan Donme activists to reclaim their national pride and standing in Turkish society, but this has met with overall rejection, embarrassment, and denial from the mainstream Donme population.

At present, there are some well-known Donme families and other less-known families occupying important positions in modern Turkish life. The former foreign minister, Ismail Cem, was a Donme, though some of his family members have officially come out and declared that, although they are of Donme ethnicity, they disassociate from the cultural group, including Cepil Ipekci, a famous fashion designer in Turkey, and Nukhet Izet Ipekci, daughter of the famous journalist Abdi Ipekci, who declared on an Islamic channel that her parents were of Donme origins.

Other Donme include the industrialist Dilber and Bezmen families and Rahsan Ecevit, wife of former Prime Minister Bilent Ecevit. Tansu Ciller, who was the first female prime minister, is half Donme on her mother's side. Altan Oymen, past leader of the Republican People's Party was of Donme descent. Other prominent personalities of Donme origin include writers, journalists, filmmakers, professors, lawyers, judges, bureaucrats (legal and foreign service), bankers, and industrialists. They can almost be said to be the standard bearers of secularism and modern Turkish nationalism that is based on cultural unity rather than racial characteristics. They are more advanced in this process than secular Turkish Jews and in many ways resemble the prominence and thinking of the European Jewish Enlightenment, leading many to suspect that Sabbateanism played a role there, too. Donme sympathy toward Jews exists but association is not common because of the fears of being further tainted by Islamic fundamentalism. This fear is becoming increasingly real as the influence of Islamic parties grows.

Selected Bibliography

- Baer, Marc David. 1999. "Revealing a Hidden Community: Ilgaz Zorlu and the Debate in Turkey over the Donme/Sabbateans." The Turkish Studies Association Journal 23 (1, Spring): 68–75.
- Barnai, Jacob. 1996. "From Sabbateanism to Modernization: Ottoman Jewry on the Eve of the Ottoman Reforms and the Haskala." In Sephardi and Middle Eastern Jewries: History and Culture in the Modern Era, edited by Harvey E. Goldberg, 73–80. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Barnai, Jacob. 1996. "The Spread of the Sabbatean Movement in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries." In Communication in the Diaspora: The Pre-Modern World, edited by Sophia Menachem, 313–337. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Carlebach, Elisheva. 1990. "Sabbatianism and the Jewish-Christian Polemic." World Congress of Jewish Studies 10: 1–7.
- Ehrlich, Avrum. 2000. "Sabbatean Mysticism as Proto Secularism." In Jewish Turkey Encounters, edited by Mehmet Tutuncu, 273–300. Haarlem, Netherlands: SOTA.
- Idel, Moshe. 1997. "Saturn and Sabbetai Tzevi: A New Approach to Sabbateanism." Jewish Studies 37: 147–160.
- Katz, Jacob. 1998. "The Suggested Relationship between Sabbatianism, Haskalah, and Reform." In Divine Law in Human Hands, 504–530. Jerusalem: Magnes Press.
- Katz, Yossef. 1987. "Paths of Zionist Political Action in Turkey, 1882–1914: The Plan for Jewish Settlement in Turkey in the Young Turks Era." International Journal of Turkish Studies 4 (1): 115–135.
- Liebes, Yehuda. 1993. "Sabbatean Messianism." In Studies in Jewish Myth and Jewish Messianism. Albany: State University of New York Press, 93–106, 177–182.
- Stavroulaki, Nikos. 1984. "Shabbetai Zevi and the 'Donme' of Thessaloniki." Forum on the Jewish People, Zionism and Israel 53: 103–114.

History of Jews in Syria

Sarina Roffé

---

General Population: 18.6 million (U.S. State Department)

Jewish Population: 10

Percent of Population: Approximately 1 percent

Jewish Population by City: Damascus, 5; Aleppo, 5

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Primarily Sephardic Jews; immigration from Spain and Italy began after 1492. Jews began leaving Syria in the late 1890s and continued emigrating until the State of Israel was created. The doors to emigration were closed by the government and not reopened until the 1990s, when the all but a few of the remaining Jews left the country for Israel or the United States.

Languages Spoken: Arabic and Hebrew

---

Historical Overview

1,000 BCE Jews are found living in Aleppo and Damascus, which was considered part of greater Palestine.

950 BCE The Great Synagogue of Aleppo is built.

200 CE East-West trade routes link through Damascus to Central Asia where silk and spices are sold. These caravan routes become an important source of commerce for Syrian Jews. Dubbed the Silk Road by German geographer Ferdinand von Richthofen in the 1870s, the Silk Road peaked during China's Tang Dynasty (618–907 CE).

636 CE The Arab conquest of region: Islamic caliphates begin ruling the region.

896 The Aleppo Codex is written.

921 Sa'adia Gaon visits Aleppo.

10th century Jews from Iraq move to Syria.

1170–1180 Rabbi Petachya of Regensburg visits Aleppo.

1173 Benjamin of Tudela writes of a visit to Aleppo.

14th century The Aleppo Codex is taken into the custody of the Jewish community of Aleppo.

1400 The Great Synagogue of Aleppo is destroyed during the rule of Tamerlane.

1418 The Great Synagogue is rebuilt.

15th century Jews from Spain and Italy move to Syria.

18th century Jews in Syria have limited access to the outside world and the modernism that spreads through Western Europe.

1867 The opening of the Suez Canal destroys the regional economy that depended on the caravan trade routes.

1890s Jews begin leaving Syria for Manchester, England, and Eretz Israel.

1900 The Ottoman census reports about 10,000 Jews in Syria.

1907–1913 A large Jewish emigration to the United States, Mexico, and Argentina is prompted by conscription of Jews in the Turkish Army, severe economic

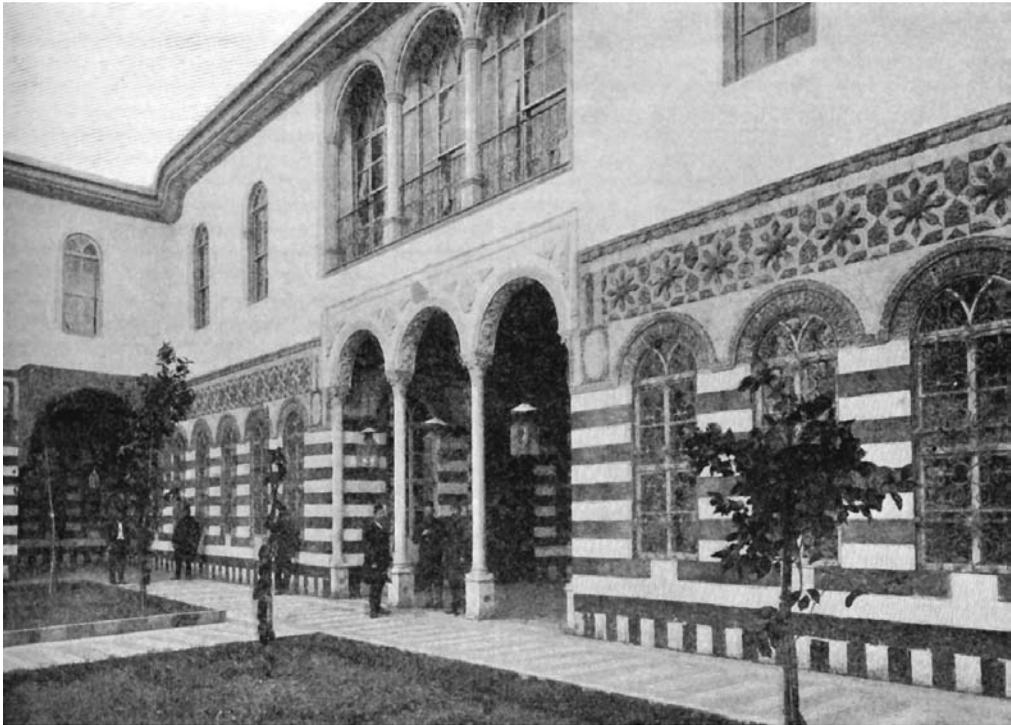

- decline in the region, and increased persecution of Jews due to Zionism. Emigration stops during World War I.
- 1908 Young Turks take over the Ottoman Empire. Dhimmi status ends and the government begins to conscript Jews into the Turkish Army.
- 1918–1920s After World War I ends, emigration to the United States, Mexico, and Argentina resumes.
- 1920 The Ottoman Empire is split and the French Mandate of Syria (as well as Lebanon) is established in the Treaty of Sèvres.
- 1923 The Republic of Turkey is established.
- 1924 The French combine the provinces of Aleppo and Damascus into the state of Syria.
- 1946 Syria is recognized as an independent state.
- 1947 Anti-Zionist groups burn the Great Synagogue of Aleppo.
Aleppo Codex is damaged and hidden.
Pogroms leave Jewish shops and synagogues destroyed.
Thousands begin to emigrate.
- 1948 The last large emigration of Jews from Syria, before the doors of the country close to emigration.
- 1958 The Aleppo Codex is smuggled out of Aleppo.
- 1980s A small group of unmarried women is permitted to leave Syria. Holy objects are smuggled out of Syria.
- 1990s The doors to emigration open and the last group is permitted to leave for the United States. About 10 Jews remain behind.
- 1995 The state of Syria abandons the Great Synagogue of Aleppo.

Background

Syria is one of the oldest Diaspora communities in the world, and Jews are reported to have lived there on land that belonged to Rabbi Judah Nasi. In the 10th century, the Jews of Syria were artisans and were engaged in commerce, banking, and government administration. Because of its conquest by King David, Syria has a higher status than other places outside Israel, and some of the commandments that apply only to Israel apply to Syria as well. The influx of Jews from Spain at the end of the 15th century and later strengthened the communities of Syria, where the influence of cabalists from Safed was intense. Jews primarily lived in Aleppo, Damascus, and outlying areas.

The city of Aleppo spans Jewish history from the days of King David over 3,000 years ago. Aristocratic and noble, Aleppo was the crown of the Sephardic world. The Jewish presence in Syria is intertwined with the history and the politics of Jerusalem. According to the book of Samuel and Psalm 60, Aram Soba, the Biblical name for Aleppo, was part of the extended area of northern Israel. Through the millennia, great Talmudic sages record Aleppo's unbroken record of communal peace and spiritual productivity. The Hebrew printing press was introduced in Aleppo in 1806 and this soon became the leading industry.

Damascus is closer to Safed and it was easier to travel from there to Tiberias than to Aleppo, where the Arabic dialect was slightly different. The Jews of Damascus were Zionists, were liberal, and had mixed schools; their Hebrew developed into the modern Hebrew language. Many were wealthy and from distinguished elite backgrounds. The middle class started to develop in Damascus only in the 18th century, although most Jews remained in the lower classes.

Residence of a prosperous Jewish family in Damascus, Syria, about 1900. (Isadore Singer, ed. The Jewish Encyclopedia, 1901)

By contrast, Aleppo preserved its own identity, even when the Spanish Jews came after the 1492 Expulsion and the Francos (European) followed later. The Francos were not obligated by local rules, enjoying a kind of extraterritorial privilege. Their orientation was more modern, paving the way for the introduction of modernism in Aleppo. They included the Picciotto family, who were consular representatives in Aleppo, supported the building of synagogues, and attempted to establish their own educational system. The gap in classes between the old neighborhood and Jamilliyah, the new neighborhood, was noticeable.

Over the centuries, Syria was plagued by earthquakes, floods, epidemics, anti-Semitism, the Black Plague, and other natural disasters. The cities maintained several charity funds, including a Bikur Holim (society to visit the sick) and hospitality and bridal funds.

In the late 17th century, Syrian Jews adopted the European attitude of quarantines, which harmed commerce. Doctors were cautious about deciding if someone was contagious, because the family would then go into quarantine and were isolated for months, shutting down trade. In Aleppo, the wealthy lived outside the city during these periods; while in Damascus many lived by the river, where it was believed the air was cleaner.

Occupations in Aleppo included international trade along the caravan route, local trade, small business, and money exchange. Silk was the primary export. A look at the records of the British Levant Company indicates that for many centuries Jews in Aleppo controlled the customs houses where the interpreters were Sephardic Jews who could converse in Spanish, Italian, and Arabic.

The 1867 opening of the Suez Canal was catastrophic for the residents of Aleppo, because they no longer had a source of trade. After the canal began operation, more than half of Aleppo's rabbis moved to Jerusalem, and its spiritual center moved with it. Spiritually, Aleppo was central to southern Turkey (Antioch, Kilez, Orpha, Entebbe, and others) and the areas east of Baghdad.

During a 10-year period in the 1980s, a collection of Jewish holy objects was smuggled out of Syria through the efforts of Avraham Hamra, who was the chief rabbi. The collection included nine ancient Bible manuscripts, known as the Ketarim, each between 700 and 900 years old. In addition, there were 40 Torah scrolls and 32 decorative boxes in which the Sephardic Torah scrolls were held. The collection was taken in stages via Turkey to the Jewish National and University Library of the Hebrew University in Israel. The smuggling was necessary because official requests for permission to take them out of Syria were denied.

Famous and influential Jews in Syria included the Farhi, Antebi, Elmaliah, and Safra families. Edmond Safra, although not the eldest son, took on his family's banking legacy, expanding it to an international empire.

Emigration

From the seventh century until the end of Ottoman rule, the Jewish community paid jizya, a poll tax. The tax delineates their status as dhimmi, a protected people, and allows them to self-govern. Self-government entitled the Jews to freedom of religion, a separate court system ruled by local rabbis to handle internal disputes, and military protection. According to the Koran, dhimmi status did not entitle Jews to the same or equal rights as Muslim citizens. Jews, along with their Christian counterparts, were of a lower status than Muslims and disputes between a Christian or Jew and a Muslim were settled in the government court, which was ruled by Islamic law.

In 1908, the Young Turks took over the Ottoman Empire and dhimmi status ended. The new government began to conscript Jews into the Turkish Army, spurring emigration. Other factors in emigration included the tremendous economic decline in the years after the Suez Canal opened and the rise of anti-Semitism as Zionist ideas were spread around the world. Emigration stopped during World War I but picked up again after the war ended. The last large wave of immigration occurred after World War II and the creation of the State of Israel. Then the doors to emigration by the Jews of Syria were closed by the government of Syria.

In the 1970s, attempts to cross the border were met with hostility. Travel papers were only granted if members of the family stayed behind. Jews faced increasing levels of persecution. In the 1980s, however, a small group of unmarried women was permitted to leave Syria to find husbands. After increased pressure from the Syrian community in Brooklyn, the doors to emigration opened in the early 1990s, when the remaining 5,000 or so Jews in Syria were airlifted out of the country. As of 1995, a Jewish community no longer exists in Syria.

Rabbinical Leadership in Aleppo

A look at Aleppo rabbinic literature indicates that responsa were sent to nearby Jewish communities in southeastern Turkey who relied on Aleppo as a spiritual center and sought the services of its rabbis and its rabbinical court. In Syria, the methods used to decide Halacha were similar to those used in Eretz Yisrael. In Aleppo, the Shulhan Arukh was followed very strictly, and the community is extremely devout.

Under Muslim rule, each community was responsible for its own religious autonomy. For centuries, and until the Jews began to migrate out of Aleppo in the early 1900s, precipitated by the Young Turks Movement, Torah honors remained the province of the Dayan family, direct descendants of King David, as distinguished scholars. The family established Beit Nasi (House of the Prince), a revered house of study and prayer that functioned in Aleppo until Israel's independence in 1947–1948.

In 1803, a dispute between the Jewish community of Aleppo and the Francos (European Jews) was settled in a 220-page rabbinical decision (Mahane Yehuda treatise, Livorno, Italy) issued by Rabbi Yehuda Kassin (Aleppo, 1708–1784). Mahane Yehuda contains hundreds of responsa and illustrates mastery of all phases of Talmudic literature. The end of the book has printed agreements between Jerusalem and Damascus rabbis. A collection of Kassin's responsa was subsequently published in Jerusalem by his great grandson, Rabbi Shaul Kassin, under the title Ro'ei Yisrael (Jerusalem 1904) in three parts. A collection of his sermons, VaZot LiYehuda, exists in manuscript form. It is a book of questions and answers on Torah, Gemara, and Kabbalah.

From the mid-19th century on, the Ottoman government appointed a chief rabbi (Hakham bashi), who represented the Jewish community before government agencies and could be a powerful individual in the community in his own right. Rabbis often came from families with a long tradition of supplying the community with hakamim. The hakam was distinguished by his clothing, for example, the size and color of his turban and the long, wide sleeves of his outer garments.

Aleppo Codex

The Aleppo community was particularly proud of its ownership for several centuries of the Aleppo Codex, written in the 10th century in Tiberias. The "Jewel of the Crown" is the Hebrew manuscript of the Bible written by the scribe Shlomo Ben Buya'a and then verified, vocalized, and pointed by Aaron Ben-Asher in Tiberias. The Codex went from Tiberias to Jerusalem to Cairo (11th century), where it was used by Maimonides, and then it went to Aleppo in the 14th century. The Aleppo Codex was kept in the Joab Ben Zeruiah Synagogue (in the Cave of Elijah) for some 500 years until 1947.

Aleppo's rabbis allowed few to view the Codex as they believed it was a talisman that protected the community. After the State of Israel was established, the streets of Aleppo and Damascus exploded with fires and acts of anti-Semitism. The Codex disappeared for 10 years, until the remaining 295 of its 487 leaves was delivered to the Ben Zvi Institute in Israel for safekeeping. Now in the Shrine of the Book, alongside the Dead Sea Scrolls in Jerusalem, it is considered the most authoritative manuscript of the Masoretic text of the Bible.

The rabbis of Aleppo made significant contribution in terms of religious literature. Examples are as follows:

- Rabbi Haim Mordecai Labaton (1780–1869 Aleppo), the son of Luna and Rabbi Helfon Labaton, became chief rabbi of Aleppo and head of the beth din. He wrote two learned treatises, Nochach Hashulchan and Ben Yayir.
- Rabbi Helphon Labaton, one of the sons of Rabbi Haim Mordecai, was a kabbalist who died in 1824 at a young age, predeceasing his father. Some of his writings are included in Nohah HaShulhan.
- Rabbi Isaac Labaton wrote Oseh Hayyil, and his responsa are published in works by other authors. Rabbi Isaac Labaton's daughter, Sarah Labaton, married kabbalist Rabbi Shalom Hedaya (1862–1945 Aleppo), son of Rabbi Moshe Hedaya. Shalom wrote Shalom LaAm, Dober Shalom, HaHayyim VeHaShalom, She LeBet Abot, and Shalom veTzedek.
- Rabbi Yitzhak Attia (b. 1775 Aleppo) wrote six books over the course of his life. Rabbi Yitzhak's first book, titled Zara Yitzhak Attia, is an explanation of the first two sections of the Chumash. The second book, Vatican Yitzhak, is a continuation and covers the next three Chumash. Shut Avot is an explanation of the Gemarra. Rov Tagan, his fourth book, is an explanation of the six books of the Mishna. His fifth book, Mesharet Moshe, speaks of the strong hand of the Rambam; Echet Chael is a literal translation of the Woman of Valor poem. His last book was titled Tana Veshiar.
- Rabbi Rafael Kassin's writings include Maarekhet HaShulhan, Lehem HaMarekhet, Yayyin HaRekaa (a collection of sermons), Derekh Hahayyim (a defense against Gentile attacks on the Bible and Talmud), and Tekafu Kohen.
- Rabbi Shaul Matlub Abadi (1889 Aleppo–1970 Brooklyn) was a Torah scholar and head of the Magen David Talmud Torah program that served Brooklyn's Syrian community for more than 40 years. He left Aleppo when B'nai B'rith tried to establish a chapter in Aleppo and he opposed it. Abadi came to Brooklyn in the 1920s to serve the Brooklyn Syrian community. A descendant of many rabbis, he studied with Rabbi Yitzhak Dahan and Ezra Shayo. He taught thousands of students in the Sephardic method of study, where you read what the sages have said; determine a correlation between the sages and today; and look at the structure of the paragraph, the sentence, and the order of the words. Abadi was also an excellent writer, especially in using meter and rhyme.

Education

Education was not provided for girls, who were protected and did not leave the home without a male escort, even after they were married. Boys attended religious school and learned basic math necessary for tracking business expenses. Once a boy reached his 13th birthday and made his bar mitzvah, he no longer attended school.

When the Alliance Israélite Universelle opened its schools in Damascus and Aleppo in the mid 19th century, it was a revered institution that included Torah studies, so it was supported by the rabbis. During its height, about 300 students attended the school annually. After the large emigration of 1907–1913 and 1918–1923, most Jewish children attended the Alliance schools. Many needed financial assistance because of the economic conditions in the region.

Contemporary Overview

A Jewish community no longer exists in Syria, although there may be dozens of Jews who live in nonorganized communities.

Selected Bibliography

- “The Central Synagogue in Aleppo, Syria.” The Database of Jewish Communities. <http://www.bh.org.il/Communities/Synagogue/Aleppo.asp> (accessed May 3, 2007).
- Deshen, Shlomo, and Walter Zenner. 1982. Jewish Societies in the Middle East: Community, Culture, and Authority. Washington, DC: University Press of America.
- Goshen-Gottstein, Moshe H. 1960. “The Authority of the Aleppo Codex.” Textus: Annual of the Hebrew University Bible Project 1: 17–58.
- Harel, Yaron. 1992. “A Spiritual Agitation in the East—The Founding of a Reform Community in Aleppo in 1862.” Hebrew Union College Annual 63: 19–35.
- Harel, Yaron. 1993. “The Edict to Destroy Em Lamikra—Aleppo 1865.” Hebrew Union College Journal 64: 27–36.
- Karpat, Kemal H. 1985. Ottoman Population: 1830–1914. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.
- Kassin, Jacob S. 1995. Princely Wisdom. New York: Shengold.
- Peretz, Don. 1958. “Israel.” AJC Archives. http://ajcarchives.org/AJC\_DATA/Files/1958\_13\_IsraelMidEast.pdf (accessed May 3, 2007).
- Peretz, Yosef. 1998. “Zekher Amalek.” Lectures on the Torah Reading. <http://www.biu.ac.il/JH/Parasha/eng/tetzaveh/peres.html> (accessed May 3, 2007).
- Roffé, Sarina. 2002. “Kassin Rabbinic Dynasty: Part I.” Rav-SIG online journal. <http://www.jewishgen.org/Rabbinic/journal/kassin.htm> (accessed May 3, 2007).
- Roffé, Sarina. 2002. “Kassin Rabbinic Dynasty: Part II.” Rav-SIG online journal. <http://www.jewishgen.org/Rabbinic/journal/kassin2.htm> (accessed May 3, 2007).
- Roffé, Sarina. 2002. “Labaton Rabbinic Dynasty.” Rav-SIG online journal. <http://www.jewishgen.org/Rabbinic/journal/labaton.htm> (accessed May 3, 2007).
- Roffé, Sarina. 2002. “Rabbi Murad Maslaton.” Rav-SIG online journal. <http://www.jewishgen.org/Rabbinic/journal/maslaton.htm> (accessed May 3, 2007).
- Roffé, Sarina. 2002. “Sephardic Rabbis Impact Halachah.” Rav-SIG online journal. <http://www.jewishgen.org/rabbinic/journal/halachah.htm> (accessed May 3, 2007).
- Roffé, Sarina. “The Jews of Aleppo.” Jewishgen.org Web site <http://www.jewishgen.org/Sephardic/AleppoJews.htm> (accessed May 3, 2007).

- Roffé, Sarina. "The Term Sephardic Jew." Jewishgen.org Web site. http://www.jewishgen.org/Sephardic/sephardic\_roffe.htm (accessed May 3, 2007).
- Setton, David. 1928. Dibber Shaul. Jerusalem: Yoreh Deah.
- The Spirit of Aleppo*. 1986. Sephardic Archives. Brooklyn, NY: Sephardic Community Center.
- Sutton, David. 2005. Aleppo City of Scholars. Brooklyn, NY: Mesorah Publications.
- Sutton, Joseph A. D. 1979. Magic Carpet: Aleppo-in-Flatbush. New York: Thayer-Jacoby.
- Sutton, Joseph S. 1988. Aleppo Chronicles. New York: Thayer-Jacoby.
- Thornton, Ted. 2007. "Persian, Greek, Roman, Byzantine Eras: 500 B.C.E.–500 C.E." History of the Middle East Database. <http://www.nmhschool.org/tthornton/mehistorydatabase/persian.php> (accessed May 3, 2007).
- Wischnitzer, Mark. 1956. Visas to Freedom: The History of the HIAS. Cleveland: World.
- Zemer, Moshe. 1988. "The Rabbinic Ban on Conversions in Argentina." Judaism 37: 84–96.
- Zenner, Walter P. 2000. A Global Community, The Jews from Aleppo, Syria. Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press.
- Zenner, Walter P. 2000. "Reinterpretation of a Tradition by a Transnational Elite: The Rabbis of the Aleppan Diaspora." Unpublished paper.

Jews in Yemen

Barak Barfi and Yael Katzir

---

General Population: 20,727,063

Jewish Population: Various approximations from 200 to 300 to 500. Arab news report estimate, 1,500

Percent of Population: 0.001 percent

Jewish Population by City: Rayda and in villages surrounding Sa'ada

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Yemeni Jews have continual ancestry in Yemen for 2,000 years or more.

Languages Spoken: Judeo-Arabic or Arabic.

---

Historical Overview

1st millennium BCE Though Jews have a long history in Yemen, known in Hebrew as Teman, it is difficult to pinpoint exactly when they arrived. As such their early origins are shrouded in legends. One tradition claims the Queen of Sheba brought back a number of Jews after her visit to King Solomon's court. Other legends place the foundation of the community around the time of the destruction of the First Temple (586 BCE) when 75,000 Jews traveled to Yemen. The Talmud however makes no mention of the country, and one can only conjecture they arrived during the early centuries of the common Era when trade opportunities attracted them.

ca. 380 CE The Himyarite king Abukarib Asad falls under the sway of Judaism, though scholars are unsure if he converted.

- 6th century Himyarite Dhu Nuwas, who reigns from 518–525, converts to Judaism. He persecutes Christians and massacres the community in Najran. This event leads to an Ethiopian invasion of Yemen and his death, as well as the death of Judaism as the state religion.
- 12th century Jewish chronicler Benjamin of Tudela mentions that Yemen has a large and powerful Jewish community, though scholars have cast doubt on these claims.
- 1160s The earliest accounts of Jewish persecution are dated around 1165 when Abd al-Nabi b. al-Mahdi orders Jews to convert to Islam. At the end of the century, the Ayyubid caliph Isma'il does the same.
- 1499–1500 A false messiah proclaims himself in Eastern Yemen and draws a following that is put down by the Sultan. The mission of the false messiah Sabbatai Zevi has a particularly devastating effect on Yemeni Jewry. A number of them sell their belongings and prepare to leave for Palestine. Hubris overcomes them and they rebel against the social restrictions imposed on them. This leads to outrage among the Muslim population and retribution. In Shibam and Kawkaban, they plunder Jewish possessions and rape their women. Though the perpetrators are punished, harsh taxes are imposed on the Jews, rabbis are imprisoned, and, later, the community is ordered to convert.
- 17th century Sources are best informed of Yemeni Jewish history beginning in the 17th century, and these accounts paint a dismal portrait of their plight. In 1676, Imam al-Mutawakkil orders Jews to convert to Islam. When they refuse, his successor, al-Mahdi, demolishes synagogues and prohibits prayer in public. They are later banished from Sana'a. The sage Mori Shalom Shabazi laments the expulsion in verse, writing, "They (the Jews) have forgotten happiness and are humiliated; they were uprooted in haste, in the desert they tread."
- 19th century The modern era of Yemeni Jewry begins with the British occupation of Aden in 1839. This period coincides with political volatility and as such offers the Jews little respite from their difficult predicament. The political instability of the 19th century and its accompanying economic and social difficulties lead to a resurgence of messianic feeling. Three false messiahs appear. These messianic movements, though in part the result of Muslim persecution, only exacerbate Jewish suffering because this social unrest destabilizes the economy and sometimes draws Muslims to their cause. The authorities respond by imposing more hardships on the Jews. Thus during this century, they are tasked with removing excrement and dead animals from Sana'a.
- 1870 Traveler Joseph Halévy records the restrictions on horseback riding that Jews have to contend with. Sore from walking, he wished to continue on a mount, a luxury prohibited to Jews. Astonished by his audacity, the Muslims he passed caused him so much grief that he was obliged to dismount.
- 1872 The Turks seize Northern Yemen. During the second Ottoman occupation of the country (1872–1914), Yemen is subjected to the Tanzimat reforms that were imposed in other parts of the empire. However, scholars are of mixed opinions as to how this benefits the Jews. They are given greater social autonomy, but at the same time their institutions, such as the beth din, are severely weakened.

- 1882 Zionist and modernist ideas, coupled with the political instability and sufferings of the 19th century lead to organized emigrations beginning in 1882. The authorities prohibit further departures a year later but the weak government cannot enforce the ban.
- 1884 Eduard Glaser visits Yemen and writes of Yemeni Jews that “they enjoyed no rights” and comments, “it was my general impression that they were the most pathetic creatures in all of South Arabia.”
- 1908 A second wave of Jewish emigration begins in 1908. More than 20,000 Yemeni Jews are in Palestine on the eve of Israeli independence.
- 1947–1950 The creation of the State of Israel provides the final impetus for mass migration. Both push and pull factors are involved in the decision to leave Yemen. After the vote to partition Palestine in 1947, Muslims riot in Aden and kill dozens of Jews. At the same time, the creation of Israel appears to fulfill biblical prophecy. Israeli authorities however, are not so keen to accept the newcomers. Cabinet transcripts reveal a heated debate over whether or not Israel really wants the Yemeni community to settle in the new country. Some ministers believe Yemeni Jews are so primitive they will not be able to integrate into Israeli society. Others worry they will bring unwanted diseases with them. Nevertheless, the government decides to facilitate their departure. Under the name Operation Magic Carpet, from 1949 to 1950 approximately 45,000 Yemeni Jews are brought to Israel.
- 1962 The trickle of Yemeni Jews that have continued to immigrate to Jewish state halts after the 1962 political revolution in Yemen.
- 1990s Emigration resumes with small numbers relocating to London, New York, and Israel. Much like Operation Magic Carpet, this exodus is also accompanied by controversy. The vehemently anti-Zionist Satmar Hasidic sect attempts to persuade the émigrés to avoid moving to Israel arguing the secular country will destroy their religious way of life.
- 2006 In January 2006, a dissident religio-political group called the Believing Youth chase 45 Jews of Ghurayr from their homes outside Saada. Though the group claims the community is serving Zionist interests and corrupting Muslims, it appears the real reasons for their actions are political. The Believing Youth are followers of a political rebel killed by government forces in 2004 and have never come to terms with their defeat. Indeed, days after the Jews leave Ghurayr, the organization ambushes and kills a number of soldiers. Thus, in all likelihood the Jews are pawns in a larger struggle between the Believing Youth and the government.

Origins of Yemenite Jews

The origin of the Jewish community in Yemen is probably found in merchants from the Babylonian Diaspora and the Persian Empire who during the Second Temple period settled in the flourishing Yemenite ports and in Arabian tribes who converted to Judaism. The Yemenite Shiite Muslims started extensive persecutions of Jews in the 12th century. Correspondence with the Rambam, the leader of world

Group of Yemeni Jews, about 1900. (Isadore Singer, ed., The Jewish Encyclopedia, 1901)

Jewry at the time who lived in Egypt, produced his famous encouraging “letter to Yemenite Jews.” Since then, for almost 1,000 years, Yemenite Jews were isolated from world Jewry. The Jews were the only non-Muslim religious group in Yemen. The Jews formed a castelike minority group within the highly stratified tribal Yemenite society, distinguished from Muslims by endogamy, religion, culture, and hereditary occupations. Jewish folk culture in Yemen was deeply embedded in local traditions, and there was a strong physical resemblance between Yemenite Arabs and Jews. The spoken language in Yemenite Jewish communities was the local variant of Yemenite Arabic. By Muslim law Jews were dhimmi, “a protected foreign people of the Book,” second-class citizens, landless, and doomed to poverty and discrimination. Most Yemenite Jews were rural and were scattered throughout Yemen in hundreds of villages. There were also urban communities such as in Sana’a, the capital, and Taiz.

Preservation of Tradition

The Jewish community in Yemen kept its tradition and Orthodox Jewish way of life zealously and consciously for almost 2,000 years in the face of great difficulties. The Yemenite Hebrew dialect is a variant of the Hebrew used in the Babylonian Diaspora, evidence to the antiquity of the community and its excellence in preserving Jewish tradition. Because of its centuries of isolation, most Yemenite Jews knew only of the Old Testament and were not acquainted with the Oral Law of the Mishnah and the Talmud. Jewish communities were too poor to support a specialized class of religious scholars and functionaries. In the absence of printing and with the scarcity of books, Yemenite Jewry entrusted custody of the sacred tradition to all males in the community. All Yemenite Jewish men could read in Hebrew and were “walking books” who knew the entire Old Testament by heart. Every man could recite the entire Old Testament in Yemenite Hebrew dialect. Men transmitted the Torah tradition directly to their sons by reciting by heart the Old Testament continuously while working at their craft with their sons present as apprentices and pupils, who followed in the recitation, until they mastered not only the craftsmanship but also memorized the whole Old Testament.

Yemenite Jewish males were artisans who came to occupy certain economic niches through the monopolization of such crafts as silver smithing, coin minting, leather work, weaving, and tailoring, vocations Muslims considered polluting. Jews were also small-scale traders, usually of their family products. In the absence of mechanized industry, banks, and so on surplus income was invested in silver jewelry and coins. Jews, thus, played a key role in Yemenite economy. The mastery of the craftsmanship was transmitted within the male kin group from father to son as a secret society.

Yemenite Jews started immigrating to Palestine in small numbers in 1882. In 1921, the Yemenite government passed a law forcing all Jewish orphans to convert to Islam because “Mohammed is the father of all orphans.” In 1948, upon the establishment of the State of Israel, Operation On Eagles’ Wings brought 100,000 Yemenite Jews to Israel.

Overview of Contemporary Jews in Yemen

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

The Yemeni Muslims frowned upon craftsmanship, which cleared the way for the Jews to dominate the vocation. They excelled as jewelers, blacksmiths, ceramists, and silversmiths. To this day Sana’ani jewelry shop owners speak of Jewish silverware in almost mythical tones, and their goods fetch much higher prices than recently crafted products. It is believed there were approximately 1,000 silversmiths in Yemen on the eve of their departure for Israel. Though they were not extensively involved in commerce, they dominated the coffee trade in Manakha. In Sana’a they controlled the royal mint for centuries. A very small percentage engaged in agriculture

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

The greatest Yemeni scholar was Yahya Salih (d. 1805). Despite their isolation from other Jewish communities, Yemeni Jewry remained loyal to the rabbinic tradition. They were in contact with the Gaonates in Babylonia and later followed the teachings of Maimonides and Joseph Caro. They were devoted to kabbalistic teachings in general and the Zohar in particular. According to Yom Tov Semach, the Aggadic Ein Ya’akov was the most popular book among Jews.

Though they were passionate students, they produced little in terms of scholarship, and none of their works had an impact outside the country. They focused on midrashic and kabbalistic works. Among their chief scholars were Solomon Adani (16th century) who authored Melekheth Shelomo, a commentary on the Mishnah. Nathanel b. Yesha (14th century) penned a midrashic work, The Light of the Darkness.

In the literary realm, their leading writers were Zechariah al-Dahir (15th century) and the aforementioned Mori Shalom Shabazi (17th century). The former wrote maqamat, a traditional form of Arabic music in North Africa and the Middle East, in the fashion of Judah al-Harizi, while the latter was a poet steeped in mysticism.

Yemenis have traditions that vary from those of their coreligionists. During the Torah readings on the Sabbath, they read a verse in Hebrew followed by its Aramaic translation. They follow the Seleucid calendar, which begins in 312 BCE. As residents of the Arab country of Yemen, they speak Arabic. The few that remain in Yemen today use Hebrew not only for liturgical and scholarly purposes but also as a means of communication.

Present Economic Conditions

Today Jews are full citizens of the state; the medieval strictures of the Pact of Umar, a ninth-century limitation on Jewish rights, and the jizya tax have been abolished and Jews have the same legal rights as Muslims. Nevertheless, they are still subjected to a great deal of social discrimination. They are compelled to choose from a limited number of professions, such as craftsmanship and agriculture, and are restricted to living together in a specific quarter of the town. Reports that they neither pray in synagogues nor have religious schools because they fear their Muslim neighbors will tear them down are unsubstantiated.

Living in the poorest country in the region, Yemeni Jews experience the same hardships as their Muslim compatriots and struggle to make ends meet. They are largely supported by Jewish communities abroad who provide religious books and yearly donations.

Because the central government is weak in large portions of the country, tribes rather than the regime control large swathes of the nation. Though Yemenis discriminate against them, they also offer them crucial protection, without which they could not survive. Rayda and Sa'ada are still ruled by disorderly tribes rather than by the central government in Sana'a. As such, every family and group must seek the protection of larger tribes or clans to survive. In Rayda, the Hashid and Bakil tribes safeguard the Jews by exacting retribution and meting out vengeance when Jews are wronged. Until 15 years ago, the Jews paid the tribe an annual tribute but recently they have done so only when they needed the Hashids to intervene on their behalf.

Jewish Education and Communal Institutions

Yemeni Jewry was exposed to Zionist and modernist ideas for the first time in the 19th century. In 1910, after correspondence with the Alliance Israélite Universelle, a modern school was opened in Sana'a, but it closed five years later because the community feared the modernist ideas it preached would have a detrimental effect on traditional Jewish life. The debate over the school reflected a greater struggle between modernists such as Rabbi Yahya Kafih and traditionalists led by Rabbi Yahya Isaac. The former wanted to wean the community away from dependence on kabbalistic teachings and embrace ideas emanating from Europe.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

Though Yemeni Jews lived scattered throughout Yemen, they resided in five main centers—Adeb and Habal in the south, Yarim in the center, Sa'ada and Tarjih in north, and Sana'a, the capital. They were largely rural in nature, and only two Jewish communities (Sana'a and Rayda) had more than 1,000 inhabitants. They lived in the urban areas of Sana'a, Sa'ada, Aden, Dhamar, Kawkaban, and Ta'iz. In addition, they resided in many rural regions, such as the Harraz mountains and the Rahib and Amran districts. The travelers Carl Rathjens and H. von Wissmann detailed 500 places where Jews lived in northern Yemen based on information given to them by a rabbi. Using these figures, they estimated there were around 70,000 Jews in the country in the 1930s; S. D. Goitein listed communities in 60 tribal areas, most located in the plateau between Ibb and Sana'a; this means they were in the Zaydi areas, not the Shafi' ones Today few Jews live in Yemen. According to the U.S. State Department, fewer than 500 Jews remain, though Arab news reports put their number as high as 1,500; possibly the remaining number of Jews is as low as 300. They reside in the city of Rayda and in villages surrounding Sa'ada, one of the cities of Sa'ada and Rayda, among the most restless and dangerous areas of Yemen.

Selected Bibliography

- Goitein, S.D., ed. 1941. Travels in Yemen: An Account of Joseph Halévy's Journey to Najran. Jerusalem: Hebrew University Press.
- Goitein, S.D. 1947. From the Land of Sheba. New York: Schocken.
- Goitein, S.D. 1955. Jews and Arabs. New York: Schocken.
- Halévy, Joseph. 1873. "Voyage Au Nedjran: Itineraire D'Un Voyage Dans Le Yemen 1869–1870." Bulletin de la Société de Géographie 6 (July): 6–31; 6 (September): 249–273; 6 (December): 581–606.
- Halkin, Abraham, and David Hartman. 1985. Crisis and Leadership: Epistles of Maimonides. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society.
- Lavon, Yaakov. 1997. My Footsteps Echo: The Yemen Journal of Rabbi Yaakov Sapir. Southfield, MI: Mishnas Rishonim.
- Shivtiel, Avihai, Wilfred Lockwood, and R. B. Serjeant. 1983. "The Jews of Sana'a." In Sana: An Arabian Islamic City, edited by R. B. Serjeant and Ronald Lewcock, 391–431. London: World of Islam Festival Trust.
- Tobi, Yosef. 1999. The Jews of Yemen: Studies in Their History and Culture. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Warburton, David. 1993. My Journey through Arhab and Hashid, translated by Eduard Glaser. Ardmore, PA: American Institute for Yemeni Studies.

Western Europe

Jews in Europe

M. Avrum Ehrlich

---

General Population: Total European Union, 376,533,000

Jewish Population: Total European Union Jewish population is approximately 1,000,000.

Percent of Population: 2.5 percent

Jewish Population by Country: As of January 1, 2007, there are 27 member states in the European Union (EU27): Austria, 9,000, 1.1 percent; Belgium, 31,400, 3.1 percent; Bulgaria, 2,300, 0.3 percent; Czech Republic, 2,800, 0.3 percent; Denmark, 6,400, 1.2 percent; Estonia, 1,900, 1.4 percent; Finland, 1,100, 0.2 percent; France, 519,000, 8.8 percent; Germany, 103,000, 1.3 percent; Greece, 4,500, 0.4 percent; Hungary, 51,300, 5.1 percent; Ireland, 1,000, 0.3 percent; Italy, 29,400, 0.5 percent; Latvia, 9,600, 4.0 percent; Lithuania, 3,700, 1.0 percent; Luxembourg, 600, 1.4 percent; the Netherlands, 28,000, 1.8 percent; Poland, 3,500, 0.1 percent; Portugal, 500, 0.0 percent; Romania, 10,800, 0.5 percent; Spain, 12,000, 0.3 percent; Slovakia, 3,300, 0.6 percent; Slovenia, 100, 0.1 percent; Sweden, 15,000, 1.7 percent; United Kingdom, 273,500, 4.6 percent

Languages Spoken: The national languages of the respective countries are usually the language of the Jews, but Jews will often prefer certain languages. In Belgium, for example, Yiddish is still a living language in Antwerp and Brussels, and French is preferred over Flemish. Many German Jews speak Russian. Many French Jews from Arab countries speak Arabic. A large number have a grasp of Hebrew reading, and others are fluent speakers. A large majority use English as the international language.

---

Historical Overview

European Jewish history is of central importance to the course of Diaspora life. The wealth of literature and books, studies, and volumes of historical documents relating to the Jewish experience in Europe is enormous and complex. Jews have followed and, in many cases, paved the contours of European life. At different times, Jews were active in the central nervous systems of European thinking, commerce, administration, and intellectual activity in the sciences and literature. In addition to the Christian nature of European culture, and the Bible's influence on its morality, governance, and perception of Jews, the role of the Jew in old and new Europe is very complex and figures in the European imagination as a subnarrative for the European experience, providing a fascinating mosaic for contemplation.

Jewish people moved into Greece, which is now Europe, in the fifth century BCE and gradually, over many cascades of time, dispersed, some keeping their identity as Jews and others assimilating at varying speeds and degrees. Small and earlier communities of Jews may have lived on the brink of extinction in certain regions until a wave of Jewish immigration from another place would come to reinforce it. At other times, regions have been evacuated or the Jews expelled, and the entire ethnic and cultural baggage of a Jewish community could be transplanted to another country, fusing with existing Jewish communities. This pattern has occurred time after time in Europe and elsewhere, suggesting unique sociological structures for the Jewish populations. It is certainly an interesting phenomena and typical of the Diaspora experience.

The Ashkenazi/Sephardi distinction emerged in Europe as Jews made their way toward Germanic and Central European countries; developed their own customs, habits, dress, and language; and became known as Ashkenazim. Some moved to Christian Spain and over a period of hundreds of years fused with the Baghdadi Jews of Iraq who lived in Muslim Spain from the ninth century. Over a few more hundred years, their joint sense of identity formed around their Spanish experience; hence, the Sephardi culture emerged. This culture was transported out of Spain in 1492 when all Jews who had not converted to Christianity were expelled, and many made their way to new areas of Europe, joining older Jewish communities in Holland, Britain, Italy, North Africa, and the Ottoman Empire, and forming new settlements in Asia, South America, and North America.

A curious irony is that at different times in Jewish history, different ethnic groups of Jews have experienced declines and successes, favor and disfavor in the eyes of changing rulers. For example, taken from relatively late Jewish history, the Portuguese Jews of the 1700s were considered the most intelligent, wealthy, able, and valuable assets to have in a new country and were protected as such. This was so in Scandinavia, Britain, and the Netherlands. European Jews, Ashkenazim, were frowned upon, and there were several examples of how Sephardi Jews tried to disassociate themselves from their Ashkenazi brothers, who were often forlorn, ignorant, and poor, seeking greener pastures in new countries and often depending too heavily on their wealthier coreligionists. Ironically, within two centuries, the reverse phenomena occurred: Ashkenazi Jews have developed a reputation for intelligence, wealth, and commerce, and the Sephardi Jews emerging from the declining Middle East are perceived as poor and less educated; the same discrimination has been prevalent.

The same feeling of superiority was expressed by German Jews who spoke negatively of the Russian and Eastern Jews who crossed over to Germany in the early 1900s. The same phenomena repeats itself in different degrees of severity, however, after the Holocaust, when there is a more intense effort to ensure that Jewish migration to more hospitable countries is made possible. An example of this is the influx of Russian Jews into Germany and the encouragement this step was given by the relevant authorities. Nevertheless, many Israelis immigrating to Diaspora countries are perceived in varying degrees of favor, while Russian and South African immigration is considered favorably.

The Nazi destruction of most of Europe's Jewish people and culture was also a great equalizer for Ashkenazim and Sephardim. Jews throughout the Diaspora probably realized the results of not doing enough to help them emigrate before the disaster struck. The Sephardi perception of the destruction of Ashkenazi Jewry was profound, and their sense of identification with the Ashkenazi Jews, deep. This is not only because Sephardi Jews witnessed the horrors of the annihilation of the Sephardi Jews of Greece, but also out of grief and a sense of brotherhood.

Today, the Ashkenazi/Sephardi divide among Jews is becoming less relevant as a new identity is developing and the socioeconomic difference narrows. The new horizons for the European Diaspora are not yet manifest. Depending on anti-Semitic trends, the Jews of different European countries could either thrive as they have in the past, negotiating their identity as Jews with modernity, or they could immigrate to other regions or to Israel. In all cases, the Diaspora story of European Jewry is not over.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

The Jews of Europe, are well established in European society and can be found working in a wide range of professions. Jews are typically strong in commerce, or retail trade. In general, Jews in European Union countries are relatively well-off, and some hold positions of influence.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Historically, the Jewish influence on European society is undeniable. Now, as reconstruction of Jewish communities across Europe has been given time to flourish, cultural and religious organizations have generally done well. Arguably, Jews and Jewish culture continue to be important elements in European society, politically, socially, and economically influencing and broadly shaping it. Jewish, contemporary contributions to European culture, in the fields of the sciences and the humanities, are too numerous to list exhaustively, as are the important European Jewish figures who so often stand behind them. Nevertheless, efforts to preserve strong ties to Judaism for the community by offering a developed cultural infrastructure would not be possible without the support of major international Jewish organization's support.

Present Economic Conditions

The European Jewish community is well established and well organized in European society and has been able to enjoy high status in that society, both socially and economically. Initiatives to restore Jewish property exist in most countries, but problems also exist for many countries where the issue is surrounded with legislation, legal procedures, and litigation, due in part to special government committees. There may also be conflicts among Jewish interest groups as to the distribution of assets and monetary compensation.

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

Jewish communities are well organized, operating under central umbrella organizations, the leadership of a chief rabbi, and a relatively well-established Jewish communal infrastructure. Much of the work for maintaining Europe's Jewish schools, organizing community activities and facilities, and establishing and maintaining legal and political institutions is more frequently accomplished through important international Jewish organizations such as the American Joint Distribution Committee or the Lauder Foundation. These mainly political organizations are active throughout Europe in the reconstruction of the Jewish community. Some highly successful Jewish studies programs, Limmud, for example, in Britain, provides a very wide and broad exposure to all strains of Jewish interests. Enrollment in Jewish schools varies; for instance, enrollment in Jewish schools is higher in Britain and lower in France.

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionism, and Existential Problems of the Community

Although there are continued anti-Semitic incidents throughout much of Europe with reconstruction, anti-Semitism in most parts of Europe is not present at dangerous levels (although in Belgium, France, Germany, the Netherlands, and Britain many challenges remain, as anti-Semitism has been on the rise in these countries for several years). Since 2003, the European Union has been involved in activity directly pertaining to the Jews of Europe, particularly with regard to the issue of anti-Semitism.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

As a source of growing concern for the Jews of the European Union, it is not anticipated that there will be another wave of immigration rivaling that during the 1950s and 1960s, when 250,000 to 300,000 Jews from North Africa immigrated to France. The exception in this case is Germany, where, from 1990 to the end of 2003, immigration was accessible for up to 190,000 Jews from the former Soviet Union. Regardless, the Jewish population in Europe has been declining, anywhere from 25 percent in Britain to 50 percent in Holland, because of low birthrates, aging, aliyah, and intermarriage.

Some Jews are wary of the rise of the Muslim community and its consequences for the Jewish community within Europe's urban centers. For instance, France's Muslim community is said to be 8–10 percent of the overall population; at the present rate of growth for Europe's Muslim community, challenges may seem unavoidable.

Jews of Europe may experience conflict over the negative view of Israel often conveyed in the media by biased reporting, which has contributed to the delegitimization of Israel in some sectors of Europe. At the same time, Jews in the European Union maintain a strong connection with the State of Israel and are active in fund-raising and cultural activities.

Jews in Austria

Shoshannah Zirkin

---

General Population: 8,106,000

Jewish Population: 10,000

Percent of Population: Approximately 0.125 percent

Jewish Population by City: Most Austrian Jews live in Vienna. Smaller communities can be found in Baden, Bad Gastein, Graz, Innsbruck, Linz, and Salzburg.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Most Austrian Jews are Holocaust survivors and their descendents. In recent years, Jewish refugees from Eastern Europe, the former Soviet Union, and Iran have settled in Austria.

Languages Spoken: German is the official language of Austria. Many Jews also speak English and Yiddish.

---

Historical Overview

903 The first Jews arrive in Austria with the Roman legions.

1195–1198 Many Jews from Bavaria and the Rhineland settle in Austria.

1200 Austria becomes a center of Jewish study. Many Jews work for the government administering taxes.

1250 The number of German Jews in Austria begins to increase.

1320 Government records show that Jews begin to pay special taxes. Discrimination against Jews increases steadily over the next century.

1420 All Jews are arrested under the orders of King Albert V, and the government confiscates all Jewish-owned property. More than 200 Jews are burned at the stake, and those who survive are expelled from the country.

1440 Life for the Jews improves under the reign of Frederick III. Jewish refugees are given protection by the state, and they are allowed to settle in two small towns, Styria and Catinthia.

1551 Jews in Austria are required to wear a yellow badge for identification.

1669 Jews are again expelled from Austria, with the exception of those employed by the state.

1727 Fewer than 500 Jews reside in Vienna; all are members of the wealthy elite. At this time, the government tries to control the Jewish population by permitting only the oldest male in a family to marry.

1785 Life for the Jews improves again during the reign of Joseph II. Jews are encouraged to assimilate into Austrian society. For the first time, they attend public schools and are permitted to serve in the army.

1790 Joseph II dies, and many of the restrictions he abolished are reinstated. Jewish children are forced to attend Christian schools.

1826 Seitenstettengasse, Vienna's first major synagogue, opens.

1848 Austria experiences a revolution that leaves the Jews optimistic about their future. Several Jews are elected to serve in the Austrian Parliament. Jews are no - longer required to pay special taxes, and the laws restricting the number of marriages per family are revoked.

- 1867 The right to exercise freedom of religion is reinforced in the Austrian constitution, and conditions for Austrian Jews improve again.
- 1882 Kadimah, the first all-Jewish national students' society is founded in response to anti-Semitism.
- 1919 After World War I, the Treaty of Germain grants minority status to all Jews living in Austria. The Jews live well until the years leading up to World War II.
- 1938 Austria is annexed by Nazi Germany. Jews are heavily persecuted. Hitler gives an order to deport the first lot of Viennese Jews in October, and Kristallnacht takes place the following November. More than 30,000 Jews are sent to concentration camps and nearly all synagogues and Jewish-owned shops are destroyed.
- 1941 Jewish emigration out of Austria is prohibited. Many of the remaining Jews are sent to the Lodz Ghetto. Others are sent to ghettos outside the country in Riga, Minsk, and Kovono.
- 1943 Only 800 Jews remain in Austria. They live in hiding and are cared for by members of the community.
- 1945 About 70,000 Austrian Jews are killed in the Holocaust.
- 1968 A small Jewish community reemerges in Vienna.
- 1991 The Austrian government admits to participating in war crimes during the Holocaust.
- 1993 Tyrol reopens; the Innsbruck synagogue had been destroyed in the pogroms at the start of World War II.

Contemporary Overview

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

Vienna has several Jewish kindergartens and one primary school. The ultra-Orthodox community maintains its own separate school system, which includes the Lauder-Chabad School and the Zvi Perez Chajes School. In addition, there is an Institute for Jewish Studies at the Vienna University and an Institute for the History of Jews in Saint Polten.

The Austrian Jewish community produces several publications. The two most popular are Die Gemeinde and Illustrierte Neue Welt, both distributed monthly.

Vienna has a Jewish Welcome Service to aid new residents and visitors. The community offices of Vienna and the Chief Rabbinate are located in the Stad Temple, built in 1826. The temple also has a number of prayer rooms that accommodate the many Hasidic sects that live within the city.

Vienna also has several Jewish-related museums. The Jewish Museum, which opened in 1993, displays a plethora of objects that reflect Jewish life in Austria before 1938. The museum is owned and operated by the city. Museum Judenplatz, which opened in 2000, serves as the national memorial for Austrian Jews who were killed in the Holocaust. There is also a Sigmund Freud Museum, located in Freud's former residence.

Holocaust Memorial at Judenplatz in Vienna, Austria. (Photo by Jono David)

Jewish organizations in Austria include B'nai B'rith, Hashomer Hatzair, the Austrian Jewish Students Union, S. C. Hakoah, the Women's International Zionist organization, the Zionist Federation, and Chabad.

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionism, and Existential Problems of the Community

Unlike Germany, Austria has done much to suppress memories of the Holocaust. Many Austrians argue that because Austria was invaded by Germany, the country actually did not exist from 1938 to 1945, thereby refusing to take any responsibility for what happened. What they fail to mention is that during the years of occupation, nearly 10 percent of Austria's non-Jewish population (630,000 people) willingly joined the Nazi party. This selective memory leaves little remorse for the terrible tragedies that took place in Austria during World War II.

After 1945, unlike Germany, Austria made no attempt to reeducate its population. Anti-Semitism did not cease to exist, and it still holds a strong presence in Austrian society today, which is reflected most heavily in politics and the media. The political left is strongly anti-Zionist, arguing that Israel promotes terrorism and racism and is an uncivilized society. In addition, Neue Kronenzeitung, the most widely read newspaper in Austria, contains anti-Semitic text and has been known to print articles that grossly diminish crimes committed during the Holocaust. However, the paper has improved significantly since 2000, when the publisher was taken to court for publishing racist materials. Another paper notorious for publishing anti-Semitic material is The Zur Zeit Weekly.

In contrast to the media, the true history of the Holocaust is part of the official Austrian Ministry of Education's curriculum. It is taught in all public schools, and all Austrian schoolchildren go on field trips to see Mauthausen.

Anti-Semitic crimes in Austria are rarely violent; however, synagogues and cemeteries are often desecrated, and many religious Jews experience verbal abuse. Crimes usually go unreported, and those that are taken to the police are commonly overlooked. Regardless of the gross denial and the anti-Semitism still in place, there are historians who have exposed Austria's true history, including Pelinka, Richard Mitten, Hans Sadrian, Gerhard Botz, G. E. R. Gedye, and Erica Weinzierl.

Austria enjoys full diplomatic relations with Israel.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

Many Jews emigrated from Austria at the start of World War II. From 1938 to 1941, approximately 130,000 of the total 300,000 Austrian Jews fled the country. Most of these refugees settled in England, other European countries, the United States, and Palestine. Since 1948, 5,400 Austrian Jews have immigrated to Israel.

Selected Bibliography

- Dagmar, Lorenze C. G., ed. 1999. Contemporary Jewish Writing in Austria: An Anthology. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.
- Halsall, Paul. 1998. "Jewish History Sourcebook: The Charter of the Jews of the Duchy of Austria July 1, 1244 CE." <http://www.fordham.edu/halsall/jewish/1244-jews-austria.html> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- "Jewish Communities: Europe: Austria." 2004–2005. World Jewish Congress Web site. http://www.worldjewishcongress.org/communities/comm\_reg\_europe.html# (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Lea, Charlene A. 1978. Emancipation, Assimilation and Stereotype: The Image of the Jew in German and Austrian Drama (1800–1850). Bonn, Germany: Bouvier.
- Marcus, Jacob. 1938. The Jew in the Medieval World: A Sourcebook, 315–1791. New York: JPS.
- "The Nazi Holocaust 1938–1945 6,000,000 Deaths." 2000. The History Place: Genocide in the Twentieth Century. <http://www.historyplace.com/worldhistory/genocide/holocaust.htm> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Pauley, Bruce F. 1992. From Prejudice to Persecution: A History of Austrian Anti-Semitism. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Peri, Anat. 2001. Jorg Haider's Antisemitism. Jerusalem: Hebrew University.
- Shields, Jacqueline. "The Jewish Virtual History Tour: Austria." Jewish Virtual Library. <http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/vjw/Austria.html> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Zohn, Harry. 1995. Austriaca and Judaica: Essays and Translations. New York: P. Lang.

Overrepresentation of Jews in Vienna's Gymnasien

Steven Beller

---

Overrepresentation of Jews in secondary and higher education in modern Western societies has been a much remarked upon and generally recognized phenomenon, especially as regards late 19th- and early 20th-century Germany and Central Europe. There has been much debate about the reasons for this overrepresentation, and what its consequences were, both for the Jewish communities involved and for the larger societies and cultures in which they existed. One of the largest Jewish communities in Central Europe at the turn of the 20th century was in Vienna, and Jewish overrepresentation in the Habsburg capital's elite secondary schools, the Gymnasien, has been seen as providing a major clue as to the very large, indeed predominant, role of Jewish individuals in the modern culture of fin-de-siècle Vienna.

Jewish overrepresentation in secondary education in Vienna was very high, especially in the Gymnasien. Jews represented roughly 9 percent of Vienna's population around 1900. Yet roughly 25 percent of all secondary schoolboys in Vienna in the same period were Jewish, with slightly more than 20 percent of boys at Realschulen and about 30 percent of all Gymnasium students being Jewish in the two decades before 1914. Secondary education for girls was not as widespread as for boys, but Jewish overrepresentation in this sector was even greater, with Jewish girls constituting around half of all those attending the Lyzeen that were the main form of female secondary education (Rozenblit 1983, 102–122; Beller 1997, 138).

Various explanations for this overrepresentation have been suggested, and they tend to divide along the lines of social causation, on the one hand, against, more specifically, Jewish cultural explanations, on the other. A straightforward cultural explanation is that Jewish religious and cultural tradition put far more weight on the need for education than did other group traditions at the time, most notably the Catholic tradition. Against this is the consideration that the Gymnasien were bastions of Classical and German humanist, secular education and, as such, were seen at major variance from the religious traditions of Central European traditional Judaism. Social historians have instead emphasized social factors, such as the concentration of Jews in commercial and bourgeois occupations, whose non-Jewish members also tended to send their children to secondary schools at a much higher rate than, for instance, peasant farmers or manual workers would. The fact that Vienna's Jewish population had a quite different occupational structure than that of the non-Jewish majority, with roughly two-thirds of Jews being either self-employed or salaried, compared with the majority Catholic population, where more than three-quarters of those employed were wage laborers (Oxaal et al. 1987, 36–37), would appear to support this social argument. Yet the very peculiarity of the Jewish occupational distribution is itself partly explicable by cultural factors, and the tendency of some occupational groups in Vienna, such as commercial independents, to send their children to elite humanist Gymnasien could just as well be due to the ethnic background and hence cultural background of the members of those groups as it could their socioeconomic class.

A quite cogent explanation for the overrepresentation is that the wish to integrate into and succeed in the larger society around them led many Jews, as members of a diasporic minority, to make an extra effort to obtain an education for themselves and their offspring as a means of gaining a professional advantage or social acceptance. Yet it is debatable whether this is to be viewed as a cultural or social explanation. The motivation to assimilate was undoubtedly a strong factor, but it had its own ideological background in the emancipation movement of Central European Jewry, going back to the late 18th century. It was also not clear that the most effective way to the desired integration was through elite secondary education. The Jewish ideology of emancipation proclaimed secular humanist education the best method, and this was echoed by German liberal ideology; but large sectors of Viennese society did not accept this ideology, and other groups in Vienna, such as the very numerous Czech immigrants, integrated in quite other ways. The attraction of education as a means to integration, as well as to social, material, and moral advancement, was as much culturally determined as socially, and in originating in the Haskalah of the 18th century linked up to the original explanation for Jewish overrepresentation, which was the high value placed on education by traditional Jewish religious society, even though now in secular form.

The emphasis within Vienna's Jewish community on the need to get one's offspring a good secondary education was much more widespread than one might have thought: more than half of Jewish primary schoolboys went on to either a Realschule or a Gymnasium at the turn of the century, compared with less than 20 percent of all primary schoolboys, and less than 15 percent of non-Jewish schoolboys. The result was a ratio of overrepresentation of Jews at Gymnasien of almost 5:1 and at Realschulen of 3:1 (Beller 1997, 119).

The consequences of this overrepresentation are also much more significant than often realized. The large Jewish presence in the Gymnasien varied greatly geographically (among schools) and socioeconomically (among parental occupations). Some schools had very few Jewish pupils, such as the Theresianum, which was traditionally the school of the nobility, and the Schottengymnasium, which, as a clerical institution, enjoyed a conservative and elite reputation. Most Gymnasien in the outlying districts of Vienna also had relatively few Jewish pupils. Not surprisingly, Jewish boys were concentrated instead in schools in those districts of Vienna with sizable Jewish populations, most notably the First (Inner City), Second (Leopoldstadt), and Ninth (Alsergrund) districts. These districts were also the three that remained politically liberal after the 1895 Christian Social takeover of Vienna's municipal government. Excluding the conservative Schottengymnasium, Jewish boys at these schools, in the so-called liberal districts of Vienna, made up 59 percent of all pupils between 1870 and 1910 (Beller 1990, 173).

Jewish boys were also concentrated in terms of their parents' occupation. Whereas non-Jewish fathers were concentrated in traditional Austrian middle-class careers, especially in the officialdom, Jewish fathers, as one would expect from traditional Jewish occupational patterns, were heavily concentrated in the commercial, financial, and capitalist sectors and in the liberal professions. This skewed distribution on ethno-religious lines meant that although Jewish boys made up 30 percent of all Gymnasien pupils, they represented about two-thirds of all Gymnasiasten from a liberal bourgeois background (Beller 1989, 53). The combined effect of geographic and occupational variation meant that in the schools in the liberal districts of Vienna, 79 percent of the boys whose parents had a liberal bourgeois occupation were Jewish between 1870 and 1910. (Beller 1990, 172–173).

Such figures strongly suggest that the reason for the well-known prominence of Jews in Vienna's modern culture was due to the equally great presence of Jews in that culture's social reservoir as represented in the more liberal and progressive sector of Vienna's educated elite. If, as has been claimed, Viennese modern culture was the product of the educated scions of the city's liberal bourgeoisie, alienated from the political realm by the collapse of political liberalism in Vienna in the 1890s, then something like two-thirds of this group appears to have been Jewish. Furthermore, the more politically liberal the grouping, the higher the Jewish presence. Over the period 1870–1910, the Jewish presence in the liberal sector of Vienna's educated class was growing, as well. (It should be recalled that the Jewish presence was even higher among educated women.)

The Jewish presence in the more liberal bourgeois sector of Vienna's educated class was so large that the particular Jewish history and experience that had partially created this overrepresentation, the ideology of emancipation and its strong attachment to the German humanist culture of Bildung, had a very strong influence on the resulting modern culture, along with the problems of being Jewish in a strongly anti-Semitic environment. Anti-Semitism can itself be seen, ironically, as partially due to the envy of the less-educated, and hence less successful, when confronted with Jewish educational achievement. In that sense, the attempt to integrate through education created one more barrier, one more locus of resistance in the rest of society.

Selected Bibliography

- Beller, Steven. 1989. Vienna and the Jews, 1867–1938: A Cultural History. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Beller, Steven. 1990. "The Social and Ethnic Foundations of a Cultural Elite: Jewish Overrepresentation in Vienna's Gymnasien." In Education and Social Structure in Central Europe in the 19th and 20th Centuries, edited by Victor Karady and Wolfgang Mitter, 163–176. Vienna: Böhlau Verlag.
- Beller, Steven. 1997. "The City as Integrator: Immigration, Education, and Popular Culture in Vienna, 1880–1938." German Politics and Society 15 (1): 117–139.
- Oxaal, Ivar, Michael Pollak, and Gerhard Botz, eds. 1987. Jews, Antisemitism and Culture in Vienna. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul.
- Rozenblit, Marsha L. 1983. The Jews of Vienna 1867–1914: Assimilation and Identity. Albany: State University of New York Press.

Jews in Belgium

Shoshannah Zirkin

General Population: 10,249,000

Jewish Population: 31,400

Percent of Population: 3.1 percent

Jewish Population by City: Antwerp, 15,000; Brussels, 15,000. Much smaller communities are found in Arlon, Liege, Mons, Ostende, Charleroi, and Ghent.

Languages Spoken: Jews in Antwerp speak Yiddish and Flemish. Jews in Brussels speak French.

Historical Overview

- 1262 The first official record of Jews in Belgium appears in Duke Henry III's will, where he orders all Jews to be expelled from Brabant province. Around the same time, theologian Thomas Aquinas suggests that Belgian Jews pay taxes and perform manual labor to prevent them from becoming wealthy.
- 1311 The Jewish community is rebuilt under the protection of Duke John II. Many Jewish refugees from France settle in Belgium at this time.
- 1348 Like elsewhere in Europe, Jews in Belgium are blamed for the Black Death and massacred as a result.
- 1490 Large numbers of Sephardic Jews are expelled from Spain and Portugal and settle in Antwerp. Most of these Jews are Marranos, that is, Jews who pretend to be New Christians while practicing Judaism in secret.
- 1650 The Marrano population maintains a synagogue with a center for diamond trading as a cover-up.
- 1713 Belgium is under Austrian rule. Jews are required to pay special taxes.
- 1831 Belgium regains independence, and Judaism is recognized as an official religion. Jews in Antwerp remain religious, but Jews in Brussels have a high rate of assimilation.
- 1878 The Great Synagogue, designed by Desire DeKeyser, is built on Rue de la Regence.
- 1880 Many Jews from various areas throughout Europe flee to Belgium to escape persecution.
- 1940 Belgium puts up a strong resistance against German invasion, but eventually the Nazi government triumphs and places the country under military rule. Restrictions of Jews are put into action immediately and become progressively worse over time; however, Belgian law did not permit the mention of religion on civil documents, making it difficult for the Nazis to identify most of the Jewish population. In addition, most local Belgians are unwilling to help the Nazis; instead, they often help Jewish friends and hide Jewish children.
- 1942 Jews in Belgium are required to wear yellow badges for identification, but local police are unwilling to help enforce this law. The first Belgian Jews are sent to concentration camps (primarily Auschwitz). In response, the Committee for Jewish Defense, an underground resistance group, is organized to help Jews hide and escape.

1942–1944 Approximately 25,000 Belgian Jews perish in the Holocaust.

1947 Belgium votes for the creation of a Jewish state at the United Nations.

1970 Political activism increases among Jews in Belgium.

1979 The first of many Arab terrorist attacks on Jews takes place in Belgium.

1980 Belgian-Israel trade reaches an all-time high.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Jews dominate the diamond industry in Antwerp. The official language of the Diamond exchange is Yiddish, and business deals are always sealed with Mazel-Bracha (luck and blessing).

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

There are many Jewish historical sites in Belgium including the Great Synagogue, the National Monument to the Jewish Martyrs of Belgium, and a Memorial for Jews who fought in the Belgian Resistance during World War II. There are several smaller monuments in Brussels, including one for World War I hero Louis Bernheim.

Present Economic Conditions

The majority of Jews in Belgium are middle class. They work in several industries including fur, textiles, leather, and diamonds.

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

The Belgian government constitutionally recognizes minority religions, and therefore holds power to support and fund religious schools. There are seven government-funded Jewish schools in Antwerp and four in Brussels. Most of the children in these cities go to religious schools where they receive Orthodox educations.

Belgium's Jewish community puts out several community publications. Regards is the main publication in Brussels, and Belgisch Israelitisch Weekblad is the most popular Jewish newspaper in Antwerp. In addition, several magazines address specific subjects, such as Israel Aujour'd'hui and La Tribune Sioniste, which are both dedicated to issues concerning Israel. Los Muestrros is a magazine focused on Sephardi culture.

Antwerp has one of the largest communities of ultra-Orthodox Jews in the world, including Hasidic Jews who follow in the traditions of Belz, Ger, Czortkow, Lubavitch, Satmar, and Vishnitz. The city has about 30 synagogues, all Orthodox. On the whole, the Jewish community of Brussels is less religious than those in Antwerp. There are more than 10 temples, including one Reform and one Sephardic synagogue.

Antwerp has kosher food stores and restaurants. It is more difficult to find kosher food in Brussels.

Because Brussels is the capital of the European Union, the Belgian community takes a special interest in politics. The World Jewish Congress and the European Union of Jewish Students both have offices in Brussels.

Major organizations include The Comite de Coordination des Organisations Juives de Belgique, which acts as a representative body for all of the separate Jewish communities throughout the country.

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionism, and Existential Problems of the Community

Belgium has a long history of anti-Semitism. In a sense, it is fashionable to be against the Jews. Belgian newspapers regularly publish anti-Semitic political cartoons, where Jews are portrayed as ugly and ultrareligious. Although deep-seated anti-Semitic beliefs are on an overall decline, violence against Jews still takes place and is often traced back to the large community of North Africans who now live in Belgium. The second Palestinian uprising in 2000 led to a drastic increase in anti-Semitic feelings and actions throughout the country. Media reports and public opinions continued to get worse for the Jews leading to anti-Semitic acts in 2002, including the bombing, shooting, and vandalizing of several synagogues and Jewish-owned shops. In addition, the Israeli flag was burned at a pro-Palestinian demonstration. About 80 percent of violent acts of anti-Semitism occur in Antwerp and are targeted at ultra-Orthodox Jews. The other 20 percent of crimes usually occur in Brussels.

Most Belgian politicians are staunchly against Israel politically, siding with Palestine on nearly all issues, in attempt to win the support of the new and large Muslim population. Belgian politicians use hatred for Israel as a tool in domestic and international issues. They appeal largely to the country's Christian majority, which reproaches Jews for failing to assimilate into mainstream society. Initially, this strong anti-Zionist sentiment was fashionably exclusive, discussed among the intellectual elite; however, it has emerged from the academic sphere into mainstream popular opinion. Today, the Belgian media continues to portray Israel in a negative light, and the people side with the press, showing little to no support under any circumstances.

Belgian Jews often feel limited to the Jewish community and misunderstood by the greater society. Some more extreme Belgians have argued that Zionists should be stripped of their Belgian citizenships because their allegiance is clearly to a country other than their own. To prove their patriotism, about 300 Jews have organized the Union of Progressive Jews of Belgium. Members are both anti-Zionist and anti-Israel. They speak regularly in public schools, and the media often showcases their various functions.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

Since 1948, 4,000 Belgian Jews have emigrated to Israel.

Selected Bibliography

- Abusz, Werber. 1968. "Jewish Resistance in Belgium." Yad Vashem Bulletin 19 (22, May): 60–66.
- Beker, Avi, ed. 1998. Jewish Communities of the World. Minneapolis: Lerner.
- Coene, G., and C. Longman. 2006. "Gender Equality and Cultural Diversity: The Belgian Case." Working paper for the conference Gender Equality and Cultural Diversity: European Lessons and Comparisons II, Free University Amsterdam, June 8–9, 2006.
- Fabry, Joseph. 1991. Next-to-Final Solution: A Belgian Detention Camp for Hitler Refugees. New York: P. Lang.
- Gerstenfeld, Manfred. 2005. "Anti-Zionism in Belgium—The Country's Civil Religion that Reflects the New Anti-Semitism: An Interview with Joël Kotek." Post-Holocaust and Anti-Semitism, No. 29, February 1. Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs Web site. <http://www.jcpa.org/phas/phas-29.htm> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- "Global Anti-Semitism: Selected Incidents around the World in 2002." 2002. Anti-Defamation League Web site. http://www.adl.org/Anti\_semitism/anti-semitism\_global\_incidents.asp# (accessed April 22, 2007).
- "Jewish Communities: Europe: Belgium." 2004–2005. World Jewish Congress. http://www.worldjewishcongress.org/communities/comm\_reg\_europe.html# (accessed April 22, 2007).
- "The Jewish Community of Belgium. Am Yisrael Web site. <http://www.amyisrael.co.il/europe/belgium/> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- "Jewish Population Tables: Table 4. Estimated Jewish Population Distribution In Europe, 1/1/2002." 2002. <http://www.jafi.org.il/education/100/concepts/demography/demtables.html#4>. (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Mikhman, Dan, ed. 1998. Belgium and the Holocaust: Jews, Belgians, Germans. Jerusalem: Yad Vashem.
- Oreck, Alden. "The Jewish Virtual History Tour: Belgium." Jewish Virtual Library. <http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsourc/vjw/Belgium.html> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Tigay, Alan M., ed. 1994. The Jewish Traveler. Northvale, NJ: Jason Aronson.

Holocaust Art in Belgium

Daniel Potteau

---

By the 1920s, the little kingdom of Belgium included a lively population of well-assimilated Jews, ranging from small shopkeepers and craftspeople to scientists, military officers, bankers, and artists. In the next decade, Belgium faced a massive immigration of mostly impoverished Jews from Eastern Europe, and after the rise of Nazism in 1933, thousands of the estimated 250,000 Jews who fled Germany settled in Belgium. At the outbreak of World War II, some 65,000 Jews lived in Belgium, the majority of them not Belgian.

In entertainment—music, ballet, opera, theater, journalism, literature—as well as in the visual arts—painting, sculpture, film, photography—Jews were participating in Belgian cultural life. Art schools and music and acting conservatories welcomed Jewish students, who were eager to learn.

When Germany invaded Belgium on May 10, 1940, Jews were seemingly left alone for almost a year. But in Poland, the first extermination camps were soon to be built.

In 1941, in a first step toward isolation, impoverishment, and degradation, all Jews in Belgium were forced to live in one of the four cities (Antwerp, Brussels, Liège, and Charleroi) where the great majority already lived. They also were subject to a nightly curfew at their domiciles. Among the many restrictions, Jewish professors and students were banned from conservatories, academies, and universities; artists were denied exhibitions; and Jewish children banned from public schools.

In Berlin, a meeting at Adolf Eichmann's office had ordered the SS officials in charge of Jewish affairs in France, the Netherlands, and Belgium to prepare for deportation of the Jews, later named the Endlösung der Judenfrage (Final Solution to the Jewish Question). SS-Sammelläger (transit camps) were instantly installed in France (in Drancy, a suburb of Paris), the Netherlands (Westerbork), and Belgium (Mechelen, Malines in French).

In Mechelen, the former Belgian Caserne Dossin barracks, ideally located half-way between Antwerp and Brussels, and with its own railroad ramp, was hurriedly converted with bunk beds for 1,000 people. (Today, part of the building houses the tiny Museum of Deportation and Resistance, which opened in 1995.)

An inexorable next step was when, after their "successful" experience in Poland, the Germans established a Judenrat (Association des Juifs en Belgique, or AJB), which all Jews were forced to join. The AJB was ordered to coordinate the so-called Arbeitseinsatz (labor mobilization) and create files for all Jews in Belgium. The files were eventually used to "invite" the Jews to work in the East. By then, Jews in Belgium were also ordered to wear the Star of David. Soon trucks drove into the Caserne Dossin courtyard, unloading new prisoners almost every day.

Resistance, even unarmed, against the German occupation was dangerous, so in the beginning much was done by individuals or small groups. Yet an illegal press flourished, and Jewish and non-Jewish artists alike drew caricatures in numerous Resistance tracts to counter Nazi propaganda.

Artists at Work in SS Camps

Several Jewish artists were rounded up and sent to the Dossin transit camp; a few survived. In one barrack, a Malerstube (painters' workshop) was installed in a small room with one window, where Jewish painters were assigned to paint cardboard numbers for the inmates, signs, and so on. Artists, including Lon Landau, Jacques Ochs, Irene Spicker, and Azriel Awret, toiled in the Malerstube, and some managed to secretly draw Dossin camp scenes, caricatures, and portraits. Others, like Kopel Simelovitz, stayed just a few weeks in Mechelen before being transported to the East.

When the evidence grew that the first deported Jews had all disappeared in the East, and after witnessing the Germans deporting even little children and older people for "voluntary labor," most remaining Jews went into hiding in attics and cellars and avoided sleeping at their homes anymore, as raids were mostly done by night. To fill the deportation trains, Jews were arrested wherever they could be found, and major raids were launched in Antwerp and Brussels in coordination with the deportations from the Netherlands and France. The artist Felix Nussbaum and his wife, the Polish-born Felka Platek, for example, were arrested and deported after their hiding place was discovered.

Soon, the SS headquarters was demanding more Jews be deported, no matter what nationality. In September 1943, the hunt for foreign Jews had become so difficult that, to better fill the trains, a carefully prepared raid was carried out to round up Jews who had Belgian citizenship. Thus far relatively safe, they, too, were now being arrested, sent to the Dossin camp, and deported.

In the meantime, Jewish and non-Jewish underground workers risked their lives to hide almost 4,000 Jewish children, including 2,500 Jewish children hidden by Catholic institutions. Even King Leopold's mother, Queen Elisabeth, born a Bavarian princess, used her German connections and influence to save several hundreds of Jewish children, scientists, artists, and old people.

Between 1942 and 1944, 28 convoys containing 25,257 Jews and 351 Gypsies left Mechelen for Auschwitz. Of all of these people, more than two-thirds were sent to the gas chambers upon arrival, and many others died from slave labor in the camps. A total of almost 40,000 Jews in Belgium were imprisoned or deported. Following were some of the best-known artists:

Jacques Ochs (1883–1971)

Jacques Ochs, a painter, was born in Nice, France, to Belgian parents. He studied at the Liège Royal Academy of Fine Arts where he was later a professor (1920) and the director. A champion fencer, Ochs won a gold medal for Belgium in the 1912 Summer Olympics (épée team). Since 1910, he had been a caricaturist for the well-known satirical monthly Pourquoi Pas?

In the late 1930s, his caricatures were often warnings against fascism. In 1938, Ochs drew Hitler with blood on his hands on the Pourquoi Pas? title page. The Germans would not forget: After the German invasion, Ochs was betrayed in February 1941, arrested for acts of resistance, and imprisoned in the infamous Breendonk Fort. Because he was a well-known portrait artist and caricaturist, he was allowed to portray the inmates and SS guards. (After the war he bequeathed his sketchbook to the Breendonk Fort museum.)

In February 1942, Ochs was set free, after the intervention of Queen Elisabeth, who favored artists. However, he continued his resistance work in the illegal press and was arrested again in 1944, imprisoned in Breendonk, and eventually was sent to the Dossin transit camp in Mechelen. A Belgian subject and a renowned artist, he was spared deportation and once more set free. He died in 1971 in Liège, Belgium.

Felix Nussbaum (1904–1944)

When Ich untergehe, lasst meine Bilder nicht sterben!
(When I pass on, don't let my paintings die with me! 1942)

Felix Nussbaum, who was born in Osnabrück, Germany, studied art in Hamburg, Berlin, and Rome. His early paintings feature stern European Jewish themes. In 1932, he was awarded a scholarship to study at the German Academy in Rome. After the Nazi rise to power in 1933, he was dismissed from the Academy by Goebbels. He remained for a year in Italy before settling with his future wife, Felka Platek, in Ostend, Belgium, where he had spent summer vacations with his parents. Terrified by the Nazi regime, his painting became more and more ominous and disturbing.

When the Germans invaded Belgium in May 1940, Nussbaum, still a German citizen, was arrested by the Belgian police and sent to the camps of Saint Cyprien and Gurs in southern France. He managed to escape and went into hiding in Brussels. Felix and Felka lived in a small attic and painted desperate works. In 1944, they were betrayed and sent to the Dossin camp. A shy and hopeless man, Nussbaum painted small watercolor still lifes till he was deported with Felka to Auschwitz, where they perished.

Felix Nussbaum's art was completely forgotten until long after World War II, when his native city of Osnabrück organized his first postwar exhibition and later built the Nussbaum Museum. The Felix Nussbaum Haus is an extension to the Cultural History Museum and displays his saved graphics and paintings. Daniel Libeskind (b. 1946), an American architect of Polish-Jewish descent who won the competition to build the museum, stated "The Nussbaum Museum becomes a profound place for the encounter of the future and the past, and not only a testament to an impossible fate."

Carol (Karel) Deutsch (1894–1943)

Carol Deutsch, a Belgian-born businessman, painter, and illustrator, was the son of a Jewish Hungarian diamond dealer. Deutsch settled in Ostend where he ran a prosperous fur trade. A stylish socialite and dandy, and a passionate art collector, he befriended famous artists like James Ensor and Leon Spilliaert, who both painted his portrait, and eventually became a painter himself. He excelled in Ostend port views, figures, and portraits and in 1929 had his first exhibition at the Manteau Gallery in Brussels. His friend Ensor wrote the introduction to the exhibition catalog.

After the German invasion, Deutsch and his wife went into hiding in Brussels under assumed names. During 1941–1944, he painted a series of 99 expressionist yet naïve illustrations to the Bible, which he kept in a wooden box as a birthday present for his 2-year-old daughter, Ingrid.

In September 1943, Deutsch and his wife were arrested by the SS and imprisoned in the Dossin camp. The day they were deported to Auschwitz with transport XXB, he left 22-year-old Irene Spicker his paintbox, which she still uses. Both Deutsch and his wife died in Auschwitz. Ingrid Deutsch, and the box with the 99 illustrations, were saved by Belgian neighbors, and she later moved to the United States. Ingrid died in 1982 and bequeathed the box and the illustrations to the Yad Vashem Holocaust Museum.

Lon (Léon) Landau (1910–1945)

Léon Landau was a well-known stage designer for the KVS (Royal Flemish Theatre) and actor in the Groep 111, in Antwerp, Belgium. It is reported that he had lived in Palestine for some time. In 1941, he moved to Brussels to hide from the Gestapo. When he was eventually arrested and sent to the Dossin camp, he was given a B number (indicating that he was a Belgian Jew), which for some time saved him from deportation. He was one of the artists in the Malerstube and voluntarily took care of the old and the very young in the dormitories.

Eventually, in 1944, because he was a suspected communist, he was put on transport XXIV to the Bergen Belsen concentration camp, a few months before the Germans were to blow up the Auschwitz-Birkenau gas chambers. When the Bergen Belsen camp was liberated, Landau volunteered to help typhoid patients, and died of the disease, aged only 35. He was buried in a mass grave in the Bergen Belsen camp.

Irene Spicker Awret (b. 1921) and Azriel Awret (b. 1910)

Irene Spicker was still a student when she fled Germany in 1939. In Brussels, she managed to survive for three years as an art student, a farm maid, and so on, but eventually had to hide and was finally arrested, one more victim of the notorious Jewish traitor “Jacques” who spotted and helped arrest more than 200 Jews in the streets of Brussels. She was imprisoned in the Dossin camp in March 1943. Because of her talent as a painter, she was assigned to the Malerstube (painters’ workshop). There she met Azriel Awret, a Polish-born painter who was assigned to paint thousands of cardboard numbers and needed an assistant. Irene, Azriel, Jacques Ochs, and other artists managed to draw sketches of camp life, many of which Irene was able to hide and save. Azriel and Irene both survived the camp. After the liberation in September 1944, they married, and in 1949, they immigrated to Israel. There, Azriel and Irene helped found the artists’ colony in Safed. They have lived in the United States since 1968. Irene Awret’s 2004 book, They’ll Have to Catch Me First, describes her flight from Berlin and her 18 months in the Dossin barracks of Mechelen, where her talent as an artist saved her from deportation.

Kopel Simelovitz (1900–1943)

Kopel Simelovitz was born in Seduva, Lithuania, in 1900. In 1915, when Jews were expelled from the western Soviet territory into the Russian interior, young Simelovitz ended up in Vitebsk, Marc Chagall’s birthplace. Simelovitz studied from 1916 to 1919 with famed local painter Yehuda Pen (Chagall’s teacher in 1906) and then returned to Seduva, where he was an art teacher for five years and joined the He Halutz (Pioneer Movement) that promoted settlement in Palestine.

In 1924, after his mother died, Simelovitz immigrated to Haifa, where he was a photographer, then went to work in the Ein Hai moshav (Kfar Melel today). However, he could not take the hot and humid climate and came down with malaria. He then contacted his uncle, Samuel Behr, who owned a frozen egg import company in London and Shanghai. After a short business training in London, Simelovitz was sent as financial manager to a subsidiary in Ghent, Belgium.

In 1931, however, the Ghent office closed and Simelovitz decided to become a professional painter. He studied at the Ghent Academy from 1932 to 1937 and had his first solo exhibition in 1935. He also rented a studio in Sint-Martens-Latem, the well-known artists' colony. Because of his health problem, he was a frequent visitor to a doctor's office and fell in love with a Belgian nurse, Florine (she never married and died in 1976). Shortly before the outbreak of World War II, Simelovitz eventually succeeded in getting Belgian citizenship.

Sadly, Simelovitz did not go into hiding and continued to live at his home for three years. In 1943, he was arrested and sent to the Dossin camp. Six weeks later, he was deported to Auschwitz, where he perished. Irene Spicker Awret recalls: "An older artist also joined sometimes in the painters' workshop, shyly sitting on the edge of our bench. He talked little and painted delicate, small watercolors, dream-like memories of Palestine—blossoming meadows where almond-eyed children played with young horses and cypresses swayed over flooded fields. Kopel was gentle, a dreamer, and we liked him well." Irene Spicker's future husband Azriel Awret painted Simelovitz's portrait, which is now in Yad Vashem's art collection.

Selected Bibliography

- Awret, Irene. 2004. They'll Have to Catch Me First: An Artist's Coming of Age in the Third Reich. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press–Dryad Press.
- Jewish Museum of Belgium (Brussels). www.mjb-jmb.org (accessed May 3, 2007).
- Jewish Museum of Deportation and Resistance. www.cicb.be (accessed May 3, 2007).
- Potteau, Daniel. "The Hole in the Wall—Kopel Simelovitz 1900–1943." Unpublished manuscript.
- Steinberg, Maxime. 1983–1986. L'Etoile et le Fusil. Brussels: Vie ouvrière.
- Van Doorslaer, Rudi. 1995. Kinderen van het Ghetto [Children of the Ghetto]. Ghent, Belgium: Hadewijch, Antwerpen-Baarn—AMSAB.

Jews in France

Ronald Schechter and Shoshannah Zirkin

---

General Population: 59,268,000

Jewish Population: 519,000

Percent Population: 0.8 percent

Jewish Population by City: Paris and suburbs of Paris, 350,000; Marseilles, 70,000; Toulouse, 23,000; Nice, 20,000; Strasbourg, 16,000; Grenoble, 8,000; Metz–Nancy, 4,000; Corsica, 200. There are also several small communities scattered throughout the country.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: 300,000 Jews immigrated to France from North Africa (primarily Morocco, Tunisia, and Egypt) in the 1950s and 1960s. As a result, nearly 60 percent of France's Jewish community is Sephardic.

Languages Spoken: Arabic, French, Hebrew, Yiddish

---

Historical Overview

The Jewish presence begins in the fourth century in what today constitutes France. As Roman citizens, the Jews of Gaul have the same rights as their non-Jewish compatriots. They engage in a wide variety of trades, including agriculture, public administration, and the military, and enjoy freedom of worship.

In the fifth century, the conquest of Gaul by the Franks does not change the legal situation of Jews, though the conversion of the Frankish King Clovis to Christianity at the end of the century marks the beginning of a series of attempts on behalf of the church to limit the rights of Jews and restrict their interaction with Christians.

From the 7th to the 10th centuries, the Jewish population sinks considerably. The rise of the Carolingian dynasty, founded by Pepin the Short in 751 and greatly expanded by his son Charlemagne (crowned Holy Roman Emperor in 800), marks the beginning of a happier period in the history of the Jews of France. In Narbonne, a Mediterranean port city in southeastern France, the Jews had enjoyed the tolerant government of Muslim rulers before the city's capture by Pepin in 759. The Carolingians maintain good relations with the Jews, whose international contacts are useful in the lucrative Mediterranean trade, and the Jewish population of Narbonne increases accordingly. Charlemagne provides Jewish merchants with broad trading privileges, including exemptions to commercial duties, and appoints a Jewish ambassador, "Isaac the Jew," to the court of the Abbasid Caliph in Baghdad. He grants the Jews legal autonomy and accepts their testimony in court, thus exempting them in most cases from the notorious trials by ordeal to which Christians are subject. His son, Louis the Pious, continues the Carolingian tradition of benevolent rule over the Jews. Such is the religious climate of the day that Bodo, a court priest, can convert to Judaism (839) and engage in public disputations with Christians without fear of reprisals, a situation unthinkable in the later middle ages. The year after Bodo's conversion, Louis the Pious dies, and his three sons contest the succession. The compromise division of the empire into three parts, its subsequent subdivision, and the increasing threat of Viking incursions lead to a disintegration of royal power and a corresponding increase in the power of territorial lords. Accordingly, the status of Jews varies from one territory to the other. Typically, lords grant the Jews residence, trading privileges, and corporate autonomy in exchange for cash and financial services. Should the Jews fail to be useful to their lords, they risk expulsion. In southern France, Jewish scholars translate the writings of Sa'adia Gaon (882–942) and Judah Halevi (ca.1075–1141) from Arabic into Hebrew, and similarly introduce their coreligionists to the great philosophers of the Arab world, Avicenna (980–1037) and Averroës (1126–1198).

Beginning in 1096, the primarily anti-Muslim enterprise quickly creates Jewish victims, as Crusaders on their way to Palestine massacre Jews in the Rhineland. Though Jews in France largely escape the violence of the First Crusade, and though Saint Bernard himself denounces attacks on Jews during the Second Crusade (1146), the Crusaders had already created a climate of hatred toward non-Christians. The notorious ritual murder accusations against Jews, in France as well as England, date from the 12th century. Thus, it is easy for Philip II (Philip Augustus, reigned 1179–1223) to expel the Jews from his domains in 1182 by citing their perfidy, though his primary interest is their property, which he duly confiscates. When he sees that the value of this property does not compensate for the loss in tax money that the Jews had previously provided, he rescinds the expulsion order in 1198.

Despite the persecutions of the Middle Ages, the Jews of France can boast of notable cultural achievements. The great biblical and Talmudic commentator Rashi (1040–1105), emerges in the tolerant atmosphere of Troyes under the counts of Champagne. Building on Rashi's legacy, two centuries of disciples known as Tosafists, for the tosafot or “supplements” they write to the master's commentaries, contribute to the prominence of Champagne as a center of Talmudic scholarship. Among the most famous Tosafists are Rashbam (1085–1158) and Rabbenu Tam (1100–1171). Champagne also sees the birth, around 1100, of the Machzor of Vitry, the prayer book that canonizes the liturgy of northern European French Jewry.

In the 13th century, Louis IX (Saint Louis, reigned 1226–1270) adds religious zeal to the persecution of the Jews, though he uses their misfortune for political gain. Citing church prohibitions against the lending of money at interest, he cancels debts owed to Jews and has their property confiscated when they fail to pay their own debts. In 1242, Talmudic manuscripts are publicly burned in Paris, and in 1254 the king orders the burning of all such “blasphemies.” In 1269, Saint Louis eagerly executes the order of the Fourth Lateral Council of the Church and forces the Jews to wear badges distinguishing them from the Christian population. His successor, Philip IV (Philip the Fair, reigned 1285–1314), expels the Jews from the kingdom in 1290, though, as with the expulsion of 1182, the value of the confiscated property does not compensate for the ensuing shortage of tax revenue. Consequently, Louis X (Louis the Stubbard, reigned 1314–1316) calls them back again in 1315.

The 14th century is a catastrophic period for the Jews of France, encompassing the Hundred Years' War and the Black Death. As susceptible to disease as anyone else, the Jewish population is decimated by the plague of 1348–1349. To make matters worse, Jews are scapegoated as bearers of the dreaded illness and consequently subjected to judicial murders and lynch-mob massacres in those areas of France where they had managed to reside. Oppression and disease take such a toll that when Charles VI (Charles the Mad) banishes the Jews in 1394, there are few left to expel.

Although the expulsion of 1394 is never formally rescinded, Jews begin to trickle back into France in the 1650s. In the southwest, they become “New Christians.” In 1550, conversos fleeing the Inquisition in Portugal settle in Bordeaux with the permission of Henri II, who sees in the crypto-Jews a potential stimulus to commercial activity in the Atlantic port city, which had never recovered from the Hundred Years' War. Their privileges, reconfirmed (for a price) by subsequent kings until the end of the 18th century, include freedom to conduct trade not otherwise regulated by local guilds, to purchase real estate, and to bequeath their property. A smaller group of Sephardic Jews finds refuge in Saint-Esprit, just outside Bayonne, at the end of the 16th century, and Louis XIV accords them the same privileges their coreligionists enjoy in Bordeaux. By the reign of Louis XV, the pretense of conversion has been dropped and the Sephardic Jews are formally recognized as Jews. Roughly contemporary with the arrival of the Portuguese Jews in southwestern France, Ashkenazi Jews begin settling in the city of Metz—conquered from the Holy Roman Empire in 1552—in the northeast. In 1565, the military governor grants residency to three Jews for the purpose of raising money to rebuild the citadel and provision the garrison. In 1574, the lieutenant governor expels the Jews, yet King Henry III later issues letters patent allowing eight Jewish families and their descendents to live in the city. Succeeding Bourbon kings confirm these residence privileges, each time admitting a larger number of families, although from 1715 the Jews have to pay a steep annual fee for “protection.” Entrepreneurs provide the army with cavalry horses, meat, grain, and cash, while their poorer relations eke out a living by peddling used goods (new products being the monopoly of Christian guild members), lending small sums of money to peasants, or begging.

The Jewish population of Alsace accrues to France in 1648 upon the province’s incorporation into France at the end of the Thirty Years’ War. As part of the postwar settlement, the French crown preserves the laws that entitle lords to settle Jews on their lands. Jews there trade in livestock and grain and therefore represent an important source of food for soldiers stationed in the embattled province and civilians who suffer periodic shortages resulting from war and harvest failures. They also engage in moneylending, which makes them unpopular with, but indispensable to, cash-poor peasants and military officials in need of specie. Making up the majority of the Jewish population in France, the Alsatian Jews are also the poorest. As in Alsace, the Jews living in the neighboring northeastern province of Lorraine come under French rule as a result of annexation. Initially an independent duchy, Lorraine is occupied by France between 1633 and 1661, and again between 1670 and 1697, before passing definitively to France in 1766. During the first period of occupation, military commanders admit small numbers of Jews, one family at a time, on the basis of their utility in providing grain, meat, and cash to the frontier region. Under the second French occupation Jews settle in 10 authorized villages throughout the province but are excluded from the capital city of Nancy.

The status of Jews rises briefly under Duke Léopold, who in 1701 prohibits Christians from mistreating or insulting Jews and who appoints a Jew, Samuel Lévy, as his receiver general in 1715. Yet when this financier is found guilty of debasing coinage and pocketing the profits, the entire Jewish community suffers. Jews who had immigrated to Lorraine after 1680 are expelled, and residents of longer standing are strictly monitored. Duke Stanislas admits more Jewish immigrants and regularizes their status by establishing a Rabbinate in 1737, but in return he charges the community with an onerous annual protection tax. On the death of Stanislas in 1766, Lorraine becomes French again and the kings assume the new role of “protector.” In addition to Ashkenazim in the northeast and Sephardim in the southwest, Provençal Jews live in and around the papal city of Avignon. After the expulsion of 1394, many Jews had fled to Provence, and when that kingdom fell to France and the Jews were expelled in 1500, most sought refuge in Avignon and the papal cities of Carpentras, Cavaillon, and Isle-sur-Sorgue in the Comtat Venaissin. Periodically falling under French control, these communities also add Jews to the French kingdom through immigration to Bordeaux, Bayonne/Saint-Esprit, and Paris. This last destination is conspicuous under the Ancien Régime for its absence of Jews, who are only unofficially tolerated before the Revolution of 1789.

It is difficult to generalize about the Jews in France between the middle of the 16th century and the end of the 18th. As during the Middle Ages, their conditions vary from place to place, according to contractual arrangements made with the relevant authorities. Significant cultural differences, as well as (usually) great distances, divide Sephardim and Ashkenazim, and the “Avignonese” Jews have a separate Judeo-Provençal culture altogether. Rich traders such as David Gradis in 18th-century Bordeaux have little in common with itinerant peddlers and beggars in Alsace. Yet with the exception of the Parisian Jews, who only constitute about 500 out of a French Jewish population of 40,000 at the time of the Revolution, nearly all are subject to legally autonomous communities. Authorized by royal letters (patent), though dependent on the king’s good graces, Jewish communities are governed by statutes (takkanoth) based on Jewish law and administered by councils composed of rabbis and laymen. They are not hermetically sealed, however; repeated ordinances throughout France prohibit fraternization between Jews and Gentiles are evidence that such friendly contact existed, as are contemporary rabbis’ sermons against the adoption of Gentile styles and habits.

The Revolution of 1789 dramatically transforms the legal status of the Jews in France. Just as it abolishes other corporate structures that had been characteristic of the Ancien Régime, the Revolution dissolves the Jewish communities as well. The emancipation of the Jews is implicit in Article 10 of the Declaration of the Rights of Man and Citizen, which prohibits unequal treatment on the basis of religion, yet the widespread prejudice that Jews are morally unfit for citizenship, combined with varying degrees of confidence about the ability of the law to transform human nature, prompts a national debate over whether inclusion in the French nation could morally improve or “regenerate” the Jews.

On September 27, 1791, the National Assembly declares Jewish men who otherwise fit the criteria for “active citizenship,” that is, who meet high property qualifications, eligible to serve in public office. Although this only directly affects a handful of men, given the poverty of the Jews in general, the new law signals an end to arbitrary treatment of Jewish communities and inclusion of the Jews into the family of French citizens. At the same time, emancipation signals a modern understanding of Jewishness as an identity to which individuals are to attribute personal meaning. Under the Ancien Régime Jewishness comprises specific legal obligations—contractually defined privileges and disabilities, justice administered by relatively autonomous Jewish courts, dues and fines collected by community officials—that the Revolution abolishes. In postrevolutionary France, Jewish identity becomes more of a spiritual or philosophical question, though to a large degree social pressure to live and work among Jews, and Gentiles’ resistance to Jewish integration into the surrounding society, slows the effects of emancipation.

If the revolution abrogated the institutions that had defined Jewish life for centuries, Napoleon attempts to create new ones from the 1790s to 1815. In his zeal for centralized control, he establishes a new organizational structure for French Jewry: the consistory. Headed by rabbis and lay notables, consistories in the newly created national départements—the postrevolutionary provinces—oversee religious and secular education and promote the “regeneration” of the Jews, a process that largely involves the reeducation of peddlers and moneylenders for “useful” occupations in artisanry, agriculture, and science. They in turn report to a Central Consistory in Paris, over which a chief rabbi (grand rabbin) presides. In a colorful ceremony designed as much to advertise Napoleon’s role as lawmaker as to celebrate the emancipation of the Jews, the emperor convokes a Grand Sanhedrin (1807)—based on the ancient rabbinical court—to confirm the compatibility of French and Jewish law and define the powers and responsibilities of the consistories. Ironically, Napoleon violates his own much-vaunted principle of legal equality by creating laws of exception against Alsatian Jews (in his view, the most lacking in civic virtue), prohibiting them from moneylending and cancelling debts non-Jews owe them. Despite these discriminatory acts (which lapse soon after the emperor’s fall), and largely because of his emancipation of Jews in conquered territories in Italy and Germany, Napoleon long maintains a heroic stature in the Jewish collective memory.

The 19th century sees an unprecedented improvement in the opportunities and conditions for French Jews. Despite the restoration of the Bourbon monarchy and a Catholic revival, especially under Charles X (reigned 1824–1830), the principle of equality of men before the law remains in place. Unlike their counterparts in Italy and parts of Germany, for example, the French emancipation is not rescinded after Waterloo.

The Jewish population more than doubles, to 96,000, by 1861, by which time nearly half of French Jewry has moved to cities, and more than a quarter (25,000) to Paris alone. Jews achieve prominence in a wide range of occupations, including musical composition (e.g., opera composer Fromental Halévy, 1799–1862) and performance (e.g., pianist Henri Herz, 1806–1888), theater (e.g., actresses Rachel Félix, 1821–1858 and Sarah Bernhardt, 1844–1923), banking (e.g., the Foulds, Pereires, and, especially, the Rothschilds), politics (e.g., government minister Adolphe Crémieux, 1796–1880), and academia (e.g., sociologist Émile Durkheim, 1858–1917). The Consistory authorizes moderate reform in the liturgy, introduces the organ to synagogue service, and integrates girls into Judaism through religious initiation ceremonies, but France—unlike Germany, where legal discrimination prompts a high rate of conversion—saw neither wholesale abandonment of Judaism nor radical reform in doctrine or practice. French patriotism, combined with a belief in the mission civilisatrice, or “civilizing mission” that justifies French imperialism, provides support for the Alliance Israélite Universelle (AIU, founded 1860), the international philanthropic organization dedicated to the emancipation and regeneration of Jewish populations around the world.

The establishment of the AIU is indicative of the security of the French Jewish community by the middle of the 19th century. Though not fully accepted in French society, the Jews are sufficiently confident to organize on behalf of their less fortunate coreligionists. By the end of the 19th century, however, Jews in France itself have reason to be worried. Anti-Semitism had existed throughout the century, but before the 1890s public expression of hostility to the Jews was rare. Utopian socialists such as Alphonse Toussenel, follower of Charles Fourier and author of Les juifs, rois de l'époque (The Jews, Kings of the Epoch, 1847), had denounced Jewish bankers, especially the Rothschilds, though other utopian socialist groups, especially the followers of the Comte de Saint-Simon, include Jews among their most vocal members. The Comte de Gobineau distinguishes between Aryan and Semitic “races” in his Essay on the Inequality of Human Races (1853–1855), thus providing the pseudoscientific framework for future racists. Yet the dominant political philosophy of the postrevolutionary period, especially after 1830, is a liberalism that sees religion as a private matter and directs its criticisms primarily at the Catholic Church, not Jews or Judaism.

The decade of the 1880s sees the ominous beginnings of a new, popular anti-Semitism; the ravings of Toussenel and Gobineau had only reached a small audience of pseudointellectuals, but in 1886, Edouard Drumont writes a best-selling screed, La France Juive (Jewish France), in which he accuses the Jews of plotting to destroy France. Yet attention from his fantasies might have waned had it not been for the Panama Crisis of 1892. Founded by Ferdinand de Lesseps (the father of the Suez Canal), a joint-stock company had begun work on what would later become the Panama Canal. The company went bankrupt in 1889, however, and it was subsequently discovered that its agents had bribed legislators to vote for public backing of the failing enterprise. Though neither the company’s directors nor the politicians implicated in the scandal are Jewish, the two intermediaries who had distributed the bribes are. One of them, Jacques Reinach, commits suicide in 1892. Before his death, however, he leaks the names of bribed politicians to Drumont, who uses the information to boost sales of his scandal sheet, La Libre Parole (Free Speech), from which he launches incessant attacks on the Jews to 300,000 subscribers, a huge audience for the time.

The Dreyfus Affair gives Drumont and his fellow anti-Semites another excuse to attack the Jews. In October 1894, Alfred Dreyfus, an assimilated Alsatian Jew and a captain in the French army, is accused of spying for Germany. On the basis of documents later proven to be forgeries, a closed-session court martial convicts him of high treason, and in January of the following year he is transported to Devil’s Island off the coast of French Guiana. During the summer of 1896, a fellow officer, Georges Picquart, discovers the identity of the real traitor (Ferdinand Esterhazy) by matching handwriting samples, but his superiors transfer him to a dangerous post in Tunisia to prevent him from attempting to reopen the case. Nevertheless, Picquart manages to convey his findings to Dreyfus’s wife and brother, who publicly demand a retrial. In January 1898, Emile Zola publishes his famous “J’accuse,” an open letter to the president of the Republic denouncing the army and declaring Dreyfus’s innocence. Drumont counters with attacks on Zola, other supporters of Dreyfus (known as Dreyfusards), and, of course, the Jews. In January and February riots against the Jews break out in France and Algeria, and politicians running for office in the National Assembly regularly capitalize on popular anti-Semitism to win voters. In another travesty of justice, a court-martial chooses to ignore the evidence against Esterhazy and acquits him. Theodor Herzl, at the time a young journalist writing from Paris, later credits the Dreyfus Affair for convincing him that the Jews are not safe in the Diaspora and they need their own state.

In June 1899, the Cour de Cassation, the highest court in France, sets aside the verdict against Dreyfus and orders a new court-martial. In a bizarre verdict, the military tribunal reconvicts Dreyfus with “extenuating circumstances” and sentences him to 10 years in prison. The president of the Republic now steps in and issues a pardon. In 1906, the Cour de Cassation annuls the 1899 verdict, though it is not until 1995 that the army itself publicly acknowledges Dreyfus’s innocence. Nevertheless, anti-Semitic agitation dies down quickly in the wake of the presidential pardon.

As to the Jewish community more generally, the Dreyfus Affair, though alarming, does not disrupt its efflorescence. Despite social and political anti-Semitism, especially in the 1890s, the Third Republic (1871–1940) furnishes opportunities for the Jews that no other European country, with the exception of the United Kingdom, could provide. Jews occupy the highest rungs on the civil service ladder. They preside over, and are present at, the salons in which the social, political, and cultural elite meet. And though Dreyfus was tragically betrayed by his peers, he is evidence of the mobility of Jews in the French army. Jewish immigrants from Central and Eastern Europe bring their ideas, and their conflicts, to France, especially after the 1905 Revolution in Russia and the closing of the United Kingdom to immigration. Though viewed with suspicion, not least by “native” Jews who worry about the effect on their own status of a largely poor immigrant population with (literally) revolutionary ideas, these new arrivals find France a welcome asylum. Paradoxically, they number among the most famous Jews in France from the turn of the century to World War II, especially in the visual arts: Jacques Lipchitz (1891–1973), Chaim Soutine (1893 or 1894–1943), and Marc Chagall (1887–1985), for example.

The nationalistic sentiment pervading Europe at the time of World War I, in which the Jews largely participate, brings with it a suspicion of foreigners, but the Jewish community in France also benefits from the idea of the union sacrée, the “sacred union” in which the French are bound, despite their differences, for the duration of the war. In the war’s aftermath, though politically France is far from united in the 1920s, anti-Semitism is a marginal movement and appears increasingly to be a relic of the previous century. Less on the defensive than ever before, Jews experiment publicly, in writing and through associations, with many ways of being Jewish: from Zionism to non-Zionist cultural nationalism (i.e., Bundism) to Hasidic revivalism and other forms of heterodox religious experience. With Hitler on the rise in Germany in the 1930s, the specter of anti-Semitism reappears in France, with extreme right-wing newspapers, clubs, and gangs attacking Jews as the alleged agents of international socialism. Nevertheless, such is the willingness of the French electorate to set aside religious or ethnic prejudice that the Jewish socialist Léon Blum (1872–1950) becomes prime minister twice, first from June 1936 to June 1937, and again in March 1938.

After the German invasion of May and June 1940, however, the situation of the Jews deteriorates rapidly. By the terms of the armistice of June 25, a little more than half of France (including Paris) would be under German occupation, but unlike other defeated countries (with the exception of Denmark), France is to remain independent, at least in principle. On July 10, the National Assembly, meeting in the spa town of Vichy in the unoccupied zone, accords dictatorial powers to Marshal Philippe Pétain, an octogenarian hero of World War I. Under his auspices, and without any coercion from Germany, the Vichy regime promulgates the Statut des juifs (Statute on the Jews) of October 3, 1940, which excludes Jews from leadership positions in the state and the armed forces and bans them from the professions of teaching, journalism, film, and theater. The following day Pétain issues a law authorizing prefects to intern “foreigners of the Jewish race” in “special camps.” By this point more than half of France’s Jewish population consists of immigrants.

From 1941 to 1945, Vichy imposes strict quotas on the number of Jews who are allowed to study at university or to practice as lawyers, architects, physicians, dentists, pharmacists, and midwives, among other occupations. “Jewish” property is “aryanized,” and Jews are required to submit to a detailed census. The Jewish census greatly facilitates the deportation of Jews, which begins with the first train to Auschwitz on March 27, 1942. The most notorious raid on the Jewish population occurs on July 16, 1942, when 4,500 French police arrest 12,884 Jewish men, women, and children of foreign origin and intern them in the Vélodrome d’Hiver, a cycling stadium in Paris. After five days of detention in appallingly unsanitary conditions, the Jews are deported to Auschwitz. In all, 75,000 of France’s 300,000 Jews perish in the camps. German pressure is undoubtedly an important factor in the French Holocaust, particularly in the Occupied Zone, but the anti-Semitism of government officials and their zeal in tracking down Jews for deportation makes the Nazis’ job easier than it otherwise would have been.

From 1945 to 1948, approximately 80,000 Jews from Central and Eastern Europe move to France. In 1949, France establishes diplomatic relations with Israel, and in 1950 France supplies Israel with arms and helps develop Israel’s nuclear program.

French Jewry experience a remarkable renewal in the wake of the Holocaust. More than doubling in size between 1944 and 1970, primarily because of the immigration of Sephardic Jews from former French colonies in North Africa, it is now the largest Jewish population in Western Europe, with a population of 650,000. French guilt in the Shoah is discussed little during the quarter century after the Liberation. Upon arriving in Paris in August 1944, General Charles de Gaulle, in an effort to prevent civil war and stop summary reprisals against suspected collaborators, promotes the myth that the French had (with few exceptions) collectively resisted Germany. The “myth of Resistance” went so far as to include Marshall Pétain himself, who is said to have played a “double game” of pretending to accede to German demands while secretly thwarting them. According to this logic, Pétain had shielded the French from what would have been a more destructive German occupation. With the publication of Vichy France: Old Guard and New Order, 1940–44, by Columbia University historian Robert Paxton, in 1973, these myths become increasingly difficult to sustain. Using German diplomatic archives captured by the Americans, Paxton shows that rather than simply (and badly) following German orders, Pétain had actively sought collaboration with Hitler. Though at first controversial, Paxton’s findings have a receptive audience in the generation that had demonstrated against “the establishment” and questioned their elders’ wartime actions and decisions during the uprising of May 1968. Few historians today support the “double game” hypothesis. Anti-Semitism, however, did not disappear after the Liberation.

The populist right-wing movement led by Pierre Poujade (1920–2003) reaches its height shortly after his anti-Semitic attacks on Mendès-France. The successor to Poujadisme, the extreme right-wing National Front is led by the anti-Semitic politician Jean-Marie Le Pen (1928– ), who has dismissed the gas chambers at Auschwitz as mere “details” of history. More mainstream politicians have betrayed anti-Semitic biases as well. During the Six-Day War in 1967, De Gaulle equates the State of Israel with the Jews more generally, infamously referring to them as an “elite people” and “domineering.” In 1980, after a bomb attack outside a synagogue, Prime Minister Raymond Barre distinguishes between the “Jews going to synagogue,” for whom the bomb was intended, and the “innocent Frenchmen” who are its actual victims.

In the 1990s, politicians begin to court France’s Jews in unprecedented ways. The Jacobin ideology inherited from the French Revolution had long devalued religious or ethnic “particularism” as harmful to the goal of republican indivisibility. Around the time of the bicentenary of the Revolution, however, Jews and representatives of other ethnic, religious, or regional groups proclaim the droit à la différence, or the “right to be different.” This new pluralism, together with growing pressure by all European governments to deal honestly with their nations’ record in World War II, leads to such gestures as Jacques Chirac’s 1995 speech acknowledging the French role in the Holocaust and the establishment of an annual commemoration of the round-up at the Vél d’Hiv.

Yet, anti-Semitism remains a problem in France with atrocities such as the desecration of a Jewish cemetery at Carpentras in 1990. In 2002, the National Front party is alarmingly successful in the first round of presidential elections when anti-Semitic candidate Jean-Marie Le Pen takes one-fifth of the votes. In 2006, the kidnapping, torture and murder of Ilan Halimi by an anti-Semitic street gang shocks France.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

At the turn of the century, many prominent Jewish artists worked together at the School of Paris. They came to be known as the “Jewish School of Paris” creating an exclusive group that left a lasting impression. Some of the most famous among them were Camille Pissarro, Chaim Soutine, Amedeo Modigliani, Jules Pascin, Mane Katz, and Marc Chagall.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Jewish historical sites exist in many locations throughout France. The Provence region is particularly rich with historic sites. Old synagogues in Carpertras and Cavaillon are now national monuments, and old cemeteries in Landes and Alsace are well maintained.

In Paris, the Museum of Jewish Art and the Cluny Museum contain the Strauss-Rothschild Collection. Paris also has several Jewish libraries, such as the Centre de Documentation Juive Contemporaine, and the Medem Library, which is the largest Yiddish library in Europe.

French Jews have held leading positions in government, including Pierre Mendès-France (1907–1982), who held the premiership (1954–1955) during a crucial phase of decolonization from Indo-China and, more recently, Simone Veil (1927– ), an Auschwitz survivor who has served as the head of the Conseil Constitutionnel (the highest administrative court in France) and president of the European Parliament. Leading Jewish intellectuals have included legal scholar and Nobel Peace Prize laureate René Cassin (1887–1976), sociologist Raymond Aron (1905–1983), anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss (1908– ), and literary theorist Jacques Derrida (1930–2004). Among the best-known public intellectuals today are Bernard-Henri Lévy (1948– ) and Alain Finkielkraut (1949– ), each of whom addresses questions of Jewish identity, among other themes.

Religious Denominations

Forty-eight percent of French Jews are moderate Orthodox. They are a well-represented community with many synagogues and rabbis throughout the country. Most Sephardi Jews in France consider themselves members of this community. Seven percent of French Jews are ultra-Orthodox, and about 5 percent are Reform. Both communities have a number of synagogues and rabbis. About 25 percent of the Jewish community observes kashruth. The number of kosher butchers, restaurants, and supermarkets is growing.

Jewish Education and Communal Institutions

About 4 percent of Jewish children are enrolled in Jewish day schools, of which there are more than 20 in Paris. Jewish schools are also located in Strasbourg, Nice, Toulouse, Marseilles, Bordeaux, Metz, and Aix-les-Mains. The AIU is an organization that supervises Jewish-French schools in other countries.

Courses in Jewish studies are offered at most universities. Classes for students and academics are offered at the Mercaz Rashi. In addition, the Rabbinical Seminary ordains French-speaking rabbis.

The Jewish community organizes a Book Week, a Music Week, and an intellectual colloquium annually. The Jewish community gathers during these events to matters of interest and concern. Regardless of the activity within the community, less than half of France's Jewish community members are registered with synagogues or Jewish organizations.

France also has an active Jewish press that produces both weekly and monthly publications. In addition, there are Jewish television shows and radio broadcasts. The recent trial of Paul Touvier, the Vichy police commander of Lyons, has brought Jewish issues to the forefront of media exposure, causing a small revival within the community. Aliyah and tourism to Israel have increased, and the small ultra-Orthodox community is growing.

During the Holocaust, valuable works of art and property were confiscated from the Jewish community. In 1996, a government commission was established to investigate these crimes.

Major organizations include the CRIF (The Representative Council of French Jewry), which was founded in 1944 as the political representative of the Jewish community. The Consistoire Central supervises religious affairs. In addition, the FSJU (The United Jewish Social Foundation) was founded in 1950 to organize and overlook social, cultural, and education issues within the Jewish community. Chabad-Lubavitch also has a large presence in France. Chabad centers offer a variety of community services, including adult education, Hebrew school, children's club, bar and bat mitzvah instruction, holiday awareness programs, kitchen koshering, hospital visitation, marriage preparation, women's group, and synagogue. Centers are located in more than 50 cities.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

In the years after World War II, approximately 80,000 Jews from Central and Eastern Europe moved to France. In 2002, anti-Semitic incidences reached an all-time high, which resulted in one of the worst years for Jews in French history. Many Jews were targets for violent attacks. In Paris, several school buses transporting children were stoned. There are recorded assaults and attacks on various individuals after leaving synagogue. Many members of the Jewish community were injured, and many Jewish sites were targeted for crimes. Many Jewish-owned properties, including schools, synagogues, and a social sports center, were targets of arson. Jewish-owned shops, kosher butcher stores, and Jewish cemeteries were defiled with graffiti. Such occurrences are regularly reported in newspapers and magazines.

The surge of anti-Semitism in recent years has caused many more religious French Jews to move elsewhere, namely Israel. Since 1948, 34,000 French Jews have emigrated from France to Israel. Among the less religious, instances of intermarriage continue to rise.

Selected Bibliography

- Blumenkrantz, Zohar, and Amiram Barkat. 2006 "2,500 American, French Immigrants to Arrive This Summer." Haaretz 14 May.
- Gerstenfeld, Manfred, interview with Shmuel Trigano. 2003. "France: Memory versus Truth." In Europe's Crumbling Myths: The Post-Holocaust Origins of Today's Anti-Semitism. Jerusalem: Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs, Yad Vashem, World Jewish Congress.
- Gerstenfeld, Manfred. 2006. "The Future of the Jews in France: An Interview with Shmuel Trigano." Changing Jewish Communities, no. 11, August 15. Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs Web site. <http://www.jcpa.org/cjc/cjc-trigano-06.htm> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- "Global Anti-Semitism: Selected Incidents around the World in 2002." Anti-Defamation League Web site. http://www.adl.org/Anti\_semitism/anti-semitism\_global\_incidents.asp# (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Jewish Communities: Europe: France." 2004–2005. World Jewish Congress Web site http://www.worldjewishcongress.org/communities/comm\_reg\_europe.html# (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Jewish Population Tables: Table 4. Estimated Jewish Population Distribution in Europe, 1/1/2002." 2002. <http://www.jafi.org.il/education/100/concepts/demography/demtables.html> (accessed April 22, 2007).

- Klarsfeld, Serge, ed. Memorial to the Jews Deported from France, 1942–1944. New York: Beate Klarsfeld Foundation, 1983.
- Lazarus, Joyce Block. 1999. Strangers and Sojourners: Jewish Identity in Contemporary Francophone Fiction. New York: P. Lang.
- Nolden, Thomas. 2006. In Lieu of Memory: Contemporary Jewish Writing in France. New York: Syracuse University Press.
- Schnapper, Dominique. 1983. Jewish Identities in France: An Analysis of Contemporary French Jewry. Translated by Arthur Goldhammer. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Jewish Day School Education in French-Speaking Europe

Zehavit Gross

---

Jewish education is considered the best antidote to assimilation and the only guarantee for Jewish commitment and continuity (Waxman 2001). Hence, the future of European Jewry depends on the quality of its Jewish day schools. The aim of this entry is to describe the challenges facing Jewish day schools in francophone countries. The information is based on a study carried out in six Jewish day schools in Paris, three in Brussels, and one in Geneva (Gross 2002).

The main threat to the existence of many Jewish communities in Europe, and especially the francophone communities, are incidents of anti-Semitism and violence toward Jews. In response, for security reasons, many Jews prefer to send their children to Jewish day schools rather than to public schools. If the increase in violence continues, there will be a growing need to establish new schools in those countries, as the existing schools will not be able to hold the vast number of Jews who want to send their children to Jewish schools. The question is whether these schools will be the same as the schools that exist today or whether something new and fresh will develop.

Today in francophone countries, Jewish schools are not attractive to many parents; as a result, a relatively small minority sends their children to Jewish schools (Tal 2005). These day schools cope with four main problems:

1. Resources: The financial state of most schools is very poor; their infrastructure is primitive, and they lack basic educational equipment needed in a modern school.
2. Economic status of the teachers: The salaries of most teachers in Jewish education are lower than the official salary tables accepted in all three countries, and teachers have no union to protect their interests. They have personal contracts (formal and informal), generally for part-time positions, and need to supplement their income by working in more than one school. As a result, many schools cannot establish a permanent staff for Jewish studies.

3. Social status of the teachers: Most of the teachers are of Sephardic origin and low socioeconomic status. There is a correlation between their low salaries and their image in the eyes of students and parents.
4. Professionalism: most of the teachers have no formal professional training (didactic or disciplinary) or a diploma from an academic institution.

In spite of these obstacles, the teachers are generally extremely committed to their profession. They view their work as a mission rather than as a job and are ready to sacrifice.

The organizational structure of most of the schools is of a bureaucratic-hierarchical nature. The hierarchy is headed by the state, which has de jure influence over school affairs. Each principal (except for Geneva) is bound by state law and is subordinate to the school board or committee, which is made up of key community personalities, such as rabbis, wealthy members of the Jewish community, intellectuals, selected parents of high socioeconomic status, and official community representatives. The membership hierarchy is headed by its president. The committee is the direct employer of the principal and functions as the school's executive body. According to most principals, the school committees are as important as the state.

The more centralized the state, the more pivotal its influence on components of professional administrative functions and school curricula. School principals in France have more extensive reporting obligations vis-à-vis the state and the bureaucratic procedures they have to follow are more complex than is the case for their peers in Belgium or Switzerland. This is probably related to the fact that, as representatives of the state, Parisian principals exercise a great deal of power on behalf of the state, and thus their accountability is greater than that of Belgian or Swiss principals.

The most prominent similarity among all schools is the dual structure of school organization; there are two subcurricular systems, general studies and Jewish studies. This duality on the organizational/administrative level corresponds to particularistic (Jewish) and universal (general) elements and reflects the ambivalence of the Jewish school toward the bicultural world in which Jews live as a minority.

The schools maintain no official, practical contact with parents as individuals except through ad hoc committees. Students are situated at the bottom of the school hierarchy and are expected to adhere to the school curriculum and obey its teachers. Students take this situation for granted and accept it as part of the francophone tradition of hierarchy and order.

The school's organizational structure and balance of power reflects its identity and its conceptual world. That is, its organizational structure reflects the forces operating within the school system, the power wielded by various actors, and the relationships between the system and the actors. A school's balance of power is thus a practical manifestation of its inherent political inclination and identity (Gross 2006).

All the principals surveyed claimed that the purpose of a Jewish school was to enhance Jewish education, expose children to Jewish culture, and create a Jewish milieu where Jews could meet in order to avoid assimilation. However, the hours allocated to the Jewish curriculum are limited and the level and quality of Jewish studies is very low. In most schools, Judaism is perceived in the narrow sense of observance of precepts and not as a civilization in the broader sense. The process of socialization places greater emphasis on the behavioral aspects of Judaism (religious laws and practices) than on cultural ones. Judaism as taught at school is perceived to be anachronistic and does not seem to be an equivalent alternative to the meaningful existential experience bestowed by the values of the modern Western world.

The connection to Israel is the foundation of the school, but there are fundamental differences between the schools. The more religious the school, the more positive its attitude toward the Land of Israel from the theological aspect, and the more critical it is from the political point of view. In most schools (especially in Paris, where there is a rapidly growing ultra-Orthodox [haredi] community), there is criticism about the secular nature of Israel. On the other hand, in the more pluralistic and secular schools (for example, in Brussels, where there is a rapid process of secularization and assimilation), which view Judaism as culture, the State of Israel and the Hebrew language serve as the focus of Jewish education. These dichotomous attitudes are accompanied by negative feelings toward the State of Israel for universal-humanistic reasons (because of the Israeli policy in the West Bank and its relationship with the Palestinians). This attitude can be found among leftist radical intellectuals in Brussels and Paris.

If Jewish education is the basis for Jewish continuity, the local Jewish communities in these countries need to view it as the core of their financial, spiritual, and human investment. The financial priorities of the communities, as well as the professional empowerment of the schools, will make the schools agents of Jewish education, not merely schools for Jews.

Selected Bibliography

- Gross, Zehavit. 2002. From Philanthropy to Meritocracy: The World of Jewish Day Schools in Paris, Brussels and Geneva [Hebrew]. Ramat Gan, Israel: Rappaport Center for Research of Assimilation and Jewish Vitality, Bar-Ilan University.
- Gross, Zehavit. 2006. "Power, Identity and Organizational Structure as Reflected in Schools for Minority Groups: A Case Study of Jewish Schools in Paris, Brussels and Geneva." Comparative Education Review 50 (4): 603–624.
- Tal, Rami. 2005. The Jewish People Policy Planning Institute Annual Assessment 2004–2005: The Jewish People, between Thriving and Decline. Jerusalem: Jewish People Policy Planning Institute.
- Waxman, Chaim I. 2001. Jewish Baby Boomers: A Communal Perspective. Albany: State University of New York Press.

Jewish Identity in French Literature and Society in the 20th Century

Alan Astro

---

The realist novel was perfected in France in the 19th century; correspondingly, the history and sociology of French Jewry in the 20th century are well documented in literature. The Dreyfus Affair, which raged as the century began, is a focus of Marcel Proust's multivolume Remembrance of Things Past (originally published from 1913 to 1927), perhaps the greatest masterpiece in French literature. Proust's aristocrats and bourgeois parvenus display anti-Dreyfus sentiments, as do some of his Jews and half-Jews, eager to distance themselves from their origins. Yet one of the main characters, Swann, a baptized Jew's son, begins manifesting Jewish traits as he feels his common identity with the mistreated army captain.

Proust depicts the sector of French Jewry from which Dreyfus as well as his own mother derived: those descending from the millennium-old Jewish settlement of Alsace. Alsatian Jews had moved to Paris and other important cities starting with the French Revolution and ending with the loss of their region to Germany in 1870. Many became quite prosperous; a portrayal of one in French literature, dating from the 19th century, is Balzac's Baron de Nucingen, based on the Rothschilds. Just how far some Alsatian Jews had journeyed from Judaism is clear from Proust's description of their loss of their "half-German, half-Jewish" language (1981, 1: 830), that is, the western dialect of Yiddish, quite different from what was spoken in Central and Eastern Europe: "[A] Jewish family . . . now thoroughly Gallicised" uses "a ritual term diverted from its true meaning. . . . [T]he children have no idea what the word meant, whether it was Spanish, Hebrew, German, dialect, if indeed it ever belonged to any language" (1981, 3: 331).

Despite this distance from Jewishness, apostasy was less common in France than in Germany. Whereas the German Jewish poet Heine saw conversion as his entry ticket to European culture, secularistic France demanded not change of religion but cultural assimilation (Marrus 60–63). Most ancestrally French Jews remained nominally Jewish, rather endogamous, practicing at most a purely formalistic religion. A typical experience is described by Edmond Fleg (né Flegheimer) in his Why I am a Jew (originally published in 1928): A young Jew, attracted to Christianity, rediscovers, because of the Dreyfus Affair, an ethnico-religious background he had thought largely irrelevant. A similarly unconsummated flirtation with Catholicism is recounted in an autobiographical work by the social critic Julien Benda (b. 1936). Benda's forebears included Jews who had fled the Inquisition to the Low Countries; however, most were ancestrally French Sephardim descended from Portuguese Jews who had settled around Bordeaux.

A humorous portrayal of the impasses of acculturation occurs in a poem entitled "Assimilation" from a volume of Poèmes juifs [Jewish poems] originally published in 1919 by André Spire, of Alsatian background: "You're happy! You're happy! / Your nose is almost straight, my word! / And so many Christians have somewhat curved noses!" (1992, 61). In 1916, some of Spire's works were set to music by Darius Milhaud, one of the most prolific 20th-century composers, who, on his father's side, hailed from a Jewish settlement even more ancient than that of Alsace or Bordeaux: the Comtat-Venaissin, located in the area around Avignon, which belonged to the popes until the French revolution. Some date this Jewish enclave back to the founding of Marseille by the Greeks in the sixth century BCE. By the time of the Dreyfus Affair, the overwhelming majority of these "papal Jews" had, like their Alsatian and Sephardic coreligionists, long since dispersed to Paris and other livelier cities. Yet a small core group stayed in place until the 1930s, interspersing their French with remnants of a Judeo-Provençal dialect that had caught the interest of a nationalist Provençal movement, not otherwise well-disposed to Jews. Such facts are recounted by Armand Lunel, librettist to Milhaud, in his 1926 Nicolo-Peccavi, or The Dreyfus Affair at Carpentras, a novelized version of his childhood.

Spire's remarks on the obsession with the Jewish proboscis are reminiscent of a joke from the same era by the American Dorothy Parker, who said that singer and comedian Fanny Brice, undergoing a common plastic surgical operation, had chosen to "cut off her nose to spite her race." Indeed, as in America, the recent arrival in France of thousands of more intensely Jewish immigrants from the Russian and Austro-Hungarian empires unsettled the feeling of complete integration among well-established Jewry. For example, a novel portraying Eastern European immigrants to France, Un "schadchen" (A shadkhn, that is, matchmaker, in Yiddish), depicts a French Jewish veteran who rejects an immigrant as a mate for his child: "An army officer's daughter must marry a born Frenchman" (Jacob 1930, 28).

Far more sympathetic is a depiction by the avant-garde poet Guillaume Apollinaire, falsely "accused" of being a Jew at the time he was equally unjustly charged with stealing the Mona Lisa. In 1912, he painted foreign-born Jews as part of the landscape of Paris in Zone: "Weeping you watch the wretched emigrants / . . . They are mostly Jews the wives wear wigs" (1977, 117). Indeed, Apollinaire was friend to Marc Chagall, one of numerous Jewish immigrant artists (like Amedeo Modigliani, Chaim Soutine, Jacques Lipschitz, Chana Orloff, and Ossip Zadkine) whose presence in the Montparnasse district until World War II contributed to making Paris the world capital of 20th-century art.

Yet most Eastern European Jews in Paris lived not in left-bank Montparnasse but in right-bank working-class neighborhoods. Some streets there were nearly as replete with garment sweatshops and other insalubrious conditions as New York's Lower East Side. In this milieu, a significant Yiddish press and literature took hold in Paris. In 2004, works by one of the main writers there, Wolf Wiewiorka, who would die on the forced march from Auschwitz, were translated into French, an example of the newfound interest in Yiddish. There were also literary attempts in French, like Abraham Cahan's English novels, to portray the life of Yiddish-speaking immigrants; one example was André Billy and Moïse Twersky's three-volume L'épopée de Ménaché Foïgel (Menashe Foïgl's epic; 1927–1928).

France drew Jewish immigrants not only from Eastern Europe but also from the Mediterranean basin, especially Greece and Turkey. (The large-scale immigration from North Africa, which represents some half of French Jewry today, would occur only after World War II.) Albert Cohen, born in Corfu and a naturalized Swiss, was the author of tragicomic novels on Greek Jews in Geneva and Marseille, published over half a century. Cohen worked as a diplomat for various organizations in Geneva; he held that the book he was proudest of was the passport for stateless refugees he helped implement after the war and that served many Holocaust survivors (Cohen 1986, xcvi).

Alas, among depictions of Jews in French literature before World War II, one would have to include many invidious or frankly anti-Semitic portrayals. Generally, they are similar to Proust's Jewish parvenus, but without much of the sympathy even the ambiguous Proust bestows on them. One example is Jacques Lacretelle's Silbermann and its more egregious sequel, Le retour de Silbermann (Silbermann's return). Silbermann is a Jewish lycée student, of the rootless cosmopolitan variety, bereft of a culture of his own, but who apes Gentile manners and tries futilely to make the French mindset his own. The case most often adduced of the anti-Semitic French novelist is Louis-Ferdinand Céline, whose pacifism (evident in his novel about World War I, Journey to the End of Night) led him to anti-Semitism (because Jews, it was argued, were trying to lead France into another disastrous war against Germany in the 1930s). However, Céline's anti-Semitic writings were actually more diatribe than novel; far more interesting in this respect was an attempted antidote to such lucubrations, Jean-Paul Sartre's 1939 novella The Childhood of a Leader, which shows the grafting of an anti-Semitic obsession onto the psyche of a young man who cannot find any authentic organizing principle for his life. This prewar text forms the basis for Sartre's 1946 Anti-Semite and Jew, where he develops the notion of the Jew as the dialectical invention of the anti-Semite. (That influential book is clearly flawed by Sartre's exclusive attention to French Jewish assimilates, so ignorant of Jewish religion and culture that they needed, as it were, anti-Semites to remind them of their identity.)

On the eve of World War II, it is generally reckoned that some 300,000 Jews resided in France. They included, besides Jews of Alsatian, Portuguese, Provençal, and far more recent Eastern European and Mediterranean origins, a few thousand refugees from Nazi Germany. (The latter group included such figures as Walter Benjamin and Hannah Arendt.) Of these 300,000 Jews in France, some 75,000 were murdered by the Nazis, with the collaboration of the Vichy regime. This crime is all the more ignominious as it occurred in the nation that along with Great Britain and the United States can pride itself on having invented modern democracy; however, the figures (three-quarters of Jews surviving) places France among occupied countries like Italy and Bulgaria whose populations are regarded as having been generally supportive of persecuted Jewry. Indeed, Nazi hunter Serge Klarsfeld has claimed that many Jews stayed alive thanks to the sympathy of a significant minority among the French.

Though not much Holocaust literature was produced during the catastrophe itself, two important works emerged from occupied France. One was Guiding Star by Jean Bruller, a half-Jewish resistance writer better known by his pseudonym Ver-cors. This story, published clandestinely in 1943, recounts the last days of a Czech Jewish immigrant who has become a French patriot; his faith in his adopted country is shaken only at the very end, when he sees he is to be executed not by Germans, but by their French collaborators. In the Yiddish language, the elegiacal Song of the Murdered Jewish People was composed in an internment camp in France by Yitzhak Katzenelson, who was sent from there to his death at Auschwitz.

In the immediate postwar years, the shame of official collaboration with the Nazis made the French reluctant to dwell on the specific fate met by Jews during World War II. As the historian Annette Wieviorka (granddaughter of Wolf, mentioned earlier) has shown, numerous Jewish survivors of extermination camps who wrote accounts in French of their martyrdom tended to present themselves as resisters to Nazism—communist revolutionaries, or French patriots, or both—rather than as victims of a racist policy targeting them primarily as Jews.

Only in the 1950s did French society generally become willing to deal with the specificity of the Jewish tragedy in World War II. In 1958, Elie Wiesel's Night appeared in French, in his own adapted translation from a Yiddish original of two years earlier, Un di velt hot geshvign (And the World Stayed Silent). Though Night has had a well-known role in defining much discourse on the Holocaust to this day, another work was far more popular at the time: The Last of the Just by André Schwarz-Bart (originally published in 1959). This saga elaborates over several centuries the Jewish legend of the 36 righteous men needed in each generation to keep the world in existence; the book ends in the extinction of the lineage of one of them: the Lévy clan, who had emigrated from Eastern Europe to Germany to France, only to be caught by the Nazis there.

The interest in Jewish fate that the French showed during the 1950s is partially attributable to their government's policies then in favor of Israel, which was seen as an ally in the struggle against Arab nationalism in French North Africa. Indeed, the debacle there caused the overwhelming majority of native Jews in Algeria, who were French citizens, to settle in France. This was the destination also chosen by a great number of Moroccan and Tunisian Jews; Israel was largely considered the less desirable option. These North African Jews are generally called Sephardic, though most of them descended not from the Jewish elite in their homelands who could trace their origins to Spain, but from Berbers converted to Judaism before the Muslim conquest. The massive arrival of these so-called Sephardim literally doubled the number of Jews in France, making it the only Nazi-occupied country to host more Jews after the war than before. Additionally, the North African Jews were less self-conscious about their peculiar identity than other Jews in France, and less troubled by accusations of dual allegiance. They are generally considered to have profoundly changed the mentality of French Jewry, making it more willing to voice concerns unapologetically (Abitbol 1994).

The first major North African Jewish writer in French is the Tunisian Albert Memmi, whose novel The Pillar of Salt, originally published in 1953, portrayed the impasse of those of his milieu, forced out of their native lands by growing Arab nationalism, yet not so thoroughly Frenchified as to feel at one with the colonizing power. Memmi would go on to become a major theoretician of decolonization and Francophone literature, and then a spokesman for a secular but specifically Jewish identity in the Diaspora, supportive of Israel but working for its harmonization with Arab concerns. Other North African writers who have portrayed the successful but nostalgia-tinged integration of their community in France include the Moroccan-born Marcel Bénabou, and the Algerian-born Gil Ben Aych.

A seismic shift in French policy toward Israel took place in June 1968, when de Gaulle sought to regain influence among former colonies and the Arab world generally as well as consummate a break from American tutelage. French public opinion tended to approve of less favor shown to Israel, but times had changed. In the 1960s came the first serious questioning of the monolithic “Jacobine” nature of the French republic. No longer were the sole political differences among the French considered to be those based on the rift between right and left, between upholders of the status quo and those who sought a more equitable or frankly utopian distribution of wealth. Suddenly, groups of all sorts—students, women, homosexuals, Bretons, Muslim immigrants from North Africa, Jews—felt entitled to formulate demands for recognition that did not necessarily dovetail with those of a social class or the French nation as a whole. In this cacophony of political discourse, a carnivalesque novel appeared in 1968 on the occupation and the Jewish question: Patrick Modiano’s La place de l’étoile. (The title is a play on words: the Place de l’Étoile is the plaza where the Arc de Triomphe stands, but it also means “the place of the star” on one’s chest, that is, the yellow stars the Jews had to wear under the Nazis.) In this book, Modiano rehearses, in an ironic display of self-hatred, the obsessions of various French anti-Semites, including even a Jewish collaborationist of sorts: Maurice Sachs. (Sachs was a French Jewish man of letters, active in the 1930s, openly homosexual, who converted successively to Catholicism and Protestantism. He ended up passing as an Aryan and spying for the Gestapo on Frenchmen deported to labor in Germany, where he was killed [Jacobson 1994]). Foregrounding such dubious characters, Modiano battered the myth that Jews had to behave as model Frenchpeople, or even as good Jews fearful of Gentile disapproval. This novel was one of many signs that a new space of expression had opened for French Jewish novelists and polemicists, similar to that introduced in the English-speaking world by Philip Roth and Mordecai Richler, with their ill-behaved Jewish antiheroes.

Since the late 1960s, so many self-consciously Jewish writers have emerged in France that it is only possible to name a few. They all bear witness to the vibrancy of a French Jewish community that has increased to some 600,000 (figures vary) and is rediscovering, in a typically postmodern renewal of religion and ethnicity, all manner of Jewish particularities. The legacy of Yiddish as a silenced tongue is embodied in the fiction of Henri Raczymow, Myriam Anissimow, Cyrille Fleischman, and Gilles Rozier. A similar role for Ladino is evident in the works of Clarisse Nicoïdski and Marcel Cohen, both of Turkish background. The greatest contribution of French Jewish writers of North African origin might well be creative syntheses of philosophy and Jewish religious thought, as in works by Edmond Jabès, Shmuel Trigano, Marc-Alain Ouaknin, and even Jacques Derrida. All such meldings of philosophy and Judaism in France owe a great deal to the Lithuanian-born Emmanuel Levinas, who was naturalized French in 1930. An example of Levinas’s philosophy is the Jewish response he gave to Heidegger on the latter’s terrain: the true dwelling-place of Dasein, human reality, is not, as the German philosopher would have it, the more or less permanent house, but the temporary sukkah or hut. This is borne out in the global nomadism that has existed forever in the Jewish people, but that has become so clear in the 21st century.

French Jews find themselves at the confluence of more defining factors of contemporary Jewish experience than their American or Israeli counterparts. Like American Jewry, they are a sizable minority living among a Christian majority, in a historically democratic society that allows them to play leading roles in cultural and political arenas. Yet like Israeli Jews, they share their environment with a Muslim population larger than theirs, with whom they must achieve a degree of harmony. Moreover, French Jews live in a country that was occupied by the Nazis; memory is particularly acute there. These factors add up to a particular existential constellation reflected in a rich literature.

Selected Bibliography

- Abitbol, Michel. 1994. "The Integration of North African Jews in France." Yale French Studies 85: 248–261.
- Benbassa, Esther. 1999. The Jews of France: A History from Antiquity to the Present. Translated from the French by M. B. DeBevoise. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Fleg, Edmond. 1943. Why I am a Jew. Translated from the French by Victor Gollancz. London: V. Gollancz.
- Marrus, Michael R. 1971. The Politics of Assimilation: The French Jewish Community at the Time of the Dreyfus Affair. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.
- Raczymow, Henri. 1994. "Tales of Exile and Forgetfulness (Excerpts) and 'Memory Shot Through with Holes.'" Translated from the French by Alan Astro. In Discourses of Jewish Identity in Twentieth Century France, edited by Alan Astro, 91–105. Yale French Studies, No. 85. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Schwarz-Bart, André. 1960. Last of the Just. Translated from the French by Stephen Becker. New York: Atheneum.
- Spire, André. 1992. "Assimilation." In Poètes juifs de langue française: anthologie [Jewish French-language Poets: An Anthology], edited by Jacques Éladan, 61–62. Paris: Noël Blandin.
- Wieviorka, Annette. 1994. "Jewish Identity in the First Accounts by Extermination Camp Survivors from France." Translated from the French by Françoise Rosset. In Discourses of Jewish Identity in Twentieth Century France, edited by Alan Astro, 135–151. Yale French Studies, No. 85. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Wolitz, Seth L. 1994. "Imagining the Jew in France: From 1945 to the Present." In Discourses of Jewish Identity in Twentieth Century France, edited by Alan Astro, 119–134. Yale French Studies, No. 85. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Jews in Germany

Frederick Ehrlich

---

General Population: 82,000,000

Jewish Population: 100,000 to 200,000

Percentage of Population: 1.5 percent

Jewish Population Centers: Berlin, Cologne, Dresden, Dusseldorf, Frankfurt, Giessen, Hamburg, Hannover, Karlsruhe, Munich, Nuremberg, Potsdam, and Ulm

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Russian emigration, Israelis and older generations of survivors

Languages Spoken: German, Russian, Yiddish, Hebrew, and English

---

Historical Overview

4th century A Jewish cemetery from this era is found in Cologne in the 1930s.

8th century Flourishing Jewish communities are found along the Rhine, and Jews live harmoniously alongside their newly Christian neighbors. Jews hold public office, own land, and work in any field they choose.

10th century Rabbenu Gershom founds a yeshiva in Mainz, which attracts Jews from all over Europe.

11th century Pope Urban II initiates the Crusades. Jews are now clearly considered “outsiders,” and communities in Worms, Mainz, and Cologne are devastated; 1,100 Jews are killed in one day in 1096 in Mainz.

13th century Jews migrate to the East, following new communities in Munich, Vienna, and Berlin.

13th century Yiddish begins to evolve.

12th–14th century Numerous massacres of Jews take place in cities such as Speyer, Worms, Mainz, and Cologne. Some 12,000 Jews are killed in the Rhenish cities alone between May and July 1096; Jews are accused of blood libel, poisoning wells, and other crimes. Accusations of well poisoning also occur during the Black Death in 1348–1349.

15th century Jews of Austria, Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia are slaughtered for being unbelievers, or forced into baptism.

16th century Yiddish becomes a written language as well as a spoken one, using Hebrew characters.

17th century The elector of Brandenburg, Frederick William, decrees that all religious beliefs should be tolerated and Jews should be protected against oppression and slander, but this proves to be only a localized phenomenon.

18th century Joseph Oppenheimer, in his role as a prominent court Jew, persuades the Duke of Wurttemberg to rescind an expulsion order banning Jews from this Duchy.

1914 Jews serve loyally in the German armies against its enemies.

1930s Hitler rises to power, implementing a series of anti-Semitic measures leading to the destruction of great parts of European Jewry and the near complete dissemination of German and Eastern European Jewry.

A number of pieces of evidence suggest a Jewish presence in the Rhineland as early as the third century and a document dated 321, refers to the fact that the Jews in Cologne had the same rights as elsewhere in the Roman Empire, which ruled the region at that time. The only restrictions on their civil liberties were in relation to the dissemination of their religion and holding government office, but they were free to follow any occupation and it appears they indeed did, in commerce, industry, agriculture, and eventually banking-type services.

Indeed, a number of Jewish communities were established in Western Europe before the arrival of Christianity. They owned land and accepted local converts, but it was not long before the Church developed the doctrine that the Jews were a rejected people who should be kept apart.

In spite of this, the Jews developed their skills as merchants, many becoming influential to the point of being used by the rulers to fund various projects or to finance their armies and their wars. Jewish mercantile networks spread to many areas beyond the Rhineland, although the major centers remained there.

With the emergence of the Holy Roman Empire after Charlemagne's unifying efforts, persecution of Jews became widespread. Nevertheless, there were major intellectual and religious movements including the establishment of yeshivas. The most famous of these was that of Rabbenu Gershom, whose yeshiva in Mainz became very famous and was even visited by Rashi.

Persecution did not become large-scale until the Crusades, when Jewish communities were routinely massacred by passing crusaders, affecting even the major centers of Worms, Mainz, and Cologne. Numerous communal facilities and private homes were also destroyed, only to be rebuilt.

It became increasingly difficult for Jews to interact with their Christian neighbors and eventually, the communities became increasingly closed and isolated. The ghetto, however, had many positive aspects also. It permitted the community to run its own affairs with less interference and, very significantly, allowed Yiddish to develop into a formal language structure. This isolation probably proved to be a major factor in maintaining the coherence and continuity of these communities, a common language being a central feature of nationhood.

Conditions for Jews steadily deteriorated after the Crusades and led to the eventual development of the Inquisition with its forced conversions and savage persecution of heretics, taking an increasing toll. Jews were accused of blood libel, poisoning wells, and spreading plague, and this was a factor leading to the migration east, so that the major centers of Jewish population spread from places like Worms and Speyer toward Poland where the kings were less disposed to persecute Jews. However, there were always some Jews who remained in Germany, and in more modern times, communities were established in Munich, Frankfurt, and Berlin. Some of these communities produced government advisers or financiers, had positions at court, and eventually produced philosophers, composers, and artists.

During the 19th century, the Haskalah movement allowed much cultural assimilation to occur and the evolution of "the German gentleman of the Mosaic faith," but this was all brought to an end by the Holocaust.

Contemporary Overview

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds

Almost all the “original” German Jews were killed in the Holocaust or have migrated to England, the United States, South America, Australia, or Israel. Most Jews presently living in Germany have come from the former Soviet Union since the 1990s. The vast majority are secular and have very little knowledge of Jewish tradition, but there are vigorous attempts at introducing Jewish education and affiliation around communal institutions. Apart from German, the commonly spoken languages are Russian and Hebrew, because of considerable presence of Israelis in financial centers such as Frankfurt. The major communities have their own rabbis, synagogues, and cemeteries, and kosher food is available in most centers.

There are several Jewish primary schools and a high school in Berlin. In addition, a number of universities have programs in Jewish studies, most of them conducted by non-Jews, for non-Jews. At Heidelberg University, there is an autonomous school of Jewish studies, which offers academic degrees, and most high schools in Germany teach various aspects of Holocaust studies.

Culturally, there is a weekly newspaper as well as a Yiddish weekly. In addition, numerous museums have sections dealing with Judaism and the Holocaust.

There appears to be little poverty among German Jews now. Many are young and actively involved in professions and commerce.

Apart from the synagogues, there are various outreach services promoted by the Chabad movement involving adult education, day camps and after-school programs, Hebrew schools, children’s clubs, and bar and bat mitzvah instruction. Additional services include checking of mezuzot and tefillin as well as loans, soup kitchens, prison visitation, hospital chaplaincy, and marriage preparation.

Selected Bibliography

- Agus, I. A. 1970. Rabbi Meir of Rothenburg: His Life and His Works as Sources for the Religious, Legal, and Social History of the Jews of Germany in the 13th Century. New York: Ktav.
- Cohn, Michael. 1994. The Jews in Germany, 1945–1993: The Building of a Minority. Westport, CT: Praeger Publishers, iii.
- Nywiek, Donald. 1980. The Jews in Weimar Germany. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.
- Poppel, Stephen. 1977. Zionism in Germany: The Shaping of Jewish Identity, 1897–1933. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society.
- Pulzer, Peter. 1992. Jews and the German State: The Political History of a Minority, 1848–1933. Oxford, UK: Blackwell.
- Reinharz, Yehuda. 1975. Fatherland or Promised Land: The Dilemma of the German Jew, 1893–1914. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

Jews in Germany: 1848–1933

Peter Pulzer

---

The Struggle for Emancipation

The restoration of the prerevolutionary order after the defeat of Napoleon in 1815 left the Jews of Germany as the subjects of 38 different states, each with its own legal code or in some cases codes. Though the treaty setting up the new German Confederation (1815–1866) pledged itself to the “civic betterment” of the Jewish population, when governments did propose measures of partial alleviation they frequently faced the opposition of legislatures, municipalities, churches, or the populace, as in the Hep-Hep pogroms that began in Würzburg and spread across Europe in 1819. The numerous petitions from Jewish communities during the 1830s and 1840s, and the untiring advocacy of complete legal equality by the Hamburg lawyer Gabriel Riesser, constituted an uphill struggle. The liberal revolutions of 1848 changed this situation. The National Parliament that met in Frankfurt contained seven deputies of the Jewish faith, including Riesser, who became one of its vice presidents. It adopted a constitution for Germany, incorporating a charter of basic rights that proclaimed that “the enjoyment of civic and citizens’ rights is neither conditioned nor restricted by religious belief.” Most of the constituent German states adopted legal provisions along similar lines. Though the Frankfurt Parliament was short-lived, dispersed as it was by Prussian bayonets, its enactments had a profound impact on Jewish consciousness. Having seen parliamentary institutions as the guarantor of civil rights, most German Jews from then on supported liberal or democratic politics—an ideological preference that did not necessarily endear them to their fellow citizens.

Equal Rights in Theory and Practice

In the decade that followed the failure of the revolution, the emancipatory laws adopted by the various states were either rescinded or ignored. In Bavaria, the government’s modest proposals for greater Jewish rights in 1849 were met with more than 1,800 petitions of protest. However, as commerce and urbanization grew, liberal sentiment revived. In 1859, when the German National Association (Deutscher Nationalverein) was founded to further German unification on a parliamentary basis, Jews were prominently involved. Jews also began breaking the barriers to public appointments without first submitting to baptism. In 1860, Riesser became the first professing Jew to be appointed to a judgeship in his native city of Hamburg. A year earlier, Moritz Abraham Stern was appointed to a full professorship in mathematics at Göttingen University. One by one, German states enacted full equality for Jews, including the Grand Duchy of Baden, in 1862, and the Kingdom of Württemberg and the Free City of Frankfurt, in 1864. With the achievement of national unification, admittedly by military rather than parliamentary means, the Reichstag of the new North German Federation (1867–1870) settled the issue of full legal equality in the law of July 3, 1869. This in turn became a law of the German Empire on its foundation in 1871.

In the decade of national unification from the late 1860s to the late 1870s, it seemed as though the moment of liberalism had come, as in many other parts of Europe, offering the prospect of further extensions of political liberties and a more open society. It also marked the high point of Jewish participation in shaping German politics. The program of the largest political party at that time, the National Liberals, was drafted by Eduard Lasker. Another National Liberal, Ludwig Bamberger, played a leading role in establishing the Imperial central bank, the Reichsbank, and a unified gold-based currency, the reichsmark. Levin Goldschmidt, who became a justice of the Imperial Commercial Court and a professor of commercial law at the University of Berlin, was one of the initiators of a unified code of civil law for the newly created empire. The first and, as it turned out, the only professing Jew to become a cabinet minister during the empire was Julius Elstätter, minister of finance in Baden from 1868 to 1893. A more mysterious figure was Gerson Bleichröder, the private banker and informal political adviser of the imperial chancellor, Otto von Bismarck. For opponents of the new order he symbolized the archetypal “money Jew” and became a scapegoat for the triumph of commerce and materialism.

This significant integration of Jews in the German public sphere had its causes in the convergence of their values and hopes and those of the majority of the German middle class. By the last third of the 19th century, most German Jews were Franco-Jewish politician Eduard Lasker.

(Isadore Singer, ed., The Jewish Encyclopedia, 1901)

adherents of some form of Reform Judaism, which made assimilation to the dominant culture easier and even desirable. But even the Orthodox minority, though it did not welcome the dilution of Jewish traditions, did not lag behind in its German patriotism and loyalty to the new political order. The identification of German-Jewish aspirations with the political reality of the new state was, however, short-lived. At the end of the 1870s a less liberal and more nationalist tone set in, the Liberal parties lost electoral support, and Bismarck abandoned his alliance with them. This more right-wing climate brought with it greater envy and resentment of the successes Jews had achieved. Politicians, political parties, and journals arose that were committed to reversing or modifying the civil rights of Jews. The term “anti-Semitism” made its appearance in Germany in 1879. Though the formal legal position remained unchanged until the end of the empire in 1918, the limits to Jewish advancement now became clear.

Achievements and Frustrations

The rightward turn in German politics largely marked the end of a Jewish role in national policy making, but not of Jews in politics. Their center of gravity now moved toward the parties of left liberalism (Progressives). In the Reichstag, this faction was a largely powerless opposition, but at the municipal level, especially in major cities like Berlin, Frankfurt-on-Main, and Breslau, Jews continued to exercise powerful influence. A younger generation of politically active Jews found its home in the growing Social Democratic Party (SPD), partly as a revival of the older tradition of Jewish radicalism, partly because the SPD was increasingly seen as an opponent to anti-Semitism. Paul Singer, a wealthy clothing manufacturer, became the party's vice chairman, and Jews were prominent in the party's ideological disputes, exemplified by Eduard Bernstein on the moderate (revisionist) side and Rosa Luxemburg on the radical wing.

Another area in which Jews continued to be numerous was the press. The leading liberal newspapers, the Berliner Tageblatt and Frankfurter Zeitung, had Jewish owners (Rudolf Mosse and Leopold Sonnemann) and editors, and the Mosse and Ullstein houses also printed a variety of tabloids and magazines. Within the Social Democratic press, too, Jewish party members, who were the most likely to have formal education, were prominent as editors of daily newspapers and theoretical journals. Although Jews enjoyed professional success and shared in the prosperity of the empire, they suffered not only from the anti-Semitism of the streets but also from continuing official discrimination. Throughout the period of the empire (1871–1918), it was extremely rare for a professing Jew to be appointed to a civil service or diplomatic position or, except in some Bavarian regiments, to be a military officer. Even in professions for which Jews were particularly well-qualified, such as the judiciary or academia, appointments were few and promotion came slowly. These frustrations obliged Jews to organize in defense of their interests. The most important defense body, significantly named the Central Association of German Citizens of the Jewish Faith, founded in 1893, had mobilized about a third of the Jewish population by 1914.

War, Revolution, and Democracy

Many German Jews welcomed the outbreak of war in 1914, in the hope that the frustrations of the prewar years would thereby be overcome and their integration into a patriotic consensus be completed. They volunteered for the army, subscribed to government war loans, and were recruited into high administrative positions, but under the impact of the military stalemate and the hardships on the home front the consensus evaporated. Jews were accused of profiteering and shirking active service, to which the government responded by ordering a census of Jewish participation in the army. This humiliating measure and the revival of anti-Semitic agitation increasingly alienated Jewish opinion from the existing order; Jews became prominent in movements favoring a compromise peace and in the antiwar Left inside and outside the SPD. These developments culminated, as Germany faced defeat in 1918, in revolutionary outbreaks and the overthrow of the monarchy, which, though not instigated by Jews, saw Jewish participation on an unprecedented scale. An extreme example was that of Bavaria, where governments of escalating radicalism contained such figures as Kurt Eisner, Ernst Toller, Gustav Landauer, and Eugen Leviné. Such activism occasioned a backlash, and anti-Semitism, which before the war had been largely verbal, now took on violent and even terroristic forms. The Nazi Party, of which Adolf Hitler seized the leadership in 1920, was founded in Munich.

Though the revolutions failed, the democratic republic, whose constitution was adopted in Weimar in 1919, was equally contested. Its enemies denounced it as a foreign import and the child of defeat, a defeat attributed to a “stab in the back” by civilian politicians, including liberal and left-wing Jews. That the new constitution was drafted by a Jew, Hugo Preuß, exacerbated the political polarization. Although complete religious freedom was guaranteed by the constitution, this no more removed the ambiguities of the Jewish position than the law of 1869 had done. Nevertheless, more Jews now had access to state and municipal employment and public advisory bodies. Though few Jews were members of national governments, especially after the assassination of Foreign Minister Walther Rathenau in 1922, they were active in all left-of-center parties and their media. In other public institutions, especially the increasingly reactionary universities, they fared less well. One sign of the growing plurality of Jewish political opinion was increased support for Zionism, with which only a small minority had identified before 1914. The encounter with the more “authentic” Jews of Eastern Europe during World War I, the establishment of a Jewish national home in Palestine, and a decline in the fortunes of liberalism all contributed to this development.

The End of Civil Rights

The election of a government by the Nazi Party in 1933, in the wake of the Great Depression, marked the end of the democratic experiment. The mere fact that Jews had had a stake in this order made it suspect in the eyes of many, and the ease with which Jews were deprived of their hard-won rights showed that these had probably never enjoyed a broad consensus in Germany. The imposition of the Nazi dictatorship in which all elements of the rule of law were cumulatively suspended showed how closely the rights of Jews were tied to the existence of human rights in general.

Selected Bibliography

- Meyer, Michael A., ed. 1997–1998. German-Jewish History in Modern Times. Vols. 2–4, New York: Columbia University Press.
- Mosse, Werner E. 1989. The German-Jewish Economic Élite: A Socio-Cultural Profile. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Niewyk, Donald L. 1980. The Jews in Weimar Germany. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.
- Pulzer, Peter. 1988. The Rise of Political Anti-Semitism in Germany and Austria. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Pulzer, Peter. 2003. Jews and the German State 1848–1933: The Political History of a Minority. Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press.
- Reinharz, Jehuda. 1975. Fatherland or Promised Land: The Dilemma of the German Jew 1893–1914. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Richarz, Monika. 1991. Jewish Life in Germany: Memoirs from Three Centuries. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Stern, Fritz. 1977. Gold and Iron: Bismarck, Bleichröder and the Building of the German Empire. New York: Alfred Knopf.

Jews in Gibraltar

Tito Benady

---

General Population: 28,750

Jewish Population: 600

Percent of Population: Approximately 2 percent

Migration Routes: Mainly Morocco, particularly from the Ladino-speaking city of Tetuan; a small number from England.

Languages Spoken: English and Spanish

---

Historical Overview

1160 The city of Gibraltar is founded by the emperor of Morocco.

1462 Gibraltar is captured by Spain.

1474 Gibraltar is sold by its lord, the Duke of Medina Sidonia, to the conversos of Cordoba.

1476 Medina Sidonia expels the conversos.

1704 Gibraltar is captured by an Anglo-Dutch force in the name of the pretender to the crown of Spain.

- 1705 Gibraltar is cut off from Spain and the garrison depends largely on supplies from Morocco. A number of Jewish merchants from London, Lisbon, and Livorno who deal with Morocco settle in Gibraltar, as do a number of Jews from Tetuan in Morocco.
- 1713 Gibraltar is ceded to Britain under the Treaty of Utrecht. Spain insists on inserting a clause in the Treaty, which precludes Jews from living in Gibraltar.
- 1717 Jews are expelled from Gibraltar, in accordance with the terms of the Treaty of Utrecht.
- 1718 Britain is at war with Spain again after Spain invades Sicily and upsets the arrangements made at Utrecht. Gibraltar is once again cut off from supplies from Spain, and the Jews are readmitted to ensure supplies from Morocco.
- 1721 Commodore Stewart of the British Royal Navy negotiates a treaty with Morocco. On the Moroccan side, the negotiations are handled by Moses Ben Hatar, the treasurer of the emperor of Morocco, and Jews are henceforth allowed to settle in Gibraltar. The first land grants are given to Jews.
- 1723 The Great Synagogue of Shaar Hashamayim (Gate of Heaven) is founded by Isaac Netto on land granted by the governor. The synagogue and its services follow those of the Spanish and Portuguese synagogue at Bevis Marks in London.
- 1750 Governor Bland makes the elders of the synagogue responsible for maintaining order among the poorer members of the community.
- 1754 There are 573 Jews in Gibraltar and they form one-third of the civilian population.
- 1759 The yeshiva (Talmudic academy) of Es Hayim (Tree of Life) is turned into a synagogue.
- 1766 The Great Synagogue is destroyed by floods that follow torrential rains, but it is rebuilt two years later.
- 1777 The number of Jews has increased to 863, but they now form only a quarter of the larger civilian population.
- 1779 The Great Siege by Spain commences in June and lasts until February 1783.
- 1781 Heavy Spanish bombardment begins. The synagogue is burnt down and many of the Jewish inhabitants take refuge in England to escape the rigors of the siege. Most return in 1783.
- 1793 The French Republic declares war on Britain. The French Revolution and the Napoleonic wars, which last (with an intermission of less than three years) until 1815, bring great prosperity to the merchants of Gibraltar and Jewish merchants. Two of them, Aaron Cardozo and the banker Judah Benoliel, achieve considerable fame abroad. Cardozo's mansion is now the City Hall.
- 1800 The Flemish synagogue, Nefusot Yehudah (Dwelling Places of Israel), is built.
- 1881 The Jewish population reaches 1,800, forming 10 percent of the total civilian population.
- 1940 The noncombatant population of Gibraltar is evacuated because of fears of a combined attack by Spain and Germany. Most evacuees go to England, but some go to Jamaica and the Portuguese island of Madeira. They return in 1944 and 1945.

Contemporary Overview

Trades and Professions

Jews participate in all the trade and professions, but a number are lawyers. Gibraltar's finance center, which incorporates a number of overseas companies, offers many opportunities to the legal profession.

Communal Institutions

Four Orthodox synagogues practice the Sephardi rite. The managing board of the Jewish community controls all communal affairs. There is an elementary school, which recently celebrated its centenary, and, more recently, separate secondary schools have been started for girls and boys. There is an active burial society, Hevrat Gemilut Hasadim, which is entirely run by volunteers.

Communal Relations

The Jewish community is well established, and relations with other religious groups are very good. On special occasions joint services are held. There is no anti-Semitism, a situation no doubt eased by considerable intermarriage in past years. Today a quarter of the general population has some Jewish ancestry.

Present Economic Conditions

The finance center and tourism make Gibraltar an affluent place with a gross domestic product of more than £20,000 per person, above the average for southern Europe. Nevertheless, opportunities are limited, and this has led to much Jewish migration to Britain and Israel.

Selected Bibliography

- Benady, Tito M. 1979. "The Settlement of Jews in Gibraltar, 1704–1783." Transactions of the Jewish Historical Society of England 26: 87–110.
- Benady, Tito M. 1989. "The Jewish Community of Gibraltar." In Western Sephardim, edited by Richard D. Barnett and Walter Schwab, 144–179. Gibraltar: Gibraltar Books.
- Benady, Tito M. 1994. "The Role of the Jews in the British Colonies of the Western Mediterranean." Transactions of the Historical Society of England 33: 45–63.
- Benady, Tito M., ed. 2004. Aaron Cardozo: Life and Letters. Gibraltar: Gibraltar Books.
- Jackson, Sir William, and Francis Cantos. 1995. From Fortress to Democracy: The Political Biography of Sir Joshua Hassan. Gibraltar: Gibraltar Books.
- Lamelas, Diego. 1992. The Sale of Gibraltar in 1474. Gibraltar: Gibraltar Books.
- Lombard, Anthony. 1997. "The Roman Catholic Abudarham Family." Gibraltar Heritage Journal 4: 75–90.
- Lombard, Anthony. 2000. "Fives Court: The Benzimra and Levy Families." Gibraltar Heritage Journal 7: 49–73.
- Serfaty, Abraham B. M. 1933. The Jews of Gibraltar under British Rule. Gibraltar: Gibraltar Books.
- Seymour, Anthony A. D. 1996. "A Tale of Two Families." Gibraltar Heritage Journal 3: 49–60.

The Jews of Gibraltar and the Development of Medical Practices

Lawrence Sawchuk

---

Throughout the 18th and 19th centuries, the Jews of Gibraltar played a critical role as intermediaries facilitating commercial and political activities that enabled Britain to provide food and provisions essential for the survival of its garrison outpost. An important port of call for merchant ships and war vessels, Gibraltar's free port status and strategic location ensured that it served as a major node in a trade network that linked numerous urban centers throughout Europe, the Mediterranean, Africa, and the New World.

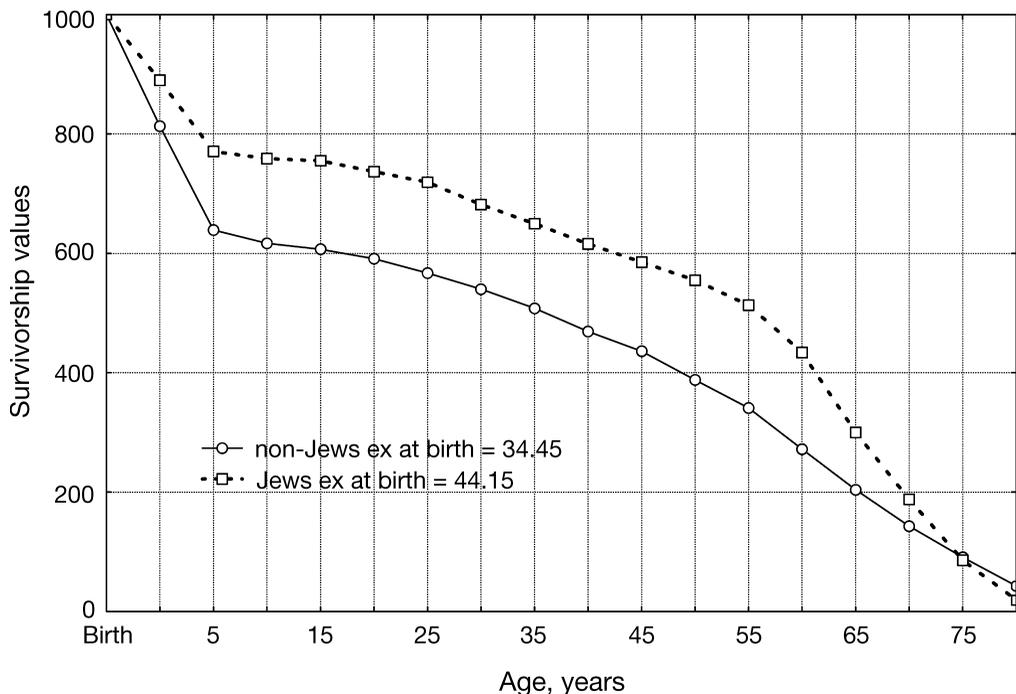

The inhabitants of this small, rocky, limestone territory would ultimately pay a high price, their very well-being, for this commercial prosperity. As an important garrison post for seasoning troops, military personnel grouped together in large numbers and moved rapidly from place to place, providing the ideal medium for the spreading infectious diseases of foreign origin into Gibraltar. As an important port of call, Gibraltar played host to hundreds of foreigners daily. The first of the deadly visitations from abroad occurred in 1804, when yellow fever struck and, literally within months, half the population died, victim to what is now recognized as a highly virulent vector-borne viral disease. Searching for the cause of this catastrophic event, the colonial government appointed a public health commission. The appointed officials claimed it was the Barbary Jews, who, because of their "habits and uncleanness," caused the spread of the disease. The lack of hygiene, overcrowding, and perceived poor moral character unfairly attributed to Jewish immigrants were mistakenly thought to be factors in the spread of the disease. All too often colonial authorities were unwilling to admit that Gibraltar or its militaristic hegemonic actions could be responsible for introducing the contagion, as this admission could damage the perception of British authority and threaten commercial relations. Admitting a local source of contagion would also lead to the intuitive next step—costly measures of cleanup. As a result, demonizing a visible minority group was a convenient explanation for an outbreak of a disease.

Gibraltar was an ideal location for the outbreak of deadly epidemics given the commingling of men and women from near and far within a limited territory and densely packed population. From an epidemiological perspective, the inhabitants of Gibraltar, throughout most of the 19th century, were subjected each day to the force of high background mortality and the uniformly high death rate among the young due to the continuous action of infectious disease, malnutrition, and the synergism between them. Having assumed the dubious reputation as an overcrowded and filthy population beyond any in the world (Hennen 1830), Gibraltar was the site of further deadly visitations of yellow fever (1813–1814 and 1828) and cholera (1834, 1865) (Sawchuk 2001). Within this unfavorable sanitary setting resided a numerically dominant Christian community and a smaller Sephardic community.

Unlike many other Jewish settlements there was no residential segregation; the inhabitants of different religious persuasions co-resided in communal tenement buildings known as “patios.” Here, members of a patio would share common entrances, courtyards, potable and sanitary water supplies, and communal privies. Even despite this communal living style, however, the Jews still enjoyed lower death rates relative to their non-Jewish neighbors during this period. The “Jewish advantage” documented in Gibraltar is by no means singular, and this phenomenon has been observed elsewhere with consistent regularity across time and space (see Derosas 2003, for example). To appreciate the magnitude and specifics of this Jewish advantage that characterized the medical history of the Sephardim of Gibraltar, two specific examples will be provided.

The first illustration comes from a period of high background mortality, when knowledge of basic disease transmission was lacking, sanitary conditions and overcrowding was excessive, and Gibraltar’s inhabitants relied principally on rainwater as their source of potable, or drinking, water. Using material derived from an excellent registration system, analysis of cause-specific death registers and census material using Smith’s (2004) survival program yields supportive evidence of this advantage. One measure, the expectation of life at birth, serves as a sensitive barometer of the social and sanitary state of health in a community. The results, depicted in the figure, show clearly that the Jews have a significantly higher life expectancy up until age 10. Further, there is empirical evidence that a significant portion of the advantage can be ascribed to a single cluster of diseases—weanling diarrhea or deaths attributable to gastroenteritis and diarrhea as well as marasmus, anemia, and starvation (Sawchuk, Herring, and Waks 1985).

Gibraltarian Jews and non-Jews: 1869–1880 survivorship values (lx) and life expectancy (ex) at birth

Weanling diarrhea is the product of a synergy between enteric infections, malnutrition, and repeated insults from infectious disease. Strongly influenced by the timing of the cessation of breast feeding and subsequent exposure to the contaminated environment, weanling diarrhea is a proxy measure of the impact of high ecological stress on the health of a population. The search to further identify a single source or disease cluster for the higher Jewish survivorship has proven to be interesting, as Table 1 indicates, but the results are unrewarding from a statistical point of view, as the observed differentials by specific cause of death may have arisen by chance alone. There is one highly suggestive finding related to tuberculosis mortality: Christians were 1.7 times more likely to die from this local endemic disease than their Jewish counterparts. Although there is a genetic component to resistance to tuberculosis, environmental factors such as household overcrowding, poor personal/public hygiene, and a protein-deficient diet, are also likely to contribute to a mortality differential. Collectively, the implications of these findings point to a generalized advantage that is likely to be the by-product of interrelated sociocultural, religious, demographic, and possibly biological factors. Unlike Derosas (2003), who

Table 1 Cause-specific Mortality Differentials According to Religious Affiliation in Gibraltar, 1869–1880<sup>a</sup>

Age (Years)	Disease	Ratio of Christian to Jewish Mortality Rates	Z Score and Significance Level
<5 years	Pneumonia and bronchitis	1.06	0.11, ns
	Tabes mesenteria (tuberculosis of lymph glands)	1.66	0.501, ns
	Scrofula (tuberculosis of abdomen)	2.84	1.09, ns
	Smallpox (influenced by inoculation practices)	2.12	0.76, ns
15–49	Respiratory tuberculosis	1.70	1.94, borderline significant
Women only
15–49	Puerperal fever (deaths arising during childbirth)	1.77	0.569, ns

<sup>a</sup>Z score and significance level indicate that the difference is not statistically different between the two groups; therefore, the observed differential could have arisen by chance alone (e.g., Z scores must be greater than 1.96 to be statistically significant at the 0.05 level of significance). The expression “ns” indicates nonsignificance at the 95 percent level of confidence. Other notable observations include the following: there were 53 Christian deaths and 0 Jewish deaths in persons under the age of 5 due to whooping cough and no cases of measles and 34 deaths among the non-Jewish children.

posits that the observed mortality differential is the result of a higher mortality for Catholics through poor child care or child neglect, it is likely that Jewish advantage was grounded primarily in relative wealth coupled with mosaic-Talmudic hygienic rituals and values of community care for the poor and ill.

The second example of the Jewish advantage focuses on a period when Gibraltar experienced a sudden and dramatic increase in the death rate arising from a common, unusual causal factor operating for a brief time, or what demographers have called “crisis mortality.” During the 1865 outbreak of cholera, the residents of Gibraltar were subjected to four months of political and economic isolation from neighboring Spain, resulting in economic hardship and a dramatic increase in the death rate. Caused by a deadly bacillus, cholera is spread through contaminated water, soiled clothing, unwashed produce, and poor personal hygiene. During this major epidemic, the observed death rate among the Jewish inhabitants was significantly lower at 8.32 cholera deaths per 1,000 population, compared with 17.28 per 1,000 for the non-Jewish residents ( $Z = 2.547, P < .05$ ). Given that the precise causal source of cholera was not discovered until the 1890s, and effective therapy was not available until the 20th century, it is unlikely that the observed advantage was the by-product of a specific knowledge base regarding cholera etiology. The Jewish advantage during this time of crisis mortality was more likely due to behaviors relating to hygienic principles and observances rooted in the Jewish community and household. The fact that Jews had lower cholera death rates while co-residing with non-Jews in patio units, underscores the importance of familial or household-based practices, particularly in the time of a high background mortality or crisis mortality.

By the 1910s, the nature of differential mortality by religious affiliation underwent a remarkable change as Gibraltar entered the third phase of the epidemiological transition where chronic degenerative disorders (e.g., circulatory diseases, cancer, lower respiratory disorders) replaced infectious diseases as the main cause of death. By the 1920s, Gibraltar’s more aged Jewish community was at a relative disadvantage as its older members (i.e., those 50 years or older) were more likely to suffer and die from a wide range of chronic diseases than their Christian neighbors. One illustration of this trend is shown by the fact that from 1918 to 1923, Gibraltar’s Jewish community experienced significantly higher death rates due to diabetes mellitus. Analysis of the cause-specific mortality shows that the death rate attributable to type 2 diabetes for persons over 50 among Jews was 3.04 per 1,000, compared with 0.08 per 1,000 for the non-Jewish group ( $Z = 2.88, P < .01$ ). This example shows that the Sephardic community assumed the position of a forerunner of the new epidemiological phase as older individuals began to succumb to adverse behavioral changes in lifestyle commonly found in the 20th century—overnutrition, lack of physical activity, and, concomitantly, obesity.

Selected Bibliography

- Derosas, R. 2003. “Watch Out for the Children!” Historical Methods 36: 109–129.
- Hennen, J. 1830. Sketches of the Medical Topography of the Mediterranean. London: Thomas and George Underwood.

- Sawchuk, L. A., Herring, D.A., and L. R. Waks. 1985. "Evidence of a Jewish Advantage: A Study of Infant Mortality in Gibraltar, 1870–1959." American Anthropologist 87: 616–625.
- Sawchuk, L. A. 2001. Deadly Visitations in Dark Times: A Social History of Gibraltar in the Time of Cholera. Gibraltar Government Heritage Publications, Monograph 2. Gibraltar: Gibraltar Government Heritage Division.

Jews in Greece

Frederick Ehrlich

---

General Population: 10 million

Jewish Population: 5,000

Percent of Population: 0.5 percent

Jewish Population by City: There are 3,000 Jews in Athens and 1,000 in Thessaloniki, a tiny remnant of the former community. Isolated Jews are in other towns.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: There are virtually no Romaniotes left. Jews in present-day Greece are partly of Sephardic origin, dating from the expulsion from Spain, but there have been additions of Ashkenazi Jews from Europe.

Languages Spoken: Greek is the most commonly spoken language, although there are still traces of Ladino speakers.

---

Historical Overview

6th century BCE The earliest Jewish settlements are established in Greece.

3rd century BCE Various books of the Bible begin to appear in Greek translation; eventually, the whole Bible is translated into the Septuagint.

2nd century BCE The Maccabean Revolt occurs after King Antiochus attempts to impose Greek religious customs on the Jews and desecrates the Temple in Jerusalem.

5th century CE Romaniot communities develop in the Byzantine period.

15th century Ottoman rule brings religious tolerance and an influx of more than 20,000 Sephardic Jews to Thessaloniki in one year.

17th century Thessaloniki becomes the home of Sabbatai Zevi and his messianic movement. This persists even after his (forced) conversion to Islam, and the Donmeh followers continue their version of Judaism. This influence persists to the present day in many parts of Turkey.

Early 19th century The Greek War of Independence is marked by a massive massacre of Ottoman Turks and Jews, because the Jews had supported that regime.

Early 20th century A mass exodus of Greeks from Asia Minor and a strong Hellenization movement pressure Jews to assimilate. Synagogues are destroyed and pogroms are carried out by some Greeks and Armenians.

Jews have lived in Greece for more than 2,500 years. When Cyrus allowed the Jews to return to their homeland after the Babylonian Exile in the sixth century BCE, early encounters with Greeks occurred. There may have been occasional Jews living in Greek cities even before that, but before the fourth century BCE there were almost no Jewish communities in Greece. Their numbers increased in the third century BCE because of the enlightened attitudes of Alexander the Great.

There was much assimilation, and in the third century BCE, King Ptolemy recruited 70 scholars to translate the Bible into Greek. The resulting Septuagint has been the basis of much Bible scholarship by non-Jews. After the Maccabean revolt, many Jewish communities appeared throughout Greece, and this was recognized by Saint Paul when he visited Greece in the first century CE.

These early Jewish communities were known as the Romaniotes. They eventually developed their own customs and laws and used prayers written in Greek, but using Hebrew letters. The Romaniotes lived protected lives and followed their own customs over a period of 1,000 years, until the Ottoman conquest. The Ottomans, based on their Islamic Law, did recognize the Jews as a separate nation with legal autonomy, but the major changes occurred after the 1492 expulsion of Jews from Spain, when large numbers of Sephardic Jews arrived in Greece, settling mainly in Thessaloniki. Many of these had been converted, and these Marranos tended to overshadow the Romaniotes with their superior culture. After this movement, the Sephardi language, Ladino, gradually became the accepted language of Greek Jewry. During the 17th century, the Sephardic community in Thessaloniki represented more than half of the town's population, and the number of Jews had reached about 80,000 by the 19th century.

At the beginning of the 20th century, Thessaloniki had 50 synagogues, 20 Jewish schools, and numerous Jewish institutions, and it was a major center of Torah learning for all of Europe. There was a marked rise in Greek anti-Semitism in the early 20th century accompanied by the destruction of Jewish institutions and resulting in the emigration of many Jews. The final destruction of the community was virtually completed during the Holocaust.

Contemporary Overview

Religious Denominations

All of the eight synagogues in Greece are Sephardic, and they are served by rabbis based in Athens and Salonica, as well as some from Israel. There is a Chabad Centre in Athens, which provides some adult education, hospital and prison visitations, marriage preparation, and pastoral work.

Today, the Athens Community Center contains a library, meeting rooms, and small schools. There is also a monthly publication.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

Greece is probably the most anti-Semitic country in Europe, and anti-Semitism is widespread throughout society. Jews are often not perceived as true Greeks, although many families have lived there since the 15th century. The mainstream media use terms such as genocide and holocaust to describe the behavior of Israel, and the general level of rhetoric is similar to that in Syria or Iran. Since the end of World War II, about half the Jewish population immigrated to Israel.

Selected Bibliography

- Bowman, Steven. 2006. "Jews in Byzantium." In Cambridge History of Judaism, vol. 4, The Late Roman-Rabbinic Period, edited by Steven T. Katz. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Bowman, Steven B. 1984. The Jews of Byzantium, 1204–1453. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press.
- Mazur, Belle D. 1935. Studies on Jewry in Greece. Vol. 1. Athens: Printing Office Hestia.
- Zvi, Ankori. 1981. Giacomo Foscarini and the Jews of Crete. "Michael on the History of the Jews in the Diaspora." Tel Aviv, Israel: Diaspora Research Institute.

History of the Jews of the Island of Rhodes

Marc D. Angel

---

The Island of Rhodes in the Aegean Sea was prized throughout history for its beauty and strategic military location. Part of the ancient Greek world, it became allied with the Roman Empire (164 BCE) and was included in the Byzantine Empire (395 CE). In 773, it fell to Islamic forces, which held it for about eight years. Rhodes was subsequently ruled by local lords and by the Genoese before returning to Byzantine rule in 1261. In 1307, it was turned over to the Knights of St. John who controlled Rhodes until the Ottoman Empire conquered the island at the end of 1522. The Ottomans lost it to Italy in 1911, and it was officially ceded to Italy in 1923. After World War II, Rhodes was granted to Greece.

Although Jews have lived in Rhodes since antiquity, there is little information about a Jewish community before the 16th century. Rabbi Obadiah of Bertinoro found 22 Jewish families when he visited the island in 1487. Early in the 16th century, the grand master of the Knights of St. John decreed the expulsion of Jews from Rhodes, unless they accepted baptism. With the Ottoman conquest, Jews were again allowed to practice their religion. Those who had been forcibly baptized returned to Judaism, and their numbers were augmented by Sephardic Jews, who were encouraged by the sultan to settle there. In the latter 16th century, several Christian travelers commented that most city dwellers in Rhodes were Jews. Although these seem to be exaggerated accounts, they point to the conspicuous presence of Jews at that period.

A traveler who passed through Rhodes in 1621 estimated that there were 200 Jews in the city. By mid-18th century, Chief Rabbi Ezra Malki reported that the community had shrunk, as some Jews had emigrated because of poor economic conditions. By the mid-19th century, Rabbi Raphael Israel estimated that there were 300 Jewish families in Rhodes. In 1900, Jewish leaders claimed a community of 3,600. In 1935, Abraham Galante put the Jewish population at 5,000, which seems to be a high estimate. During the first decades of the 20th century, many Jews from Rhodes left for the United States, Europe, Africa, and other destinations in search of greater economic opportunity. Many also left with the onset of fascist Italian rule. In 1944, when the Jews of Rhodes were deported to concentration camps, about 2,000 Jews were victimized. Only about 150 survived the Nazi brutalities.

When the Sephardim arrived in Rhodes beginning in 1523, they soon came to dominate communal life. The small native-Greek-speaking Romaniot community was absorbed by the Sephardim, and Judeo-Spanish became the language of all Jews. They lived in a Jewish Quarter—known among them as the Juderia—within the walled city. Their original synagogue, built during the 1480s, was known as Kahal Kadosh Gadol (or kahal grande). Another synagogue, built mid-16th century, was known as Kahal Kadosh Shalom. During the 19th century, as the Jewish population grew, other synagogues were established, including Kahal Kadosh Camondo and Kahal Kadosh Tikkun Hatsot.

From the 16th century, Rhodes's Jews followed the general organizational pattern of Sephardic communities in the Ottoman Empire. Lay officials oversaw the functioning and financing of communal institutions. They enacted communal ordinances (haskamoth), with the approval of the hakam (chief rabbi). They operated a system of taxation, whereby Jews were assessed for the maintenance of community institutions as well as for remittance of taxes to the Ottoman government. Revenue was also raised by selling rights (hazakoth) to work in certain businesses; and by sales tax (gabella) on certain items such as meat, wine, and cheese.

Although the synagogues employed religious functionaries, the community as a whole was under the religious authority of a hakam. As chief rabbi, the hakam was responsible for the religious life of the community. He headed the rabbinic court, supervised kashruth, taught Torah classes, answered questions in Jewish law, ensured the Halachic status of the mikvah and erub, implemented communal ordinances, and so on.

The Sephardic community of Rhodes boasted fine rabbinic scholars from its early years. Among the rabbis during the 16th and 17th centuries were Rabbis Yehiel Bassan, author of a book of responsa; Moshe de Vushal, author of a volume of sermons/lectures, Yismah Moshe; and Hayyim Algazi, author of a Halachic tome, Banei Hayei. Rabbi Moshe Israel became chief rabbi in 1714. During his 12-year tenure, Rhodes developed as an important Torah center in the Sephardic Diaspora. He authored three volumes of responsa, Masat Moshe, as well as a book of sermons/lectures, Apei Moshe. More important, he began a line of rabbis in Rhodes that continued through the early 20th century. Rabbis of the Israel family not only provided religious leadership for Rhodes, but also served in other communities. Many wrote books of rabbinic scholarship, including Rabbis Abraham Israel, Eliyahu Israel, Hayyim Yehudah Israel, Michael Yaacov Israel, Moshe ben Eliyahu Israel, Rahamim Hayyim Yehudah Israel, Raphael Yitzhak Israel, and Reuben Eliyahu Israel. Aside from rabbis of the Israel family, Rhodes also had other rabbinical leaders, scholars, and authors of rabbinic works. Among them were Rabbi Ezra Malki, in the 18th century, and rabbis Rahamim Franco, Hizkiah Kodron, Mordecai Krespin, Hizkiah Shemuel Tarica, Yedidiah Shemuel Tarica, and Hayyim Tarsa in the 19th century.

It is indeed remarkable that such a tiny community as Rhodes produced so many rabbinic scholars and authors. Even into the 20th century, a high level of rabbinic scholarship was evident in the works of Rabbi Reuben Eliyahu Israel, the last official chief rabbi of Rhodes, who served as hakam from 1922 to 1932.

Although the community maintained an elite group of scholars over the centuries, the religious and general education of the masses of Jews began a serious decline by the early 18th century. Along with the rest of the Ottoman Empire, Rhodes suffered economic stagnation. Education beyond the elementary level became a luxury for the privileged few, rather than an opportunity available for most children of the poor. As the community's tax base weakened, so did support for communal institutions and schools. Writing in the mid-18th century, Rabbi Ezra Malki lamented the "screaming in the markets and in the streets" because of the widespread poverty among the Jews of Rhodes.

Most boys attended communal or privately run schools where they learned the rudiments of Hebrew reading, the prayers, and rote memorization of sacred texts. Most girls received no formal education at all until the early 20th century.

In 1889, Abraham Galante founded a progressive school that offered a comprehensive curriculum. In 1901, this school went under the aegis of the Alliance Israelite Universelle. In 1902, the Alliance opened a school for girls. Before the Alliance schools were established, the educational situation in Rhodes was far from satisfactory. According to a report by community leaders in 1900, 92 students attended the community Talmud Torah; 400 attended the poorly run elementary schools known as meldars; and 150 children did not attend school at all. Of the 92 students in the Talmud Torah, 48 attended at no charge due to poverty. The opening of the Alliance Schools not only provided good education for their students, but they also stimulated the existing schools to improve their methods. By 1914, it was rare to find a single school-age Jewish child in Rhodes who was not enrolled in school.

When Italy took possession of Rhodes in 1923, the Alliance schools were soon transformed from French to Italian language and culture. The Italian influence was also evident in the establishment of a rabbinical school in Rhodes in 1928. Known as the Collegio Rabbinico, it was accredited by the Italian government. Students were expected to gain mastery in rabbinics, but they also had to meet requirements in secular subjects taught by Italian professors. The Collegio Rabbinico, which attracted students from various communities and had shown so much promise, was closed in 1938 by the fascist Italian government.

Although the economic life of Jews was problematic during the 18th and 19th centuries, a financial elite continued to flourish, providing jobs for their coreligionists and support for communal institutions. The most significant business venture among the Jews of Rhodes in the 19th century was a bank opened by Bohor Alhadeff in 1819. Later known as the bank of Salomon Alhadeff's Sons, it was one of the major financial institutions of the Levant. During the 20th century, economic opportunities expanded during the early years of Italian rule. By the late 1930s, though, the fascist government imposed discriminatory laws against Jews, and their condition deteriorated rapidly.

From its inception in 1523 to its destruction by the Nazis in 1944, the Jewish community of Rhodes maintained a vibrant Judeo-Spanish culture. Although few Jews live in Rhodes today, many Jews of Rhodes descent visit the island and support its remaining synagogue, Kahal Shalom, and an adjoining museum.

Selected Bibliography

Angel, Marc D. 1978. The Jews of Rhodes: The History of a Sephardic Community. New York: Sepher-Hermon Press.

Jewish Commerce in Salonica: 1881–1912

Orly C. Meron

---

The cessation of Salonica port activity on Saturday but not on Friday, the Muslim day of rest, demonstrates how exceptional a phenomenon was Jewish domination of the city's economy during the last decade of Ottoman rule. Jewish and non-Jewish visitors have stressed the link between the Jewish population's demographic dominance in multiethnic Salonica and its relative economic superiority. According to a published report compiled by Alliance Israelite Universelle (1884), the Jewish labor force in Salonica comprised 4,000 tradespeople, 4,000 shopkeepers, 2,000 porters, 600 boatmen, 250 brokers, 250 butchers, 250 tinkers, 150 fishermen, 150 donkey drivers, 100 domestic servants, 60 coal dealers, 60 turners, 50 chair manufacturers, and 500 people plying various other trades. These occupations indicate that since the first half of the 19th century, Salonica was home to an entrenched religious community of Ottoman Jews, impoverished and lacking modern education and skills.

Legal reforms initiated by the Ottoman Empire removed obstacles for private capital accumulation, thereby creating new opportunities for non-Muslim groups while encouraging foreign investment in its territories. Creation of the Ottoman Public Debt Administration (1881) laid the foundations for European semicolonialism based on reallocation of authority between economic (European) and political-legislative (Ottoman) spheres. Foreign investment in Macedonia's infrastructure, including construction of a modern port (1891), penetration of new agricultural technologies, and remittances from Macedonian emigrants promoted formation of a huge new consumer market. These developments spurred Salonica's emergence as a commercial and industrial center, administrative capital, and casern for Ottoman troops.

Anti-Semitic incidents in Europe and the Empire revived solidarity between local Jewish elites, the larger local Jewish population, and their counterparts in Europe. The educational revolution initiated by the Jewish elite with the help of Jewish philanthropic associations, especially the Alliance Israelite Universelle, induced Westernization and acquisition of modern skills. Furthermore, the community remained politically faithful and pro-Turkish even during the brief Young Turks regime. Because Jews, unlike Balkan national minorities, lacked political and territorial aspirations, they became favorites of the Ottoman elites. Thus, with their dominant demographic presence, political loyalty and repository of suitable skills, the Jews were uniquely positioned to fulfill functions that were beyond the abilities or desires of the demographically or politically Ottoman dominating class.

A report written by delegates of the Union des Associations Israélites in 1912 portrays the Jewish professions on the eve of the Greek annexation of Salonica in broad strokes. According to the report, the Jewish labor force included 24,385 employed persons distributed in five main branches: commerce (46 percent), industry and crafts (41 percent), transportation (6 percent), finance and brokerage (5 percent), and professional services (2 percent). Jewish absence from agriculture resulted from the Jews' historic urbanism, designed to sustain Jewish communal life. Although 100 Jewish families earned their livelihood from fishing in the Bay of Salonica or in the open seas, their activities were considered urban "maritime occupations," not maritime agriculture.

Being a minority, the Jewish presence in the public administration was negligible as Ottomans dominated this sector even after the Tanzimat (1839) reforms theoretically opened the sector to non-Muslims. Instances of Jews participating in the senior Ottoman military command or as officials in the Salonica Province administration were few. Salonica's municipal bureaucracy also remained monopolized by the Muslim majority although it rested on Sabbateans (Donme), a group considered part of the majority population and familiar with the workings of modern administration.

In 1912, Jewish employment in the professions and professional services was distributed between the Jewish community's public and private sector, which included about 2 percent of all the Jews employed in Salonica (430 out of 24,385). It was composed primarily of teachers (70 percent, 300 out of 430), but there were also 40 pharmacists, 30 lawyers, 25 dentists, 20 physicians, 10 journalists, and 5 engineers and architects. Table 2 shows the percentages of professionals by ethnic origin.

Table 2 Professionals in Salonica in 1912 by Ethnic Origin

Profession	Jewish (%)	Greek (%)	Turkish (%)	Other Nationalities (%)	Total Professionals (No.)
Doctors	37	35	7	21	68
Pharmacists	54	31	4	12	26
Lawyers	42	19	39	0	36
Engineers and architects	23	31	8	38	13
Opticians	63	13	0	25	8
Midwives	50	0	0	50	4
Journalists	78	0	0	22	9

According to a list of professionals adapted from an undisclosed 1915 report in German, compiled and issued by the Museum of Commerce by order of the Austro-Hungarian authorities, the Jewish presence among professionals was large compared with the number of professionals belonging to the Ottoman majority, but small in relation to this segment among the Greeks, and even smaller in comparison with “others,” mainly Europeans. The last group was especially dominant in medicine and consisted primarily of European physicians, including Jews, who had been imported from Central Europe to ease the scarcity of physicians.

Limited opportunities to acquire higher education in the Ottoman Empire influenced participation in medicine and engineering by sons of Jewish families sufficiently wealthy to send their offspring to study in European universities. In tandem, a clear preference was observed among the educated Jewish elite for profitable occupations linked to commerce, such as law, dentistry (32 percent of Jewish physicians) and pharmacy (about 54 percent of all pharmacists).

The concentration of Jews in commerce, industry, and crafts aligns with their traditional urban occupations. Jewish entrepreneurs stimulated industrial and commercial growth in the final decades of semicolonial Ottoman rule in Macedonia. Excluding European concerns that developed public infrastructure projects for the Ottoman state, Jewish firms filled the entrepreneurship gap observed in the dominant population. Most of Salonica’s urban firms were in Jewish hands (538 out of 931). Hence, the share of Jewish enterprises (58 percent) was large compared with that of Turkish enterprises (8 percent; Table 3).

Dispersion of the Turkish population throughout rural Macedonia, the Turkish elite’s traditional inclination for government and military service—which prevented the creation of a business tradition—and delayed development of a modern public

Table 3 Firms in Salonica in 1912 by Ethnic Origin and Branch (N = 931)

Branch	Ethnic Origin of Firms by Branch				Total Number of Firms in a Branch
	Jewish	Greek	Turkish	Other
Food and beverages	61	27	6	6	100
Chemicals	17	5	1	5	28
Construction materials	31	11	1	6	49
Energy and public utilities	8	1	1	6	16
Metal	15	5	5	17	42
Wood	20	5	3	1	29
Hides, leather, and footwear	28	18	3	8	57
Textiles	34	8	5	3	50
Clothing	48	10	23	17	98
Printing, paper, and office equipment	26	8	4	14	52
Tobacco	10	2	4	2	18
Domestic wares and furniture	30	3	2	6	41
Trade in agricultural products	77	34	4	20	135
General wholesale and retail	24	2	6	7	39
Finance and commission trade	109	25	8	35	177
Total number of firms per ethnic group	538	164	76	153	931

education system created a vacuum that Jewish entrepreneurs were well equipped to penetrate with the new niches by virtue of their commercial skills, available labor, and political loyalty. Ottoman Jews, as favored co-citizens and trustees of the old Ottoman elites, and “foreign” Jews, as representatives of European economic semicolonialism, cooperated in assuming key roles in the local economy by virtue of their competitive advantages over the Ottoman majority and other minorities.

Compared with the ruling elite and other competing minorities, such as the Greeks, the scope of commercial and industrial branches benefiting from Jewish entrepreneurship in Salonica was quite broad. Jewish entrepreneurs favored participation in growing niches connected with rising local consumer markets, the regional Imperial market, and international industry. The distribution of Jewish firms thus demonstrates their horizontal involvement in the city’s economy. Three groups of prominent niches can be identified: banking, international commerce, and import of semi-raw materials and Jewish domestic production (Table 4). Jewish banks served as substitutes for nonexistent Ottoman institutions. Domination of financial facilities, in addition to political support from Ottoman elites, granted Jewish businesspeople a clear advantage over their Greek competitors while it facilitated financing of large-scale trade. In international commerce, the Jews’ pervasive financial activity included organizing primary agricultural exports to core states and importing semi-raw materials and manufacturing products from Western states on their way to the Macedonian periphery. Finally, activities in the import of semi-raw materials, and, the Jewish domestic production niche, demonstrate that Jewish manufacturers in Salonica displayed a pronounced preference for importing semi-raw manufacturing inputs.

Table 4 Jewish Entrepreneurial Niches in Salonica in 1912

Sub-branch	Total Firms (No.)	Jewish Firms
		(No.)	Percentage of Total Firms in Sub-branch
Banking	39	33	84.6
Grain and flour	34	29	85.3
Silkworms and cocoons	13	11	84.6
Opium	10	7	70.0
Pharmaceuticals	13	9	69.2
Watches and valuable articles	19	17	89.5
Colonial commodities	47	38	80.9
Bones and rags	5	5	100.0
Cotton yarn (commercial)	7	7	100.0
Wood coal	8	8	100.0
Glass, plates, and metals	17	16	94.5
Leather	8	7	87.5
Ropes and jute sacks	15	12	80.0
Wool, yarn, and fabrics	14	10	71.4

As laborers, Jews were concentrated in tobacco and transportation. As a profitable, growing, labor-intensive industry, tobacco attracted unskilled or semiskilled Jews of both genders at the expense of the traditional employment in textiles. In 1908, about 63 percent of the workers registered with the Tobacco Workers Syndicate in Thessalonica were Jewish men, and 90 percent of the workers in the cigarette-manufacturing factories owned by the tobacco monopoly were likewise Jews, primarily women.

Whether self-employed or salaried, Jewish workers were prominent in the overland and maritime transport industries, involving carriages and carts ( $n = 500$ ), porters ( $n = 600$ ), seamen and stevedores ( $n = 400$ ). Guilds of Jewish porters, which survived dissolution of other guilds in the Ottoman Empire during the 19th century, monitored competition within the Jewish economy by means of internal allocation of storage areas.

Jewish preference for menial jobs in the port was attributable to the relatively high wages received, which was a result of personnel shortages in the face of growing demand for labor. The control Jewish traders exercised over trade passing through the port facilitated entry of Jewish workers. Concurrently, the Ottoman regime preferred to employ loyal Jewish port workers because of the Turkish public's mistrust of local Greeks, who were suspected of cooperating with Greek nationalists intent on annexing the port. Furthermore, Jewish labor was in sufficient supply, had diversified experience in maritime labor and trade, and had managerial skills and knowledge of Western languages. These qualities allowed the Jewish minority to dominate the full range of occupations needed by the port. Jews thus exercised horizontal control over activities associated with international trade and vertical control over entrepreneurial investment. This was accomplished through supply of commercial services (e.g., customs, insurance), including unloading and delivery before transport.

Selected Bibliography

- Dumont, Paul. 1979. "The Social Structure of the Jewish Community of Salonica at the End of the Nineteenth Century." Southeastern Europe 5 (2): 33–72.
- Issawi, Charles. 1982. "The Transformation of the Economic Position of the Millets in the Nineteenth Century." In Christians and Jews in the Ottoman Empire: The Functioning of a Plural Society, vol. 1, edited by B. Braude and B. Lewis, 262–285. New York: Holmes & Meier.
- Meron, Orly C. 2005. "The Jewish Economy of Salonica (1881–1912)." Jewish Journal of Sociology 47 (1 and 2): 22–47.
- Meron, Orly C. 2005. "Jewish Entrepreneurship in Salonica during the Last Decades of the Ottoman Regime in Macedonia (1881–1912)." In Frontier of Ottoman Studies: State, Province, and the West, vol.1, edited by Colin Imber, 265–286. London: I. B. Tauris.
- Quataert, Donald. 1993. "Premières fumées d'usines" [The First Smoking Chimneys of the Factories]. In Salonique, 1850–1918: La ville des juifs et le réveil des Balkans [Salonica, 1950–1918: The Jewish Metropolis and the Balkan Revival], edited by Gil Veinstein, 177–194. Paris: Éditions Autrement.
- Quataert, Donald. 2002. "The Industrial Working Class of Salonica, 1850–1912." In Jews, Turks, Ottomans—A Shared History, the Fifteenth through the Twentieth Century, edited by Avigdor Levi, 194–211. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press.

Jews in Italy

Steve Hall and Shoshannah Zirkin

---

General Population: 57,226,000

Jewish Population: 29,400

Percent of Population: 0.5 percent

Jewish Population by City: At present, the Italian Jewish population is concentrated in Rome (15,000) and Milan (10,000). Smaller communities exist in Turin (1,600), Florence (1,400), and Leghorn/Livorno (1,000). Several hundred Jews also reside in Bologna, Genoa, Trieste, and Venice; and smaller numbers of Jews can be found in Alessandria, Ancona, Asti, Ferrara, Gorizia, Mantua, Merano, Modena, Naples, Padua, Parma, Perugia, Pisa, Siena, Spezia, Vercelli, Verona, Viareggio, and Casale Monferrato.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Eastern European Immigrants after World War II and approximately 3,000 Libyan immigrants in the late 1960s and early 1970s.

Languages Spoken: Italian

---

Historical Overview

161 BCE The first Jews to travel to Rome are the envoys of Judah Maccabee.

66 BCE The Israelites' migration to Rome continues when Israel is conquered by Rome.

100 CE Western Europe's oldest known synagogue is established at Ostia.

212 Emperor Caracalla establishes new standards of Roman citizenship, including, for Jews, property ownership, benefits, and taxations.

312 Italy is conquered by Constantine, and Christianity is promoted throughout the lands. Under Constantine, the Roman Church begins to develop anti-Semitic convictions.

5th century Various anti-Semitic laws are passed, including restrictions on Jewish dwellings and clothing, the holding of public office, the repeal of the right to own slaves, and bans on the opening of synagogues.

600 The Catholic Church uses anti-Semitic restrictions and incentives for conversion to encourage Jews to adopt Christianity.

825 The Charter of Protection to Jews is issued by the Holy Roman emperor, resulting in Jewish trade and looser political restrictions.

10th century The early manifestations of Yiddish appear, as result of communication with German speakers. Kalonymus and R. Moses of Lucca, in northern Italy are said to have been the pioneers of Ashkenazi Jewry, when they move to Mainz, though historian Thietmar von Merseburg has suggested this may be attributable to Otto II (973–983), who was saved in a battle with the Saracens by Kalonymus.

1179 The Third Lateran Council adopts measures to prevent Jews from attaining status in Italian society; Jewish converts to Christianity are allowed to have possessions.

1215 Canons issued by the Fourth Lateran Council force Jews to live in separate quarters from Christians and wear a mark on their clothing, ban Jews from

- holding public office, and forbid Christians to pay interest on loans from Jews.
- 1240 The Italian Talmudist, Zedekiah ben Abraham Anav, details the liturgy and holiday customs of Roman Jews, which are distinct from those of Ashkenazi and Sephardic Jews
- 1288 The first expulsion of Jews takes place in south Italy.
- 1290–1293 A campaign to convert Jews in southern Italy decimates the Jewish community in Naples.
- 1300 Around 15,000 Jews live on the Italian Peninsula.
- 1399 To solve the problems of anti-Jewish measures throughout Italy, Italian Jewish synods are established and used throughout the 15th and 16th centuries.
- 1416 Jews from Forli and Bologna stand up to Franciscan anti-Semitic propaganda; later, Pope Martin (1417–1431) will make efforts to control the Franciscans.
- 1442 Further Diaspora movement to other areas of Italy becomes inevitable after Pope Eugenius IV issues anti-Semitic edicts.
- 1464–1492 Lorenzo Il Magnifico of Florence offers Jews official protection and supports Jewish scholarship. Under his leadership, the city experiences a renaissance of Jewish activity, including the creation of the chair of Hebrew at the University of Bologna and the revival of the use of Hebrew for theological and secular research.
- 1470s–1480s In Calabria and Pieva da Sacca, the first two Hebrew presses are established, while others are set up in Mantua and Naples. Later in 1480, the Soncino family opens Hebrew presses throughout Italy, leading to the first complete edition of the Hebrew Bible, by Abraham ben Hayyim.
- 1491 As part of their efforts to expel all the Jews from Ravenna, Franciscan and Dominican friars destroy synagogues.
- 1492 The Spanish possessions of Sicily and Sardinia are included in the expulsion of Jews from the Iberian Peninsula. Most refugees from the Spanish expulsions head for Italy, specifically Venice, Leghorn, and Rome.
- 1494 When Italy is invaded by France, the Jews of Florence are expelled and the Medici are dethroned.
- 1495 Charles VIII of France's occupation of the Kingdom of Naples leads to new levels of persecution of Jews; two major expulsions later take place, in 1510 and 1541, under King Ferdinand of Spain.
- 1513 Jews are allowed to return to Florence.
- 1516 The ghetto of Venice is established.
- 1529 Scuola Grande Tedesca, the oldest synagogue in Venice, opens.
- 1537–1570 Under Cosimo I of Florence, Jews enjoy four decades of prosperity and growth.
- 1541 Jews are granted permission to reside in Venice, but are expelled from Naples.
- 1550s The Catholic Church declares that the Talmud is anti-Christian. It orders thousands of copies of Jewish religious texts to be burned in cities throughout the Italian Peninsula, and places restrictions on the printing of Hebrew books. Pope Paul IV imposes economic restrictions on Jews and requires them to live in ghettos.

- 1569 There is a further expulsion of Jews from the Papal States, with the exceptions of Rome and Ancona.
- 1570 Cosimo trades his protection of the Jews for the title of Grand Duke of Tuscany, thereby establishing the ghetto in Florence.
- 1573 In the ghetto of Rome, the Cinque Scole Synagogue is erected.
- 1593 When Jews are expelled from all the Papal States save Rome, Avignon, and Ancona, they are invited to settle in Leghorn in Tuscany.
- 1597 Nine hundred Jews are expelled from Spanish-controlled Milan.
- 1616 Modena's The History of the Hebrew Rites provides non-Jews with a systematic description of Jewish customs and is said to be one of the earliest attempts to do so. Eventually, it is translated into English, French, Dutch, and Latin.
- 1808 Jews are freed from the ghetto of Florence under Napoleon but are forced to return in 1815, when the House of Lorraine is restored.
- 1848 The Piedmontese constitution leads to the full emancipation of the Jews of northern Italy.
- 1860 The Alliance Israelite Universelle is established as the first modern international Jewish organization; its mission is to defend the civil rights and religious freedom of Jews in all across the globe.
- 1861 Italy is united, Jews are emancipated, and their ghettos are abolished.
- 1890 Florence's ghetto is demolished, and the town center undergoes renovations.
- 1902 Italian-Jew Giuseppe Ottolenghi is named minister of war, eventually rising to the rank of lieutenant general.
- 1904 Rome's Great Synagogue is built.
- 1930 As part of Italy's new legal practice, the legal status of Italian Jewish communities is standardized, Jews are required to join the Union of Italian-Jewish Communities, local leaders must now be elected, mandatory contributions are established, the role of rabbis is defined, and the law decrees that the community is subject to the protection and supervision of the state.
- 1930s Between April 1933 and May 1939, 5,000 Jews emigrate from Germany to Italy.
- 1938 Racial laws are passed against Jews in September. The Italian government bars Jews from studying or teaching in educational institutions of higher learning and revokes citizenship of foreign Jews obtained after January 1919. Their expulsion is ordered within six months. In later November, marriage between Jews and Aryans is prohibited, and Jews are excluded from military and civil administrative positions.
- 1939–1945 During World War II, the fascist Italian government and military frequently stand up to German demands to hand over Jews. In 1943, Italy switches sides and joins the Allies, after which German forces on Italian soil commit numerous atrocities and deport Jews. The number of Italian Jews who perish during the war numbers more than 7,000.
- 1956 A Jewish museum is opened in Venice.
- 1962 The Leghorn Synagogue, destroyed during World War II, is rebuilt.
- 1993 The Vatican and Israel establish formal diplomatic ties.

Contemporary Overview

Religious Denominations

Most Jewish temples in Italy are Sephardi. Over the past two millennia, a distinct tradition of prayer, similar to the Sephardi and Ashkenazi traditions called the Nusach Italki, or Italian rite, developed within Italy's Jewish community. This tradition has its own order of prayer and song and is followed in many synagogues throughout Rome, including the Great Synagogue.

The chief rabbi of Israel runs the Great Synagogue of Rome. He also heads the country's rabbinical council. Pope John Paul II's visit to the Great Synagogue of Rome in 1986 marked a new beginning in the relationship between Italian Jewry and the Vatican.

Jewish Education and Communal Institutions

Jewish educational institutions exist in Rome, Milan, Florence, Genoa, Livorno, and Trieste. More than 60 percent of Jewish children in Italy attend Jewish primary school, but most community members choose to send children to secular schools for secondary education. Schools of advanced studies, including rabbinical study, are present in Rome, Turin, and Milan.

In Rome, the Unione delle Comunita Ebraiche Italiane is directly involved in providing religious, cultural, and educational services for the Jewish community.

Great Synagogue in Rome. (Hedda Gjerpen)

One of the union's major projects was the organization of a five-year program for Jewish-Zionist education. To make this program possible, the union worked in conjunction with the cooperation of the Education Department, the Torah Education Department of the Joint Authority, the Pincus, and Joint Funds. Together they established seminars and in-service training for Hebrew language and Jewish studies. Seminars are held in both Italy and Israel. This program provides high school students with the opportunity to spend two months of the school year at the Yemin Orde youth village, studying Hebrew and enriching their Jewish/Zionist studies. The same organization offers a two-year training program for Italian preschool and elementary school teachers. The program includes 8–10 hours of weekly training in Italy, seven weeks of study in Israel, and four annual seminars in Italy lasting 7–10 days each. There are two guest lecturers from Israel at each seminar.

In addition to its contributions to education, the Unione delle Comunità Ebraiche Italiane represents the Italian Jewish community politically. Although individual communities and associations are independent, they all maintain firm cooperative links with the Rome-based union. Until Israel and the Vatican secured a diplomatic accord in 1993, the union was a critical link between the Catholic Church, Israel, and world Jewry.

In addition, many of Italy's Jewish communities also produce regularly scheduled publications. Shalom in Rome, and Bollettino delle Comunità in Milan are both distributed monthly. Other publications are produced by independent organizations, such as La Rassegna di Israel, an academic quarterly.

International organizations, such as B'nai B'rith and the Women's International Zionist Organization, are active in major cities throughout Italy. B'nai Akiva and Hashomer Hatzair are two organizations that provide activities for youth. Other organizations help provide welfare and cater to cultural concerns.

There are also several branches of Chabad-Lubavitch in Italy. Locations include Milan, Rome, Trieste, and Venice.

Kosher food is available throughout Italy. There are kosher restaurants in Bologna, Florence, Milan, and Rome.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

At first, anti-Semitism did not characterize Benito Mussolini's Fascist movement. In fact, some Italian Jews were enthusiastic Fascists until Italy's alliance with Germany during World War II. Nazi pressure to implement discrimination against Jews was largely ignored. However, anti-Semitic remarks were prevalent in Mussolini's speeches, foreshadowing the tragedy that was to come. In 1931, there were 48,000 Jews in Italy. By 1939, nearly 4,000 were baptized, and thousands more chose to emigrate, leaving a mere 35,000 Jews in the country. During the war, Jews in Italy were interned in labor camps. Beginning in 1943, when the Germans effectively occupied northern Italy, the position of Jews grew significantly worse. German forces tried to deport Italian Jews east, to death camps in other parts of Europe, but they were largely unsuccessful because of the willingness of the Italian civilian population to protect Jews in danger. By the end of the war, 7,750 Jews had died at the hands of the Nazis and Italian Fascists.

Ladispoli, a small town near Rome, was used by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee as a transit for Soviet Jewish emigrants who sought refuge before the collapse of the Soviet Union. Since 1948, 4,170 Italian Jews have emigrated to Israel.

Instances of Anti-Semitism

In March 2002, a synagogue was vandalized with anti-Semitic graffiti and received two arson threats. The perpetrators opened a coffin and damaged headstones, including those with Hebrew writing and the Star of David.

Selected Bibliography

- Ben-Ghiat, Ruth. 2001. Fascist Modernities: Italy, 1922–1945. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Della Pergola, Sergio. 1972. Jewish and Mixed Marriages in Milan, 1901–1968. Jerusalem: Institute of Contemporary Jewry, Hebrew University.
- “Global Anti-Semitism: Selected Incidents around the World in 2002.” 2002. Anti-Defamation League Web site. http://www.adl.org/Anti\_semitism/anti-semitism\_global\_incidents.asp# (accessed April 22, 2007).
- “Jewish Communities: Europe: Italy.” 2004–2005. World Jewish Congress Web site. http://www.worldjewishcongress.org/communities/comm\_reg\_europe.html# (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Malissa, Elizabeth D. 2000. “Italy and the Jews—Timeline.” Jewish Virtual Library Web site. <http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/History/italytime.html> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Milner, Stephen J., ed. 2005. At the Margins: Minority Groups in Premodern Italy. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Minerbi, Sergio I. 2003. “Neo Anti-Semitism in Today’s Italy.” Jewish Political Studies Review 15: (3–4, fall). Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs Web site. <http://www.jcpa.org/phas/phas-minerbi-f03.htm> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Pugliese Stanislao G., ed. 2002. Most Ancient of Minorities: The History and Culture of the Jews of Italy. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
- Toaff, Ariel. 1996. Love, Work, and Death: Jewish Life in Medieval Umbria. Translated by Judith Landry London. Portland, OR: Newbury House.
- Wistrich, Robert S., and Sergio Della Pergola, eds. 1995. Fascist Anti-Semitism and the Italian Jews. Jerusalem: Vidal Sassoon International Center for the Study of Antisemitism, Avraham Harman Institute of Contemporary Jewry, Hebrew University.

Jews in Milan: 1535–1597

Orly C. Meron

---

The story of the Jewish population in the Duchy of Milan during the Spanish regime, until its expulsion by King Philip the II of Spain, is an important chapter in the history of the Italian Diaspora and, more broadly, the Iberian Diaspora. From the late 14th century on, the presence and regional distribution of the Jewish population in the Duchy of Milan was dictated by the Jew’s major current occupation:

moneylending and banking. Official recognition of this raison d'être, the temporary Charter of Privileges (condotta), was already granted to the Jewish bankers collectively by Duke Francesco Sforza II in 1533. It declared that Jewish bankers and their attendants—family members, servants, and agents—could live and work safely throughout the state. Although the Spanish authorities adopted the charter in word and spirit (1535), its scope was limited by Carlo V, who in 1541 forbade Jews to live in Milan, the Duchy's capital. The charter, continuously renewed until 1566, in lieu of a "reasonable" payment to the Royal Treasury, was afterward renewed sporadically and with limitations until 1591, when the Edict of the Expulsion was issued.

At the beginning of the Spanish period (1535), Jews settled in the Duchy's main towns (Cremona, Pavia, Lodi, Alessandria, and Como), which served as metropolitan centers for the outlying villages (contadi). Large banks opened in these centers; by means of their agents and underwriters, activities were extended to more than 40 outlying localities. Jews circumvented the ban on their residence in Milan, a major commercial center, by settling in a belt around the city. From their location in Abbiategrasso, Binasco, Monza, Melegnano, and Vigevano, they had easy access to the city, where their credit activities were based. The map of Jewish settlement, motivated by considerations of security and politics, was therefore reinforced by opportunities to make handsome profits from banking. The latter were achieved through perceptive integration into locations where Milan's commercial heart was beating.

Patterns of Jewish urban settlement demonstrate still another strategic reason for this choice: ready access to the entry routes used by potential customers, villagers entering the town from outlying areas. Because bankers worked mainly from home, it appears that they chose their residences according to the advice offered by the author of The Book of the Lender and the Borrower: Be close to the town center as well as near crossroads. So, despite the ineffectiveness of ghettoization in the Duchy, Jewish urban settlement after 1566 was characterized by concentration.

To illustrate this pattern, consider Cremona. In 1576, the Jewish population was concentrated in three main areas: around the city's new communal center, in the vicinity of the traditional town center proximate to the main cathedral, and at the entrance to the road connecting Cremona to Milan. The S. Sofia quarter, located near the communal center, is described as quite densely populated by Jews, to the point of their outnumbering their Christian neighbors; the census—the descrittione delle bocche ("mouths," i.e., the number of mouths consuming wheat)—lists 179 of Cremona's 307 Jews (58 percent) as residing in this quarter. Evidence supporting the recorded information's veracity is found in a complaint made by the local church rector in 1571. He states that urgent repairs to his church could not be undertaken because most of the parish's populace was Jewish; hence, the 100 ducats required to pay for the repairs could not be raised among the inhabitants.

In 1584, Jewish residential areas, with their fine houses, were considered to be the most elegant in Cremona. In April 10, 1597, on the eve of expulsion, Cremona's Jewish population had spread to the new urban center, close to the podestà, the Spanish local governor's palace (Table 5). With its high percentage of Jews, the S. Sofia quarter also housed a synagogue, the center of Jewish communal life. A similar pattern was observed in Pavia and Lodi, where Jewish residences were concentrated

Table 5 Distribution of the Jewish Population by Town, the Duchy of Milan, 1589–1590

Town	No. of Jewish Households	No. of Jews	Percentage of Jewish Population in the Duchy
Cremona	92	456	51.2
Pavia	23	123	13.8
Lodi	N/A	131	14.7
Alessandria	21	103	11.6
Casalmaggiore	10	71	8.0
Caravaggio	N/A	6	0.7
Total	N/A	890	100.0

Cremona, Lodi, Alessandria, and Pavia) and two smaller (Casalmaggiore and Caravaggio) communities. Attempts to confine Alessandria's Jews in a ghetto were opposed by the local Jewish community on the grounds that the site was less centrally located. Indeed, although the transfer of Jews to Contrada Correggio was completed in 1585, neither their ghettoization nor the intended special form of ghetto administration was realized. Moreover, the Jewish and Christian inhabitants of the town continued to share a common well and courtyard in the new quarter.

The only precise information available regarding the total number of Jews in the Duchy of Milan in the period considered pertains to the years 1589–1590. In spring 1589, the Spanish king asked the governor of Milan to write a report on the Jews living in the Duchy—their numbers and the benefits to be gained by extending their Charter of Privileges for 12 more years. The census of householders and their dependents, conducted by local authorities, recorded a total of 890 Jews living in the Duchy. This community constituted 3.6 percent to 4.2 percent of all Italian Jewry (estimated at 21,000–25,000 by 1600), whereas Milanese Jewry constituted 4.7 percent to 5.6 percent of all Italian Jews living outside ghettos. The average size of Jewish households derived from this census was about five persons, which agreed with known contemporary trends in family size encountered elsewhere in Italy.

Knowledge of the demographic characteristics of the Jews in the Duchy of Milan, like that of Jewish communities throughout Italy in the 1500s, is insufficient. These characteristics depended on mobility patterns materializing throughout the duchy, immigration of foreign Jews into the duchy, and conversions. Estimates of the size of the duchy's Jewish population during the earlier Spanish period and other points of time enable identification of the main trends appearing throughout the Spanish period. These estimates are based on partial lists, including census figures in which Jewish bocche were also tallied, Jewish bankers' lists, and partial lists naming Jews who stored wheat reserves. These lists generally exclude poorer Jewish residents. Two basic assumptions enable approximations of these figures: first, less prosperous Jews constituted approximately one-third of the Duchy's total Jewish population; second, Jewish households contained five members (see Table 6).

in prestigious residential quarters, in the city's center and close to the towns' major cathedrals, sites strategically chosen for their economic benefits. The premises rented by the Jewish community in Milan for use as a hostel by coreligionists coming to the capital on business were also located in the heart of the city.

The 1566 edict prohibiting moneylending led to changes in the distribution of Jewish residence. Smaller settlements were totally erased between 1566 and 1590. By the end of the Spanish period, Milanese Jewry was concentrated in four major (Cre-

Table 6 Temporal and Spatial Distribution of the Jewish Population, the Duchy of Milan, 1522–1600: Partial Data and Estimates (Absolute Figures)

Year	Duchy of Milan	Alessandria	Lodi	Pavia	Cremona
1522	450	–	–	–	–
1556	525*	–	–	–	–
1568–1569	–	–	–	–	158*
1571–1572	–	–	–	–	228*
1576	–	–	–	–	307*
1585	–	145	–	–	–
1591	–	–	–	–	400
1594	–	–	–	120*	–
1597	700*	170*	100*	60*	370*
1600	48*	25*	8*	–	15*

* Estimates.

Calculation of Jewish population concentrations in the Duchy confirms the overall trend: A moderate increase in population from the beginning of the period accelerated after the mid-1550s. From 1590 on, the Jewish population decreased until the expulsion in 1597, after which it reached an unprecedented low. These fluctuations demonstrate the connection between demography and the scope of Jewish banking.

Irrespective of natural increase, growth in Milan's Jewish population from the beginning of the Spanish period until the late 1560s was influenced by Jewish immigration. Rising demand for cheap credit, resulting from intensified commercial and industrial activity and simultaneous increased Church restrictions on Christian credit activity, encouraged Jewish bankers to migrate to the Duchy. After the 1555 Edict of Counter-Reformation restricted the interest rate to 12 percent and confined Jews to ghettos, Jewish immigrants from central Italy were drawn to the duchy, which was now ruled by the king of Spain. The king, considered an enemy of the pope, delayed the application of the Catholic reform edict in the duchy for a decade, until 1566; significantly, contrary to events in central and northern Italy, no ghetto was established in the duchy. Furthermore, within the duchy, the prohibition on Jewish moneylending proved to be only declarative. Formal termination of this service's provision, absent the availability of Catholic credit facilities, led to the search for legal loopholes that were designed to avoid the order's execution. Hence, Jewish credit activity continued—albeit disguised as trade in precious stones or the purchase of gold and silver on credit.

The Jewish refugees who flowed into the Duchy of Milan from the Papal State, as well as from Udine, Venice, and Tuscany, strongly influenced the ethnic composition of the local Jewish population, strengthening its Italian component while weakening its former majority, the Ashkenazi component. The terms moderni (“new”) for Italian Jews and vecchi (“old”) for Ashkenazi Jews thus began to appear in the responsa and in public records. Urbanization likewise brought internal Jewish migrants from the contadi flowing to the Duchy's main towns. A 1590 list of Jews from Cremona includes names such as Moise Como, Abraam Dina of Fontanella, Isaco Cremasco, Rafael Crema, Rica Monza, and Viviano da Bozzolo. This mobility should, however, be considered part of a general trend in the duchy, prompted by prohibitions on moneylending together with growing urban demand for credit in the wake of crafts industry development.

Housing shortages began to appear as growing numbers of Jews entered the Duchy's towns, particularly Cremona, which contained the Duchy's largest Jewish community. Although epidemics of plague (1576–1577) left their mark on the general population, they had little effect on the Jewish population, according to Hala-chic and notarial documentation.

Beginning in the early 1590s, the declining Jewish presence was inevitably the product of political and economic uncertainties. By motivating the establishment of a public bank (Bank of S. Ambrogio) in Milan in 1593 to replace credit facilities formerly provided by private bankers, including Jews, the Edict of Expulsion issued by the king of Spain in 1591 removed any formal justification for continued Jewish residence in the duchy.

Selected Bibliography

- Bonfil, Roberto. 1982. "The Settlements of Wanderer Jews in Italy during the Late Middle Ages." In Migration and Settlement in Israel and the Other Nations [Hebrew], edited by Menachem Ben-Sasson and Joseph Hacker, 139–153. Jerusalem: Zalman Shazar Center.
- DellaPergola, Sergio 1989. "Distribution résidentielle des juifs dans quelques villes Européennes et à Rome en particulier" [The Jews' Residential Distribution in Selected European Cities, Particularly in Rome]. Revue des Etudes Juives 148 (1–2): 69–92.
- Harris, Alan Ch. 1967. "La demografia del ghetto in Italia (1516–1797 circa)" [The Demography of Italy's Ghettos (circa 1516–1797)]. La Rassegna Mensile di Israel [The Monthly Review of the Jewish People] 33 (1–5): 1–68.
- Invernizzi, Carlo. 1905. "Gli ebrei a Pavia" [The Jews in Pavia]. Bollettino della Società Pavese di Storia Patria [Bulletin of the Pavese National Historical Society] 5: 191–240, 281–319.
- Meron, Orly C. 1990. "The Decline of Jewish Banking in Milan and the Establishment of the S. Ambrogio Bank (1593)—Were the Two Interrelated?" Nuova Rivista Storica [New Historical Review] 74: 369–384.
- Meron, Orly C. 1993. "Demographic and Spatial Aspects of Jewish Life in the Duchy of Milan during the Spanish Period (1535–1597)." In Papers in Jewish Demography 1989, edited by Uziel O. Schmelz and Sergio DellaPergola, 37–47. Jerusalem: Institute of Contemporary Jewry, The Hebrew University.
- Roth, Avraham Naftali Zvi. 1955. "The Book of the Lender and the Borrower Fallacy Related to Zecharia Pugliesi." Hebrew Union College Annual (Hebrew Section) 26: 39–74.
- Segre, Renata. 1973. Gli Ebrei Lombardi nell'età spagnola: storia di un'espulsione [The Jews of Lombardy during the Spanish Era: History of an Expulsion]. Turin, Italy: Accademia delle scienze.
- Shulvass, Moses A. 1951. "The Jewish Population in Renaissance Italy." Jewish Social Studies 13: 3–24.
- Simonsohn, Shlomo, ed. 1982–1986. The Jews of the Duchy of Milan, Vols. 1–4. Jerusalem: Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities.

Portuguese Jews of the Diaspora: Italy and Beyond

Joseph Abraham Levi

---

Just like the Netherlands, the self-governing city entities of present-day northern and central Italy—Ancona, Ferrara, Florence, Genoa, Livorno, Mantua, Modena, Padua, Pisa, Turin, and Venice—as well as the kingdom of Naples, Rome, and the Pontifical States, were relatively friendly toward the Jews residing in their territories, be they local or foreign, provided they paid their taxes and did not disrupt the overall peace of the state. The same would apply to Portuguese Jews and Marranos.

As for the expelled Iberian Jews, a few made their way to Naples where a few decades earlier a contingent of Sephardic Jews enjoyed protection from King Alfonso I of Aragon and Sicily (1442–1458). King Alfonso's successor, Ferrante I (1458–1495), though solely guided by economic factors, treated these Iberian emigrants very favorably. In 1469, and again in 1491, he in fact issued a decree granting all foreign Jews residing in his kingdom the same privileges that his Jewish subjects enjoyed. Needless to say, their freedom had a price: 1,800 ducats in exchange for the right of (permanent) settlement in his territory. They were thus considered full citizens of the land, entitled to assistance and care, especially after the 1492 expulsion from Spain. Among the most notable exiles to settle in Naples were Isaac Abrabanel (1430–1508), his sons Judah, also known as Leone Ebreo il filosofo (Leon the Jew, the Philosopher), Joseph, and Samuel, as well as their uncle Jacob Abrabanel.

Iehuda Leão ben Isac Abrabanel (ca. 1465–ca. 1521) was a wealthy physician who left Portugal for Spain in 1483, where he remained nine years before continuing onto Italy in 1492. His brother Samuel was highly regarded among the Jewish communities of the Diaspora. In fact Samuel Usque calls him “tremagisto,” that is, “three times master;” great in law, nobility, and richness. Judah's father, Isaac Abrabanel, took refuge in Toledo after the conspiracy against the Portuguese monarch, King João II. After living in Naples, Messina, Corfù, Monopoli, Genoa, Venice, Florence, and a few other Italian cities, Judah eventually settled in Padua. He is famous for his Dialoghi d'amore (Love Dialogues), written in 1535 and published in Rome. In 1484, Joseph Abrabanel, Isaac's nephew and son-in-law, also left Portugal for Spain. Between September 1492 and December 1494, Isaac Abrabanel was in Naples, where he held an important position at the royal court. In 1495, he visited Palermo, Messina, and Corfù. Between 1496 and 1502, Isaac resided in Monopoli. Only in 1503 he was able to reach Venice, where he soon established commercial ties between this city and Portugal. The ever-enticing spices were in fact at the core of any trade transaction. Unfortunately, his political maneuvering did not lead to anything. Isaac thus spent the remainder of his life devoted to his writings, particularly the exegesis of the first four books of the Pentateuch.

In 1593, the Grand Duke of Livorno, Fernando I, opened his doors to all the Jews of the Diaspora, granting them immunity from any persecution; pardon for crimes committed or allegedly committed in other countries before their arrival in his territory, as in the case of New Christian apostasy; no taxation; the right to vote; and, most importantly, the right to practice their faith in public without fear of retaliation. Portuguese Jews and Marranos thus began arriving in great numbers and soon contributed to the makeup of the local Jewish communities, covering areas as far as Pisa. Aided by the Portuguese Jews who came from Venice, the Sephardic community of Livorno soon became the prominent Jewish center of the entire southern part of Europe, rivaled only by Amsterdam in the North. The Santa Esnoga (Holy Synagogue) of Livorno became the home of a mixture of Portuguese and Italkian Jews. Undoubtedly, Portuguese Jews and New Christians contributed to the transformation of Livorno into one of Europe's most active cities and commercial centers of Europe. From Livorno, spices, corals, soap, silk, and woolen clothes made their way to the rest of the then-known world. Expatriated Portuguese Jews from Amsterdam also founded academic circles where poetry and science were discussed and analyzed. In a little over four decades the Portuguese Jewish community grew from 100 people to 7,000 members. The Portuguese language was, in fact, the lingua franca of trade, being used in all transactions down to the 18th century, when it was finally supplanted by Italian. The last known document written in Portuguese, dating from 1821, is a re-edition of an earlier publication governing the proper institution of the dowry. Most of the books, religious as well as secular, were printed in Portuguese or Spanish, with an occasional Italian edition/translation.

During this time of religious persecution, Ferrara was a known haven for many Sephardic Jews. Upon their arrival in Ferrara, the Usques openly declared their ties with Judaism, thus becoming active members of the Sephardic and Italkian communities. In Italy the Usque brothers established a Sephardic printing press, though it is still not clear if Samuel and Abraão were either brothers or close relatives. The Usques published their first book in Spanish in 1553, followed by the Jewish version of the Spanish Bible, prayer books for the Sephardic communities of the Diaspora, and, in 1554, Bernardim Ribeiro's Menina e Moça (Story of the Young and Innocent Maiden and Lass).

Bernardim Ribeiro (ca. 1475–ca. 1544) was a Portuguese poet and lyric writer credited with introducing bucolic poetry to Portugal. His work is a happy combination of three novelistic trends: the sentimental, the pastoral, and the chivalrous. His most famous work is Menina e Moça, by far the best example of the 16th-century Portuguese sentimental novel. The fact that Menina e Moça was printed by two Sephardic Jews of the Diaspora in Ferrara led some scholars to believe Ribeiro was most likely himself a Portuguese Jew or a converso. Menina e Moça is characterized by an almost complete lack of references to Christianity. Contrary to what seems to be the norm in Portuguese letters of the time, in Ribeiro's work there is no mention of or allusion to Jesus, Mary, or the myriad of saints that usually are seen in medieval and Renaissance Portuguese works. Similarly, when the situation calls for the inclusion of Christian rites, as in the case of weddings and funerals, once again, there are no references to a Christian, that is, Catholic, function. Perhaps Ribeiro was either an exiled Jew or was only visiting his coreligionists of the Sephardic Diaspora in Ferrara. As Samuel Usque does in his Consolaçam às tribulações de Israel, Bernardim Ribeiro perhaps uses his narration to vent his anguish and frustration over how the Sephardic Jews of the Diaspora, particularly the Portuguese Jews, had suffered.

The Usques were originally from Spain. Abraão Usque, whose secular name was Duarte Pinhel, wrote in Portuguese, whereas Samuel expressed himself better in Spanish. The Usques must have left for Italy in or around 1545, escaping the Portuguese Inquisition, perhaps with a copy of Ribeiro's work still in manuscript form. They eventually took refuge in Ferrara where Abraão opened a private printing shop. Between 1551 and 1557 Abraão and Samuel published many books and treatises on Jewish matters, religious as well as secular, including philosophical essays.

In 1495, the French invasions of Naples brought to an end to this brief, yet unparalleled time of tolerance. On October 26, 1496, Jews were officially expelled from the kingdom. However, a few Sephardic Jews were asked, or rather, forced to remain and/or to return and establish loan offices, which were obviously taxed. Jacob Abrabanel and his nephew/son-in-law Samuel were also appointed chief loan officers. In 1525, the Portuguese David Ibn Yahia, rabbi of the exiled Iberian communities, gave a detailed account of daily life on Italian soil. Only 16 years later, in 1541, Jews were finally expelled from the kingdom of Naples, though a few, most of whom were of Iberian origin, succeeded in remaining at Empoli.

In November 1492, Duke Ercole I d'Este allowed 21 Iberian Jews, expelled from Genoa, to enter and establish themselves in Ferrara. The Este family governed over Ferrara (13th–16th centuries) as well as Modena and Reggio Emilia (13th–18th centuries), the latter cities with important Jewish communities in their midst. Among the notables stand out rabbi Santo Abennamias, his Hebrew name being Shem tov Nahmias, as well as two very famous physicians, Ferrer el Levi and Rabbi David Marich. Portuguese Jews and Marranos enjoyed protection under Ercole I, Alfonso I, and Ercole II d'Este. Their favorable attitude toward the Jews appears to be a family tradition. Their ancestor and founder of the dynasty, Duke Borso I, also sought and obtained from Pope Paul II (1464–1471) full absolution for all Jews residing in his territories. Mantua was also a chosen site for many Sephardic Jews who chose to live in the territories of rulers who were sympathetic with the Jewish cause, as in the case of the Gonzaga family (1328–1708).

In 1524, for example, Portuguese New Christians were allowed to settle in Ferrara and return to their ancestral faith freely. During the entire 16th century, this city was the most important center of Jewish life, where freedom of religious expression also contributed to the creation of a free printing press in Hebrew and/or Romance languages printed in the local vernacular or Hebrew characters.

This climate of religious tolerance continued even when the duchy of Ferrara fell under papal dominion in 1593. This was because most of the Portuguese New Christians were already first-generation Portuguese Jews; hence, they were born into the Jewish faith. Having never been baptized, they were thus, by law, immune from the Inquisitions—Portuguese as well as Italian.

Samuel Usque's fierce and unparalleled critique of the Inquisition, Consolação às Tribulações de Israel (Consolation for the Tribulations of Israel, 1553), the 1553 Ferrara Bible, and the 1554 publication, in Portuguese, of Ribeiro's Menina e Moça, are just a few examples of the intellectual fervor that the Italian duchy enjoyed during the time. Considered by many as the most important Jewish literary piece ever written in Portuguese, this pastoral novel centers on the lament of shepherds and their speculations on a possible consolation from all the sufferings that befell the Jews.

Among the most prominent Portuguese names of 17th-century Florence are António Dias Pinto, a well-known jurist teaching canonical law at the University of Pisa, and the jurists Francisco Jorge and Duarte Pereira, the latter also known as Judah Lombroso.

From 1492 to 1570, the Italian Peninsula was the scene of Jewish migrations, internal and external Diasporas, that eventually led to a massive restructuring and changes in the “religious practices and attitudes” of the Italkim. These transformations influenced the demography and social-cultural makeup of Italian Jewry who, though never a monolithic group, had managed to keep a cultural Italic common denominator.

Already toward the end of the 13th century, and definitively during the first decades of the 14th, the Jewish communities residing in Italian soil saw themselves completely involved in the system of money-lending, both on a small and large scale. Given the papal prohibition against usury and money-lending practiced by Christians, Jews were gradually pushed into this profession, either willingly or unwillingly. At around the same time, many Italian Jews from Rome, the kingdom of Naples, and the regions to its immediate south, including Sicily, began to migrate north, particularly to the prosperous principalities, duchies, and city-states of Ferrara, Genoa, Livorno, Mantua, Modena, Perugia, Pisa, and Venice. Soon after, Ashkenazi Jews, French Jews, and Moroccan Jews also entered the Italian Peninsula, thus joining their Italian coreligionists in the profitable business of money-lending and establishing banking institutions from which they could perform all kinds of monetary transactions.

The Iberian Diaspora to the Italian Peninsula should be analyzed against this background. Regardless of their Iberian origin, the Italkim called their Portuguese and Spanish coreligionists Ponentini—that is, those who came from the west, or rather, from the land where the sun sets—if indeed they had arrived directly from the Iberian Peninsula. On the other hand, if they had entered Italy from the Ottoman Empire they were nicknamed Levantini, or those who came from the East, where the sun rises.

In the 16th century, the Italian peninsula was politically and geographically divided into three major areas: the Papal States, which ruled central Italy, including Rome; the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies, which, though officially part of the Aragonese crown, belonged to Spain; and Northern Italy, a mosaic of independent or semi-independent city-states, principalities, and/or dukedoms.

Italkim, Ashkenazim, Sephardim, North African Jews, and French Jews all contributed to the multi-composite nature of Italian Jewry at the time. Portuguese Jews and conversos were thus the latest stratum added to the mix. Needless to say, this living together was not always happy or desired, thus causing understandable rivalries and religious disputes.

In 1541, the physician Amato Lusitano (1511–1568), a Portuguese Jew of the Diaspora who had lived in Antwerp since 1534, accepted a teaching post at the University of Ferrara. Also known as João Rodrigues de Castelo Branco, Amato Lusitano was born in Castelo Branco and studied medicine in Salamanca. At the age of 18, Lusitano was already practicing medicine. In 1521, he returned to Portugal, but in 1534, for fear of anti-Semitic persecution, he left for Antwerp. Lusitano is famous for having detected the existence of valves in human veins, thus opening the door for further investigations on blood circulation. Lusitano wrote all of his treatises in Latin where he reports his observations and theories. He was fluent in Greek, Latin, and Arabic and was a firm believer in the direct observation of pure facts. During the latter years of his life, fearing for his safety, Lusitano eventually moved to Salonika, one of the major Portuguese-Jewish centers in the east, where he later died. Between 1549 and 1561, Lusitano wrote Centuriae, a seven-volume work where he expounds his medical theories based on firsthand observations of human bodies.

Lusitano performed autopsies on real human corpses, and his lectures on anatomy were so renowned that even the Church and the Portuguese Crown were willing to overlook to his Jewish background. On many occasions Lusitano was in fact asked by Pope Julius III (1550–1555), his sister, and the Portuguese ambassadors to the Holy See, to cure them from their illnesses. By 1551, Ferrara had a Portuguese-Jewish cemetery; needless to say, the city had become the center of Portuguese presence in Italy, also owing to the migration of refugees from Ancona. In 1574, an anonymous complaint to the Portuguese Inquisition mentions at least 30 family members of Portuguese-Jewish origin residing in Ferrara. Their presence is put to an end in 1581, when Rome finally succeeded in forcing the city-state to take some action against them. A few remained, some were imprisoned, and the rest migrated northeast, finally stopping in Venice. In the 17th century, Ferrara still had more than 1,000 Portuguese Jews in its midst.

Toward the middle of the 16th century, Ancona and, later, Ferrara, became the receptacles of a sizable number of Portuguese New Christians. Given its geographical position, strategically located halfway between Venice and the Balkans/Ottoman Empire, the city of Ancona, in itself an important port on the Adriatic coast, was appealing to the Jews of the Diaspora, particularly Portuguese Jews and Marranos. Politically speaking Ancona was part of the Pontifical States, which comprised the following present-day Italian regions: Campania, Emilia Romagna, Marche, and part of Umbria. Therefore, before establishing long-term residence there Jews had to seek approval from papal authorities. In 1547, having already been in Ancona for 17 years, Portuguese Jews finally received permission from Pope Paul III (1534–1549) to reside in his territories. Pope Julius III (1550–1555) continued this policy of tolerance toward the Jews. Now more than ever Ancona prospered economically and socially, and the Sephardim partook in this affluence. Unfortunately, Pope Paul IV (1555–1559) ordered severe persecutions and autos-de-fé against all Jews living in his territories. In 1556, he devoted all his energies to the Roman Inquisition (established by the then Cardinal Caraffa, future Paul IV, in 1542), accusing the Jews of supporting the Protestant cause throughout Europe. With his July 12, 1555, Bull Cum Nimis Absurdum (Because it is Absurd), Pope Paul IV required that all Jews be confined strictly in ghettos and forced to wear special headgear.

On April 30, 1566, Pope Paul IV ordered all Portuguese Jews and conversos who settled in Ancona arrested and sentenced as criminals. Fifty were imprisoned and 24 were burned at the stake. Ironically, the Portuguese Jewish presence came to an end as a result of an economic embargo on the port of Ancona devised by New Christians Grácia Nasi Mendes (ca. 1510–1569) and her nephew José Nási (ca. 1524–1579).

Grácia Nasi was born in Portugal around 1510. From a New Christian family, she was baptized Beatriz de Luna. In 1518, Grácia married the New Christian Francisco Mendes, a prominent merchant and banker with numerous branches throughout Europe, particularly Holland. After the death of her husband in 1537, Grácia settled in Holland where she began her anti-Inquisition campaign. Her passionate desire to help exiled Portuguese New Christians took her first to Venice, where she was eventually denounced for her crypto-Jewish faith, and then to Ferrara, where she finally returned to Judaism and adopted the Jewish name Grácia Nasi. Toward the latter part of her life, in 1553, Grácia finally settled in Constantinople (Istanbul) dedicating the rest of her life to helping the Portuguese and Spanish communities of the Sephardic Diaspora. Her nephew and son-in-law, José Nási, was also of a Marrano family; his Christian name was João Micas. In Holland, José studied at the University of Louvain and worked at one of the family banks. Before joining his aunt in Constantinople, José also lived in France. In Istanbul, José's reputation soon reached the ears of the authorities, particularly the attributes regarding his moral integrity. Sultan Süleyman II, the Magnificent (1494–1566), who ascended the throne in 1520, in fact nominated José to be duke of the Isle of Naxos and, thanks to his aunt's intercessions, entrusted him with the construction of a rabbinical school on the Isle of Tiberius, which was completed in 1565. On Tiberius José also planted mulberry trees, a move that was instrumental in establishing the silk industry. José kept his title until his death in 1579. His legacy was continued by another Portuguese Jew, Ibn Yaish, also known as Salomão Abenais, a very wealthy merchant of the area

With the help of the Ottoman Empire the Portuguese succeeded in imposing a boycott of the city and conveying all business transactions to the nearby port of Pesaro. Both the Christians and Jews living in Ancona, most of whom were traders relying on overseas commerce, suffered from this economic drawback. As a way of recovering from their huge losses, Portuguese Jews and Marranos decided to leave Ancona heading north to Ferrara and, when this city was annexed to the Papal States in 1593, then to Venice, by far the most important center of Jewish culture—Italkian as well as Sephardim—in the entire Italian Peninsula.

Unlike her sister cities in Italy, Venice offered the Portuguese Jews and (former) Marranos freedom of worship and a relatively safe place where they could establish permanent residence, that is, the ghetto, a separate section of the city, away from the city proper. The word “ghetto” was apparently first used in 1516 in Venice. One of the city's islands had an old foundry, which was called, in Venetian, gheto. There are, however, many controversies as to the veracity of this account and the exact etymology of the word “ghetto.” In all likelihood the Venetian gheto derives from the Latin jacto, meaning “throwing” or “I throw.” Its equivalent in standard Italian is getto.

The Venetian ghetto soon became the model for many Sephardic communities of the Diaspora, from Amsterdam, London, and North Africa to the Balkans and the Americas. The ghetto was composed of Sephardim who, in their turn, were divided into Ponentini (Westerners)—that is, Portuguese and Spanish Jews who arrived from the West—and Levantini (Eastern), that is, Sephardic Jews who came to Venice from the east, mainly Constantinople, Corfù, and Salonika (Thessalonica). Both groups were deeply involved in Venice's lucrative maritime trade. Their synagogue was in a sense a manifesto to their role and prestige within Venetian society. Rabbis, doctors, philosophers, writers, scientists, and wealthy merchants all contributed to the renaissance of Portuguese Jewry outside Portugal. By 1541, the Ponentini and the Levantini were in the Ghetto Vecchio, and the Ghetto Nuovo was set aside for the increasing number of Ashkenazim of German, Hungarian, Romanian/Moldavian, and/or Slavic stock who were making Venice their safe haven. Of all the "foreign" Jews residing in Venice, the exiled Portuguese and Spanish soon became the most numerous and, because of their expertise in trade, the most prosperous, mainly thanks to their commercial ties with the Ottoman Empire.

Venice's role as the center of Portuguese Jews and Marranos was however being challenged by Livorno, soon to be followed by Pisa, Modena, and Reggio Emilia. Charters were quickly drawn by their respective rulers to attract Ponentini to settle in their dominions, continue performing their business transactions as usual, and, at the same time, enjoy full religious freedom, including the right to erect new synagogues.

On July 10, 1593, with the Livornina Chart, the Grand Duke of Tuscany, Ferdinand I, declared the city-port of Livorno a free zone, a place where people from all religious, racial, and ethnic backgrounds could live and work freely without fear of persecutions, including the Inquisition(s).

It is obvious, then, that the Grand Duke of Livorno was specifically inviting into his territories Portuguese and Spanish Marranos who by this time were already residing in nearby city-states, principalities, and Pontifical State possessions, namely, Ancona, Ferrara, Pisa, and Venice. In doing so, Ferdinand I was following in the footsteps of his father, who extended similar privileges to Ottoman Muslims in 1551, as well as other rulers of the Peninsula, including Duke Ercole II d'Este and the duke of Savoy who, respectively in 1550 and 1572, guaranteed protection for the Marranos who chose to live in their midst. In less than 50 years Livorno saw its Jewish population grow in numbers never before seen, and it soon rivaled Amsterdam for prestige and economic weight. Economically speaking, Livorno also became one of the major trading centers of the Mediterranean, the linking point between northern and western Europe from one side, and the Levant from the other. Because of the overwhelming presence of Portuguese Jews and Marranos in the area, Portuguese became the official lingua franca for the entire Mediterranean basin area—from the Tyrrhenian and the Adriatic to the Ionian and the Aegean—as well as the trading centers of northern Europe, position it held into the middle of the 19th century, when all trade transactions gradually stopped being conducted solely in Portuguese. Religiously speaking, Portuguese had to compete with Spanish as the sacred language of the Sephardic communities in Italy. Services were conducted in either or both Iberian languages; burial tombstones also bore witness to this predilection for the Sephardic element. The Judeo-Portuguese and Judeo-Spanish secular hold on local Italkian traditions and values was also pervasive and all-encompassing, imposing itself over the local and foreign Jewish communities for a little over 200 years, that is, approximately until 1715, when it was finally supplanted by Italian.

Until the end of the Renaissance, the three branches of Judaism residing in Italian soil, namely, the Sephardic/Oriental, the Ashkenazi, and the autochthonous Italkim, usually referred to as the tre nazioni (the three nations), lived side by side, at times interacting, but most of the times at odds with one another. During the last two decades of the 16th century, though, some signs of fusion and assimilation appeared. In a short time these diverse Jewish peoples finally seemed to converge into mainstream Italian Jewry. Once the linguistic barrier was broken, the cultural and ritual differences soon followed suit.

During the first decades of the 17th century, a few European centers, particularly those connected to international trade, saw an unparalleled increase in Jewish population. Cities like Amsterdam, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Prague, and Venice, as well as the Italian principalities of Livorno and Mantua, were literally inundated by Jewish merchants and their families. Most of them were Portuguese Jews and/or former Portuguese New Christians who, while living in the Ottoman Empire, reverted to Judaism without fear of retaliations. In 1629, Portuguese New Christians were finally allowed to travel without any restrictions. Portuguese Jews in Italy thus followed the fate of their Italian coreligionists not only in matters of faith but also in an economical sense: trade and business with the rest of the world. Given its central position in the Mediterranean, the city-states of the Italian Peninsula encouraged their Jewish citizens to establish commercial ties with the East, mainly the Ottoman Empire; the West, namely, the Iberian Peninsula and northern Europe; and the southwest. North Africa and, beyond the sea, the Americas were additional places where Italkim and Sephardic Jews of the Nação Portuguesa took their economic expertise and incredible survival skills. Italian and Portuguese Jews both contributed to the passage from Renaissance Europe, initiated by the Italian city-states, to the modern age of mercantilism, which was only possible with the aid of the Portuguese New Christians. It was in fact from cities like Livorno, Venice, and Ferrara that Portuguese Jews and Marranos reached the New World, thus opening new doors for international and transatlantic trade, which continued uninterrupted for three centuries.

Selected Bibliography

- Altabé, David Fintz. 1993. Spanish and Portuguese Jewry. Before and after 1492. Brooklyn, NY: Sepher-Hermon Press.
- Barnett, Richard David, and Walter Manfred Schwab, eds. 1989. The Sephardi Heritage: Essays on the History and Cultural Contribution of the Jews of Spain and Portugal. Vol. 2. Grendon, UK: Gibraltar Books.
- Finkelstein, Louis, ed. 1960. The Jews. Their History, Culture, and Religion, 3rd ed. 2 vols. New York: Harper and Row.

- Finn, James. 1841. Sephardim; or, the History of the Jews in Spain and Portugal. London: J.G.F. and J. Rivington.
- Gubbay, Lucien, and Abraham Levy. 1992. The Sephardim: Their Glorious Tradition. From the Babylonian Exile to the Present Day. London: Carnell.
- Katz, Israel J., and M. Mitchell Serels, eds. 2000. Studies on the History of Portuguese Jews from Their Expulsion in 1497 through Their Dispersion. New York: Sepher-Hermon Press.
- Levi, Joseph Abraham, ed. 2002. Survival and Adaptation. The Portuguese Jewish Diaspora in Europe, Africa, and the New World. New York: Sepher-Hermon Press.
- Levi, Joseph Abraham. 2003. "Bernardim Ribeiro." In Dictionary of Literary Biography. Portuguese Literature, vol. 1, edited by Monica Rector and Fred Clark, 259–267. Detroit: Gale Thomson.
- Milano, Attilio. 1972. Encyclopaedia Judaica, s.v. "Italy," vol. 9, 1115–1132. Jerusalem: Keter.
- Roth, Cecil. 1946. The History of the Jews of Italy. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America.
- Usque, Samuel. 1964. A Consolation for the Tribulations of Israel. Third Dialogue, edited and translated by Gershon I. Gelbart. New York: Bloch.

Jews in Luxembourg

Shoshannah Zirkin

---

General Population: 437,000

Jewish Population: 600

Percent of Population: 1.4 percent

Jewish Population by City: Approximately 80 percent of the total community resides in Luxembourg City. A much smaller community exists in the adjacent town of Esch-sur-Alzette.

---

Historical Overview

963 Luxembourg is founded by Count Siegfried.

1276 The first Jews to live in Luxembourg settle in Luxembourg City, the capitol.

1349 Jews in Luxembourg are blamed for the Black Death, massacred, and expelled from cities in Luxembourg and the surrounding region of Echternach.

1391 All Jews are officially expelled from Luxembourg and surrounding regions.

1405 Jews began to return to Luxembourg and established a small community.

1478 Jewish homes and property are pillaged and destroyed in a series of uprisings. All but two Jewish families flee the country.

1515 Fifteen Jewish families resettle in Luxembourg and the surrounding regions of Echternach and Arlon.

1530 With the exception of a small Marrano population, the Jewish community is expelled from the country again. This expulsion is strictly enforced, and no Jews resettle in Luxembourg until the late 18th century.

1808 Seventy-five Jews reside in Luxembourg.

1815 Luxembourg gains independence.

- 1823 The first synagogue is built in Luxembourg City.
- 1843 Samuel Hirsch is appointed the first chief rabbi of Luxembourg. He serves the community for more than 20 years.
- 1880 Luxembourg's Jewish population increases to 150 families, most of whom reside in an area called Gutland.
- 1894 The first Great Synagogue is constructed in Luxembourg City.
- 1899 The first provincial synagogue in Luxembourg is built in Echternach.
- 1927 The Jewish community numbers 1,171 individuals and continues to grow, largely because of Russian pogroms and the immigration of refugees from Germany.
- 1930 Approximately 4,000 Jews reside in Luxembourg and surrounding areas.
- 1940 Although neutral, Luxembourg is invaded by Germany. Local Volksdeutsche, ethnic Germans, aid the Nazis. Approximately 1,000 Jews escape to France and Portugal. Luxembourg remains under the control of a German military government for several months. On August 2, a Nazi civil government, headed by Gauleiter Gustav Simon, is established. By early September the Nuremberg laws are introduced to Luxembourg. Conditions for the Jews continue to worsen. On September 13, the Gestapo announce that Jews who did not flee would be deported on the following Yom Kippur.
- 1941 Approximately 200 Jews flee overseas, and 1,000 people are evacuated to the unoccupied zone in France. Most of those in France are later deported to concentration camps in Poland. About 850 Jews remain in Luxembourg. A political body called the Aeltesternrat der Juden is established to oversee the Jewish population. They are interned in a German transit camp, Fuenfbrunnen, not far from Ulfingen, a city in northern Luxembourg.
- 1942 Of the Jews held in Fuenfbrunnen, 127 are able to emigrate.
- 1943 Luxembourg is officially Juddenrein, cleansed of Jews, as the Jewish population is transported to the Chelmno, Lodz, Auschwitz, and Theresienstadt extermination camps. Only a handful of Jews remain in hiding. The synagogue in Luxembourg City is destroyed.
- 1944 The Allies liberate Luxembourg on September 9. Only 1,555 of the 3,500 Jews who lived in Luxembourg in 1939 survive the Holocaust. Of all the Luxembourg Jews who are deported to concentration camps, only 36 survive.
- 1947 Luxembourg votes in favor of the partition plan to create a Jewish state.
- 1949 Luxembourg establishes diplomatic relations with Israel.
- 1953 The government gives funds to help the postwar Jewish community build a new synagogue.
- 1959 Rabbi Emmanuel Bulz becomes the chief Rabbi of Luxembourg. In addition, the Luxembourg government receives 18 million Deutschmarks from Germany as compensation for losses suffered during World War II.
- 1998 Betty Preston establishes Luxembourg's first and only Reform Jewish congregation.
- 2002 Luxembourg establishes a commission to research material losses suffered by the Jewish community during World War II.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Luxembourg's Jewish community is small, but many Jews have achieved prominence within the larger professional community. Edmond Israel is the former president of the Luxembourg stock exchange. Alain Mayer once served as vice president of the Jewish community and is currently an active member of Luxembourg's Council of State.

Present Economic Conditions

Luxembourg voted in favor of the partition plan to create a Jewish state in November 1947. Two years later, Israel and Luxembourg established full diplomatic relations. Because of Luxembourg's small size, the Israeli embassy is located in Brussels. The Belgian embassy represents Luxembourg economically, and the Dutch embassy controls political relations.

Religious Denominations

Luxembourg's main synagogue is Modern Orthodox and located in the town center. Moroccan-born Rabbi Joseph Sayagh, who is believed to be the first Sephardic rabbi in Luxembourg history, conducts services in both French and Hebrew.

Betty Preston, an American expatriate, established Or Chadash, a small Reform congregation in 1998. Or Chadash holds monthly Shabbat services at the local Baha'i Center. Rosh Hashanah services are held at the Hilton Hotel. Each year, a guest rabbi comes from England to lead High Holiday services.

Jewish Education and Communal Institutions

The Consistoire Israelite is the community's legal representative to the government. The government finances this group, which is responsible for appointing the chief rabbi and one of the communal functionaries.

Luxembourg has only one kosher grocery store, Boulangerie Philip, which provides food for approximately 30 families. There is no local production of kosher meat, but such products are brought into Luxembourg from Brussels and Strasbourg.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

Emigrants from Germany fled to Luxembourg in the 1930s, increasing the Jewish population from 1,500 to 4,000 persons. Of these Jews, about 2,000 were deported and 690 were killed. Most of those who were not deported survived. Some fled to France, and a small number remained in Luxembourg and were looked after by Christian rescuers. Victor Bodson, the former justice minister and chairman of Luxembourg House of Representatives rescued approximately 100 Jews during the Holocaust by aiding them along organized escape routes. He was named Righteous Among Nations for his efforts. After World War II, approximately 1,500 Jews returned to Luxembourg. Most came to rebuild their prewar businesses. The government supported them financially. Since 1948, 84 Jews have emigrated from Luxembourg to Israel.

Selected Bibliography

- Jewish Communities: Europe: Luxembourg.” 2004–2005. World Jewish Congress Web site. http://www.worldjewishcongress.org/communities/comm\_reg\_europe.html# (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Sloame, Joanna. 2008. “Luxembourg.” The Virtual Jewish History Tour. Jewish Virtual Library Web site. <http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsourc/vjw/Luxembourg.html> (accessed April 22, 2007).

Jews in Malta

Tito Benady

---

General Population: 404,000

Jewish Population: Approximately 80

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Sephardi Jews from North Africa

Languages Spoken: Maltese and English

---

Historical Overview

- 870 Malta is captured by Arabs and the existing Jewish population continues to live on the island.
- 1091 Malta is captured by the Sicilian Normans, and the Jewish community is not disturbed by the change in sovereignty.
- 1283 Sicily becomes part of the Kingdom of Aragon and subsequently Spain.
- 1492 Jews are expelled from Spanish territories, including Malta.
- 1530 The Emperor Charles V cedes Malta to the Knights of St John, and during the following two and a half centuries Jews are not allowed to settle on the island.
- 1798 Malta is captured by Napoleon, who expels the Knights of St John.
- 1799 The Maltese rise against the French with British assistance.
- 1800 The French on the island surrender, and Malta becomes a British possession. Jewish merchants begin to settle there shortly afterward.
- 1804 Anti-Jewish riots take place.
- 1815 A British Jews Committee is formed to regulate the community’s affairs.
- 1881 The Jewish community numbers 145.
- 1979 A new synagogue opens in Ursola Street.

Selected Bibliography

- Coburn, Kathlen. 1949. Notes on the Notebooks of S. T. Coleridge. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul.

- Davis, Derek. 1984. "The Jewish Cemetery at Kalkara." Miscellanies of the Jewish Historical Society of England 13: 145–170.
- "Malta." 2008. The World Factbook. CIA Government Web site. <https://www.cia.gov/library/publications/the-world-factbook/geos/mt.html> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Roth, Cecil, 1931, "The Jews of Malta." In Transactions of The Jewish Historical Society of England 12: 187–251.

Jews in the Netherlands

Shoshannah Zirkin

---

General Population: 15,575,000

Jewish Population: 30,000

Percent of Population: 0.19 percent

Jewish Population by City: Amsterdam (15,000) is the center of Jewish life in the Netherlands. Other sizable Jewish communities exist in Rotterdam and The Hague. Small communities reside in Amersfoort, Arnhem, Bussum, Eindhoven, Enschede, Groningen, Haarlem, Hilversum, Leeuwarden, Leiden, Utrecht, and Zwolle.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: During the 18th century, many Jews settled in Dutch colonial territories to participate in international trade. However, the Dutch were unsuccessful at establishing competitive trade routes. Towns in rural areas collapsed as people moved to larger cities in search of work. Small Jewish communities collapsed overnight, and the Jewish population of the larger cities grew exponentially. At the turn of the 18th century, the Jewish population in Amsterdam was 6,200; 100 years later, it had increased to 20,335.

---

Historical Overview

- 1100 The first Jews settle in the "low lands" (present-day Belgium). They are persecuted and expelled.
- 1349–1350 The Jews are accused of spreading the Black Plague and are violently persecuted. Most Jews are massacred, and those who survive are expelled.
- 1500 Amsterdam becomes a center of world trade and shipping. Many Portuguese Marrano merchants flee to the Netherlands to escape the Inquisition and pursue business opportunities.
- 1593 The Marrano population continues to grow, particularly in Amsterdam, as they are not permitted to live in Middelburg and Haarlem.
- 1603 The Netherlands officially recognizes one religion, Protestantism. The Jewish Marrano community is discovered, and the leaders of the community are arrested.
- 1608 A second Marrano community is established, which replaces the one forced to disperse five years earlier.
- 1618 The Sephardi community splits because of a disagreement concerning how liberal the community should be. This split is evidence that although life is fairly calm and anti-Semitism in the Netherlands is low, the Jews have internal community problems.

- 1619 The government is eager to repress the Jews, but the Dutch population is unwilling to participate as many Jews have become important traders and merchants. To limit the political rights of the Jews, a law is passed giving individual cities the right to dictate all matters concerning Jews in their territory. Amsterdam allows Jews to settle but prohibits them from holding citizenship. Most territories follow this example.
- 1620 The first Ashkenazi Jews arrive in Amsterdam as refugees from the 30 Years' War (1618–1648). They are very poor and quickly outnumber the Sephardim; however, many survive because of the generous aid granted by the Sephardic community.
- 1621 The Dutch West Indies Company is established, largely due to relationships between the Dutch and South America.
- 1632 Many Jews study medicine and law at the university in Amsterdam, as they are allowed to be doctors and lawyers. The city of Amsterdam passes a law excluding Jews from entering trade guilds, although exceptions are sometimes made.
- 1635 The Ashkenazi Jewish community is officially formed.
- 1656 Baruch Spinoza, a Sephardic Jew in the Dutch community is excommunicated after giving a speech on the nature of God from his book Ethics.
- 1780–1784 The Anglo-Dutch war leads to a great decline for the Netherlands and ends with French occupation of the country.
- 1796 A law is passed granting full civil rights to all inhabitants of the Netherlands. As a result, Jews are now able to reside anywhere in the country with no restrictions.
- 1799 In accordance with the new laws of emancipation, Jewish congregations, like Christian congregations, receive grants from the government treasury.
- 1806–1810 Louis Napoleon, who wants to create real equality for the Jews, rules the Netherlands. He implements several changes, such as moving market day from Saturday to Monday; however, his reign is too short to make a lasting impact.
- 1812 The Napoleonic government forces all Dutch Jews to register with civic authorities, and many Jews fight for the Netherlands at Waterloo.
- 1814 A law is passed officially ending the French regime, and the Netherlands is again an independent country. The Jewish population of the Netherlands grows steadily until World War II.
- 1939 As many as 34,000 Jewish refugees enter the Netherlands in attempt to flee Nazi Germany. Many reside in Westerbork, a shelter the Dutch government arranges for those fleeing Nazi Germany. The Nazis later use Westerbork as a transit camp to concentration camps elsewhere.
- 1940 Germany invade and occupy the Netherlands. They immediately begin to pass anti-Jewish laws forcing Jews to leave their jobs and quit their schools. At the time of occupation, 140,000 Jews live in Holland—1.6 percent of the total population.

- 1941 Thousands of ethnic Dutch hold a strike against the Germans to protest the treatment of the Dutch Jews. Although many ethnic Dutch aid the Germans in the deportation of Jews, this is the only protest of its kind held in an occupied country during World War II.
- 1942 A deportation plan is put into effect to remove all Jews from the Netherlands. It begins in the town of Zaandam on January 14. By October 2, more than 12,000 Jews have been deported.
- 1943 The deportation of Jews from the Netherlands increases. Most of these Jews are sent to Auschwitz and Sobibor.
- 1944 Deportations of Jews from the Netherlands ends.
- 1946 Approximately 30,000 Jews live in the Netherlands, only 20 percent of the prewar population. This is one of the lowest survival rates in all of the Nazi-occupied countries. The government pays generous reparations to the surviving community; however, a large number of Jews choose to immigrate to Palestine.
- 1948 The Netherlands establishes diplomatic relations with Israel.
- 2005 The prime minister, Jan Peter Balkenende, publicly apologizes for Holland's collaboration with the Nazis during World War II.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

During the golden age of the 1600s, many Jews, Sephardim in particular, contributed largely to the economic expansion of the Netherlands, helping the country become a world center for trade and commerce. Jews also took part in the tobacco, sugar refining, and printing businesses as well as medicine. Portuguese Jews were involved with international trade and shipping, and some of the wealthiest businesspeople held shares in the East Indies Company. Most importantly, the Jews held an informal monopoly on the diamond industry, not because others were prohibited, but simply because they were extremely successful at the craft.

The Netherlands experienced a sharp decline during the 18th century, and everyone, including the Jews, experienced tremendous economic hardship. However, the Netherlands regained its independence from France in 1814 and conditions began to improve. The Jews became involved with in the cotton industry and returned to the diamond industry.

Jews who lived in small towns outside big cities were usually involved in commerce, shopkeeping, and cattle trade/slaughter. Every town had a ritual slaughterer and inspector. Depending on the wealth of the community, they would also employ a rabbi, cantor, teacher, and scribe. Because the Dutch Jews were so successful, they integrated into society with less difficulty than elsewhere in Europe.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Amsterdam has many historical Jewish sites and museums. The Rembrandt House is located on Jodenbreestraat, and contains a sizable collection of works, including biblical scenes and portraits of prominent 17th-century Jews. The Resistance Museum has many sections of Jewish interest, and there is also a small museum at the Hollandsche Schouwburg, where Jews were held before deportation during World War II. The detention camp at Westerbork was preserved, and a memorial center was established. An old Jewish cemetery is preserved at Ouderkerk-on-the-Amstel.

The Jewish Historical Museum is located in four old Ashkenazi synagogues: the Great Shul (1670), the Obbene Shul (1672), the Dritt Shul (1700), and the Neie Shul (1730). Directly across the street is the Snoga, a famous Sephardi synagogue that has been used by the Jewish community since 1672. It has a magnificent interior with sand-covered floors. The Snoga houses a library, which contains priceless copies of scholarly works dating back to the golden age. Synagogues in Amsterdam, Middelburg, Rotterdam, and Breda have been restored. The most popular Jewish historical site is the hiding place of Anne Frank, which is located at 263 Prinsengracht and now contains a museum.

Religious Denominations

There are three councils of Dutch Jewry: Ashkenazi Orthodox (Nederlands-Israelitisch Kerkgenootschap, commonly referred to as the NIK), Ashkenazi Reform (Verbond van Liberaal Religieuze Joden), and Sephardi Orthodox (Portugees-Israelitisch Kerkgenootschap). The NIK has approximately 5,000 active members, who make up 36 congregations. Their presence is overwhelmingly larger than the other two councils of Dutch Jewry. The NIK has 10 synagogues in Amsterdam alone and an active presence in The Hague, Rotterdam, Amersfoort, Arnhem, Bussum, Eindhoven, Groningen, Haarlem, Hilversum, Leiden, Leeuwarden, Utrecht, and Zwolle.

Anne Frank House in Amsterdam.
(Feije Riemersma)

German-Jewish refugees introduced Ashkenazi Reform, or Liberal Judaism to the Netherlands in the 1930s, and it is the only denomination of Judaism currently experiencing growth. Six rabbis lead the community, and active synagogues are located in Amsterdam, Rotterdam, The Hague, Tilburg, Utrecht, Arnhem, Enschede, Almere, and Heerenveen. Approximately 1,100 Dutch-Jewish families are affiliated with a Liberal Jewish Synagogue.

The Sephardi Orthodox community is comparatively small, with about 270 families centered in Amsterdam. Another Jewish community, called Beit Ha'Chidush, was founded in the Netherlands in 1995. It was started by secular and religious Jews together in attempt to create a more open and diverse community. Rabbi Elisa Klapheck, the first female rabbi in the history of the Netherlands, leads the community. They have connections to Reconstructionist Judaism and Jewish Renewal as well as communities in Amsterdam and Groningen.

Historically, the Ashkenazi and Sephardic communities of the Netherlands co-existed and often intermingled. Cross-cultural influences and high rates of intermarriage resulted in a unique closeness not found elsewhere. As such, both sects of Judaism have adopted traditions from the other. For example, Dutch Ashkenazi Jews name their children after living grandparents. This tradition is common among Sephardim, but traditionally the Ashkenazi do not name after living relatives.

Jewish Education and Communal Institutions

Amsterdam has several Jewish day schools. The Ashkenazi community runs a primary and secondary school, and the untra-Orthodox community runs separate schools of its own. For those who wish to continue their studies, there is a seminary and an Institute of Jewish Studies in Leiden.

Many Jewish groups are active in the Netherlands, and Zionist activity is high. Rabbi Moshe Stiefel heads Chabad-Lubavitch in the Netherlands, which has locations throughout the country, including Almere, Amersfoort, Amsterdam, Haarlem, Maastricht, Rotterdam, The Hague, and Utrecht. These Chabad centers offer a variety of services, including adult education, Hebrew school, bar and bat mitzvah instruction, holiday awareness classes, communal lectures, kitchen koshering, circumcision, seniors visitation, hospital visitation, prison visitation, marriage preparation classes, funeral services, and Shabbat hospitality.

The Women's International Zionist Organization and B'nai B'rith are active. In addition, there are several other youth movements.

The Jewish community distributes two publications regularly. The Nieuw Israelitisch Weekblad is distributed weekly. The Studia Rosenthaliana is a biannual journal published twice a year by the Bibliotheca Rosenthaliana (the Judaica library of Amsterdam University).

There is a Jewish hospital in Amstelveen and Jewish retirement homes in Amsterdam and Scheveningen. Kosher food is available in Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and The Hague.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

Before the Holocaust, some 140,000 Jews resided in the Netherlands. Throughout the 1930s, the Dutch Jewish community was very active in rescuing people from Germany, and as a result, nearly 30,000 German Jews escaped to the Netherlands. As the war progressed, however, many Dutch people collaborated with the Germans, resulting in the death of nearly 100,000 Dutch Jews. In the years after World War II, more Jews from the Netherlands immigrated to Israel than to any other Western country. More than 10,000 Dutch Jews have immigrated to Israel over the past 30 years.

Selected Bibliography

- Brasz, Chaya, and Yosef Kaplan, eds. 2001. Dutch Jews as Perceived by Themselves and by Others: Proceedings of the Eighth International Symposium on the History of the Jews in the Netherlands. Symposium on the History of the Jews in the Netherlands. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- "Four Hundred Years of Dutch Jewry: Settlement of Jews in the Netherlands." Jewish Historical Museum Web site. <http://www.jhm.nl/netherlands.aspx> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Fuks, Lajb. 1995. Aspects of Jewish Life in the Netherlands: a selection from the writings of Leo Fuks. Edited and with an introduction by Renate G. Fuks-Mansfeld. Assen, Netherlands: Van Gorcum.
- Israel, Jonathan, and Reinier Salverda, eds. 2002. Dutch Jewry: Its History and Secular Culture (1500–2000). Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- "Jewish Communities: Europe: Netherlands." 2004–2005. World Jewish Congress Web site. http://www.worldjewishcongress.org/communities/comm\_reg\_europe.html# (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Katchen, Aaron L. 1984. Christian Hebraists and Dutch Rabbis: Seventeenth Century Apologetics and the Study of Maimonides' Mishneh Torah. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Center for Jewish Studies.
- Michman, Jozeph, and Tirtsah Levie, eds. 1984. Dutch Jewish History: Proceedings of the Symposium on the History of the Jews in the Netherlands (November 28–December 3, 1982), Tel-Aviv, Jerusalem. Jerusalem: Tel-Aviv University.
- "Protest Following the Dismissal of a Jewish Professor of Law (November 26, 1940)." Jewish Virtual Library Web site. <http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/Holocaust/dutchprof.html> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Shoyvitz, David. "The Virtual Jewish History Tour: Netherlands." Jewish Virtual Library. <http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/vjw/netherlands.html> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Wessels, Benjamin Leo. 2001. Ben's Story: Holocaust Letters with Selections from the Dutch Underground Press, edited by Kees W. Bolle. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press.

Jews in Portugal

Shoshannah Zirkin

---

General Population: 9,808,000

Jewish Population: 900

Jewish Population by City: Lisbon has the largest Jewish population and serves as the center for Jewish life. Small communities of conversos, people in the process of returning to Judaism, reside in Belmonte and Oporto.

Languages Spoken: Portuguese

---

Historical Overview

- 1139 Jews in Portugal enjoy protection from the crown. The Jews are recognized and respected. King Affonso Henriques entrusts Yahia ben Yahi III as royal tax collector. Shortly after his appointment, Yahia ben Yahi III becomes the first chief rabbi of Portugal.
- 1493 Jews without permanent resident status who fail to leave Portugal after eight months are declared slaves of the king. Approximately 700 Jewish children are separated from their parents and sent to live on the island of São Tomé off the west coast of Africa where they are converted to Christianity.
- 1506 Lists of Marranos, newly converted Christians who continue to practice Judaism in secret, are presented to the king, and 3,000 New Christians are massacred in Lisbon.
- 1540 The first trial of the Portuguese Inquisition is held. Newly every prominent New Christian family is tried and executed.
- 1654 Twenty-three Portuguese families flee to New York in an attempt to evade the Inquisition. They are the first Jewish settlers in the United States.
- 1765 The last public Inquisition trial in Portugal is held.
- 1821 A liberal revolt formally ends the Portuguese Inquisition.
- 1892 The Jewish community is officially recognized and Shaare Tikvah Synagogue is built in Lisbon on the condition that it does not face the street.
- 1912 The Portuguese Republic restores rights to the Jewish community. They were permitted to slaughter animals according to Jewish law; register births, deaths, and marriages; and collect money for charity.
- 1930 Arthur Carlos de Barros Basto, a Marrano Jew who converted to Orthodox Judaism at the age of 33, leads a brief resistance. He establishes a synagogue in Oporto encouraging Jews to rejoin their faith, and he travels throughout Portugal with two doctors who perform circumcisions.
- 1991 Portugal opens an embassy in Israel.
- 1993 A ceremony is held to commemorate the children sent to São Tomé Island.
- 1996 The government of Portugal officially apologizes for the forced expulsion of Jews in the 1490s. Portugal's president, Jorge Sampaio, joins Israel's Parliament speaker and members of the Catholic Church in marking the 500th anniversary of the expulsion. Events include the inauguration of a synagogue in the town of Belmonte, where Jews secretly preserved their traditions for centuries.
- 1999 Historian António José Telo, with the support of the Portuguese government, publishes a book about Jewish gold stolen by the Nazis during World War II that was smuggled into Portugal.

Contemporary Overview

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

The 13th and 14th centuries were the golden age for Jews in Portugal. Jews lived in separate areas called Judiarias. There were 135 Judiarias in various locations throughout the county, and each had its own synagogue, slaughterhouses, hospital, jails, bathhouses, and other communal institutions. Although Jews lived separately, they traveled freely throughout the country.

Religious Denominations

In the early 1930s, Arthur Carlos de Barros Basto established a synagogue in Oporto and encouraged Jews to rejoin their faith. The synagogue grew and eventually moved into a new building donated by Elly Kadoorie. Shortly after, another synagogue was established in Braganca. Basto also established a yeshiva in Oporto, which ran for nine years. Following Basto's lead, more than 10,000 Marrano families admitted that they practiced Judaism in secret. The government forced Basto to close the yeshiva, ending the Marrano resistance.

Jewish Education and Communal Institutions

The Comunidade Israelita de Lisboa is an organization that unites the Jewish communities throughout Portugal. There are active Sephardi synagogues in Lisbon, Belmonte, and Oporto, and one Ashkenazi synagogue in Lisbon. An ancient synagogue still stands in Tomar. The remnants of a Jewish quarter can be visited in Castelo de Vida as well as the old Jewish cemetery in Faro.

Kosher food is available in Lisbon and Belmonte.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

Since 1948, 248 Portuguese Jews have immigrated to Israel.

Selected Bibliography

- Adler, Elkan Nathan. 1908. Auto de fé and Jew. New York: H. Frowde.
- Benveniste, Arthur. 1997. "500th Anniversary of the Forced Conversion of the Jews of Portugal." <http://home.earthlink.net/~benven/annivers.html> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Bloch, Joshua. 1938. Early Hebrew Printing in Spain and Portugal, 1890–1957. New York: New York Public Library.
- Dias, Eduardo Mayone. 2000. "Crypto-Jews in Portugal—A Clandestine Existence." HaLapid, Winter. Society for Crypto Judaic Studies Web site. <http://www.cryptojews.com/cryptoJewsinPortugal.htm> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Edgar, Samuel. 2004. At the End of the Earth: Essays on the History of the Jews in England and Portugal. London: Jewish Historical Society of England.
- "Information About Jewish Portugal." 2003. International Survey of Jewish Monuments. <http://www.isjm.org/country/portugal.htm> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- "Jewish Communities: Europe: Portugal." 2004–2005. World Jewish Congress Web site. http://www.worldjewishcongress.org/communities/comm\_reg\_europe.html# (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Lindo, Elias Hiam. 1865. History of the Jews of Spain and Portugal, from the Earliest Times to Their Final Expulsion from Those Kingdoms, and Their Subsequent Dispersion; with Complete Translations of All the Laws Made Respecting Them During Their Long Establishment in the Iberia. London: Longman, Brown, Green & Longmans.
- "Resources." Saudades: Portuguese Sephardic History Web site. http://www.saudades.org/resource\_topics.htm (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Roth, Cecil. 1931. "The Religion of the Marranos," The Jewish Quarterly Review 22 (1): 1–33.

- Singerman, Robert. 1975. Jews in Spain and Portugal: A Bibliography. New York: Garland Publishers.
- Weiner, Rebecca. 2008. "The Jewish Virtual History Tour: Portugal." Jewish Virtual Library Web site. <http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/vjw/Portugal.html> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Yerushalmi, Yosef Hayim. 1976. Lisbon Massacre of 1506 and the Royal Image in the Shebet Yehudah. Cincinnati: Hebrew Union College–Jewish Institute of Religion.
- Zucker, George K., ed. 2005. Sephardic Identity: Essays on a Vanishing Jewish Culture. Jefferson, NC: McFarland.

Jews in Scotland

Nathan Abrams

---

General Population: 5,062,011

Jewish Population: 6,400 (2001 census)

Percent of Population: 0.13 percent

Jewish Population by City: Glasgow, 4224; Edinburgh, 768; Aberdeen, 150; Dundee, 33

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Dutch and German Jews arrive in the 1700s and 1800s; Eastern European immigrants, in the late 1800s and early 1900s. The majority are Ashkenazi, but a small proportion are Sephardic. Almost 87 percent of Scottish Jews were born in the United Kingdom. There has been a small immigration from the United States, the Middle East, other European Union countries, Eastern Europe, South Africa, and Ireland.

Languages Spoken: English

---

Historical Overview

- 1180 Individual Jews, such as financiers, have business interests in Scotland without actually settling there. The bishop of Glasgow passes an official regulation forbidding churchmen to "ledge their benefices for money borrowed from Jews."
- 1641 Julius Conradus Otto, a converted Jew from Vienna, becomes professor of Hebrew and Oriental Languages at Edinburgh University.
- 1665 A boatload of Jews is reported to have docked at Aberdeen.
- 1691 David Brown is given permission to trade in Edinburgh and becomes the first openly practicing Jew to settle in Scotland.
- 1700s Jewish individuals and families settled in Edinburgh. Sephardi Jewish doctors in England received medical degrees in absentia from Aberdeen's two medical schools—King's and Marischal Colleges. As they do not require religious oaths, they are the first universities in the English-speaking world to allow Jews to study and graduate in medicine.
- 1779 Joseph Hart Myers is the first Jew to study as an undergraduate at Edinburgh University and graduate with an MD.

- 1788 Herman Lyon, a dentist and “corn operator,” comes to Edinburgh from Prussia.
- 1790s The first Jews settle in Glasgow. They are predominantly Dutch and German merchants, furriers, and businessmen.
- 1795 Lyon obtains a burial plot for himself and his family on Calton Hill.
- 1812 Isaac Cohen, a hatter, who came from Manchester to Glasgow (which at that time had the largest hat industry in Europe) is admitted as a Freeman of the City of Glasgow in 1812.
- 1816 The first synagogue in Scotland opens in a lane off Nicholson Street in Edinburgh and serves 20 families.
- 1820 Scotland’s first Jewish cemetery opens in Braid Place (now Sciennes House Place) in Edinburgh. It is used until 1867 and contains around 30 plots.
- 1823 The first synagogue opens in the High Street in Glasgow in the tenement home of Moses Henry Lisenheim, rabbi, Hebrew teacher, and butcher.
- 1825 The synagogue in Edinburgh moves to a converted tenement in Richmond Court.
- Early 1830s There is a community of around 50 people in Glasgow.
- 1832 The first Jewish cemetery opens in Glasgow—a Jewish enclosure in the newly opened Necropolis, a prestigious burial ground overlooking the cathedral. The first burial in the Necropolis, of the quill-maker Joseph Levi, takes place the same year.
- 1833–1840 An independent congregation is formed in Richmond Court, Edinburgh.
- ca. 1834–1862 Rev. Moses Joel is minister, teacher, baker, and butcher to the small Jewish community of Edinburgh.
- 1838 A Jewish Philanthropic Society is formed in Edinburgh.
- 1840 German-Jewish textile merchants begin to settle in Dundee. They revolutionize aspects of the jute trade and play a vital role in the city’s civic and cultural life.
- 1878 A minyan is formed in Dundee and a synagogue opens.
- 1879 The Glasgow community is around 800 strong, and the first purpose-built synagogue in Scotland is opened in Garnethill.
- 1881–1917 Jewish settlement increases in Scotland as an influx of East European Jewish immigrants, fleeing religious persecution, discrimination, and severe economic hardship, many of them en route for America, settle there. Large-scale immigration is facilitated by the quicker and lower-priced mass transportation made possible by the railway and steamship. Jews looking for new places from which to conduct business and that offers a greater range of economic opportunities and competitiveness spread out in Scotland. Some choose to live in remote places, scattered and isolated throughout the Scottish isles, as far as Lerwick in the Shetland Isles.
- 1893–1917 Seven new synagogues are opened across Scotland.
- 1918 Dr. Salis Daiches becomes minister of the Edinburgh Hebrew Congregation. Under his leadership, which lasts 27 years, until his death, he unites the Edinburgh community into a single cohesive unit and becomes the spokesman for Scottish Jewry as a whole. His profound impact earns him the title of de facto chief rabbi of Scotland.

1922 Emmanuel (Manny) Shinwell is elected as the member of Parliament for Linlithgowshire. He serves until 1924 and is reelected in 1928.

1930s A small number of middle-class, affluent, educated, and assimilated German and Austrian Jews fleeing Nazism settle in Scotland.

1930s and 1940s At its peak, the Scottish Jewish community numbers some 15,000.

1945 The Scottish Jewish community begins to decline, and all but two (Aberdeen and Dundee) of those outside the principal cities closed in the postwar period. The Aberdeen Hebrew Congregation moves to new premises in Dee Street.

1981 The first recorded anti-Semitic incident takes place in Dundee. Swastikas are painted on the synagogue, shortly after Dundee is twinned with the West Bank town of Nablus.

1993 The Argyll and Bute Jewish community is established (later renamed the Jewish Network of Argyll and the Highlands) to connect those Jews (approximately 15–30) scattered in the more isolated regions of Scotland.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Former generations included peddlers, artisans, family businesses, shops, pharmacies, furriers, and middle-class businesspeople. The modern Jewish community has focused on higher education and professions. Jews became involved in most sectors of Scottish society, and there were no barriers to advancement.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Cultural and religious organizations have flourished. Jews are active in all sectors of Scottish society. The Scottish Jewish community has produced a number of important personalities in a range of fields, including the arts, politics, journalism, literature, and so on. These include Ronni Ancona, comedienne; Charlotte Auerbach, geneticist; Chaim Bermant, writer; Lady Hazel Cosgrove, judge; Ivor Cutler, poet; David Daiches, writer and literary critic; Hannah Frank, sculptor; Hannah Primrose, Countess of Rosebery, a Rothschild and a philanthropist; Harry Primrose, 6th Earl of Rosebery, son of Hannah Primrose, and secretary of state for Scotland in 1945; Jeremy Isaacs, broadcaster; Malcolm Rifkind, politician and secretary of state for Scotland, minister of transport, secretary of state for defense, and foreign secretary; Jerry Sadowitz, comedian and magician; Benno Schotz, sculptor; and Emmanuel (Manny) Shinwell, politician. A number of German Jewish émigrés also came to Scotland and were later to make their names, such as Emil Fackenheim, philosopher/theologian; Karl König, founder of Rudolf Steiner-Camphill schools; and Otto Hahn, founder of Gordonstoun School.

Present Economic Conditions

The Scottish Jewish community today has a relatively high socioeconomic standing.

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

The Jewish community in Scotland may be statistically small, but it nevertheless maintains a wide range of structures and services. Because the bulk of Scottish Jewry has clustered in Glasgow and its surrounding suburbs, much of the Jewish infrastructure is located in that region. Currently, there are six synagogues (five Orthodox and one Reform), a primary school, a yeshiva, a kollel, two nursing homes and sheltered housing for the elderly, a welfare center, facilities for those with learning difficulties, a golf club, a sports center, a community newspaper (the Glasgow edition of The Jewish Telegraph), youth groups, and two delicatessens. These services cover the range of Jewish identification and affiliation from Orthodox to Reform to secular, both assimilated and religious. Nonetheless, Jewish interests, irrespective of these factors, are looked after by the Glasgow Jewish Representative Council, founded in 1914.

Although Glasgow is often taken as a synonym for the whole of Scotland, Jewish life thrives outside of that city. In Edinburgh there are two synagogues (Liberal and Orthodox), as well as a series of welfare organizations (the Lunch Club, Edinburgh Burial Society, Board of Guardians, Ladies Guild, and Shul Events Committee), clubs and organizations (Parent & Toddler Group, Junior Maccabi, Senior Maccabi, Scottish Friends of Alyn, Council of Christians & Jews, Maccabi Cricket Club Jewish Community Centre, and Rambling Group). The Edinburgh Hebrew Congregation also has its own magazine (The Edinburgh Star) and literary society, founded in 1888, which is reputed to be one of the oldest in the United Kingdom. Elsewhere, Aberdeen and Dundee both have Orthodox synagogues. Aberdeen Hebrew Congregation runs a series of regular events, including Shabbat and Holy Day services, meals, lectures, and discussions, whereas Dundee Hebrew Congregation meets less regularly, as befitting a smaller community. Furthermore, the Jewish Network of Argyll and the Highlands seeks to maintain contact with Jews living in and visiting the west of Scotland. It provides a focal point for Jews to meet up periodically and discuss topics of Jewish interest. In addition, the universities of Aberdeen, Edinburgh, Glasgow, and St. Andrews all have student Jewish societies that meet regularly and include students from all over the world. They are served by a student chaplain based in Glasgow.

With the exceptions of the Reform and Liberal congregations, it is assumed that the bulk of Scottish Jewry is nominally Orthodox in affiliation if not in personal practice, as is often norm in Britain. Both Edinburgh and Glasgow possess a mikvah, Orthodox burial societies, cemeteries, and other institutions. Aberdeen and Dundee also have dedicated Jewish burial grounds. However, the available statistics do not allow for a precise analysis of rates of congregational affiliation. The 2001 census records a 0.2 percent difference between those who gave Judaism as their current religion and those who list it as their religion of upbringing and that only covers those who chose to volunteer such information. Furthermore, as a result of the difficulties and despite the best of intentions, Jews in Scotland do not and perhaps cannot always maintain a strictly Orthodox lifestyle and have made some compromises in their personal observance. It can be said with some certainty that some Jews do not participate at all and that intermarriage is a continuing feature of Scottish-Jewish life. What is more, as reflected the United Kingdom as a whole, numbers of Scottish Jews are declining both as a result of intermarriage and nonaffiliation but also as young Jews seek economic opportunities, a great Jewish infrastructure and social life, and a university education elsewhere (typically London). There is a strong Glasgow-Jewish Diaspora in North London in particular. Nonetheless, Zionist feeling and activity is strong in Scotland, and a number of groups are devoted to this cause (the Edith Wolfson Mizrahi Group, Friends of the Hebrew University, Habonim Dror, Glasgow Israel Committee, Jewish National Fund, Tel Aviv University Trust, United Jewish Israel Appeal, and the Women's International Zionist Organization).

All of these organisations fall under the umbrella of the Scottish Council of Jewish Communities, which is the representative body of all the Jewish communities in Scotland and of students studying in Scottish universities and colleges. It aims to advance public understanding about the Jewish religion, culture, and community, and it represents the Jewish community in Scotland to government and other statutory and official bodies, monitors the Scottish Parliament, and liaises with members of the Scottish Parliament and others on matters affecting the Jewish community. It also works in partnership with other organizations and stakeholders to promote good relations and understanding among community groups and to promote equality. The Scottish Council of Jewish Communities publishes a quarterly newsletter, Four Corners, for the smaller Scottish Jewish communities and organizes current issues briefings for professionals in the Jewish community.

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionism, and Existential Problems of the Community

In general, Jews have been treated well in Scotland, which prides itself on being one of the only European countries with no history of organized anti-Semitism. Although there has been bigotry and racism over the years, many Jews believe it is possible to write a history of Scotland without using the word anti-Semitism. This is undoubtedly overplayed, but there have been sporadic outbreaks of racism, most notably in Dundee in the 1980s and in Glasgow, as that is where most Jews are concentrated. Overall, however, the Scottish record of tolerance toward its Jews is a good one.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

The community is not growing, and many are emigrating to other countries, in particular England. Since 1945, the Scottish Jewish community has declined drastically. The drop in figures is due to a number of factors: an aging population; intermarriage; and emigration, as children move away to university in search of employment and/or a suitable marriage partner, or families with young children relocate to a location with a more developed Jewish infrastructure. The downturn in the Scottish economy after 1945 especially accelerated this migration away from the small communities toward the central belt and England, in particular, London. There are no accurate figures for assimilation.

Selected Bibliography

- Abrams, Nathan, and Kaplan, Harvey. 2006. "Jews in Scotland: Myth and Reality." The Edinburgh Star 53 (February): 3–6.
- Collins, Kenneth, ed. 1987. Aspects of Scottish Jewry. Glasgow, Scotland: Glasgow Jewish Representative Council.
- Collins, Kenneth. 1988. Go and Learn: The International Story of Jews and Medicine in Scotland. Aberdeen, Scotland: Aberdeen University Press.
- Collins, Kenneth. 1990. Second City Jewry: The Jews of Glasgow in the Age of Expansion, 1790–1919. Glasgow, Scotland: Scottish Jewish Archives.
- Collins, Kenneth. 2001. Be Well! Jewish Health and Welfare in Glasgow, 1860–1914. East Linton, Scotland: Tuckwell Press, 2001.
- Collins, Kenneth. 2005. "Maintaining a Jewish Identity in Scotland." In Scottish Life and Society: The Individual and Community Life. A Compendium of Scottish Ethnology, Vol. 9, edited by John Beech, Owen Hand, Mark Mulhern, and Jeremy Weston, 486–496. Edinburgh: John Donald Ltd.
- "Edinburgh Jewish History." Edinburgh Hebrew Congregation Web site. <http://www.ehcong.com/JewishHistory.htm> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- "Jewish Communities and Congregations in Scotland." Jewish Communities and Records—United Kingdom Web site. <http://www.jewishgen.org/JCR-UK/scotland.htm> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Phillips, Abel. 1979. A History of the Origins of the First Jewish Community in Scotland: Edinburgh, 1816. Edinburgh: Donald.
- "Scotland's Jewish Community—Reference Page." Jewish Genealogical Society of Great Britain. <http://www.jgsgb.org.uk/scot01.shtml> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Shields, Jacqueline. "The Virtual Jewish History Tour: Scotland." 2008. Jewish Virtual Library Web site. <http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/vjw/Scotland.html> (accessed April 22, 2007).

Jews in Spain

Shoshannah Zirkin

---

General Population: 39,647,000

Jewish Population: About 14,000

Percent of Population: 0.035 percent

Jewish Population by City: Spain's largest Jewish communities reside in Madrid (3,500) and Barcelona (3,500). Smaller Jewish communities are found in Ibiza, the Canary Islands, Malaga, Majorca, Alicante, Benidorm, Cadiz, Granada, Marbella, Majorca, Torremolinos, and Valencia.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Many Jews migrated to Spain in the years after World War II. These Jews came from Morocco, the Balkans, and other European countries. The most recent immigrant community of substantial size came from Latin America in the 1970s and 1980s.

Languages Spoken: Spanish

---

Historical Overview

- 589 The Visigoths, who rule the Spanish peninsula, adopt Christianity under King Reccared and their well-disposed attitude toward the Jews begins to change.
- 613 The Visigoths force the Jews to convert to Christianity or emigrate. As a result, many Jews begin to practice their religion in secret. If they are caught it is a serious offence, met by drastic punishment.
- 694 All of the Jews who fail to convert and remain in Visigoth controlled areas are enslaved.
- 711 Muslim Moors invade Spain, and the Visigoths lose power. The Jews are released from slavery and permitted to organize their own communities. The Moors rule Spain for eight centuries during which the Jewish community flourishes. The Moors rely on the Jews to aid economic advancement. In addition, many Jews serve as diplomats to court advisers. They are allowed to contribute to society in many ways, including medicine, philology, and literature. This dramatic change is reflected in Jewish art, architecture, and literature.
- 1200 Christian dynasties begin to reconquer Spain. They place restrictions on the Jewish community by controlling their dress and prohibiting them from holding positions of authority. However, Jewish communities are allowed to maintain internal autonomy and handle legal matters among themselves.
- 1250 The first Spanish blood libel case is recorded and causes tension within the Jewish community. Many turn to the study of mysticism. As a result, the Zohar is produced.
- 1391 Persecution of the Jews heightens tremendously. Thousands of Jews are killed in riots. Synagogues are turned into churches, and holy books are destroyed.
- 1413 A public debate between Christian and Jewish theologians is held in Tortosa. Thousands of Jews convert to Christianity.
- 1481 Catholic Spain is unified for the first time through the marriage of Isabella of Castille and Ferdinand of Aragon. The Spanish Inquisition, headed by Father Tomás de Torquemada, is introduced in attempt to purify Spain.
- 1492 The Inquisition drives Muslims to flee Granada. Shortly after, a movement is introduced to complete Spanish unity by expelling all Jews from Spain. Jews are given four months to evacuate the country. More than 100,000 Jews flee by the end of the year, and many people die on the journey. Those who succeed in escaping to Turkey are among the most fortunate, as Sultan Bajazet welcomes them warmly. Those who flee became known as Sephardim or Sefarad, the Hebrew word for Spain. This community of Jews, now spread throughout Europe and the Arab world makes an informal ban prohibiting Jews from ever living in Spain again. Of the Jews who remain in Spain, a large community is baptized and continues to practice Judaism secretly. These newly converted Christians (conversos) are called Marranos (which means “swine”). The Inquisition accuses tens of thousands of Jews of being Marranos. These Jews are burned at the stake.
- 1834 The final suppression of the Inquisition occurs.
- 1868 The Spanish Republic makes a pledge of religious tolerance, which results in a small number of Jews moving to Spain.

Early 1900s Synagogues are established in Barcelona and Madrid.

1936 The Spanish Civil War breaks out.

1944 As a result of Spain's neutrality during World War II, 25,600 Jews take refuge there. Spanish diplomats abroad are able to protect an additional 4,000 Jews in France and the Balkans.

1960s Spain's Jewish American population grows from those avoiding the draft for the Vietnam War.

1968 The Spanish government officially repeals the Expulsion Edict established in 1492, and a new synagogue is opened in Madrid.

1986 Spain formally recognizes the State of Israel and establishes formal diplomatic relations.

1992 King Juan Carlos symbolically repeats the repeal of the Expulsion Edict on the edict's 500th anniversary.

Contemporary Overview

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Jewish cultural and historical sites are located throughout Spain. For example, the former Jewish quarters still exist in Barcelona, Besalu, Burgos, Caceres, Gerona, Granada, Hervas, Madris, Montblanc, Secovia, Seville, Tarazona, Tarragona, Toledo, and Tudela.

Many of Spain's ancient synagogues have been converted to churches, including some in Avila, Bembibre, Caceres, Estella, Monthlanc, Seville, and Toledo. Toledo has two popular sites, the Church of Santa Maria La Blanca (an ancient synagogue), and the Museo Sephardi (Sephardi Museum) located in El Transito synagogue.

Religious Denominations

The great majority of Spain's Jewish community is Sephardi.

Jewish Education and Communal Institutions

The Federacion de Comunidades Israelitas de Espania unites the various Jewish communities throughout Spain and presents their interests to the Spanish government. Both Sephardic and Ashkenazi synagogues are found in Barcelona and Madrid. In Barcelona, the two synagogues are located within the same building. Other cities with active synagogues include Alicante, Benidorm, Malaga, Marbella, Seville, Torremolinos, and Valencia.

There are active Jewish day schools in Barcelona, Madrid, and Malaga. Both the Women's International Zionist Organization and M'nai B'rith are active in Spain.

Most of Spain's Latin American Jewish population is secular. However, they have formed several organizations to cultivate a sense of religious community. The Circulo de Reflexion Group, The Spinoza Center, and a magazine called Raices (Roots) are three examples of organization within the Latin American community.

The Mounds, a local Jewish family who reside in Ibiza, have made their private home a central meeting place for the present Jewish community. Anyone interested in heritage or history is welcome. They run Shabbat and holiday religious services, organize cultural events, and have a small school.

Chabad-Lubavitch centers are located in Barcelona, Madrid, and Marbella. They provide many services for the local Jewish communities, including day camp for children, Hebrew school, bar and bat mitzvah instruction, women's group, private study, communal lectures, adult education classes, and marriage prep classes. The synagogue in Barcelona has a Judaica Shop and library. The community organizes hospital and prison visitations. They have kosher private kitchens and run restaurants of their own.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

Jews have lived on Ibiza, one of the Balearic Islands, for more than 2,000 years. Unlike the Jews of Majorca, The Jews of Ibiza, called Ibicencos, survived the Spanish Inquisition, which did not come to Ibiza with the same fervor as it did elsewhere. The first vicars general of the Inquisition came to Ibiza in 1410, and they stayed until the Inquisition was permanently suppressed in July 1834. Regardless of persecution against them, many Jews were able to maintain strong positions within the salt trade. At this time, salt was a vital commodity throughout Europe, and the entire continent's supply was manufactured in the southern Balearic Islands. Salt exports were carried on Jewish-owned ships, allowing Ibicencos to travel throughout Europe and maintain connections with Jews elsewhere. Those captured by Ibicenco pirates were often hidden from authorities and helped to escape the Inquisition.

Although their presence on the island was obvious, Jews were forced to live in secret. There was no open practice of Judaism anywhere on the island during the Inquisition. Some historical evidence indicates that Jews maintained their faith behind closed doors. Prince Luis Salvador of Hapsburg wrote about Ibiza's Jewish community in 1868, remarking that they appeared Catholic to the outside world, but that they lived distinctly among themselves. In the 1930s, Isadoro Macabich, a priest in Ibiza, still conducted Jewish wedding ceremonies in the Marrano fashion. Ibicinos did not marry outside the community.

In comparison to other parts of Spain, the Ibicencos lived in a peaceful multi-communal society. At the outbreak of the Spanish Civil War in 1936, Ibiza's Jewish community comprised about 50 Jewish families. They met regularly and valued many of the historical relics that survived through the years. Today, the Ibicencos are experiencing a revival of community, largely because the younger generation has shown an interest in preserving their past.

The Ibicencos were not the only secret Jewish community in Spain. The Chuetas (pork eaters) lived in Ivica, the smallest of the Balearic Islands. These Jews practiced many of the traditional Jewish customs secretly, including lighting Sabbath candles and practicing the rite of circumcision. The community was led by a rabbi who doubled as a Catholic priest.

Many Jews sought refuge in Spain during World War II. Approximately 25,600 Jews escaped to Spain where they survived the duration of the war. Jews in Ibiza were protected by the chief of the secret police, who failed to deport those who lacked proper paperwork. In addition, Spanish diplomats were able to save nearly 4,000 Jews in France and the Balkans. The vast majority of the Jews who took refuge in Spain, later left for other countries. Since 1948, 1,412 Jews have emigrated from Spain to Israel.

Today, nearly all Spaniards are Catholic, making Spain one of the most homogeneous countries in the world. Anti-Semitic stereotypes and expressions are socially accepted and commonly used. There are no laws restricting hate crimes against Jews or Holocaust denial. As a result, convicted Nazi war criminals are able to seek refuge in Spain's borders. In addition, much neo-Nazi and extreme rightist literature is published throughout Spain.

Selected Bibliography

- Benbassa, Ester, and Aron Rodrigue. 1995. Jews of the Balkans: The Judeo-Spanish Community, Fifteenth to Twentieth Centuries. Cambridge, MA: Blackwell.
- Cooperman, Bernard Dov, ed. 1998. In Iberia and beyond: Hispanic Jews between Cultures: Proceedings of a Symposium to Mark the 500th Anniversary of the Expulsion of Spanish Jewry. Newark: University of Delaware.
- Cowans, Jon, ed. 2003. Early Modern Spain: A Documentary History. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Ezratty, Harry A. 1997. 500 Years in the Jewish Caribbean: The Spanish and Portuguese Jews in the West Indies. Baltimore, MD: Omni Arts.
- "Jewish Communities: Europe: Spain." 2004–2005. World Jewish Congress Web site. http://www.worldjewishcongress.org/communities/comm\_reg\_europe.html# (accessed April 22, 2007).
- "The Jewish Community of Spain." The Shema Yisrael Torah Network Web site. <http://www.amyisrael.co.il/europe/spain/index.htm> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Katz, Solomon. 1937. The Jews in the Visigothic and Frankish Kingdoms of Spain and Gaul. Mediaeval Academy Monograph no. 12. Cambridge, MA: Medieval Academy of America.
- Kayslerling, M. 1928. Christopher Columbus and the Participation of the Jews in the Spanish and Portuguese Discoveries. Translated from the author's manuscript with his sanction and revision by Charles Gross. New York: G. Dobsevage.
- Marcus, Jacob. 1938. The Jew in the Medieval World: A Sourcebook, New York: JPS.
- Milman, H. H. 1909. The History of the Jews. Vol. II. London: J. M. Dent.
- Mound, Gloria. 1988. "Survivors of the Spanish Exile: The Underground Jews of Ibiza." Jerusalem Letters of Lasting Interest. February 10. Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs Web site. <http://www.jcpa.org/jl/hit12.htm> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Perednik, Gustavo D. 2003. "Naïve Spanish Judeophobia" Jewish Political Studies Review 15: 3–4.
- Scott, S. P., trans. 1910. The Visigothic Code. Boston, MA: Boston Book Company.
- Ziegler, A. K., 1930. Church and State in Visigothic Spain. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America.
- Zohar, Zion, ed. 2005. Sephardic and Mizrahi Jewry: From the Golden Age of Spain to Modern Times. New York: New York University Press.

Jews and Jewish Communities in Medieval Spain

Norman Roth

---

Jews lived in the Iberian Peninsula from at least the fourth century. They suffered persecution under the Christians, particularly during the Visigothic reign in the following centuries, during which period they were compelled to be baptized, until the Muslim conquest in 711 freed them. During the long Muslim rule, at least to the 12th century, the Jewish population increased dramatically by immigration, mostly from North Africa, Babylon (Iraq), and Iran, but also from Christian France. This was the period commonly called the golden age of Jewish history in Spain, when significant cultural developments took place, including the rediscovery of Hebrew grammar, which led to scientific biblical analysis and commentary, the creation of secular Hebrew poetry and literature, scientific and philosophical writing, and translations from Arabic into Hebrew and Spanish. This continued even after the Christian reconquest of most of southern Spain (Andalusia, but including “new Castile”) at the end of the 11th century and culminating in the 13th century. Rulers such as Jaime I of Aragon-Catalonia (1213–1276), who extended his kingdom to include Valencia and Majorca, and his son-in-law, Alfonso X of Castile and Leon (1252–1284), were both tolerant of the conquered Muslims and influenced by their culture and particularly favorable toward the Jews of their kingdoms. This favored status of the Jews continued for the most part throughout the medieval period in Spain.

In the early period of Muslim rule, in the 9th and 10th centuries, Jewish populations of some cities were so numerous that Arabic sources refer to them as “Jewish cities.” Lucena, in fact, may have been entirely Jewish, or nearly so. Other cities, such as Granada, had entire Jewish sections. After the civil war of the early 11th century brought an end to the Cordoba caliphate, Muslim Spain was divided into separate city-states (taifa kingdoms). The largest of these, Granada, had a Jewish prime minister and commander of its army, the famous Samuel Ibn Naghrillah, who was also a scientist, Talmudic scholar, and accomplished poet. He was not, however, the only Jewish prime minister of Muslim states (earlier, Hasdai Ibn Shaprut had served the caliph of Cordoba as a minister of state, although not prime minister).

After the reconquest, Toledo became the most important city in Castile, with a significant Jewish population that included a number of scholars, translators, and scientists who composed most of the scientific treatises sponsored by Alfonso X, the “wise” king (if he was wise, it was due chiefly to the Jewish and Muslim scholars he supported). In the 14th century, the emigration from Germany of a leading Jewish scholar, Asher b. Yehiel, brought further renown to Toledo, and it rivaled Barcelona as the center of Jewish learning. Other major Jewish population centers in Castile included Seville and Burgos, but Jews lived in almost every city and town in Spain, including small villages where only a few lived. Many were farmers or artisans, and those in larger towns were craftspeople and merchants. Jewish physicians were also famous, and several cities as well as royal families and nobles had Jewish physicians permanently on their payrolls. It is interesting to note that several Jewish women physicians were licensed to practice. Jewish and Christian women in Spain were relatively free of the restrictions in other lands; for instance, they could own property and engage in business. Nevertheless, aside from a few who wrote in Arabic in the Muslim period, there are no examples of a Jewish woman writer or scholar.

In the extensive kingdom of Aragon-Catalonia, which included Languedoc and most of Provence until the late 13th century, Jews also flourished. Major centers included Zaragoza (where, as there remained a significant Muslim population, Jews still used Arabic), Huesca, Calatayud, Gerona, Barcelona, Lerida, and numerous smaller towns and villages. Valencia, a separate kingdom but under the authority of the Catalan rulers, also had many Jews in several cities; as did neighboring Murcia. Several hundred Jews lived in the Basque province, in regions such as Cantabria (the beautiful northern coastal region of Castile), and of course in the kingdom of Leon.

The Jewish population increased, particularly in Aragon-Catalonia, through immigration from France and even Germany. After the repeated expulsion (and recall and further expulsion) of French Jews in the 14th century, for example, many refugees were welcomed (also by the rulers) into the kingdom. To some extent, this changed the cultural life of Jews in these communities; for example, Hebrew pronunciation was strongly affected by the Ashkenazic (German, but also French) usage, and certain customs and practices were also influenced by them. Some rabbinical authorities held out strongly for adherence to traditional "Spanish" customs.

The use of the term (and the language) "Spanish" deserves comment. Interestingly, although there were separate medieval kingdoms, five in all, both their rulers and the inhabitants considered themselves Spaniards, and the language chiefly used was what is referred to as "Castilian" today. Certainly Catalan, Aragonese, and other dialects were used in daily speech and in some documents, but the official language of communication was Spanish. Jews were no different; all were fluent in Hebrew and some in Arabic, but they spoke and often wrote Spanish and referred with great pride to their land as Spain (Sefarad in Hebrew), although sometimes that term was reserved for southern Spain. Nevertheless, there are several examples of documents and even complete texts composed by Jews in Catalan and Catalan written in Hebrew letters. In fact, one of the earliest literary texts in Catalan was written by a Jew (Judah Bonsenyor, d. 1331; Sentencias morals, or Libro de palabras y dichas de sabios y filosofos), similar to the much better known Castilian work by Sem Tov de Carrion (14th century), Proverbios morales. Jews also continued to serve as official translators and interpreters of Arabic, as secretaries and diplomats, for the Spanish rulers in their relations not only with the still Muslim kingdom of Granada but also with those of North Africa.

While the largest Jewish centers were, of course, the major cities, throughout the medieval period Jews continued to live in smaller communities and even isolated on farms. These communities number in the hundreds throughout Spain. Significant smaller communities include Tarragona, Teruel, Cervera, Daroca, all the towns of Languedoc-Provence, Majorca, Zamora, Salamanca, Segovia, and many others.

All of this was possible because of the special relationship that existed not only between Jews and the kings but even more between ordinary Jewish and Christian citizens. The term for this in Spanish is convivencia, an almost untranslatable word that means much more than “living together”; it implies mutual respect and daily contact on terms generally cordial. This meant Jews did not fear living even in small numbers in villages and towns surrounded by a Christian population. More than this, as extensive documentation proves, they were perfectly willing to apprentice their sons and daughters for a period of years to Christian families or craftsmen, for example. These documents specify that the apprentice be fed kosher food and be allowed to observe all Jewish religious practices. In turn, Christians also apprenticed their own children to Jewish craftsmen or to serve in Jewish homes.

Unlike other Christian lands, in Spain Jewish physicians were allowed to treat Christian patients. As mentioned, many were on city payrolls as official physicians or were in the service of kings and their families, as well as nobles and church dignitaries. Jews also served in other capacities, such as jewelers and clockmakers to the kings, administrators of cities and provinces, collectors of taxes and financial ministers (particularly in Castile), and even such amusing occupations as minstrels or musicians or royal lion keepers.

On a more common level, many Jews were artisans and craftsmen, often found as shoemakers, makers and sellers of clothing, metalworkers, and bookbinders. All of this, of course, brought them into daily contact with their Christian neighbors. Bishops and other officials sometimes left gifts or other benefits to Jewish friends in their wills, and Jews sometimes designated gifts for the Christian poor, to be distributed by the local church, in their wills.

This convivencia could have religious implications that were sometimes problematic, as when Christian neighbors entered a Jewish house during Passover carrying or eating food not permitted on that holiday, or when they sent nonkosher food items as gifts to Jews. Sexual intimacies were an even more serious problem, and although intermarriage was supposedly impossible, some cases exist. More frequent were incidents of prostitution or illicit sexual relations between Christians and Jews. Some individual Jews found it convenient to go to another town where they were not known and there live ostensibly as Christians so that they could do what they wished.

Leadership of the Jewish Community

Official leadership of Jewish communities has always been in the hands of laypeople and not rabbis. In fact, the role of the rabbi until the modern period was that of scholar and teacher. He was not a religious leader, or clergyman like the Christian priest. There were often several rabbis in any one community, rarely associated with a particular synagogue, whose (honorary) title represented supposedly a high level of Talmudic learning. In fact, not all rabbis were particularly learned, and there is much criticism of some of them in the literature. Slowly, beginning apparently in the 13th century, rabbis increasingly did take a leadership role in the community, and in spite of scholarly objections began to receive salaries as the official rabbi of a community. Nevertheless, they (as well as teachers and other officials) were hired and to an extent supervised by members of the community.

The governing body of each community was an elected council that consisted of several members and with an executive council referred to as the “seven good men,” although the number was often more than seven. These groups enacted the ordinances that governed the community and took care of the day-to-day affairs and control of the synagogues and schools.

Public meetings were held at least annually, at which everyone could voice concerns or make recommendations to be carried out by the councils. There were also elected officials who supervised “morals” and punished those who violated such laws.

Education was, of course, a primary concern. Jewish law requires that every person be fluent in Hebrew, at least enough to read the prayers and the Torah, and in fact beyond that to at least a basic mastery of the Talmud. To this end, elementary and advanced schools were established in virtually every community no matter how small. Teachers were hired, and scribes were also needed to copy the books necessary for study as well as the Torah scrolls and prayer books necessary for community use.

In addition to these officials, slaughterers of meat (according to rigid Jewish regulation), collectors and supervisors of various charitable funds, and other minor officials were necessary. Guilds, or more correctly “brotherhoods,” modeled after the Christian fraternities, were also established for such things as support of learning, burial, marriage, and provision for widows and orphans. There were also guilds properly speaking, composed of members of a particular trade or craft.

Visitors to a community had to be provided with housing and food, and in larger cities there were sometimes hospices for this, although the duty of hospitality is the responsibility of every individual Jew. There were also, again usually in the larger communities, hospitals for the care of the sick or injured. Most of these were staffed by laypeople, but certainly local doctors were on call to attend patients when needed and even to perform surgery (sometimes very complex, such as eye surgery).

Jewish scholars who attained a high level of knowledge of the Talmud and Jewish law, whether officially rabbis or not (the famous Nahmanides, Moses b. Nahman, for example was not a rabbi), became de facto heads of the entire Jewish community. Some, such as Nahmanides and others, were recognized in this capacity by the kings, who indeed sought the advice of these and other Jewish leaders on many issues. In practical terms, this meant local rabbis, as well as any individual Jew or Jewish community, could write to these scholars with legal questions and receive detailed replies.

Many thousands of such questions and answers (“responsa”) have survived, from the earliest period to the end of the 15th century, and are a major source for today’s knowledge of Jewish life. Some of the most important scholars were Joseph Ibn Megas, Meir Abulafia, Nahmanides, Asher b. Yehiel, Solomon Ibn Adret, and Isaac b. Sheshet. Sheshet was particularly interesting because he moved from one community to another, from Catalonia to Valencia and then after the attacks on Jews in 1391 finally to North Africa. He was in communication with virtually all of the rabbis of this period. The most important collection of responsa, nevertheless, consists of the several printed volumes of Ibn Adret, which are a treasure of information for all aspects of Jewish life and thought.

Daily Life as a Jew in Medieval Spain

From the point of view of religious or cultural duties and life, a Jew in Spain was not markedly different from one in any other country. With the exception of those who ignored some or all of these requirements (and were usually ostracized by the community), medieval Jews were scrupulous in their observance of the commandments and the regulations of the rabbis. Prayers three times a day, the wearing of tefillin (phylacteries) by males over the age of 13, observance of the Sabbath and holidays, and the eating of kosher food, all were strictly observed by most Jews. This meant that a good part of their day, and life, was devoted to observance of some practice or fulfilling of a commandment or other rule.

In addition, most Jewish males attempted to fulfill at least the minimal requirements of learning. This meant they devoted part of the day or evening to the study of Talmud or the study of compendia such as the laws of Isaac al-Fasi or the more comprehensive code (Mishneh Torah) of Maimonides (born in Cordoba, where he already wrote some work, he lived and wrote in Egypt). Many young men studied in special academies (yeshivas) with famous scholars. This learning was not only theoretical, a every aspect of personal and communal life was subject to Jewish law. Therefore, it was essential to know these laws as a practical part of ordinary life.

Books were highly prized, and it is noteworthy that in a period when few Christians had any books at all and most libraries in monasteries were remarkably small (and the books mostly in Latin, which few could understand), private libraries of ordinary Jews were common and contained many books, the lists of several of these having survived. Indeed, some Jews were known to travel great distances and spend significant sums to acquire an important manuscript.

In areas of daily life not strictly controlled by Jewish law, Jews lived in a manner nearly identical to that of Christians. Houses were usually small, often one story; except in larger cities where people lived in homes of two or more stories, often shared or with the bottom floor used as a store. Streets in cities, particularly in Catalonia, were often narrow and crowded with such buildings in close proximity. In other parts of Spain, however, separate houses were common, and particularly in Andalusia these usually had courtyards and fountains and were open and spacious. Private baths, although not unknown, were not common and Jews, Christians and Muslims shared public baths, although on separate days.

Generally, there were no restrictions on Jewish clothing such as existed in Christian Europe. Jews in Catalonia customarily wore a hooded cap, but these are seen also on Christians; otherwise, there were no distinctions in clothing. When the Church imposed the wearing of a special sign (the so-called badge) for Jews in 1215, these regulations were simply ignored in all Spanish kingdoms. Only later, in the 15th century, were serious efforts made to require such a sign, usually a circular patch of cloth on the outer garment.

Food was also quite similar to that consumed by Christians, with the exception of dietary regulations imposed by Jewish law (essentially, this meant no pork; Jews in Spain also hunted wild game, just as did their Christian neighbors). The diet then, as now, was rich in vegetables and fruit largely unknown in Christian Europe, and of course an abundance of fresh fish. All of this was also important for health, and it is significant that with the exception of some communities in Catalonia, or large cities such as Toledo, few Jews were affected by the Black Plague, or other plagues, of the mid-14th century. Far fewer Christians also died in Spain than in the rest of Europe, and it has been suggested that this was due not only to better diet and health but also to sanitation and such things as bathing (virtually unknown in medieval Europe).

Changing Conditions in the Jewish Community

The generally harmonious relations between Jews and Christians were subject to serious challenges along the way. One example was the famous Barcelona disputation (actually two different disputations) in 1241 and 1262 (the latter involving Nahmanides). Jewish books were temporarily confiscated and investigated on charges of alleged heresy, and although the king rescinded the order and apologized when the charges were proved false, much harm had been done.

However, worse was yet to come. The unsettled political and economic conditions were certainly a major cause of the unrest, but it was the preaching of a fanatic church official that was the immediate cause of the riots in the summer of 1391. Throughout Spain, synagogues were burned and Jewish communities were attacked and robbed by roaming bands of hoodlums. Some Jews were killed and many more were baptized, often of their own choice out of fear. The rulers did everything possible to prevent such attacks and punish those responsible, but the damage was done. Although it is not true that the famous community of Barcelona came to an end as a result, it was severely diminished and never recovered its former glory.

The mass conversions that took place had serious repercussions for the viability of the Jewish community as a whole and were to be repeated in even larger numbers as a result of the missionary campaign of the greatest preacher of the medieval period, Vicente Ferrer, in the first part of the 15th century. Thousands, or hundreds of thousands, of Jews converted as a result, including in some cases entire Jewish communities. Shortly after, another disputation was held at Tortosa (1413–1414), called by Benedict XIII, the anti-pope who was recognized by Spain. By this time, all of the important Jewish scholars were either dead or had converted, and the few remaining rabbis converted as a result of this disputation (with the exception of Joseph Albo and one or two others). Demoralized by this, many more Jews converted.

As a result, combined with constant warfare and political unrest in Castile, the Jewish community was seriously depleted. Its leadership was effectively gone, morale was low, yeshivas were closed, and Jewish learning virtually ceased; it was not to be restored until near the end of the century when new rabbinical scholars emerged.

Nevertheless, perhaps remarkably, normal daily relations between Jews and Christians did not change significantly. There is very little evidence of open hostility toward Jews, although intolerant monarchs in Castile and Aragon-Catalonia at the beginning of the 15th century temporarily imposed restrictive legislation. The real challenge for Jews came from the New Christians, or conversos, who had willingly abandoned their people and chosen to become Christians. They now sought their own interests and advancement, both politically and economically, and were not concerned with Jews. From their side, the Jews despised these renegades and did everything possible to cause harm to them (such as informing on them to the Inquisition, established to root out alleged heresy among the new converts). Although the Inquisition was not concerned at all with Jews, the theoretical basis for which they could act against New Christians (who, in fact, were not guilty of any heresies at all) was to create a fictitious category of "Jewish blood," or racial impurity, which supposedly would taint "old Christians." This certainly had dangerous implications for real Jews, and although in fact such charges were never used against them, the psychological impact both on Christians and Jews must have existed.

The Final Stage and the Expulsion

Although the Jewish population was considerably depleted by the 15th century, and conversions continued on a large scale, Jews continued to live in numerous towns and villages and were by no means concentrated only in large cities. This in itself is an indication of how little change there was in normal relations between Christians and Jews. True, there were a few isolated incidents of hostility, particularly in some Castilian communities, in the latter half of the century. However, Jews continued to serve as administrators for important and powerful nobles, as tax collectors and financial officers for the kings, and in all of the other positions and professions that they had traditionally held.

Only in one area, that of officials for the kings, were Jews now mostly replaced by conversos. This had two disastrous results: it isolated Jews from the center of power and from intimate knowledge of what was going on at court, and it increased resentment of the conversos on the part of many Christians who thought they were being kept from these offices. That, in turn, resulted in increased anti-Semitism; directed not at Jews but also at the new converts. The irony was that the more "Christian" they became, the more they were despised.

From the mid-15th century, Jewish communities were once again thriving, both economically and culturally. The significant difference was that the cultural revival was almost entirely limited to traditional Jewish learning. By 1470 there were already again important rabbinical scholars, primarily if not exclusively in Castile; and even if they did not compare to the giants of previous times, at least they renewed the study of the Talmud, and some were not entirely unaware of secular knowledge as well. Hebrew poetry and some literature was, peculiarly, now confined to a few examples in Catalonia; once this had been the imitator of Jewish traditions that had their roots in Arabic culture and flourished in Andalusia. Although there were still Jewish doctors, there was no longer independent scientific or medical writing of any significance. It would be fair to say that Jewish culture in Spain in the second part of the century was not basically different from that anywhere in Europe during the whole medieval period: focused almost exclusively on Talmudic interpretation.

There were signs to be read, had anyone been perceptive enough to understand them, of the impending disaster. Ferdinand and Isabella were far from being the bigots, hostile to Jews, that they have popularly been portrayed. On the contrary, they maintained the same cordial relations with Jews that their predecessors had. Nevertheless, religious fanatics on the one side, such as those behind the creation of the Inquisition, and certain hostile elements in various communities on the other, forced the monarchs into enacting an increasing number of restrictions on Jews. These included the first laws in Spain restricting the right of Jews to live where they chose. Separate Jewish quarters, or sections of cities, were now created in various parts of the country, chiefly in Castile. The growing Jewish population of Cordoba, for instance, experienced severe hardship from this when they had to sell their homes and move into a confined area of the city where there was barely room to contain them. Again, vast numbers converted because of this. One may judge from the remains of the area of the Jewish quarter in the city, and especially the tiny synagogue, how few Jews actually remained.

It might be supposed that the anti-Jewish elements in society would have been satisfied with the massive conversions of Jews, without precedent in any period of Jewish history. However, the anti-Semite knows no logic, and the increased bitterness toward the converts now began to turn itself against the Jews. The argument was invented, for it was pure fiction, that Jews were corrupting the conversos (just as they were supposedly corrupting the old Christians) by daily conversations and dealings with them. Nothing could be further from the truth, as the Jews in fact hated the conversos passionately and for the most part had nothing to do with them.

On this false pretext, nevertheless, the king and queen were convinced to issue an order for the expulsion of all the Jews from the kingdom in 1492. Part of the propaganda that resulted in this decree was certainly the successful war against the Muslim kingdom of Granada, the conquest of which finally united the entire peninsula into one Christian kingdom. There were once again utopian visions of a world Christian empire, united under the glorious Spanish monarchs.

Of all of this the Jews had no clue, and literally up to the very eve of the Expulsion relations continued with Christians on a favorable basis. When the decree was enacted, many Christians felt real compassion for their departing friends and neighbors. The monarchs, on their part, also took many measures to ensure the fair treatment of Jews in the purchase of their property (except for synagogues and other public buildings, which were seized by local communities). Nevertheless, with the exception of a very small number who now chose conversion rather than expulsion, the Jewish community of Spain came to an end.

Today there remain numerous Jewish sites in Spain—synagogues, cemeteries, and remains of Jewish castles; some actual homes remain much as they were. For those who know where to look, even such large and modern cities as Barcelona have remnants of their Jewish past. Perhaps more encouraging, Jewish communities once again exist in several cities in Spain. While these are a pale shadow of what was once there, with few inhabitants who either know or care about the glories of the Jewish past in Spain, Hebrew is again being taught and used by Jews and prayers are again being recited in synagogues. The story of the Jewish culture and history of Spain, however, is being told, as it has been for over a century, by Spanish Christian scholars.

Selected Bibliography

- Baer, Yitzhak. 1966. A History of the Jews in Christian Spain, 2 vols., abridged English translation. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America.
- Roth, Norman. 2002. Conversos, Inquisition and the Expulsion of the Jews from Spain, rev. ed. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.

Relations between Jews and Muslims in Medieval Spain

Norman Roth

---

In 711, the Muslim invasion of the Iberian Peninsula by Berber forces from North Africa ended the theocratic Visigothic kingdom and freed the Jews from centuries of persecution that ended in forced conversion. Liberated Jews were used to garrison newly conquered cities as the Muslim forces swept on to drive the Christians from the land, with the exception of a small enclave in the extreme northwestern portion of Spain.

By the ninth century, most of Spain from the southern coast to Barcelona and beyond was in the hands of the Muslims. A central government was established with Cordoba as its capital. Later, the last surviving member of the Umayyad Dynasty, which had once ruled the vast Muslim empire, fled Baghdad and came to Spain in 756, and as Abd al-Rahman I established an emirate (princedom) under his control. His most famous successor, Abd al-Rahman III, achieved numerous victories against the early attempts of Christian forces to regain parts of Spain, and declared himself caliph in 929. This title had traditionally been reserved for the ruler in Baghdad, head of the entire Muslim world, and thus he was declaring the complete independence of Muslim Spain (al-Andalus, which also included northern Spain) from Baghdad. The Spanish caliphate came to a catastrophic end with the uprising of Berbers in Cordoba in 1010, who resented the control by so-called Arabs, immigrants from Syria and Egypt, and their second-class status. This resulted in a civil war, which brought an end to the caliphate by 1016. The country was then divided into a series of taifa kingdoms, or independent city-states.

As noted, the Muslim population increased enormously in the 8th through 11th centuries due to immigration. On a smaller scale, but no less dramatically, Jewish immigration was also significant in this period, chiefly from other Muslim countries but also some from northern Christian lands. Indeed, according to Muslim sources several cities were known as “Jewish,” in which all, or at least most, of the inhabitants were Jews. Although this is undoubtedly exaggerated, certainly there was a significant Jewish population in Cordoba, Lucena, Jaen, Granada, Seville, Toledo, and other cities and towns in the south and Zaragoza, Huesca, Tudela and other northern cities.

Jews and Muslims shared many common cultural and even religious elements. To begin with, they had a common language, Arabic, which meant Jews availed themselves of all the secular learning for which the Muslim world was famous. This was seen particularly in education, where indeed Jewish boys studied together with Muslims and learned mathematics, physics, astronomy and other sciences, philosophy, and medicine. All of this was accomplished before the age of 18. While not every Jew, or Muslim, completed this demanding curriculum, neither was it limited to the aristocracy, as some have thought. In fact, few if any of the greatest Jewish poets, philosophers, and scientists in Muslim Spain had any such aristocratic background. In addition to secular subjects, Jews also had to fulfill the requirements of their own law by learning Hebrew, the Bible, and the Talmud. This was a learning process that continued throughout life.

Religiously (although no such distinct category of life would have been recognized by Muslims or Jews, for whom all of life was governed by law and religious principles), Jews and Muslims shared many concepts and practices. In fact, most of these were borrowed by Islam from Jewish traditions and included such ideas as absolute monotheism and God conceived of as not having any bodily image, daily obligation of prayers (three times a day for Jews, five for Muslims), required washing or immersion for certain purposes, the obligation to provide for the poor or widows and orphans, certain dietary regulations (although much less stringent for Muslims), and other things.

The similarity of many Arabic and Hebrew words, particularly relating to religious matters, is also noteworthy. All of this resulted in a common cultural heritage, or outlook, which meant Jews certainly had more in common with Muslims than either did with Christians.

In the more mundane areas of daily life, Jews also shared with Muslims a style of clothing (which Jews adopted entirely from Muslims), the houses in which they lived, the love of gardens and open and airy space both in the home and in the city itself, the use of public baths, a healthy and comprehensive diet that included many varieties of fruits and vegetables unknown in Christian Europe, and for recreation a love of music and the ubiquitous “wine parties.”

Jews had begun participating in government already in the 10th century, and a famous state minister in the caliphate of Cordoba was Hasdai Ibn Shaprut, in the service of Abd al-Rahman III, who was a scholar (responsible for the translation of the famous pharmaceutical work of Dioscorides), physician, and warrior. Even more famous was Samuel Ibn Naghrillah (933–1056), who became the prime minister and commander of the army of the kingdom of Granada. Renowned also as a Talmudic scholar, astronomer, and poet, he achieved fame throughout the Muslim world. He also attracted bitter opponents, however, and engaged in polemical disputes with a famous Muslim jurist and religious fanatic, Ibn Hazm. His military victories over other Muslim kings who were enemies of Granada also earned him enemies. Other Jews were also prime ministers and high-ranking government officials in Muslim city-state kingdoms, although some were required to convert to Islam.

All was not sweetness and light, however. While there were as yet no general persecutions of Jews, there were increasing attempts to impose restrictions on them, and there were instances of Jews being attacked and even murdered. Some Muslim sources speak very favorably of Jews in general, and of important officials such as Ibn Naghrillah or famous Jewish scholars, but others condemn them just as strongly. Although Jews were technically, as the ahl al-qitab (people of scripture), protected (dhimmis) under Muslim law, they were definitely second-class citizens. The Koran itself, full of vitriolic hatred of Christians and Jews, seems not to have had any particular impact on real relations, but there were already signs of the hostility that would develop in the 12th century under the fanatic Almoravid and Almohad regimes.

After the death of Samuel Ibn Naghrillah, his son Yusuf succeeded him as prime minister of Granada, but his alleged overbearing behavior led to a rebellion in which he and many other Jews were killed. Life for Jews became impossible in that kingdom for centuries to come. The invasion of the North African Almoravids (actually they were invited by the weak Muslim kings to aid in their campaign against the Christians who were increasingly conquering Muslim territory) resulted in only minor changes for the Jews. The famous restrictive laws written by a Muslim judge of Seville may or may not have been put into practice; there is little evidence for this. Yet clearly Jewish cultural life, at least, suffered a decline in southern Muslim Spain. The last important Jewish poet and scholar, Moses Ibn Ezra, fled Granada and settled in remote Estella in Navarre. Tudela, the chief city of that kingdom, was the birthplace of two great scholars and poets who succeeded him, Judah Halevi and Abraham Ibn Ezra. The first made his way to Granada, to visit Moses Ibn Ezra before he left the city, and then determined to go to the Land of Israel (he journeyed to Egypt and from there set sail for his ultimate destination, but the ship sank in a storm and he died). He was motivated not only by religious reasons but even more by his determination that life under the Muslims was growing intolerable. The same feeling seems to have motivated the decision of his close friend Abraham Ibn Ezra to leave Spain and begin his wanderings in Italy, Provence, and apparently France, before finally returning to die in Spain.

The even more fanatical Almohads (in Arabic, “unifiers of God”) invaded Spain in the latter part of the 12th century and instituted full-scale persecution of Christians and Jews. Many Jewish communities were depleted, if not completely destroyed, and large numbers of Jews ostensibly converted to Islam as they were no longer allowed to live as Jews. Those who could, like Maimonides and his family, fled Spain (in his case, first to Morocco and then Egypt). Others later went to Christian Spain and resumed life as Jews.

The Christian reconquest of Muslim Spain continued in force, nevertheless, and by the mid-13th century all but the kingdom of Granada was under Christian control. This is not the end of Jewish-Muslim contact, however, for Muslims were not persecuted by the Christians and in fact played an important role in the development of the new Christian territories. Significant Muslim populations remained in Aragon, particularly in Zaragoza and Huesca, but also in smaller towns, where there were also many Jews. Although there were some tensions, in general cordial relations continued between Jews and Muslims in these areas, and also in Christian New Castile, in cities such as Toledo. Throughout the 13th and 14th centuries, Arabic remained the chief spoken language of the Jews in these areas, and this was the period of important translation of Arabic scientific and some philosophical work into Hebrew and Spanish. Jews served as diplomats and official translators for the Christian rulers.

Although the sources are scanty, there is sufficient evidence to show that Jews and Jewish culture continued to thrive in the remaining Muslim kingdom of Granada, including Malaga, throughout the late medieval period, until it was conquered by Ferdinand and Isabella at the end of the 15th century, when Jewish captives were treated as virtual slaves. After the expulsion of the Jews in 1492, most of the Jews decided to go to Muslim North Africa and later to the Ottoman Empire, where they expected to receive better treatment than in Christian lands, an expectation that largely was justified.

Selected Bibliography

- Roth, Norman. 1994. Jews, Visigoths & Muslims in Medieval Spain: Cooperation & Conflict. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Roth, Norman, ed. 2003. Encyclopedia of Medieval Jewish Civilization. New York: Routledge.

Jews in Minorca: 18th Century

Tito Benady

---

Minorca was captured by a British expedition in 1707 during the War of the Spanish Succession and ceded to by Spain Britain in 1713, under Article 11 of the Treaty of Utrecht. Within a few years Jewish merchants were present in the island, and a Jewish community was formed at Mahon, which became the administrative and commercial capital of the island. The community was made up mainly of immigrants from North Africa, but there were also a few merchants from Livorno.

Little is known of the early years of the community, but in 1756 the Seven Years' War broke out, and British officers in the island were concerned that the Jewish merchants might leave. They seem to have been well-off, for when the governor asked the inhabitants for loans for the defense of the island he received $4,000 from the Jews while the rest of the civilians only came up with $7,227.

When the French invaded Minorca later that year, there were 15 Jews besieged with the garrison in Fort St. Philip, 11 of whom took up arms. After the fort surrendered, all nonnative civilians, including the Jews, were forcibly put on transports and sent to Gibraltar; but when the island was restored to Britain in 1763, the Jews returned. Their number seems to have increased because in 1766 they decided that the room they were using as a synagogue was no longer adequate and they should build a proper synagogue. On learning this, the jurats (city councillors of Mahon) protested vehemently as did the paborde (the vicar general of the island), and Lieutenant-Governor Johnston withdrew his permission for the construction of the new building.

The Jews of Mahon wrote to the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue in London explaining the situation. After consulting the governor, Lord Howard, who was in London at the time, they presented a petition to the secretary of state in conjunction with the Board of Deputies, and permission was given for the construction to continue. The Minorcans did not take this defeat lightly, and the following year Johnston had to write to the paborde complaining of the anti-Jewish sermons of the local parish priest and of his prohibiting anybody dealing with them. He ended his letter with the hope that the anti-Jewish action would cease, as otherwise he would have to ensure that the Jews who had settled in Minorca with the permission of the king of England “may have the necessaries requisite for human society.” After this the situation seems to have calmed down, and the Minorcans accepted the presence of the Jews. There are instances of joint commercial ventures.

Minorca was again invaded during the American Revolutionary War. In August 1782, a Spanish force under the Duke de Crillon landed. A week afterward and while Fort St. Philip was still resisting, Crillon issued a proclamation that the Jews would have to leave the island in accordance with the laws of Spain, which did not permit Jews to settle.

Transport was arranged for the 400 Jewish inhabitants to carry them to Marseilles, and, until the ships were available, they were confined to their house. Only one woman in each family was allowed to go out to buy food. Ten of the principal merchants were to remain behind to settle the affairs of the members of the community. On October 13, these gentlemen wrote to Crillon to thank him for ending their confinement so they could settle their affairs and offering a gift of 300,000 reales (about £5,000) for the troops. No doubt some of the officers with whom they had to deal had forced them to do this. Crillon must have realized what had happened for he forbade them to make this douceur.

At the peace, Britain gave up possession of Minorca, and this ended the 74 years of occupation. The Jews were not allowed to return, and the community was not reestablished.

Selected Bibliography

Benady, Tito M. 1992. “Menorquines en Gibraltar.” Revista de Menorca 2: 205–226.

- Benady, Tito M. 1992–1994. “The Role of Jews in the British Colonies in the Western Mediterranean.” Jewish Historical Studies 33: 45–63.
- Gregory, Desmond. 1990. Minorca, the Illusory Prize. Cranbury, NJ: Associated University Presses.
- Roth, Cecil. 1936. “Jews in Minorca under British Rule.” In Orient and Occident, edited by Bruno Schindler and Arthur Marmorstein, 51–63. London: Taylor’s Foreign Press.

Jews in Switzerland

Avram Hein

---

General Population: 7,523,934 (July 2006 estimate)

Jewish Population: 17,900

Percent of Population: 0.24 percent

---

Historical Overview

- 1213 Switzerland is one of the largest communities in Europe.
- 1291 The Swiss Confederation is founded.
- 1348 The Jewish community is blamed for the spread of the Black Death and poisoning wells. As a consequence of this libel, 600 Jews are burnt at the stake.
- Middle Ages Jews are primarily engaged in moneylending. In Basel they are required to loan the church money without interest. They are despised and ostracized. With the rare exception of Jewish physicians, they are forced to wear a special hat called the Judenhut. As their principle occupation is moneylending (as this was the only occupation permitted to the Jews, as in most of the rest of Europe), when Christian inhabitants are in debt to moneylenders, the Jews are blamed, tortured, or expelled. Jews are required to live in certain neighborhoods and reside on certain streets, where their infrastructure (e.g., schools, synagogues, cemeteries, ritual baths) are also located. Jews have to pay high taxes for these “privileges.”
- 1349 Most of the Jews are expelled from Switzerland.
- 1352 Jews return to Zurich.
- 1361 Jews return to Basel. Their return does not herald an end to persecutions and maltreatment continues.
- June 25, 1401 Accused of blood libel, all of Jews living in Schaffhausen are condemned to death, and 30 are burned alive. Four weeks later, 18 men and women are burned at the stake in Winterthur.
- 1622 With the exceptions of doctors, all Jews are expelled from Switzerland.
- Late 18th century A Jewish community is established in Geneva.
- 1868 The Great Synagogue in Basel is built.
- 1874 Freedom of religion is granted after years of pressure from France, England, and the United States. The only countries that emancipate Jews later are Spain and Portugal.

- 1886 The Aargau Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals demands that the government prohibit ritual slaughter.
- 1887 The Jews of Baden asks for ritual slaughter to be permitted.
- August 1893 An article is inserted in the Constitution after a referendum that prohibits shechitah (ritual slaughter).
- 1897 The First World Zionist Congress is held in Basel, Switzerland. Theodor Herzl intends to center the Zionist movement in Basel. While that does not come to fruition, Basel serves as the host for nine more Congresses.
- 1919 The Jewish Agency is established in Switzerland at the World Zionist Congress.
- 1928 An article in the American Journal of Sociology shows a rapid rise in intermarriage among Swiss Jews between 1888 and 1920. According to the study, most intermarriage (including Christians marrying other Christian sects) in Switzerland involves Jews.
- World War II Despite Switzerland's veneer of neutrality, it aids the Nazis. Swiss banks guard the assets of Nazi war criminals. They hold the assets of Jews who were murdered by the Nazi regime. Swiss financing helps sustain the Reich and provides the Zyklon B used in the gas chambers. Jewish refugees who enter Switzerland are sent to work camps. Germany adds the letter "J" to Jewish passports at the request of the Swiss. Swiss banking secrecy laws are not applied to the Jews.
- 1942 A law barring asylum on the basis of race serves as a justification to keep out thousands of Jews seeking escape from the Nazis.
- 1947 The Great Synagogue in Basel is restored.
- 1972 The Jewish community of Basel is the first Jewish community to be recognized as a sanctioned corporation.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Jews are well represented in the textile and clockwork industries, although Jews are underrepresented in the chemical industry—Switzerland's largest industry. Jews also do not play a large role in Switzerland's banking industry, despite their international representation elsewhere, although Edmond Safra ran his banking magnate from Switzerland.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

In 1999, Switzerland elected its first Jewish president, Ruth Dreifuss. She was also Switzerland's first female president. Some prominent Jews to have called Switzerland their home include businessman, philanthropist, and banker Edmond Safra, Albert Cohen, Nobel Laureate Elias Canetti, Jeanne Hersch, literary critic Jean Starobinski, international law expert Paul Guggenheim, violinist Yehudi Menuhin, and composer Ernest Bloch. Albert Einstein spent his youth in Switzerland and obtained his doctorate in Zurich. Zionist leader Ze'ev Jabotinsky studied law in Switzerland. Chaim Weizman spent time in university in Switzerland. Prominent Jews who became part of the Russian Revolution, such as Lenin and Leon Trotsky, also spent time in Switzerland.

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

The Swiss Jewish population is well organized. The Swiss Federation of Jewish Communities (SIG/FCI) serves as an umbrella organization representing more than 23 different Jewish organizations. The umbrella organization of the Swiss Jewish community does not include the ultra-Orthodox community or the Reform community. The Schweizerischer Israelitischer Gemeindebund (the Swiss Jewish Community) was established to protest the prohibition against kosher slaughter.

In the 1950s and 1960s, the federation was working on the issue of dormant accounts held by Jews in Swiss banks, an issue that only gained international prominence in the last decade of the 20th century. The federation was also a founding member of the World Jewish Congress. Many international Jewish organizations have offices in Switzerland. Particularly in the large cities, Switzerland has thriving Jewish institutions, youth groups, synagogues, kosher restaurants, and Jewish bookstores. Traditional, ultra-Orthodox, Sephardi, Reform, and Conservative synagogues operate in Switzerland. Nine Jewish schools operate in five cities of Switzerland. There are also three German Jewish newspapers and one French Jewish newspaper.

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionism, and Existential Problems of the Community

The SIG/FCI plays an important role in distributing kosher food, because of the prohibition on ritual slaughter in Switzerland. Thus, kosher meat is imported. Many animal rights activists, however, have led campaigns against the importation of kosher meat. They have been joined by anti-Semites who use animal rights as a cover for their anti-Jewish positions. In 2002, the government considered rescinding the ban on domestic slaughter, but in the wake of a public campaign with anti-Semitic overtones, the government surrendered to public opposition and maintained the prohibition on domestic slaughter while permitting importation of kosher meat.

Switzerland has generally been seen as supportive toward Israel, while maintaining its noted neutrality. This support seems to have strengthened in the 1960s and 1970s due to a terrorist attack against an El Al plane in Zurich in 1969 and sabotage on a Swissair flight headed to Israel in 1970.

Anti-Semitic attacks have been fueled by the Israel-Palestinian conflict, the issue of Swiss control of Jewish assets during the Holocaust, and Muslim terror. In 2004, Switzerland began imposing taxes on Israeli exports that come from Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip (before Israel's pullout from Gaza in the summer of 2005). More than a dozen Palestinian and left-wing organizations in Switzerland launched a boycott against Israeli goods in 2003. Aimed not only at Israeli products, the boycott is also aimed at Jewish-owned businesses. In 2003, a Jewish senior foreign ministry official, Ambassador Thomas Kupfer, the head of the ministry's Middle East department, wrote a letter to a pro-Palestinian group that referred to Palestinian suicide bombers as "resistance fighters."

In 2003, the Swiss government provided sponsorship to the Geneva Initiative between a group of Israeli and Palestinian academics and political leaders. The sponsorship was criticized by a small group of Swiss legislatures, arguing that it harmed Swiss-Israel relations and violated Swiss principles of neutrality.

A Swiss government report made claims that anti-Semitic acts would lead to violent extremist responses by the Jewish community. It also referred to Jewish students as armed radicals; before being edited, the original version of the report stated that “Jewish political extremism manifests itself in the conduct of associations fighting for the Zionist cause.”

Additionally, certain Swiss cantons have laws that deny Jews (as well as Muslims) the right to practice their religion. Jewish and Muslim law require that coreligionists be buried in a religious cemetery; however, the cantons of Geneva and Neuchâtel mandate burial in state-owned cemeteries.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

Jews make up only a tiny percentage of Switzerland’s population, although there have been Jews in Switzerland for hundreds of years. Making up only 0.2 percent of the population, the Jewish population is mostly centered in the four major cities of Zurich, Geneva, Basel, and Bern. About 18,000 Jews live in Switzerland. While mostly centered in the major communities, there are also Jews who live in smaller nearby cantons. The number of Swiss Jews has remained fairly stable since the early 20th century, but the relative proportion has declined owing partly to emigration, an aging population, and intermarriage.

Many Ashkenazi Jews settled in Switzerland after the Soviet invasion of Hungary in 1956 and the crushing of Prague Spring in 1968. After decolonialization in North Africa, many North African Jews settled in Switzerland. There has also been more aliyah (immigration to Israel) than in other similar European communities.

Selected Bibliography

- Blau, Gisela. 1999. “Swiss Jews Raise their Guard.” The Jerusalem Report, November 22.
- “Communities/Switzerland.” 2005. European Jewish Congress Web site. http://www.eurojewcong.org/ejc/news.php?id\_article=121 (accessed May 4, 2007).
- Elazar, Daniel J. “The Jewish Agency: Historic Role and Current Crisis.” Jewish Center for Public Affairs Web site. <http://www.jcpa.org/dje/articles/ja-role.htm> (accessed May 4, 2007).
- Engelman, Uriah Z. 1928. “Intermarriage among Jews in Switzerland 1888 1920.” The American Journal of Sociology 34 (3, November): 516–523.
- Finder, Joseph. “Unaccountable.” The New Republic 219 (November 23, 1998): 21.
- Hein, Avi. 2008. The Virtual Jewish History Tour: Switzerland. <http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsourc/vjw/swiss.html> (accessed May 4, 2007).
- Jacobs, Joseph, and Meyer Kayserling. “Switzerland.” Jewish Encyclopedia. <http://www.jewishencyclopedia.com/view.jsp?artid=1201&letter=S> (accessed May 4, 2007).
- Rosenthal, John. 2003. “Anti-Semitism and Ethnicity in Europe,” Policy Review 121 (October): 17–38.
- “Swiss Group Boycotts Israeli and Jewish Products” JTA Global News Service Web site. http://www.jta.org/page\_view\_story.asp?intarticleid=12928&intcategoryid=2 (accessed May 4, 2007).

- “Swiss Keep Kosher Slaughter Ban, But Will Guarantee Import of Meat.” JTA Global News Service Web site. http://www.jta.org/page\_view\_story.asp?intarticleid=11060&intcategoryid=2 (accessed May 4, 2007).
- “Swiss Legislators Blast Government for Its Support of the ‘Geneva Accord.’” JTA Global News Service Web site. http://www.jta.org/page\_view\_story.asp?intarticleid=13640&intcategoryid=2 (accessed May 4, 2007).
- Tal, Rami, ed. 2005. The Jewish People Policy Planning Institute Annual Assessment 2004–2005: The Jewish People between Thriving and Decline. Jerusalem: Gefen.
- Traynor, Ian. 2005. “Swiss Jews Furious at Report Warning of Violent Extremism.” The Guardian, January 5. <http://www.guardian.co.uk/international/story/0,3604,1383271,00.html> (accessed May 4, 2007).
- “Uproar over Swiss Officials’ Letter Condoning Suicide Attacks on Israel,” JTA Global News Service Web site. http://www.jta.org/page\_view\_story.asp?intarticleid=12566&intcategoryid=2 (accessed May 4, 2007).

Jews in the United Kingdom

William D. Rubinstein and Avram Hein

---

General Population: 60,000,000

Jewish Population: 280,000 to 330,000

Percent of Population: Less than 1 percent

Jewish Population by City: Most Jews live in London. Manchester is home to some 30,000 Jews, and Glasgow, Leeds, and Liverpool are home to substantial Jewish communities.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Sephardic Jews from Spain in the 15th and 16th centuries; Ashkenazim from Russia and Eastern Europe in the 19th and 20th centuries

Languages Spoken: English and Yiddish

---

Historical Overview

First millennium CE Individual Jews may have visited England in the early centuries of the first millennium, perhaps as merchants from Phoenicia buying tin from Cornwall, but there is no settled community of Jews in England until after 1066. Jews are recorded as having lived in England in the ninth century CE.

1066–1290 After the Norman conquest of England in 1066, Jews from France and Germany are permitted to settle in London and other large towns of medieval England exclusively to work as royal tax collectors and moneylenders, activities forbidden to Catholics. These Jews and their families, maybe 3,000 in total, are the King’s property. The Jewish community has its own structure of government, headed, from about 1183, by an “arch-presbyter” (Presbyter Judaeorum), appointed by the king, who apparently combines a secular and religious role. Medieval English Jews can only live in designated ghettos. Although they enjoy the protection of the Crown, they are subject to increasing attacks, to some extent encouraged by the Church.

1144 On Passover a Christian boy, William of Norwich, is found murdered. Local Jews are accused of ritual murder, the first such accusation in British history.

1190 The Jews of York are burnt alive in Clifford's Tower, where they had sought protection from a mob; it is one of the worst pogroms of the Middle Ages.

1255 A Christian boy, Hugh of Lincoln, is found murdered. Eighteen Jews are falsely executed for the crime, and Hugh is declared a saint by the Church.

In 1290, King Edward I expels Jews from England. Jews are legally forbidden to live in England from 1290 until 1656, although it is known that small groups of Marranos live in London, and there are other notable exceptions.

1594 Dr. Roderigo Lopez, Queen Elizabeth's Jewish physician, is executed as a Spanish spy. He is generally believed to have been the model for Shylock in Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice. As his example suggests, Jews are still viewed antipathetically by both writers and ordinary people, although Shakespeare's depiction is unusually three-dimensional.

1650s After the execution of King Charles I and the installation of a military dictatorship led by the Puritan commander Oliver Cromwell, the political climate becomes distinctly philo-Semitic. The Puritans who had abolished the monarchy have a great deal of sympathy with all things Jewish. Puritan divines read the Old Testament in Hebrew. Some are even circumcised.

1650 Manasseh Ben Israel's Spes Israel (The Hope of Israel) is published; it is believed to be the trigger for Cromwell's interest in Judaism. The book argues that the Second Coming of Christ, desired by the Puritans, will not occur until Jews are allowed to live in every country, and therefore should not be barred from living in England.

1651 Amsterdam rabbi Menasseh ben Israel petitions Cromwell to allow Jews to reenter England. This petition unleashes five years of furious debate among the Puritan divines and the army that runs the country during the Interregnum.

June 1656 Lord Protector Cromwell's Council of State agrees to permit Jews to meet together for private worship. In truth, however, the Cromwellian resettlement is not a resettlement at all. Sephardic Marranos, crypto-Jews fleeing the Spanish Inquisition, had been living in England, very quietly, since at least 1536. It is not Menasseh's petition that is granted in 1656, but that of seven Marranos already living in London. Furious with Menasseh for having poked his unwelcome nose into their business, they argue simply for the right of private worship for Jews already settled here, and for permission to purchase land for a cemetery outside city limits. A synagogue is established in London as early as December 1656.

1660s After the restoration of the monarchy in 1660, with Charles II as king, it is feared that Jews would again be compelled to leave, but the new king is also favorable to the Jews. As early as 1667 it is established that Jews may swear in courts on the Old Testament.

1670s Moves in Parliament to make Jews subject to a special tax are thrown out, never to be raised again.

- 1690 A small Ashkanazi synagogue is established.
- 1700 A Jewish community of about 850, mainly Sephardic, exists in London.
- 1701 The synagogue at Bevis Marks is rebuilt. This synagogue, a replica of the Great Synagogue in Amsterdam, is still standing and in regular use, the oldest surviving synagogue in Britain.
- 18th century Ashkenazim eventually outnumber Sephardim, a situation that is intensified when, in 1714, the elector of Hanover becomes a King George I of England. Several large and imposing Ashkenazic synagogues are built in London, which by the mid-18th century also boasts a number of smaller houses of worship, shtiebls, established by less wealthy Jews of German and Polish origin. During the course of the century, large numbers of Polish Jews settle in England—small tradespeople and itinerant peddlers. Jewish communities begin to thrive in the large provincial towns, such as Birmingham, Manchester, and Leeds, as well as in Glasgow and Edinburgh, Scotland, and Cardiff and Swansea, Wales. Most of these congregations were so small they could not afford to appoint a full-time rabbi. Instead, they looked to the rabbi of the oldest Ashkenazic synagogue in England, the Great Synagogue in London, as their religious leader. Successive rabbis of the Great Synagogue came to be regarded as the chief rabbis of the German and Polish Jews of Britain. The community of Spanish and Portuguese Jews languish. At the beginning of the 18th century there are some 2,000 Spanish and Portuguese Jews in England. The number had not grown significantly by the end of the century, mostly because of intermarriage and assimilation.
- 1750 The Jewish population of Britain is around 8,000.
- 1753 The government of George II agrees to sponsor legislation to make it easier for foreign-born Jews to become naturalized British citizens. No sooner has the legislation passed than a vicious agitation is whipped up against it by opposition politicians. After these “Jew Bill” riots, the act is quickly repealed in 1754.
- 1760 The Board of Deputies of British Jews, the central representative body of the Jewish community, is founded.
- 1780 The rabbi of the Great Synagogue in London is recognized as the chief rabbi of the British Empire.
- 1790s–1815 The period of the French Revolution and the Napoleonic Wars marks a watershed in the history of British Jewry. Further immigration of foreign-born Jews to Britain all but ceases. At the same time, Jewish financiers enter into lucrative partnerships with the government and are especially helpful in financing the war effort. When the Duke of Wellington’s army needs to be paid in gold in Spain, the only banking house in London that can guarantee such payments is the English branch of the House of Rothschild. At the other end of the social scale, Jews serve in Admiral Lord Nelson’s navy and fight under his command at the Battle of Trafalgar (1805). At this time the Jewish population of Britain numbers around 20,000.
- 19th century The religious leadership of British Jewry, in the shape of successive chief rabbis, Solomon Hirschel (1802–1842) and Nathan Adler (1845–1890), is ambivalent on the issue of political emancipation of British Jews. Although neither Hirschel nor Adler opposes political emancipation, neither is enthusiastic about a process they fear will encourage assimilation. The two issues that preoccupy these rabbis are the religious laxity of British Jewry overall and the establishment of a Reform synagogue in London in the early 1840s. Hirschel issues a ban on the Reform congregation, and Adler forms a strong alliance against it with the acknowledged lay leader of British Jewry, banker and born-again ultra-Orthodox Moses Montefiore, who as president of the board of deputies ensures that no “Reformer” can be elected a deputy. The deputies play a minimal role in the campaign for political emancipation.

- 1835 Jews receive the right to vote in parliamentary elections, a right they had in practice been exercising freely, though illegally, for some considerable time hitherto. Jews can vote, but if elected to Parliament they can take their seats only if they swear an oath “on the true faith of a Christian.” Converted Jews can, of course, take their seats if they swear this oath; Benjamin Disraeli, the future prime minister first elected to Parliament in 1837, was one such.
- 1840s Reform Judaism is founded in 1840–1842, and a weekly Jewish newspaper begins printing in 1841.
- 1847 Lord Palmerston, the foreign minister, makes a famous speech defending the use of force to protect Don Pacifico, a Jew who is a British subject, who was the victim of an anti-Semitic riot in Athens.
- 1855 The first Jewish lord mayor of London is elected, and Jews College, an Orthodox rabbinical seminary, is established.
- 1870 Most Orthodox Ashkenazi synagogues group together in an association known as the United Synagogue, which recognizes the chief rabbi as its head. Most Jews live in London.
- 1887 The Federation of Synagogues is founded; it represents right-wing Orthodox and is a rival to the United Synagogue.
- 1880s–1910s The assassination of Czar Alexander II of Russia in 1881 and the subsequent persecution of Russian Jews results in a profound and fundamental change in the size and social composition of British Jewry. In the mid-Victorian period, there are perhaps 60,000 Jews living in the British Isles. This number increases to 85,000 in 1880, 240,000 in 1900, and 300,000 in 1914. Many of these immigrants settle in Whitechapel, in London’s East End, which becomes well-known as a heavily Jewish area. This “native” community is then swamped by at least twice that number of Jewish refugees from Russia and Russian-Poland. Mostly poor, Yiddish-speaking, Orthodox, socialist and Zionist, these new arrivals, the bulk of whom came in the period 1882–1906, pose major challenges for the existing community.
- 1904 Zionist Chaim Weizmann comes to England to teach chemistry at Manchester University; eventually, he becomes the first president of the State of Israel.
- 1905 Chiefly because of alarm at Russian Jewish immigration, Parliament passes the Aliens Act, which gives immigration officials the right to refuse entry to “aliens,” the British legal term for anyone not a citizen of the British Empire.

This cuts the number of Jewish immigrants in 1905–1914 by about one-third. Immigration is even more heavily restricted after 1918.

1909 Herbert Samuel is the first professing Jew to enter the British cabinet.

1910s–1920s When Britain takes control of Palestine from Turkey, the government offers it to the Jews as a “national home,” in the famous Balfour Declaration. Britain’s control of the Palestine Mandate from 1917 until 1948 makes England one of the most important centers of the Zionist move movement. About 60,000 Jews serve in the British military during World War I. General Sir John Monash, of German Jewish parentage, is commander-in-chief of the Australian armies during the war. The Bolshevik Revolution of 1917 and war unrest brings about heightened British anti-Semitism in 1917–1922, with, for instance, the dissemination of The Protocols of the Elders of Zion for the first time in Britain in 1920.

Late 1930s Britain admits about 75,000 Jewish and “non-Aryan Christian” refugees from Nazi Germany, especially after 1938.

1939–1945 Britain declares war on Nazi Germany in September. During World War II, British Jews play a prominent role in society and the military, and thousands of Jews serve in the armed forces. In 1943, Anglo-Jewish film star Leslie Howard and Wilfrid B. Israel, a member of an important British Jewish family, are killed when their civilian airliner is shot down by the German Luftwaffe off the coast of France. Their plane was returning to Britain from Spain, where Howard had been actively supporting Britain’s war effort and Israel was aiding Jewish refugees.

1946–1947 An anti-Semitic backlash occurs in Britain after violent reprisals against British troops by Zionist extremists in Palestine.

1950s–1960s Israel receives almost universal support in Britain, and levels of anti-Semitism decline except among neo-Nazi groups. Internal issues come to dominate Anglo-Jewry, for instance the so-called Jacobs Affair of 1961, concerning the appointment of Rabbi Louis Jacobs, an Orthodox rabbi with liberal views, to head Jews College. This leads to the beginnings of the Masorti (Conservative) movement in Britain. This period also sees a considerable growth in strictly Orthodox and Charedi movements, virtually unknown in Britain before World War II, and among Reform and Liberal synagogues. The growth of the two extremes weakens the influence of the mainstream Orthodox United Synagogue and the chief rabbi. Considerable friction emerges between the various strands in Anglo-Jewish religious life. After about 1950, Jews virtually abandon the East End, moving to north and northeast London, especially to such neighborhoods as Golders Green and Stamford Hill. Provincial Jewish communities decline; only Manchester, Leeds, Gateshead, and south coast towns like Brighton show vigor. Britain’s Jewish population likely peaked at about 390,000, or higher, around 1955.

2002 The British government enacts an annual Holocaust Memorial Day.

2004 Michael Grade, a Jew, is appointed to head the BBC, which is often seen as hostile to Israel.

2005 Notable Anglo-Jewish writer Harold Pinter wins the Nobel Prize in Literature.

Contemporary Overview

Demography

Two-thirds of British Jewry lives in the London area. The rest are centered in three major cities: Manchester (30,000), Leeds (10,000), and Glasgow (6,000). Smaller communities exist in Birmingham, Liverpool, Leicester, Brighton, Gateshead, Southend, Bournemouth, Newcastle, and Edinburgh, and scores of Jews are spread out in smaller communities.

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Anglo-Jewry is solidly middle class: 52 percent of Jews are in the professions, compared with 9 percent of the general population. Twenty-one percent of Jews hold managerial positions. The Jewish community is disproportionately represented in commerce, retail, and the professions.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

British Jewry enjoys a rich cultural life. The United Kingdom has several museums and art galleries focusing on Jewish life and culture. Jewish studies courses are available at major universities.

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

Anglo Jewry has traditionally been centered on the synagogue. In recent years, there has been a shift away from the synagogues in favor of professional institutional agencies. Nevertheless, unlike North America, there are no community centers. Communal activity is also centered on the synagogue. The main organization is the Board of Deputies of British Jews, founded in 1760, which comprises synagogue representatives and several other Jewish organizations. It purports to serve as the official voice of British Jewry.

The United Synagogue serves as the main synagogue body of British Jewry, yet it only represents the Orthodox community. The chief rabbi of Great Britain, Dr. Jonathan Sacks, was formerly the head of the United Synagogue. There is also the London beth din (religious court), which also operates under Orthodox auspices.

Although much of the “official” structure of Anglo Jewry is Orthodox, most British Jews do not identify as Orthodox. According to a 1998 survey, 10 percent identify as Orthodox, 2 percent identify as Traditional (many Masorti/Conservative), 15 percent as Progressive (liberal or Reform), 20 percent as “Just Jewish” and 23 percent as secular. Nevertheless, two-thirds of all families belong to a synagogue, mostly centered in London.

Other synagogue bodies include the Spanish and Portuguese Jews’ Congregation, the (Orthodox) Federation of Synagogues, the Union of Orthodox Hebrew Congregations, the (Conservative) Assembly of Masorti Synagogues, and the Reform Synagogues of Great Britain and the Union of Liberal and Progressive Synagogues. The Assembly of Masorti Synagogues was founded by the late Rabbi Dr. Louis Jacobs, who split from the Orthodox establishment over disputes over his acceptance of academic scientific biblical criticism.

Interior of the Spanish and Portuguese Jews' Congregation Synagogue, London. (Photo by Jono David)

Several newspapers focus on Anglo Jewry. The largest, read by 75 percent of Jewish families, is the Jewish Chronicle. The London Jewish News is a relatively new addition to Anglo-Jewish media. The Jewish Telegraph publishes editions in Manchester, Leeds, Glasgow, and Liverpool. The Jewish Quarterly is a monthly magazine.

BICOM, the Britain Israel Communications and Research Centre, is a pro-Israel organization founded in the wake of the second Intifada that aims to serve as a lobby in the United Kingdom. It engages in educational and advocacy work to promote relations between the United Kingdom and Israel.

The Anglo Jewish community hosts an annual week-long pluralistic Jewish learning seminar during the last week of December. Founded in 1981, the Limmud conference is Europe's largest Jewish educational event, with over 2,300 participants and 370 speakers from North America, Israel, and Europe. This grassroots learning event is pluralistic and nondenominational. Events range from musical performances, storytelling, lectures from Jews and non-Jews, and traditional text study.

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionism, and Existential Problems of the Community

Most hostility to Jews in Britain today comes from left-wing and Muslim anti-Zionist groups, now generally regarded as far more threatening than right-wing neo-Nazi groups. After the London terror attacks of July 7, 2005, which killed three Jews, including one Israeli, the Jewish community significantly beefed up its security. The attacks were not directed at Jewish targets, but it was assumed that Islamic terrorism is a threat to Jewish sites. In the wake of the second Intifada, the Jewish community has had a security service since the 1930s called the Community Service Trust.

Several prominent teachers unions were hijacked by a vocal anti-Israel minority. This vocal minority advocated divestment from Israel and a boycott of Israeli scholars, refusing to publish them in academic journals or engage in research with Israeli lecturers. In addition, several Muslim leaders called on the British government to abolish Holocaust Day in exchange for a Genocide Day in order to avoid alienating the Muslim community. They demanded that other atrocities, including what they claim to be Israel's genocide of the Palestinians, be included in this commemoration. This demand was not supported by the British government.

Former mayor of London Ken Livingstone is known to have made numerous anti-Israel and anti-Semitic remarks. He once said a Jewish reporter behaved like a Nazi guard. He maintains positive ties with Sheikh Yusuf al Qaradawi, who has publicly embraced suicide bombers.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

Jews make up 0.5 percent of the United Kingdom population. United Kingdom Jewry is steadily shrinking from a high of 450,000 people in 1950 to approximately 300,000 in 2001. Estimates of the Jewish population in 2003 range from 280,000 to 330,000.

The population has declined by 25 percent largely because of emigration (mostly to Israel), low birthrates, and assimilation. The birthrate of 10 per thousand population is lower than the death rate of 12.5 per thousand (slightly higher than the average rate in England and Wales). Because of the negative balance, there is an annual negative population growth of approximately 1,000 people. The population is also undergoing a rapid graying process despite the immigration of about 30,000 Israelis to the United Kingdom. Today, most British Jews live in the affluent suburbs of London and Manchester and the south coast towns of Southend, Brighton, and Bournemouth. They work for the most part in professional occupations. And on average they are about a third wealthier than their non-Jewish counterparts. In addition, there is a high rise in intermarriage: 38 percent of all married Jewish men are married to non-Jews and 50 percent of married Jewish women under 30 are also married to non-Jews. This is being recognized by the Jewish community and some Progressive synagogues are now performing mixed marriages.

Selected Bibliography

- Alderman, Geoffrey. 1992. Modern British Jewry. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.
- Bulkacz, Vanessa. 2006. "One Year after London Attacks, U.K. Jews Stress Communal Security." Jewish Telegraphic Agency (JTA), July 11. http://jta.org/page\_view\_story.asp?intarticleid=16806&intcategoryid=2 (accessed May 3, 2007).
- Cesarani, David, ed. 1990. The Making of Modern Anglo-Jewry. Oxford, UK: Basil Blackwell.
- Endelman, Todd. 2002. The Jews of Britain, 1656 to 2000. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Hyamson, Albert M. 1928. A History of the Jews in Britain. London: Methuen.
- Katz, David S. 1996. The Jews in the History of Britain, 1485–1850. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

- Langham, Raphael. 2005. The Jews in Britain: A Chronology. Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Lipman, V. D. 1990. A History of the Jews in Britain since 1858. Leicester, UK: Leicester University Press.
- Morris, Andrew. 2004. "At Limmud Conference, Approach Is Inclusive, and From Bottom Up." Jewish Telegraphic Agency (JTA), January. http://jta.org/page\_view\_story.asp?intarticleid=13642&intcategoryid=5 (accessed May 3, 2007).
- Peled, Daniella. 2005. "Row over Holocaust Memorial Day Shows U.K. Muslim-Jewish Tension." Jewish Telegraphic Agency (JTA), September 13. http://jta.org/page\_view\_story.asp?intarticleid=15835&intcategoryid=2 (accessed May 3, 2007).
- Roth, Cecil. 1978. A History of the Jews in England. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.
- Rubinstein, W. D. 1996. A History of the Jews in the English-Speaking World: Great Britain. Basingstoke, UK: St. Martin's Press.
- Tigay, Chanan. 2006. "Groups Mobilize as British Teachers Consider Another Boycott of Israelis." Jewish Telegraphic Agency (JTA), May 16. http://jta.org/page\_view\_story.asp?intarticleid=16618&intcategoryid=2 (accessed May 3, 2007).

History of Jewish Wealth in Britain

William D. Rubinstein

---

The economic elite of the Jewish community of Britain had a number of distinctive characteristics that set it apart from its equivalents elsewhere. Evidence suggests that Jews made up a considerably smaller percentage of top wealth holders than in many other European societies. A Jewish community existed in England in the Middle Ages, between about 1066 and 1290, when it was expelled. These Jews were chiefly engaged as tax collectors on behalf of the Norman kings. A number were also moneylenders and became very wealthy, although it is difficult to compare their wealth with that of the richest Christians. Aaron of Lincoln (d. 1186), the richest member of this community, was reputedly worth £25,000, an extraordinary sum at the time.

After their expulsion, Jews were not legally able to live in England until they were readmitted by Oliver Cromwell in 1656. In this long period when Jews were absent from English society, the institutions and culture of the country altered profoundly. Protestantism replaced Catholicism. As a result, the Catholic ban on usury vanished and, by the Elizabethan age (1558–1603), the English had already become renowned merchants and traders, with a sophisticated infrastructure and laws that protected property. At the fringes of the established Anglican Church, so-called Non-conformist Protestant sects (e.g., Baptists, Congregationalists, Quakers) emerged that often exemplified Max Weber's "protestant ethic" thesis, which sees an affinity between Protestantism and capitalism. Scotland adopted Prebyterianism as its official religion, a Calvinist form of Protestantism that was also favorable to capitalism. Jews thus reentered a highly sophisticated society with a relatively advanced capitalist framework highly favorable to entrepreneurship. It had few, if any, feudal survivals and no peasants or serfs; it was permeated by what Thomas Carlyle termed the “cash nexus.” By 1750, however, a small, mainly Sephardic community of Jewish financiers and merchants existed in London. It suffered from few overt legal restrictions, and in general could operate freely as businesspeople. Some, like Sir Sampson Gideon (1745–1824) became very wealthy and—after converting to Anglicanism—even joined the aristocracy. Jews were often close to the dominant Whig government, especially as loan contractors.

Nevertheless, Britain increasingly diverged from the Continent in many ways that affected the Jewish economic structure. From about 1760, Britain saw the world’s first Industrial Revolution, which revolved around the mass production of cotton goods in factories, railways, coal mining, engineering, and other facets of heavy industry and manufacturing. These classical industries of Britain’s Industrial Revolution had little or no Jewish presence, being overwhelmingly dominated by Protestants, often Nonconformists like Quakers or Unitarians. There was thus little or no Jewish presence in the economic elites of such industrial cities as Birmingham, Glasgow, and Newcastle. A number of largely industrial cities like Manchester and Bradford did have a successful Jewish presence, chiefly of German Jewish migrants, but they generally worked as merchants rather than as manufacturers, and the Jewish presence was comparatively small. Britain’s tremendous economic and demographic growth after about 1760 also enriched its landed aristocracy, which often owned vast tracts of urban property and minerals as well as agricultural land. The very wealthiest British landed aristocrats like the dukes of Westminster and Devonshire remained probably the richest men in Europe until the 20th century.

Jews were, however, much more prominent in the City of London, the square mile in the eastern part of central London that functions as its financial hub, similar to Wall Street in New York. A Jewish economic elite did emerge there from the 18th century on. In the period between around 1860 and 1914, when it was at its zenith, it was largely centered in a number of interrelated families known as the “Cousinhood,” which included the Rothschilds, Sir Moses Montefiore (1784–1885), Sir Isaac L. Goldsmid, Sir Samuel Montagu (Lord Swaythling), and their relatives, as well as such older families as the Cohens, Mocattas, and D’Avigdors, and relatively new families like the Sterns and Sassoons. Most were of Sephardic or German Ashkenazi background and usually remained Orthodox Jews for most of this period. They were regarded as the acknowledged leaders of the Anglo-Jewish community. Sir Moses Montefiore was the preeminent figure in Anglo-Jewish life for 70 years until his death at the age of 101. When the British government issued the Balfour Declaration in 1917, it was addressed to Lord Rothschild, although he held no official position in either the Anglo-Jewish community or the British government.

During this period, the Anglo-Jewish community secured equal rights in all spheres of public life and met relatively little anti-Semitism before the arrival of 200,000 Jews from Russia after 1881. The “Cousinhood” was, however, relatively divided over a range of issues, including religion and Zionism.

Probably about 10 percent of Britain’s nonlanded millionaires and richest men of the period 1870–1914 were Jews, with about three per cent, a much lower figure, among all British persons who bequeathed £100,000 or more. These levels were almost certainly much lower than in Germany—where, it seems, about 31 percent of the country's richest families around 1910 were Jewish or originally Jewish—or elsewhere in central Europe, although higher than in the United States, where Protestants comprised the overwhelming majority of America's super-rich during the period of Gilded Age capitalism (1865–1929). Anglo-Jewry's economic elite probably seemed to observers to be larger and more influential than it really was. Minorities are always noticed. The Prince of Wales (later Edward VII, king from 1901–1910) was particularly close to this Jewish elite and was said by some to have had a Jewish “court,” which included English families like the Rothschilds, Sassoons, and the banker Sir Ernest Cassel, and South Africans like the Beits. The Anglo-Jewish economic elite was centered in the West End of London and was in the public eye. Nevertheless, its limitations should be kept in mind. It was disproportionately represented only in merchant banking, stockbroking, and a few other similar areas of finance. Even here it was far from predominant. The Barings, the great rival family to the as international financial titans the Rothschilds, were Gentiles. Jews had virtually no connection with any clearing bank (branch banks like Barclays and Lloyds), which were mainly founded and owned by Protestant Nonconformist families. Jews were virtually unrepresented in shipping, the lifeblood of Britain's worldwide commercial empire, or large-scale retailing. As noted, Jews were almost unknown in the economies of many big cities outside London. As a result, Jews probably attracted less hostility than in other countries, especially as Jewish merchant bankers had little nexus with ordinary persons as employers and seldom owned factories or mines where they might well be hated by their workers.

The power of the Cousinhood was adversely affected by World War I and, essentially, never recovered. The war ended the financial hegemony of the city of London. In the interwar period, however, new Jewish families emerged as highly successful in the British economy. These included (for the first time) a number of great retailers, especially the Marks and Sieff families of Marks & Spencers, the most famous British chain store; Sir Monatgue Burton of Burton's, a famous chain of men's clothiers; Sir Isaac Wolfson; and Sir Charles Clore. Jews also played a role in the entertainment industry, founding cinema chains and record companies (Decca records), and in restaurant chains like J.Lyons & Co. The Marks and Sieff families, who began in Manchester rather than London, were probably the greatest donors to the Zionist movement in the world. The appearance of these families probably reflected a shift of the British economy toward domestic rather than international capitalism and toward more “modern,” consumer-oriented businesses.

After World War II, British Jews were especially prominent in property development, one of the few areas in which it remained possible to become wealthy in postwar Britain, where taxation had reached extraordinary levels. Many used the opportunities created by rebuilding and rehousing after the destruction caused by the war. A few, like Howard Samuel and his cousin, Lord Samuel of Wych Cross, Harry Hyams, and Jack Cotton, became well known. Most of the second and third generation of the wave of immigrants of 1881–1914 entered the professions or family businesses, and there have possibly been fewer Jewish self-made millionaires after about 1965 than in the past. Some, however, still appear, such as Philip Green, the retailing king who is one of the wealthiest individuals in Britain. Successful Jewish immigrants can still be found as well, such as Roman Abramovitch, the Russian oil mogul and owner of the Chelsea football team. Probably about 8–10 percent of persons on the Sunday Times Rich Lists are Jews, compared with the Jewish overall percentage of 0.5 percent, but it would be more accurate to describe the contemporary Anglo-Jewish community as more notable for high levels of affluence rather than for a handful of the astronomically wealthy. It is probably also more accurate to view Anglo-Jewry as a component of the Jewish Diaspora in the English-speaking world rather than part of a pan-European Jewish world, in a society with little hostility to capitalism or to Jews.

Selected Bibliography

- Bermant, Chaim. 1971. The Cousinhood. London: Eyre and Spottiswoode.
- Pollins, Harold. 1982. The Economic History of the Jews in England. East Rutherford, NJ: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press
- Rubinstein, William. 2001. "Jewish Top Wealth-holders in Britain, 1809–1909." Jewish Historical Studies 37: 133–162.
- Rubinstein, William D. 2000. "Jews in the Economic Elite of Western Nations and Antisemitism." Jewish Journal of Sociology 42 (1, 2): 5–35.

The British Chief Rabbinate

Raymond Apple

---

Britain has had a chief rabbi, the recognized spiritual head of the community, since the early 19th century, though the office has a long prehistory. Before the expulsion from England in 1290 there was an Episcopus Judaeorum, who was possibly a chief rabbi, and King John acknowledged a certain Rabbi Jacob of London as "Presbyter of the Jews of all England." After the resettlement in 1656, the dominant group was the Sephardim whose spiritual leader was generally styled hakam. Later in the 17th century, the first Ashkenazi congregation was founded, with several brief rabbinic incumbencies until the appointment of Aaron Hart as rabbi of the Great Synagogue. He held office from 1709 to 1756, supported by wealthy members of his family. Hart's brother Moses was largely responsible for erecting the Great Synagogue, and Moses' daughter gave a large amount to enlarge the synagogue. Aaron Hart had a Halachic controversy with the rabbi of a rival synagogue, and both published Hebrew tracts stating their case—probably the first post-resettlement Hebrew works to appear in England, though there were significant pre-Expulsion Hebrew scholars.

Hart was succeeded as rabbi of the Great Synagogue by Hart Lyon (Hirschel Levin; 1756–1764); some lists of chief rabbis include his son Saul Berlin, who never actually held office and was the author of forged responsa, Besamim Rosh, which created great controversy. After an incumbency by David Tevele Schiff (1765–1792) there was an interregnum until 1802 when the position was given to Solomon Hirschel, who was born in England, another son of Hirschel Levin. At that period there were no significant rabbinic rivals to Hirschel, who by default became acknowledged as rabbinic head of the whole community (the Gentile population generally called him “High Priest of the Jews”).

Unlike his brother Saul, Hirschel was highly traditional in his views and barely acquainted with modern intellectual movements, though he was not without some general education. He could speak English but when he preached it was generally in Yiddish. His long incumbency saw the community lose its essentially “foreign” character and become increasingly anglicized. Hirschel found it hard to come to terms with the growing religious laxity of his constituents, especially when, late in his career, the Reform movement came to England, even though here it was less radical than in Germany and, later, in the United States. To Hirschel any type of reform was scandalous and he placed a ban (herem) on the “seceders.” Not only did he oppose the movement and its policies, but it offended him that the minister appointed by the reform congregation, which became known as the West London Synagogue of British Jews (“British” because it rejected the existing demarcation between “Portuguese” and “German” Jews) was his former student David W. Marks, who, though he had no university degree, became professor of Hebrew at University College, London.

Hirschel died in 1842. It was clear that the Hirschel model would no longer suffice in the changed circumstances of British Jewry, and his successor would need to be not merely a rav but a rabbiner. The community chose Nathan Marcus Adler, who was university trained and had a broad general education and wide experience of ecclesiastical administration in Germany. Adler had family connections with the chief rabbinate: his grandmother was the sister of David Tevele Schiff. A competing candidate was Samson Raphael Hirsch, later the pioneer of neoorthodoxy on the European continent. Cecil Roth wrote that where “the office of chief rabbi had as it were come into being spontaneously, de facto, it was necessary to recognize it de jure.” Hence Adler was appointed on the basis of a communal electoral process. His rabbinical authority extended from the beginning to the provinces, the colonies and parts of the United States. Adler reorganized the synagogue system, encouraged regular vernacular preaching, and took part in Jewish and national debates. He was close to the lay head of the community, Sir Moses Montefiore. His scholarly works included Netinah LaGer, a commentary on the Targum Onkelos. To reinforce his rabbinic authority, Adler endorsed the title “reverend” for all the ministers under his jurisdiction with only one—that is, himself—bearing the title rabbi.

His system, dubbed “Adlerism” by its critics, became increasingly controversial with the arrival of eastern European immigrants who included learned rabbinic figures. Adler’s son Hermann, preacher of the Bayswater Synagogue, was delegate chief rabbi in the final years of Adler’s life, and succeeded his father in 1891. Called by some “the willing captive of the gilded gentry,” Hermann Adler held office for 20 years but found it difficult to reconcile both the strictly Orthodox and the liberal factions to his rule. He was firm in his Orthodoxy but had a congenial relationship with the Reform section; indeed, suggestions were made that the Reform as well as the Orthodox should join in electing a new chief rabbi. Hermann's son Solomon Alfred Adler might have continued the Adler dynasty, but he died in his father's lifetime, and in 1913 Joseph Herman Hertz, the first graduate of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, was appointed chief rabbi after holding posts in South Africa and New York.

Hertz was a strong character (his secretary called him "decisive and incisive"), at home with all sections of the Orthodox community and respected though not automatically followed by the Reform and liberal elements. He was a fighter, not only for his fellow Jews, especially at the time of the Nazi onslaught, but also for the retention of the seventh-day Sabbath against the proponents of calendar reform. He had a troubled relationship with Sir Robert Waley Cohen, president of the United Synagogue, and on his death Waley Cohen and others determined that the new chief rabbi had to be quieter and more amenable. Hertz was a prolific writer, and his Book of Jewish Thoughts as well as his popular pew editions of the Pentateuch and prayer book reinforced the chief rabbinate as the embodiment of establishment Judaism. Hertz died in 1946. As Britain had just emerged from World War II, the community wanted the new chief rabbi to have had military chaplaincy experience.

The chosen successor was Israel Brodie, later knighted, who combined chaplaincy experience in both world wars with a distinguished period of ministry in Australia and some years on the academic staff of Jews' College, the rabbinic seminary. A mellifluous preacher and gentle personality, Brodie worked through the Conference of European Rabbis to reestablish Jewish life on the Continent of Europe. Like Hertz, but not Hermann Adler, he was a firm Zionist and rejoiced to hold office at the creation of Israel. At the end of his incumbency he vetoed Rabbi Louis Jacobs as principal of Jews' College on the basis of untraditional views on Revelation. In the ensuing controversy, the community split into what were called Israelites and Jacobites. Brodie was not a prolific writer; his works included a three-volume edited version of the Etz Hayyim, written by a medieval London scholar.

Brodie retired in 1965, and the appointment was offered to Jacob Herzog, an Israeli diplomat, the son of Chief Rabbi Isaac Herzog. When Herzog withdrew for health reasons the choice fell on Immanuel Jakobovits, scion of a rabbinic family, a former chief rabbi of Ireland, and a rabbi in New York, who was a pioneering scholar in Jewish medical ethics. Jakobovits, inducted in 1967, became the leading voice for traditional morality in Britain, consulted by political leaders in preference to Christian prelates; he was knighted and then raised to the peerage for his services to Britain. Highly regarded in all sections of the community, his status was sporadically called into question by the progressive groups, who resented the power of establishment orthodoxy.

Jakobovits was succeeded by Jonathan Sacks, an elegant writer and speaker whose philosophical writings have brought him wide acclaim, though some strictly Orthodox rabbis object that his theology of other faiths is too accommodating. Sacks received a knighthood in 2005.

The British Jewish community is now less homogeneous than before, and some groups refuse to recognize the chief rabbi as the spokesman for all British Jews to the general community. In the Council of Christians and Jews, the chief rabbi had long been the one Jewish co-president, though acknowledgment of the progressive groups has now been conceded. Beyond Britain the congregations that formerly regarded themselves as coming under the chief rabbi's jurisdiction now mostly insist on their own independence; the chief rabbinate can no longer claim jurisdiction over the Jews of the Commonwealth as a whole, though there is great respect for the chief rabbi and his views are frequently sought but not always adopted.

Selected Bibliography

- Jacobs, Louis. 1962. "The Beth Din: The Jewish Ecclesiastical Court." Lawyer 5: 19–25
- Kirsch, Harvey J. 1971. "Conflict Resolution and the Legal Culture: A Study of the Rabbinical Court." Osgoode Hall Law Journal 9: 335–357.
- Levy, Elkan D. "The History of the Chief Rabbinate." <http://www.chiefrabbi.org/history-index.html> (accessed May 07, 2007).

Influence of British Jewry on World Jewry

Raymond Apple

---

British Jewry is not identical with English-speaking Jewry as a whole, which includes the United States. In the narrow sense, however, British Jewry has had a significant influence on world Jewry, on Israel and in some ways on human culture as a whole.

Religiously, it produced the urbane centrist Orthodoxy known as Minhag Anglia (The English Usage), which spread to and molded communities throughout the colonies and the Commonwealth. It created a professional ministry characterized more by general culture than deep rabbinic learning, and it was headed by a chief rabbinate that made religious decisions for constituent congregations. It was a Jewish echo of many patterns of the British environment. The chief rabbi was the Jewish equivalent of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the United Synagogue was equated to the established church, the Singer prayer book was the Jewish Book of Common Prayer, the minister was a religious functionary like his Christian counterpart, and, though not a strictly religious publication, the Jewish Chronicle was the Jewish version of The Times.

It developed a community structure based on a principle of voluntary identification with the community as well as centralized organisation and cohesive institutions, though many of these were at first patrician and undemocratic. British terms such as board of deputies, though archaic, were adopted when communities organized themselves on British lines in many parts of the Commonwealth.

The Jewish community became a model of integration into the host society, believing participation in both general and Jewish life could be combined. Often the same people held office in both Jewish and public life, and prominent Jewish public figures had at least a basic level of involvement in Jewish communal life. Until recently, residents of the Commonwealth regarded Britain as home, and Jews in British countries had a special feeling for Anglo-Jewry. Jews outside the Commonwealth respected British ways even though they had no wish to emulate them.

The Jewish community also contributed to the upbuilding of Israel, at first by promoting the Zionist idea (leading British Jews such as Chaim Weizmann and Chief Rabbi Hertz had an influence on the Balfour Declaration, though some of the Jewish gentry feared accusations of Jewish dual loyalty). During the British Mandate, a number of British Jews helped to bring British institutions, styles of administration, and academic methods to Palestine. Some, such as Edwin Samuel, son of the first British high commissioner, guided the administration of the new State of Israel.

British Jews, familiar with the political pattern in Britain, participated in Israeli debates on electoral processes by urging Israel to achieve better representation of the electorate and greater national stability by means of preferential voting and involving Knesset members with electors on the local level. Israelis had Anglophilia despite their resentment of the Mandatory government.

Leading Anglo-Jewish figures made seminal contributions to medicine, science, art, philosophy, literature, music, and other disciplines, including pre- and postwar Jewish immigrants to Britain. This pattern repeated itself in many other countries, and Britain was seen as a role model.

Selected Bibliography

- Becher, H., S. Waterman, B. Kosmin, and K. Thomson. 2002. A Portrait of Jews in London and the South-east: A Community Study. London: Institute for Jewish Policy Research.
- Board of Deputies of British Jews. 2002. Compilations of Communal Vital Statistics. London: Board of Deputies of British Jews.
- Goodkin, J., and J. Citron. 1994. Women in the Jewish Community: Review and Recommendations. London: Women in the Community.
- Graham, D. 2003. Secular or Religious? The Outlook of London's Jews. London: Institute for Jewish Policy Research.
- Graham, D. 2003. "So How Many Jews Are There in the UK? The 2001 Census and the Size of the Jewish Population." JPR News Spring: 4–6.
- Holman, C., with N. Holman. 2001. Orthodox Jewish Housing Need in Stamford Hill. London: Agudas Israel Housing Association.
- Holman, C., and N. Holman. 2002. Torah, Worship and Acts of Loving Kindness: Baseline Indicators for the Charedi Community in Stamford Hill. London: The Interlink Foundation.
- Kosmin, B. 1999. "The Demographics and Economics of the Jewish Market in North America." In Creating the Jewish Future, edited by M. Brown and B. Lightman, 216–233. Walnut Creek, CA: AltaMira Press.
- Kosmin, B. 1999. Ethnic and Religious Questions in the 2001 UK Census of Population: Policy Recommendations. London: Institute for Jewish Policy Research.

Central and Eastern Europe and Russia

Jews in Central Europe, Eastern Europe, and Russia

M. Avrum Ehrlich

---

General Population: 400,000,000

Jewish Population and Percentage by Country: Albania, 200, 0.005 percent; Belarus, 24,300, 2.4 percent; Bulgaria, 2,300, 0.3 percent; Croatia, 1,300, 0.3 percent; Czech Republic, 4,000, 0.4 percent; Hungary, 51,300, 5.1 percent; Moldova, 55,500, 1.3 percent; Poland, 3,500, 0.1 percent; Republic of Macedonia, 100, 0.00005 percent; Romania, 10,800, 0.5 percent; Russian Federation (former Soviet Union), 410,000, 1.9 percent; Serbia and Montenegro, 1,700, 0.2 percent; Slovakia, 3,300, 0.6 percent; Slovenia, 100, 0.1 percent; Ukraine, 100,000, 2.0 percent

---

Historical Overview

The regions of Central and Eastern Europe and Russia are some of the most important areas for the growth and spread of the Jewish Diaspora over 1,000 years. A number of the most important social developments for the Jews were fermented there.

Jews started immigrating during the Roman Empire. Some of the most interesting developments in Jewish community organizations and structures, the commentaries on Talmudic law, Jewish schools and academies, religious and mystical teachings, and a broad range of social developments formed within the Jewish communities of these regions. Thousands, if not tens of thousands, of works of literature and science, religious texts, and historical volumes were penned there. The advent of the Hasidic movement emerged from the Ukraine and spread throughout Eastern Europe and Russia. The enlightenment of the Jews from the ghettos and inequality spread from Germany to Central Europe and beyond and was an important stage in Jewish development. In addition, the participation of Jews in philosophical inquiry and the natural and social sciences, including physics, math, psychiatry, sociology, and of course, the emergence of the great political movements, including Marxism and Communism, were staged and made possible in this area. The Zionist movement also emerged from Eastern Europe and Russia and was informed and inspired by 19th-century European nationalism.

The bulk of the contemporary Jewish consciousness is staged against the backdrop of Eastern European Jewish life. The major trends of Jewish orthodoxy and religious behavior are molded from the Eastern European Jewish experience. The greatest destructions of Jewish people and communities ever to be recorded took place in these regions. The largest immigrations of Jews and the relocation of their religious and intellectual heritage to Western lands came from these regions and emerged in a number of waves beginning in the 1900s and continuing into the present day.

Central and Eastern Europe was ravaged by the Nazis, and millions of Jews were killed and transported. The Communist revolution, the emergence of the Soviet Union, and its aftermath destroyed many areas of Jewish religious life in Russia and other Soviet countries; people, communities, buildings, and libraries, the social and intellectual sum of a thousand years of religious and communal life, were repressed, and some believed them to be terminated, though over time it appears that Jewish culture did survive, Jewish personalities worked through the Communist system and Jewish culture was able to reemerge.

Although many survivors left the region for Western shores or for the State of Israel, many were not able to leave, not able to form Jewish organizations, and remained in a state of fossilized limbo. In the 1980s, this began to change. Communities started to reorganize, and a number of international Jewish organizations, Israeli government departments, wealthy Russian Jews, and individual donors have been increasingly involved in building and supporting regrowth of Jewish communities and culture.

Contemporary Overview

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

In Central Europe and the former Soviet Union, there was a vibrant and developed Yiddish civilization before the Holocaust and Stalin's anti-Semitic regime. After the destruction of Yiddish, any subsequent efforts to revitalize it were completely suppressed. Presently, efforts to restore Yiddish heritage may be considered a part of the ongoing process of reconstruction, made possible only after the 1980s. Community groups, under the umbrella of international Jewish organizations, attempt to replicate Yiddish heritage (although this does not include formal teaching of the Yiddish language)—Yiddish songs, literature, and theater, along with the traditions and beliefs of the Jewish people.

Jewish cultural development has been facilitated by the approval of educational programs, especially since 1988 in the states of the former Soviet Union, which focus on Jewish themes and issues. Nevertheless, Jewish original creativity and complete cohesive understanding of the community, both internally and externally, cannot be considered restored.

Present Economic Conditions

The Jewish community in most states of the former Soviet Union is said to enjoy a higher standard of living and is mainly positioned in areas with ongoing urban development projects. Official demographic information, such as job occupation and income level, are believed to be unreliable, and financial transactions are said to have been constructed within the grey areas of Russia's financial legal system; thus, the exact socioeconomic status of people is not known. Since the 1990s, a host of Jewish business and industry leaders have made large sums of monies and been called “oligarchs,” mainly in the Russian Federation, but also in the Ukraine, Kazakhstan, and other Asiatic states. Some might speculate that the wealthiest of Russian Jews are worth billions. Russian Jewish community organizations are not presently capable of self support and would not function without the assistance of outside organizations and institutions and their wealthy patrons.

Belarussian and Ukrainian Jews are white-collar workers and professionals or businesspeople of the middle class. They enjoy the improvements in the region’s economy, although poverty exists due to the aging population and other factors.

The newly established Jewish institutional structures—schools, offices, and so on—offer employment in teaching and administration positions, and many people in poorer regions are financially supported by the existence of these institutions.

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

Over the past decade, many dozens of Israeli- and Jewish-sponsored high schools, vocational schools, Hebrew schools, and Sunday schools have opened throughout Central and Eastern Europe and Russia. The Lauder Foundation, the Chabad movement, Eastern European branches of the World Jewish Congress, the Jewish Agency, and other Israeli organizations, as well as the joint efforts of smaller organizations and wealthy sponsors, have made an impact on Jewish life in this region. About 12,000 pupils are said to be studying in Jewish schools alone, half of whom study in religious schools.

One of the major hurdles to this regrowth was the need to wait for formal permission for organized legal Jewish activity. Once given, however, the road to a renewed Jewish presence in Russian and Eastern European society was steadier. Israel, along with Western Jewish organizations, was permitted to conduct open activities within the borders of the former Soviet Union, and Jewish identity and association are in the process of becoming increasingly normative.

Lack of Jewish participation may be attributed to several factors. For instance, most Jews of the former Soviet Union consider themselves to be (or might possibly proclaim themselves to be, in order to avoid anti-Semitism) highly secular and far removed from expressions of Jewish identity. Jewish communities in many states have long been detached from Jewish heritage. Youth commonly live in mixed family arrangements, reducing their ethnic-Jewish connection.

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionist Movements, and Existential Problems within the Community

Anti-Semitism is present throughout Eastern Europe; it is generally accepted that it has served as a tool in the internal political struggles of the Russian Federation, the Ukraine, Poland, and the Baltics. Throughout the 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s, active anti-Semitism was sponsored by Communist propaganda tools to deflect the failings of the regime onto a Jewish-related presence. Though this has subsided, there are lingering feelings of anti-Semitism, which are commonly brought up in political campaigns and in the free press. As the Jewish presence increases and Jewish businesses succeed and prominent Jews assert themselves in public life, these feelings may intensify.

The revival of Muslim-related nationalism is a factor in Russia's position regarding the Jews. The Chechnya war and extremist Chechnyan-Islamic terror activities gave rise to the sentiments of anti-Semitic hatred and violence, which some suggest is a permanent feature in Russian society. Although the present anti-Semitic scenery does not present serious questions for Jewish survival, should there develop a constant wave of anti-Semitic activity for Soviet Jews, questions of immigration will also become important.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

Large numbers of Jews immigrated to Israel, and from there to the United States or other places, and others immigrated to Western Europe, most notably Germany. More than 1.5 million Jews have left the Former Soviet Union, including 950,000 immigrants to Israel; 400,000 immigrants to the United States and Canada; and 210,000 who left for Germany, other European countries, and Australia. Presently, there are only about 12,500 immigrants per year, but there were as many as 60,000 per year during the 1990s.

As the economy improves there has been a halt to this trend, and young Jews are increasingly finding employment and their place in society. Many leave for a few years to study and gain experience, but as the economy improved they returned with skills and integrated into their country's workforce. Israeli Russians, Ukrainians, and Polish are returning to their native lands to do business and reside. Many older Eastern European Jews choose to remain, creating a large elderly and relatively poor community.

Negative natural growth in the population is mainly attributed to the aging population, as witnessed by the rate of deaths to births, which was 13:1 in 2000. In 2002, some 40 percent of the population was over the age of 60.

As is the case across the Jewish Diaspora, there is the trend of intermarriage. The exact figures are hard to estimate but are assumed to be more than 50 percent. However, this phenomenon can work both ways as children of mixed marriages are coming to identify as Jews and seeking Jewish education and identity. What was assumed to weaken and halve the Jewish population may serve to double it or increase it in unlikely places as highly assimilated mixed Jewish-Gentile offspring develop a sympathy for their Jewish roots. The future of this trend is fascinating, has implications for Jewish identity and Jewish law, and will no doubt need to be addressed in the coming decades.

Selected Bibliography

- Abramson, Henry. 1999. A Prayer for the Government: Ukrainians and Jews in Revolutionary Times, 1917–1920. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Altshuler, Mordechai. 1987. Soviet Jewry Since the Second World War: Population and Social Structure. New York: Greenwood Press.
- Aster, Howard, and Peter Potichnyj, eds. 1990. Ukrainian-Jewish Relations in Historical Perspectives. Edmonton: Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies, University of Alberta.
- Della Pergola, Sergio, and Amos Gilboa. 2005. The Jewish People Policy Planning Institute Annual Assessment 2004–2005: The Jewish People between Thriving and Decline. Jerusalem: Jewish People Policy Planning Institute.

- Dubnow, Simon. 1916. History of the Jews in Russia and Poland from the Earliest Times Until the Present Day. Vol. 1. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America.
- Gitelman, Zvi. 1994. "The Reconstruction of Community and Jewish Identity in Russia." East European Jewish Affairs 2 (24): 40.
- Gitelman, Zvi. 2001. A Century of Ambivalence: The Jews of Russia and the Soviet Union, 1881 to the Present. 2nd exp. ed. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Iwanou, Mikola. 2001. "Die jüdische Welt in Weißrussland vom Ende des 19. Jahrhundert bis zum Holocaust" [Jewish World in Belarus from the Beginning of the 19th Century until the Holocaust]. In Handbuch der Geschichte Weißrusslands, edited by Dietrich Beyrau and Rainer Lindner, 392–408. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.
- Levin, Nora. 1988. Paradox of Survival: The Jews in the Soviet Union Since 1917. Vol. I. New York: New York University Press.
- Pinkus, Benjamin. 1988. The Jews of the Soviet Union: The History of a National Minority. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Weinryb, Bernard D. 1973. The Jews of Poland: A Social and Economic History of the Jewish Community in Poland from 1100 to 1800. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America.

Jews in Albania

David Straub

---

General Population: 3,581,655

Jewish Population: 10–40

Percent of Population: Less than 1 percent

Jewish Population by City: Most Albanian Jews live in Tirana.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Sephardic Jews from the Iberian Peninsula and Ashkenazi from Eastern Europe

Languages Spoken: Albanian

---

Historical Overview

1st–4th centuries CE During time of the Roman Empire the first Jewish population arrives in the coastal city of Valona (modern Vlorë, known in Hebrew as Avilona), which was then a Byzantine possession.

527–565 Justinian reigns as Byzantine emperor. Strict anti-Semitic rules are imposed, and this marks the beginning of a long period of repression and poverty for Valona's Jews.

1290 Jews in Apulia, Italy, are accused of blood libel. Fleeing persecution and forced conversion, many settle in Valona.

1417 Ottoman Turks conquer Valona. Repression of the Jews is lifted, and the city undergoes economic expansion. At this time Valona's Jewry consists of Romaniotes, descendants of Greek and Byzantine Jews, and Pugliese Jews, who originated from Italy.

- 1492 Spanish Jews are expelled from the Iberian Peninsula. Refugees settled in Valona, increasing city's Jewish population.
- 1497 Portuguese Jews are expelled and also settle in Valona.
- 1500s Bogumil Hrabak refers to Valona as "preponderantly a Jewish town." Trade expands as Valona's natural port provides routes to Dubrovnik, Greece, and other ports throughout the Mediterranean. Land trade expands into Eastern Europe. Jews dominate the city's commerce.
- 1520 Census notes that out of 945 families in Valona, 528 are Jews; there are 3,600 Jews in a population of less than 5,000.
- 1541 Isak Trink becomes the first Jewish consul, or commissioner, for trade with Ragusa, modern Dubrovnik. Jews dominate the consul position for the next century.
- 1550s Portuguese conversos in Ancona in northern Italy are accused of reverting to Judaism, and 24 are burned at the stake. Ottomans intervene and in 1557 a shipload of Jews from Ancona arrives in Valona.
- 1637 Angelo Kodutto, a member of Ancona Jewish family, becomes consul of Ragusa in Valona.
- 1676 The false messiah, Sabbatai Zevi, dies in Berat in 1676 after being exiled there for fomenting rebellion.
- 1688 The Ottoman-Venetian war results in fall of Valona to Venice. Jews flee the city, fearing Venetian cruelty. Those who do not leave city are enslaved and sent to Italy. Jewish refugees settle in Arnaut Belgrade (modern Berat in Albania) and other areas of Ottoman-controlled Mediterranean. Despite the Ottoman recapture of Valona, few Jews returned to the city.
- 1740 Epidemics in Berat result in the dispersion of Jews, mainly to Greece, the Balkans, and Istanbul.
- 1850 Romaniot Jews from Greece settle in Valona and form a small community. The ancestral cemetery and synagogue are returned to Jewish possession.
- 1915 Invading Italian forces occupy Valona and convert the synagogue into a military storage facility; the synagogue is later destroyed in fire.
- 1928 Zog I becomes king of Albania. Albanian Jews refer to the period of King Zog I's reign as the golden age of Jews in Albania.
- 1930 The census indicates that 204 Jews live in Albania. Herman Bernstein, an American Jew, is appointed American ambassador to Albania. Bernstein would serve until 1933 and was instrumental in negotiating with King Zog to provide European Jewish refugees with residency permits and safe passage to transit through Albania during their escape from the Nazis. .
- 1933–1939 An estimated 600–3,000 Jews use Albania as a transit point for escaping the Nazis. Wealthy Jewish merchants in Valona are instrumental in organizing the arrival and safe exit of non-Albanian Jews.
- 1936 Albania asks Greece for the return of a 1,500-year-old Torah from Valona, known in Hebrew as Sefer Avilona, or Book of Valona; Nazis later burn the text.
- April 1937 The Jewish community is officially recognized by Albanian government.
- 1938 Immigration restrictions are placed on Jews after King Zog bows to pressure from Italy. Officially there are 300 Albanian Jews in the country; many more unofficial Jewish immigrants stay in the country on expired visas. The Jewish population of Valona is 15 Jewish families.

February 1939 One hundred Jewish families arrive in Albania from Vienna.

March 1939 Ninety-five Jewish families arrive in Albania, mostly from Austria and Germany.

April 1939 Italy invades Albania; thousands of non-Albanian Jews are stranded in the country; Jews suffer financial hardship and official discrimination. King Zog's policies of tolerance toward Jews would save thousands of lives during World War II

July 1940 The Italian commander in Albania orders foreign Jews to be repatriated to their home countries; in actuality no Jews are forced to leave the country, and Jewish refugees from Yugoslavia and Bulgaria find safety in Albania. Jews in the port city of Durres are ordered to relocate to the interior of country.

September 1941 A wave of Jews arrives from Kosovo.

April 1942 Another wave of Jews arrives from Kosovo, including 100 Jews arriving in Berat, and 79 Jews sent to Preza.

July 1942 An additional 88 Jews arrive from Kosovo.

1943 An estimated 800 foreign Jewish refugees are residing in Albania.

September 1943 Germany occupies Albania. Germans are undermanned and forced to cooperate heavily with Albanian government, which refuses German requests for handing over lists of Jews. Many Jews join the resistance and die fighting the Germans.

May 1944 Communist partisans form a new government in Albania under Enver Hoxha.

1945 By end of war an estimated 1,800 Jews reside in Albania. Not one Jew in Albania was turned over to the Germans during the war.

1949 Albania recognizes Israel but refuses to establish diplomatic or trade relations until the fall of Communism in 1991. From 1948 to 1991 aliyah is made by 356 Albanian Jews.

1950s The communist regime imposes strict, Stalinist-style rule over the entire country. Jews in Albania, including some foreign Jewish refugees who remained in the country after World War II, are not targeted for persecution, but they are not allowed to leave the country and visit relatives abroad.

1967 Albania is declared an atheist state. Religious buildings, including the synagogue in Tirana, are confiscated.

1985 Enver Hoxha dies. The new government relaxes restrictions and grants new freedoms.

December 1990 A secret evacuation of Jews to Israel commences. In total 350 Jews are airlifted to Israel by the Jewish Agency in what is code-named Operation Flying Carpet. Jews are flown in groups of 20 and 30 to Rome and Athens and then to Israel and the United States.

June 1991 Operation Flying Carpet is completed. The remaining Jews in Albania number around 20.

August 18, 1991 Albania and Israel establish diplomatic relations.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Traditionally Jewish occupations included merchant and urban laborer.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

In 1991, Albanian journalist Neshat Tozaj published a novel, Shalom, on the plight of the Albanian Jewry during World War II.

Religious Denominations

Organized Jewish religious services are virtually nonexistent today. A synagogue still exists in Vlorë (Valona), but it is no longer in use.

Jewish Education and Communal Institutions

There is very little organized Jewish life in Albania. The American Jewish Distribution Committee provides essential support for the remaining Jews, including regular shipments of matzoth for Passover. The most notable Jewish organization is the Albania-Israel Friendship Society in Tirana. In 1990, Albanian Refik Veseli, head of the society, became the first of his compatriots to be invited to Israel and honored as one of the Righteous Persons at Yad Vashem. During World War II Veseli's family was one of many Albanian families to help save Jews. In total, 63 Albanians have received this honor. On February 2, 1995, Albania was added to the list of "Righteous Among Nations" at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, DC. In June 1990, Jewish-American Congressman Tom Lantos and former Albanian American Congressman Joe DioGuardi traveled to then-communist Albania and met President Ramiz Alia who told of numerous unpublicized heroic deeds of hundreds of Albanians who rescued Jews during World War II.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

After the Shoah most Jews left Albania. Much of the remaining Jewry migrated from the old Jewish center of Vlora to Tirana, where educational and economic opportunities were greater. In 1990–1991 most of Albania's remaining 300 Jews made aliyah to Israel. Of the 60 Jews who remained in Albania, most emigrated during political violence that struck the country in 1997.

Selected Bibliography

- Arbell, Mordechai. 2003. "The Jewish Community of Vlor-Valona-Avilona . . ." Los Muestrros 50. European Sephardic Institute Web site. <http://www.sefarad.org/publication/lm/050/html/page16.html> (accessed April 21, 2007).
- Cloyes-Dioguardi, Shirley. 2006. "Jewish Survival in Albania and the Ethics of Besa." Congress Monthly, January/February: 7–10.
- Fischer, Bernd J. "The Jews of Albania During the Zogist and Second World War Periods." Illyria. Albanischer Studentenverein Hamburg. www.heimat.de/home/illyria/i.php3?p=2004\_01\_09\_fisher\_jews\_in\_albania&s=e (accessed April 21, 2007).

- Gruber, Ruth E. 1997. "Last Jews of Albania Are Leaving." May 2. The Jewish News Weekly of Northern California. http://www.jewishsf.com/content/2-0-/module/displaystory/story\_id/6064/edition\_id/113/format/html/displaystory.html (accessed April 21, 2007).
- "Jewish Communities: Europe: Albania." 2004–2005. World Jewish Congress Web site. www.worldjewishcongress.org/communities/comm\_reg\_europe.html (accessed April 21, 2007).
- Keinon, Herb. 1992. "The Albanian Exodus, A Jewish Community Ends." Jewish Monthly 106 (April): 30–33.
- Sarner, Harvey. 1992. The Jews of Albania. New York: Brunswick Press.
- Sarner, Harvey. 1997. Rescue in Albania: One Hundred Percent of Jews in Albania Rescued from Holocaust. New York: Brunswick Press.
- Ukraincik, Merri L. 1996. "Albanian Jews Search for Their Roots." Jewish Education News 17 (Fall): 17.

Jews in Belarus

Alexander Friedman

---

General Population: 9,751,000 (2005)

Jewish Population: Official census 27,810 (1999); communal estimates are 50,000 (2006)

Percent of Population: Approximately 0.3–0.5 percent

Jewish Population by City: As of 2006, an overwhelming majority of Belarusian Jews live in the regional centers of Brest, Grodno, Vitebsk, Gomel, and Mogilev and in the capital of Belarus Minsk, which has the largest Jewish population in the country at nearly 60 percent. Smaller Jewish communities exist in Bobruisk, Mozyr, Baranovichi, Pinsk, Kalinkovichi, Lida, and Borisov.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Ashkenazi from Western and Central Europe and Poland, primarily during the Middle Ages. Almost all Jews are Ashkenazi.

Languages Spoken: Russian and Belarusian. The number of Yiddish or Hebrew speakers is very small.

---

History of Jews in Belarus

14th century The oldest Belarusian Jewish communities are Brest, first recorded in 1388, and Grodno (1389). At this time much of what is present-day Belarus is controlled by Lithuania and Poland.

1388 The Jews of Brest are granted the Privilege Code of Law by the Grand Duke Vitautas of Lithuania.

15th century Jewish quarters are recorded in Novogrudok (1445), Kobrin (1456), and Minsk (1489).

1495 Jews are expelled from the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, only to be allowed to return in 1503.

16th century In the first part of the century, there are known Jewish communities in Kletsk, Polotsk, Vitebsk, Mogilev, and Orsha. Contemporary Belarusian areas are a significant part of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, which formed a commonwealth with the Polish Kingdom in 1569. Notable 16th-century Jewish merchants include Michael and Isaac Jesofovich from Brest, who play a tremendous role in the economical life of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in the first part of the century, and Shaul Wahl from Brest, a legendary “Polish king for one night” at the end of the 16th century.

1506 A Jewish community is recorded in Pinsk.

18th century After the partition of Poland in the latter half of the century the territory of Belarus is annexed into the Russian Empire. Prominent personalities in the Hasidic movement include Menachem Mendel of Vitebsk (ca. 1730–ca. 1787) and Shneur Zalman of Liady (1745–1812), the founder of Habad Hasidism. Notable Orthodox rabbis include the founder of the Volozhin yeshiva, Chaim Volozhin (1749–1821).

1791 The Pale of Settlement is created, incorporating much of what is modern Belarus; it exists de jure until 1917. At this time Jews play a key role in the economic life of what is today modern Belarus as dealers, merchants, and craftspeople.

19th century Under Russian rule Belarusian areas maintain a great world center of the Jewish religious life. Northern and western parts are under the strong influence of the Mitnaggedim, including well-known Lithuanian yeshivas in Mir and Volozhin. In the second part of the 19th century, the Musar movement spreads in the western part of Belarus. Meanwhile, Habad strengthens its leading position in the south and east. The Haskalah, especially the supporters of assimilation, which was widespread in Western Europe at this time, had not managed to extend its influence in Belarus. One great obstacle on the way to the spread of assimilation ideas was the anti-Semitic policy of the Russian authorities.

1880s–1890s Because of economic hardship and legal discrimination, a large number of Jews emigrate; most leave for the United States. Later, Jews made aliyah to Palestine. At this time Zionist or radical parties are organized and continue to operate into the beginning of the 20th century.

1897 The census reveals large communities of Jews across Belarus, most notably in Minsk, 47,562 (52 percent of the total population); Vitebsk, 34,440 (52 percent); Mogilev, 21,547 (50 percent); Pinsk, 21,065 (74 percent), Bobruisk, 20,759 (60.5 percent); and Gomel, 20,385 (55 percent). In shtetls the percentage of the Jewish population is even higher: 1,127 Jews out of 1,568 inhabitants in Kolyshki, 1,080 out of 1,523 in Krupki, and 1,310 out of 1,768 in Kopatkevichi.

1903 The Gomel pogrom takes place.

1905 A pogrom occurs in Orsha.

1915–1918 During World War I, Belarus is the epicenter for fighting between Russian and Austrian-German forces along the eastern front. During the war, the Jewish population suffers severely from anti-Semitic violence on the part of the Russian military.

1919–1920 Fighting takes place on Belarusian soil between the Soviet Red Army, Polish troops, and White Russian forces, resulting in a large number of casualties among soldiers and civilians and unleashing a great deal of social instability. All sides target Jews for violence, and pogroms are carried out in Belarus.

- 1921 Poland and Soviet Russia sign a peace treaty in Riga, which divides Belarus in two parts. Western Belarus becomes part of Poland and the east remains under the control of the Bolsheviks.
- 1920s–1930s Polish authorities do not interfere in the activity of the Jewish community, which leads to the flourishing of Jewish culture, education, and religious life in Western Belarus. Despite this, actual discrimination against Jewish citizens exists. Jews remain an essential element in the Western Belarusian economic system. Many Western Belarusian Jews sympathize with Zionists and communists. In the Belarus Soviet Socialist Republic, attempts to organize Jewish collective farms in the latter half of the 1920s, and the intensification of the Jewish resettlement in the Crimea and, later, in the far eastern regions of Russia, have only limited success. In the latter half of the 1930s, the government encourages Russification of national minorities, which severely damage the Jewish culture in Belarus. Jews do play a significant role in party and state apparatuses of the Belarus Soviet Socialist Republic, yet many Jews suffer under the Bolshevik repressive policy, lishentsi. Former members of the forbidden parties, intellectuals, including communists, and anyone labeled a counterrevolutionary element fall victim to Stalin's purges.
- September 1939 Poland is divided between the Soviet Union and Germany; many Jews see the Red Army as a liberator.
- 1939–1941 Thousands of Jewish refugees escape from German-occupied Poland into Western Belarus; there are as many as one million Jews in Belarus before the German invasion of the Soviet Union.
- 1939–1945 During World War II, the German invasion into the Soviet Union marks the greatest tragedy in the history of Belarusian Jewry. The Nazis and their collaborators execute about 810,000 Belarusian and foreign Jews in the territory of Belarus. Maly Trostenez, near Minsk, is one of the largest Nazi exterminations camps in Europe; more than 200,000 victims perish there. Jews fight in the war as partisans and Soviet Army officers, including Jewish partisan commanders Shalom Zorin (1902–1974) and the Bielski Brothers (Tuvia [1906–1986], Asael, Aharon, und Zus), who fight against Nazis in the Naliboki Forest (Western Belarus); and Soviet officers Colonel Efim Davidovich (1924–1976), Colonel Lev Ovsishcher (born 1919), and Lieutenant-Colonel Naum Alshansky (1917–1991).
- Late 1940s–1950s In years immediately after the end of World War II Soviet authorities complete the destruction of Jewish culture in the Belarus Soviet Socialist Republic; until the Gorbachev's perestroika there are no Jewish schools or cultural institutions in the Belarus Soviet Socialist Republic. At this time latent anti-Semitism is a central part of Soviet state policy.
- 1960s Soviet authorities refuse to allow Jews to emigrate, and thus the number of the "refuseniks" increased dramatically.
- 1970s Symbols of the protest of the Belarusian Jews against Soviet anti-Semitic policy are the annual illegal memorial assemblies, which take place on May 9, Victory Day, at a place where the prisoners of the Minsk ghetto were executed during World War II.

- 1980s Jews across the Soviet Union are permitted greater freedoms for emigration. Thousands of Belarusian Jews make aliyah or immigrate to the West.
- 1991 Belarus gains independence. Emigration controls for Jews are lifted, but anti-Semitism rises in the next decade.
- 1999 In April in Minsk the entrance to a synagogue is destroyed, a fire is set on the first floor, and anti-Semitic graffiti is spray painted on the walls. The incident elicits international condemnation. In May the Belarus public prosecutor's office publicly chastises local media in Minsk for the use of anti-Semitic materials.
- 2000 The Association of Belarusian Jews accuses President Alyaksandr Lukashenka of not doing enough to prevent a rise in anti-Semitism, including the vandalizing of Jewish graves and synagogues.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Historically, Jews were farmers, merchants, craftspeople, and worked in taverns or inns. A very high educational level is a distinctive feature of Belarusian Jewry, and Jews were employed by the state as doctors, teachers, engineers, and university professors and in private institutions, companies, and organizations. Generally, Jews have not played an important role in contemporary Belarusian cultural, economic, or political life. One notable exception is Mikhail Finberg (b. 1947), art director of the state symphony, People's Artist of Belarus, and member of numerous governmental committees and councils.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

After the creation of the Belarusian Soviet Socialist Republic, life underwent radical changes. The national policy of the Bolsheviks in the 1920s included the support of a culture of national minorities, which corresponded to the principle "national in form, socialist in content." As a result of this policy the Belarusian Soviet Socialist Republic became one of the leading centers of the Soviet Jewish culture. In particular, Yiddish schools, Belarusian State Jewish theater (1926), the Jewish Sector of the Belarusian Academy of Science, and Yiddish literature underwent tremendous development. Yiddish had been recognized as one of the official languages in the Belarusian Soviet Socialist Republic. There were also Jewish courts and local soviet political organizations.

Notable Belarusian Jewish artists, writers, and scientists include painter and scenery and costume designer Leon Bakst (born Lev Rosenberg, 1866–1924); painter and designer Marc Chagall (1887–1985); painter Chaim Soutine (1894–1943); painter Michel Kikoine (1892–1968); sculptor, painter, and lithographer Pinchus Kremegne (1890–1981); sculptor Zair Azgur (1908–1995); painter and pedagogue Yehuda (Yudel) Pen (1854–1937); philosopher Solomon Maimon (1753–1800); historian Simon Dubnow (1860–1941); psychoanalyst Max Eitingon (1881–1943); and physicists Yakov Zeldovich (1914–1987), Vitaly Goldansky (1923–2001), and Arcady Migdal (1911–1991). Belarus has also produced some of the most important politicians in Israeli history, including Israeli prime ministers Menachem Begin (1913–1992), Yitzhak Shamir (b. 1915), and Shimon Peres (b. 1923) and presidents Chaim Weizmann (1874–1952) and Zalman Shazar (1889–1974).

Present Economic Conditions

In recent years, Jews have benefited from the rebound of the Belarusian economy after the long recession of the 1980s and 1990s. Generally, the standard of living in Belarussian Jews has improved, though there are many poor old Jewish pensioners.

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Organizations

Since the collapse of the Soviet Union Belarusian Jewry has experienced a renaissance of religious organizations. Mainly, they are concentrated in the capital of the country, which is also the center of Judaism in Belarus.

- Religious organizations: Union of Religious Jewish Congregations (Orthodox), Union of Jewish Religious Communities (Chabad-Lubavitch), and Religious Union for Progressive Judaism.
- Cultural, educational, and youth organizations: Jewish History and Culture Museum of Belarus, a few Jewish schools, several kindergartens, and Beit Hillel Student Organization, among others.
- Welfare organizations: Jewish community center Emunah, Jewish Family Outreach Service, Jewish Welfare Fund Hesed Rachamim, and Institute of Communal and Welfare Workers, among others.
- Organizations of Jewish war veterans and Holocaust survivors: The Belarussian Union of Jewish War-disabled and Veterans of War, Partisans and Underground resistance fighters, Gilf Ghetto and Nazi Camps Survivors Organization.
- Representatives of the foreign Jewish organizations: American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, Union of Communities in Defence of Jews of the Former USSR, and the Jewish Agency for Israel, among others.

The leading Jewish institution of the country is the Union of Belarusian Jewish Organizations and Communities, which unites more than 100 organizations from 26 Belarusian towns.

Notable Jewish religious leaders from Belarus include Israel Meir HaCohen Kagan (Chafetz Chaim; 1838–1933), founder of the Radun Yeshiva and one of the most influential Orthodox rabbis in the 20th century, and Lithuanian Orthodox rabbi Moshe Feinstein (1895–1986), who was widely recognized as supreme authority on Orthodox Jewry of North America.

Anti-Semitism, Existential Problems, and Future Prospects

Pessimistic predictions about the coming end of Jewish life in Belarus, examined in the beginning of 1990s under the influence of the mass emigration, were not justified. Belarus remains an important Jewish center in Eastern Europe. Jewish emigration continues, but its pace has remarkably declined in recent years as most Jews willing to leave the country have already left it. On the one side, the contemporary Jewish community is represented by elder Jews who do not want or are not able to emigrate; increasingly, a significant part of the Jewish youth see their future in Belarus because of the improvement of the economy. Equally important is a relatively low level, in comparison to neighboring countries, of anti-Semitism in Belarus. Basically, this is the result of traditional tolerance of the Belarusians in relation to national and religious minorities. Still, it is important to note that there are anti-Semitic publications in mass media; the defilements of Jewish monuments and further anti-Semitic actions do take place.

The Jewish community mainly depends on financial aid from abroad, from organizations in the United States and Israel. The crucial obstacle to strengthening the Belarusian Jewish community is lack of money.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

The creation of the so-called Pale of Settlement in 1791, combined with the prohibition of residing the Jews in the countryside, caused the concentration of the Jews in big and small towns (shtetls) of Belarus, where they made a considerable part and often even the majority of the population. In the western part of Belarus, under Polish rule (1920–1930s), this situation remained, while in the Belarusian Soviet Socialist Republic, an important number of Jews stayed in big cities and shtetls, but the percent of urban Jewish inhabitants decreased. This state of affairs can be explained by the fact that some Jews of the Soviet Belarus took advantage of the repeal of the Pale of Settlement and moved to larger towns, particularly Leningrad and Moscow, or to Crimea or the Jewish Autonomous Republic in the far eastern region of Russia (Birobidzhan). In the country, Jews were organized on collective farms; at the same time, Jews from shtetls were resettled in the greater towns of the republic.

Abandoned Jewish cemetery in Zaslavl, a former shtetl near Minsk, Belarus. (Alex Potemkin)

After the Nazi genocide, Belarusian towns and shtetls lost their Jewish peculiarity. Remarkably, there are many shtetls that once had a high Jewish population density up to the Holocaust, but now have only few Jewish inhabitants or even none at all. The Jewish population in Belarus was considerably reduced in the last decades after the Holocaust. On the one hand, this development was the result of growing emigration, but it was certainly related to strong adverse demographic tendencies after the 1986 nuclear disaster in Chernobyl. According to the 1989 Soviet census, 111,977 Jews (1.1 percent of the entire population) lived in the Belarusian Soviet Socialist Republic, but the first census in the independent Republic of Belarus (1999) reported only 27,810 Jewish inhabitants. However, the 1999 data are met with skepticism from Belarusian Jewish organizations, which estimate that there were about 50,000 Jews living in the country in 2006.

Selected Bibliography

- Bjadulja, Zmitrok. 1918. Žydy na Belarusi. Bytavyja štrychi [Jews in Belarus. The Facettes of Customs]. Minsk, Belarus: Drukarnja A. Ja. Grynbljata.
- Botvinnik, Marat B. 2000. Pamjatniki genocida evreev Belarusi [Monuments of the Genocide of the Jews of Belarus]. Minsk, Belarus: Belaruskaja navuka.
- Friedman, Alex. "The History of Belarusian Jews." www.beljews.info (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Gerlach, Christian. 1999. Kalkulierte Morde. Die deutsche Wirtschafts- und Vernichtungspolitik in Weißrussland 1941 bis 1944 [Calculated Murder: The German Economic and Extermination Policy in Belarus]. Hamburg, Germany: Hamburger Edition.
- Ioffe, Emmanuil G. 1996. Stranicy istorii evreev Belarusi [Pages of the History of the Jews of Belarus]. Minsk, Belarus: Arti-Feks.
- Iwanou, Mikola. 2001. "Die jüdische Welt in Weißrussland vom Ende des 19. Jahrhundert bis zum Holocaust" [Jewish World in Belarus from the Beginning of the 19th Century until the Holocaust]. In Handbuch der Geschichte Weißrusslands, edited by Dietrich Beyrau and Rainer Lindner, 392–408. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.
- Persin, Stephanie. "The Jewish Virtual History Tour: Belarus." <http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/vjw/Belarus.html> (Accessed April 22, 2007).
- The Projektgruppe Belarus, ed. 2003. "Existiert das Ghetto noch?" Weißrussland: Jüdisches Überleben gegen nationalsozialistische Herrschaft ["Does the Ghetto Still Exist?" Belarus: Jewish Survival Against the National Socialist Rule]. Berlin, Germany: Assoziation A.
- Rozenblat, Evgenij, and Irina Elenskaja. 1997. Pinskie evrei 1939–44 [The Jews of Pinsk 1939–1944]. Brest, Belarus: Brestskij Gosudarstvennyj universitet.
- Skir, Aron Ja. 1995. Evrejskaja duchovnaja kul'tura v Belarusi [Jewish Spiritual Culture in Belarus]. Minsk, Belarus: Mastackaja litaratura.
- Smilovickij, Leonid. 2000. Katastrofa evreev v Belorussii 1941–1944 gg. [Holocaust in Belorussia 1941–1944]. Tel Aviv, Israel: Biblioteka Matveja Čornogo.
- Smolar, Hersch. 1989. The Minsk Ghetto: Soviet-Jewish Partisans Against the Nazis. New York: Holocaust Library.

Jews in Bulgaria

Frederick B. Chary, Emil Kalo, Julina Dadova, and Robert Levi

General Population: 7,450,000 (2006)

Jewish Population: 3,461 (1992 census); 6,000 Jews in Bulgaria-Shalom (OJB)

Percent of Population: Approximately 0.05 percent

Jewish Population by City: Sofia, 3,000; Plovdiv, 400; Varna, 100

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Jews entered the lands in Roman times. Many Jews lived in the Second Bulgarian Empire (1186–1396). Most Jews came from Spain after 1492. These were Sephardim—90 percent of the modern population. A minority of Ashkenazim migrated from central Europe.

Languages Spoken: Bulgarian; before 1945, Ladino; a minority speak Yiddish

Historical Overview

356–323 BCE Evidence of Jewish settlers in the land of contemporary Bulgaria dates from the late ancient period, during the reign of Alexander of Macedonia, when many Jews head for the Balkan Peninsula. The Apostles' Deeds, a memorial stone with an inscription in honor of the Archisynagogus Josephus dating from the second century CE, which is found near the village Gigen (Pleven region), is one of the earliest archaeological monuments proving the presence of Jews at that time. It describes Jewish communities in Thessalonica (Salonika), Philippi, and Beroia (Beria). A Greek inscription found on a marble book in the same place has a picture of a Jewish menorah on it. These two findings indicate there were Jewish settlements in the eastern provinces of the Roman Empire at the time. A large part of the Jewish population is concentrated in settlements along the Danube River, the northern border of the empire, and plays an important role in its protection. These places develop as significant trade centers, along which Jewish settlements appear. Such centers are Benonia (Vidin), Istria (Silistra), and Nikopolis ad Istrum (Nikopol). Besides, there are Jewish settlements in Serdica (Sofia), as well as in Philipopolis (Plovdiv), one of the most significant towns in the eastern part of the Balkan Peninsula, beginning in the second century, and home of the oldest known synagogue in Bulgaria, dating from the third century. Two dedicatory inscriptions have been deciphered on the remaining part of a floor mosaic, the first dates from the middle of the first century and the second from the fourth century; the inscriptions indicate that the synagogue was destroyed during the Gothic invasions and reconstructed after that. Vidin is another important center of Jewish life during that period. An inscription in Latin has been found in Vidin's Jewish cemetery that mentions the Jewish name Anius, which corresponds to the masculine name Hanana, known from the Old and the New Testaments.

- 5th century After the Roman Empire disintegrates in 476, the Jewish population of the eastern provinces remains in Great Byzantine. Greek becomes the spoken language. It influences the Jewish population, which starts using it in everyday life. The first compact group appears, known as Kaal Kadosh Romania, the so-called Grekos, or Romaniotes. Many Bulgarian Jewish family names, such as Polikar, Pilosof, Parasko, Kalo, Yavani, Pizanti, and Moskona, originate during this period. Christianity becomes the official religion, and hostility based on religious differences grows against the Jews.
- 527–565 During the reign of Justinian, anti-Jewish legislation comes into force, restricting the right of Jews to occupy public positions and forcing them to pay taxes to the Church. Later, they are forbidden to testify against Christians. Restrictions are also imposed on the performance of religious rites. Anti-Jewish measures are often accompanied by mass persecutions.
- 681 The foundation of the Bulgarian state (the first Bulgarian Kingdom) has a positive impact on the Jewish population. Many Jews from Byzantine find refuge in it.
- 811 Many come to Bulgaria as prisoners of war after the victory of Khan Krum over the Emperor Nikiphor. In the newly created Bulgarian state, the Jews live in peace among the Bulgarian population. The Bulgarians of Khan Asparukh have been familiar with the Jews ever since the time they inhabited the lands of the Khazar Empire (6th–11th centuries) in southern Russia. The famous 10th-century medieval work Sefer Josefon, the final version of which was edited by Leon-Judas Moskona (born in Orhrid in 1320), testifies that the Jews had contacts with ancient Bulgarians since the time of Khan Kubrat's Bulgaria in the 630s. The favorable environment facilitates the penetration of some ideas of Judaic monotheism in the upper circles of Bulgarian aristocracy. For example, when Prince Boris adopts Christianity as the official religion of Bulgaria, he turns to Pope Nikolas I (866) to clarify certain issues related to rituals and everyday life. The answers to the 106 questions he asks, which still exist today, show good knowledge of Jewish religion. The Jewish influence is also manifested in the propagation of the Slavonic alphabet created by the Salonika-born brothers Cyril and Methodius. They borrow several letters (denoting consonants that do not exist in the Greek alphabet) from old Hebrew and introduce them into Slavonic alphabet. The brothers have a good command of old Hebrew and translate the Bible from the original to the spoken language to make it more comprehensible to the common people.
- 11th century During the first Crusade, many Jews from Central and Western Europe—mostly Bavaria, Bohemia and Hungary—are forced to move to the east as a result of mass persecutions and violence against them. Many reach Bulgaria and establish their communities, which are separate from earlier Jewish settlements. The settlement of the Ashkenazim continues during the next centuries, their larger part concentrating in the towns along the Danube River, although some choose Sofia and Plovdiv.
- 1097 Tovia ben Eliezer (b. 1050), from the Jewish community in Kastoria (Kostur), writes Lekah Tov, which contains instructions and commentaries to the Torah, as well as a Jewish grammar. Yehuda Lev Mung, author of Menor Enahim, is a famous disciple of Eliezer who adopts Christianity; he is elected Archbishop of Ohrid, owing to his great erudition. Another Bulgaria-born Jewish man of letters is Shimon Set (b. 1080) who wrote Stehanit and Ihnilat.

12th century A Jewish traveler, Rabbi Benjamin de Tudella, crosses these lands on his way to Asia Minor and India and collects comprehensive data about Jewish communities on the Balkan Peninsula. When the Bulgarian kingdom is conquered by the Byzantine Empire, hard times begin for the Jews with the introduction of laws for persecuting Jews on the occupied Bulgarian territories. When Bulgaria regains its independence in 1187, the Bulgaria rulers invite many Jewish merchants from Dubrovnik, Ragusa, and Genoa, who contribute to the economic prosperity of the state. During the period of the Second Bulgarian Kingdom (1186–1396), the Jews benefit from the positive attitude manifested toward them. For example, King Ivan-Assen II receives the “heretic” Jews from Hungary, and this provokes a conflict between him and Pope Grigorius IV (b. 1238).

14th century In 1360, Jews from Southern Germany settle in Sofia. Also during the second half of the 14th century, many Jews from Western Europe settle in Vidin, after being accused of spreading the Black Death (the plague). Two famous rabbis are among them—Moshe Yavani and Shalom from Neustadt. The latter establishes the first rabbinic school (yeshiva) in Bulgaria. During the period of the Second Bulgarian Kingdom, a Jewish community also exists in the capital, Tarnovo. It is particularly noticeable during the reign of Ivan Alexander (1331–1371). After dissolving his dynastic marriage, the king marries Sarah, a Jewish woman who adopts Christianity and is baptized as Theodora. She becomes known as a fervent Christian and restores many churches. The church opposes the heretical trends in religion and philosophy based on dualism, which refuses to recognize the divine nature of Jesus Christ and therefore rejects the canon of official Christianity. Along with the Bogomil and Adamite heresies, these trends included the Judaizing heresy as well. The Jews are condemned by a number of ecumenical councils (the council that convenes in Tarnovo in 1360 being the most well-known). During the second half of the 14th century, the Ottoman Turks invade the Balkan Peninsula, and in 1396 Bulgaria falls under Turkish domination.

1492 The Jews and the Moors are chased from Spain by virtue of a special decree issued by the Spanish kings Ferdinand and Isabella. In 1496, the same happens to the Jews in Portugal. The baptized Jews, the Marranos, shared the same fate. Some move to Holland and France, and others head for the Ottoman Empire. They found communities and synagogues, which became known as Sephardic (after the Jewish name for Spain: Sepharad). Initially, the newcomers settle in big towns like Constantinople, Edirne, and Thessalonica, and from there they gradually spread throughout the empire to reach the Bulgarian territory. The Jews in the Ottoman Empire are organized according to the millet system, which separates the non-Muslim population into religious communities with internal autonomy. Thus, along with the Greek Orthodox and Armenian Gregorian millets, the Yehudi millet appears. The Jews are represented by the chief rabbi (hakam bashi) with a seat in Constantinople. In compliance with the requirements of the official authorities, the Jewish community has its internal functions, combining the rights of spiritual and temporal power on its members. At same time its responsibilities include maintaining and regulating the community's relations with the state, such as collecting taxes and regulating the economic activities of its members.

1493 The settlement of Sephardic Jews within the Ottoman Empire facilitates the development of printing. The first printing house in the Empire is founded in Constantinople. Run by David and Shmuel ibn Nahmiyas, it functions until 1518. The first printed book it produces is Sefer Aturim by Jakov ben Asher. During the following decades, printing houses are established in other important towns, including Salonika, Izmir (Smirna), Sofia, and Belgrade. The Sephardic Jewish newcomers, with their knowledge and expertise in such different fields as trade, crafts, and science, have a positive impact on the development of the economic and cultural life of the Ottoman Empire. Textile production, centered mostly in Salonika, is their major craft. The Sephardic Jews are distinguished specialists in silk production and wool textile and dyeing. Ever since the reign of Sultan Bayezid (1481–1512), they have been granted privileges (berat) for buying wool from certain regions at lower price.

16th century The Ottoman Empire's conquest of vast territories facilitates the control of the big trade roads between Europe and Asia. This enables Sephardic merchants to occupy key positions, especially in international trade. The Bulgarian lands became an important link for the Ottoman Empire in two directions: southwest (Dubrovnik, Constantinople, Salonika) to the Mediterranean and northwest (the Danube region, Transylvania, and Central Europe). The Jews engage in trade in the interior regions of the Balkan Peninsula, thus playing a major role in the regional markets. Beside the privileges ensured by the Ottoman government, the Jewish merchants also have privileges guaranteed by the treaties signed by the Sublime Porte and the European forces. These treaties mark the decline that started in the Ottoman Empire after the 16th century; it motivated Jews to migrate to the West in search of new possibilities for accomplishment.

1523 Rabbi Josef Kapo, author of the famous work Shulan Aruh, comes to Nikopol, an important educational and religious center, where he teaches for some time at the local Talmudic school. One of the biggest achievements of the Sephardic cultural tradition, the Judeo-Hispanic language known also as Ladino, is enriched lexically under the influence of the Balkan, Arabic, and French languages. Wine production is another important occupation Sephardic Jews engage in (Salonika, Sofia, Bitolya, Edirne, Dupnitsa), as well as production of golden jewelry, glass, leather items, and dairy products (Vidin, Sofia, Salonika, Chorlu). Their expertise in medicine and physics, as well as their good command of foreign languages, facilitates the rise of Sephardic Jews to high positions in the sultan's court. Money exchange is another occupation that attracts many Jews. They are also active in collecting taxes and engage in direct money lending to different layers of the population.

- 17th century During the second half of the century, the movement of the self-proclaimed messiah Sabbatai Zevi gains popularity. His influence reaches the Bulgarian territories occupied by the Turks and finds fervent followers, especially among the Sofia Jews. In the 17th and 18th centuries, a number of works on religious matters are published in old Hebrew and Judeo-Hispanic, among them are also books on moral issues and commentaries. Special attention must be paid to the work of Yakov Kuli and Isak Magrisso Meham Loez (b. 1733), which includes commentaries on the Bible and has an enormous impact on Spanish Jews in the Orient.
- 18th century Another pseudo-messiah, Jakov Frank, makes a strong impact on the Bulgarian Jews, in particular in Nikopol.
- 1817 The first secular schools of Alliance Israelite Universelle, with teaching in French, start functioning in Shumen, Samokov, and Russe; these schools also provide education for girls. After the liberation, schools of the Alliance open in Plovdiv, Vidin, Sofia, and Pazardjik. Gradually, the schools supported by the communities start the process of modernization and adjust to the educational programs of Bulgarian schools. Along with Hebrew, they also teach Bulgarian, which greatly facilitates the integration of young Jewish people into the economic and social life of the country.
- 1877–1878 In spite of their loyal attitude toward the sultan, many Jews are inspired by the ideas proclaimed by the Bulgarian revolutionaries during the period of the National Revival. They join the national liberation struggle of the Bulgarian people and participate in the Russo-Turkish war. Vassil Levski, founder and leader of the revolutionary organization, often finds refuge in the homes of Bulgarian Jews in Vidin, Russe, Pazardjik, and Plovdiv. Eliezer Kalev from Plovdiv and Moshon Garti from Stara Zagora make significant contributions to the revolutionary movement. During the Russo-Turkish war, many Jews join the Bulgarian volunteer troops. Mosei Kalev and Leon Krudo from Samokov participate in the battle on Mount Shipka at the end of August 1877. When the Turkish troops withdraw from Sofia in the beginning of January 1878, the rabbi of Sofia, Gabriel Almosnino, actively tries to prevent the destruction of the town by fire. He participates in the unsuccessful negotiations with the commander-in-chief of the Turkish army, Syuleiman Pasha, pleading for him not to set the town on fire. When his request is denied, Almosnino helps organize a fire brigade, which puts out the fire. He is also elected as the representative of Bulgarian Jews in the first Grand National Assembly in Tarnovo in 1879.
- 1880 Promulgated July 2, the Temporary Rules for Spiritual Guidance of Christians, Muslims, and Jews, which set the frame of the religious objectives of the Jewish communities, are signed by Prince Alexander Battenberg. The document also recognizes Rabbi Gabriel Almosnino as official representative of Bulgarian Jewry.

Jewish communities are established in 34 Bulgarian towns. The survey of 1880 lists 20,503 Jews living in Bulgaria, 4,117 in the territory of Eastern Rume-lia and the others in the Principality of Bulgaria. During the next 20 years, the Jewish population increases by approximately 70 percent. Trade and crafts are the major occupations of the Jewish population.

- 1885 The Principality of Bulgaria and the autonomous region of Eastern Rumelia, created under the Berlin treaty, are unified. The Constitution of the Principality of Bulgaria is adopted on April 16, 1879, and the Organic Statutes of Eastern Rumelia on April 14, 1879. The liberation of Bulgaria marks a new stage in the development of the Jewish communities. The legal status of Jews as citizens of the state is regulated by internal legislation and the international treaties signed by Bulgaria—the Berlin treaty (1878) and the Neuilly peace treaty (1919), which stipulate the legal equality of all citizens regardless of their faith and nationality.
- 1896 Jews from Bulgaria found the Hartuv settlement in Palestine. The leaders of the Bulgarian Zionist movement in its early stage are distinguished figures with international experience, such as Josef Marko Baruh, Zvi Belkovski, Hirsh Ramalovski, and Markus Ehrenpreis, as well as the Bulgaria-born Yeshua Kalev, Karl Herbst, and Albert Romano. The Bulgarian Jewry welcome with enthusiasm the ideas of political Zionism, which gain great popularity after the publication of the book The Jewish State by Theodore Herzl (1896).
- 1898 The first conference of Bulgarian Zionists is held in Plovdiv.
- 1901 Bulgarian Zionists begin publishing Hashofar, the central organ of Zionists.
- 1909 The Jewish Singers' Society is founded at the Central Sofia Synagogue. It is directed by some of the most distinguished professionals in choral singing: Petar Rendev (1909–1910), Mois Tsadikov (1910–1938), Menahem Bensusan (1938–1940), and Israel Aladjem (1945–1962).
- 1914 On April 6, an ordinance of the Foreign Ministry recognizes the Central Consistory of the Jews in Bulgaria as the representative organ of Bulgarian Jewry. This marks the beginning of the Jewish community's secular administration. The communities carry out their activities in economy, charity, education, religion, and culture through different organizations and funds. Before the liberation, the melder religious schools are widespread in Bulgaria. After World War I, under the influence of the Zionists, the Jewish schools start a process of Hebrewization at an accelerated rate. The consistory pays special attention to professional training in order to meet the needs of emigration for Palestine. Courses and schools in crafts are opened free of charge with the financial assistance of the consistory, the Zionist Federation, and the Carmel B'nai B'rith Lodge. Jewish citizens are loyal to the Bulgarian state and participate in all its wars: the Serbo-Bulgarian war (1885), the Balkan War (1812–1813), the war between the Balkan Allies (1913), and World War I (1915–1918), as brave warriors; many sacrificed their lives for the national ideals of the Bulgarian state. Rahamim Moshonov Garti, Avram Tadjer, Moisei Kohinov, Moreno Grasiani, Sason Alkalai, and other officers distinguished themselves in the battles. The total number of Jews who die in the Bulgarian wars of that period is 942, and 31 of them are officers. The favorable conditions created by the democratic development of the state after the liberation facilitate the expansion of the Zionist movement among Bulgarian Jewry. The Zionist movement is also inspired by the ideals of the Bulgarian national liberation movement. The first Zionist organizations, created soon after the liberation, include Ezrat Ahim in Sofia, Carmel in Plovdiv, and Dorshei Zion in Haskovo.

- 1919 The first Jewish chitalishte, Obsht Podem (1919–1924), is founded in Sofia. Jewish centers of the chitalishte type function actively. They house public universities, theater groups, choruses and orchestras, arts and literature clubs, and so on. In the years to come, other institutions of the same type are established in Sofia: Heinrich Heine Chitalishte (1921–1924), Ch. N. Byalik Chitalishte (1926–1935), Jewish Popular Chitalishte (1936–1943), and, after 1944, the Emil Shekerdjiiski Chitalishte. Similar institutions are founded in other towns with concentrated Jewish populations, such as Plovdiv, Yambol, Haskovo, Russe, Kyustendil.
- 1920 The Central Consistory's program is connected with the revival of the Jewish national home in Palestine. Fund-raising is organized by Keren Aiesod (the main fund for the construction of Palestine). Societies of women, young people, sports, culture, charity, and other Zionist organizations set the pace of Jewish social and political life. The Maccabi gym society (the first branch of which was founded in Plovdiv in 1897), the left-wing Zionist youth organization Hashomer Hatsair, the Women's International Zionist Organization, and the revisionist movement Betar establish branches in Bulgaria. Ehalutz organizes agricultural societies (like the one near Pazardjik) that train pioneers for emigration to Palestine. Many Jews settle there during the British Mandate and found the settlements Kfar Hitin and Bet Hanan.
- 1933 The rise of the Nazi regime in Germany and the enactment of the Nuremberg racist legislation pave the road for the mass extermination of European Jewry. Bulgaria forms an alliance with Nazi Germany, which encourages the government to adopt anti-Semitic laws modeled after the Nuremberg racist legislation.
- 1940 Although there had not been marked anti-Semitic feelings in Bulgaria before, the enactment of the Law for Protection of the Nation on December 24 gives anti-Semitism the status of official policy for the first time in the country's history. As a result, Jews are excluded from Bulgarian economic, social, and cultural life. The adoption of this legislation is strongly opposed by the representatives of different professional associations—lawyers, physicians, journalists, artists—and by intellectuals, politicians, the Bulgarian Orthodox Church, members of the Bulgarian Workers' Party, and ordinary citizens. Protest declarations sweep the National Assembly. The Jews express their own position in a declaration issued by the Central Consistory. Many join the ranks of the underground antifascist movement and guerilla resistance groups.
- 1941 An ordinance mobilizes the entire male Jewish population to build roads and railways all over the country. The Nazi occupation of Greece and Yugoslavia gives Bulgaria a chance, as an ally of Germany, to annex Macedonia and Greek Thrace, which had been taken from it under the Neuilly treaty after World War I. Bulgarian legislation is introduced to these territories by force under the Bulgarian police and the army. The decree that regulates citizenship on the territories liberated in 1941, enacted by the Council of Ministers on July 5, 1942, denies Jews living in these territories the right to acquire Bulgarian citizenship.

- 1942 The plan for the Final Solution, adopted at the Wannsee Conference in Berlin on January 20, envisages the destruction of the entire Jewish population in Europe, more than 11 million people, including the 48,000 Bulgarian Jews. After this, the restrictions imposed on the Jews are intensified. A commissariat for Jewish affairs is established at the Ministry of the Interior to implement the anti-Semitic legislation, organize the confiscation of Jewish property, and prepare for the deportation of the Jews. Alexander Belev is appointed head of the commissariat. A secret agreement, signed between Bulgarian Commissar Alexander Belev and SS Hauptsturmführer Theodore Dannecker, the German councillor on Jewish matters, provides for the deportation of 20,000 Bulgarian Jews from the so-called New Territories. Because the number of Jews on these territories does not exceed 12,000, the remaining Jews have to be taken from the Bulgarian borders to meet the deportation number.
- March 1943 At this time, 11,343 Jews from Vardar, Macedonia, and Greek Thrace are deported to death camps in Poland. The next measures involve the deportation of several thousand Jews from the Bulgarian borders. The news that preparations for the deportation are under way becomes known to the public in Kyustendil on March 9. A delegation that includes Petar Mihalev, Assen Suichmezov, and Ivan Momchilov heads for Sofia to inform their fellow citizen Dimitar Peshev, member of Parliament and deputy chairman of the National Assembly, of this plan. He arranges their meeting with P. Gabrovsky, minister of the interior, who is forced to admit that the government intends to deport the Jews from the country. Pressure from the delegation temporarily delays the implementation of the deportation order. The campaign to rescue the Bulgarian Jews is carried out with the participation of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church, members of the Bulgarian Workers' Party, public figures, and common people. On March 18, Peshev initiates a protest petition to the prime minister against the deportation, which is signed by 43 members of Parliament representing the ruling majority.
- May 21, 1943 The government adopts a plan to deport 25,000 Jews from Sofia to other places as a transitive measure for their future deportation from the country. The whole Bulgarian public—prominent cultural and political figures, representatives of the Holy Synod, common citizens—opposes this decision. Many letters and telegrams of protest are sent to the prime minister and the king. On May 24, a demonstration in which many Jews participate is carried out in Sofia and supported by the Bulgarian Workers' Party. The police broke up the rally, and many participants are sent to prison and concentration camps. In spite of strong public protest, the deportation of Jews to the countryside is implemented.
- August 1943 The advance of the allied armies and the political crisis after the death of King Boris III forces the Bulgarian government to distance itself from the plan for the Final Solution of the Jewish question. As a result, 50,000 Bulgarian Jews are saved from destruction.
- September 1944 Soon after a coup on September 9 that overthrew the pro-German government and allied Bulgaria with the USSR, a Jewish Popular Front (JPF) is founded and begins the task of normalizing the life of the communities and the liquidating all consequences of the Law for Protection of the Nation. The Central Consistory is restored with its assistance. One of its first objectives is to provide humanitarian aid and to restore Jewish social and economic institutions. During the same period the United Zionist Organization (UZO) is established, which unites the restored Zionist associations: societies of women and young people, charity associations, and gymnastic groups.

After December 9, 1944 A government of the Popular Front coalition is established in Bulgaria. It completely abolishes all anti-Semitic laws from January 1941. Properties and civil and political rights of the Jews are restored.

1944–1947 Bulgaria is absorbed into the Soviet sphere of influence. Bulgarian Zionists meet with representatives of the world Jewish community and establish contact, which facilitates the foundation of their branches in Bulgaria and restores former structures. The American Joint Reconstruction Foundation, the Organisation for the Distribution of Artisanal and Agricultural Skills among the Jews (ORT) and the International Organization for Protection of Jews and Care of Jewish Children (OPJ) were actively functioning in Bulgaria at that time. Their objective is to extend humanitarian assistance, create real possibilities for the integrating Jews in Bulgarian economic and social life, and improve their social conditions. After 1944, Jewish chitalishte centers in Sofia, Plovdiv, Shumen, Sliven, Yambol, Russe, and Burgas launched large-scale cultural and educational programs. Their library funds are renovated; activities in art, music and literature flourish within their walls.

March 2, 1945 A decree announces the return of Jewish real estate taken away under anti-Semitic legislation.

1945 The Jewish Popular Chorus is founded under the direction of Israel Aladjem. After 1945, a Jewish Club of arts and journalism appears. Famous cultural personalities are related to the literature club directed by Yako Molhov: Armand Baruh, Valeri Petrov, Viktor Baruh, Haim Oliver, Anjel Vagenstein. A Popular University opens its doors. The Jewish chitalishte in Sofia launches the periodical Novi Dni (New Days). A theater group directed by Mois Beniesh and Yosif Rozanov becomes particularly popular.

A Jewish Academic Institute is founded at the Central Consistory. Dr. Asher Hananel, chief rabbi of Bulgaria, and Eli Ashkenazi, are among its main organizers. The institute receives the Jewish archives that survived wartime bombings, including valuable manuscripts and printed books from the 16th–17th century in old Hebrew and Judeo-Hispanic. The institute also maintains an archive of proverbs, sayings, and songs collected and a large number of materials related to important historical issues, such as schooling and the antifascist movement.

1947 After the State of Israel is founded on May 15, the City Committee for Assistance of Haganah is organized under the auspices of the consistory, and many volunteers join. The Bulgarian communist government favors Jewish emigration, especially after the Soviet Union officially expresses support for the establishment of the Jewish state. Parallel with that, the international activities of the Zionists become more dynamic. The Jewish institutions allocate a significant part of their means for preparing the emigration. An emigration commission is formed that includes representatives of the consistory and three Zionists and is chaired by Jacques Natan. The commission prepares the lists of emigrants. A sahliah (messenger) arrives from Israel to sign the agreement with the Bulgarian government regarding the scale of the emigration and the means of implementation.

1948 The first group departs for Israel by the end of October. A month later, a second group of 2,903 persons departs. A third group of 2,857 persons departs at the end of 1948. The first emigrants are transported via Yugoslavia and, later, via Varna and Burgas, on the ships Rodina and Bulgaria. Organized emigration from Bulgaria to Israel from October 25, 1948, to May 15, 1949, reaches 32,106 persons, mostly craftspeople and merchants, as well as representatives of some categories of intellectuals and civil servants. After this aliyah, approximately 10,000 Jews remain in Bulgaria. The foundation of the Jewish Democratic Front (JDF) is an attempt to overcome the division and unite Bulgarian Jewry. Its program puts an end to the independence of young people and women's organizations, B'nai B'rith Lodge, and other groups that receive financial assistance from abroad or maintain relations with foreign organizations. After the big emigration of Jews to Israel in 1948, urban Jewish property gradually disappears. Most of it is sold and the Central Consistory receives the income from the deals. The control and the property of Jewish institutions, such as schools, a kindergarten, a Jewish popular hospital, a polyclinic, and banks, are transferred to the state. The cooperatives established by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee in Bulgaria are dissolved. The economic foundation of small-scale urban business disappears.

1948–1949 After the big aliyah to Israel, Zionist organizations discontinue their activities. Another actively functioning organization in the period.

1949–1952 Active Jewish life in Bulgaria comes to a halt. On March 8, 1949, the Communist activists at the Central Consistory hold a meeting that launches the idea to curb the social activities of the communities. Their religious functions are supposed to be funded mostly by the state. It is proposed that the Jewish chitalishte centers should become local institutions and abandon their Jewish character. Plans are also made to close the JPF and establish a Jewish Committee at the Commission for the Minorities of the Popular Front National Council. The Central Consistory is charged with a number of additional social functions. Many Jewish communities have to close, and only those in Sofia, Plovdiv, Russe, Stanke Dimitrov, Yambol, Varna, Kyustendil, Haskovo, Pazardjik, Pleven, Sliven, Burgas, and Stara Zagora are to continue functioning. The office of chief rabbi and the synagogues are preserved.

1951 The Central Israelitic Spiritual Council is founded, consisting of five members, with a seat in Sofia. It is decided that a spiritual council can be established wherever the Jewish population exceeds 50 persons. The chief rabbi is officially active in Bulgaria until 1960, and this post is held by Dr. Asher Hananel. After the Jewish emigration wave of 1948, religious life in many communities gradually fades. Many synagogues are closed and their property is transferred to the Central Sofia Synagogue. Normalization of public life raises questions about the future of the Jewish community. The opposition between the two main ideological trends—Zionist and communist—becomes stronger. The difference of views is reflected in the confrontation between JPF and UZO.

- 1952 The fifth conference of the Jewish communities, held on April 20, formulates the notion that Jews are an ethnic minority.
- 1955 In October the Secretariat of the Bulgarian Communist Party discards the concept that the Central Consistory is an official representative of Bulgarian Jewry. In the years that follow, Jewish life centers mostly on cultural and educational activities. The National Organization of the Jews for Culture and Education (NOJCE) is founded in Bulgaria. It exists until 1990, when it is reorganized and renamed the Organization of Jews in Bulgaria-Shalom.
- 1981 Elias Canetti, a Bulgarian Jew born in Russe in 1905, wins the Nobel Prize for literature.
- 1990 Andrei Loukanov, born to a Jewish mother and Bulgar father, serves two separate terms as prime minister.
- 1992 The census reports only 3,461 people who identify themselves as Jewish.
- 1996 Loukanov is assassinated at his home in Sofia. The reason for his murder and the perpetrators of this crime remain unknown.

Contemporary Overview

Bulgarian Jews are united in the Organization of Jews in Bulgaria-Shalom (OJB), which was founded in 1990 as the universal successor of the Central Consistory, which was created in the 1920s. After the big aliyah in the 1950s it was replaced by NOJCE, which existed until 1989.

The reform of an organization like NOJCE, which had a 40-year history and played a significant role during the totalitarian period, turned out to be a difficult task. Under contemporary conditions, it was necessary to rediscover the Jewish identity, which had been gradually disappearing; to reconstruct communal Jewish life; to remodel Evreiski Vesti (Jewish News), the newspaper of the Jewish community; to organize activities in a new way in order to incorporate communities from other Bulgarian towns; to perform indispensable social activities; and restore the international relations interrupted in the past as a result of the isolationist policy of the Bulgarian state.

All of these tasks necessitated the foundation of a new organization, the Organization of Jews in Bulgaria-Shalom, which consists of 19 regional organizations centered in different parts of the country. These regional organizations can also be registered as independent legal entities. Irrespective of their status, they elect their governing bodies and adopt their statutes. The statutes of the regional organizations that are registered as legal entities are created on the basis of the model statutes approved by the General Assembly.

The numerous activities and clubs of the OJB encompass young people's clubs; social, cultural, and educational structures; women's associations; and so on. The regional organizations have middle-age clubs, Ladino clubs, and so on. The General Assembly of the OJB is the supreme governing body. The OJB also carries out numerous religious, cultural, educational, publishing, youth, and international relations activities.

The social programs of the OJB are supported by Claims Conference, World Jewish Relief, JDC, and other groups. Social activities include the following:

- Beit Avot senior citizens' home employs a physician and care staff for about 25 residents.
- The largest regional organizations in Sofia and Plovdiv have canteens that offer kosher food to more than 250 persons; in the other municipalities Shalom pays to restaurants to provide catering services.
- A daytime rehabilitation center attends to 150 persons every day;
- The Golden Age Club provides recreational opportunities and care to about 200 persons every Saturday.
- Cash allowances up to the level of the social minimum are provided to people with income lower than that level.

The OJB carries out formal and informal educational activities. Formal educational activities include care and financial assistance to kindergarten No. 1 in Sofia and the Dimcho Debelianov secondary school No. 134 with early foreign language education (its first-grade curriculum includes obligatory Hebrew studies for all children, irrespective of their ethnic background). The school is run by the state and has students of Jewish origin, as well as Bulgarian, Gypsy, and Turkish children. The OJB acts as a coordinator between the school and its sponsors (the Lauder Foundation and ORT).

Informal education is run by the Youth Centre for Jewish Non-formal Education (YCJNE). Programs include Yom Sababa (for children 6 to 11 years old) in which the children, supervised by madrikhim, acquire knowledge of Jewish traditions, religion, and culture through games; Ein Gvulot, in which 12- to 14-year-olds are engaged in different activities ranging from media and journalism to fashion; and Hadraha College, which trains madrikhim for the two programs for younger children.

In terms of religious activities, the chairman of the Central Israelitic Spiritual Council is entitled to be a member of the executive bureau of Organization of Jews in Bulgaria-Shalom. Beside the synagogue in Sofia, there is also a functioning synagogue in Plovdiv, and there are midrashim in Varna, Russe, and Burgas. The Sofia synagogue is one of the biggest and most beautiful synagogues in Europe. During World War II it was partially destroyed, but restoration began in 1990, and in 1997 the big hall was opened for services in its entire splendor. Every year since the Hanukkah shammash has been lit by a prominent state leader—the president, prime minister, or mayor of Sofia. The OJB pays the salaries of the synagogue staff in Sofia and Plovdiv, and services are regularly performed in the synagogues. The chief rabbi of Bulgaria is Behor Kahlon. OJB organizes mass Passover Seders, children's carnivals for Purim, and other events on religious holidays. The Sofia synagogue also houses a Jewish museum under the directorship of Vladimir Paunovski.

OJB is in charge of cultural activities that are rich and varied. The Jewish theater Keshet, directed by Eva Volitzer, has a repertoire that includes the classical Jewish play Dibbuk by Solomon Anski and plays by Jewish and Bulgarian playwrights. Dibbuk was shown on Bulgarian national television. Musical activities include the Agada chorus and Dulce Canto, a vocal group directed by Lika Ashkenazi.

Synagogue in Sofia, Bulgaria. (Yana Downing)

OJB has two cultural centers in the very center of Sofia and 10 centers in different regions of the country. One of the Sofia centers houses a kosher restaurant that offers concerts every evening and hosts meetings with famous cultural figures.

OJB also has a publishing center that publishes books important for Jewish culture in four major fields: Jewish authors from around the world, Bulgarian Jewish authors, history, and Judaism. Major publications include The Jewish State by Theodor Herzl (the first foreign language translation of this book was in Bulgarian); books by Amos Oz, Shalom Ash, Efreim Kishon, Albert Einstein (My People); Lion Feuchtwanger's trilogy on Josephus; and books by Isaac Bashevis Singer.

OJB has diverse international activities. After 1990, OJB resumed its active cooperation with American Jewish Joint & Distribution Committee (AJJDC), which was interrupted during the 1950s by the then ruling Communist regime. AJJDC, the Jewish Agency (Sohnut), the Lauder Foundation, and ORT participate in different OJB projects. OJB is also a member of the two European Jewish structures—the European Council of the Jewish Communities and the European Jewish Congress. Contacts with the American Jewish Committee, BB International, the Conference for Jewish Material Claims, and many other international Jewish and non-Jewish organizations are also very effective.

Important Personalities

Prominent members of the OJB include Eddy Shwartz (1937–2006), the first chairman of the OJB, who contributed to the unity of the community and founded the Mabat journal; Dr. Emil Kalo, chairman of OJB and former president of B'nei B'rit-Bulgaria; Dr. Maxim Benvenisti, chairman of the Sofia Regional Organization and sponsor of the OJB; Sara Cohen, executive director of OJB; Dr. Emil Astrukov, chairman of B'nai B'rith Lodge Karmel-Bulgaria; Becca Lazarova, director of the Lauder Foundation for Bulgaria, who is responsible for the educational and editorial activities (Shalom Publishing House); Mihailina Pavlova, editor-in-chief of the Jewish News newspaper; Simantov Madjar, chairman of the Plovdiv Regional Organization (the second-largest regional organization in the country); and Robert Djerassi, chairman of the Central Israelitic Spiritual Council.

Notable Bulgarian Jews involved in cultural activities in the 1920s and 1930s include artists Boris Shatz, David Perets, Eliezer Alsheh, and Sultana Surozhon; journalists Leo Koen, Karl Herbst, Mois Benaroya, theater directors Boyan Danovski, Mois Beniesh, Isak Daniel, and Grisha Ostrovski; actors Leo Konforti, Yosif Rozanov, and Isidor Hershkovich; painters Jules Pascin, the Nobel laureate Elias Canetti, and composer Pancho Vladigerov.

Contribution to the Country

The Jewish community in Bulgaria consists mostly of intellectuals, as it is typical for Jews to have a high level of education. The Jews have contributed to practically all fields of the social and cultural life of the country.

In the area of politicians and public figures, the Jewish community has always had representatives in the National Assembly ever since the beginning of the transition period (1990) and in the government of the Republic of Bulgaria. The most important political figures include the following: Ilko Ashkenazi (member of Parliament in the Grand National Assembly and the one that followed it and former vice prime minister of Bulgaria); Solomon Passi (member of Parliament in the Grand National Assembly, founder and first chairman of the Atlantic Club, advocate for Bulgaria's membership in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, former Bulgarian minister of Foreign Affairs, and member of Parliament); Nina Chilova (member of Parliament in the 36th and 37th National Assembly and former minister of Culture and Tourism); Nansen Behar (former member of Parliament).

Following is a list, although far from complete, of some of the people who have made important contributions in the areas of the arts, culture, and science: Leon Daniel (theater director), Andrei Daniel (painter), Ida Daniel (poet), Valeri Nisim Mevorah (pseudonym Valeri Petrov; poet, translator, and one of the most significant names in the Bulgarian culture), Anjel Vagenstein (writer, whose books have been translated into several European languages; scriptwriter, former member of Parliament in the Grand National Assembly), Roni Vagenstein (editor, owner of Kolibri, one of the biggest and most prosperous Bulgarian publishing houses), Grisha Vagenstein (film operator, producer), Grisha Ostrovski (theater director, professor in the Krastyo Sarafov National Academy of Theatre and Film), Nikolai Kaufman (professor, musicologist, ethnologist, popular for his work in arranging Bulgarian and Jewish folksongs and collecting authentic folklore), Leon Levi (professor of psychology in the St. Kliment Ohridski State University in Sofia), Vladimir Pilosof (physician, chairman of the Tzedaka Foundation, and assistant professor); Fenya Dekalo (ethnologist who studies the Bulgarian aliyah in Israel); Eddi Shwartz (1937–2006: theater director, writer, founder and editor-in-chief of the Mabat journal), Itzko Fintzi (popular theater and film actor), Eva Volitzer (actress, acting technique instructor, director of the theater school for children and young people), Kasiel Noah Asher (actress), Dessi Tenekedjieva (actress, pop singer), Greddi Assa (painter), Yana Levieva (painter, book illustrator), Zafer Galibov (photographer), Simon Versano (photographer), Etien Levi (pop singer who teaches in New Bulgarian University), Venice Levi (chorus conductor), Milcho Leviev (world-famous pianist and jazz musician), Mayer Frank (pianist), Viktor Baruh (writer), Viktor Samuilov (poet, journalist), Albert Benbassat (head of the journalism faculty in the St. Kliment Ohridski State University in Sofia), Moni Shwartz (director, scriptwriter), and Robert Levi (anthropologist, poet, journalist).

Prominent journalists include Tatiana Vaksberg (popular research journalist, author of documentaries), Emi Baruh (journalist, member of the Bulgarian Helsinki Committee), Viktoria Behar (television presenter, correspondent of the Bulgarian national television in Israel), and Elizabeth Levi (television presenter, producer).

The Jewish community as a whole and the OJB in particular have contributed to preserving and enhancing ethnic peace in the country with their participation in the activities of the Centre of Ethnic Problems at the Council of Ministers and in a number of important discussions, like the one that focused on the International Convention for the Protection of Minority Rights. The annual Shofar Prize of the community includes a category “contribution for ethnic and religious tolerance.”

Selected Bibliography

- Barouh, Emmy, ed. 2001. Jews in the Bulgarian Lands: Ancestral Memory and Historical Destiny. Sofia, Bulgaria: International Center for Minority Studies and Intercultural Relations.
- Bar-Zohar, Michael. 1998. Beyond Hitler's Grasp: The Heroic Rescue of Bulgaria's Jews. Holbrook, MA: Adams Media Corporation.
- Chary, Frederick B. 1972. Bulgarian Jews and the Final Solution, 1940–1944. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press.
- Elazar, Daniel J. 1984. Balkan Jewish Communities: Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Greece, and Turkey. Lanham, MD: University Press of America.
- Haskell, Guy H. 1994. From Sofia to Jaffa: The Jews of Bulgaria and Israel. Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press.
- Tamir, Vicki. 1979. Bulgaria and Her Jews: The History of a Dubious Symbiosis. New York: Sepher-Hermon Press for Yeshiva University Press.
- Todorov, Tzvetan. 2001. Fragility of Goodness: Why Bulgaria's Jews Survived the Holocaust. Translated by Arthur Denner. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Jews in the Czech Republic

Cooper Childers

---

General Population: 10,235,455

Jewish Population: 4,000

Percentage of Population: Less than 1 percent

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Most came from Germany, Hungary, Austria, Spain, and the Byzantine Empire and are of Bohemian, Moravian, and Silesian decent

Languages Spoken: Czech

---

Historical Overview

10th century The earliest Jews to arrive in the present-day Czech Republic (ancient kingdom of Bohemia) date from 970. Most arrive along trade routes and are merchants and artisans. A major settlement eventually forms in Prague's old town on the right bank of the Vltava (Moldau) River.

11th century The period of the Crusades witnesses tense relations between the Jewish population and Christians, and the Jews suffer greatly in a string of pogroms, most notably at the hands of Christians of the First Crusade in 1096.

12th century The next period of the Crusades witnesses severe limitations on civil rights for Jews, and the Jewish quarter is limited to the right bank of the Vltava, close to Prague's old town square.

1142 Prague Castle is besieged. The oldest synagogue and a large section of the Jewish quarter on the left bank of the Vltava River are burned.

1215 The Lateran Council mandates that Jews wear distinctive clothes, prohibits Jews from holding public office, and places limitations on the amount of loan interest Jews could charge. This marks Jews as a minority group and is the origin of the Jewish ghetto in Prague.

14th century Early in the century Emperor Charles IV and his successor, Wenceslas, loosen government control of the Jewish quarter in Prague. This is the beginning of the power struggle among the nobility, the burghers, and the Hapsburg royalty over control of Jewish affairs and business.

1389 On Easter, Prague clergy claim Jews desecrated the Eucharist. Mobs burn most of the Jewish quarter, and the entire Jewish population of Prague is killed or converted.

15th century In the early 1400s, the Hussite Wars weaken royal power and control shifts to the burghers and the landed nobility. City burghers begin to hold positions once held exclusively by Jews, such as banking. However, in the last half of the century, a free Jewish press opens in Prague, and its releases become the model for European Haggadoth.

1501 The landed nobility (Bohemian Landtag) reinstates ancient Jewish rights and fosters economic activity.

1522–1541 The Jewish population of Prague almost doubles as refugees from Germany, Austria, Moravia, and Spain flood into the city. The Jewish ghetto expands.

- 1541 Under pressure from the burghers, Ferdinand I expels the Jews from Prague for two years.
- 1557 Jews are again expelled from Prague.
- 1564 Ferdinand's death improves the situation for the Czech Jewry. During the reigns of Maximilian (1564–1576) and Rudolf II (1576–1612), the Counter-Reformation in the Hapsburg Empire is ignored, and a large number of Jewish intellectuals settle in and around Prague. Economic freedom is given to the Jews.
- 1707 More Jews live in Prague than anywhere else in the world, and they account for one-quarter of Prague's population.
- 1724 The first census of the Jews in Czech lands is carried out, showing 30,000 Jews living in 168 towns and 672 villages in Bohemia, approximately 20,000 Jews living in Moravia, and 10,500 Jews in Prague.
- 1726 Charles VI limits the number of Jewish families to 8,541 in Bohemia and 5,106 in Moravia. Familianten (only the first-born children of Jewish families were allowed to marry) is issued to enforce the quota, numerus clausus. Jews begin to immigrate to Hungary in search of marriage permits.
- 1740s Empress Maria Theresa expels the Jews from Prague between 1745 and 1748, ending the golden age of Prague Jewry.
- 1780s Jews return to Prague under the reign of Joseph II (1780–1790), and in October 1781, the Edict of Toleration gives Jews religious and economic freedom.
- 1849 Jews on Czech land have temporary civil equality under law. Shortly after, the Jewish population splits because of the culture conflict between Czech nationalists and the German-speaking members of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. By the end of the 19th century, three antagonistic groups emerge among the Jews: those who accept German acculturation, those who favor Czech-Jewish acculturation, and those who favor Zionism. These divisions remain through the 1940s.
- 1918 Czechoslovakia gains independence from the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Jewish nationalists plan individual Jewish "statelettes" within Czechoslovakia as early as 1917 but do not achieve their ambitions before the Nazi invasion.
- 1930 The Jewish population of small towns decreases by half as Prague, Brno, and Ostrava receive an influx of Jews from the countryside. The Jewish population of Czechoslovakia stands at 356,830.
- September 29, 1938 The Munich Agreement cedes the Sudetenland to Nazi Germany.
- March 14, 1939 Slovakia declares its independence from Prague and signs a treaty of protection with Nazi Germany. The next day German troops cross Czech borders. The Bohemia-Moravia Protectorate is established. After the invasion approximately 26,000 Czech Jews escape to Palestine, Poland, Great Britain, France, the United States and South America, but 92,000 Jews remain in occupied Czech lands. Of the 80,614 Jews who are deported by the Germans during World War II, 10,090 survived.
- May 5, 1945 Czechoslovakia regains sovereignty; 2,803 Jews remain in Bohemia and Moravia.
- February 1948 A Soviet backed coup establishes a communist dictatorship in Czechoslovakia. From 1948 to 1949 the Soviet block recognizes Israel, allowing Jews to - make aliyah: between 1948 and 1950, 18,879 Jews immigrated to Israel. Czechoslovakia offers strong support of Israel during Israel's war of independence and is one of the first countries to officially recognize Israel. During the Soviet period, there are no rabbis on Czech lands and only eight Jewish communities: Prague, Brno, Usti nad Labem, Olomouc, Ostrava, Levice, Pizen, and Pribram.

- 1989 Under pressure of mass protests, the communist leadership in Prague resigns in the Velvet Revolution
- 1990 Czechoslovakia has its first free election since 1946.
- 1991 A museum is opened dedicated to Franz Kafka, a Czech Jew whose works are repressed during the Soviet period.
- 1993 The Czech Republic and Slovakia peacefully separated.
- 1994 The Prague Jewish Museum in the city's historic Ghetto is returned to the Jewish community.
- 1997 A Jewish elementary school opens in Prague.
- 1999 A Jewish high school opens in Prague.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Most Jewish Czechs are professionals or members of the service industry.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Prague has been the traditional cultural center for the Czech Republic and Central Europe. During the Renaissance, several prominent Jewish intellectuals emerged, and Jews became mathematicians, astronomers, historians, geographers, philosophers, and artists. Another period of cultural activity was during the years between World War I and World War II; it produced writers such as Ludwig Winder, F. C. Weisskopf, Egon Erwin Kisch, Franz Werfel, Max Brod, and, most notably, Franz Kafka. Since World War II there has been little cultural activity among the tiny Czech Jewish population.

Religious Denominations

Orthodoxy, Havurah, Bet Simcha, Bet Praha, and Reform are the prominent denominations. Most young Jews are outside Orthodoxy because of a high degree of cultural assimilation and a lack of being Halacha.

Jewish Educational and Communal Institutions

The Jewish population of the Czech Republic is too small to merit special schools from the government, though a Jewish kindergarten opened in Prague in 1994. In addition to the kindergarten, an old age home was established in Prague in 1993. Prague is the residence of the only rabbi in the Czech Republic, the formerly exiled playwright, Karol Sidon. After the fall of communism many new societies and clubs were formed by Czech Jews, most notably the B'nai B'rith Lodge and the Franz Kafka Society. In 1991, a memorial museum was opened on the site of the Jewish ghetto in Terezin. In 1992, work began to restore the Holocaust memorial in the 500-year-old Pikkas Synagogue in Prague. Prague continues to be the host for various interreligious forums on anti-Semitism.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

During the brief period of official contact between Czechoslovakia and Israel, 18,879 Jews made aliyah. Others migrated to the United States through Western Europe. Most Jews remaining in the Czech Republic live in urban centers and most of the Jewish population is still centered in Prague.

Selected Bibliography

- Epstein, Helen, and Kovaly, Heda Margolius. 1997. Under a Cruel Star: A Life in Prague 1941–1968. Teaneck, NJ: Holmes & Meier.
- “The Genocide of the Czech Jews.” http://old.hrad.cz/kpr/holocaust/hist\_zid\_uk.html (accessed April 21, 2007).
- Heitlinger, Alena. 2006. In the Shadows of the Holocaust & Communism: Czech and Slovak Jews Since 1945. Edison, NJ: Transaction Publishers.
- Rothkirchen, Livia. 2006. The Jews of Bohemia and Moravia: Facing the Holocaust (Comprehensive History of the Holocaust). Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.
- Yahil, Chaim, et al. “Jewish History of the Czech Republic.” Porges Families Web page. <http://www.porges.net/JewishHistoryOfCzechRepub.html> (accessed April 21, 2007).

Jews in Hungary

Jordan Auslander and Frederick Ehrlich

---

General Population: 10,006,835 (estimate July 2005)

Jewish Population: Estimates range from 50,000 to 100,000

Percent of Population: Less than 1 percent

Jewish Population by City: Budapest, 80,000; smaller populations reside in Debrecen, Miskolc, Szeged, and Pecs.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Galician

Languages Spoken: Nearly all speak Magyar. Yiddish is rarely spoken.

---

Historical Overview

ca. 300 Jews migrate to Pannonia, Roman Empire’s border with Germania, now southwest Slovakia 962 Jewish merchants from Byzantine Empire are observed in Bohemia.

1001 The Magyar, Saint Stephen, is the first Catholic crowned king of Hungary. German and Czech Jews begin to settle in Buda, Esztergom, Sopron, and Tata.

1092 While King Koloman protects Jews in exchange for a special levy, Catholic clergy restrict intermarriage and business practices; conditions are still favorable for the region.

- 1222 Jews face restrictions on holding noble titles, but further harsher measures are vetoed by king
- 1251 King Bela IV grants Jews legal rights and welcomes Jewish immigration.
- 1349 Jews are blamed for the spread of the bubonic plague.
- 1458–1490 The reign of Matthias Corvinus is favorable to Jews.
- 1490–1516 King Ladislas VI cancels debts owed to Jews. Anti-Semitism is condoned during his reign.
- 1494 Blood libel accusations in Tyrnau result in 16 Jews being burned at the stake and riots in towns with significant Jewish minorities, including Pressburg (Presov), Buda, and others.
- 1526 Ottoman Turks defeat Hungarians. Sephards from Istanbul settle in Subcarpathia, and others disburse into the Balkans.
- 1541 Conquered Hungary is incorporated into Ottoman Empire where Sephardim had always sought haven from harsher regimes. The Jewish population moves from Asia Minor to Buda and Kecskemet.
- 1614 Sectarian registration era begins when Pope Paul V issues Rituale Romanum, which codifies the keeping of five types of parish registers of baptisms, confirmations, marriages, congregation numbers, and burials. In areas under Hungarian control, the Roman Catholic becomes the de facto church of record, registering Protestants and others until 1781.
- 1686 Ottomans are defeated by an alliance where Hungarian nobles elect an Austrian Hapsburg king to rule Hungary. Turkish domination of the region ends in 1699.
- 1690s To consolidate their power base, Austrians and landed Hungarians encourage non-Magyar influx, including Slovaks and Jews, to resettle the wartorn land. Hapsburgs dominating the empire promote use of German language. The historic lands, Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia, come under Austrian rule, and Slovakia and Transcarpathia come within Hungary's realm. Retaliatory Jewish expulsions take place.
- 1725 The Jewish census records about 1,700 households, in 40 communities, most in Western Hungary
- 1735–1738 The census shows that 8,000 of Slovakia's 12,000 Jews are originally from Moravia.
- 1740–1780 Anti-Semitic Maria Theresa, reigns as archduchess of Austria and queen of Hungary and Bohemia.
- 1772 Galicia is annexed by Austria.
- 1774 Bukowina is annexed by Austria.
- 1780–1790 Joseph II succeeds Maria Theresa and issues the Edict of Toleration (Toloranz Patent), which officially allows Jews to work as farmers and artisans and attend public schools; Jews are also allowed to settle in the royal cities, but changing residence still requires special permission.
- 1784 The October 24th Letter of Tolerance specifies that rabbis are to keep German-language registers of births, marriages, and deaths through 1895. Jewish jurisdictional autonomy is abolished.
- 1787 On July 23, Hungary's 81,000 Jews are ordered to choose German family names for taxation and the draft and to Germanicize their first names by January 1788.

- 1840 The civil registration era begins. Decree XXIX mandates the recording of births, marriages, and deaths. Jewish compliance is tempered by the absence of official recognition of citizenship. Debrecen is opened to Jewish settlement.
- 1848 The Magyars, led by Lajos Kossuth, rebel against Austrian domination. Austrians, with Russian help, crush the rebellion. Jews are punished collectively for their support of the rebellion with a tax; its levy is preceded by a Jewish census. “Enlightened despot” Franz Joseph I succeeds Franz II and rules through 1916.
- 1850 The Jewish population is 340,000. Religious marriage is officially recognized, and registry compliance increases.
- 1851 Beginning in July, Jews are required to maintain “parish” registry books for vital records; compliance expands.
- 1866 The dual monarchy establishes common military, foreign policy, and finances. Francis Joseph still rules.
- 1867 The Hungarian Diet passes the Emancipation Act granting Jews full citizenship; residence restrictions and serfdom are abolished. Place names are changed to Hungarian names.
- 1869 The Jewish population is 542,000. Anti-Semitism persists and conversions to Christianity increase.
- 1882 Blood libel is documented in Tiszaeslar.
- 1886 Jewish vital registers that were created in 1827 and 1840 laws become an enforced requirement as of January 1; compliance is virtually universal. Register districts are centralized and depot seats are established by Hungarian Minister of Culture and Education Decree #1924.
- 1894 The register agenda is nationalized; civil marriage is introduced along with general freedom of religion.
- 1895 The Jewish register becomes an official civil function as of October 1; formerly it was a rabbinical responsibility. Although the Jewish register/parish districting ends, Jewish records are kept as a separate category through 1948.
- 1896 The Hungarian Parliament enacts Article XVII. The Jewish faith is given equal standing with all other religions; some Catholic backlash ensues.
- 1910 The last census of the empire records 910,000 Jews, more than half of Hungary’s merchants
- 1914–1918 During World War I some 320,000 Jews serve in the Austro-Hungarian forces; 40,000 die in the conflict.
- 1918 On October 28, Czechoslovakia is created from a union of Bohemia, Moravia, Slovakia, and Subcarpathian Ruthenia and formalized in a triumph of Pan-Slavic hopes.
- 1919 A Hungarian Soviet Republic is briefly established; 3,000 Jews die in the “White Terror” reactions.
- 1920 Anti-Semitism persists after the Treaty of Trianon, which dismantles the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Place names are changed to Croat, Czech, Slovak, Serb, Romanian, and so on.
- 1920–1938 New clauses begin to appear on the Hungarian law books curtailing a century of gains in rights for Jews.

- 1938 Hungary joins the German Axis powers and is rewarded with parts of Slovakia, Transylvania, Yugoslavia, and Transcarpathia, increasing the Jews under Hungarian rule to about 800,000.
- 1941 The “Third Jewish Law” is passed prohibiting intermarriage; “Jew” becomes a racial definition. Approximately 50,000 converted Christians are classified as Jews. In autumn, 20,000 Hungarian Jews are expelled to Kamentes-Podolsk and killed by SS and Hungarian troops.
- 1942 In and around Backska, 1,000 Jews are murdered in January. Another 50,000 die in noncombatant labor battalions from harsh conditions on the Russian front. Prime Minister Miklos Kallas, Hungarian fascist Arrow Cross party leader, orders Jewish property confiscated, and imposes economic and cultural restrictions. While parroting Hitler’s “Final Solution” rhetoric, Jews fare better in Axis countries than in countries Nazis conquer as most of their autonomy is retained.
- 1944 In March, Nazis occupy Hungary, ostensibly for its failure to deport its 800,000 Jewish-classified citizens, who were already stripped of most of their rights and property. The 63,000 Jews previously murdered could not prove they had three generations of Hungarian residency. In April, Adolf Eichmann conducts a three-generation Jewish census of 400,000 Jews uprooted from countryside who are now concentrated in ghettos created in major towns. Deportations to Auschwitz commence in May. Some 2,000 Jews avoid the ghettos, fleeing to Romania. Zionist organizations provide fake passports, food, clothing, and concealment. Hannah Szenes and Perez Goldstein, members of the Jewish defense organization Haganah, infiltrate Hungary with the intention of organizing Jewish resistance, but their success is mostly symbolic and both are captured and killed. The Europa Plan is the result of a philanthropist’s private negotiations with Eichmann to buy, at $1,000 a head, passage for 1,658 Jews to Switzerland. Accounts from these refugees published in neutral countries prompts Heinrich Himmler to cancel the escape route, but the stories result in sanctioned and covert protection initiatives from Sweden, Switzerland, and Portugal, notably from Hungarian-based diplomats Charles Lutz of Switzerland and Raoul Wallenberg of Sweden.
- 1945 An estimated 98,000 Budapest Jews die in forced marches to Austria in January. By the Nazi surrender in May, 94,000 Jews survive in Budapest’s ghettos, perhaps another 25,000 survive in hiding. Returnees from Soviet labor camps and, to a much lesser extent, the countryside, bring the number of Holocaust survivors to 260,000; however, 565,000 Jews perish, most in the final 12 months of the war.
- 1945–1947 Hungary is reduced to its 1920 borders by victorious Allies per the Yalta and Potsdam agreements. Returning Holocaust survivors revive some Jewish institutions, but most communities reestablished outside the larger cities fail to take root. Pogroms occur in some towns, most significantly in Miskolc and Kunmadaras. Anti-Jewish laws are repealed with the significant exception of property restoration and restitution laws. The Soviet Union subverts elections and installs a communist regime (Hungary becomes a “People’s Republic”), which actively pursues war criminals, primarily for their anticommunism.

- 1948–1949 The Jewish community is officially recognized, and aid comes from American philanthropies, but many Jews, fearing Stalinist anti-Semitism, immigrate to the new, and officially recognized, State of Israel. This window soon closes in 1949, as the Communists curtail emigration and outside contact, close Jewish community schools and institutions, and crack down on Zionists and other activists.
- 1951–1953 As many as 20,000 urban Jews are compelled to disperse to rural areas, but are then allowed to return.
- 1956 The Hungarian Uprising takes place in October and November; eclipsed on the world stage by the Suez Crisis, it is brutally crushed by primarily Warsaw Pact troops and armored forces. The uprising costs tens of thousands of lives, and about 250,000 people, 10 percent of them Jews, escape to the West and elsewhere. Soviets reduce their visible profile and some liberalizations are enacted, but overt religious practice is discouraged.
- 1967 Persons of Jewish origin are estimated at 85,000, most in Budapest (this number would decline to about 50,000 throughout the remainder of communist rule), where the observant maintain 20 synagogues. In response to the Six-Day War, diplomatic, but not commercial, relations with Israel are cut officially until 1989.
- 1999 On March 12, Hungary, the Czech Republic, and Poland are admitted into North Atlantic Treaty Organization.
- 2004 On May 1, Hungary, along with Slovakia, Slovenia, the Czech Republic, and Romania, join the European Union. Relations, trade, and tourism with Israel continue to improve. Hungary exports matzoth and Kosher wines and meats.

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Until emancipation, which occurred in stages throughout the 19th century, Jews were limited from higher education and professional careers. Many produced wine and other alcoholic beverages in the vineyards east of the Danube, serving their products at their own inns (korcma) and taverns. By 1900, more than a third of Hungary's farmland was owned by Jews. As legal obstacles fell, Jews took advantage of the opportunities in a much higher proportion than the general Hungarian population, perhaps the result of the Jews' culture of education in contrast to the general population, 33 percent of whom were illiterate as late as 1918. A middle class with assimilationist tendencies grew, while religious community leaders debated the merits of these new freedoms. By the 1910 census more than half of Hungary's lawyers and commercial businesspeople and nearly 60 percent of Hungary's doctors were Jews, as well as a staggering 80 percent of financiers. Hundreds of Jewish families had even joined the nobility by 1914.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Hungarian Jews flocked more to science than the arts, or rather, their spectacular achievements in science overshadowed their cultural contributions. Many atomic theorists, Leo Szilard, Eugene Wigner, Edward Teller, John von Neuman, Theodor von Kámán, Michael Polanyi, and George de Hevesy, had roots in the Carpathian basin and moved to universities in Szeged and elsewhere, but primarily Budapest, when fleeing the fascists in the 1930s.

Alternative Jewish Culture

With emancipation and the freedoms of middle-class wealth and society came a pent-up radicalism for even more social justice. Many middle-class Jews joined bunds and socialist and communist causes, figuring prominently in the 1918 General Strike and Revolution centered in Budapest. In 1919, Bela Kun, a Jew, briefly establishes a Hungary-Soviet Republic. Many fled Admiral Horthy's "White Terror" reprisals in the 1920s, which claimed perhaps 5,000 lives, 3,000 of them Jews.

Present Economic Conditions

Manufacturing sector gains have been concentrated in the former Hungarian regions of Slovakia and Romania (Transylvania). The legacy of prewar and Soviet higher education infrastructure has seen many Hungarian Jews join the emerging middle-class service sector.

Jewish Education

The Carpathian basin of pre-World War I Hungary as well as the major cities that remained Magyar after the treaty of Trianon were all centers of Jewish secular and sectarian education and publishing. The Hasidic influence remained strong in its Carpathian cradle through World War II.

Religious Denominations

Orthodoxy and Isaac Taub's Hasidim bloomed in eastern Slovak, for example, Moses Sofer of Pressburg/Presov, was a zealous adversary of the Enlightenment, and Carpathian basin (centered in yeshiva and publishing towns of Ungvar/Uzhorod and Munkacs/Mukacevo) in the late 1700s. In reaction to these strict interpretations, the Enlightenment or Haskalah spawned the Neolog movement in the 1830s, which took root in Budapest and other cities.

Assimilation and intermarriage increased with the Emancipation Act, which whetted the appetite for economic and social opportunity. For religious taxation and record keeping the Hungarian Dual Monarchy addressed the some of the internal divisions and recognized three Jewish communities:

- Neolog: The Neolog community is closer to American Conservative or English Liberal than Reform Judaism. It included liberalized services with new concepts like organ music, played by a Gentile, on the Sabbath, mixed choirs, and so on. Congressusi and progressive Halado are Neolog variants.
- Orthodox: The Orthodox broke away from Neolog and formed their own community, aligned with traditional Orthodox Judaism principles. For instance, the rabbi was not allowed to give a sermon in Hungarian, only Yiddish.
- Status Quo Ante: This community was Orthodox, not Autonom Orthodox (Hasidim or Oberlander Yidden). Similar in origin to American Conservatives, this group thought the Neolog reforms were too liberal and the Orthodox too strict. In accordance with accepted Halacha (Jewish law), they kept no synagogue organ, all-male choirs, and so on. Like the Neologs, they omitted the piyyutim (poems) from Sabbath services.

Budapest has a Jewish Museum in Europe's largest synagogue, which is the site of an annual cultural festival each August. In addition Budapest has a Jewish community center, theaters, bands, choirs, and dance ensembles. Many of these events are touted in general tourist information and in Jewish publications originating in Budapest. Elsewhere in Hungary, the World Monuments Fund's Jewish Heritage Council, as well as other private and government funds, has restored synagogues, notably in Szeged, even in communities where Jews have not returned, such as Mad, where they serve as museums and cultural centers.

Communal and Political Institutions

Zionism has roots in Hungary, but not because of Budapest-born Theodor Herzl. Aliyahs before and after World War II included many Hungarians for idealistic and pragmatic reasons. Although most of the current Jewish population is involved in commerce, there is a small but proportional representation in politics, especially as many postcommunist Hungarians discover that democracy is participatory.

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionism, and Existential Problems of the Community

After the bloodletting of the White Terror, anti-Jewish sentiments persisted into the 1920 as Jews were linked with radical political thought. Zionist activities were banned until 1927.

Acceding to Nazi and some popular pressure, anti-Jewish laws were passed coinciding with Hungary's alliance with Germany in 1938. Quotas spread to the professions, bureaucracy, and commerce, followed by bans. Nearly all Jewish heads of households lost their livelihoods, and this was extended to those who could not document three generations of non-Jewish Hungarian (Magyar) roots.

Budapest's Jewish population swelled with those seeking work among their own to survive. Social organizations were formed but could not keep pace with needs.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

Although assimilation, anti-Semitism, and general right-wing xenophobia persisted throughout Central Europe in the 1990s, much of this was curtailed by Hungary's making relatively successful transition into a free-market economy.

Contemporary Overview

There were significant population movements during and after the Holocaust: new arrivals from Poland, Slovakia, and Romania and even a sprinkling of Sephardim. After the war, some 200 Jewish communities were reconstituted, but most dwindled through natural attrition, emigration, and migration to the capital. In 1946, anti-Jewish sentiment led to pogroms in Kunmadaras, Miskolc, and elsewhere. The imposition of communist rule resulted in the closure of many Jewish institutions and the arrest of Jewish activists. Many Jews were expelled from Budapest but were later allowed to return. During the Hungarian Revolution in 1956, 20,000 Jews opted to leave the country. The situation of Hungarian Jewry began to improve in the late 1950s. The community was allowed to reestablish links with the Jewish world, and with the collapse of communism, all restrictions on ties with Israel were lifted. Since 1948, 30,029 Hungarian Jews have immigrated to Israel, 14,324 of them between 1948 and 1951. This figure does not include Hungarian-speaking Jews from Romania.

The present situation is one of very limited religious affiliation. About 20 synagogues and prayer houses function in Budapest, and there are others in the principal provincial towns in which Jews live. The bulk of the Hungarian Jews who are religiously active (a small minority) attend the Reform synagogues, but there are also four Orthodox synagogues, one of them Sephardi. Eastern Europe's only rabbinical seminary, Reform in its practice, is in Budapest, and students from some neighboring countries study and receive their ordination there.

Budapest has more than 10 kosher butchers and a kosher bakery and restaurant. Hungary exports matzoth, kosher wine, spirits, and meat.

Budapest has three Jewish day schools and a high school. One of the schools is Orthodox, another is Reform, and the third is sponsored by the Lauder Foundation.

Interior of the Dohany Synagogue in Budapest, Hungary. (Peter Spiro)

The Alliance of the Hungarian Jewish Communities is the leading communal organization. This framework embraces both the Reform community and the Orthodox community. The Hungarian media often deals with Jewish topics, and its coverage is sometimes tinged with anti-Semitism. During electoral campaigns in particular, there have been manifestations of anti-Semitism. A common charge is that Jews were responsible for imposing communism on Hungary. Nevertheless, even though many Jews left after the war and after 1956, and many assimilated, there is a degree of revival in most recent years. Jewish property is being reclaimed, Zionist organizations are active, and synagogues are being rebuilt. The huge Dohany synagogue in central Budapest is being beautifully restored, largely funded by Hungarian Jewish emigrant Estée Lauder.

The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee is actively involved in community support services and the Chabad movement has a major presence, providing rabbis and numerous facilities, including adult education and Hebrew school (Chevrah Kadishah), an early childhood/preschool center, bar and bat mitzvah instruction, kitchen koshering, circumcision, and hospital and prison visitation services.

Selected Bibliography

- Patai, Raphael. 1996. The Jews of Hungary: History, Culture, Psychology. Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press.
- Perlman, Robert. 1991. Bridging Three Worlds: Hungarian-Jewish Americans, 1848–1914. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press.
- Schonfeld, Louis. "Hungarian Jewish History." Magyar Zsidó 2 (1): 3–6.
- Suess, Jared. 1980. Handy Guide to Hungarian Genealogical Records. Logan, UT: Everton Publishers.
- Szalai, Anna, ed. 2002. In The Land of Hagar, The Jews of Hungary: History, Society and Culture. Tel Aviv, Israel: Beth Hatefutsoth, Ministry of Defence Publishing House.
- Ujvari, Peter. 1987. Zsidó Lexikon. Budapest: Blackburn International.

Jews in the Republic of Macedonia

Scott Meadows

---

General Population: 2,034,000

Jewish Population: Around 200

Percent of Jewish Population: Less than 1 percent

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Sephardic Jews from the Iberian Peninsula

Languages Spoken: Macedonian, Albanian

---

Historical Overview

70 The destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple forces a wave of Jews to immigrate to the Balkans.

- 4th century The first synagogue in the region is built in the ancient town of Stobi.
- 1096–1097 The First Crusade devastates the Jewish population, particularly in Byzantium, Meglen, Pelagonia, Per, and Skopje.
- 1108 Leon Mung, a converted Jew, is made archbishop of Ohrid. He becomes popular for his assistance to Jews who are persecuted elsewhere in Europe.
- 1170 Benjamin ben Yonah de Tudela visits Macedonia. His writings explicate Jewish origins, language, and customs and their affable relations with other peoples, especially the Vlachs.
- 1328 Judah ben Moshe Moskona is born in Ohrid. His primary works focus on philology and geography.
- 1331–1355 Dushan the Great, who is crowned in Skopje, upholds restrictive laws against the Jews.
- 1366 Beth Aharon, the first known synagogue in Skopje, is built.
- 1371–1387 Expanding into the Balkans, the Ottomans, under Murad I, conquer Macedonia. Bitola-Monastir is occupied in 1382.
- 1481–1512 An immense migration of Jews from Western Europe occurs as Jews flee the Inquisition. Many of the Jews who escape are accepted into the Ottoman Empire and the Balkans.
- 1492–1498 The Jews are expelled from Spain by order of Tomás de Torquemada and Ferdinand I and Isabella. Many flee to Portugal, only to be banished again along with many conversos. Most migrate to the Balkans, creating the first Macedonian settlements of the Sephards in Bitola, Kratovo, Ohrid, Skopje, Stip, Struga, and Strumica.
- 16th century Several notable Jewish philosophers are born or live for a time in Macedonia, including Samuel de Medina, Josef ben Lev, Shlomo Koen, Jaakov tam David Yahia, Ishaak ben Samuel Adrabi, Aharon ben Josef Sason, and Salamon Molho.
- 1560 An Italian traveling through Skopje writes that Jews exceed other populations in number.
- 17th century The synagogue Bet Ya'akov is built, and Skopje becomes a hub for Judaism. Sabbatai Zevi and Nathan of Gaza both visit Bitola-Monastir and Skopje.
- 1680 Nathan of Gaza dies and is buried in Skopje, which becomes a world-renowned pilgrimage destination.
- 1688–1689 The Austrian army under General Piccolomini occupies Macedonia. Skopje is set ablaze because of a cholera epidemic. The Jewish sector and cemetery are completely destroyed, and families in Moravia are held for ransom.
- 1863 A devastating fire occurs in Bitola, destroying more than 2,080 houses, including 1,008 owned by Jews. Depression and poverty soar, and slums replace most of the old city.
- 1895 The Alliance Israelite Universelle establishes a school in Bitola. More than 30 percent of Macedonian Jews speak French at this time.
- 1912–1913 Upon the dissolution of the Ottoman Empire, the territory of ancient Macedonia is divided among Greece, Bulgaria, and Serbia. Territories of the present-day Republic of Macedonia are named “Southern Serbia.”

- 1941–1942 The Bulgarian army invades Macedonia and soon enacts laws preventing Jews from being involved in any form of commerce. Jewish businesses are forcibly sold, and Jews are ghettoized.
- 1943 Deportation of Jews to Nazi concentration camps begins. The entire Jewish populations of Skopje, Bitola, and Štip are removed, wiping out nearly the entire Jewish community of Macedonia.
- 1944 Macedonia is liberated, and the few remaining Jews regroup in Serbia. Most immigrate to Palestine (which becomes Israel in 1948), and a few return to Macedonia. The area is one of the hardest hit by the Holocaust; only about 140 Jews survive.
- 1991 After being part of the Kingdom of Yugoslavia since 1929, the country secedes and is renamed the Republic of Macedonia. September 8 is officially celebrated as their Independence Day.
- 1993 After a naming dispute with Greece, the country is admitted into the United Nations under the name “the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.”
- 2003 The Jewish community builds a new synagogue in Macedonia.

Contemporary Overview

Industries, Trades, and Professions

Traditionally Jews work as merchants and urban laborers.

Religion

Though several minority religions still experience difficulties in Macedonia, today Jews are free to pursue religious activities, and anti-Semitism is not a problem. However, because of Macedonia's unfortunate economic situation, its Jewish population was unable to build new temples until recently. Starting in 1999, Temple Beth Israel congregants in Scottsdale, Arizona, began raising funds for a new synagogue. The synagogue was built in 2003 and is now a cherished center for the practice of Judaism.

Community

Contrary to most of Eastern Europe, the Jewish population of Macedonia comprises mostly young adults and middle-aged Jews, with only a small number of elderly. Inter-marriage rates among Jews are high in Skopje, where nearly all of the Jewish population resides. Outside the capital city, one family lives in Štip, and a single Jew remains in Bitola. Ties with the Jewish communities of Belgrade and Salonica are strong, and a rabbi travels intermittently from Belgrade to Skopje to conduct religious services.

Programs

The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) has been involved in several Jewish programs and works in Macedonia. JDC gives welfare assistance to needy Holocaust victims. The group also supports an ongoing Jewish revival in Skopje, with such events as monthly visits by the chief rabbi of Yugoslavia and Macedonia, a communal seder, and a Macedonian translation of the siddur. It also facilitates participation in such regional events as the annual Beyachad seminar in Croatia and the Lauder/JDC Summer Camp in Szarvas, Hungary. The JDC also sponsors a work/study program that enables volunteers to help clean and restore Bitola's 500-year-old Jewish cemetery, which has been neglected since World War II.

Selected Bibliography

- Bickley, Tami. 1999. "Helping Hands: TBI Congregants Raise Funds for Synagogue in Macedonia." 23 July. Jewish News of Greater Phoenix. <http://www.jewishaz.com/jewishnews/990723/help.shtml> (accessed April 21, 2007).
- Brailsford, Henry Noel. 1971. Macedonia: Its Races and Their Future. New York: Arno Press.
- Cohen, Mark. 2003. Last Century of a Sephardic Community: The Jews of Monastir, 1839–1943. New York: Foundation for the Advancement of Sephardic Studies and Culture.
- Daskalovski, Zhidas. 2000. "Remembering the Past: Jewish Culture Battling for Survival in Macedonia." January 30. Central Europe Review. <http://www.ce-review.org/00/4/daskalovski4.html> (accessed April 21, 2007).
- "Europe and Central Asia." World Report 2002. The Public Affairs and Religious Liberty Department of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. http://parl.gc.adventist.org/documents/world\_reports/2002/Europe%20Central%20Asia.pdf (accessed April 21, 2007).
- "Europe/Macedonia." 2005. American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee Web site. http://www.jdc.org/p\_ee\_mace\_current.html (accessed April 21, 2007).
- Gruber, Ruth E. Jewish Yugoslavia. Our Jerusalem Web site. <http://www.ourjerusalem.com/history//story/history20030601.html> (accessed April 21, 2007).
- Matkovski, Aleksandar. 1982. History of the Jews in Macedonia. Skopje, Macedonia: Macedonian Review Editions.
- Persin, Stephanie. "The Virtual Jewish History Tour: Macedonia." Jewish Virtual Library Web site. <http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/vjw/Macedonia.html> (accessed April 21, 2007).
- Sadikaro, Samuel. 1997. "Essential Facts about History of the Jews in Macedonia." <http://www.sefarad.org/publication/lm/031/macedoine01.html> (accessed April 21, 2007).
- Stefanidis, Yiannis D. "Macedonia in the 1940s." Modern and Contemporary Macedonia 2: 64–103. <http://www.gate.net/~mango/Stefan01.html> (accessed April 21, 2007).

Jews in Poland

Vladimir Levin and Piotr Goldstein

---

General Population: 38,537,000 (2006 estimate)

Jewish Population: Estimates vary from 1,100 (2002 census) to around 8,000, according to the Jewish community. Many people are still afraid to admit their Jewish roots, so the actual size of the Jewish population may be much bigger.

Percent of Population: Less than 1 percent

Jewish Population by City: Main communities exist in Warsaw, Kraków, Łódź, Szczecin, Gdańsk, Katowice, and Wrocław.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Jews from Germany immigrated in the 12th–17th centuries. There was an influx of Jews from Russia in the late 19th to the early 20th centuries; at the same time, there was a large exodus to the United States. The 1920s–1930s saw Jews depart to Palestine. The late 1940s saw immigration into Poland of Polish Jews from the territories annexed by the Soviet Union, and departures to the United States and Israel. In 1968, most of the remaining Jews emigrated.

Languages Spoken: Until the 20th century, the spoken language of the absolute majority of Polish Jews was Yiddish; the Polish language intensively spread in the first half of the 20th century. Nowadays, the spoken language of Polish Jews is Polish, but the older generation also knows Yiddish.

Historical Overview

9th–11th centuries Jewish merchants travel to Poland but do not settle there.

Late 12th century First documentary evidence of Jewish settlement in Poland appears, including coins with Hebrew inscriptions.

1234 The first mention is found of the Jewish community in Kraków.

1264 A “privilege” (charter) of Prince Bolesław V the Pious of Kalisz to the Jews of Great Poland allows them freedom of movement and trade; prohibits assaults on Jews and their cemeteries and synagogues; and places Jews under the jurisdiction of the prince and his representatives, rather than city authorities.

1267 The Provincial Church Council in Wrocław (Breslau) demands separation of Jews from non-Jews. Jews are to be segregated in specified sections of towns and must wear special hats. The number of synagogues is restricted, and Jews are prohibited from employing Christians. The regulations are never fulfilled but become a cornerstone of the anti-Jewish positions of the church in the following centuries.

1356 The first mention of the Jewish community in Lwów is found.

1364–1367 King Kazimierz III the Great confirms the privilege of Bolesław V for Jews of all Poland.

1367 The first mention of the Jewish community in Sandomierz is found.

1379 The first mention of the Jewish community in Poznań is found.

15th century Intensive development of the Jewish settlement in Poland takes place. Jews are engaged in money-lending and almost all branches of trade, including international.

Late 15th century The struggle of Christian townspeople against Jews begins. A number of towns, including Warsaw, receive the right de non tolerandis Judaeis, or prohibition of Jewish settlement.

16th century A prominent yeshiva is established in Poland. Poland is developing into a center of Torah learning, attracting pupils from Germany.

1539 King Zygmunt I transfers jurisdiction over the Jews living in private towns and villages to the hands of the town officials.

Mid-16th century The highest institution of Jewish autonomy—Vaad Arba Aratsot (Council of the Four Lands) appears: the heads of the main communities and prominent rabbis meet twice a year in fairs in Lublin and Jarosław and decide about matters concerning all Polish Jews, including the division of the per capita tax.

Late 16th–first half of the 17th century Jews take part in colonizing the Eastern areas of Poland that are today part of Ukraine, especially as managers of noble estates. Meeting restrictions and opposition in the old crown towns, Jews concentrate in the private towns belonging to the nobility.

1648–1649 The Khmelnitsky Cossack uprising takes place. The Jewish communities in Eastern Poland are destroyed and thousands of Jews are killed. Poland ceases to be a magnet for Jewish immigrants, and Jews begin to leave for the West.

Late 17th–18th centuries Polish Jewry recovers from the troubles of Cossack uprising and 30 years of war. Jews are increasingly engaged in managing the nobility's estates and leasing beverage production and sale.

1764 The Council of the Four Lands is abolished. The first census of Jews establishes that about 650,000 Jews live in the kingdom of Poland.

1772 In the First Partition of Poland, Prussia, Austria, and Russia receive territories with large Jewish populations.

1793 The Second Partition of Poland is led by Prussia and Russia. A Jewish regiment under the command of Berek Joselewicz participates in the uprising against the partitioning powers.

1795 In the Third Partition of Poland, by Prussia, Austria, and Russia, the independent Polish state ceases to exist.

First half of the 19th century Hasidism spreads in Poland. Jews begin to be acculturated into Polish culture.

1807–1815 Napoleon I organizes the Duchy of Warsaw on the Polish territories taken from Prussia and Austria. Jewish emancipation is proclaimed but postponed for 10 years.

1815 The Vienna Congress creates the Kingdom of Poland (Congress Poland) as an autonomous part of the Russian Empire on the territory of the Warsaw Duchy.

1822 Autonomous Jewish communities (kahals) are abolished. In their place, new communities are created, restricted to the religious and social help spheres.

1862 The Jews are emancipated in Congress Poland.

1881 An anti-Jewish pogrom takes place in Warsaw in December.

1890s–1910s Jews immigrate to Congress Poland from Lithuania (so-called litvaks). Jews take an active part in the developing the textile production. Anti-Semitism increases. There is mass emigration of Jews to the United States. Two major Jewish centers develop in Warsaw and Lodz. Warsaw becomes the largest Jewish community in the world, with 337,000 Jews in 1914, and a center of Yiddish and Hebrew culture.

1897 According to the First All-Russian census, 1,321,100 Jews are counted in Congress Poland, which is 14.5 percent of the total population and 37.7 percent of the urban population.

1906 Pogroms take place in Białystok and Siedlce.

- 1912 During the elections to the Russian Fourth State Duma a Jewish deputy, Dr. M. Bomasz, is elected in Lodz; in Warsaw the Jewish majority elects a Polish worker, E. Jagełło; nonetheless, Polish nationalists proclaim an anti-Jewish boycott.
- 1914–1915 Jews suffer persecutions by the Russian army during World War I; many communities are completely expelled to the east.
- 1918 The independent Polish Republic is created; it includes Congress Poland, Poznań, Pomorze, Silesia, Galicia, Volynia, West Byelorussia, and south Lithuania. Anti-Jewish pogroms take place in Galicia (November 1918) organized by the Polish army.
- 1919 Polish-backed anti-Jewish pogrom breaks out in Lithuania in April. The Minorities' Treaty is signed in Paris in June. The Polish government promises to Jewish schools, controlled by Jewish authorities and funded by the state, and not to compel the Jews to violate Sabbath.
- 1921 At this time, 2,855,318 Jews live in Poland—10.5 percent of the total population and more than one third of the urban population.
- 1920s–1930 The independent Polish state applies anti-Jewish policies: Jews are de facto not allowed work in state service or government-dominated branches of industry and trade, numerus clausus exists in high schools, and an anti-Jewish boycott becomes effective by the late 1930s. Governmental policies and the development of a native middle class cause the decline of Jewish economic well-being in Poland. The major Jewish political parties are the General Zionists, Agudat Israel, and Bund.
- 1931 At this time, 3,113,933 Jews live in Poland—9.8 percent of the total population.
- 1939–1944 During the Holocaust, about 3 million Polish Jews are killed by the Nazis; about 300,000 survive, mostly by fleeing to the Soviet Union. Thus, about 90 percent of Polish Jewry is annihilated. Six major extermination camps are situated in Polish territory: Auschwitz, Majdanek, Chelmno, Treblinka, Sobibor, and Belzec.
- 1946 Blood libel and a pogrom take place in Kielce in July.
- Late 1940s There is a revival of Jewish life in Poland, but all Jewish institutions are taken under full control of communist authorities; there is mass emigration of Jews.
- 1958–1959 About 50,000 Jews emigrate from Poland.
- 1967 After the Six-Day War between Israel and the Arab states, Poland and Israel break off diplomatic relations.
- 1968 The Gomulka's government initiates an intensive anti-Semitic campaign and most Jews emigrate; about 6,000 Jews remained.
- 1977 The government begins a counter campaign to improve the treatment of Jews.
- 1989 The communist government falls and a significant renewal of Jewish cultural and religious life takes place; communal and cultural activities are strengthened.
- 1990 Poland and Israel resume full diplomatic ties.

- 2004 At the site of the Great Synagogue in Oswiecim, where the Auschwitz death camp was located, archaeologists uncover important Jewish relics.
- 2005 The Centre for Public Opinion Research in Warsaw publishes a poll finding that 45 percent of Poles have some antipathy toward Jews.
- 2006 A memorial is unveiled for the Jews killed in Kielce in 1946; they were murdered by local residents after they returned to claim their property.

Contemporary Overview

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

The Union of Jewish Religious Congregations in Poland has a main office in Warsaw and branches in all cities with a sizable Jewish population. The union maintains the Jewish cemeteries, synagogues, charities, and daytime centers for elderly. The rabbi of Lodz and Warsaw—Michael Schudrich—is currently Poland's chief rabbi. The Lauder Foundation has established schools in Warsaw and Wrocław. The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee supports Sunday schools and other communal activities. The Social and Cultural Society of Jews (TSKŻ) helps with the renewal of Jewish life and culture; it has 15 branches in all major cities of Poland and publishes Dos Yiddishe Wort (formerly Folkssztyme), a Yiddish and Polish bi-weekly. Other Jewish publications are the monthly Midrasz, and local community bulletins (all in Polish). Numerous Internet portals and Web forums are run by Jewish communities and organizations. Jewish institutions include the Jewish Historical Institute, the E. R. Kaminska State Yiddish Theater (most of the actors are non-Jews) in Warsaw, the Jewish Choir Tslil in Lodz and Warsaw, and the Jewish Cultural Center in Kraków.

The Reform Judaism Temple synagogue in Kazmierz, the Jewish district of Kraków, Poland. (Aga Grandowicz)

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionism, and Existential Problems of the Community

The change to a pluralist democracy in the late 1980s opened up opportunities for extremist nationalist groups using anti-Semitism as a tool in the political struggle. They identify Jews with the communist regime and blame them for all shortcomings of Polish life. The removal of restraints on freedom of expression meant anti-Semitism was now openly voiced in public and everyday life and grassroots anti-Semitism well attested in public polls. At the time of the 1990 presidential and 1991 parliamentary elections, anti-Semitic rhetoric was even used by the mainstream political groups.

The dispute over the Carmelite convent at the territory of the Auschwitz death camp, where nuns from the convent had placed a cross near the camp grounds to celebrate Catholic resistance fighters executed by the Nazis, was at the center of the crisis in Catholic-Jewish relations from 1984 until 1993, when the crisis was finally resolved and the nuns were relocated. Although some elements within the Catholic Church supported right-wing Christian parties with known anti-Semitic tendencies, the Polish bishops, in an effort to improve relations, issued an unprecedented statement in 1991 taking a clear stand against all manifestations of anti-Semitism.

Since the late 1980s, Polish-Jewish relations are constantly discussed in public. There is continuing interest in the history and culture of Polish Jews among the Polish intelligentsia, and courses on Jewish subjects are taught in universities.

Rebirth of Young Jewish Life

After experiences of war, the 1948 Kielce pogrom, and intensive anti-Semitic propaganda in 1957 and 1968, most of the remaining Polish Jews have been cautious about admitting their Jewish roots. Jewish religious communities—Kehilot and secular TSKŻ clubs in larger Polish cities—would gather very few and mostly elderly Jews. After the transformations of 1989, with Polish public life becoming more open and with contributions from the Lauder Foundation, run at that time by Rabbi Michael Schudrich, many people found their way back into Jewish life. Now numerous Jewish organizations attract those who were previously afraid to admit being Jewish and those who have recently discovered their roots. Elderly Jews are becoming more confident about disclosing their Jewish origins to their children and grandchildren, which has had a ripple effect, and many people are discovering an identity as Poles of Jewish extraction. In 1993, the Polish Union of Jewish Students was established as a nationwide Jewish youth association. It has recently evolved into more locally based organizations such as Czulent in Cracow, ZOOM in Warsaw, and Yalla! in Lodz.

Selected Bibliography

- Ben-Sasson, Haim Hillel, Ezra Mendelsohn, Stefan Krakowski, Isaiah Trunk, Sara Neshamith, David Sfarid. 2007. "Poland." Encyclopaedia Judaica, edited by Michael Berenbaum and Fred Skolnik. Vol. 16. 2nd ed. Detroit, MI: Macmillan Reference USA: 287–326.
- Cygielman, Shmuel Arthur. 1997. Jewish Autonomy in Poland and Lithuania until 1648 (5408). Jerusalem: Self-published.
- Dubnow, Simon. 1916. History of the Jews in Russia and Poland from the Earliest Times until the Present Day. Vol. 1. Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society of America.
- Gutman, Yisrael, ed. 1989. The Jews of Poland between the Two World Wars. Tauber Institute Series, No. 10. Hanover, NH: University Press of New England.
- Hundert, Gershon David, and Gershon C. Bacon. 1984. The Jews in Poland and Russia: Bibliographical Essays. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Kapralski, Slawomir, ed. 1992–1999. The Jews in Poland. 2 vols. Kraków: Jagiellonian University.
- Lerski, George J., and T. Halina. 1986. Jewish-Polish Coexistence, 1772–1939: A Topical Bibliography. New York: Greenwood Press.
- Mendelsohn, Ezra. 1983. "Poland." In The Jews of East Central Europe between the World Wars. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Polonsky, Antony, ed. 1993. From Shtetl to Socialism: Studies from Polin. London: Littman Library of Jewish Civilization.
- Polonsky, Antony, Jacob Basista, and Andrzej Link-Lenczowski, eds. 1993. The Jews in Old Poland, 1000–1795. London: Littman Library of Jewish Civilization.
- Rosenthal, Herman, J. G. Lipman, Vasili Rosenthal, L. Wygodsky, M. Mysh, and Abraham Galante. "Russia." Jewish Encyclopedia. www.jewishencyclopedia.com/view.jsp?artid=479&letter=R#11 (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Weiner, Rebecca. "The Jewish Virtual History Tour: Poland." Jewish Virtual Library Web site. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/vjw/Poland.html (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Weinryb, Bernard D. 1973. The Jews of Poland: A Social and Economic History of the Jewish Community in Poland from 1100 to 1800. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America.

Jews in Romania and Moldova

Frederick Ehrlich

---

General Population: Romania, 22.3 million (2006); Moldova, 4.5 million (2006)

Jewish Population: 15,000–30,000

Percent of Population: 1.5 percent (Romania) and 1.3 percent (Moldova)

Jewish Population by City: Kishinev, 20,000; Bucharest, 4,500; Belz, 2,000; Timisoara, 750; Cluj, 550; Iasi, 550; Oradea, 550; and between 50 and 1,000 in half a dozen smaller Moldovan towns. Most of the Jewish population in Romania is elderly; perhaps less than 1,000 are under 25. The pattern is quite different in Moldova where there is a much stronger preservation of Jewish traditions and many more social and educational opportunities for younger Jews.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: There has been very substantial emigration since World War II, mainly to Israel where some 350,000 of the 400,000 Romanian Jewish survivors of the war went. The situation in Moldova is a little different; there has been a degree of immigration of postwar Jews from southwestern Ukraine, enhancing the local population.

Languages Spoken: Most Romanian Jews speak Romanian. In Moldova, Russian and Yiddish are more dominant, and the Moldovan population contains a substantial reservoir of Yiddish speakers, even among the youth, because of the educational opportunities for Yiddish at school and university level.

Historical Overview

- 2nd century Some evidence of a Jewish presence exists in what is now Romania.
- 14th century Historical records mention a Jewish quarter in what was later to be Bessarabia.
- 15th century Jewish merchants establish a presence in Romania and Bessarabia.
- 16th century Sephardim appear in Bucharest.
- 17th century There is extensive evidence of Jewish life. Prominent rabbis visit the established community in Iasi, and the presence of Jewish doctors is noted. There are numerous other Jewish communities and a tombstone from that period is still in Moldava. A bill of rights and a public statement define the status of Jews and their relation to Christianity. Ukrainian Jews flee to the relative safety of Moldava in the face of the pogroms of Bohdan Chmelnitzki.
- 18th century There is extensive documentation of Jewish life throughout what is modern Romania and Moldova. Apothecaries and physicians feature prominently, and they have presence at court.
- 1731 The Jews of Oradea have official recognition of their chevra kadisha.
- 1741 The Iasi community decides to elect its secular leadership annually.
- 1756 A princely decree confirms the appointment of a hakam as supreme religious leader for what is now Romania and Moldova.
- 19th century Jews allowed to buy houses and shops in towns but not to lease land estates. Synagogues are built but political rights are limited. Jews are regarded as aliens, even though they might have lived there for centuries.
- 1848 Emancipation of the Israelites is proclaimed in 1848.
- 1852 A Jewish school opens in Bucharest.
- 1857 A Jewish newspaper is initiated in 1857.
- 1859 After the unification of Romania in 1859 Jews are promised emancipation.
- 1866 Jews are declared to be stateless; only Christians can be citizens.
- 1877 After the substantial Jewish support of the army in the 1877 war of independence it is decided that Jews can acquire citizenship, albeit in case-by-case scrutiny of merits.
- 1899 The census records 266,652 Jews, 4.5 percent of the total population.
- 1914–1918 During World War I, 20,000 Jews fight in the army.
- 1919 A new constitution grants Romanian citizenship and equal rights to the Jews.
- 1930 The census records 757,000 Jews.
- 1940 Prime Minister Ion Antonescu allies Romania with Nazi Germany.

- 1939–1945 During World War II, Romanian Jews are massacred or deported to Transnistria in Moldova, cutting the prewar Jewish population of some 800,000 in half.
- 1944 Romania withdraws from the Axis alliance and joins the Allies. Jews are active in the resistance against Germany and in the Romanian Communist Party, which has a Jewish wing, the Jewish Democratic Committee (JDC).
- 1948 The Zionist Organization in Romania participates in the World Zionist Congress in Basel, Switzerland, but the same year the communist government in Romania bans Zionism. Jewish organizations are harassed in the official press and suffer violent attacks. The JDC of the Communist Party is dissolved. Only the religious communities, or kehilloth, are allowed to continue to operate.
- 1949 The government organizes the Federation of Communities of the Mosaic Religion to regulate religious activities. Jews are allowed to maintain synagogues, train rabbis, and observe religious customs.
- 1956 The Romanian, Yiddish, and Hebrew language Jewish newspaper, Revista Culturii Mozaic Din R.P.R., begins publication.
- 1960 Throughout Romania, 153 Jewish communities operate 841 synagogues.
- 1967 As the Romanian government distances itself from Moscow, Bucharest makes closer ties with Israel. An official Romanian economic delegation is sent to Israel, and the two countries develop substantial economic and cultural relations.
- 1968 The Jewish theater in Jassy, which has produced more than 100 works over 20 years, discontinues operations. The same year the Bucharest Jewish theater tours Israel.
- 1977 The official census counts 25,600 Jews, but the Federation of Jewish Communities estimates the Jewish population at 45,000.
- 1981 The European Rabbinical Conference is held in Romania, the first time the conference is held in Eastern Europe since World War II.
- 1986 Rabbi I. M. Marilus dies, leaving only two rabbis in Romania.
- 1989 The communist regime is overthrown in Romania.
- 1992 The census records 9,000 Jews in Romania.
- 1994 Rabbi Moses Rosen dies at the age of 83. For more than 40 years Rabbi Rosen had been chief rabbi and head of the federation of Romanian Jewish communities.
- 1995 Rabbi Yehezkel Mark, an Israeli of Romanian origin, becomes chief rabbi.
- 2004 President Ion Iliescu inaugurates the first Romanian Holocaust Remembrance Day. Since 1949, 300,000 Jews have emigrated to Israel.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

The vast majority of Romanian Jews are very elderly, unemployed, and very poor, eking out their existence from very inadequate pensions and assistance from the JDC and other Jewish charities.

Moldova is largely preindustrial; agriculture and related activities are predominant. In the past, the Jews were prominent in commerce and the professions. Little is known about the present situation, although many of those still in the workforce are engaged in Jewish communal and educational activities.

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

There is a much more positive and well-integrated Jewish community in the smaller country of Moldova than in Romania, but both communities are shrinking because of the combination of youth aliyah and the high mortality of the disproportionately large geriatric remnant. Little more than a tiny fragment of Jewish life will likely be found in these countries in future decades.

The Romanian Jewish population is governed by the Federation of Jewish Communities. The federation has been separated from the office of the chief rabbi, which was for many of the postwar years a very effective agent for preserving the community and acting as its advocate.

Although a number of synagogues are still preserved, as are some kosher facilities, the main communal work is now concerned with supporting the increasingly elderly and frail population, which is very much depending on support services. Chabad has established a significant presence and provides a synagogue, library, preschool facilities, bar and bat mitzvah instruction, adult classes, and hospitality and humanitarian aid.

In Moldova there is also an umbrella organization for the country's whole Jewish population, located in Kishinev, where there are also two rabbis. The communal leaders indicate that relations are more harmonious than in many other communities of the former Soviet Union, or even abroad. The leadership has certainly been very effective in establishing educational institutions, as there are two day schools and a yeshiva in Kishinev. One has more than 400 pupils from elementary through high school and offers at least seven hours of instruction in Hebrew and Jewish history and tradition, as well as extracurricular activities such as Israeli dancing, and summer schools. A second, rather smaller, school is under Chabad auspices and offers a very full Jewish program, as does the yeshiva.

There are three Jewish Sunday schools in Kishinev and another five in provincial towns, as well as an adult Jewish university program. Kishinev State University has a faculty of Judaica, Jewish history, and Jewish culture and there is an active Hillel Society.

Because of the widespread poverty, there is much work for the JDC and its Hessed initiatives, which provide nutritious meals and the opportunity for companionship to the elderly as well as a variety of cultural and vocational opportunities for youth.

There is an Israeli consulate and at its cultural center there are youth clubs, Maccabi sports club, ulpan (with some 250 enrollees), as well as other activities with a focus on younger people.

Anti-Semitism is, of course, endemic in the region, although it is officially discouraged. The serious decline in living standards is a strong catalyst for aliyah, which has continued at a high level since emigration has been possible, and continues to deplete Moldovan and Romanian Jewry of its youth.

Selected Bibliography

- Ancel, Jean. 1991. Bibliography of the Jews in Romania, compiled by Jean Ancel and Victor Eskenasy. Tel Aviv, Jerusalem: Goldstein-Goren Centre for the History of the Jews in Romania, Diaspora Research Institute, Tel Aviv University.
- Butnaru, I. C. 1992. The Silent Holocaust: Romania and Its Jews. Includes foreword by Elie Wiesel. New York: Greenwood Press.
- Carmelly, Felicia (Steigman), compiler, on behalf of the Transnistria Survivors Association Toronto. 1997. Shattered! 50 Years of Silence: History and Voices of the Tragedy in Romania and Transnistria. Scarborough, Ontario, Canada: Abbeyfield.
- “A History of Romania.” Romanian History Index. <http://vlib.iue.it/hist-romania/minorities.html> (accessed April 29, 2007).
- The UN Refugee Agency. <http://www.unhcr.org/home/RSDCOI/41501c557.html> (accessed April 29, 2007).

Jews in Russia

Avram Hein

---

General Population: 142,893,540 (2006 estimate)

Jewish Population: 228,000 (2006)

Percent of Population: 0.15 percent

Migration Route and Ethnic Backgrounds: Since the early Middle Ages, Jewish travelers (known in Hebrew as halkhei Rusyah—Russian travelers) traveled through Slavic and Khazar lands. In the eighth century, the Khazars converted to Judaism and their kingdom, in what is today part of the Ukraine and Russia, became a new Jewish kingdom.

Languages Spoken: Russian, Yiddish

---

Historical Overview

8th–12th centuries Prohibitions begin: Jews are not permitted to reside in Moscow and the Russian Empire.

Between the 16th and 18th centuries Some Jews enter Russia illegally or gain entry permits for commercial reasons.

Late 18th century Because of the partition of Poland, the Jews from Lithuania come under Russian rule.

1791 Czar Constantine I confirms the right of Russian Jews to live in the territory annexed by Poland. This area becomes known as the “Pale of Settlement,” and its borders are finalized in 1812.

1815–1855 Emperors Alexander I and Nicholas I attempt to convert the Jews by imposing compulsory military service on young children. Under Nicholas, Jews are conscripted for a period of at least 25 years. The Jewish community is required to provide the Russian officials with a minimal quota of Jews between

- 12 and 25 years of age to serve in the czar's military. Kidnapping was often needed to fill the quota.
- 1844 State schools for Jews are founded, but most Jewish parents continue to send their children to cheder.
- 1876 Restrictions were placed on the Jews' military service. For example, Jews are prohibited from serving in high-status positions, such as the artillery and navy, from becoming officers and conductors in military bands, and from taking leave outside the Pale of Settlement, even if they are stationed elsewhere. Yet they are still disproportionately represented in the military. In 1897, Jews make up more than five percent of the army despite making up only four percent of the population.
- 1881–1883 The Hivvat Zion movement is established in the wake of pogroms during this period.
- 1881–1914 More than 2 million Jews leave Russia, mostly for North America and Palestine.
- 1889 A law is passed banning all non-Christians from practicing law. This discriminatory law only affected Jews. Quotas are also placed on the number of Jewish doctors.
- 1892 The Municipalities Law prohibits Jews from serving in local authorities.
- 1897 Workers unions establish the Bund, a militant workers' group advocating Jewish cultural autonomy and Yiddish as the national language for the Jews.
- 1903 A wave of pogroms lead to self-defense organizations being formed among a diverse array of Jewish organizations such as the Bund, Zionists, and Socialist Zionists.
- 1912 Limits on the right of Jews to vote are introduced.
- 1917 With the end of the rule of the Russian monarchy in March 1917, the Provisional Government ends restrictions on the Jews. After the October Revolution overthrows the Provisional Government, the Bolsheviks, led by Vladimir Lenin, denounce all forms of anti-Semitism and permit Jewish representatives in party institutions. This strengthens the Jewish community as long-dormant parties, such as the Socialists, Zionists, and religious groups, are revitalized.
- 1924 The Soviet Union is established. Traditional Jewish institutions are abolished or placed under direct government control. Some Jewish elites are able to become a part of the political structure of the Bolshevik regime, but its socialist economic policies weaken the masses.
- 1927 Rabbi Yosef Schneerson, the head of the Chabad Hasidic sect, is imprisoned and expelled.
- 1928 The Jewish Autonomous Region is formed in Siberia.
- Mid-1930s The Soviet regime begins a systematic anti-Jewish campaign.
- 1939–1945 During World War II, Russian Jewry is decimated by the Holocaust.
- Late 1940s to early 1950s Authorities close down yeshivas and cheder and forbid the printing of Jewish books.
- 1948 On May 18, four days after the State of Israel is established, the Soviet Union recognizes Israel and takes several pro-Israel positions in the United Nations.

The recognition of Israel leads Jews to believe they can display support for Israel and Zionism and leads to greater expressions of Jewish national consciousness. This is opposed by the Soviet regime, and leads to an outburst of state-sanctioned anti-Semitism and a clamp-down on Jewish culture, including harsh reactions against Israel's diplomatic representations, first led by Golda Meyerson (later Meir).

- 1950s The Jewish Autonomous Region undergoes its second round of purges, and Jewish expressions are prohibited even after Stalin's death in 1953. This leads to a rapid decline in Jewish literacy among Soviet Jewry.
- 1965 Only 60 synagogues remain in Russia. From 1965 to 1967, a few hundred Jewish families are permitted to emigrate to Israel.
- October 1966 In the United Nations, the Soviet Union suggests that Zionism is equivalent to the genocidal Nazism.
- 1967 The Soviet Union cuts diplomatic relations with Israel after the Six-Day War, and the government unleashes a media campaign denouncing Israel and Jews.
- 1970 After the trial of a group of Jews accused of trying to hijack a plane to Israel, the harsh sentencing leads to a worldwide outcry against the Soviet regime.
- 1973 The U.S. Congress passes the Jackson-Vanek amendment, linking trade with Jewish emigration. This law, and international pressure, lead to permission for some Jews to emigrate. However, mass emigration results in increased persecution and discrimination among the Jews who remain.
- 1980s Emigration is severely curtailed. Despite this, prominent refuseniks, such as Anatoly Shcharansky (Natan Sharansky) and Yosef Mendeleovich, are able to emigrate to Israel. It is only in the late 1980s, with the rise of Mikhail Gorbachev, that formal expressions of Jewish culture, mostly non-Zionist, are sanctioned.
- 1987 The Soviet Union permits mass emigration. Many Jews remain in Russia, however. Most Soviet Jews are not Zionists or committed to a Jewish way of life. Most who seek to escape do so because other family members have left, or for economic reasons.
- 1990s A sharp rise in anti-Semitism is seen in the media and by nationalist politicians.
- 1991 The Soviet Union is dissolved and Russia becomes independent.
- 1996 Vladimir Zhirinovsky, leader of the Liberal Democratic Party of Russia, polls surprisingly well in his losing bid in the presidential elections. Zhirinovsky, of Polish-Jewish descent, is a controversial figure with a nationalist bent who denies his Jewish origins, praises Hitler, and uses anti-Semitic rhetoric.
- 1998 Russian Duma member Albert Makashov elicits international condemnation for his frequent use of inflammatory anti-Semitic language.
- 1999 In December, scores of Jews from the Caucasus are expelled from Moscow as part of a drive to rid the city of immigrants from the southern regions of the former Soviet Union.
- 2000 Around 300,000 Jews have left Russia since 1989.

Interior of the Great Choral Synagogue in St. Petersburg, Russia. (Chaim Danzinger)

Contemporary Overview

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

Since the collapse of the Soviet Union, new Jewish institutions have been established that serve a small but important segment of the Jewish population. In recent years, more than 40 “Israeli” schools and 180 Jewish Sunday schools have opened. There are also some Chabad-affiliated religious schools.

Kosher food is available, and the facilities are available for observant Jews. However, most Russian Jews do not view their Jewish identity in religious terms but rather in ethnonational terms. Although most of the population is not religious, Moscow has five synagogues, six day schools, yeshivas, and a kosher restaurant.

There are more than 230 registered Jewish organizations in the Russian Federation, although many only exist on paper. The institutional structure of the Russian Jewish community since the mid-20th century consists of a Zionist stream, religious stream, and cultural stream. The Zionist stream is composed of organizations that aid in the teaching of Hebrew and provide information about Israel, but this stream has significantly weakened since the emigration of its activists in the 1990s. The religious stream developed only in the 1990s and relied mainly on financing and personnel from Israel and the United States. The cultural stream was established in the 1980s and has developed since the 1990s. The religious stream is the central stream of Jewish activity in the Soviet Union.

A variety of Jewish organizations operate in Russia, mostly under the auspices of three umbrella organizations. Rossiiski Evriskii Kongress, the Jewish Russian Congress, was founded in 1996 by wealthy Jews, headed by media tycoon Vladimir Gusinski. It mostly operates in education and welfare. One of its branches is the Congress of Jewish Organizations and Associations of Russia. The other large umbrella organization is the Federatzia Evreiskih Obschin Rossii (Federation of Jewish Communities in Russia). It was founded in 1999 by Russian-Israeli tycoon Lev Leviev, with support from Chabad. In 2002, the Kazakhi businessman Alexander Mashkevich founded the Evroasiatski Evreiaskii Kongress (the Euro-Asiatic Jewish Congress). In July 2005, a new regional council of Sephardic Jews was established, serving Sephardi Jews throughout the Commonwealth of Independent States.

The Reform (Progressive) movement has maintained a presence in the Soviet Union since 1992. The Reform movement is strengthened in Russia for its welcoming attitude toward those who are not Halachically Jewish. The Jewish Agency also runs programs for children who are not Halachically Jewish. The Masorti (Conservative) movement has also increased its presence.

The government of Israel has representation in Russia through the Ministry of Education, which provides financing and administrative support for the teaching of Israeli subjects in a network of 44 schools. World ORT (Organisation for the Distribution of Artisanal and Agricultural Skills among the Jews) runs a network of vocational schools and provides technical support to Jewish schools. The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee runs an extensive welfare network. It provides services to Russia's elderly and poor populations.

Since the 1990s, educational opportunities in the Jewish sphere have expanded. In 2003, Russia's network of Jewish schools included 17 day schools, 11 preschools, and 81 supplementary schools, educating a total of about 7,000 students, not all of them Jewish. In recent years, Russian universities have added Jewish and Israeli studies programs. There are four Jewish universities in Moscow and St. Petersburg.

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionism, and Existential Problems of the Community

With economic and political decline, Russia saw an upsurge in xenophobic attacks targeted at Jews and an increase in anti-Semitic publications. Despite a relative low level of anti-Semitism, the rise in anti-Semitism has given cause for Jews to worry. Some inquire about emigration to Israel, although there is little follow-up. In recent years, Jewish religious and cultural facilities have been targets of vandalism, and in January 2006, worshipers were attacked at the Chabad synagogue in Moscow.

In June 2005, Russian prosecutors opened an investigation against a Russian organization that published a Russian translation of the Kitzur Shulchan Aruch. The investigation of the Jewish holy book was instigated by a letter from a group of Russian leaders calling for a ban on Jewish organizations. Several of the signatories of the letter were representatives of the leftist Rodina party, which holds several seats in the Russian Duma. The investigation into the Kitzur Shulchan Aruch was closed after pressure from Jewish groups and the Israeli government.

Russia has also seen an increase in militant Islamic activity and is struggling with Islamic extremism. Many radical Islamic groups are funded by extremist Islamic factions in the Middle East.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

Although Russia was once a major population center for the Jewish people, by the early 21st century, its Jewish community was in deep decline and made up only a small majority of the worldwide Jewish population. While the Jewish population of the Soviet Union made up more than 20 percent of Diaspora Jewry in 1970, in 2003 it made up only 5.3 percent of Diaspora Jewry. In 2020, the population is predicted to make up 2.4 percent of Diaspora Jewry and only 1.3 percent of world Jewry.

Since the mid-1980s, Russia has seen a mass exodus of its Jewish community. There has been a significant decline in the Jewish population because of emigration to the West, the graying of the population, low levels of fertility, and an out-marriage rate that is the highest in the entire Jewish world—80 to 90 percent.

In the early 1990s, some Russian emigrants began to return. Many were elderly people who could not acclimate to their new society, but others were younger, looking to make it in the new Russian business environment. The growing number of Russian-Israeli emigrants who return to Russia has brought additional strength, as well as new challenges, to the Jewish community, as some of them send their children to Jewish schools but provide a more realistic—and negative—view of life in Israel.

Selected Bibliography

- Altshuler, Mordechai. 1987. Soviet Jewry Since the Second World War: Population and Social Structure. New York: Greenwood Press, 21–24.
- Ettinger, S. 1970. “The Jews in Russia and the Outbreak of the Revolution.” In The Jews in Soviet Russia Since 1917, edited by Lionel Kochan, 14–28. London: Oxford University Press.
- “Former Soviet Union/Russia.” 2005. American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee Web site. http://www.jdc.org/p\_fsu\_rus\_current.html (Accessed April 22, 2007).
- Gidwitz, Betsy. 1999. “The Role of Politics in Contemporary Russian Antisemitism.” Jerusalem Letter/Viewpoints. September 15, No. 414. Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs Web site. <http://www.jcpa.org/jl/vp414.htm> (accessed April 28, 2007).
- Gitelman, Zvi. 1994. “The Reconstruction of Community and Jewish Identity in Russia.” East European Jewish Affairs 2 (24): 35–56.
- Gitelman, Zvi. 2001. A Century of Ambivalence: The Jews of Russia and the Soviet Union, 1881 to the Present. 2nd ed. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Levin, Nora. 1988. Paradox of Survival: The Jews in the Soviet Union Since 1917. Vol. I. New York: New York University Press.
- Pinkus, Benjamin. 1988. The Jews of the Soviet Union: The History of a National Minority. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Ro'i, Yaacov, ed. 1995. Jews and Jewish Life in Russia and the Soviet Union. Essex, UK: Frank Cass & Co.
- Tal, Rami, ed. 2005. The Jewish People Policy Planning Institute Annual Assessment 2004–2005: The Jewish People between Thriving and Decline. Jerusalem: Gefen.

The Unique Relationship between Habad Hasidism and Russia

M. Avrum Ehrlich

---

Habad Hasidism hailed from various small towns in Belarus. It emerged slightly later than the first Hasidic groups. After the death of the Magid of Mezeritch, his disciples, instead of finding a suitable sage and saint to replace him as their master, returned to their respective places of origin and began to attract their own disciples. Only a few disciples originated from Russia, which was disproportionate to the size of the Russian territory and the Jewish communities there. Rabbi Menachem Mendel of Vitebsk (1730–1788) and R' Shneur Zalman of Liadi (1745–1812), the founder of the Habad Hasidic philosophy, was among this group of pioneering Russian Hasidic leaders.

Habad Hasidism grew in what is today Belarus (Byelorussia) White Russia and over one and a half centuries became increasingly influential in various towns and villagers, though Hasidism was not the standard identity of Russian Jews. By the Russian Revolution of 1917, the Hasidic leadership was one of the few to remain in Russia and de facto became its representation. Had the former leaders, rabbis, and dignitaries of Jewish Russia not escaped Russian territory by 1922, leaving the masses to fend for themselves, this leadership vacuum may not have occurred. Rabbi Yosef Yitzchak Schneerson stubbornly remained in Russia and rose to near exclusive prominence. He had recently become the new Lubavitcher rebbe with the death of his father, and he was making his first marks on the style of leadership and determination he would pursue throughout his life. Habad had already developed a more universalist temperament, its ideology and general concern for the welfare of the Jewish soul complemented his ambitions to become a general Russian Jewish leader beyond the confines of a small Hasidic group.

Rabbi YY Schneerson urged the Moscow rabbinic leadership, particularly R' Shmuel Rabinowitz to gather a clandestine meeting of Soviet rabbis to organize themselves for the future against the onslaught of communism. The latter rejected this call, suggesting the dangers involved. Schneerson went over his authority and managed to initiate the meeting and was selected as one of the three leaders of the council. His political, social, and organizational skills as an administrator, political strategist, and, later, as chairman of the council, established him in a non-Hasidic role as one of the official leaders of the whole of Soviet Jewry.

Protests by some people, claiming a Hasidic takeover of traditional Russian Jewry, were for the most part ignored. The situation was tolerated because of the urgency of the hour. The committee sent out questionnaires inquiring into the state of religion in the various communities. Additionally, it employed representatives to energize local communities. These people were handpicked by Schneerson and were often Habad Hasidim despite the nonpartisan character of the organization that he headed. These messengers went secretly, not as messengers of organizations. Their tactic was to contact a local heder teacher who had earlier been unemployed to gather a few students together. The teacher would be provided with a stipend in return for the students' regular instruction. Instructions were given to each teacher as to how to should behave in the event of an arrest. The teacher would then be left to his own devices. In this manner, many haderim were established in many communities that were suffering the pressures of communism. The emissaries traveled widely, replicating this model of religious outreach throughout the Soviet Union.

Rabbi Schneerson's strategy worked, and the clandestine nature of his activities remained undiscovered for years. It was first coordinated from the institution called the merkaz (the center) located in Moscow, but moved to Leningrad in 1924 so as to better facilitate Schneerson's work, because he lived there at that time.

In 1923, Schneerson appealed to the world Jewish organizations for funding for his general activities as a Soviet Jewish leader. His appeals were rejected because of concern that his activities were primarily on behalf of Habad Hasidic interests. At that time, American donors still did not consider him to be a general leader of Russian Jewry. Even the Agudat Yisrael and Agudat Ha-Rabanim of America did not come to his aid at that early stage. In 1924, Schneerson was successful in establishing ties with the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, and he received funding for cultural work in Russia. The French Alliance Israelite Universelle also gave financial assistance to him, which further enhanced his prestige and authority and his ability to help others.

Schneerson prioritized his allocation of funds to the maintenance of yeshivas and haderim as elite institutions integral to Jewish survival. He provided legal aid to teachers who were arrested while carrying out their jobs. Their defense was necessary, as teachers were, on the one hand, the basic instrument in Jewish reeducation and, on the other hand, the most vulnerable targets of Soviet authorities.

Rabbi Schneerson often commented that he worked within the framework of Soviet law and considered only certain marginal elements in the government, particularly the yevseksiya, to be anti-Jewish. Nevertheless he had no qualms about illegal operations when he considered them necessary for his educational activities and particularly when it was realized that the anti-Jewish policies were not limited to the marginal arm of the yevseksiya.

Schneerson encouraged Jews to become artisans, because at that stage artisans were not required to work for the Soviet-controlled factories run on Shabbat. He provided light machinery to religious families for this purpose. He aggressively fought the flow of Hasidic emigration out of Russia, insisting that his Hasidim should not be selfish and that Russian Judaism relied on them to be rabbis, cantors, shohetim, and teachers. Although many Hasidim went to Poland and Latvia with Schneerson's blessings, and even to pre-state Israel, nevertheless, Schneerson told his followers in Russia that there were enough Hasidim around the world to build there and that the problems were largely in Russia. He particularly argued against leaving for the United States, insisting that emigration was tantamount to desertion.

These instructions were given in no uncertain terms and were generally obeyed by his loyal followers. Their disciplined obedience to his instructions to remain in the Soviet Union while others left, gave Habad activists clout as the few remaining religious functionaries in Soviet Russia. This contributed to Schneerson's authority as a general leader, but particularly as a Hasidic rebbe. His constituents (the Hasidim) were better off than most, as they were guaranteed jobs if they carried out Schneerson's instructions. In 1928, however, the rabbinic institutions (including two Habad yeshivas) and the main rabbinic seminary in Nevel were discovered and closed down by the authorities.

From 1930, large-scale crackdowns against rabbis, educational facilities, and artisans who avoided contact with the state economy were implemented. Religious life became extremely difficult to observe. It became clear to all that these antireligious policies were coming from the main arm of government and not from marginal influences. Everything Schneerson had established until then began to crumble. Soon there was no strategy for survival, no plans, and no organized leadership. Schneerson decided that he could do little more from his place in Riga and moved to Warsaw where he continued his activities and ran a yeshiva there. Eventually, he immigrated to the United States, which opened up a new chapter in the Habad movement and its leadership. He continued his efforts on behalf of Soviet Jewry in a clandestine fashion from there. As of today there is a predominance of Soviet Jews in the Habad fraternity. Additionally, a high proportion of newly repentant Russian Jews embrace Habad Judaism over other ideological groups. This is largely because many Russian Jews still have recollections, or have heard stories, of Habad activities in the Soviet Union, and they associate the movement with their Jewish roots.

Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, who succeeded as the seventh Chabad-Lubavitch leader, continued efforts on behalf of Russian Jewry. Born in the Russian city of Yakatrin Slav, Schneerson was a fluent Russian speaker and privy to the decimation of the country's Jewish communities. He was involved in clandestine efforts from New York to assist communities and emissaries during the Soviet era. When the Iron Curtain lifted in the 1990s, Habad moved back into former Soviet Union countries with zest and has since built extensive networks of Habad centers wherever Jewish populations exist. These compete with other Jewish organizations and even Israel-sponsored agencies, and, in most cases, because of the highly motivated religious vigour of Habad rabbis, have by far dominated the religious Jewish presence in Russia and the former Soviet Union.

Hundreds of Habad houses, rabbis, schools, and religious education programs in various forms have sprung up. Habad emissaries have raised a lot of money from the newly wealthy Russian Jewish oligarchs. Many of the emissaries speak Russian and have attracted returnees to religious Jewish life, who in turn are more effective in setting up education and religious institutions. Habad's presence in Russia and the Soviet Union appears to be just the beginning of a renewal of Russian Habad Hasidism.

Selected Bibliography

Buber, Martin, and Olga Marx. 1947–1948. Tales of the Hasidim. New York, Schocken Books.
Dubnow, Simon, and Helen Lederer. 1970. A History of Hasidism. Cincinnati: Self-published.

- Ehrlich, M. A. 2000. Leadership in the Habad Movement: A Critical Study of Habad Leadership, History and Succession. Northvale, NJ: Jason Aronson.
- Ehrlich, M. A. 2004. The Messiah of Brooklyn: Understanding Lubavitch Hasidism Past and Present. Hoboken, NJ: KTAV.
- Fishman, David E. 1992. "Preserving Tradition in the Land of Revolution: The Religious Leadership of Soviet Jewry, 1917–1930." In The Uses of Tradition, Jewish Continuity in the Modern Era, edited by Jack Wertheimer, 85–118. New York: Jewish Theological Seminary of America.
- Friedman, M. 1994. "Habad as Messianic Fundamentalism: From Local Particularism to Universal Jewish Mission." In Accounting for Fundamentalism: The Dynamic Character of Movements, edited by M. E. Marty and R. S. Appleby, 328–360. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Gilbert, M. 1976. The Jews of Russia. London: National Council for Soviet Jewry of the United Kingdom and Ireland.
- Gitelman, Z. 1972. Jewish Nationality and Soviet Politics. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Levitats, I. 1943. The Jewish Community in Russia 1772–1844. New York: Octagon Books.

Jews in Slovakia

Norris Thigpen

---

General Population: 5,400,000

Jewish Population: 2,700 mainly living in Bratislava

Percentage of Population: 0.05 percent

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Most came from Austria, Germany, Bohemia, Moravia, and Poland.

Languages Spoken: Slovak, Hungarian

---

Historical Overview

2nd century Jews followed the Roman armies that crossed the Danube River and occupied what is now southern Slovakia. They were primarily employed as slaves, soldiers, and, later, as merchants. When the Roman armies left, the Jews followed.

9th century Jewish peoples are recorded as living in the Great Moravian Empire.

11th century Jews are firmly established in Slovakia. Slovakia is conquered by the Magyars and integrated into the Hungarian Empire. Jews emigrate from Austria, Germany, and Bohemia. Hungary is their main destination, but many settle in Slovakia.

13th–14th centuries The Jewish people in Slovakia become urbanized as King Kalman decrees that Jews are only allowed to live in towns. In 1251, King Bela IV proclaims that the Jews will be granted legal status and protection from Christians. After King Bela IV's proclamation, the Jews move into ghettos inside the cities.

- The movement of the Jews from the countryside to the city shifts employment from agriculture and small-scale trade to finance, commerce, and civil service.
- 14th century The city of Pressburg (Bratislava) has 800 Jews living in it.
- 1494 In the city of Trnava, blood libel begins. On August 22, 16 people are burned at the stake.
- 1526 Turkish armies defeat the Hungarian Empire and force all Jews to leave the major cities.
- 1529 Another blood libel occurs in the city of Pezinok.
- Late 16th century By the end of the 16th century, the Jewish population of Slovakia has left the major cities and scattered throughout the countryside.
- 17th–18th centuries Jews are reurbanized into the cities. Most people move back to the cities their families were originally from. There is also a surge of immigrants from Moravia, Poland, and Austria because of anti-Semitic riots and laws. These immigrants settle in western Slovakia around the city of Pressburg.
- 1700 The first yeshiva is established in the city of Pressburg.
- 1783 The Emperor Joseph II issues the Edict of Tolerance. The edict declares that Jews are allowed to live nearly anywhere in the Hungarian Empire and participate in any type of occupation. In the late 18th century, the Jewish population expands along with their freedom. Jews live throughout the empire. However, they are not allowed to live in central and northern Slovakia.
- Early 19th century Jewish toleration broadens and Jewish communities increase in size.
- 1820s Jewish cultural and religious life expand. The first Torah centers open in Pressburg.
- 1840s Another round of governmental toleration acts allows Jews greater opportunities in the Hungarian Empire.
- 1867 Slovakia becomes part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. The government enacts new laws that further liberalize the treatment of Jews, but there is a rise in nationalist sentiment among the Slovakian upper classes.
- End of the 19th century Jews experience toleration from the government and anti-Semitism from the people of Slovakia.
- 1882–1883 Major anti-Semitic riots take place throughout Slovakia.
- 1896 The Reception Law is passed, giving Judaism the same standing as Christianity and giving rise to further anti-Semitism.
- 1903 The city of Pressburg is in the forefront of the Zionist movement and holds the first Hungarian Zionist Movement convention.
- 1904 The first World Mizrahi Congress is held.
- 1918 Slovakia gains independence from the Austro-Hungarian Empire and is absorbed into the new state of Czechoslovakia.
- 1921 The first census of Czechoslovakia counts 135,918 practicing Jews.
- 1920s–1930s Slovak nationalism and anti-Semitism increase.
- 1938 Czechoslovakia and Nazi Germany sign the Munich Agreement on October 6. On November 2, two large areas of Slovakian territory, containing 45,000 Jews, are ceded to Hungary.
- March 14, 1939 Slovakia declares its independence from Czechoslovakia and signs a treaty of protection with Nazi Germany.

April 18, 1939 The first of a series of anti-Semitic laws is passed. By the end of 1939, laws are in effect that prohibit Jews from working in the government and military, using public buildings, and owning businesses. The deportation and extermination of Slovakian Jews begins in the spring of 1942.

1939–1945 Around 100,000 Jews from Slovakia die during World War II.

August 29, 1944 Many Jews take part in an uprising aimed at overthrowing the Nazi-led regime.

After World War II The Zionist movement experiences a renewal.

1948–1949 More than 11,000 Jews leave for abroad, many going to Israel.

1950s The rise of communism results in decreased Jewish involvement in the community and government.

1989 The collapse of the communist regime brings increased migration and involvement of the Jews.

1993 The Czech Republic and Slovakia peacefully separate.

Contemporary Overview

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Slovakia's most famous Jewish rabbi was Chatam Sofer. During the 19th century, he opposed the enlightenment and championed Jewish Orthodoxy. He headed Slovakia's most important yeshiva in Pressburg.

Jewish Educational and Communal Institutions

The Jewish population in Slovakia is aging, and many residents are over 70 years old. The aging structure of Slovakian Jews has prompted a renewed interest in preserving Slovakian Jewish identity. Synagogues are located in the cities of Bratislava, Galanta, Kosice, Piestany, Presov, and Trnava, and there are hundreds of cemeteries. The two rabbis in Slovakia are from abroad. Kosher meat is locally produced in the cities of Bratislava and Kosice. Many clubs and organizations promote Jewish awareness, and the Federation of Jewish Communities in Slovakia is the largest organizer of Jewish cultural identity services. Other organizations, such as Maccabi and B'nai Brith, are also engaged in promoting cultural identity. The Jewish Distribution Committee, the Lauder Foundation, and the Czechoslovak Union of Jewish Youth promote Jewish cultural awareness to youth. Of cultural interest is the Underground Mausoleum where many famous rabbis are buried.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

From 1948 to 1949, 11,000 Slovakian Jews emigrated to Israel. A smaller number moved to various other countries, primarily the United States. Today, most Jews live in urbanized areas, primarily in Bratislava.

Selected Bibliography

Buchler, Yehoshua Robert, and Gila Fatran. "A Brief History of Slovakian Jewry." JewishGen Web site. http://www.jewishgen.org/yizkor/Pinkas\_Slovakia/Slo0XI.html (accessed April 21, 2007).

- Dawidowicz, Lucy S., ed. 1996. The Golden Tradition: Jewish Life and Thought in Eastern Europe. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press.
- Kirschbaum, Stanislav. 2005. A History of Slovakia: The Struggle for Survival. 2nd ed. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Scheib, Ariel. "The Virtual Jewish History Tour: Slovakia." Jewish Virtual Library Web site. <http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/vjw/slovakia.html> (accessed April 21, 2007).
- "Slovakian History for Genealogical Researchers." 2006. <http://www.iabsi.com/gen/public/history.htm> (accessed April 21, 2007).

Jews in Slovenia

David Straub

General Population: 2,004,3942

Jewish Population: 200–600

Percent of Population: Less than 1 percent

Jewish Population by City: Most Slovene Jews live in Ljubljana; a dozen persons live in Murska Sobota.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Historic Jewish community expelled by 1700s. In the 18th century, Sephardic and Ashkenazi migrants arrived from areas of the Austrian empire. In the 20th century, Jewish migrants arrived from different areas of Yugoslavia.

Languages Spoken: Slovenian is universally spoken and a small number of people can speak Hebrew.

Historical Overview

5th century CE Unearthed antiquities reveal the existence of a Jewish community during the Roman period, including an oil lamp from the fifth century with an engraved menorah found in Skocijan. Ptuj on the Istra peninsula is a region of Jewish concentration during the Roman period.

12th century Venetian Jews, relocating for economic opportunity, and Central European Jews, fleeing the Crusades, migrate to what is now Slovenia and establish settlements in Ljubljana, Maribor, Porec, Ptuj, Pula, Radgona Rovinj, Slovenj-Gradec, and Stanijel. The Ljubljana community has its own synagogue, school, and law court.

1277 A Jewish community is first recorded in Maribor.

14th century Jewish quarters are burned in Ptuj, Gradec (Graz), and Radgona when Jews are blamed for the spread of the plague.

15th century The Jewish community in Maribor experiences a period of prosperity; Jews own numerous property and conduct trade with neighboring regions.

1427–1435 Rabbi Israel Isserlein of Maribor takes the title "Chief Rabbi of Styria, Carinthia, and Carniola." Rabbi Isserlein documents theological and legal questions facing local Jews and the Jewish history of the region.

1441 Ptuj's synagogue is converted into a church.

- 1496 The Jewish populations of Styria and Carinthia are expelled after Emperor Maximilian concedes to the demands of local nobility. The edict is to be implemented no later than January 6, 1497, and does not include the Jews of Carniola. After the expulsion, Jews move to rural areas in Slovenia, or to Italy and Central Europe. Archives in Maribor reveal that Jews had sold off their property in anticipation of expulsion. Jews exiled from Maribor take on the surname “Morpurgo.”
- 1501 The Maribor synagogue is converted into a church
- 1515 Under pressure from German nobility and clergy, an expulsion order is issued for Jews in Ljubljana.
- 1561–1565 Jews are banned from living in Gorizia.
- 1624 The Pincherle family of Gorizia is given the rank of “Court Jews” by the Holy Roman Emperor.
- 1718 Jews are expelled from Carinthia.
- 1773 Hungarian Jews settle in Lendava.
- 1788 The Jewish community of Gorizia totals 270 people.
- 1793 Records show 60 Jews living in Prekmurje.
- 1809 After the Napoleonic conquest of the region, Jews are allowed to settle again in Slovenia with full civil rights.
- 1817 Austrian Emperor Francis II prohibits Jews from settling and residing in Carniola; Jews relocate to Prekomurje and Maribor and establish communities in Murska Sobota and Lendava.
- 1843 A Jewish school opens in Lendava.
- 1880 Census records 96 Jews in Carniola.
- 1889 Records show 1,107 Jews living in Prekmurje.
- 1890 Records show 76 Jews in Ljubljana.
- 1910 Census records show 96 Jews in Carniola.
- 1918 Slovenia joins the newly created kingdom of Yugoslavia.
- 1919 Jewish community of Slovenia joins the Zagreb Jewish community.
- 1941 On the eve of World War II, around 3,000–4,500 Jews live in Slovenia, which is divided by Italy, Germany, and Hungary in April 1941. The Italians occupy much of the country, including Ljubljana. During the Italian occupation, many Slovenian Jews are sent to concentration camps in Italy, where they receive relatively humane treatment. A number of Jews join the Yugoslav resistance.
- 1942 The Jewish aid organization Delegazione per l'Assistenza agli Emigranti (Deslasem) organizes the evacuation of orphaned survivors of the massacre of Jews in German-occupied areas of Yugoslavia to hiding places in Slovenia. The rescue is coordinated by Lelio Vittorio Valobra, vice president of the Union of the Italian Jewish Communities, who travels to Slovenia in the spring and find that the children are in hiding in Lesno brdo, a town near Ljubljana that sees fighting between Slovene partisans and Italian forces. In July, Deslasem agrees to transfer the children to Italy, and, with the help of the Red Cross, 42 Jewish orphans are sent to Nonantola, near Modena, where they survive the war.
- September 1943 Italy defects to the Allies; German forces take over Slovenia.
- April 1944 A total of 328 Jews from Prekmurje are deported to Auschwitz. A total of 460 Jews from Prekmurje are deported; of these, 65 survive.

1954 The Murska Sobota synagogue is demolished.

June 1991 Slovenia gains independence and Jewish culture is revived.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Historically, Jews worked as artisans, bankers, moneylenders, innkeepers, and merchants. Today, most are urban laborers.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

In 2000, the Judovska Skupnost Slovenije (Jewish Community of Slovenia; JCS) published the first Jewish calendar in Slovenia's history. The Haggadah of Ljubljana was recently published. Alberto Michelstaedter, a philosopher and painter who lived from 1850 to 1929, is buried in the Jewish cemetery in Nova Gorica.

Present Economic Conditions

Slovene Jewry has, to a large extent, assimilated into the general Slovene population and has benefited from the country's recent rise in the standard of the living.

Religious Denominations

In 2003, Ljubljana opened a new synagogue. In 1999, Rabbi Ariel Haddad, of Chabad-Lubavitch, was appointed the first chief rabbi in Slovenian history. Recently, the community received its first Torah since World War II.

Jewish Education and Communal Institutions

After the fall of communism, a Jewish community center was rebuilt in Ljubljana. The JCS was formed in 1945 after the Shoah, but it remained dormant throughout the communist era. With the assistance of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), the JCS was revived after Slovenia gained independence in 1991. In 1997, the community purchased the first Jewish community office in 50 years. The current leader of the JCS is Andrej Kožar Beck. The JCS has coordinators that oversee five different categories of activities: student affairs, education, culture, women's section, and religious affairs; classes in modern Hebrew are also taught at the JCS center. The official communal publication is The Menora, which has been published regularly since 1998. Membership in the JCS stands at more than 100, and the most active members are those aged 30 and younger. Slovenian Jews have participated in numerous JDC-sponsored activities throughout the Balkans. There is a Synagogue Cultural Centre in Maribor, the ancient center of Slovene Jewry, where an ancient synagogue has been preserved.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

After the Shoah and the advent of communism, most of the Slovene Jewry moved to the capital Ljubljana. This community was further reduced by emigration to Israel in the 1990s.

Selected Bibliography

- “Europe/Slovenia.” 2005. American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee Web site. www.jdc.org/p\_ee\_slo\_current.html (accessed April 21, 2007).
- “Excerpts from Jews in Yugoslavia—Part I.” 2006. Centropa Quarterly. Volume 10, summer. www.centropa.org/reports.asp?rep=HR&ID=5960&TypeID=36658\_Centropa (accessed April 21, 2007).
- Gruber, Ruth Ellen, and Samuel D. Gruber. 1998. “Jewish Monuments in Slovenia.” Jewish Heritage Report. Vol. 2, no. 1–2. www.isjm.org/jhr/Inos1-2/slovenia.htm (accessed April 21, 2007).
- “History.” Jewish Community of Slovenia Web site. <http://www.jewishcommunity.si/jss/ENG-zgodovina.asp> (accessed April 21, 2007).
- Persin, Stephanie. “The Virtual Jewish History Tour: Slovenia.” Jewish Virtual Library Web site. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsourc/vjw/slovenia.html (accessed April 21, 2007).
- “Slovenia to Observe Jewish Day of Culture for the First Time.” 2006. Slovenia News. September 1. www.uvi.si/eng/slovenia/publications/slovenia-news/3573/3587/index.text.html (accessed April 21, 2007).
- Zimmerman, Joshua D. 2005. Jews in Italy under Fascist and Nazi Rule: 1922–1945. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Zuccotti, Susan. 1996. Italians and the Holocaust: Persecution, Rescue, and Survival. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.

Jews in the Ukraine

Samuel Barnai

---

General Population: 48,457,000 (2001 census)

Jewish Population: 103,600

Percent of Population: 0.2 percent

Jewish Population by City: Kyiv, 17,962; Odessa, 12,379; Kharkiv, 11,176; Dnipropetrovsk, 10,508; Donetsk, 5,087; Zaporizhzhya, 3,456; Mykolaiv, 2,797; Lviv, 1,932; Sevastopol, 1,016

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Most Ukrainian Jews are Ashkenazi who came to the Ukraine from Poland, Germany, and Hungary beginning in the 14th century. A large influx of Jews migrated to the industrial centers of the Ukraine from other regions of the Soviet Union in the 1920s–1930s and after World War II. There are approximately 2,000 non-Ashkenazi Jews and Karaites.

Languages Spoken: Most speak Russian (83 percent), and a minority speak Ukrainian (13.4 percent).

---

Historical Overview

4th century BCE Archaeological evidence has been found of Jews in the Greek colonies in the Crimea.

737 CE The Arabs defeat the Khazars in the Caucasus, which leads to influx of Jews in the Crimea and Dnieper region.

Early 10th century Jews settle in Kyiv.

965–969 Sviatoslav, the prince of Kievan Rus', defeats the Khazars, many of whom practiced Judaism.

1097 An incident of blood libel leads to a pogrom in the Greek city of Chersonesus in Byzantine Crimea.

1113 The residents of Kyiv destroy the city's Jewish quarter after Prince Sviatopolk's death.

1156 Karaites of Kyiv are mentioned for the first time.

1173 Benjamin of Tudela visits Kyiv.

1240 Batu Khan conquers Kyiv. Jews escape to Halych-Volhynia. Jewish merchants, land tenants, and craftspeople from Germany and Hungary also come to Halych-Volhynia under the rule of Prince Daniil Romanovich.

1259 Prince Daniil Romanovich invites the Jews to return to Kyiv.

1367 King Kazimierz III of Poland expands the rights of Jews in Poland—including the freedom of worship, migration, and economic activity—to the newly incorporated territories of Eastern Galicia and part of Volhynia.

1386–1434 King Władysław II Jagiello of Poland refuses to reaffirm the rights of Jews.

1388 Grand Duke Vitautas of Lithuania extends the same rights to Jews in Lithuania, including some cities now in the Ukraine.

1447–1492 King Kazimierz IV Jagiellończyk of Poland forbids Jews from settling in the countryside, working in agriculture, selling products wholesale, or entering a craft guild.

1449 The Republic of Genoa publishes laws for its Black Sea colonies that include freedom of worship; this allows Jews to settle in the colonies.

1495 Grand Duke Aleksander Jagiellończyk of Lithuania expels Jews from the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, including Kyiv and Luts'k. Some Jewish refugees settle in the Ottoman Empire and the Crimea.

1503 The Grand Duke of Lithuania and the King Aleksander Jagiellończyk of Poland reaffirm the rights of Jews and allow them to return.

1529 King Zygmunt I of Poland reaffirms the rights of Jews in the First Lithuanian Statute, but Jews are forbidden to testify at trial, possess Christian slaves (they must free such slaves with no compensation), proselytize to non-Jews, take on Christian women as nurses, and wear gold and silver sewn clothes. In addition, men must wear yellow hats.

1530s–1550s Jewish communities are founded in Vinnytsia, Bar, and Bratzlav.

1539 Zygmunt I transfers to the nobility the jurisdiction over Jews who settled in their estates.

1566 The Second Lithuanian Statute confirms anti-Semitic regulations.

1569 The Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth is founded.

1576 A blood libel and pogrom, provoked by Jesuits, occurs in Lviv.

1576–1586 King Stefan Batory of Poland gives equal rights to Jews and Christians in municipal taxation and the right to participate in discussions concerning taxation of city dwellers.

1598 Jews are forbidden to stay in Kamianets'-Podil's'kyi for more than three days.

- 1619 King Zygmunt III of Poland forbids Jews from staying in Kyiv for more than one day, but local authorities allow them to stay as “temporary dwellers.”
- 1620s–1630s Pogroms are carried out in the Dnieper region in 1621, 1630, 1637, and 1638.
- 1648–1654 The Cossack uprising of Bohdan Khmelnytsky occurs against the Poles. Jews are blamed as Polish collaborators and branded enemies of Christendom and exploiters of Ukrainian peasantry. As a result, 30,000 to 50,000 Jews are killed or escape to Poland, the Ottoman Empire, and other European countries, and 300 Jewish communities are destroyed.
- 1654 The Treaty of Pereiaslav reunites the Ukraine with Moscow. The combined Cossack-Muscovite forces occupy cities in the Ukraine, Belorussia, and Lithuania and almost totally exterminate the Jewish population.
- 1664 A pogrom is carried out in Lviv. About 100 Jews were killed and 200 wounded.
- 1667 The Treaty of Andrusiv results in Russia’s annexation of Dnieper and Kyiv. Jews in Poland are allowed to reestablish their communities, and those baptized by force are allowed to return to Judaism; their economic and civil rights are reaffirmed by kings until the mid-1730s.
- 1708 Peter I restricts Jews from selling by retail.
- 1721 Russian Emperor Peter I orders the expulsion of all Jews from the Ukraine. Expulsion orders are also issued by Empress Catherine I in 1727 and Empress Anna Ivanova in 1731 and 1738.
- 1722 Polish rabbis declared kherem, or communal excommunication, of members of the clandestine Sabbatean groups in Podolia and Galicia.
- 1734–1768 Mass extermination of the Jews takes place during several haidamaka uprisings by paramilitary bands of Cossacks and peasants on the right bank of the Ukraine and during Russian interventions in Poland.
- 1740 Medzhibizh becomes the center of Hasidism founded by Rabbi Israel ben Eliezer, known as Baal Shem Tov or Besht.
- 1742 Russian Empress Elizabeth Petrovna orders the expulsion of Jews from the Ukraine. Unlike all previous orders of Russian Emperors, the order is fulfilled and about 600 Jews are expelled to Poland.
- 1756 A rabbinical conference in Brody declares kherem, or excommunication, on Sabbatians and Frankists.
- 1757 Theological disputes occur between Talmudists and Frankists in Kamianets’-Podil’s’kyi. Similar theological disputes take place in Lviv in 1759.
- 1764 Russian Empress Catherine II, by petition of local nobility, allows Jews to temporarily come to the Ukraine and found Jewish agricultural settlements in Novorossia, the southern part of modern Ukraine.
- 1770s–1790s In the years 1772, 1793, and 1795, Poland is partitioned by its neighbors, and the right bank of the Ukraine, Podolia, and Volhynia are annexed by Russia; Galicia is annexed by Austria.
- 1782 Austrian Emperor Josef II’s Edict of Tolerance affords Jews the freedom of worship, abolishes the requirement to wear special clothes, and increases the property qualification for Jews who want to stay in Galicia. Jews are also allowed to open schools in German or send children to general schools.

- 1783 Russia annexes the Crimea and the Black Sea Maritime region. Catherine II allows Jews to enlist in city estates.
- 1784 Josef II orders Jewish tenants of distillers, inns, and breweries to liquidate their businesses and leave their places of residence.
- 1785 Jewish kahals are abolished in Austria.
- 1787 Two German-language Jewish schools open in Lviv.
- 1789 The Edict of Tolerance for Galician Jews grants Jews equal rights. Synagogues are allowed equal status with churches, rabbis lose juridical rights over Jewish populations, Jewish children have to study in elementary schools in German, Jews are allowed to engage in trade and craft, and Jews are forbidden to possess inns.
- 1794 Catherine II allows Jews to settle in several regions in the Ukraine. Double taxation of Jewish subjects is introduced.
- 1804 Russian Emperor Alexander I establishes the Pale of Settlement, which includes eight Ukrainian provinces. Some Jewish merchants, entrepreneurs, artists, and craftspeople are allowed to visit temporarily outside the Pale with special passports.
- 1817 Alexander I forbids anyone from blaming Jews for ritual murder without evidence. Jews are allowed to study in schools and institutions of higher education within the Pale.
- 1820 Jews are forbidden to employ Christians as workers and servants.
- 1821 A pogrom occurs in Odessa when local Greeks blame Jews for the death of the Orthodox patriarch in Istanbul.
- 1822 Maskilim open a modern Jewish school in Uman'. A second school opens in Odessa in 1826.
- 1827 Cantonist Law requires that Jews be drafted into military service, and the recruit tax is abolished.
- 1830s Jews are expelled from villages in Kyiv province. Several blood libel accusations occur in Ukrainian towns. Jews who were blamed for the use of Christian blood are declared not guilty.
- 1835 Kyiv, Mykolaiv, Sevastopol, and state-owned villages are excluded from the Pale of Settlement.
- 1844 Jewish kahals are abolished, and Jews pass under the control of local authorities.
- 1846 A Reformist synagogue opens in Lviv.
- 1849 Austrian Emperor Francis Joseph signs a new constitution that grants complete equality of rights.
- 1851 The Austrian constitution of 1849 is abolished. Several abridgments for Jews are introduced during the 1850s.
- 1856 Cantonist Law is annihilated.
- 1859–1860 Jewish merchants are allowed to stay in Mykolaiv, Sevastopol, and Yalta; at the end of the 1870s these rights are expanded to Jewish craftspeople, soldiers and their descendants, and persons with higher education degrees.
- 1860s Odessa becomes the center of the Jewish press for Russian, Hebrew, and Yiddish texts. The journals Rassvet (Sunrise) and Sion (Zion), and the newspapers

Den' (Day), Ha-Melits (Proponent), and Kol Mevaser (The Heralding Voice) appear in the city.

1867 Jews are emancipated in Austria.

1881–1884 Pogroms take place in more than 150 Ukrainian cities and towns.

May 3, 1882 Russian Emperor Alexander III introduces temporary May Laws, which prohibit Jews from settling in rural areas. In the next 20 years, new anti-Jewish restrictions are introduced in Russia, and quota limits are placed on the number of Jewish students.

1880s Mass Jewish emigration from the Russian Empire begins.

1897 The All-Russian Census records 1,870,000 Jews living in the Ukraine. These numbers constituted 40 percent of all Jews in the Russian Empire and more than 9 percent of the population of the Ukraine.

1890s–1900s Political activity grows among Jewry in the Ukraine and Austrian Galicia, and various Jewish political movements appear.

1905–1907 The First Russian Revolution breaks out, which unleashes about 600 pogroms, mostly in the Ukraine. Jews begin to organize politically.

1911–1913 The Beilis blood libel occurs in Kyiv.

1914 World War I begins and the Russian offensive in Galicia takes place. Hundreds of thousands of Jews escape westward. Austro-Hungarian laws are abolished in occupied territories. Pogroms occur in Lviv and various places of occupied Galicia.

1915 The Russian army is defeated in Galicia and Poland, and Jews are forced to move eastward.

1917 After the February Revolution, the Russian Provisional Government abolishes the Pale of Settlement and all anti-Jewish legislation. The government recognizes the Ukrainian Central Rada (Council) as autonomous self-rule for the Ukraine. Jewish parties, including Bund, Poalei Zion, Fareinikte, and Folkspartei, as well as Zionists, receive seats in the Ukrainian parliament and government. A Jewish vice-secretary position is established in the Ukrainian government to care for the concerns of the Jewish population.

November 7, 1917 After the Bolshevik takeover, the Ukrainian People's Republic is established in Kyiv. Complete equality of rights, including democratic and social rights, is declared. Jewish parties support the declaration.

January 7, 1918 The Ukrainian Parliament passes the Law of National-Personal Autonomy at the demand of Jewish parties.

January 9, 1918 The Ukraine declares independence. Jewish parties do not support the declaration.

1918–1920 During the Russian Civil War, approximately 1,500 pogroms take place all over the Ukraine, resulting in Jewish casualties: 75,000–200,000 dead, 200,000 wounded, and thousands raped. In November 1918, a pogrom in Lviv, Poland, results in the death of 70 Jews.

1920s–1930s Jews in Soviet Ukraine go through a process of accelerated Sovietization: dozens of Jewish national village councils and three Jewish national districts are established, including three districts in the Ukraine and two in Crimea, totaling more than 250,000 residents. Education, official and judicial work, press, and cultural activity in the national councils and districts are in Yiddish. Jewish cultural and educational expulsions occur all over the Ukraine. Antireligious activity includes the closing of synagogues, prayer houses, and heiderei; antireligious propaganda among youngsters; and mock tribunals of the Judaic faith. Mass emigration from the former Settlement of the Pale leads to a decrease in the Jewish population in the Ukraine from 1,750,000 in 1926 to 1,532,000 in 1939.

- 1921 Eastern Galicia and western Volhynia become part of Poland. Approximately 530,000 Jews gain complete equal civil rights, including freedom of worship and the right to found autonomous communities and educational institutions. Various Jewish parties participate in elections. At the same time, anti-Semitism among the public and economic restrictions lead to mass Jewish emigration.
- 1923 About 128,000 Jews of Bukovyna, which had been annexed by Romania, receive Romanian citizenship and equal civil rights after the Romanian government comes under pressure from Western powers. Permanent aggressive anti-Semitism and a general economic hardship lead to mass emigration.
- 1930s About 80,000 Jews from the Czechoslovakian Karpats'ka Rus' region, which was annexed to the Ukraine after World War II, obtain complete equal civil rights and political and religious freedom.
- 1939–1940 The Soviet Union occupies eastern Poland, home to 1,270,000 Jews. Bukovyna and three ex-districts of Romania, with 278,000 Jewish inhabitants, are annexed to Soviet Ukraine. Other areas become part of the Soviet Republic of Moldava.
- June 22, 1941 Nazi Germany invades the Soviet Union. The territory of the Ukraine is divided into several administrative districts: Galicia is incorporated into the General-Government, Transnistria is occupied by Romania, Reichskommissariat Ukraine is established in the central and right bank of the Ukraine, and the eastern part is under military administration.
- July 25, 1941 Petliura Day takes place in Lviv. Ukrainian nationalists organize violent pogroms.
- September 29–30, 1941 More than 33,000 Jews are exterminated in the Kyiv suburb of Babi-Yar; more than 150,000 Jews are killed there during the war.
- 1941–1944 During the German occupation, approximately 1.4 million Ukrainian Jews are exterminated by the Germans and local collaborators, including 500,000 in Reichskommissariat Ukraine and 240,000–263,000 in Transnistria.
- 1944–1946 Jews who are former citizens of Poland and Romania receive permission to return to their homelands after liberation. Approximately 30,000 Jews return to Poland and 17,000 return to Romania. Jews with no proof of their former foreign citizenship are considered illegal residents. Several synagogues were reopened, most of them without registration, in the liberated territories. Jewish communities survived only in Romanian-occupied Transnistria.
- September 7, 1945 A pogrom takes place in Kyiv when I. Rosenstein, a Jewish officer, kills two soldiers after they assault him. The subsequent funerals escalate into violence that leads to 100 casualties, including 36 fatalities. Rosenstein is sentenced to death by military tribunal.

- 1948–1953 State-organized campaigns against Jewish cultural and religious organizations take place, and prominent Jewish scientists and artists are persecuted in a wave of anti-Semitic activity.
- 1959 The census records 840,000 Jews in the Ukraine, or 2 percent of the entire population of the republic.
- 1959–1962 During a general antireligious campaign, only 15 official Jewish communities remain. The Lviv synagogue is closed. Only 16.5 percent of Jews declared Yiddish as their native language.
- 1970 The census records 777,000 Jews, 1.6 percent of the entire population of the Ukraine. Census data show a demographic crisis among Ukrainian Jewry because of aging and assimilation through mixed marriages. Mass Jewish emigration begins from the Soviet Union.
- 1979 According to the census, 634,000 Jews live in the Ukraine, 1.3 percent of the entire population. Most Jews are urbanites, and assimilation and mixed marriages are common.
- 1989–1991 About 150,000 Jews emigrate from the Ukraine (most of them to Israel, Germany, and the United States).
- 1991 The Ukraine gains independence.
- 1992 The law of national minorities grants complete equal civil, cultural, and religious rights. The Ukrainian embassy opens in Tel Aviv.
- 1996 The Constitution of the Ukraine confirms the rights of national minorities. Some properties formerly belonging to Jewish communities are returned to the newly established Jewish communities.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Traditional Jewish occupations included shopkeepers; craftspeople, including tailors, shoemakers, watchmakers, and blacksmiths; peddlers; pharmacists; dentists; manufacturers; and bankers. In southern Ukraine, Jewish agricultural colonies were founded in the 19th century. During the Soviet period, Jews focused on professional and higher education, held positions in state and party institutions, and were highly involved in scientific and industrial spheres.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Prominent Ukrainian Jews include poet and translator M. Fishbein; television and radio journalist M. Gurvits; journalist, historian, vice president of the Jewish Confederation of the Ukraine, and vice president of the World Council of Jewish Culture, I. Levitas; scholar, chairman of the Vaad of Ukraine, and executive vice president of the Jewish Confederation of Ukraine, J. Zisels; musician and member of Parliament I. Tabachnik; historian and head of the Kiev Center for the Research of the Culture and History of East European Jewry, L. Finberg; and historian Y. Honigsman.

Beginning in the 1990s, Jews held positions in the Ukrainian government, politics, and business. Notable individuals include E. Zviagils'kyi, acting prime minister in 1993–1994 and current member of Parliament; A. Paskhaver, former economic adviser to the president; Yu. Ioffe, former vice prime minister; mayor of Odessa, E. Gurvitz; mayor of Vynnytsia, D. Dvorkis; member of Parliament, businessman, and vice president of the Ukrainian Football Federation, G. Surkis; member of Parliament and president of Jewish Foundation of the Ukraine, A. Feldman; and member of Parliament and vice president of Euro-Asian Jewish Congress, E. Chervonenko; influential businessmen V. Rabinovich, head of All-Ukrainian Jewish Congress and the United Jewish Community of Ukraine; and V. Pinchuk, influential oligarch and son-in-law of the former president of the Ukraine.

Present Economic Conditions

Most Jews are white-collar workers, engineers, technologist, academicians, and middle-class businesspeople. However, as a result of aging and emigration, there are a large number of destitute pensioners.

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

Since the end of the Soviet era, cultural, scientific, religious, and welfare organizations have flourished in Kyiv, Kharkiv, Odessa, Lviv, and other cities of the Ukraine. Notable examples include Vaad of the Ukraine, or the Association of Jewish Organizations and Communities of the Ukraine; the Jewish Foundation of the Ukraine; Jewish Council of the Ukraine; Council of Rabbis of the Jewish Confederation of the Ukraine, whose chairman is Yaakov Dov Bleich, the chief rabbi of Kyiv and the Tombstone with Hebrew inscriptions in a Ukrainian Jewish cemetery. (Center for Jewish Art, the Hebrew University of Jerusalem)

Ukraine; World Jewish Congress; European Jewish Congress; Jewish Agency; Chabad; Aish HaTorah; World Union of Progressive Judaism; and Maccabi-Ukraine.

Ukrainian Jewry, with the support of local businesspeople of Jewish origin and international Jewish organizations, maintain a wide range of structures and services. More than 250 such organizations actively work in the Ukraine. Jewish organizations have permanent well-developed contacts with various state institutions and public organizations that help to improve mutual understanding between peoples and to protect the interests of Jewish minorities. Jewish education is one of the most important fields of activity. By the mid-1990s, more than 70 secondary and Sunday schools, 10 kindergartens, 10 yeshivas, and 90 *ulpan*s functioned in the Ukraine. Center of Jewish Education, the distance-learning program of Israeli Open University, International Solomon University, opened in 1993; most of the students are non-Jews.

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionism, and Existential Problems of the Community

Independent Ukraine completely abandoned any form of state anti-Semitism. However, several right-wing political movements—Ukrainian National Assembly—Ukrainian National Self Defence, Ukrainian Conservative Party, Ukrainian National Labor Party, Organization of Ukrainian Idealists—systematically use anti-Semitic propaganda in their publications. Most of the organizations are active in western and central Ukraine, but some operate nationally. One of the most active anti-Semitic organizations is the University of the Inter-Regional Academy of Personnel Management, headed by G. Shchokin, leader of Ukrainian Conservative Party. Its newspaper, Personal+, systematically attacks not only Jews, but also non-Jews who do not adhere to anti-Semitism. In 2005, the president of the Ukraine, Viktor Yushchenko, condemned anti-Semitic invectives of the university and demanded that it stop publishing xenophobic materials. Along with anti-Semitic propaganda, the Jewish community suffers from assaults on Jews and acts of vandalism against Jewish facilities, including cemeteries, synagogues, and communal centers.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

The demographic decline facing Ukrainian Jewry since World War II continues to this day and is due to an aging population, high mortality rate, emigration, and intermarriage. About 300,000 Jews emigrated from the Ukraine in 1989–2005 and only 8,500 immigrated into the Ukraine. Most children born to Jewish mothers have non-Jewish fathers. In the mid-1990s, more than half of Kyiv's Jews were at least 50 years old. The situation is even worse in small peripheral communities.

Selected Bibliography

- Abramson, Henry. 1999. A Prayer for the Government: Ukrainians and Jews in Revolutionary Times, 1917–1920. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Aster, Howard, and Peter Potichnyj Peter, eds. 1990. Ukrainian-Jewish Relations in Historical Perspectives. Edmonton: Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies, University of Alberta.
- Berkhoff, Karel. 2004. Harvest of Despair: Life and Death in Ukraine under Nazi Rule. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press.

- Khanin, Vladimir, ed. 2003. Documents on Ukrainian Jewish Identity and Emigration 1944–1990. London-Portland: Frank Cass.
- Magocsi, Paul Robert. 1996. A History of Ukraine. Seattle: University of Washington Press.
- Stampfer, Shaul. 2003. “What Actually Happened to the Jews of Ukraine in 1648?” Jewish History 17: 165–178.
- Subtelny, Orest. 1994. Ukraine: A History. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.
- Wilson, Andrew. 2000. The Ukrainians: Unexpected Nation. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Baltic States

Jews in the Baltic States

David Straub

---

Countries: Latvia 2,300,000; Lithuania 3,400,000; Estonia 1,300,000.

General Population: 7,000,000

Jewish Population of the Baltic States: 14,700

Jewish Population by Country: Latvia 9,500; Lithuania 3,300; Estonia 1,900

---

Historical Overview

Jewish habitation of the Baltics dates to the 14th century when the emperor of Lithuania invited Jews to migrate to the region. Official tolerance by the government continued until the late 15th century, when a series of anti-Semitic laws were put in place. Official anti-Semitism included the confiscation of property, expulsion of Jews from particular regions or cities, and punitive taxation. Examples of this include the expulsion of Jews from Lithuania in the 1490s and anti-Semitic exclusion laws in Vilnius and Kaunas in the 1520s. Often, laws discriminating against Jews were wholly or partially revoked and Jews were allowed to return, but years or decades later, anti-Semitic hysteria would again result in forced emigration for local Jews. Even in the midst of anti-Semitic hysteria in one region of the Baltics, other regions were opened for Jewish immigration, as was the case with the Polish conquest of Livonia in 1561 and the opening of Piltene in the 1570s. The main center of Jewish habitation was Vilna, which had as many as 120,000 Jews in the 18th century; smaller communities of Jews were situated in other Lithuanian cities and Courland. In the 16th and 17th century, the Baltic region was the center of several regional wars and Jews suffered great atrocities.

From 1772 to 1795 the Polish-Lithuanian state was dismantled and erased from the map of Europe, and the Baltics fell within the Russian Empire's sphere of influence. Under Russian law Jews were enlisted in military service and much of Lithuania was placed within the borders of the Pale of Settlement, an area set aside for settlement by Russian Jewry. In the late 19th century, a wave of anti-Semitism struck Russia, and violence broke out across the country, including a series of pogroms that depopulated regions of their Jews. The assassination of the emperor in 1881, for example, resulted in pogroms and thousands of Jews left the country. The 1897 census found 755,000 Jews residing in Lithuania alone, but by the end of World War I, tens of thousands of Jews had either chosen to emigrate or were forcibly expelled from the Baltics.

After the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917, the Baltic states of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia became independent. In the postwar period, the fortunes of Baltic Jewry were tied to the politics of their respective nations. During the 1920s, democracy and tolerance were the norm and Jews were permitted to openly practice their faith and establish cultural organizations. By the 1930s, a fascist regime had taken power in Latvia and anti-Semitism was on the rise across the region. On the eve of World War II, Lithuania was home to more than 150,000 Jews, Latvia had more than 95,000 Jewish residents, and Estonia had only a few thousand Jews. In 1939, World War II broke out in Europe, and in June 1940 the Baltic states were annexed to the Soviet Union. At this time the Soviet Union was in the midst of massive purges directed from Stalin, and a year later, thousands of Jews were deported to the Soviet Far East. In late June 1941, Nazi Germany occupied the Baltic states and immediately began the systematic murder of the region's Jewish population. By the end of 1941, as many as a quarter million Baltic Jews were killed in massacres throughout the region. In the remaining years of the war, tens of thousands of Jews from outside the Baltics were sent to concentration camps in the Baltics, where all but a small number perished. By the time the Soviets drove the Germans out of the Baltics, in 1944, an estimated 70 percent of Latvian Jews and 90 percent of Lithuanian Jews had been killed, and Estonia's small Jewish population had been decimated.

Only a small number of Baltic Jewish survivors remained in the region after the war, and in the decades after the war a number of Russian-speaking Jews from elsewhere within the Soviet Union migrated to the Baltic republics. During the Soviet period, Jews excelled in academia and the sciences, but institutional anti-Semitism continued to be prevalent. Beginning in the 1970s, Soviet authorities relaxed immigration policies, and over the next two decades a large number of Baltic Jews made aliyah or migrated to the United States and Western Europe. In 1991, the Baltic states gained their independence and restrictions on Jewish immigration were completely lifted. In the post-Soviet period, only a small number of Jews remain in the Baltic states, and although the democratic governments of the region preach tolerance, there has been a disturbing rise in anti-Semitism across the Baltics.

Selected Bibliography

- Beare, Arlene. 2001. Guide to Jewish Genealogy in Latvia and Estonia. London: Jewish Genealogical Society of Great Britain.
- Greenbaum, Masha. 1995. The Jews of Lithuania: A History of a Remarkable Community. New York: Gefen.
- Hundert, Gershon David. 2004. Jews in Poland-Lithuania in the Eighteenth Century: A Genealogy of Modernity. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Levin, D. 2000. The Litvaks. A Short History of the Jews of Lithuania. Jerusalem: Yad Vashem.
- Steimanis, Josifs. 2002. History of Latvian Jews. New York: Columbia University Press.

Jews and Anti-Semitism in the Baltic States

Dov Levin

---

The Baltic states of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia attained political independence immediately after World War I and from then on their history had many similarities. A fortiori one may speak of cultural and economic similarities and the similar fate that greeted the Jewish population of these countries. Of the 350,000 Jews in these countries at the beginning of World War II, fewer than 5 percent lived to witness the end of the war. The remainder were slaughtered during the Nazi occupation, in various and sundry ways, as a result of the occupier's policies and the enthusiastic implementation of these policies by the Jews' local neighbors, among whom they had lived for centuries.

In the 1910s and 1930s, several bloody eruptions by peasants against their Jewish neighbors were prompted by religious prejudices, such as accusations of blood libel. On the other hand, avenues of cooperation and solidarity between Jews and non-Jews came into being as in joint lists of candidates for the Russian Duma. The Jewish, Lithuanian, and Latvian delegates elected to this institution represented the interests of the population at large in their localities. In the wake of this precedent, the sides were in contact even during and after the German occupation in World War I. Consequently, Jewish public figures were appointed to the first governments of the Baltic countries when they proclaimed their independence in 1918. The Jewish citizens of these countries were promised sweeping cultural and educational rights, and local Jewish personalities and others abroad acted to strengthen these countries' political and economic status. Furthermore, thousands of Jewish volunteers took part in the wars against various forces, including the Bolsheviks, who attempted to annex these countries to Soviet Russia. Lithuanian soldiers inflicted grave abuse on the Jewish population on the pretext that the Jews were Bolshevik sympathizers. Even the Jews of Vilnius, only a few of whom were accused of pro-Soviet sympathies and most of whom had a pro-Lithuanian orientation, paid a heavy price.

By the second half of the 1920s, the Jews' autonomous rights were eroding badly. Although the Jews still had an acute need for these rights, they continued to display loyalty to the state and faithfully discharged their civic duties, including military service. As quasi-military organizations were ill inclined to admit Jewish veterans into their ranks, the Jews established the Association of Jewish Front-Line Soldiers, under the command of Jewish officers who had taken part in the wars of independence. Young Jews also volunteered for service in fire brigades in various cities and towns, including some brigades that were totally Jewish.

The only political setting that brought Jews and non-Jews together was the tiny Communist Party, which operated underground and attracted support from only a fraction of the Jewish community. In contrast, the Zionists, who accounted for a majority of the Jewish population, remained loyal to the state and its government, but their ideological political orientation focused on events outside their countries of residence. Their practical aim was to systematically mobilize the Jewish masses to immigrate to Palestine. Therefore, Zionist organizations with a strong ideological bond to the Soviet Union, such as Ha-shomer ha-Tsa'ir and Po'aley Tsiyyon Left, were allowed to engage in overt political activity because the establishment defined them as "carriers of Communism for export" to Palestine.

Anti-Semitism increased in the 1930s, with increased economic distress and the political radicalization of right-wing militant organizations throughout the Baltics. One may infer something about the ideological nature of these organizations and the extent of their identification with the Nazi regime from the fact that their leaders held very high-ranking positions in their countries during the Nazi occupation. The German minority played a considerable role in disseminating the racial doctrine and anti-Semitic propaganda in the Baltic countries. "Our anti-Semitism is of an especially bad type," wrote the oppositionist daily newspaper Lietuvos Zinios on June 13, 1933, "because it is imported from outside and has a special goal. . . . Hitlerism has discovered the Lithuanians and has tailored special anti-Semitic methods to them." Indeed, proposals were expressed in Baltic establishment newspapers, such as Lietuvos Aidas and Verklas in Lithuania, Ogunkrust in Latvia, and Meie voi Juudid in Estonia, to take pronouncedly racial measures against the Jews. The recommended actions included revoking the Jews' electoral franchise, not allowing Jews to have non-Jewish servants, forbidding Jewish doctors to treat Christian patients, and banishing Jews from resort areas.

The economic rivalry between Jews and their neighbors also took on an increasingly anti-Semitic hue in the form of a boycott against Jewish merchants and craftspeople and public slogans such as "Lithuania for the Lithuanians" and "Latvia for the Latvians." Economic organizations produced a crescendo of demands to limit the Jews' domination of traditional occupations that they had practiced for generations—such as domestic and cross-border sales of farm produce, crafts, and light industry, especially in clothing, food, and printing. The anti-Jewish economic propaganda was accompanied by anti-Semitic incidents, such as desecrating cemeteries; defacing Yiddish and Hebrew signs; smashing windows of Jewish homes and public institutions, including synagogues; and violently assaulting Jews, individually and in groups. Verbal and physical attacks also took place at the University of Kaunas after Gentile students demanded that their Jewish counterparts be seated on special benches. As a result, relations between Jews and non-Jews in academia were seriously harmed. The few attempts by leftists, intellectuals, and Democrats to foster cultural and social relations between Jews and non-Jews also failed.

After Lithuania was forced to relinquish its historical capital, Vilnius, and the port city of Klaipeda (Memel) in 1938–1939, organizations on the Right found it easy to turn the masses' rage against the Jews. One organization with a pronounced National-Socialist orientation contacted the German authorities and asked them for assistance, in the form of money and weapons, for the express purpose of organizing pogroms against the Jews. As the authorities displayed indifference to these manifestations, several Jewish personalities who had been active in establishing the Baltic countries and strengthening them politically now geared up to summon world public opinion, following the tradition from the time of the czarist persecutions. Militant organizations such as the Jewish Front-Line Soldiers and Betar, to name only two, were already planning to form a self-defense system of sorts.

Inclusion of the Baltic Countries in the Soviet Sphere of Influence

In the middle of June 1940, amid concern about a Nazi German takeover of the region, the Red Army occupied the three Baltic countries and within seven weeks transformed them into Soviet republics with everything this implied. Although much has been written about this, several relevant facts deserve special note.

From the standpoint of the Jews, the Soviet takeover of the Baltic countries, in October 1939, and their annexation to the Soviet Union, from July 1940 to June 1941, was the lesser of two evils. Even so, no representative Jewish organization in these countries congratulated the Soviets for revoking the political independence of the Baltic countries.

At this stage, the majority peoples, who were mourning the loss of their independence, accused the Jews of treason. This tendency gathered strength as a result of systematic incitement by ultra-nationalist organizations such as the Lithuanian Activist Front (LAF) in Lithuania, which derived its inspiration and support from Nazi Germany. The Soviet regime allowed civilians to “let off steam” by grumbling and expressing counterthreats of the “just-wait” variety. Leaflets circulated by underground nationalist groups spoke of a “reckoning” that would be conducted against those who had brought Sovietization upon them, including three groups: imported functionaries from Moscow, local collaborators, and the Jews. Shortly before the Nazis invaded Lithuania in the summer of 1941, members of the LAF distributed leaflets promising their political rivals clemency if they could clearly prove that they had wiped out at least one Jew. The leaflets also contained instructions on how to treat Jews, including the following:

All Jews are excluded from Lithuania forever. Should any one of them dare to expect any refuge in new Lithuania, let him know the irrevocable sentence passed on them: “Not a single Jew shall have any citizenship rights nor any means of sustenance in Lithuania reborne.”

Nazi Occupation (1941–1944)

In the first hours of the Wehrmacht invasion, many local inhabitants began to abuse almost any Jew whom they encountered. As time passed, the assaults escalated in momentum, extent, and brutality, and in every city Jews were being slaughtered en masse. Some of the perpetrators of this crime hunted down the victims, abused them, and led them to the death pits. Others participated in putting them to death and, afterward, divided up the victims’ clothing and jewelry. The physical obliteration of most Jews in the Baltic countries was perpetrated by local inhabitants, with the blessings of the German authorities. It was done not in gas chambers but with guns, knives, axes, and metal poles; Jews were beheaded, their skulls were smashed against walls, and they were buried alive; women were murdered after being raped as their families looked on. In dozens of localities, many assaults on the Jewish neighbors took place hours or even several days before the arrival of the first German soldier.

All types of attacks were initiated and perpetrated by men, women, and teenagers from all population groups, including teachers, students, members of the clergy, army and police officers, mayors, and journalists. Masses of people cheered in town squares at the sight of wanton brutalities against women and rabbis, burning of Torah scrolls, and the like. During the months of the mass slaughter, June–October 1941, contacts between Jews and non-Jews were almost totally severed, except for official orders that the civil administration and the local militia presented to the Jews on behalf of the Nazi occupation authorities. Disclosures from recently opened archives, along with other information that has accumulated on the attitude of the Baltic peoples toward the Jews, bring the following schematic picture to light: Of approximately 6 million non-Jewish inhabitants, nearly 40,000 physically assaulted or harmed Jews and about 1,000 saved Jews in various ways; only a few thousand provided assistance of any kind to individual Jews.

Because they feared collective punishment, the victims rarely offered physical resistance to their murderers. In the last year of the Nazi occupation, Jews who had resolved to defend their lives with dignity, by taking up arms, could do so by joining up with pro-Soviet partisans. This fact reinforced the old myth about all Jews being Communists, with all the implications this implied. Diaries left behind by victims, as well as folk songs and other kinds of folklore from those horrific days, often bring grave accusations against the local murderers, mixed with profound disappointment. A song in several stanzas, written by Jewish children in the ghetto of Kaunas as a parody on the Lithuanian national anthem, was recently found and published by the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, DC. An excerpt follows: “Oh, Lithuania, blood soaked land, be cursed forever, Let your towns, villages, and fields burn. You will be murdered, as you murdered us. Forever and ever.” Even Jews who escaped from a ghetto or a labor camp were still in considerable danger of being denounced to the Germans by local inhabitants. In view of this description, the acts should not be hidden behind such terms as genocide, catastrophe, tragedy, and execution. Instead, what occurred was a barbaric mass homicide, coupled with protracted torture—physical abuse, humiliation, and rape. In a word: a cruel and continual lynching.

Soviet Rule in the Baltic Countries (July 1944–May 1945)

In this last phase of World War II, Red Army soldiers gradually returned to the Baltic countries. As the Soviet forces advanced to the west and the Wehrmacht and its local allies retreated toward Germany, a few Jews came to the surface almost every day—Jews who had managed to survive in all sorts of ways, including concealment with non-Jews. These survivors were joined by several hundred Jews, including former soldiers in the Red Army, who had fled to the Soviet interior in the summer of 1941. At the end of the war, both groups together added up to no more than 3,000 persons—only 0.05 percent of the population. Because many murderers of Jews, known as “Jew-shooters,” had fled to Germany, the fugitives from the slaughter had reason to hope they would be treated decently, at the very least. However, this did not happen.

Although the surviving Jews construed the Soviets’ arrival as a deliverance from extinction, much of the population at large considered it an act of national enslavement. Similarly, a series of contrasting interests in daily life overshadowed the few interactions that by necessity took place between the sides. By the nature of things, the Jewish survivors were filled with desire to avenge the murder of their families and considered the recovery of their looted property the minimum that should be done to correct the horrific injustice caused to them. For local inhabitants who had guilty consciences, and for those who possessed the property of murdered people, almost every surviving Jew was a source of trouble who should be removed in any way possible.

It is no wonder that encounters between the sides were often fraught with severe tension and sometimes ended in verbal clashes and physical attack. One of the serious points of friction at the time concerned the return of Jewish children who had been placed in hiding with Christian families or in convents for the duration. Only a few priests mustered the courage to encourage those who sheltered children to return them to their relatives. In most cases, the relatives had to use force or ask the authorities to intervene.

However, support from the authorities was not always guaranteed, because the official goal was to create relative calm as long as the war continued among the hostile population or only dozens of kilometers away. In terms of domestic policy, the Jews, with their complicated problems, were often a stumbling block of sorts. This policy was also associated with the Soviets’ hopes of soft-pedaling the role of the Baltic peoples in murdering the Jews. This intent was expressed in part by the use of vague and general terms: The murderers were termed “fascists,” “nationalists,” and so on, whereas the Jewish victims were called “Soviet citizens,” without further differentiation.

The local population interpreted these and other signals as an indication that the authorities took exception to the Jews. Consequently, they reverted to their previous custom of settling scores at the personal level. In several localities, especially in peripheral towns, Lithuanian or Polish inhabitants murdered their surviving Jewish neighbors, children and all, and threatened to subject all Jews who remained alive to the same fate.

Jews occasionally heard sincere expressions of commiseration and consolation, however, a crescendo of voices among the Jews argued that there was no further point in living among graves and murderers, let alone in conducting a dialogue with the latter; hundreds of survivors began to abandon their places of residence and, with or without permission, to stream out of the Baltic countries. Most joined the organized clandestine escape movement to Palestine, the Beraha. The nucleus of the Beraha movement was composed of former members of Zionist youth movements who for months had fought in partisan units in Lithuania. Eventually, the Beriha spread to Latvia and Estonia as well. Although they lacked adequate information, appropriate documents, and financial and logistical resources, the movement leaders refused to avail themselves of local nationalist elements who, as they carried on their armed struggle against the Soviet regime, did not conceal their hostility toward the Jews but were glad to be rid of them one way or another.

Postwar Era

There exists general and partial denial of the Holocaust in the three Baltic countries, Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia, which includes components of disinformation and distortion. All of them frequently interrelate with the new forms of anti-Semitism. In 1944–1945, when the Soviets reoccupied the Baltic countries, a small proportion of Jewish survivors returned to live in areas that were filled with the graves of most of their relatives, recently slaughtered by the Germans and their non-Jewish neighbors. Quite a few of these murderers emigrated under false names and/or went to the forests to join the armed gangs that, for nearly 10 years, fought against the Soviet regime to make their countries independent again.

Before withdrawing, the Germans strived prodigiously to cover up their crimes by incinerating the bodies of murdered Jews. The Soviet authorities adopted a different kind of deception: although Soviet authorities punished collaborators with the Nazi occupation authorities, including murderers of Jews, from the late 1940s and in the 1950s they were careful to make the least possible mention of the Holocaust. From the mid-1960s it became increasingly the trend in Soviet-Lithuanian historiography to “prove,” by stressing the existence of several hundred Lithuanians honored as “Righteous among the Nations,” that the Jewish-Lithuanian fraternity of peoples endured even during the Nazi occupation. The only nonparticipants in this fraternity were “a minority of lowly murderers,” nearly all of whom were “fascist nationalists” and “kulaks.” Denial of the wartime murderers followed Baltic émigrés who fled to the West after the war and concealed from the immigration authorities their activity in murdering Jews in their countries of origin. Denial of the Holocaust has continued even since the Baltic states gained independence in 1991, drawing wide condemnation.

Selected Bibliography

- Levin, Dov. 1994. “New Lithuania’s Old Policy toward the Holocaust.” Jews in Eastern Europe 2 (24): 67–71.
- Levin, Dov. 2001. “Jewish Autonomy in Inter-War Lithuania: An Interview with Yudl Mark,” POLIN 14: 196–211.
- Levin, Dov. 2001. “A Report of the NKGB on Jewish ‘Nationalist’ Activity in Lithuania 1940–1941.” Jews in Eastern Europe 44 (1, Spring): 60–91.
- Levin, Dov. 2002. “Jewish Resistance in the Baltic States 1941–1945,” Latvia SIG 6 (4, April): 6–12.
- Levin, Dov. 2002. “Mass Deportations of Latvian Jews to Remote Areas of the USSR: 1941.” Latvia SIG 7 (September): 10–17.

Jews in Estonia

David Straub

---

General Population: 1,471,000

Jewish Population: 2,500–3,500

Percent of Population: Less than 1 percent

Jewish Population by City: Around 2,000 Jews live in Tallinn and smaller communities exist in Tartu, Narva, Pärnu, and Kohtla-Järve.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Ashkenazi arrived from Russia in the 19th century and from the Soviet Union after World War II.

Languages Spoken: Russian and Estonian

---

Historical Overview

14th century Jews first migrate to the Baltic region, but strict anti-Semitic laws limit the Jewish population there.

1830 The Tallinn congregation is established by artisans and soldiers.

1858 Demobilized Russian Jewish soldiers settle in Estonia.

1865 Emperor Alexander II issues a statute recognizing Jewish rights to settle in Estonia. The first settlers known as kantonists.

1866 The Tartu congregation is established when the first 50 Jewish families settle in the city.

1883 Tallinn Synagogue is built.

1900 The Jewish community expands into the towns of Valga, Pärnu, and Viljandi, and Jewish students begin to enroll in the University of Tartu.

1901 The Tartu Synagogue is completed.

1913 Some 5,000 Jews live in Estonia, including 2,000 in Tartu and 1,100 in Tallinn.

1917 The Jewish Drama Club is founded in Tartu.

1918 Republic of Estonia declares its independence. From 1918 to 1920 a war for independence is fought. Around 200 Jews fight for Estonian independence. The new government grants Jews more freedoms and rights.

1918 The H. N. Bjalik Literature and Drama Society is founded in Tallinn.

May 1919 The first Estonian Congress of Jewish congregations is convened.

1920 The Maccabi Sports Society is founded.

1923 The Jewish Gymnasium, or school, opens in Tallinn. The gymnasium serves as an important cultural center and plays host to Maccabi Sports Society events. Samuel Gurin is the director of the center from 1925 until its liquidation by Soviet authorities in 1940.

1925 The Jewish population totals more than 3,000. The population decrease is due in part to the increased number of Jews making aliyah.

1926 Jewish cultural autonomy is granted under a government program to allow ethnic minorities greater self-determination in cultural matters.

- June 1926 The Jewish Cultural Council is created. The council's administrative organ is the Board of Jewish Culture, headed by Hirsch Aisenstadt.
- 1930s Despite their exclusion from the civil service, the Jewish community thrives. More than 350 students are enrolled in Jewish schools throughout the country, including kindergartens in Tallinn, Tartu, Narva, Viljandi, and Pärnu. Numerous student societies open, including the Tartu Academic Society, the Women's Student Society Hazfiro, the Corporation Limuvia, the Society Hasmonaea, and the Endowment for Jewish Students. Jewish political organizations in operation include Hasomer Hazair and Beitar. Cultural and social support groups include the Jewish Goodwill Society of the Tallinn Congregation and the Jewish Assistance Union in Tartu. Jewish businesspeople are prosperous members of the community and own the leather factory Uzvanski and Sons in Tartu and the Ginovkeris' Candy Factory in Tallinn; they also operate furriers and forestry companies.
- 1934 At this time, 4,381 Jews live in Estonia, including 2,203 in Tallinn, 920 in Tartu, 262 in Valga, 248 in Pärnu, 188 in Narva, and 121 in Viljandi. Most Jews work in commerce and services or as artisans, laborers, and physicians. A chair is established in the School of Philosophy for the study of Judaica.
- June 1940 Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania are occupied and annexed by the Soviet Union. Jewish cultural autonomy is liquidated. Around 400 Jews are deported to Siberia on June 14.
- June 1941 Germany occupies the Baltic states and reorganizes them into Ostland. A large number of Jews escape to the Soviet Union, including Hirsch Aisenstadt
- August 15, 1941 Jews are ordered to wear yellow badges and are banned from walking on the pavement, using public transportation, owning cars or radios, and visiting public places.
- 1941–1944 German killing units called Einsatzgruppen are ordered into the Baltics. In first months of occupation approximately 1,000 Jews are murdered in Estonia, including Rabbi Gomer of Tallinn, and the country is declared "Jew free." The synagogues of Tallinn and Tartu were destroyed during the war. Approximately 20,000 foreign Jews are sent to 22 concentration and labor camps in Estonia, the largest of which were at Kalevi-Liiva and Vaivara; most of these Jews would perish during the war.
- 1944 The battle for Estonia ensues between the Soviet Union and Germany in September. Germans massacre approximately 4,500 Jews in the cities of Klooga, Ereda, and Lagedi, just days before Soviet forces arrive. Less than a dozen Estonian Jews are known to have survived the war under German occupation.
- 1944 Estonia is annexed to the Soviet Union and does not gain independence again until 1991.
- 1946–1960s Strict anti-Jewish policies are implemented across the Soviet Union granting Jews few religious or cultural freedoms. The Jewish community is not allowed to rebuild synagogues, and Hebrew and religious education are banned.
- 1949 The Jewish leader Hirsch Aisenstadt is arrested by Soviet authorities.
- 1960 The Jewish population of Estonia is approximately 5,500.
- 1970s–1980s Estonia's moderation allows Jews more opportunities than elsewhere in the Soviet Union; numerous Jews arrive in Estonia and find positions at the University of Tartu and the Polytechnical Institute in Tallinn. Emigration restrictions are eased and Jews make aliyah and move to the United States.

March 1988 The Jewish Cultural Society, the first Jewish organization in Estonia since 1940, opens in Tallinn.

April 1992 The Jewish Community, an umbrella organization for Jewish organizations and societies, receives a government charter.

October 1993 The Estonian government passes the Cultural Autonomy Act, based on the 1925 law, which grants minority groups a legal guarantee to preserve their cultural identities.

July 2005 The government opens a memorial site in the former concentration camp in Klooga.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Traditionally, Jews worked in trade and public service and as artisans, laborers, professionals, and owners of real estate and factories.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

During the Soviet period, numerous Jews joined the ranks of academia. Most notable was Jury Lotman, who made revolutionary developments in the field of semiotics.

Religious Denominations

A synagogue is located in Tallinn. Rabbi Shmuel is the kot chief rabbi of Estonia. In 2006, a new synagogue opened in Tallinn.

Jewish Education and Communal Institutions

Before World War II, Jewish cultural and educational institutions flourished but were eliminated during the Shoah and the Soviet occupation of Estonia. Since 1988, the Jewish Cultural Society has served as an umbrella group for Jewish organizations in Estonia. The current chairman of the Jewish Religious Community of Estonia is Boris Oks. In Tallinn a Jewish Community Center called Dor Vador (Every Generation) has opened. The community also publishes a newspaper, Hashakhar (Dawn), and broadcasts a monthly radio show, Shalom Aleichem.

Other Jewish organizations include the sports society Maccabi, the Society for the Gurini Goodwill Endowment, the Jewish Veterans Union, and the survivor organization Former Ghetto Prisoners' Association. Jewish cultural clubs operate under the Cultural Society in Tartu, Narva, and Kohtla-Järve.

In 1989, a Jewish Sunday school opened in the capital, and in 1990 the Tallinn Jewish School for grades 1–12 began operations. A kindergarten opened in Tallinn in 2002. Courses in Hebrew have been established, and a large library operates in the capital.

The Jewish Community of Estonia is active in several regional and international Jewish organizations, including the Baltic States Committee of the Federation of Jewish Communities of the Commonwealth of Independent States, the Baltic Jewish Forum, the World Jewish Congress, the European Jewish Congress, and the European Council of Jewish Communities. Other international organizations operating in Estonia include the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation, and the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

The Jewish population in Estonia was decimated by World War II, and few Estonian Jews returned. In the decades after World War II, Jews fleeing harsh anti-Semitism elsewhere in the Soviet Union flocked to Estonia. Since 1989, more than 1,000 Jews have made aliyah.

Selected Bibliography

- Beare, Arlene. 2001. Guide to Jewish Genealogy in Latvia and Estonia. London: Jewish Genealogical Society of Great Britain.
- "Estonia Country Page." National Conference on Soviet Jewry Web site. <http://www.ncsj.org/Estonia.shtml> (accessed April 20, 2007).
- Fouse, Gary C. 2000. Languages of the Former Soviet Republics: Their History and Development. Lanham, MD: University Press of America.
- "The Jewish Community in Estonia." 2007. Estonian Ministry of Foreign Affairs Web site. http://www.vm.ee/estonia/kat\_172/998.html (accessed April 20, 2007).
- "Jews in Estonia." 1997. Fact Sheet. The Estonian Institute. <http://www.einst.ee/factsheets/jews/> (accessed April 20, 2007).
- Münz, Rainer, and Rainer Ohliger. 2003. Diasporas and Ethnic Migrants: Germany, Israel and Post-Soviet Successor States in Comparative Perspective. Portland, OR: Frank Cass.
- Weiss-Wendt, Anton. 1998. "The Soviet Occupation of Estonia in 1940–41 and the Jews." Holocaust and Genocide Studies 12 (2): 308–325.

Jews in Latvia

David Straub

General Population: 2,500,000

Jewish Population: 15,000–17,000

Percent of Population: Less than 1 percent

Jewish Population by City: The largest population of Jews is in the capital, Riga (11,000); sizable Jewish populations are also found in other cities, most notably Daugavpils, Liepaya, Ludza, Rezekne, and Yelagva.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Sephardic Jews from Poland and Germany and Ashkenazi from Russia.

Languages Spoken: Russian, Latvian, Yiddish

Historical Overview

- 12th–16th centuries The German Knightly Orders that control Livonia ban Jews.
- 1500s The lands that today constitute Latvia are divided among Russia, Poland, and Denmark.
- 1561 Poland conquers the region and opens it to Jewish settlement.
- 1571 The first Jews arrive in Piltene under the protection of Duke Magnuss after the Bishop of Courland sells the land to Denmark. Courland Jews develop a German dialect called “Courland Yiddish.”
- 1600s Yiddish-speaking and Orthodox Jewish refugees flee to Polish-controlled Latgalia after a series of pogroms in Byelorussia and Poland; Jews there form a self-governing community, or kahal.
- 1638 The first house for Jews is built in Riga.
- 1700s There is an influx of German Jewish workers and artisans into Courland.
- 1708 The first synagogue is built in Aizpute, Courland.
- 1710 Livonia, or Vidzeme, is captured by Russia.
- 1713 Jews living outside of Piltene are expelled from Courland, although the order is not completed.
- 1717 A tax of two talers is imposed on all Jews in Piltene; two years later, the tax is doubled.
- 1724 Jews are expelled from Livonia and Riga.
- 1727 An order to expel Jews from Courland fails.
- 1738 A second order to expel Jews from Courland also fails.
- 1766 Census records document 2,996 Jews, not including children, living in Latgalia.
- 1795 Piltene and Courland are taken over by Russia; at this time 4,582 male Jews live in Courland.
- 1799 After Russia takes over Courland, Jews obtain legal status as permanent citizens, but they still must pay punitive taxes.
- 1804 The Russian government creates the Pale of Settlement, but Courland is not included.
- 1840 The Jewish Kaplan school is established in Riga with German as the language of tuition.
- 1841 Jews are allowed to officially live in Riga.
- 1847 As many as 11,000 Jews are recorded as living in Latgalia in the towns of Dagdam, Daugavpils, Gostini, Kraslava, Livani, Malta, Preili, Rezekne, Varaklyani, and Vishki.
- 1850 Records show 51,072 Jews living in Courland. The first synagogue in Riga is built. At this time around 4,500 Jews live in Livonia, including Riga.
- 1852 Records show 23,743 Jews living in Courland.
- 1853 The first Jewish historian, Reuben Wunderbar publishes History of the Jews of Lifland and Kurland.
- 1893 Records show 21,963 Jews in Riga.
- 1897 Russian census records show that in the lands that would become Latvia, 82 percent speak Yiddish. More than 55,000 Jews are recorded in Latgalia.

- 1914 Before World War I, 190,000 Jews live in Latvia and 33,600 Jews are recorded in Riga; much of the population flees the country during the war.
- 1918–1921 As many as 1,000 Jewish soldiers fight for Latvian independence.
- November 1918 Independent Latvia is established; Jews are granted full civil rights. Eleven Jews become members of People’s Council of Latvia.
- 1919 A network of state-sponsored Jewish schools is established.
- 1920 The Jewish population declines to 79,000, of whom almost 25,000 live in Riga; 24 Jewish schools exist in Latvia.
- 1925 Records show that 95,675 Jews live in Latvia, making up 5.2 percent of the population; These numbers include 78,000 Yiddish speakers, 8,600 German speakers, 4,500 Russian speakers, and 500 Latvian speakers.
- 1925–1935 Six thousand Jews emigrate, many of whom make aliyah.
- 1930 Records show 94,588 Jews in Latvia, of whom 42,328 live in Riga.
- 1933 In Latvia, 119 Jewish schools operate.
- 1934 Latvian Democracy is abolished and a Fascist government with strong sympathies with Nazi Germany comes to power. Jewish autonomy is abolished and anti-Semitism increases, but the dictatorship does not institute harsh punitive anti-Semitic laws. The Jewish kehillah in Riga, which records births, marriages, and deaths, is permitted to remain open.
- 1935 Census records show 93,479 Jews in Latvia, 4.79 percent of the population. Of these numbers, more than 85,000 live in urban centers and less than 7,000 in rural areas; 86,427 are Latvian citizens, and the remainder are identified as “alien” or “stateless.” Jews are recorded living in Daugavpils, Liepaja, Rezekne, Jelgava, Ludza, Kraslava, Ventspils, and Krustpils; more than 43,000 Jews live in Riga. More than 75 percent of Jews are recorded as working in “trade and commerce” or “industry.” Jews own 213 corporate enterprises, or 35.6 percent of the total production value of firms in Latvia.
- 1937 The record of marriages in Latvia shows a low number of intermarriages between Jews and non-Jews; of the 857 Jewish men and 859 Jewish women who are married, only a few dozen are wed to non-Jews. Three Yiddish language newspapers are in print.
- 1940 More than 85,000 Jews inhabit Latvia, including 40,000 in Riga and 10,000 in Liepaja. Most Jews at this time speak Yiddish.
- June 1940 The Soviet Union occupies Latvia.
- June 13 and 14, 1941 Mass deportation of Jews by the Soviets begins.
- June 21, 1941 Germany invades the Soviet Union. Ghettos are established in larger cities in Latvia, and German Einsatzgruppen are used to massacre Latvian Jews; a pro-Nazi Latvian paramilitary group called Aizsargi aids Germans in the massacre.
- June 23, 1941 The first massacre of Jews by Germans takes place.
- July 4, 1941 Gogol Synagogue in Riga is burnt.
- July–October 1941 The Germans massacre around 34,000 Jews.
- November–December 1941 Liquidation of the Latvian ghettos begins: 11,000 Jews from Daugavpils are murdered and 25,000 Jews from the Riga ghetto are taken to Rumbula Forest to be massacred. The Jewish populations in Riga, Mitau,

- Liepaja, Valmiera, and Daugavpils are liquidated. By the end of the year, only 2,500 Jews are left in the Riga ghetto and 950 in Daugavpils.
- Late 1941–July 1942 As many as 15,000 Jews from Germany, Austria, and Czechoslovakia arrive in Latvia to be murdered in and around Riga.
- 1943 The 5,000 remaining Latvian Jews are sent to concentration camps, where most perish. Kaiserwald concentration camp is set up in the summer for the remaining Latvian Jews.
- November 3, 1943 The Riga ghetto is liquidated.
- 1944 Soviets drive the Germans from Latvia. As the Germans retreat, the remaining Jews in Latvia are sent to Stutthof concentration camp near Danzig. Approximately 70,000 of the more than 95,000 prewar Jews in Latvia perish in Shoah. Roughly 15,000 escape to Russia. Several hundred Jews go into hiding and survive the war; 93 non-Jewish Latvians are recognized at Yad Vashem as “Righteous Among Nations” for saving Jewish lives. More than a thousand Latvian Jews return after the war, and thousands of Russian-speaking Jews from the Soviet Union migrate to the Latvian Soviet Socialist Republic.
- 1970s Riga becomes the center of dissident Jewish activities. Jews begin to make aliyah and emigrate to America.
- 1979 Records show 28,300 Jews in Latvia.
- 1989 Emigration and aliyah reduce the Jewish population in Latvia to 22,900, of whom 18,800 lived in Riga.
- 1990 Aliyah is made by 3,388 Latvian Jews.
- 1991 Latvia gains independence and Jews are allowed to immigrate freely.
- 1997 The census records 14,600 Jews in Latvia.
- November 2001 Latvian president Vaira Vike-Freiberga attends the international conference “Jews in the Changing World,” in Riga. That same month, the Latvian prime minister attends a memorial to the 60th anniversary of the mass killings and deportations of thousands of Jews during World War II.
- 2003 The Latvian government commissions a monument to Zanis Lipke, who saved 57 Jews during the Nazi occupation.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Traditionally Jews worked in trade, commerce, industry, medicine, art, and education and as artisans, including construction workers, roofers, inlay workers, and tailors.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Important contributors to the arts and science include Isaiah Berlin (1909–1997), who was born in Riga and, in 1921, immigrated to Britain where he became a philosopher, historian, theorist, and writer. Mark Rothko (1903–1970), born Marcus Rothkowitz in Daugavpils, settled in the United States and became an internationally renowned artist. Yeshayahu Leibowitz (1903–1994) was born in Riga and Latvian-born Isaiah Berlin, one of the most prominent philosophers of the 20th century. (Library of Congress) made aliyah in 1935. He taught chemistry, physiology, history, and philosophy at Hebrew University and became an outspoken critic of the Israeli government. Noted religious scholar and commentator Necham Leibowitz (1905–1997), Yeshayahu Leibowitz's sister, was born in Riga and moved to Eretz Yisrael in 1930. Other notable Latvian Jews include Jewish historian Simon Dubnow (1860–1941) and classical Latvian writer Rudolf Blaumanis.

Present Economic Conditions

Many Latvian Jews are elderly and impoverished and receive aid from national and international communal organizations. In Riga, the Jewish Community Center and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) provide a meals-on-wheels program for the elderly and the Federation of the Jewish Communities of CIS (FJC) operates a soup kitchen and prepares food packages for homebound elderly. Much of the pre–World War II communal Jewish property was confiscated by the Soviet government and still has not been returned. Currently, laws are under consideration to return communal property to the Latvian Jewish community in hopes of improving their economic wellbeing.

Religious Denominations

Before World War II, Latvian Jews in Kurzeme, Zemgale, and Vidzeme were Mithnagdim, and Jews of Latgale were Hasidim of the Habad school. In Riga, both sects operated. Synagogues exist in Riga, Daugavpils, Liepaja, and Rezhitsa.

Jewish Education and Communal Institutions

The Latvian Society for Jewish Culture is the leading communal organization. Other important groups include the Council of Jewish Organizations and the Council of Latvian Jewish Communities and Congregations. A Jewish newspaper, Gersharim, is published in Riga. Jewish community organizations exist in Daugavpils, Liepaya, Ludza, Rezekne, and Yelagva. The Latvian Society of Jewish Culture opened in 1989. The JDC, Chabad, and the FJC are active in Latvia.

In 1989, the first Jewish school in the Soviet Union, the Dubnov School, opened in Riga. Other youth education programs include the Union of Jewish Youth of Latvia, established in 1994; the Shalom Club, sponsored by the Israeli embassy; and FJC operated summer camps. In 1998, the Center for Judaic Studies opened at the University of Latvia.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

From the 16th to the 19th centuries, German and Polish Jews arrived in Latvia. The Latvian Jewish community was decimated during World War II, and after the war, Russian Jews from throughout the Soviet Union migrated to Latvia, settling mostly in the capital. Since 1989, thousands of Jews have made aliyah.

Selected Bibliography

- Anders, Edward, and Juris Dubrovskis. 2001. Jews in Liepaja, Latvia, 1941–45: A Memorial Book. Burlingame, MA: Anders Press.
- Gordon, Frank. 1990. Latvians and Jews between Germany and Russia. Stockholm, Sweden: Memento.
- “History of Jewish Latvia: Overview.” Rumbula: The Holocaust in Latvia and Latvian Jewry Web site. www.rumbula.org/history\_of\_latvian\_jewry.shtml (accessed April 20, 2007).
- “History of Latvia and Courland.” Latvia SIG Web site. www.jewishgen.org/Latvia/SIG\_History\_of\_Latvia\_and\_Courland.html (accessed April 20, 2007).

“Latvia’s History: Education, Remembrance, Research.” 2005–2006. Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Latvia Web site. www.mfa.gov.lv/en/news/Newsletters/History/2006/34/ (accessed April 20, 2007).

Steimanism, Josifs. 2002. History of Latvian Jews. New York: Columbia University Press.

Jews in Lithuania

Saul Issroff and Aubrey Newman

General Population: 3,585,000 (2006)

Jewish Population: Estimated at 4,000; 600 individuals live in Vilnius and Kaunas and 230 in Siauliai. Smaller communities are found in Klaipeda, Panevys, Druskininkai, Shvenchionys, and Ukmerge.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: The majority are Ashkenazi, but there is evidence of some Sephardi origin.

Languages Spoken: Lithuanian, Russian, Polish, German, and Yiddish

Historical Overview

1323 Grand Duke Gediminas, empire builder of Lithuania, makes Vilnius his capital and invites into his country Jews who come in part from southeast Europe, Germany, and central Europe.

1386 The marriage of Gediminas’s grandson Yagiello (Wladislawll) to Hedwig-Yadwiga of Poland results in the union of Poland and Lithuania.

1388 Prince Vytautas the Great of Lithuania grants an official charter to Jews of Troki and Brisk. Synagogues and cemeteries are exempted from taxation, and Jews are given personal and religious security. The following year the charter is extended to Grodno. It lays the foundation for a system of Jewish autonomy and the basis of the structure for Jewish life between the 14th and 18th centuries.

1392 Vytautas invites Jews and Karaites to settle in Vilnius.

1401 Vytautas proclaims the autonomy of Lithuania.

1444 Poland and Lithuania are again united under Casimir the Great.

1495 Casimir’s successor, Alexander Yagiello, Grand Duke of Lithuania, expels the Jews from Lithuania and confiscates their property.

1503 Jews are readmitted into Lithuania; Abraham Boemas is appointed as senior and judge of the Jews.

1528 Jews are excluded from Vilnius and Kaunas, but many Jews move into districts near the city owned by nobles and not under the control of the burghers of Vilnius. Some Jews were appointed to important economic positions.

1551 The rule of Sigismund II brings recognition and enlargement of the powers of the kahal and the Lithuanian Jewish Community Council.

1569 The Union of Lublin harmonizes and merges the Polish and Lithuanian administrations. The Jews are now recognized as important in the economic system and become tax collectors and estate managers.

- 1573 The first official synagogue opens in Vilnius.
- 1581 Official recognition is given to the Council of the Four Lands—the Synod of the Provinces into which Jewish Poland was divided—Little Poland, Greater Poland, Belorussia, and Lithuania. This does not replace the individual kehilloth, but becomes the official channel between the community and the government, thus ensuring autonomy.
- 1587 Sigismund III is elected as King of Poland and Grand Duke of Lithuania. During his reign the Jews become much more active as partners of the nobility, sometimes even becoming part owners of land. Many engage in money lending but others are active in agriculture and estate administration or hold brewing and distilling rights. The nobility begin to create large numbers of small private townships (shtetlach) some with many Jewish inhabitants, at times a majority.
- 1648 The Cossack uprising under Bogdan Chmielnicki is directed against the Poles and Jesuits, but the Jews also become targets, as the agents and bailiffs of the hated landlords. The murder of the Jews by the Cossacks was the most ferocious onslaught upon them until modern times. Thousands of Jews flee from the Ukraine to Lithuania, and then the Russians and Swedes invaded Lithuania.
- 1734 The Great Fire of Vilna burns the “Jerusalem of Lithuania.” Although many of the wooden houses and synagogues are destroyed, they are soon rebuilt with assistance provided by Jewish communities from all over Western Europe.
- 1764 The government dissolves the Council of the Four Lands and the Council of Lithuania, which results in the loss of Jewish autonomy; however, the individual community councils (kehilloth) are retained as a method of collecting taxes from the Jews.
- 1765 The first census of Lithuanian Jews counts 76,474 individuals, but estimates suggest that the number may be as high as 120,000.
- 1768 The Gaon, Rabbi Elijah ben Judah Solomon Zalman, settles in Vilna.
- 1772–1795 Independent Poland and Lithuania disappear, partitioned and absorbed into the Russian state.
- 1781 Zalman issues herem against the Hasidim and the mitnaggedim rise in Lithuania.
- 1823 The Committee for Jewish Affairs is established and is the means by which the Russian government begins to enforce new discriminatory edicts against the Jews.
- 1827 Military service for Jewish youth (cantonists) is introduced. Service is for 25 years.
- 1835 The Pale of Settlement and the Regulations on Jewish Affairs are officially established, restricting even more severely Jewish freedom of movement and preventing settlement outside very restricted geographical areas.
- 1844 The kehilloth are dissolved.
- 1846 Sir Moses Montefiore visits Vilnius and Kaunas en route to Saint Petersburg. On leaving he declares to the leaders of the community: “I leave you but my heart will ever remain with you. When my brethren suffer, I feel it painfully: when they have reason to weep my eyes shed tears.”
- 1855 With the death of Nicholas I and accession of Alexander II the Cantonist system is abolished.

- 1858 Jews are granted limited rights to leave the Pale and live elsewhere in Russia.
- 1867 The Great Famine leads to an outbreak of cholera and the beginnings of a mass emigration.
- 1872 The first Jewish public library in Lithuania is founded in Vilnius.
- 1881 Alexander II is assassinated and Alexander III ascends the throne. Pogroms break out in southern Russia and the beginning of the flight of Jews en masse to the West.
- 1882 In May, Provisional Laws are introduced that restrict Jewish rights of settlement, ownership of land, and permission to trade on Sundays.
- 1886 The first Jewish labor societies are founded in Vilnius.
- 1891 Another Great Famine breaks out along with more pogroms in the south.
- 1893 Foundation of "Mizrachi" in Bialystock.
- 1897 The Bund is founded in Vilnius. It opposes Zionism and the use of Hebrew. The general census shows 755,000 Jews in Lithuania (212,600 in Kaunas). As many as 33,800 Jews emigrate from Kaunas.
- 1897–1914 More than 50,000 Jews emigrate from Kaunas.
- 1903 Theodor Herzl, the founder of Zionism, comes to Vilnius. Mass demonstrations are staged in his support, which the Russian troops disperse by force. He writes "Yesterday, Vilna day, was something I shall never forget."
- 1906 After the 1905 revolution, the first Duma is established; Naftali Fridman is elected from Kaunas, specifically as a Jew. Political organizations "with foreign connections," that is, Zionists, are prohibited.
- 1915 In April and May, the Russian Government orders the expulsion of all Jews from Lithuania, on the alleged grounds that they are helping the German invaders. More than 120,000 have to leave. In September the German army occupies Lithuania.
- 1917 The Russian czar Nicholas II is overthrown and the Bolsheviks come to power, which triggers a civil war.
- 1918 Lithuania declares independence.
- 1919 Lithuania is recognized, and the Paris Declaration grants official, but short-lived, autonomy to the Jewish communities in Lithuania.
- 1920 Poland seizes Vilnius, and Kaunas becomes the new capital of Lithuania. The Yiddish Reali Gymnasium is founded in Vilkomir.
- 1923 The last National Jewish Assembly is held in Kaunas.
The national census shows a Jewish population of 154,000.
- 1924 The Festivals Law prohibits working on Sundays and other Christian festivals.
- 1926 A military coup d'état ends democracy in Lithuania.
- January 1939 A German-Lithuanian nonaggression pact is signed.
- March 1939 The Germans occupy Memel.
- September 1939 The Soviets occupy Vilnius.
- October 1939 A Russian-Lithuanian mutual assistance agreement is signed and Vilnius is restored to Lithuania.
- 1940 Soviet forces occupy Lithuania.
- June 1941 The Soviets deport 30,000 "enemies of the state," including a large number of Jews; by this means they are saved from subsequent murder by the Nazis.

- Germany attacks the Soviet Union. On June 24, Germany occupies Kaunas and Vilnius. Lithuanian partisans massacre 4,000 Jews in Kaunas.
- June–November 1941 About 11,000 Kaunas Jews are murdered in Fort Nine.
- August 1941 The German administration incorporates Lithuania, Estonia, and Latvia Ostland. Ghettos are established in Kaunas, Vilnius, and Siauliai. Dr. Elhanan Elkes is elected head of the Kaunas Ghetto.
- September 1941 Jacob Gens is appointed head of the Judenrat in Vilnius.
- 1941 The vast majority, about 200,000 out of an estimated 220,000–250,000 Lithuanian Jews are murdered.
- July 1942 Jews are deported from Kaunas to the concentration camps at Stutthof (women) and Dachau (men). The Red Army enters Lithuania on July 14. Approximately 10,000 Jews in Lithuania survive the German occupation.
- September 1943 The Vilnius Ghetto is liquidated.
- November 1943 The “Murder of the Children” (Kinderaktion) takes place in Siauliai.
- 1948–1953 Anti-Semitism in Lithuania consolidates; Jews are under increasing pressure and face growing antagonism. Jewish schools and institutions are closed down.
- 1979–1998 The Jewish population falls from 23,562 to 4,500. Many Jews emigrate to Israel and the United States
- 1990 Lithuanian independence from Soviet control is internationally recognized. The President of Lithuania issues a declaration condemning the role of Lithuanian anti-Semites. Since the end of communist rule, Jewish national identity has been maintained by the restoration of religious life and cultural heritage. Holocaust memorialization remains a top priority; more than 200 places of mass extermination are looked after. Annual ceremonies are held on September 23, the Day of Remembrance for the Holocaust in Lithuania, at the 9th Fort in Kaunas and in Ponary, the sites of the most terrible mass murders of Jews. Despite these actions, anti-Semitism is rife and fuelled by right-wing politicians and a populist press.
- March 7, 2004 The Lithuanian Jewish community elects Chaim Burshtein the new chief rabbi of Lithuania.

Contemporary Overview

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Lithuanian Jews have been active contributors to science and the arts in Lithuania, even after emigration. Notable individuals include philosopher Emmanuel Levinas (1906–1995); Mark Antokolsky, sculptor to Emperor Alexander (1843–1902); Bernard Berenson (1865–1959), Lithuanian-born American art critic and art historian; Jascha Heifetz (1901–1987), world-renowned violinist; Al Jolson (Asa Yoelson), born in Sereďzius (1886–1950), singer and entertainer; Jacques Lipchitz (Chaim Jacob Lipchitz; 1891–1973), cubist sculptor; Ben Shahn (1898–1969), artist; Andrew Schally (b. Vilnius, 1926), 1977 Nobel Prize in Medicine; Sir Aaron Klug (b. 1926), physicist, chemist, and winner of the 1982 Nobel Prize in Chemistry for developing the crystallographic electron microscopy, president of the Royal Society 1995–2000; Abba Kovner (b. 1918 in Sebastopol, lived in Vilnius, d. 1987), partisan leader who later lived in Israel and a noted poet; Yacov Shmuskevich, commander of Soviet Air Force; Emma Goldman, anarchist and revolutionary leader (b. Kaunas, 1869–1940); Laurence Harvey (Lauruska Mischa Skikne; b. 1928), actor; Sidney Hillman (b. 1887 in Zagare, d. 1946), labor leader, founder and president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America; Moshe Arens, former minister of defense and former minister of foreign affairs of Israel (b. 1925); Aharon Barak, president of the Supreme Court of Israel (1995–2006) who was smuggled out of the Kovno Ghetto in a suitcase as a child and hidden by a Lithuanian farmer; and Joe Slovo (Yossel Mashel Slovo; b. Obeliai 1926, d. Johannesburg 1995), ANC activist and cabinet minister in South African government.

Notable persons who have contributed to Jewish culture and religion include Eliezer Ben-Yehuda (Eliezer Yitzhak Perelman; 1858–1922), pioneer of modern Hebrew revival; Abraham Mapu (1808–1867), known as the creator of the Hebrew novel; Nosson Tzvi Finkel (1849–1927), famous rosh yeshiva of the Slabodka yeshiva; Eyliohu ben Schloyme Zalmen (1720–1797), rabbi, Talmud scholar, sage, and Kabbalist; Uriel Weinreich (1926–1967), linguist and scholar of Yiddish studies; Mordecai Kaplan (1881–1983), founder of Reconstructionist Judaism; David Wolfsohn (1856–1914), Jewish businessman, prominent Zionist, and second president of the World Zionist Organization in 1905; and Chatzkel Lemchen (1904–2001), lexicographer.

Jewish Education and Communal Institutions

Dr. Simeonas Alperavicius is the chairman of the Lithuanian Jewish Community (JLC), an umbrella organization representing all Lithuanian Jews that was established in 1991. The Jewish community maintains good relations with the Lithuanian government. The Jewish community maintains the Ezra medical center, Ilan Children's Club, Union of Lithuanian Jewish students, Jewish cultural club, Fajelech dance and choral ensemble, and Maccabi sports club. JLC publishes Jerusalem of Lithuania in Lithuanian, Russian, English, and Yiddish. Notable clergy in Lithuania include Chaim Burshtein, a Russian-born Israeli Orthodox Rabbi, and Rabbi Shlomo Krinski, a Chabad rabbi who runs a Lubavitch center with a Jewish secondary school in Vilnius.

State-supported Jewish institutions include a kindergarten, a school named after Shalom Aleichem, a library, and the Jewish Gaon State Museum of Lithuania. A branch of the museum also operates at the Paneriai memorial. The Vilnius Yiddish Institute (established 2001 at Vilnius State University) and the National Library include significant Judaica sections.

The beginning of the 21st century was marked by conflicts between members of Chabad-Lubavitch and followers of traditional Judaism. In 2005, violence between those factions broke out at the Vilnius synagogue. Interest among descendants of Lithuanian Jews has spurred tourism and a renewal in research and preservation of the community's historic resources and possessions.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

A mass exodus of Jews began in 1880. Large numbers went to the United States, an estimated 15,000 families settled in South Africa, and smaller numbers dispersed among various South American states, Australia, England, France, and Canada. A number of Lithuanian Jews have immigrated to Israel or the United States since the fall of the Soviet Union.

Selected Bibliography

- Cohen, Rose Lerer, and Saul Issroff. 2002. The Holocaust in Lithuania 1941–1945: A Book of Remembrance. 4 Vols. New York: Gefen.
- Goren, N., L. Garfunkel, et al., eds. 1959–1984. Yahadut Lita [Lithuanian Jewry]. 4 vols. Tel Aviv: Association of Lithuanian Jews in Israel.
- Greenbaum, M. 1995. The Jews of Lithuania: A History of a Remarkable Community. New York: Gefen.
- Kagan, B. 1991. Yidishe Shtet, Shtetlekh un Dorfishe Yishuvim in Lite biz 1918. Historish-biografishe skitses [Jewish Cities, Towns and Villages in Lithuania Until 1918. Historical and Biographical Sketches]. New York: B. Kohen.
- Kasnett, Rabbi Y. 1996. The World That Was: Lithuania. A Study of the Life and Torah Consciousness of the Jews of Lithuania and Northeastern Poland. Cleveland Heights, OH: The Living Memorial, Hebrew Academy of Cleveland.
- Leikowicz, Ch., ed. 1965. Lite [Lithuania]. Vol. 2. Tel Aviv, Israel: I. L. Peretz.
- Levin, D. 2000. The Litvaks: A Short History of the Jews of Lithuania. Translated by A. Teller. Jerusalem: Yad Vashem.
- Levin, D., and J. Rosin, eds. 1996. Pinkas Hakehillot: Lita [Encyclopedia of Jewish Communities from their Foundation until after the Holocaust: Lithuania]. Jerusalem: Yad Vashem.
- “Lithuania.” Am Yisrael Web site. www.amyisrael.co.il/cis/lithuania.htm (accessed April 20, 2007).
- Lithuanian Holocaust Names Project Web site. <http://www.lithnames.nux.co.uk/> (accessed April 20, 2007).
- Oshry, Ephraim. 1995. The Annihilation of Lithuanian Jewry. Translated by Y. Leiman. New York: Judaica Press.
- Rozett, R., and S. Spector, eds. 2000. Encyclopedia of the Holocaust. Chicago: Fitzroy Dearborn.
- Schoenburg, Stuart. 1991. Lithuanian Jewish Communities. New York: Garland Publishing.
- Spector, S., and G. Wigoder, eds. 2001. The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life. Before, During and After the Holocaust. Vols. 1–3. New York: New York University Press.
- Sudarsky, M., U. Katzenellenbogen, and J. Kissin, eds. 1951. Lite [Lithuania]. Vol. 1. New York: Jewish-Lithuanian Cultural Society.
- Vilnius Yiddish Institute. <http://litvakai.mch.mii.lt/index.en.html> (accessed April 20, 2007).

History of Lithuanian Jewish Culture

Dovid Katz

---

The Jewish cultural concept of “Lithuania” differs markedly from the modern state of that name. Today’s Republic of Lithuania, the southernmost of the three Baltic states, occupies the westernmost sliver of the Lithuanian Jewish area that is known as Lító in traditional Lithuanian Ashkenazic Hebrew, Líte in Yiddish, and Líta in modern Hebrew. The three variants are spelled distinctly in the Jewish alphabet: Lító with (Aramaic-origin) final alef (ליטא) in rabbinic culture; Líte with Yiddish final ayin (ליטע) in modern Yiddish literature; and Líta with final (biblical-style) hey (ליטה) in modern Hebrew. In fact, these three forms correspond symbolically to the three major Jewish cultures for which Jewish Lithuania was a critical center for many centuries and for which Lithuanian Jewry produced permanent contributions: traditional rabbinic (and Kabbalistic) learning, modern Yiddish culture and scholarship, and modern Hebrew language and literature and the cultural form of Zionism, which actually determined the contours of the State of Israel. In this essay, Líta is used as a neutral English term, with English word final reduced -a, encompassing all three Jewish senses.

The contours of the borders of Lita bear more than a passing resemblance to various 14th-century versions of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and in some areas, to the demarcation line between the Lithuanian and Polish components of the Polish-Lithuanian commonwealth set up by the 1569 Union of Lublin. In other words, internal Jewish cultural geography often corresponds in some measure to erstwhile borders that had profound influence on incipient settlement patterns and the degree of intercommunity (and inter-Jewish community) communication. The territory of Lita is generally congruous with present-day Belarus, parts of Latvia, Lithuania, a large swath of eastern Ukraine, and the Suwalk (Suwalki) and Bialystok areas of northeastern Poland.

In all three Jewish languages of Ashkenazic Jewish civilization—Hebrew, Yiddish, and Aramaic—the traditional Lithuanian Jew has always been immediately identifiable by the sound system evident in pronouncing all of them. As in standard Ashkenazic Hebrew, the Lithuanian variety usually realizes the historic vowel games as an open o, and historic u vowels retain their u quality; hence, blessings start with borukh (“blessed is”), but for a non-Lithuanian East European Jew, it is burikh. In most (but not all) varieties of Lithuanian Jewish pronunciation, again in all three languages, the historic holem vowel (oy in standard Ashkenazic Hebrew and standard Yiddish) is rendered ey, hence “Torah” is téyre (or formal teyro) for standard tóyre (toyro). Finally, Lithuanian Jews were needed for their conflation (or seeming switcharounds) of s and sh sounds (hissing and hushing sibilants), and the dialect is playfully called sábesdiker losn—the language of those who say sábes for shábes (“Sabbath” or “Saturday”), and losn for loshn (“language”), or, in effect, those who would render the shibboleth phrase for “language of the Sabbath” with s instead of the required sh in both words.

The cultural significance of Lithuanian Jewry, disproportionate to its minority status within East European Jewry (historically in the region of a quarter of East European Jewry), is often derived ultimately, if indirectly, from the relative tolerance of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, which was a largely multitheist (“pagan”) East European empire. Its rulers adopted Christianity only in the late 14th century, and for a long time thereafter, the multitheist culture remained potent, keeping at bay for some time the absolutist brand of central European Christianity. The intolerance of medieval Christian Europe’s rulers—so evident in period of the Crusades (1095–1291), the Rindfleisch massacres (1298), and the Black Death (1347–1351)—was in fact the prime factor in the various migrations of medieval Ashkenazic Jewry in various directions, and particularly eastward, where Hungarian and Polish rulers issued charters of tolerance to encourage Jewish migration, primarily for economic reasons. While Lithuanian grand duke Gedymin (Gediminas) is rumored to have settled Jews in his new capital city Vilna (now Vilnius) in the early 1320s, the earliest known recorded Lithuanian charters come from his grandson Witold the Great (Vytautas), for the Jews of Brest in 1388 and Grodna in 1389. They contained formulations that were sensational for their time, including freedom of religious belief, tax-free synagogue and cemetery plots, economic rights equal to that of all citizens, the explicit right to own land, the imposition of a fine on a Gentile who fails to answer the call for help from a Jew, and the affirmation that these rights are “everlasting.” It is little wonder that Witold became known as “the Cyrus of Lithuania.”

Notwithstanding serious setbacks, such as the short-lived expulsion of 1495, it became common knowledge that Lithuania was, in the course of many centuries, the most tolerant area with respect to its Jewish population. Moreover, Lithuania represented, in terms of European Jewish history, a “further trek eastward” for Ashkenazic civilization on a trajectory that started in Germany and passed through the Polish lands, coming to maturity rather later than in the oldest centers of Polish Jewry.

Rabbinic Scholarship

By the 16th century, Lithuanian Jewish communities were determined to achieve sophistication of rabbinic scholarship, mostly by spending scant resources on importing top scholars and sending pupils to the best academies elsewhere. Mordechai Jaffe (“the Levúsh,” ca. 1535–1612), a native of Prague, was brought to Lithuania to teach and officiate in Grodna (now Hrodna, Belarus) in the 1570s; around the same time, Solomon Luria (the “Maharshál,” ca. 1510–1674), originally from Poland, was brought to Brisk D’Lita (now Brest, Belarus). By the 17th century, Lithuania was itself producing some of Europe’s top rabbinic scholars. Among the most famous were “the Shakh” (Shabbetai ben Meir ha-Kohen, 1621–1662), the “Maharshák” (Aaron Samuel Kaidonover, ca. 1614–1676), and the “Be’éyr Ha-góylo” (Moyshé Rivkes, ca. 1595–ca. 1672). Rivkes pioneered a keen critical sense for textual criticism and reconstruction in his commentary to the Shulkhon orukh (Shulhan Aruch) code of law, which appeared during his years in Amsterdam in the 1670s. Textual expertise was to become the hallmark of Lithuanian Talmudic scholarship, in contrast to the propensity for complex clever explanation, sometimes called pilpul, that became the hallmark of the Polish rabbis. In a further symbolic establishment of the Lithuanian Jewish tradition of putting scholarship before all else, Rivkes left a will that provided funds from his estate for descendants who would be talented students.

One of those direct descendants was the Gaon of Vilna, Eylioḥu ben Shloyme-Zalmen (Elijah the son of Shelomo-Zalman), who lived from 1720 to 1797, and by virtue of his scholarship and intellectual influence, made his city, Vilna, into a celebrated world-class center that would thereafter become known as Yerusholáyim d'Lite (the Jerusalem of Lithuania).

The Gaon and his circle in Vilna were also founders of Misnagdism, the misnagdic (or “opposition” or “protestant”) movement against the new Hasidic movement, which had emanated from 18th-century Podolia in the Ukraine. The Vilna group’s bans against the Hasidim, from 1772, became foundational to the Lithuanian Jewish heritage. Objecting to the quasi-deification of the hasidic rebbe (or tsádik), the enacted changes in prayer and other laws, the introduction of a kind of pantheism, and the seeming demotion of Torah scholarship, the followers of the Gaon, and in the first instance his pupil Chaim of Valozhin (1749–1821), went on to found a network of rabbinic academies or yeshivas that were renowned for their strict standards, starting with the famed Valozhin Yeshiva that was established in 1802. Other Lithuanian towns that became famous because of their celebrated yeshivas were Mir, Kletsk, and Slutsk, on the territory of today’s Belarus, and Ponevezh, Slabodke, and Telz, in today’s Lithuania.

But much of the eastern sector of Lithuanian Jewry—in and around Vitebsk, Mohilov, Gomel, Bobruisk, and other towns—became adherents of a new “Third

Eylioḥu ben Schloyme Zalmen (1720–1797), the Gaon of Vilna, leader of Lithuanian Jewry and Talmudic protégé. (Isadore Singer, ed., The Jewish Encyclopedia, 1901)

Way,” a distinctly Lithuanian Hasidism. Its principal founder was Shneur Zalman of Lyadi (1745–1813), who synthesized Lithuanian love of learning and adherence to Jewish law with core tenets of Hasidism, in his Chabad movement, which also came to be known later as Lubavitch, after the town to which his son moved the court (today Lubavichy in Russia near the border of Belarus). There have been other Lithuanian Hasidim, including the dynasties of Amdur, Karlin (eventually Karlin-Stolin), and Lechevitsh.

Modern Yiddish Culture

Although much of the modern literary form of Yiddish developed in the Ukraine and other parts of the southern dialect areas, their implicit recognition of the “standard status” of most aspects of Lithuanian pronunciation is apparent starting from the early 19th century at least (based on earlier notions of correctness regarding Hebrew and Aramaic renditions in prayer and Bible reading). The grandfather of modern Yiddish literature, Mendele Moykher Sforim (Sholem-Yankev Abramovitch, ca. 1836–1917), was himself from Lithuania but relocated as a teenager to Ukraine. His later works, synthesizing Lithuanian and Ukrainian dialect features, fixed a durable interdialect balance of standard Yiddish.

In 1897, the Jewish Labor Bund was founded clandestinely in Vilna. At first led by cultural assimilationists, it turned to Yiddish culture as a prime ideological component of cultural autonomy in the early years of the 20th century, largely because of the leadership of Esther Frumkin (1880–1943), who helped develop curricula for modern Yiddish schools.

Vilna, which already had the aura of being known as the “Jerusalem of Lithuania” for its rabbinic learning, proved a fertile symbolic capital for highbrow modern Yiddish secular culture. This image was effectively launched in 1913 with the appearance in the city of Der Pinkes, a sophisticated anthology of academic research on Yiddish published entirely in Yiddish; in this work, the founder of modern Yiddish studies, Ber Borokhov (1881–1917), published his seminal works delineating the new field.

In Vilna, the extant infrastructure included, in addition to densely populated Yiddish-speaking districts, the Romm publishing house, which in the second half of the 19th century had added modern Yiddish fiction to its output, most famously publishing the populist tales of Isaac Meir Dik (1814–1893).

During and after World War I, a number of the most talented Yiddish scholars—linguists, literary historians, folklorists, educators—settled in Vilna (which was Wilno, Poland, from 1920 until September 1939). Among them were literary historian and philologist Zalmen Reyzen (1887–ca. 1940); philologist, translator, and editor Zelig-Hirsh Kalmanovitch (1881–1944); poet and educator Moyshe Kulbak (1896–ca. 1940); and most significantly the linguist and cultural historian Max Weinreich (1894–1969), who was instrumental in establishing the Yivo Institute for Jewish Research in Vilna in 1925. The city also became famous for its modern Yiddish educational institutions, including the modernist school founded and led in the interwar period by Sofia Gurevitsh (1880–1942).

The scholarly and educational components of modern Yiddish culture came in a great measure from Lithuanian Jewry. By creating a conceptual international center for sophisticated, higher-end Yiddish culture, particularly education and research activities, the Vilna circles helped build Yiddish studies into a viable field, a construction that would have a new significance decades after the Holocaust when the models created were playing a significant role in Western universities where Yiddish studies are taught.

Modern Hebrew Culture

Lithuanian Jewry played a critical role in the revival of modern Hebrew. Most of the top stylists who began to fashion a modern Hebrew that would be viable as a contemporary literary language (and eventually as a revived spoken language) were maskilim (“enlighteners”) from the depths of the Lithuanian Jewish territory. They tended to congregate in Vilna where three big-city Hebrew salons developed in the 19th century: the homes of Tsvi-Hirsh Katzenelenbogen (“Hirshl Simkhe’s”), the Klatshko family, and Moyshe Rosenthal. Among the authors nurtured were the pioneers of modern Hebrew poetry, including Abraham Dov-Ber Lebensohn (or “Odom ha-koyhen,” 1794–1878), his son Micah Joseph (or Michal, 1828–1852), and Yehuda-Leib (or “Leon”) Gordon (1831–1892). In the arena of prose, the stylistic virtuosity of another Vilna salon member, Mordechai-Aaron Ginsburg (1795–1846), taken in tandem with the novels of Abraham Mapu (1808–1867), from another major Lithuanian city, Kovna (now Kaunas), were crucial. Mapu’s Ahavas tsíyoyñ (Love of Zion), which appeared in Vilna in 1853, is rightly considered the first modern Hebrew novel.

By the waning years of the 19th century, Lithuanian Hebrew literature fed into the new Eastern European–driven branch of Zionism that placed a renewed Hebrew language and culture in or near the ideological center of the movement. Peretz Smolenskin (ca. 1840–1885), who founded the journal Ha-shákhár, pioneered polemic and journalistic styles. Eliezer Perlman, who became Eliezer Ben-Yehuda (1858–1922), is the celebrated actual reviver of a living, spoken Hebrew, who established (in Palestine) the first Hebrew-speaking family in several thousand years. He was a native of Luzhik in the province of Vilna (now Luzhki, Belarus).

The Notions “Litvak” and “Litvish”

Many nowadays refer to Lithuanian Jews as “Litvaks” (Yiddish lítvakes, plural of lítvak). It is important to understand, however, that the word has different connotations for different groups. For most ethnographers, linguists, and cultural historians, a Litvak is a Jew who hails from the territory Jews called Lita, where they spoke the Lithuanian dialect of Yiddish and used the Lithuanian dialect of Hebrew and Aramaic in their prayers, readings, and recitations. But for some, especially (but not only) Chabad Hasidim, the term Litvak refers only to the anti-Hasidic mitnaggedim, primarily of the western portions of the Jewish ethnographic territory of Lita; there are some mitnaggedim who likewise reserve the term for the non-Hasidic component of Lithuanian Jewry. And in some non-Lithuanian communities (e.g., from Ukraine), ironically, the word Litvak usually refers to Chabad Hasidism, primarily because of their Lithuanian pronunciation, which goes hand in hand with various religious and cultural differentiations between northern Chabad Hasidim and their southern counterparts.

Although the adjective litvish (literally “Lithuanian”) may refer to the noun litvak (and take on whichever of the meanings it has in context), it is often used to refer to the Lithuanian Yiddish, Hebrew, and Aramaic dialect or mode of pronunciation. As such, it would be universal to refer to all Lithuanian Jews, whether mitnaggedim of the west, or Chabad Hasidim of the east as “speaking Litvish.” Incidentally, the dialect area of litvish, known to linguists as Northeastern Yiddish and/or Northeastern Ashkenazic (with reference to Hebrew or Aramaic), includes a rather larger territory, extending southeastward to the Black Sea, and covering such towns as Zaporozhe and Kherson, which were only inhabited by extensive Jewish communities from the early 19th century onward.

More than 90 percent of Lithuanian Jewry was murdered during the Holocaust, one of the largest percentages of any part of Europe. On the territory of today’s Lithuania, the figure approaches (or exceeds) 94 percent. For many intents, the Holocaust per se was tested in Lithuania in the months immediately after the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941. Following Shoah, the surviving Lithuania Jewry emigrated in mass, bringing to an end the history of a unique community that had flourished for centuries.

Selected Bibliography

- Ben-Sasson, Haim Hillel. 1973. “Lithuania: The Structure and Trends of Its Culture.” In Encyclopaedia Judaica. Jerusalem: Year Book.
- Kasnett, Yitzchak. 1996. The World That Was: Lithuania. Cleveland, OH: Hebrew Academy of Cleveland.
- Katz, Dovid. 2004. Lithuanian Jewish Culture. Vilnius, Lithuania: Baltos Lankos.
- Kostanian, Rachel, Ruta Puisyte, et al. 2001. Jewish Life in Lithuania. Vilnius, Lithuania: Vilna Gaon Jewish State Museum of Lithuania.
- Lempertas, Izraelis. 2005. Litvakes. Vilnius, Lithuania: Versus Aureus.
- Levin, Dov. 2000. The Litvaks. A Short History of the Jews in Lithuania. Jerusalem: Yad Vashem.
- Oshry, Ephraim. 1995. The Annihilation of Lithuanian Jewry. Translated from the Yiddish by Y. Leiman. Brooklyn: Judaic Press.
- Rosenthal, Herman. 1904. The Jewish Encyclopedia, s.v. “Lithuania.” New York: Funk & Wagnalls, viii, 118–130.
- Schochet, Elijah Judah. 1994. The Hasidic Movement and the Gaon of Vilna. Northvale, NJ: Jason Aronson.

Vilnius as a Jewish City

Mordechai Zalkin

---

Jews began to settle in Vilnius by the middle of the 15th century, but they did not receive a legal approval to do so until the end of the following century. While included in Vaad Medinat Lita in the middle of the 17th century, the Jewish community of Vilnius was one of the most important Jewish communities in Eastern Europe. At this time the community was already well organized and functioned according to regulations, set and supervised by the local community board, the kahal. The intensive activity of this body, in almost every aspect of the local Jewish life, made the Jewish community “a city within a city” or, in another words, a Jewish city. In fact, local Jews could manage their lives almost without any contact with the local authorities. The kahal, assisted by some other communal bodies, either provided directly, in many cases for free, or took care of a wide range of social and economic services, such as social welfare, basic education for children of needy and poor families, medical treatment, constant supply of Kosher food, a justice system, public bath houses, burial services, and the like.

By the end of the 18th century, the community, which at that time reached nearly 6,000 persons, suffered from internal social and religious instability. At the beginning of the 19th century, the Jewish community of Vilnius, numbering around 20,000 people, became known as “Jerusalem of Lithuania” and began to play a focal role in the history of modern East European Jewry. Synagogues and other religious institutions, such as public bath houses, elementary religious schools (hadarim) and a few academies for Torah study (yeshivas) were scattered all around the city and its suburbs.

Some of the most important contemporary rabbinic figures and scholars, such as Rabbi Elijah Kremer, known as the Genius of Vilna, lived and studied in this city. The world’s biggest and most important Jewish printing press and publishing house, Romm, which was founded by the first quarter of the century, published a new edition of the Babylonian Talmud as well as a wide range of religious and secular books.

Besides its importance as a center for Torah studies, the local Jewish community also played an important role in the local and regional economic spheres. Jewish entrepreneurs, such as Rosenthal, Kliachko, Yogiches, and Opatow, were highly involved in different types of businesses—import, export, industry, and the like. By 1861, of the 20 local merchants who belonged to the first guild, 19 were Jews. Likewise, the importance of Vilnius also became apparent among Russian governmental circles and among Jewish dignitaries from all over the world. Thus, for instance, in his visit to Russia in 1846, Moses Montefiore spent almost a week in Vilnius.

By the middle of this century, the “Jewishness” of Vilnius took another direction as a result of the wide and quick spread of the Jewish enlightenment (Haskalah). As early as 1830, modern schools for Jewish boys and girls were established. These schools were, in fact, the first step of the educational revolution that took place in the “Jerusalem of Lithuania” throughout this century. From the beginning of the 1840s, several modern schools for Jewish boys and girls were established by the local maskilim, attracting a growing numbers of students. Simultaneously, many young Jews were enrolled in local non-Jewish educational institutions. Thus, by the end of the century, the local educational map was scattered among traditional and modern hadarim; several yeshivas for young boys and for advanced, well-trained scholars (the most famous yeshiva was known by the name Ramailles); modern elementary and high schools for boys and girls; and, last but not least, a chain of vocational schools that were very popular among the lower classes of the local Jewish society.

During the 19th century, the city also witnessed an intensive literary activity of local writers and poets, such as Adam Ha-Cohen, Aizik Meir Dik, Samuel Joseph Finn, and Kalman Shulman. Different libraries, in which one could find all sorts of Jewish and general literature, were opened and served all types of readers. In addition, modern newspapers, such as Ha-Karmel, were printed and published by local maskilim. Besides, many young Jews, men and women alike, frequented non-Jewish local educational institutions, such as elementary schools, gymnasia, and the local university. Simultaneously, because of the historical research of Samuel Joseph Finn and Hillel Noah Maggid-Shteinschneider, Vilnius became known as an important center of modern Jewish historiography. Book collections, such as the collection of Matityahu Strashun, as well as rich public libraries, also became an integral part of the local cultural view. From the social point of view, the maskilim formed their own social institutions, such as the first enlightened synagogue, Taharat Ha-Kodesh, founded in the city center in 1847. At the same time, different informal types of maskilic subgroups were active, mainly in private houses. By the last quarter of the century this cultural trend was intensified with the involvement of local scholars and public figures in the activities of the Society for the Dissemination of Haskalah among Russian Jewry and the Society of Mekitsei Nirdamim.

Scene in the Jewish quarter of Vilnius, Lithuania, about 1920. (Library of Congress)

Because of its popularity as a center of Jewish life, and as a result of the increasing demand for workers, the Jewish population numbered about 76,000 by the end of the 19th century. At the same time, Vilnius became one of the major centers of the Jewish socialist movements. In 1897, the Bund (the Jewish socialist movement) was established in one of the city's suburbs.

World War I had a significant effect on the local Jews' life. On the one hand, many local inhabitants left the city, temporarily or for good, but, on the other hand, thousands of Jewish refugees found shelter in Vilnius. During the interwar period, Vilnius, now part of Poland, witnessed a renaissance of the local Jewish life. This renaissance encompassed all aspects of public life and was characterized mainly by political diversity. The "Jewish street" became an arena for all types of contemporary ideological movements—Zionists, socialists, Orthodox, and the like. This diversity was apparent, for instance, in the multifarious educational system, which included Zionist, Yiddishist, religious, and Orthodox schools, a microcosm of the political and cultural diversity of the local Jewish community. The interwar period was also marked by the fact that local figures and institutions played, again, a major role in the cultural life of East European Jewry and made Vilnius the capital of Yiddish language and culture. This activity was centered on the Yivo Institute (the Jewish Scientific Institute), founded in Vilnius in 1925, and which soon after became an important center for the research of Jewish history, philology, literature, economy, statistics, psychology, and education. Among the active members of Yivo were prominent researchers such as Simon Dubnow, Eliyahu Cherikover, Jacob Leshchinsky, Max Weinreich, Zalman Rejzen, Alexander Harkavy, and Max Erik. During the 20th century, historiographers Pinchas Kohn and Joseph and Israel Klausner continued the work of the 19th-century founding fathers of the local school of historiography. This period was also marked by intensive literary activity, led by a group of young poets and writers, such as Haim Grade and Abraham Sutskever, and known as "Yung Vilne."

From the political perspective, the interwar period was characterized by increasing tension between the city's Polish population, as well as the Polish government, and the local Jewish community. As a result of the Polish army's occupation of Vilnius at the beginning of the 1920s, the local Jewish community, which for centuries was known as the capital of the Litvaks, was cut off from the young independent Lithuanian state and from its natural Jewish environment. Thus, the Polish authorities always regarded the local Jewish community, which supported the Lithuanian side in this dispute, as disloyal to the Polish state. Even though a few local dignitaries, such as Rabbi Rubinstein and Dr. Vigodski, served as members of the Polish parliament and the city was formally part of Poland, Jewish Vilnius preserved its original "Litvishe" character until World War II when most local Jews were murdered either in the city or in a nearby mass-murder site in Ponar forest. Jewish Vilnius ceased to exist, and as the Lithuanian poet, Tomas Venclova, wrote: “Vilnius will never be the same without its Jewish district.”

To a certain extent, the “Jerusalem of Lithuania” was the most Jewish city in the history of East European Jewry. From the cultural, religious, and welfare perspectives, the community was a self-sufficient entity that supplied its members with all types of material and spiritual needs. In addition, the unique atmosphere of the Jewish quarter’s narrow alleys, the countless small synagogues scattered around the city, and the Yiddish-dominated hustle and bustle of the small markets all made Vilnius a “Jewish city.”

Selected Bibliography

- Cohen, Israel. 1943. Vilna. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America
- Klausner, Israel. 1983. Vilna, Dorot aharonim. Jerusalem: Bet lohmei hagetot.
- Klausner, Israel. 1988. Vilna, Yerushalayim de-Lita: dorot rishonim 1495–1881. Tel Aviv: ha-Kibuts ha-meuhad.
- Kruk, Herman. 2002. The Last Days of the Jerusalem of Lithuania: Chronicles from the Vilna Ghetto and the Camps, 1939–1944. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Minczeles, Henri. 2000. Vilna-Wilno-Vilnius, la Jerusalem de Lituanie. Paris: La Découverte.
- Ran, Leyzer, ed. 1974. Yerusholayim de-Lita [Jerusalem of Lithuania]. New York: Vilner Albom Komitet.

Scandinavia

Jews in Scandinavia

Mikael Tossavainen

---

General Population: 24.4 million

Jewish Population: 28,510

Percent of the Population: 0.001 percent

Jewish Population by Country: Sweden, 17,000 (Stockholm, Göteborg, Malmö); Denmark, 8,000 (Copenhagen); Norway, 2,000 (Oslo, Trondheim); Finland, 1,500 (Helsinki, Turku); Iceland, 10 (Reykjavik)

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: The first Jews who arrived in Scandinavia came from German lands or were Sephardi traders. Later Jewish immigration has come mainly from Central and Eastern Europe.

Languages Spoken: Swedish, Danish, Norwegian, Finnish, Russian, Polish, and to a certain degree Yiddish in the older generation.

---

Historical Overview

1592 The first Jew in Denmark is registered in Elsinore under the name of Jochim Jode (Jochim the Jew). This is the first documented Jewish presence in Scandinavia.

1619 The Danish king Christian IV makes use of court Jews and gives a licence to a Sephardi Jew, Albert Dionis, allowing him to direct the royal mint in the town of Glückstadt. Some 30 Sephardi families, or Portuguese as they are called in the sources, find their way to Glückstadt, but the town's growth comes to an end, and the Jews gradually leave to seek better opportunities elsewhere.

1640 The first major Jewish congregations in Scandinavia are set up under the King Christian IV of Denmark when he acquires towns north of Hamburg from the counts of Schaumburg. He awards them licences and tempts other hard-working Jews to move there. The congregation in Altona grows quickly during these years, and in the course of the following decades, Jews gain a real foothold in Danish territory.

1645 Queen Christina of Sweden consults the Jewish physician Baruch Nechemias (Benedictus de Castro). His visit to Sweden is the first documented time a Jew enters the country.

1667 Jews in Altona are given permission to travel and trade freely in Denmark, laying the foundations for a more significant Jewish presence in Denmark proper.

1681 At a grand ceremony attended by King Karl XI, his queen, and other high dignitaries, 12 Jews (4 adults and 8 children) are baptized in the German Church in Stockholm. At this time, Jews who arrive in Sweden and convert to Christianity are granted privileges. Similar ceremonies are also held in Denmark during the 17th century.

- 1684 The Danish king grants Jews permission to hold services in Copenhagen. At the same time, Jews settle in a number of provincial towns, including Ribe, Fredericia, Nakskov, and Nyborg among others.
- 1770–1772 Johann Struensee's revolutionary regime in Denmark brings the idea of freedom of speech and the concept of equality for the Jews. From the middle of the 18th century the intellectual and physical walls that had isolated the Jewish community from the Christians began break down.
- 1774 Aaron Isaac, a Jewish seal-maker and businessman from Mecklenburg, is the first Jew granted the right to settle in Sweden without renouncing his Jewish faith. The following year in Stockholm, Isaac and coreligionists, whom he had invited to establish a minyan, found the first Jewish congregation in Sweden. A free port is established at Marstrand on the west coast, and Jews are allowed to settle there as well.
- 1780s–1810s In Denmark, a series of tolerance decrees are introduced. In 1788, Jews are given access to the guilds. In 1798, Jews are given the right to enter into mixed marriages and to settle wherever they want in the kingdom. In 1809, Jews are given the right to become soldiers and to be admitted to the university. In 1810, Jews who have lived in Copenhagen for more than three years are given permission to stay. However, there is still widespread social discrimination, and complete equality has not yet been attained.
- 1782 The status of the Jews in Sweden is formalized with the establishment of the so-called Regulation of the Jews (Judereglementet). According to this legal document, the Jews are regarded as a colony of aliens granted the right to live in Sweden and largely autonomously conduct their own internal affairs. The regulation limits Jewish life in Sweden socially, economically, and politically. Jews are only allowed to marry other Jews, and to begin with they may only settle in Stockholm, Göteborg, and Norrköping. Most trades and crafts are off limits to Jews, and a Jew cannot hold a high-ranking political office, such as member of Parliament. As non-Christians, Jews are not allowed to testify in court either.
- March 29, 1814 A royal decree gives equal rights to Jews in Denmark.
- 1815 Ruben Henriques, a Danish Jew, is the first Jew to register in Iceland. He begins to trade at the northern port of Akureyri but never settles there.
- 1815 The status of the Jews is discussed in the Swedish Parliament, and Jews are accused of causing the economic crisis in Sweden at the time. Parliament decides to practically close the Swedish borders to Jewish immigration. Some 800 Jews are living in Sweden.
- 1819 Anti-Jewish riots suddenly appear in various Danish towns, including Copenhagen, Odense, Slagelse, and Elsinore. Especially in Copenhagen, very serious disturbances persist, with some interruptions, from September 1819 to the early part of 1820. Jews have their apartment windows smashed, and they are attacked. The serious anti-Jewish disturbances have a drastic effect on the Jews. One of the reactions among the Jews is to seek assimilation by converting to Christianity. After 1820, there is a rapid increase in the number of conversions. Behind this wave of conversions there is not only the fear of new anti-Semitic demonstrations, but also the desire to get rid of a burdensome ethnic and - religious inheritance. Even M. L. Nathanson, the leader of the Jewish community, has his children baptized.

- 1838 In Sweden, the Regulation of the Jews is abolished by King Karl XIV Johan. With that, most discriminatory administrative limitations regarding the approximately 900 Jews in Sweden are lifted. They are no longer considered alien residents and are instead officially called "Swedes of the Mosaic faith."
- 1848 The new Danish constitution confirms the legal equality of the Jews.
- 1851 The ban is lifted on Jews entering Norway.
- 1853 The Parliament of Iceland accepts in principle that Danish Jews are permitted to settle, but not worship, on the island, which is part of Denmark.
- 1855 A large majority of the Icelandic Parliament agrees to admit non-Danish Jews to Iceland.
- 1858 In accordance with an imperial Russian decree, discharged Russian soldiers and their families, without regard to their religion (thus including Jews), are allowed to stay temporarily in Finland, which is a Grand Duchy in the Russian Empire. At the end of the 19th century, Jewish veterans from the Russian army are allowed to settle permanently in Finland.
- 1870 The Jews in Sweden are granted civil rights. Only minor limitations remain in place.
- 1873 Aron Philipson and Moritz Rubenson become the first Jewish members of the Swedish Parliament.
- 1880–1930 Considerable Jewish immigration takes place from Eastern Europe to Sweden, Denmark, and Norway. The new Jewish immigrants are young people who have left Czarist Russia and are moving west in the hope of creating a better life for themselves. Relations between the immigrant Jews from Eastern Europe and the old Scandinavian Jewish community are tense. The established Jewish families do not believe they have anything in common with the new arrivals, and they fear the poor Eastern European Jews will undermine the position of the Jewish minority in Scandinavia. The local authorities do not look kindly on the East European Jews either. There is an unwillingness to risk their needing financial support and thus becoming a burden on the community, and so various attempts are made to get rid of them. Nonetheless, the history of the Eastern European Jews in Scandinavia is also a success story, as within a generation these people succeed in creating better lives for themselves and their children.
- 1889 The Finnish government issues an administrative decree expressly governing the presence of Jews in Finland. Under the decree, a number of Jews, mentioned by name, are allowed to stay in the country only until further notice and to settle only in certain towns assigned to them. They are given temporary visas with a period of validity not exceeding six months. Jewish economic life is severely restricted. Children of Jews are allowed to stay in Finland only as long as they live with their parents or are not married.
- 1906 The first Jewish settlers arrive in Iceland, when two young Jews, the merchant Fritz Nathan and the musician Paul Bernburg (Liepman), register in Reykjavik. Nathan soon becomes very influential and his co-owned company, Nathan & Olsen, becomes one of Iceland's largest at that time. After completing the construction of one of Reykjavik's largest buildings, he returns with his family to Denmark, shortly before the outbreak of the World War I. The given reason was the absence of Jewish ritual services. Bernburg, however, takes the easy road and merges into the society, apparently through baptism.

- 1907 The first democratic parliamentary elections are held in Finland. Those in favor of Jewish emancipation win a clear majority, but constitutional conflicts between the Finnish and Russian authorities prevent a positive solution of this issue.
- 1917 Finland becomes independent, and the Jews receive civil rights. Between the two world wars, the Jewish population increases to about 2,000 as a result of immigration, mainly from Soviet Russia during the early period of the Revolution.
- 1930s German Jews fleeing increasing Nazi oppression begin to make their way to Scandinavia. Many, however, are refused entry at the border. From the start of the 1930s, the Danish authorities make it clear that they will not allow further Jewish immigration.
- 1936 Iceland closes its borders to Jewish refugees and attempts to deport Jewish residents.
- 1938 The Finnish and Swedish governments severely limit Jewish immigration, effectively closing their borders to any Jews fleeing Germany. The Norwegian government also curbs Jewish immigration.
- April 1940 Denmark is occupied by Nazi Germany, but because of strong popular sentiments, no anti-Jewish laws are enacted at the time.
- April 9, 1940 Norway is occupied by Germany, and it becomes clear from the beginning of the war that the situation is more dangerous for the Jews than for the rest of the Norwegian population. One month after the invasion, all radios belonging to Jews are confiscated. The list of anti-Jewish measures is long and continues even after the Jews are deported from the country.
- May 1940 The secretary of the Jewish aid society, David Goldberg, is the first Norwegian Jew arrested. However, he is released soon after, as are many of the Jews arrested early in the war.
- Fall 1940 Jews are deported to concentration camps like Sachsenhausen.
- December 1941 The first Norwegian Jew to be killed in a concentration camp is the communist Benjamin Bild.
- 1942 The Finnish authorities hand over eight Jewish refugees, including two children, to Nazi Germany, which is a cobelligerent against the Soviet Union. Seven of these Jews die in Auschwitz.
- November 1942 Norwegian Jews, 532 in all, are arrested and deported to Auschwitz.
- February 1943 Another 158 Jews are deported. Of all of those deported to Auschwitz, only 34 return; 766 Norwegian Jews are killed—between 35 and 40 percent of the entire Jewish population. However, almost half of the Norwegian Jews manage to escape to Sweden and thus escape the Holocaust.
- Late 1943 During a few dramatic weeks after Rosh Hashanah, practically all 7,000 Jews in Denmark manage to escape to Sweden. The Nazis capture some 500 Jews, who are sent to the Theresienstadt concentration camp.

- 1945–1946 In the wake of World War II, some 10,000 survivors of the Holocaust arrive in Sweden. Of these, only some 3,000 stay in Sweden. Most eventually continue on to other destinations, such as the United States and the State of Israel.
- 1951 The Swedish Parliament passes a law on the freedom of religion. Swedish citizens are no longer forced to belong to a religious congregation. As a consequence, the Jewish communities become voluntary organizations. Jews are now allowed to hold any political office, including cabinet minister. Only the position of head of state is still reserved for a member of the Church of Sweden.
- 1956–1972 Political turmoil behind the Iron Curtain in Hungary (1956), Czechoslovakia (1968), and Poland (1969) causes waves of Jewish emigration, also to Scandinavia.
- 1987 Ahmed Rami, a Swedish Muslim, begins broadcasting anti-Semitic programming on the radio station he operates, Radio Islam.
- 1996 The Swedish supreme court rules that a person wearing Nazi symbols may be charged with incitement against an ethnic group.
- 1997 Ahmed Rami is cited for breaking anti-racism laws after posting anti-Semitic materials on his Web site. The Swedish government institutes the Living History Project, a large-scale program to educate the people of Sweden about anti-Semitism.
- 2000 In January, Sweden hosts an international gathering to promote awareness of the Holocaust.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

The first Jews who settled in Scandinavia were often peddlers, minor businesspeople, or artisans active in one of the few fields that were not forbidden for Jews. Later, some Jews came to prosper as businesspeople and merchants. Jews have played a certain role in the development of industry and banking in the Scandinavian countries.

Today, Jews can be found in most professional sectors, including blue-collar professions. However, Jews in Scandinavia are primarily occupied in those professions requiring an academic education or in the arts and media.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

In spite of the relatively small number of Jews in Scandinavia, most of these countries have examples of notable Jews in the fields of culture and science.

Klezmer music has become quite popular: there are both Jewish and non-Jewish bands playing this music, and many international stars have played at the Helsinki Klezmer Festival. When the Helsinki synagogue celebrated its centenary in 2006, a theater play in Yiddish was performed for the first time in several decades.

Several Swedish Jews have been well-known artists. The most notable are painters Ernst Josephson (1851–1906), Eva Bonnier (1857–1909), Hanna Pauli (née Hirsch 1864–1940), and Isaac Grünewald (1889–1946). A number of Swedish Jews have been notable literary historians, such as Henrik Schück (1855–1947) and Martin Lamm (1880–1950), who were also members of the Swedish Academy that selects the Nobel Prize laureate in literature. Another well-known literary historian was Oscar Levertin (1862–1906), who was also an author and poet in his own right. Other Jewish authors in Sweden include Sophie Elkan (1853–1921) and the Nobel Prize laureate Nelly Sachs (1891–1970), who fled to Sweden from her native Germany in 1940. The composer Moses Pergament (1893–1977), the historian Hugo Valentin (1888–1963), the economist Eli Hecksher (1879–1952), and the publisher Albert Bonnier (1820–1900) have also left their mark on Swedish cultural life.

In Norway, the pianist Robert Levin was a respected and well-known pianist both in Norway and internationally. He became the first professor at the College of Music. His daughter, journalist and author Mona Levin, has written a book about her father, in addition to several other books on different topics. She has also been very active in the current debate about Jews and Israel. In science, the psychiatrist Leo Eitinger, an Auschwitz survivor, invented the concept of KZ syndrome—meaning the stress reactions that come many years after release from the concentration camp.

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

The Jewish communities in Scandinavia are small, and the Jewish population is usually quite secularized, although some traditions are still kept. A high rate of assimilation is also typical of Jewish communal life in Scandinavia. The level of participation on the part of the members of the communities is usually high, compared with their number, and most communities offer their members a wide range of social and religious services. There is also a highly developed network of connections between the Jewish communities in Scandinavia, facilitated by the fact that these countries are culturally, linguistically and historically closely linked.

Finland has two Jewish communities today; 90 percent of Finnish Jews belong to the community in Helsinki, whereas the community in Turku is very small (123 members at the end of 2005). Both synagogues follow Orthodox ritual. Although there is a rabbi in Helsinki, the community in Turku has been without a rabbi since 1965. The Jewish community has legal status and the right to levy taxes on its members. Kosher slaughtering is permitted in Finland (it was last discussed in Parliament in 1995), and there is a kosher butcher shop in Helsinki.

In Sweden, most members of the communities in Stockholm and Göteborg belong to Reform or Conservative (Masorti) congregations, although small Orthodox minyanim can be found in both these cities, as well. The Jewish community in Malmö is Orthodox only. Today, some 10 percent of the Swedish Jews are Orthodox, and they mainly descend from immigrants who came to Sweden from Eastern Europe at the turn of the 20th century.

Norway has two synagogues in Norway—one in Trondheim and one in Oslo. The congregations are Orthodox even though the members are mostly secular. In Norway, as in Sweden, kosher slaughter is forbidden.

The Jewish communities in Scandinavia are democratically structured, and officials are elected at assemblies open to all members. In some cases, the community is divided into political parties that compete for the votes of the members at the general assemblies.

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionism, and Existential Problems of the Community

Religiously motivated anti-Judaism has a long tradition in Scandinavia but has all but disappeared in these largely secularized countries. In the 19th century, secular, racially motivated, anti-Semitism flourished in Scandinavia as in the rest of the world. Undoubtedly, anti-Semitism influenced the reluctance on the part of the Scandinavian authorities to accept Jewish refugees fleeing Nazi persecution before and during the World War II. After the World War II, when Germany was defeated and the full horror of the Holocaust became evident, anti-Semitism lost its credibility and was banned to the political fringes.

Anti-Semitism is taboo in Scandinavian mainstream society today. However, in the past decades, growing anti-Zionism in Scandinavia has created a climate where the line between criticism of the State of Israel and anti-Semitism is not always upheld, especially among left-wing groups. At times, leftists with a Jewish background, and sometimes even those born in Israel, play a key role in this discourse. Another factor that has contributed to a rise in anti-Semitism in Scandinavian society is the immigration from Arab and Muslim countries, especially to Sweden, Denmark, and Norway—Finland and Iceland have fewer such immigrants. Some of these immigrants or their descendants harbor anti-Jewish sentiments that have on occasion led to attacks on Jews, most notably in the wake of the second Intifada. With that said, neither anti-Semitism nor anti-Zionism constitute an existential threat to the Jews in Scandinavia. If anything threatens continued Jewish life in Scandinavia, it is the negative demographic trends as a result of an aging Jewish population and low birthrates in combination with a high level of assimilation.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

The Jewish communities in Scandinavia have never been particularly large, and today they seem to be disappearing. As an example, the Jewish community in Stockholm has lost 20 percent of its members in the past few years, and the trend is similar in many other communities. In Iceland, there is no community at all. The general decline in the number of Jews in Scandinavia is largely attributable to three factors. First, the rate of assimilation is high, as many nonobservant Jews see little reason for endogamy. Second, traditionally, the Jewish community was reinforced by immigration from Eastern Europe, but after the Holocaust, the Jewish communities there were wiped out. Third, religiously observant Jews tend to leave Scandinavia for places with a richer Jewish life, mainly by means of aliyah to Israel. An exception to the general trend is the Jewish community in Finland, which numerically stands its ground, partly because of immigration of Jews from the former Soviet Union.

Selected Bibliography

Bachner, Henrik. 1999. Återkomsten. Antisemitism i Sverige efter 1945. Stockholm: Natur och Kultur.

- Bergsson, Snorri G. 1998. "The Aryan Cradle: Iceland and the 'Jewish Question.'" Kulanu Web site. <http://www.kulanu.org/iceland/iceland.html> (accessed May 8, 2008).
- Blüdnikow, Bent. 1985. "Dansk-jødisk historic—en forskningsoversigt." Fortid og Nutid 1: 13–31.
- Broberg, Gunnar, Harald Runblom, and Mattias Tydén. 1988. Judiskt liv i Norden. Uppsala, Sweden: Svanberg & Tydén.
- Christensen, Karsten. 1986. "Dansk jødisk genealogi: Part 1" Tidsskrift for Dansk Jødisk Historie 23: 18–22.
- Fischer, David. 1996. Judiskt liv. En undersökning bland medlemmar i Stockholms judiska församling. Uppsala, Sweden: Megilla-Förlaget.
- Harviainen, Tapani. 2000. "The Jews in Finland and World War II." Nordisk Judaistik-Scandinavian Jewish Studies 21: 157–166
- Jewish Community, Stockholm. <http://www.jf-stockholm.org> (accessed May 8, 2008).
- JUS [Jewish Youth Organization in Sweden]. <http://jusungdom.org> (accessed May 8, 2008).
- Katz, Per. 1988. "De første jøder i Danmark." In Judisk liv i Norden, edited by Gunnar Broberg, Harald Runblom, and Matthias Týden, 71–98. Uppsala, Sweden: Uppsala University, Centre for Multiethnic Research.
- Levin, Elias. 1994. Den gamle jødiske begravelsesplads i Møllegade 1684–1994, 1–2. Copenhagen: E. Levin.
- Lomfors, Ingrid. 1996. Förlorad barndom—återvunnet liv. De judiska flyktningbarnen från Nazityskland. Göteborg, Sweden: Historiska institutionen Univ.
- Margolinsky, Julius. 1978. Jødiske dødsfald i Danmark 1693–1976. Copenhagen: Dansk Historisk Håndbogsforlag.
- Pentikäinen, Juha, and Veikko Anttonen. 1995. "The Jews in Finland." In Cultural Minorities in Finland. An Overview towards Cultural Policy, edited by Juha Pentikäinen and Marja Hiltunen, 163–166. Helsinki, Finland: Publications of the Finnish National Commission for Unesco. No 66.
- Sjögren, Karin. 2001. Judar i det svenska folkhemmet. Minne och identitet i Judisk krönika 1948–1958. Eslöv: Ostlings bokforlag Symposion.
- Svensson, Anna. 1995. Nöden. En shtetl i Lund. Lund, Sweden: Gamla Lund.
- Valentin, Hugo. 2004. Judarna i Sverige. Från 1774 till 1950-talet. Stockholm, Sweden: Judiska museet.
- Vilhjálmsón, Vilhjálmur. 2004. "Iceland, the Jews, and Anti-Semitism, 1625–2004." Jewish Political Studies Review 16 (3–4, fall): <http://www.jcpa.org/phas/phas-vilhjalmur-f04.htm> (accessed June 3, 2008).
- Whitehead, Þór. 1980. Ófriður í aðsigi [Approaching War]. Reykjavík, Iceland: Almenna bókafélagið.

Intermarriage in Scandinavia

Lars Dencik

---

In 2000, a questionnaire entitled "Questions about Jewish Life" was sent to the affiliated members of the Jewish communities in Sweden, Finland, and Norway. The questions related to issues such as Jewish identity, degree of observance of Jewish traditions, and practices.

A “Jewish community” in this context means an organization of which a Jew (according to Halachic rules) can become a member. Membership is voluntary and implies paying an income-related fee (“tax”) to the community. The Jewish communities in the countries surveyed organize synagogal, educational, social, and cultural services. It is estimated that between a third and a half of the Jews living in Sweden, Finland, and Norway are affiliated members of a Jewish community. An estimated 1,300 Jews currently live in Finland; only slightly more live in Norway. Sweden has by far the largest Jewish community in Scandinavia—around 17,000 could be counted as Jews.

Marriage Patterns

There are no significant differences between the countries with respect to civil status. Approximately two-thirds of the members of the Jewish communities in the investigated Scandinavian countries are married or in marriage-like relationships. Close to 10 percent of the respondents in each of the countries are divorced, and an additional 3 percent have established a new post-divorce relationship. Around 13 percent are single, having never been married, and little more than 10 percent are widows or widowers.

Married respondents were asked whether their partner is Jewish or not, and if the partner is Jewish whether he or she is Jewish by birth or conversion. With respect to this there are considerable differences among the three countries. Of those members of the Jewish communities that are married, in Sweden 31 percent live with a non-Jewish partner, in Finland 51 percent live with a non-Jewish partner, and in Norway the corresponding figure is 43 percent.

The composition of the category “Jewish partner” also differs among the countries: 63 percent of the married members of the Jewish communities in Sweden are married to a partner that is “Jewish by birth” and an additional 5 percent are “Jewish by conversion.” In Finland the corresponding figures are 35 percent and 14 percent, respectively, and in Norway, 43 percent and 14 percent, respectively.

A major factor explaining the differences in Jewish marriage patterns as observed is the size of the Jewish communities in the respective countries. The likelihood of meeting a Jewish partner is, of course, higher in a country with a larger Jewish population. The situation in Finland and Norway demonstrates that the reverse holds as well: The lower the likelihood of meeting a suitable Jewish partner, the higher ones propensity to engage with a non-Jewish partner.

Attitudes toward Inter-marriage

Generally, the affiliated Jews in the Nordic countries support the idea that inter-marriage should be avoided on a societal level. When asked about the same issue but with a personal nuance, the respondents answered differently. In all countries most affiliated members of the Jewish communities could, as a matter of principle, consider marrying a non-Jew (although most of them are in actual fact already married, and most of them, except in Finland, are married to a Jewish partner). The differences in attitude among the three countries largely reflect the differences in factual conditions: Sweden, although the most religiously liberal of the three Jewish communities, has the largest group of individuals who reject the idea of marrying a non-Jew. Finland, being an Orthodox community but also the smallest community (Turku) in the investigation has, by far, the smallest percentage of people who responded No to the question "Could you, as a matter of principle, consider marriage to a non-Jew?" In this, the smallest and most remote Jewish population (both geographically and linguistically), there is scant potential in the Jewish marriage market. Making virtue out of necessity is likely the operative principle underlying the Finnish Jews' responses.

The hypothetical proposition of deciding for oneself "in principle" is quite different from approving or disapproving of one's offspring's decision to out-marry. It is noteworthy that only a minority of affiliated members of the Jewish communities in all three Nordic countries would try to prevent their children from marrying a non-Jewish partner. It is also noteworthy that the largest proportion (26 percent) of potential parental obstructers is found in liberal Sweden, which has the relatively smallest proportion of intermarriage, whereas in Norway, with its small Orthodox community but larger proportion of actual intermarriages, a considerably smaller proportion of parents (15.3 percent) could imagine themselves fighting their child's decision to out-marry. Again, these findings demonstrate the crucial role—more crucial, perhaps, than religious and ideological convictions—that the sheer size of a community plays in influencing the attitudes of actively involved Jews toward Jewish societal issues.

In Sweden, for reasons already indicated, a much larger proportion of the Jewish community than in Finland and Norway is married to a partner who is also Jewish. In Finland and Norway, as compared with Sweden, a relatively larger proportion of Jewish partners were not born Jewish but have converted to Judaism. There are also marked differences in the marital patterns of men and women: in all three countries a sizably larger proportion of female members of the Jewish communities are married to a partner who was born Jewish. Particularly striking are the differences in all three countries with respect to living with a partner who has converted to Judaism. There is a far larger (three to four times) proportion of men whose wife converted to Judaism than there are women whose husband is a convert.

It is either more attractive, important, or less of a problem for a non-Jewish woman to convert to Judaism and to share the religious orientation and lifestyle of her husband than it is for a non-Jewish man to convert to the religious orientation and lifestyle of his Jewish wife.

More than 9 of 10 men and women living in a Jewish couple have children, and it seems to be of minor or no importance whether the partner is born Jewish or has converted to Judaism. In mixed marriages, however, the propensity to have a child is lower. Close to 25 percent of these relationships were childless at the time of this investigation.

Child Rearing

Circumcision of boys is a highly deviating practice in the Nordic (Scandinavian) countries. Nowadays in Scandinavian countries, circumcision is publicly denounced as primitive, cruel, inhumane, barbaric, and a violation of the rights of the child. To what extent do the couples consisting of at least one affiliated member of a Jewish community adhere to the Jewish commitment of male infant circumcision? Among the Jewish couples, the commandment of having one's son circumcised is highly observed, but it is considerably less so among the mixed couples. Most amazing, however, is the fact that in mixed couples, regardless of whether the male or female parent is non-Jewish, the degree of observance of the Jewish mitzvah is notably higher than the theoretically anticipated 50 percent. In relationships wherein the male party is Jewish, close to three of four non-Jewish wives accept that this basic Jewish mitzvah is carried out. The figure is slightly lower if it is the mother who is Jewish, but still close to two-thirds of the non-Jewish (i.e., uncircumcised) fathers do not prevent their sons from being circumcised. A tentative conclusion might be that in mixed marriages the Jewish identity markers tend to penetrate the relationship so deeply that even Halachically non-Jewish children become physically marked with a symbolic Jewish identity. The highest degree of observance of the mitzvah of circumcision is found in couples wherein the female party has converted to Judaism, whereas the lowest degree of observance takes place in couples where the father is a non-Jew.

The lighting of Shabbat candles is quite a widespread custom. More than 80 percent of those respondents living with a Jewish partner do so at least sometimes. Interestingly, those who share their life with a partner who has converted to Judaism are even more observant of this mitzvah than are those who live with a partner who is a Jew by birth. The tendency to be more observant if the partner is a convert holds also with respect to keeping a kosher home. The mitzvah of kashruth, however, is far less observed in the Nordic Scandinavian countries—where it takes a real effort to obtain kosher food (shehita is prohibited both in Sweden and Norway)—than is the custom of lighting Shabbat candles. Amazingly, as many as 46 percent of the men married to a non-Jewish woman at least sometimes light Shabbat candles—a habit traditionally carried out by the wife—and 17 percent of these men at least keep partly kosher at home.

Weinuka

Jewish life in Scandinavia is, of course, embedded in the culture and customs of the surrounding dominantly Christian (albeit secular Christian) society. One of the strong and very popular traditions in these societies is the celebration of Christmas, but only 4 percent of the Jewish homes where both spouses are Jewish by birth have a Christmas tree. However, there is a Christmas tree in 11 percent of the homes in which the male partner is a Jew by conversion, whereas this is the case in only proportionally half as many homes where the converted party is female. Furthermore, 38 percent of the homes where the male partner is not Jewish have a Christmas tree, compared with 48 percent of the homes wherein the female partner is a non-Jew.

In about 72 percent of the mixed marriages, regardless of whether the male or female spouse is Jewish, one gives Christmas gifts. This custom also holds in approximately 25 percent of the Jewish households in which one of the partners has converted (slightly more if the wife is a convert), whereas Christmas gifts are given in less than 20 percent of the homes inhabited by a couple made up of two Jewish-born spouses. Finally, there are families in which one lights both Shabbat candles and Christmas lights, or where the family both keeps kosher and has a Christmas tree.

Conclusions

Many Scandinavian Jews celebrate Hanukkah, hold Passover Seders, circumcise their children and hang mezuzot, while not as many keep Shabbat or fast on Yom Kippur. A possible explanation for these findings is that the holidays of Hanukkah, Purim, and Passover are national celebrations wherein Jews commemorate and celebrate the persistence of Jewish peoplehood in the face of adversity and oppression. As a minority ethnic group, Scandinavian Jews can relate to these struggles. Shabbat and kashruth, on the other hand, are more private, personal devotional rituals. The case of the mezuzah is interesting, as 80 percent of Scandinavian Jewish homes hang one on their doorpost. For those who can read the symbol, a mezuzah is a clear sign of a Jewish home. Non-Jewish neighbors, however, would most likely not notice this discreet symbol. The mezuzah is a sophisticated symbol that indicates to other members of the Jewish community that one is Jewish without alarming one's non-Jewish peers. The findings support the overall observation that most Scandinavian Jews view their Jewishness as an ethnic identity rather than as a religion.

The Scandinavian Jewry presently lives in a kind of "Swedish smorgasbord" situation, where both Jewish and non-Jewish traditions and social customs are available to the population. The result is a kind of "smorgasbord Judaism" implying that Jews in these countries may feel free to pick or reject what they want among the traditions, to mix according to their will, and to define their own personal mélange of Judaism. In such a sociocultural context, not only customs and ideals but also marriages tend to become mixed.

Selected Bibliography

- Dencik, Lars. 2003. "'Jewishness' in Postmodernity: The Case of Sweden." In New Jewish Identities: Contemporary Europe and Beyond, edited by Zvi Gitelman, Barry Kosmin, and Andras Kovacs, 75–104. Budapest, Hungary: Central European University Press.
- Dencik, Lars. 2006. "'Homo Zappiens'—A European-Jewish Way of Life in the Era of Globalisation." In Turning the Kaleidoscope: Perspectives on European Jewry, edited by Sandra Lustig and Ian Leveson, 79–105. Oxford, UK: Berghahn Books.
- Dencik, Lars. 2006. Judendom i Sverige—en sociologisk belysning [Judaism in Sweden—A Sociological Elucidation]. Uppsala: Swedish Science Press.

Jews in Denmark

Bent Blüdnikow

---

General Population: 5,237,000

Jewish Population: 8,000

Percent of Population: 0.13 percent

Jewish Population by City: Most Jews reside in Copenhagen. There are also small communities in Odense and Aarhus. The great majority of Danish Jews are Ashkenazim with roots in Central and Eastern Europe. Although intermarriage has taken its toll, Jewish life has been bolstered by the arrival of Jewish immigrants, particularly from Israel and other European countries. Moreover, in recent years, children of some of the refugees from Poland, with tenuous Jewish links, have begun to take an active part in communal life.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Sephardi traders and court Jews from Portugal and the Netherlands, Sephardi Jews of Hamburg, Ashkenazi Jews from Germany, Austria, Poland, and Russia

Languages Spoken: In the 18th century, many Jews lived in close proximity to each other in central Copenhagen, and they spoke to each other in Yiddish. When they wrote, it was either in Yiddish or Hebrew before Danish became the mother language of Danish Jews.

---

Historical Overview

1592 The first Jew in Denmark is registered in Elsinore under the name of Jochim Jode (Jochim the Jew). His Jewish identity is the subject of a careful study by Karsten Christensen, who concludes that it is probably correct to assume that he was indeed Jewish. However, presumably there are only quite small numbers of Jews in Denmark proper before the middle of the 17th century, although some have arrived in Denmark under false Christian names. Such is the case with Duarte de Lima, who assumed a Christian name while living in Denmark in the 17th century.

1592–1700 Jews actively participate in trade close to the Danish border.

1619 The Danish king, Christian IV, employs Jews in his court, giving them the license to direct the royal mint.

1620 The Christian Church begins its attempts to convert the Jews, though in general with little success. Although a Jew is successfully baptized in the Cathedral Church of Our Lady in Copenhagen as early as 1620, baptisms do not become more common until the end of the century. Both the Church and the authorities place great store in these ceremonies, and they are often performed in the presence of all the city elite.

1640 The first major Jewish congregations are set up under the King Christian IV of Denmark when he acquires towns north of Hamburg from the counts of Schaumburg.

1640s Benjamin Musaphia, a well-known Sephardi doctor, was appointed royal physician to the Danish court by Christian IV in 1646. Mussaphia is a typical representative of the many highly respected Jewish doctors in the 17th century. He also publishes a small book in which he describes his brief meeting with the Danish king and their discussion on the existence of mermaids.

- 1651 The king issues laws and ordinances directed against illegal Jews, attempting to keep illegal Jews from permanently residing in places such as Schleswig-Holstein. The starting point for the attitude toward immigrants is the fact that the king actually preferred the Sephardi Jews but could accept Ashkenazi Jews provided they either have enough money or are enterprising merchants. In reality he mainly gets Ashkenazi Jews, not all of whom have money or are particularly enterprising. Ashkenazi Jews come to dominate the Copenhagen congregation, for the Sephardi Jews are so few in number they have difficulty gathering the 10 men required for a divine service. The fact that a large number of Jews are given residence permits in Glückstadt, Altona, and elsewhere, is often likely the result of their wanting a place of refuge when anti-Semitism gets out of control on German territory. Even at this time, the king of Denmark has acquired a reputation for being tolerant. But there is no doubt that the king's mercantilistic policy results in a new social group providing financial and commercial benefit to the country, though the importance of their activities should not be exaggerated.
- 1659 The first known Jewish service is held in Zealand during the Swedish occupation by Jews who are with the Swedish army outside Copenhagen. They are arrested in the middle of the Yom Kippur service.
- 1667 Jews in Altona are given permission to travel and trade freely in Denmark, laying the foundations for a more significant Jewish presence in Denmark proper.
- 1670–1680s A vehement religious awakening takes place among Jews, as a prophet by the name of Sabbatai Zevi announces he is the new messiah. Both during Zevi's lifetime and after his death, the religious movement has violent repercussions in Jewish communities.
- 1670–1700 A total of 56 residence permits are issued, 26 of which apply to Hamburg, Altona, and Glückstadt. However, these permits say nothing about the total number of Jews, which, as previously mentioned, is considerably greater. Altona that becomes the most important town, but Hamburg nevertheless remains home to a large number of the most important Sephardi families. These families, who often collaborate with each other, come to be of considerable importance to the Danish economy and trade, and as Court Jews, they are responsible for supplying jewels, costly textiles, and other luxury goods to the Danish Court. The Ashkenazi Jews eventually take over the role of the Sephardis, and with their smaller firms and their business activities, they come to play quite a significant part and come to numerically dominate the Copenhagen congregation. Their family connections in other European countries are instrumental in their ability to acquire the right goods for the Danish market.
- The congregations in Denmark achieve a high degree of autonomy, though they appear to accept the decisions of the Danish court. They have synagogues, burial grounds, associations of Jewish butchers (Fredericia), and much more.
- 1670s Jews move northward to Ribe and Copenhagen, starting with Hamburg Sephardi Jews and then Ashkenazi Jews.

- 1678 Private letters by Arthur Arnheim, in Yiddish, concerning the Jews of Copenhagen indicate that there are 15 from Hamburg/Altona in the capital and they play an important part in the city's trade. Most have no passport and are therefore, strictly speaking, in the city illegally; but it is not unusual for laws on safe conduct, royal licences, and the like, not to be observed. These Jews likely have relatives and possibly servants, so their numbers are greater than a mere 15. The strong links between the Jews in Denmark proper and those in Hamburg/Altona are established during these years and maintained for several centuries.
- 1684 The king grants Jews permission to hold services in Copenhagen. The Jews in the capital thereby establish a foothold they will be able to exploit. At the same time, Jews settle in a number of provincial towns, including Ribe, Fredericia, Nakskov, and Nyborg among others. Numbers are modest: Until 1700, there are 17 residence permits in Copenhagen, 15 in Fredericia, and fewer in the other provincial towns. A considerable number of Jews are in Denmark without permission, and as already noted, permits only include the applicants themselves and not their families and servants.
- 1684–1686 Gabriel Milan serves as governor of the Danish West Indies, which is today known as the U.S. Virgin Islands. However, he is accused of corruption and finally hanged in Copenhagen.
- 1693 Land for a Jewish cemetery is purchased in Møllegade.
- 1695 When extremely wealthy Sephardi Jew Samuel Teixeira is in Copenhagen, the Sephardi Jews gather for a service, although they have still not been given royal permission to hold one. They are arrested, but soon released again, and thereafter given their own license. However, the Sephardi congregation never plays any significant part in numerical terms.
- 1696–1706 Holger Paulli publishes, altogether, 32 pamphlets reflecting the Pietist ideas of the time and the expectations of the coming of a Messiah, which Sabbatai has awakened among the Jews. Paulli has plans for equipping a Danish army to liberate Palestine and reinstate the Jews. Ingratitude is the way of the world, and Paulli is thrown into prison in Amsterdam but later released. He ends his days in Copenhagen in 1714.
- 17th century German Jews throughout the country are subject to the chief rabbinate in Altona, and in several instances the chief rabbi interferes in the affairs of other congregations. Copenhagen is still not of decisive importance, and there are almost as many Jews in Fredericia as there are in Copenhagen. Also, the communities in Schleswig-Holstein grow in size and significance to Denmark. The congregations in Hamburg, Altona, and Wandsbek together make up dynamic Jewish centers. By the end of the 17th century, there is a notable influx, and Jews come to play a part in the growth of trade and business activities. Some Jews are allowed to set up as manufacturers of textiles and tobacco. Also, through the activities of court Jews acting on behalf of the Danish royal court, Jews came to play a not insignificant role for the Danish state.
- 18th century The Northern European Jewry experience some dramatic controversies. Relations between the congregations in Altona and Fredericia are strained as the result of a debate on whether the chief rabbinate in Altona has jurisdiction over the Jews in Fredericia.

- 1700–1770 Anti-Semitism is part of life—Jews live relatively isolated from the rest of society and a section of the Jewish population finds it difficult to make ends meet. When Copenhagen suffers a great fire in 1728, a group of Jews is arrested and accused of starting it.
- 1711 In the year of the plague, the tax lists indicate that 36 Jewish adults and 48 children live in Copenhagen. Two families had left and four others are not included because they are not subject to tax. But the poor families not included in the taxation lists, and the foreign Jews merely passing through, or only in Copenhagen for a short period, must also be taken into consideration.
- 1719 Jews open a synagogue in Fredericia, which had become a town with freedom of religion in 1682.
- 1720s Jews can register in Svendborg, which is home to several Jewish families throughout the 18th century, although in 1756 the town judge issues a warning that “all Jews” would “surreptitiously introduce forbidden goods and bring harm to the public by dint of usury and dishonesty.”
- 1726 The number of Jews has increased to about 65 “families,” but in addition there are still many without passes, many poor Jews, and many Jews on visits.
- 1727 The authorities issue a police notice forbidding people to insult Jews in the open street, which confirms a general anti-Jewish sentiment in Denmark.
- 1729 The Gedeløcke Affair refers to an attorney by the name of Gedeløcke who had shown an interest in Judaism. When he dies, the rumour arises that he had converted to the Jewish faith. Accordingly, there is general reluctance to bury him in an ordinary Christian cemetery, though a reason is found to bury him in the garrison cemetery, Garnisons Kirkegård. When rumors about Gedeløcke’s conversion persisted, however, he is exhumed, and the Jews are forced to bury him in their own burial ground. The entire affair and the funeral procession to Møllegade is a humiliation to the resident Jews. The events are well described in a number of scholarly works, and they suggest that the Copenhagen population does not like the Jews.
- 1733 There are Jews in Nakskov and Maribo, and there are Jews in Zealand from the middle of the 18th century.
- 1750s–1800s The Jews in Germany increasingly become part of German society, as indeed the Danish Jews also wish to do. The German Haskalah movement, with Moses Mendelssohn at its head, makes a great impression on Danish Jews. Mendelssohn’s thoughts of a community in which Jews can be equal citizens, and his battle for education and cultural enlightenment, asserts itself in Denmark, not only because he has friends and two brothers-in-law in Copenhagen, and because there are other close family ties between German and Danish Jews, but largely because the Danish Jews are helped by the general economic prosperity and the general trend toward education and enlightenment that characterizes Europe at that time. One of Mendelssohn’s close collaborators, moreover, is Jacob Hartwig Wessely, who was born and bred in Copenhagen.

Throughout this entire period, a bitter struggle is taking place between the champions of reform who are trying to modernize the Jewish congregation and the traditionalists who are doggedly attempting to preserve the Jewish community as it had been, with religion and tradition as the essential values and the group of older leaders of the congregation unchallenged in their decision-making role.

It is more than simply an ideological and religious struggle. Mixed up in this confrontation are personal and social elements. The group of reform Jews is dominated by younger, affluent Jews who will not accept the old style of leadership, wanting to follow the fashions of the time in intellectual matters and dress and to achieve success in Danish society.

- 1757 Among the 90,000 inhabitants in Copenhagen, there are about 1,200 Jews, to whom, as always, could be added visiting or illegal Jews being given shelter in the city. The economic upswing is the result of Denmark's advantageous foreign policy during international wars and crises, which allows the country to profit from exporting and shipping. During these days of overseas trade, Denmark experiences a hitherto unknown increase in wealth, and a number of Jewish business and finance figures are also able to make use of the favorable trading conditions. About 70 of the approximately 250 Jewish families living in Copenhagen are considered to be wealthy. About 100 other Jewish families belong to the middle classes, and the remainder belong to the lower classes who have to make their way on the basis of small businesses, hawking or even begging and thieving. Among the Copenhagen Jews there are at the same time various shadowy businesspeople whose operations border on the criminal.
- 1760 Some 700 Jews are living in Denmark, according to M. L. Nathanson's book Historisk Fremstilling af Jødernes Forhold og Stilling i Danmark, navnlig i Kjøbenhavn.
- 1766 Jews acquire their own synagogue in Læderstræde. Before this, the Jews had held services in various private apartments.
- 1770–1772 Johann Struensee's revolutionary regime in Denmark brings the idea of freedom of speech and the concept of equality for the Jews. From the middle of the 18th century, the intellectual and physical walls that have isolated the Jewish community from the Christians begin to be broken down.
- 1770–1814 The period is characterized by an increase in financial well-being, an extensive reform of the Jewish community, and, crowning these developments, the 1814 emancipation.
- 1780s–1790s Poor Jews are found in the provinces, where they trade with the "peasantry," and not least in Copenhagen where they signify a growing problem.
- 1787 The confrontation between reformists and traditionalists comes to a head, and the opposition complains to the government about its situation. Relatively reliable figures for the number of Jews in the provinces at this time indicate that there were already Jewish homes in a large number of Danish provincial towns before 1787, and by 1787 there are 354 Jews living in 16 provincial towns: 7 in Zealand, 2 in Lolland, 3 in Funen, and 4 in Jutland.
- 1788 Jews are given access to the guilds.

- 1791 The government helps with a temporary compromise dividing power between the reformist and traditionalist groups. At the same time, a series of reforms of the congregations and of Jewish conditions is initiated.
- 1795 The government sets up a commission to examine the congregation's circumstances, which results in a series of publications and satirical prints.
- 1796 The commission's report paves the way for fundamental changes in the administration of the congregation and for equality with their Christian fellows in most areas.
- 1798 Jews are given the right to enter into mixed marriages and to settle wherever they want in the kingdom.
- 1801 There are 666 Jews residing in nine provincial towns in Zealand, two in Lolland, one in Falster, eight in Funen, one in Langeland, and seven in market towns in Jutland. The figure has risen to 27 percent from 19 percent in 1787.
- 1803 The Flour and Bread Society is set up to ensure cheap flour and bread.
- 1805 A school for poor boys is established, and a school for poor girls is established in 1810. The two schools undertake a major task in teaching the children Danish, so Yiddish is no longer the first language of the Jews.
- 1806 Crown Prince Frederik seeks fresh initiatives in a move toward equality for the Jews. He writes that he was inspired by Napoleon's policy of friendship to the Jews.
- 1809 The reformist Jews achieve power in the decision-making body in the community, and the way is thereby opened anew for reforms in collaboration with the government. Jews are also given the right to become soldiers and to be admitted to the university. However, there is still widespread social discrimination, and complete equality has not yet been attained.
- 1810 Jews who have lived in Copenhagen for more than three years are given permission to stay. This an unusual form of tolerance from a European perspective.
- 1813–1814 Two opposite Jewish movements are clearly seen during these years. The movement toward emancipation that has been under way since the 1770s culminates in the 1814 emancipation decree, but, at the same time, the anti-Semitism that has long been latent is reinforced. Evidence of this includes the protracted public debate—known as the literary Jewish controversy—on the position of Jews in society, which starts in 1813 and continues until 1819.
- August 18, 1813 A definitive royal resolution is drawn up, after which the Chancery issues a final decree and regulations for the Copenhagen Jewish community are approved.
- March 29, 1814 A royal decree gives equal rights to Jews. The reformist leader M. L. Nathanson makes a great personal contribution and, by virtue of the good relationship he has with the king and Danish decision-makers, may have had an influence on the course of events. During these years, the Danish state has taken up some enormous loans from Jewish lenders, and this collaboration might also have encouraged the king in his willingness to introduce reforms. Finally, there is a vehement public debate on the position of the Jews in society, and this debate, in which important Danish citizens take the part of the Jews and speak out on behalf of equality, might have influenced the Danish authorities.

- 1818 The census for all Denmark shows that the Jewish population has increased: there are 3,907 Jews, of whom 1,394 (36 percent) reside in the provinces. Many Jews are still making their way on the basis of small enterprises of various kinds and the sale of old textiles. Most Jews in the provinces are tradespeople, but the provinces also come into contact with many itinerant Jews visiting local markets. Loan businesses had often provided Jews with a source of income, and in Denmark, too, this is a favored occupation. Thus, the state-owned pawnbroking establishment known as Det Kongelige Assistenthus, which provides small loans to Copenhageners, is put in the hands of Jews.
- 1819 Anti-Jewish riots suddenly appear in various Danish towns, including Copenhagen, Odense, Slagelse, and Elsinore. Especially in Copenhagen, serious disturbances take place, with interruptions from September 1819 to the early part of 1820. This is the most serious unrest in the reign of Frederik VI, and it encompasses scuffles involving several hundred people. Jewish apartments have their windows smashed, and there are attacks on individual Jews. A state of emergency is proclaimed in Copenhagen when the police show themselves to be incapable of controlling events, and the military is given permission to use weapons against the populace. The king and his government no doubt fear that the violent disturbances could develop into a serious rebellion. The serious anti-Jewish disturbances have a drastic effect on the Jews. One reaction is to express hatred of the Christians, as a Jew living in Borgergade does, in 1820, when he empties a bucket of water over people in the street, shouting "Christian dogs." Another common reaction is to seek assimilation by converting to Christianity. After 1820 there is a rapid increase in the number of conversions. But behind this wave of conversions there is not only the fear of new anti-Semitic demonstrations, but also the desire to get rid of a burdensome ethnic and religious inheritance as well as in some cases an honest desire to become a Christian and believe in Jesus. It is thus symptomatic that M. L. Nathanson, the leader of the Jewish community, has his children baptized.
- 1830s Developments signify a golden age for the Danish Jews in terms of an increase in affluence, education, and social significance. Meanwhile, there is first another anti-Jewish phase that manifests itself precisely in 1830 as revolutionary currents are spreading through Europe.
- 1830–1890 Rabbi A. A. Wolff begins his long period in office as chief rabbi in the big new synagogue built in Krystalgade. He serves as a conservative compromise between the two wings, in which many of the traditional elements of Judaism have been preserved, meaning the reform wing's most radical proposals have not been accepted. Nevertheless, some Orthodox groups in the community refuse to accept Wolff's line, and this, combined with personal controversies, leads to a split in which a minority form their own congregation in the middle of the century.
- 1848 The constitution ensured Jews of legal equality. Danish Jews experience a high degree of stability in their own community in addition to a successful life in Danish society. This stability, however, must not be confused with internal unity.

1870 The arrival of the cultural movement that comes to be known as Modern Denmark marks a notable watershed in the history of the Jews. Many conversions and mixed marriages have already made great inroads in the formal Jewish congregation, but this has not necessarily diminished the Jewish sense of community. Many Jewish converts marry each other, and it was common—as it also was in Germany, for instance—for the Jewish way of life to be transformed under powerful influences while at the same time surviving as something different from what today would be understood as Danish.

1900–1917 Some 6,000–7,000 East European Jews come to Copenhagen, but about half continue on to London and New York. The new Jews in Denmark are young people who have left Czarist Russia and moved west hoping to create a better life. Relations between the immigrant Jews from Eastern Europe and the old Danish Jewish community are tense. The Danish Jewish families do not think they have anything in common with the new arrivals, and they fear the poor Jews, many of whom are often socialists, will undermine the position of the Jewish minority in Denmark. To avoid this, the Danish Jewish community works actively to move poor Jews further west. Neither do the Danish authorities look kindly on the East European Jews. They fear they are revolutionary socialists—as indeed some of them are—and there is an unwillingness to risk their needing financial support and thus becoming a burden on the community. And so attempts are made to get rid of them in various ways. A Yiddish-speaking environment is created in the old part of Copenhagen. In many areas, the history of the Eastern European Jews in Denmark is also a success story, as within a generation these people succeed in creating better lives for themselves and their children. Meanwhile, relations with the Danish Jewish community are constantly strained, and only after World War II did the two groups come together in a common social framework.

The emergence of Modern Denmark and modern political movements bring new potentials and new dangers for Danish Jews. For instance, there is the hope of a new, just world in which no distinction will be made between Jews and Christians. The young intellectual generation of Jews is strongly attracted to the radicalism represented by Georg Brandes and others, where current issues are discussed without any thought of faith or ethnic background. No study has yet been made of the situation, but the mere presence of so many Jewish names in the young radical movement and in the political party known as the Radical Left indicates a strong Jewish commitment to the cause. Among the leaders in this radical movement are Herman Heilbuth, Ivar Berendsen, Herman Trier, and the Brandes brothers.

1917 The Danish authorities effectively close the borders to further immigration, and it is not until the 1930s that a fresh wave of Jews attempts to come to Denmark.

1930s German Jews begin to make their way to Denmark. Denmark becomes a magnet for Jews from Germany, Austria, and Poland. Many, however, are refused entry at the border, and those who are allowed to enter are usually given only a six-month visa and no work permit. From the start of the 1930s, the Danish authorities make it clear that they will not allow further Jewish immigration, and later that decade, the minister of justice, K. K. Steinckc provides a clear statement on Danish policy, which is that German Jews are not to be considered refugees, while maintaining that German laws on the Jews are legitimate civil legislation.

1940–1945 Danish Jews are evacuated and illegally transported to Sweden, 1943 About 500 Jews are captured and sent to the Theresienstadt concentration camp.

1960s A number of Polish Jews flee to Denmark.

1969 The Israelis government presents the people of Denmark with the statue Wounded Woman by Israeli artist Bernard Reder in appreciation for the support Danes provided Jews during World War II.

1983 Queen Margrethe attends a ceremony at the Copenhagen synagogue to celebrate the 150th anniversary of the building's opening.

2004 The Jewish Museum, the first museum for a minority in Denmark, opens in Copenhagen.

2005 Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen apologizes for Denmark sending Jews to concentration camps during World War II.

Selected Bibliography

- Blüdnikow, Bent. 1985. "Dansk-jødisk historic—en forskningsoversigt." Fortid og Nutid 1: 13–31.
- Buckser, Andrew. 2003. After the Rescue: Jewish Identity and Community in Contemporary Denmark. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Christensen, Karsten. 1986. "Dansk jødisk genealogi-1." Tidsskrift for Dansk Jødisk Historie 23: 18–22.
- Christensen, Karsten. 1987. "Dansk jødisk genealogi-2." Tidsskrift for Dansk Jødisk Historie 23: 40–44.
- Dübeck, Inger. 1987. "Fremmedrettens udvikling i Danmark ca. 1700–1914." In Fremmede i Danmark. 400 års fremmedpolitik, edited by Bent Blüdnikow, 13–47. Odense: Odense Universitetsforlag.
- Goldberger, Leo, ed. 1987. The Rescue of the Danish Jews: Moral Courage Under Stress. New York: New York University Press.
- Israel, Jonathan I. 1985. European Jewry in the Age of Mercantilism 1550–1750. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.
- Levin, Elias. 1986. Jødiske gravstene 1886–1900 på Mosaik Vestre. Copenhagen: Self-published.
- Levin, Elias. 1994. Den gamle jødiske begravelsesplads i Møllegade 1684–1994, 1–2. Copenhagen: Self-published.
- Linvald, Axel. 1921. "Af Jødernes Frigørelshistorie." Tidsskrift for Jødisk Historie og Literatur 25: 340–358, 379–415.
- Margolinsky, Julius. 1978. Jødiske dødsfald i Danmark 1693–1976. Copenhagen: Dansk Historisk Håndbogsforlag.

Jews in Finland

Svante Lundgren

---

General Population: 5,255,580 (end of 2005)

Jewish Population: 1,500–2,000

Percent of Population: Less than 0.5 per million

Jewish Population by City: 1,200 live in Helsinki, about 200 in Turku, and about 50 in Tampere

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Russian immigrants in the 19th century

Languages Spoken: Finnish and Swedish; there are some Yiddish speakers among the oldest Jews.

---

Historical Overview

Before 1809 Under Swedish law, Jews are allowed to settle only in three major towns in the kingdom, none of them in the territory of Finland. Jews sometimes visit the country, and a few Jewish converts to Christianity settle there.

1809 As a consequence of the defeat of Sweden in the Russian-Swedish war of 1808–1809 (part of the Napoleonic Wars), Sweden loses control of Finland, and an autonomous Grand Duchy of Finland is established within the Russian Empire. The Swedish constitution and legal system are, however, maintained in the Grand Duchy, and the prohibition on Jewish settlement in Finland thus continues.

1830s A small Jewish prayer house is in use in Helsinki.

1858 The decrees are announced under which discharged Russian soldiers and their families, without regard to their religion, are allowed to stay temporarily in Finland.

1870s The press debate on Jewish emancipation starts and continues throughout the 1880s. The status of the Jews in Finland does not yet change for the better, however.

1870 About 400 Jews are in Finland, half of whom live in the capital Helsinki.

1872–1906 The Finnish Diet discusses the legal status of the Jews several times, and Jewish emancipation is also the subject of animated press debates. General conservatism, national protectionism, and the fear of a mass influx of proletarian Eastern European Jews causes a majority to be negative to Jewish emancipation.

End of 1800s Jews who serve in the Russian Army arrive in Finland and are permitted to stay after discharge.

1889 The government issues an administrative decree expressly governing the presence of Jews in Finland. Under the decree, a number of Jews, mentioned by name, are allowed to stay in the country only until further notice and to settle only in certain towns assigned to them. They are given temporary visit permits with a period of validity not exceeding six months. The occupations open to the Jews are the same as under the decree of 1869, meaning they are to continue supporting themselves mainly as dealers in secondhand clothes. They are forbidden to attend fairs or perform activities outside their town of residence. The slightest violation of any of these limitations serves as grounds for expulsion from Finland. Children are allowed to stay in Finland only as long as they live with their parents or are not married. Jews conscripted to the Russian Army within Finland are not allowed to return to Finland after their discharge.

End of 1880s About 1,000 Jews live in Finland.

1906 The synagogue in Helsinki is inaugurated. A Jewish sports club is founded in Helsinki. It later changes its name to Makkabi and is Europe's oldest continuously functioning Jewish sports association 1907 The first democratic parliamentary elections are held. Those in favor of Jewish emancipation win a clear majority, but constitutional conflicts between the Finnish and Russian authorities prevent a positive solution of this issue.

1912 The synagogue in Turku is inaugurated.

1917 Finland gains its independence in December. The parliament approves an act that grants the Jews equal civil rights at the end of the year; the act is promulgated in early 1918.

December 22, 1917 Parliament approves an act concerning "Mosaic Confessors," and on January 12, 1918 the act is promulgated. Under the act, Jews can for the first time become Finnish nationals, and Jews not possessing Finnish nationality are henceforth in all respects to be treated as foreigners in general.

1918 A short but bloody civil war ends with the victory of the White (bourgeois) over the Red (socialists).

1919–1938 Between the two world wars, the Jewish population increases to about 2,000 as a result of immigration, mainly from Soviet Russia during the early period of the Revolution. Many young Jews study at university, and others enter the liberal professions as physicians, lawyers, and engineers. Still others turn to industry and forestry, but most continue in the textile and clothing business. With a few isolated exceptions, the Jews do not take part in internal party politics or join any political movement.

1930s The Jewish population rises to its highest-ever level, about 2,000. Emancipation opens up new possibilities and many young Jews study at the university and enter the professions as physicians, lawyers, and engineers.

1938 Hundreds of Jewish refugees from Central Europe come to Finland before the Finnish authorities refuse to allow more refugees into the country.

1939–1940 After having been attacked by the Soviet Army, Finland fights the Winter War (or Finnish-Russian War).

1940s–1950s After World War II, the Jewish population is completely integrated into Finnish society; having fought for their country, Jews are widely accepted even by those who had earlier been suspicious of them. The Jewish population now slowly decreases because of emigration, mainly to Israel, and assimilation.

1941–1944 Finland fights the Continuation War against the Soviet Union as a co-belligerent (although de jure not an ally) of Nazi Germany. German soldiers are stationed in Finland giving rise to the ironic situation in which Jews and Germans are fighting side by side. Jews fight together with their non-Jewish fellow countrymen in both wars, and the Jewish losses (8 percent) are conspicuously heavy. Despite strong German pressure, the Finnish government refuses to enact any anti-Jewish legislation and protects its Jewish citizens, who thus continue to enjoy full civil rights throughout the war. There are many interesting anecdotes from this period, concerning, among others, the presence of a Jewish prayer tent on the Russian front virtually under the Nazi's noses, and the food help given to Russian-Jewish prisoners of war by the Jewish communities of Finland.

- 1942 Eight Jewish refugees, including two children, are handed over to the Germans; seven die in Auschwitz.
- 1944 The city of Vyborg (Viipuri) is lost to the Soviet Union, and the city's Jewish community now only exists in principle. (It is formally dissolved in 1958.)
- 1947 The War of Independence for the State of Israel brings to the new state Finnish-Jewish volunteers as well as weapons donations by the state of Finland. These Finnish volunteers represent the highest per-capita participation of any Diaspora Jewish community. The following years saw a fairly high rate of aliyah.
- 1948 Twenty-nine Finnish Jews fight in the Israeli independence war.
- 1979 Ben Zyskowitz becomes the first Finnish Jew to be elected to Parliament, where he continues to serve today.
- 1981 The third Jewish community, the one in Tampere, ceases to operate because of a lack of members.
- 1990s The number of Jews starts to grow again, albeit very slowly, partly because of immigration from former Soviet republics and Israel.
- 1995 Finland joins the European Union.
- 2000 A monument is erected to the memory of the eight Jewish refugees handed over to the Germans during World War II, and the Finnish Prime Minister apologizes for what had happened on behalf of the Finnish government and people.
- 2002 The Jewish center in Helsinki is evacuated after a bomb threat.
- 2004 The Chabad-Lubavitch movement starts its work in Finland.
- 2006 The synagogue in Helsinki celebrates its centenary in the presence of dignitaries such as the president of the republic and the speaker of Parliament.

Contemporary Overview

There are organized Jewish communities in Helsinki and Turku with their own synagogues, both Ashkenazi-Orthodox, built in 1906 and 1912, respectively. The Jewish community of Tampere discontinued its activities in 1981. The communities are members of the Central Council of Jewish Communities in Finland, a consultative body dealing with matters of general interest concerning Jews in Finland. This body is, in turn, a member of the European Council of Jewish Community Services and the World Jewish Congress Connections with communities in the other Nordic (Scandinavian) countries.

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

The first Jews in Finland were former soldiers, and their ways of earning a living in Finland were restricted to selling homemade handicrafts, bread, berries, cigarettes, secondhand clothes, and other inexpensive textile products. After emancipation, the Jews grabbed the opportunity, and many studied at universities. Finnish Jews are today well educated, mostly upper-middle and middle class, and they are well integrated into society; many are public administration employees or self-employed professionals. Today, most of the Finnish Jews are corporate employees or self-employed professionals. Some are civil servants. Among Jews who have occupied important positions, Max Jakobson, former Finnish ambassador to the United Nations, should be mentioned. In the music world, the late Dr. Simon Parmet definitely won his place as a composer and conductor. Worth mentioning also is the late painter Sam Vanni, a member of the Finnish Academy and the European Academy of Science, Art and Literature. Rafael Wardi, another scion of the community, is also a very well-known painter. In 1979, Ben Zyskowitz became the first Finnish Jew to be elected member of Parliament.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Although their total number is very low, several Finnish Jews have risen to national prominence in the commercial, academic, and cultural fields. Klezmer music has become quite popular: there are both Jewish and non-Jewish bands playing this music, and many international stars have played at the Helsinki Klezmer Festival. As the Helsinki synagogue celebrated its centenary in 2006, a theater play in Yiddish was performed for the first time in several decades.

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

There are two Jewish communities in Finland today; 90 percent of Finnish Jews belong to the community in Helsinki, whereas the community in Turku is very small (123 members living in Finland at the end of 2005). The community in Turku has a synagogue and a community center, and despite its small size it still manages to form a minyan almost every Sabbath (except during summer months).

At the end of 2005, the community in Helsinki had 1,454 members, 315 of whom were living abroad. The community has managed to create an impressive range of communal activities including a kindergarten for about 25 children, a school for about 100 pupils in nine grades, a hospital with 14 beds, a library, a choir, and a great number of organizations, such as Makkabi Helsinki, the Women's International Zionist Organization, Keren Kayemet, Chevra Kadisha (founded in 1864), and Bikur Cholim. In Finland, Jewish organizations work under the auspices of the synagogue community. Community work in Helsinki is concentrated on a synagogue and an adjoining community center, and the activity must be seen as being very high, bearing in mind the size of the community. In such a small community, everyone has to take responsibility for keeping Judaism alive. On its home page the community states: "Although we are one of the northernmost and smallest Jewish communities in the world, we have a very active community life and a warm heart!"

The community is democratically governed with a community council as the highest authority. It has 32 members who are elected every third year. Normally, about a third of those entitled to vote participate in the election.

Both synagogues in the country follow Orthodox ritual, and there is a rabbi in Helsinki; the community in Turku has been without a rabbi since 1965. The Central Council of Jewish Communities in Finland is a consultative body dealing with general matters and is affiliated to the World Jewish Congress and the European Council of Jewish Communities. The Jewish community has many international contacts and cooperation is close, especially with the Jewish communities in the other Nordic countries. The two communities have good relations with the state and municipal authorities. The Jewish community has legal status and the right to levy taxes on its members. Kosher slaughtering is permitted in Finland (it was last time discussed in Parliament in 1995) and there is a kosher butcher shop in Helsinki.

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionism, and Existential Problems of the Community

Anti-Semitism has never been very strong in Finland—even in the 1920s and 1930s it was restricted to small ultra-right circles—and although old prejudices still appear, and biased criticism of Israel can be heard in the media and from leading politicians, violent anti-Semitism is very rare. There have been some violent incidents initiated by Muslim immigrants, but these have been very few in number. After the 9/11 attacks, the president of Finland summoned representatives of the three Abrahamic faiths, and these meetings have continued. The Jewish community has excellent relations with the Muslim Tatar community, which came to the country in the 19th century, but its relations with more recent Muslim immigrants have been more problematic. The Jewish community in Finland was early influenced by Zionism. Today most Finnish Jews have relatives or close friends in Israel, visits to the country are common, and a clear majority has a strong sense of affinity with the Jewish state. Yom Ha-Shoa and Yom Ha-Atzmaut are celebrated yearly, often in the presence of the Israeli Ambassador. The Jewish community has good relations with the dominant Lutheran church, and there is strong support for Israel among active churchgoers; Finnish evangelical Christians have helped thousands of Russian Jews immigrate to Israel via Finland. Academic Jewish studies are pursued at the University of Helsinki (in the fields of Semitic languages and rheology) and at Åbo Akademi University, Turku (in the field of theology).

A 2001 study showed that the Jews affiliated to a community were quite satisfied with the work of the community and optimistic about the future of Judaism in Finland. For them Jewishness is not primarily related to religion but rather to an awareness of being Jewish, adherence to a Jewish culture, and a willingness to pass on this living tradition. Most of the respondents viewed the Jews of Finland primarily as part of the Jewish people, not as a religious minority. In highly secularized countries, like the Nordic countries, peoplehood tends to be more important than religion. “Feeling Jewish inside,” “loyalty to the Jewish heritage,” and “a sense of belonging to the Jewish people” are the main pillars of their Jewish identities, whereas religious activities play a minor role. It is perhaps possible to say that the Jews of Finland have an ethnocultural conception of what it means to “be Jewish.” In their behavior Finnish Jews are modern in the sense that they freely choose which customs and lifestyles they want to adopt. Although they do not follow all Jewish traditions, they do observe several practices; they live to a large extent as most Finns do, but they are proud of their Jewishness. They see neither emigration to Israel nor Orthodoxy as the only guarantees of Jewish survival; rather, they believe Judaism will survive in Finland through a clear concentration on cultural and social activities. The survival of such a small community has been questioned several times, but they are still here and determined to be here in the future as well.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

There are no big movements of Jews either emigrating from or immigrating to Finland. The community is growing, but very slowly. Finland is a quite secularized country, and the Jews are influenced by modern secularism. Most Jews do not attend synagogue regularly and do not keep kosher. There is, on the other hand, quite strong support for the official policy of the synagogue, that is, for keeping it Orthodox, and Jewish holidays are widely celebrated. Mixed marriages are extremely frequent, something that is not surprising bearing in mind the size of the community. Most converts to Judaism are persons who have married a Jew, and it is quite common for children of mixed marriages to become Jewish.

The Jews of Finland have a strong Jewish identity. In a comprehensive 2001 study, 80 percent of the respondents to a questionnaire said they were very conscious of their identity as Jews. But that does not make them less Finnish. They are, in fact, well integrated into Finnish society, and half of the respondents said they felt as Jewish as they felt Finnish. In an increasingly multicultural world, multiple identities are becoming more common, and the question of being, say, Finnish or Jewish is becoming increasingly obsolete; it is not a question of “either-or” or “fifty-fifty.” Jews in Finland today fully accept their “Jewishness” and, at the same time, fully accept their “Finnishness.” Instead of feeling half this and half that, they appear to oscillate between the positions depending on the situation. In doing this, they are in fact 100 percent both. The ease in being Jewish and the fact that Jews are so well integrated into society are paradoxically the biggest threats to Jewish survival. There is no pressure from outside to keep Jews together as a distinct and different group, and it is easy to assimilate.

Selected Bibliography

- Harviainen, Tapani. 2000. “The Jews in Finland and World War II.” Nordisk Judaistik-Scandinavian Jewish Studies 21: 157–166.
- Pentikäinen, Juha, and Veikko Anttonen. 1995. “The Jews in Finland.” In Cultural Minorities in Finland. An Overview towards Cultural Policy, edited by Juha Pentikäinen and Marja Hiltunen, 163–166. Helsinki, Finland: Publications of the Finnish National Commission for UNESCO. No 66.
- Rachlin, Robert D. 1999. “How Were They Saved? Finland, the Second World War, and the Jews.” The Bulletin of the Center for Holocaust Studies at the University of Vermont 3 (2): 7–14.

Jews in Iceland

Snorri G. Bergsson

---

General Population: 300,000

Jewish Population: 10

Percent of Population: 0.003 percent

---

Historical Overview

Iceland has, for ages, been an isolated and homogenous country, located far north in the Atlantic. It is also the only European country where an established Jewish community has never existed. Consequently, the discussion here is focused on how the Icelanders responded to the actual, or possible, arrival of Jewish immigrants, and how individual Jews contributed to the development of Icelandic society. The author Hendrik Siemsen Ottósson, who was married to a Jewish woman and assisted Jewish refugees during World War II, stated that only a few Jews were ever simultaneously present in Iceland “and, because of their small numbers and the liberalism of the Icelanders, there was never made any distinction between them and other citizens. They intermarried and had their children baptized” (Ottósson 1951, 37). In theory, Danish Jews could reside in Iceland without restrictions other than those that applied to other Danes. Even so, most Jews would have found immigration to that country a temptation worth resisting, as there was hardly any consumer market found in Iceland until the early 20th century, and practically no employment for alien workers, traders, and craftspeople.

1815 Ruben Henriques, of a Danish Jewish family, is the first Jew to register in Iceland. He begins to trade at the northern port of Akureyri. He never settles there, and in fact might not even have sailed to Iceland himself, as his associates, Jewish and non-Jewish, execute his business during the trading season. Those men are apparently the first Jews to stay for an extended period in Iceland without being baptized, as Lutheranism is the only recognized religion in Iceland until 1874.

1850–1853 In 1850, the Althing (parliament) discusses Danish “laws on admitting foreign Jews to the Kingdom” and whether they should apply to Iceland as well. Its members of Parliament (MPs) accept in principle that Danish Jews are permitted to settle, but not to worship, in Iceland. In 1853, they refuse, however, to admit foreign Jews, as they say they are cunning traders by nature and will soon bully the existing merchants and enrich themselves at the expense of the local population.

1855 The MPs do not envisage Jews in any other way than relating to trade and banking, but the tables turn when the last restrictions on the Icelandic trade are abolished. This time, the admission of non-Danish Jews to Iceland is accepted by a large majority, and the Althing’s resolution states that, “as it is spurious for any society’s prosperity to discriminate the rights of citizenship on the basis of religion, it could also harm the Icelandic trade if Jews were not allowed to settle in Iceland due to their religion.” It adds that “if the [Jewish] trade would not be allowed, it might harm our trade and business dealings with other nations, since it is generally believed that among the Jews are many hard-working and honest traders and [Jews] in general are good workers, useful and peaceful citizens where their immigration has been permitted” (quoted in Bergsson 2005, 29).

1874 Journalist and Zionist leader Max Nordau visits Iceland. The locals generally dislike his arrogant behavior, and he does not fancy them and their melancholy, either.

Early 20th century The first Jewish settlers in Iceland arrive no later than 1906, when two young Jews register in Reykjavik: the merchant Fritz Nathan and the musician Paul Bernburg (Liepman). Nathan soon becomes very influential and his co-owned company, Nathan & Olsen, becomes one of Iceland’s largest at this time. The Icelanders welcome him, and his beneficence to the society earns him absolute recognition. After completing the construction of one of Reykjavik’s largest buildings, he returns with his family to Denmark, shortly before the outbreak of World War I. The given reason is the absence of Jewish ritual services. Bernburg, however, takes the easy road and merges into the society, apparently through baptism. Neither of the men suffer any discrimination, as the locals welcome any foreigners, of whatever nationality or creed, who settle in Iceland, pay taxes, and are culturally integrated. However, anti-Semitism is present, but is apparently restricted to individuals who have studied abroad.

1904 Iceland’s turn from backwardness to modernity, at the dawn of the 20th century, seems to have involved a substantial Jewish capital, most notably that of the Newcastle-based Louis Zöllner, a Danish Jew by birth. His input into Icelandic society is vital for the emergence of a gigantic cooperative movement and other local enterprises. Other Jews, or suspected Jews, also take some part in Iceland’s rejuvenation through trading and financing, most notably, Danish Jews, who are the predominant investors in the Bank of Iceland (established in 1904), which is responsible for financing Iceland’s industry. As a result, the word “Jew” (Gyðingur) is synonymous with finance and trade, usually in a negative manner. Later, the image of the Jew is related to a Jewish–communist worldwide conspiracy, but its main propagandist is publicly ridiculed and virtually ostracized, most notably through the efforts of Hendrik Ottósson 1930 Some German Jews unsuccessfully attempt to immigrate to Iceland, as the Danish embassy in Berlin refuses to issue visas for Jews. At that time, no visa is de facto needed for immigration to Iceland.

1936 The government of Prime Minister Hermann Jónasson (the Progressive Party) issues the Alien’s Act and establishes the Bureau of Immigration a year later. Until now, aliens of any persuasion and race could, more or less, settle in Iceland if they have sufficient means for support and do not suffer from any contagious diseases. About 15 Jews are living in Iceland, “slipped in while there were no [immigration] barriers,” as governmental officials state (Bergsson 2005, 336). Some of them are socialists, protected by the Socialist Democrat Party, which is represented in government by Haraldur Guðmundsson, who happens to be a member of the only refugee-aiding organization in Iceland.

1938 In March, the socialists relinquish their governmental post and Jónasson's Progressive Party forms a minority government. Almost immediately, Prime Minister Jónasson, who also serves as the minister of justice, sets sail to relieve Iceland of its Jews, supported by some nationalistic elements, most notably the right-wing daily Vísir. As has been documented recently, he especially singles out Jews for deportation. His argument is that because of unemployment these people will have to depart, and his officials also admit that applications from German Jews have "as a rule been refused" (Bergsson 2005, 321). At this time, Iceland is in great needs of doctors, but Jewish doctors are turned away en masse—at the same time that manual laborers of Nordic blood are welcomed. Moreover, Jónasson states, in his conversations with foreign emissaries, that he will remove all Jews to protect the Nordic blood of the Icelanders. He also blocks the admittance of a few Jewish refugee children, in opposition to the wishes of other political leaders, even those within his own party. The right-wing newspapers are practically the only supporters of that decision, but mostly because the organization involved in the matter is not only dedicated to help those unwanted Jewish refugees but is also made up of dangerous elements such as the communist Hendrik Ottósson and the Social Democrat chairman, Stefán Stefánsson.

1939 In April, the Progressive, Socialist Democrat, and Conservative parties form a unity government, presided over by Jónasson. Almost immediately, some Jewish refugees are admitted—"the majority of min[isters] approves of that," Jónasson bitterly states (Bergsson 2005, 352). Thus, even Jews who were denied access a few months earlier are now admitted. It is not a pleasant testimony to Jónasson's immigration policies that Iceland apparently has the lowest ratio of Jewish refugees (per 1,000 inhabitants) of all European countries, and probably the highest ratio of deportees, as well. However, some refugees are saved, most notably through the efforts of Hendrik Ottósson. Thus, a small community of Jews remains in Reykjavík when the British army occupies Iceland, in May 1940.

Contemporary Overview

Iceland never officially categorized Jews as a special entity, although the government informally accepted a distinction between Jewish and non-Jewish Germans during the late 1930s. Any discrimination would have been illegal according to the Admission Act of 1855, and Bergsson has argued that Iceland's prime minister repeatedly supervised a breach of that in 1938–1939 when he singled out Jews for special treatment (Bergsson 2005, 320). On the other hand, Iceland has never sought Jewish immigration and did not officially take part in any rescue attempts during or after World War II. Although individual Icelanders did save some Jews from the horrors of Nazism, that practice was relatively rare.

It might be worth mentioning that Dr. Helgi Briem, Iceland's representative at the Danish Embassy in Berlin, had in late 1938 put himself in danger to save Dr. Karl Kroner, a German Jew who had assisted Icelandic nationals in Germany for more than two decades. Briem's outrageous behavior, direct threats, and fierce attitude secured Dr. Kroner's release, much to his own surprise (Whitehead 1980, 87–90). And Prime Minister Jónasson, who had been Kroner's guest in Germany, reluctantly granted him a visa, but not without complaining that too many annoying Jews were already residing in Iceland.

Most Jews who had managed to stay in Iceland during the perilous years of 1938–1939 were protected by influential Icelanders. Dr. Kroner's case was of that nature, as Briem was an influential member of the Progressive Party. The force of friendship was the main reason any Jews were accepted to Iceland at this time. From the summer of 1939 to Iceland's occupation in May 1940, a few Jewish families and a number of individuals were accepted. None were admitted solely because they were persecuted or their life was in danger. However, some Jews who had entered Iceland illegally were temporarily tolerated; for example, the elderly Helene Mann and her adult son, Hans. They had moved to Iceland in 1936 to rejoin Helene's daughter, Olga Rottberger, who was later deported, along with her husband and their young children. The younger of those, Felix, was probably the first child to have been born in Iceland of two Jewish parents. The government repeatedly tried to deport the two remaining members of the Mann family, even as late as March 30, 1940, but to no avail. Hans Mann hid in the countryside, and later a friendly physician prevented their deportation because of Helene Mann's illness, which he partly exaggerated. The author Hendrik Ottósson also saved a number of Jews who faced deportation, one time by marrying a German Jewess and threatening to charge Prime Minister Jónasson with murder if any members of her family were deported.

The refugee community in Reykjavik was small in number. About 30 Jews were located in Reykjavík and the suburbs in the summer of 1940, and roughly a quarter of those were actual refugees. The remainder was made up of musicians and other "specialists in some field of employment," and thus considered legal immigrants according to Icelandic immigration laws. Among those were Jewish women, married to non-Jews, half-Jews, and socialists, who had left Germany because of their political beliefs and happened to be of Jewish origin as well.

In May 1940, the British Army occupied Iceland. Among the soldiers were individuals of the Jewish religion. As they sought coreligionists in Iceland, the Army contacted Hendrik Ottósson, who was at that time on its payroll. To accommodate these men, Ottósson soon organized a small congregation, along with his wife and mother-in-law, the latter being deeply religious. Some of the refugees also took part. Ottósson later arranged a place of worship, had an altar made, and borrowed the Torah from a friend. This small group celebrated Yom Kippur in 1940 and soon established a Jewish congregation in Reykjavik.

Most of the soldiers left in 1941–1942, as the United States took over the protection of Iceland. These men were replaced by American Jewish soldiers, and soon the first rabbi arrived to serve their spiritual needs. At that time, Ottósson's stepson, Pétur Goldstein, became the first Jewish boy to receive bar mitzvah, and another congregation was formed, this time by more strict observers of Jewish rituals. Until the end of the war, a number of rabbis had visited those two congregations, but in 1945 they were both dissolved. It is quite remarkable that the atheist Hendrik Ottósson was, for three years, among the registered leaders of a congregation whose religion he did not profess. This he did, as he admitted, “out of sympathy for the most persecuted nation in history” (Ottósson 1951, 165–169). Ottósson later received a letter of recognition from American Jews, honoring his services.

In the postwar period, some Jewish refugees immigrated to the United States, including Dr. Kroner and his family. They were replaced by new arrivals, including the father of Dr. Vilhjalmsson, who has written on the history of Jews in Denmark and Iceland. Iceland soon established diplomatic relations with Israel, and was for decades among Israel’s most dedicated supporters. During the decades after World War II, the Icelandic people were at large very friendly toward world Jewry. The Jews were no longer merchants, bankers, communists, or refugees. In postwar Iceland, the Jews were Israel, which had a somewhat romantic support among the Icelanders. Because of Israel’s immigration policies, Iceland was no longer needed as a refuge. Thus, there was never a want for synagogues or rabbis, and the only Jewish services held in Iceland were conducted at the U.S. Air Force base at Keflavik, established in 1951.

The wartime refugee community was soon to disperse. Most practicing Jews emigrated, and those who remained soon merged into Icelandic society, as their predecessors had done. Iceland’s leading musicians, who had imported and protected their Jewish counterparts, were soon rewarded, as composers such as Robert Abraham and Heinz Edelstein elevated this country’s musical life to a much higher level. In the 1970s, the Russian Jewish composer and pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy immigrated with his Icelandic wife and was granted citizenship. If the Icelanders had earlier labeled Jews as bankers and merchants, their image had by then transformed to that of musicians. From the 1970s, most Jewish immigrants were either employed by the Icelandic Symphonic Orchestra or otherwise related to music. Most other immigrant Jews had married Icelanders, including the Israeli-born Aliza Kjartansson, who was for three decades the unofficial spokesperson of the local Jewry. The Jews in Iceland only gathered together on special occasions and holidays, most often in the company of friendly Icelanders.

The Icelanders’ favorable image of Jews has recently been affected by anti-Zionism, instigated by some parts of the media and individual Icelanders. The Israeli-born musician Elias Davidsson has been the main propagator of anti-Israel and anti-American opinions in Iceland, supported by various left-wing elements. Another Icelandic citizen of Jewish origin, Robert (“Bobby”) Fischer, had similar convictions. Fischer became the world chess champion in 1972, at the “match of the century” in Reykjavik. He later collided with the U.S. government on various issues and was imprisoned in Japan after his U.S. passport was canceled. The Icelandic government granted him citizenship in 2005, albeit officially condemning Fischer’s repeated remarks on Jewish-American worldwide conspiracy. Until his death in 2008, Bobby Fischer was doubtless Iceland’s most famous Jew, although he strongly disassociated himself from his origin and despised everything Jewish, including the production of Jewish-owned companies.

Iceland also has another Jewish celebrity. In May 2003, the Jewess Dorrit Mousaeff married Iceland’s president, Olafur Ragnar Grimsson, at a private ceremony at Bessastaðir, the presidential residence. Iceland's first lady is of Bukhari ancestry; she was born in Jerusalem but lived in Britain during most of her adulthood. She was warmly welcomed and is very popular in Iceland, even more so than the president himself, who had previously been the country's most controversial politician.

Iceland might not have taken a significant part in harboring the dispersed children of Israel, but having a Jewish first lady is a feature not very common among the countries of the Diaspora.

Selected Bibliography

- Bergsson, Snorri G. 1994. "Listi Hermanns" [Hermanns's List]. Efst á baugi May, 28–29.
- Bergsson, Snorri G. 1995. "Útlendingar og íslenskt samfélag 1900–1940" [Aliens in Iceland 1900–1940]. Master's diss., University of Iceland.
- Bergsson, Snorri G. 1998. "The Aryan Cradle: Iceland and the 'Jewish Question.'" Kulanu Web site. <http://www.kulanu.org/iceland/iceland.html> (accessed May 8, 2008).
- Ottósson, Hendrik. 1951. Vegamót og vopnagnýr [Crossroads and Cannons]. Akureyri, Iceland: Bókaútgáfa Pálma H. Jónssonar.
- Vilhjálmsson, Vilhjálmur. 2004. "Iceland, the Jews, and Anti-Semitism, 1625–2004." Jewish Political Studies Review 16 (Fall): 3–4.
- Whitehead, Þór. 1974. "Kynþáttastefna Íslands" [Iceland's Racial Policy]. Lesbók Morgunblaðsins [The Morgunblaðið Literary supplement] January 13.
- Whitehead, Þór. 1980. Ófriður í aðsigi [Approaching War]. Reykjavík: Almenna bókafélagið.

Jews in Norway

Irene Levin

General Population: 4,593,041

Jewish Population: 2,000

Percent of Population: 0.027 percent

Jewish Population by City: There are two Jewish communities: one in the capital of Oslo and one in Trondheim. In total, these two communities have approximately 1,000 members (around 800 in Oslo and 160 in Trondheim). In addition, there are probably around 1,000 Jews living around the country who are not members of any of the two communities. Most Jews live in the Oslo area.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: The first group consists of those who came to Norway before World War II and their descendants. Most in this group arrived around 1905. A second group (around 500) came as refugees just before World War II from Germany, Austria, and Czechoslovakia. Sixty percent of the Jews in Norway were refugees in Sweden during the war and most returned afterward. Between 30 and 40 percent of the Norwegian Jewish population was killed in Auschwitz—only 34 persons came back. No woman or child survived the first selection in Auschwitz-Birkenau.

The third group consists of those who came to Norway after World War II, most of whom came from displaced-persons camps. Norway's policy was to "replace" the loss from World War II and reestablish the Jewish communities with a new Jewish immigration. Many of those coming from the concentration camps wanted to immigrate to America, but because the United States did not accept persons with illnesses or disabilities, Norway accepted several of these refugees. They were called "minus-refugees."

The fourth group consists of Israelis who came to Norway for different reasons. Some married a Norwegian Jewish or non-Jewish spouse and some came because of work opportunities. Usually the non-Jewish spouse converted to Judaism. Most of the Israelis (estimated at 2–300) are not members of any of the two Jewish communities.

A fifth group consists of American citizens who live in Norway because of their work. Some become members of one of the Jewish communities, even though their stay is limited in time.

Language Spoken: Norwegian

---

Historical Overview

- 1814 The country's first constitution comes into effect. Before that Norway is under Denmark's rule. The new constitution states, in the second paragraph, that Jews are prohibited from entering the country. The Norwegian constitution differs from that of Denmark and Sweden, where Jews had lived for hundreds of years.
- 1851 The Norwegian parliament (Stortinget) changes the ban and the paragraph, allowing Jews to enter the state. The poet Henrik Wergeland leads the fight for these changes and it succeeds six years after his death.
- 1875 Only 34 Jews are in Norway. They are mainly from Germany.
- 1880 The main Jewish immigration to Norway starts, mainly as a result of the pogroms in Russia and the Pale of Settlements.
- 1905 Jewish immigration peaks at around 1,200 persons. The Jews who find their way to Norway come mainly from Lithuania (Vilna and Shtetles, close to the Latvian border) and Poland. They are poor and leave their countries because of persecution. Most live in Oslo and Trondheim, but also in smaller municipalities. Before the war, the Jews lived in 64 different municipalities around the country. Three religious communities are created (two in Oslo and one in Trondheim). Norway in this period is one of the poorest countries in Europe and a large group leaves for the United States.
- 1930s Before World War II, the immigration policy of Norway is very strict and even stricter for Jews. The main newspaper, Aftenposten, runs an editorial on April 4, 1933, telling readers not to judge the German people too hard because Jews were of a certain kind with special traits.
- 1940 At the beginning of the war, there are around 500 Jewish refugees in Norway, many in transit to the United States. There are never more than 2,200 Jews (1,000 households) in Norway, and this is the situation at the beginning of the German occupation.
- April 9, 1940 Norway is occupied by Germany, and it becomes clear from the beginning of the war that the situation is more dangerous for the Jews than for the rest of the Norwegian population. One month after the invasion, all radios belonging to Jews are confiscated. Arrests of Jews begin early in the occupation, but after some weeks they were released. The same is happening also with the non-Jewish population. The list of anti-Jewish measures is long and continues even after the Jews are deported from the country.
- May 1940 The secretary of the Jewish aid society, David Goldberg, is the first Norwegian Jew arrested. However, he is released soon after, as are many of the Jews arrested early in the war. In the beginning, those arrested are communists and others who had been vocal in the media, speaking out against Nazism (like Ephraim Wulff Koritzinsky and Moritz Rabinowitz). Because many are set free, the arrests are not seen as dangerous.

June 18, 1941 The first mass arrest of Jews starts in northern Norway. Together with the arrest of the Jews around 300 non-Jews are arrested. The gentiles are released after some months. The Jews are sent to different camps, perform forced labor, and finally end up in Auschwitz. Several Jews are arrested in the southern part of the country, but they are released shortly after. However, the Jews from Tromsø and the other cities in the northern part of the country are sent to concentration camps in Norway, first to Sydspissen and later to Grini in the Oslo area. Some are also sent back to northern Norway as forced labor for work on the roads before they are deported to Auschwitz.

December 1941 The first Norwegian Jew to be killed in a concentration camp is the communist Benjamin Bild.

1942 Early in the year, Jews are registered with the government and all identification cards are stamped with a "J." By early March the Nazi collaboration regime (the Quisling regime) has a complete overview of the Jewish population in Norway.

August/September 1942 Eleven Jews are arrested in connection with summer vacation at Naersnes just outside of Oslo. Among them is the rabbi Julius Samuel. They are later deported to Auschwitz with SS Monte Rosa.

October 6, 1942 In Trondheim, all Jewish men over the age of 15 are arrested and detained in a local prison before being sent to Falstad concentration camp outside the city. The women and children are placed in three apartments in the city.

October 26, 1942 All Jewish men over the age of 15 with a "J" in their identification papers are to be arrested. The order comes from the leader of the state police, K. A. Marthinsen, who sends a telegram to all Norwegian police authorities. The arrests are based on a law signed two days earlier. The order of the arrest is a German initiative, but the Norwegian authorities do not resist.

Most men in southern Norway are sent to Berg concentration camp, 100 km south of Oslo. The women have to register daily at the local police stations. Many women try to escape. However, for several this is not an alternative when their sons, husbands, and fathers are arrested. Instead, they try to deliver parcels to Berg to get in contact with their arrested relatives. All Jewish property is liquidated from this date.

November 26, 1942 A new order of arrest that comes from the German Hauptsturmführer Wagner includes women and children. This is the biggest police action ever in Norway. The Norwegian police arrest 532 Jewish women, men, and children and send them to Stettin with SS Donau. From Stettin, they are transported by train to Auschwitz.

Four transports leave for concentration camps. SS Donau is one of four transports. SS Monte Rosa has two transports (19 and 26 of November 1942). SS Gutenland leaves on February 25 with 158 Jews. All have the same destination: Auschwitz. Of all of those deported to Auschwitz, only 34 return. 766 Norwegian Jews are killed—between 35 and 40 percent of the entire Jewish population.

The Jews who are not sent to Auschwitz manage to escape to Sweden, where they stay until the war was over. During the war, their apartments are confiscated by the Nazis and their economy is liquidated. Little by little the Jewish population manages to grow. Norway accepts an immigration of displaced persons equal to the number that was lost.

Contemporary Overview

Jewish Contributions to Culture, Science, and the Humanities

The Jews of Norway have a short history. However, they integrated successfully into all the country's institutions. Integration, not assimilation, is the watchword.

Jo Benkow has been a speaker of parliament and was also the leader of the conservative (Høyre) party for a period. He has written several books about such topics as his Jewish background and King Olav, who was a good friend of his.

Pianist Robert Levin was a respected and well-known pianist both in Norway and internationally. He became the first professor at the College of Music. His daughter, journalist and author Mona Levin, has written a book about her father in addition to several other books on different topics. She has also been very active in the current debate about Jews and Israel.

In the field of science, there is psychiatrist Leo Eitinger, a survivor of Auschwitz, who invented the concept of KZ syndrome, which refers to the stress reactions that come many years after a person's release from a concentration camp.

Other Jewish personalities include Kai Feinberg (Holocaust survivor and head of the Jewish community in Oslo), Julius Paltiel (Holocaust survivor and head of the Jewish community in Trondheim), Oscar Mendelsohn (author of the first book on the history of Norwegian Jews), Eva Scheer (author and journalist), Vera Kommissar (author of a book about Auschwitz survivor Julius Paltiel), Charles Philipson (supreme court judge and the first ombudsman for consumers), and Berthold Grünfeld (a professor of social medicine).

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

There are two synagogues in Norway—one in Trondheim and one in Oslo. The rabbi situated in Oslo is also the rabbi of the synagogue in Trondheim. The present rabbi, Yoav Melchior, is the son of the chief rabbi of Norway, Michael Melchior, who lives in Israel and visits Norway several times a year. The congregations are Orthodox, even though the members are secular. This means the synagogues have separate seating in a gallery for women. For many this is a contradiction in a gender-equalized society like Norway, where a Jewish woman can become prime minister of the whole country but cannot hold a Torah. Still, for the first time both the community in Oslo and the one in Trondheim have female leaders—Anne Sender in Oslo and Rita Abrahamsen in Trondheim. However, all religious rituals are performed according to Orthodox Jewish rituals. Even though these rules and rituals are definite according to the oral and written tradition, some changes have been accepted, such as women saying Kaddish over the deceased at a funeral and throwing sand on the grave, to give a few examples.

In spite of the small number of members, the communities are very vibrant. This is very much due to the chief rabbi, Michael Melchior, who lived in Norway for some decades and was an active inspirer for the community—especially in Oslo. He started many activities, among them a Jewish kindergarten in Oslo, and was very visible in the public sphere.

There is a cheider that leads to bar mitzvah for boys and bat chayil for girls. B'nei Akiva is the main youth organization with camps, religious and Zionist education, and scout activities. There is a Jewish Youth Organization (JUF) for older youth, which is part of Scandinavian Jewish Youth Organization (SJUF). The Women's International Zionist Organization is active, and the members work especially for a children's home in Ashdod in Israel. The clubs B'nai Brith and Menorah are active with social gatherings for men.

A new community house is situated next to the synagogue. In the community house there is also a jatke, a kosher butcher where one can buy frozen meat and other kosher items. Jewish ritual slaughtering has been forbidden in Norway since before World War II. The discussion that led to the decision contains arguments about human slaughtering of animals as well as classic anti-Semitic arguments.

There is also a senior citizens' home next to the synagogue and the community house. Every senior citizen has his or her own apartment with possibilities to have common meals and other services that are required in older age.

The Jewish community in Oslo owns a cottage just outside the city where youth from Norway and other Scandinavian countries come for summer camp. It is an important place where Jewish cultural and religious life is being taught and social gatherings are held. The cottage is also used for family gatherings and outdoor life.

The Oslo Synagogue. (Photo by Jono David)

Hatikwa, the publication of the Jewish communities, contains news from members and institutions and is issued three or four times a year. It is an important communicator between members, and shows the high level of activity in the community.

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionism, and Existential Problems of the Community

After a decision in the Parliament in 1996, a committee was established to focus on the return of Jewish property confiscated during World War II. As a result, the government and parliament decided to settle this dark chapter in Norwegian history—morally and economically—and 400 million Norwegian kroner was given to the Jewish minority in Norway. This sum was divided among those who had suffered a loss because of anti-Jewish policy in Oslo and Trondheim. In addition, 40 million Norwegian kroner was put aside to establish the Center for Studies of the Holocaust and Religious Minorities. A further 60 million kroner went to a fund for education to support projects of memory and education about the lost Jewish culture in Europe. Norway was the first country that settled a restitution case, and the way it was done became the norm for other European countries afterward. There was a disagreement in the committee with the minority group, Berit Reisel and Bjarte Bruland from the Jewish Community, making their own report. The government followed the recommendations from the minority group.

In 2006, the Center for Studies of the Holocaust and Religious Minorities was opened, together with an exhibition of the Holocaust. The center is located at Quisling's former residence, Villa Grande in Oslo. In September 2008, a Jewish museum will open. This museum will display the history of the Jews in Norway and Jewish rituals and festivals. The Jewish museum is located in a former synagogue in Calmeyersgt in Oslo.

Selected Bibliography

- Abrahamsen, Samuel. 1991. Norway's Response to the Holocaust: An Historical Perspective. New York: Holocaust Library.
- Barfold, Jorgen H. 1968. Escape from Nazi Terror: A Short History of the Persecution of the Jews in Denmark and Norway and the Danish Underground Refugee Service. Copenhagen: Forlaget for Faglitteratur.
- Eitinger, Leo. 1975. "Jewish Concentration Camp Survivors in Norway." The Israel Annals of Psychiatry and Related Disciplines 13 (4): 321–334.
- Elazar, Daniel Judah, Adina Weiss Liberles, and Simcha Werner. 1984. The Jewish Communities of Scandinavia—Sweden, Denmark, Norway, and Finland. Jerusalem: University Press of America.

Jews in Sweden

Mikael Tossavainen

---

General Population: 9,000,000

Jewish Population: About 17,000

Percent of Population: 0.2 percent

Jewish Population by City: Approximately half of the Swedish Jews, some 5,000 people, live in the Stockholm region. Other major Jewish centers are Göteborg, 1,500 people, and Malmö, 1,000 people.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: The first Jews who came to Sweden arrived from Germany in the 18th century. Later waves of immigration have largely come from Russia, Poland, and other areas in Eastern Europe.

Languages Spoken: Swedish and, to a certain extent, Polish and Yiddish among the older generation

---

Historical Overview

pre-17th century There is no evidence of a Jewish presence in Sweden.

1645 Queen Christina consults the Jewish physician Baruch Nechemias (Benedictus de Castro). His visit to Sweden is the first documented time a Jew enters the country.

1681 At a grand ceremony attended by King Karl XI, his queen, and other high dignitaries, 12 Jews (4 adults and 8 children) are baptized in the German Church in Stockholm. At this time, Jews who arrive in Sweden and convert to Christianity are granted privileges.

1685 A new law stipulates that Jews who want to move to Sweden will have to become a Protestant Christian. Any Jews living in Sweden have to convert or leave.

1774 Aaron Isaac, a Jewish seal-maker and businessman from Mecklenburg, is the first Jew granted the right to settle in Sweden without renouncing his Jewish faith.

1775 In Stockholm, Aaron Isaac and coreligionists, whom he had invited to establish a minyan, found the first Jewish congregation in Sweden. A free port is established at Marstrand on the west coast, and Jews are allowed to settle there as well.

1779 Moses Salomon, Elias Magnus, and their families settle in Marstrand. In 1790, some 60 Jews live here, but when the free port is abolished, almost all of them move to Göteborg.

1780 David Abraham from Germany and his household become the first Jews who were granted the right to settle in Göteborg.

1780–1815 Jewish congregations are established in Göteborg, Norrköping, and Karlskrona.

1782 The status of the Jews in Sweden is formalized with the establishment of the so called Regulation of the Jews (Judereglementet). According to this legal document, the Jews are regarded as a colony of aliens granted the right to live in Sweden and largely autonomously conduct their own internal affairs. The regulation limits Jewish life in Sweden socially, economically, and politically. Jews are only allowed to marry other Jews, and to begin with they could only settle in Stockholm, Göteborg, and Norrköping. Most trades and crafts are off limits to Jews, and a Jew cannot hold a high-ranking political office, such as member of Parliament. As non-Christians, Jews are not allowed to testify in court, either.

- 1802 The first known synagogue opens in Göteborg, but it burns down the same year.
- 1808 A new synagogue with room for 150 worshippers opens in Göteborg, but it soon becomes insufficient.
- 1815 The status of the Jews is discussed in Parliament, and the Jews are accused of causing the economic crisis in Sweden at the time. Parliament decides to practically close the Swedish borders to Jewish immigration. Some 800 Jews live in Sweden.
- 1838 The Regulation of the Jews is abolished by King Karl XIV Johan. With that, most discriminatory administrative limitations regarding the approximately 900 Jews in Sweden are lifted. They are no longer considered alien residents, and are instead officially called "Swedes of the Mosaic faith."
- 1855 The present synagogue in Göteborg, which was built in accordance with plans by the German architect August Krüger, is consecrated. The synagogue has room for 300 worshippers.
- 1870 The Jews in Sweden are granted civil rights. Only minor limitations remain in place.
- 1870 The Great Synagogue in Stockholm is consecrated. The synagogue seats 900 people.
- December 2, 1871 The Jewish congregation in Malmö is founded and has 200 members.
- 1873 Aron Philipson and Moritz Rubenson become the first Jewish members of Parliament.
- 1880–1930 Jewish immigration from Eastern Europe increases, especially after bloody pogroms in Russia in 1895–1910. At the end of this period, some 7,000 Jews live in Sweden.
- 1903 The synagogue in Malmö opens.
- 1938 As a response to the increasing number of Jewish refugees from Nazi Germany, the Swedish government severely limits Jewish immigration to Sweden, effectively closing the borders to any Jew fleeing Germany.
- 1942 Almost half of the Norwegian Jews manage to escape to Sweden and are thus not deported to the death camps in Poland.
- 1943 During a few dramatic weeks after Rosh Hashanah, practically all 7,000 Jews in Denmark manage to escape to Sweden.
- 1945–1946 In the wake of World War II, some 10,000 survivors of the Holocaust arrive in Sweden. Of these, only about 3,000 stay in Sweden; most eventually continue on to other destinations, such as the United States and the State of Israel.
- 1951 The Swedish Parliament passes a law on the freedom of religion. Swedish citizens are no longer forced to belong to a religious congregation. As a consequence, the Jewish communities become voluntary organizations. Jews are now allowed to hold any political office, including cabinet minister. Only the position of head of state is still reserved for a member of the Church of Sweden.
- 1956–1972 Political turmoil behind the Iron Curtain in Hungary (1956), Czechoslovakia (1968), and Poland (1969) cause waves of Jewish emigration. Some 3,500 of these Jews arrive in Sweden.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

The first Jews who settled in Sweden were often peddlers, minor businesspeople, or artisans active in one of the few fields that were not forbidden for Jews. Later, some Jews came to prosper as businesspeople and merchants. Jews such as Heyman Schück, Aron Levi, and Jacob Marcus played a role in developing the Swedish textile industry. Members of prominent merchant families, such as the Lamms, Josephsons, and the Sachses in Stockholm and the Mannheimers and Magnuses in Göteborg, have played an important part in the development of Swedish industrial and financial life. Modern banking was introduced in Sweden in cooperation with Theodor Mannheimer from Göteborg. Other important Jews in the financial sphere were Henrik Davidson, Herman Mannheimer, and Olof Aschberg.

Today, Jews can be found in most professional sectors, including blue-collar professions. However, Jews in Sweden are primarily occupied in those fields requiring an academic education or in the arts and media.

Present Economic Conditions

Most Swedish Jews enjoy a comfortable middle-class socioeconomic position.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Several Swedish Jews have been well-known artists. The most notable are the symbolist painter Ernst Josephson (1851–1906), Eva Bonnier (1857–1909), Hanna Pauli (née Hirsch 1864–1940), and Isaac Grünewald (1889–1946).

Several Swedish Jews have been notable literary historians, including Henrik Schück (1855–1947) and Martin Lamm (1880–1950), who were members of the Swedish Academy that selects the Nobel Prize laureate in literature. Another well-known literary historian was Oscar Levertin (1862–1906), who was also an author and poet in his own right. Other Jewish authors in Sweden include Sophie Elkan (1853–1921) and Nobel Prize laureate Nelly Sachs (1891–1970), who fled to Sweden from her native Germany in 1940.

Composer Moses Pergament (1893–1977), historian Hugo Valentin (1888–1963), economist Eli Hecksher (1879–1952), and publisher Albert Bonnier (1820–1900) have also left their mark on Swedish cultural life. The Jews continue to contribute to Swedish cultural and academic life to this day, with many well-known authors, media personalities, and academics.

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

In 1955, the Hillel School, a Jewish elementary school, was established in Stockholm. The junior high school Vasa Real offers special classes for Jewish pupils. Jewish education in Malmö and Göteborg takes place within the framework of evening classes, as there is no demographic basis for independent Jewish schools in these cities. Summer and winter camps are organized for the children from all three communities in Stockholm, Malmö, and Göteborg.

All three Jewish communities maintain community centers that offer a wide range of services and activities for the members, including day care, care for the elderly, and various religious services such as a mikvah, cultural activities, and sports. Judisk krönika is a bimonthly magazine dealing with Jewish topics, which is distributed to all members of the Jewish communities and is also available to the general public. There are two Jewish publishing houses, Megilla Förlaget and Hillel Förlaget.

Much like Swedes in general, Swedish Jews are quite secular. The older Jewish families with roots in Germany have either assimilated or belong to liberal congregations. Most members of the communities in Stockholm and Göteborg belong to Reform or Conservative (Masorti) congregations, although small Orthodox minyanim can be found in both these cities, as well. The Jewish community in Malmö is only Orthodox. Today, some 10 percent of the Swedish Jews are Orthodox, and they mainly descend from immigrants who came to Sweden from Eastern Europe at the turn of the 19th century. As opposed to the all-Orthodox community in Malmö, the Jewish communities in Göteborg and Stockholm are so-called unity communities, which means they have both Masorti and Orthodox members and minyanim. Recently, Habad has reached Sweden, and there is now a minute Habad presence in all three cities with a Jewish community in Sweden.

The Jewish communities are democratically structured, and officials are elected at assemblies open to all members. The most developed communal life can be found in Stockholm, which has the largest Jewish community in the country. Here, the community is divided into political parties that compete for the votes of the members at the general assemblies.

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionism, and Existential Problems of the Community

Religiously motivated anti-Judaism has a long tradition in Sweden, as can be seen, for instance, in artwork in the cathedral in Uppsala from the 14th century. In the 19th century, secular, racially motivated anti-Semitism flourished in Sweden as it did in most European countries. Undoubtedly, anti-Semitism influenced the reluctance on the part of Swedish authorities to accept Jewish refugees fleeing Nazi persecution before and during World War II.

After World War II, when Germany was defeated and the full horror of the Holocaust became evident, anti-Semitism lost its credibility and was banned to the political fringes. Still today, anti-Semitism is a taboo in Swedish mainstream society.

However, in the past decades, growing anti-Zionism in Sweden has created a climate where the line between criticism of the State of Israel and anti-Semitism is not always upheld. Another factor that has contributed to a rise in anti-Semitism in Swedish society is immigration from Arab and Muslim countries. Some of these immigrants or their descendants harbor anti-Jewish sentiments, which on occasion have led to attacks on Swedish Jews, most notably in the wake of the second Intifada.

With that said, neither anti-Semitism nor anti-Zionism constitute an existential threat to the Jews in Sweden. If anything threatens continued Jewish life in Sweden, it is the negative demographic trends of an aging Jewish population and low birthrates, in combination with a high level of assimilation.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

The Jewish community in Sweden has never been particularly large, and today it seems to be disappearing. As an example, the Jewish community in Stockholm has lost 20 percent of its members in the past few years, and the trend is similar in Göteborg and Malmö. The general decline in the number of Jews in Sweden is largely attributable to three factors. First, the rate of assimilation is high, as many nonobservant Jews see little reason for endogamy. Second, the Jewish community was traditionally reinforced by immigration from Eastern Europe, but after the Holocaust the Jewish communities there were wiped out. Third, religiously observant Jews tend to leave Sweden for places with a richer Jewish life, mainly by means of aliyah to Israel.

Selected Bibliography

- Bachner, Henrik. 1999. Återkomsten. Antisemitism i Sverige efter 1945. Stockholm: Natur och kultur.
- Broberg, Gunnar, Harald Runblom, and Mattias Tydén. 1988. Judiskt liv i Norden. Uppsala, Sweden: Centre for Multiethnic Research, Uppsala University.
- Fischer, David. 1996. Judiskt liv. En undersökning bland medlemmar i Stockholms judiska församling. Stockholm: Megilla-Förlaget.
- Jewish Community, Stockholm. <http://www.jf-stockholm.org> (accessed May 8, 2008).
- JUS [Jewish Youth Organization in Sweden]. <http://jusungdom.org> (accessed May 8, 2008).
- Lomfors, Ingrid. 1996. Förlorad barndom—återvunnet liv. De judiska flyktingbarnen från Nazityskland. Göteborg: Historiska institutionen, Göteborgs universitet.
- Sjögren, Karin. 1998. Judisk åminnelse som speglad i tidskriften Judisk krönika 1948–1958. Lund, Sweden: Historiska Media.
- Sjögren, Karin. 2001. Judar i det svenska folkhemmet. Minne och identitet i Judisk krönika 1948–1958. Eslöv: Brutus Östlings Bokförlag Symposion.
- Svensson, Anna. 1995. Nöden. En shtetl i Lund. Lund, Sweden: Gamla Lund.
- Ulvros, Eva-Helen. 2001. Sophie Elkan. Hennes liv och vänskap med Selma Lagerlöf. Lund, Sweden: Historiska Media.
- Valentin, Hugo. 2004. Judarna i Sverige. Från 1774 till 1950-talet. Stockholm: Natur och Kultur.

Caucasus and Central Asia

Jews in the Caucasus

Irena Vladimirsky

---

Countries: Armenia, Georgia, and Azerbaijan

General Population: Armenia, 3.2 million (census of 2003); Georgia, 4,661,473 (census of July 2006); Azerbaijan, 8,265,000 (census of 2004)

Jewish Population: 18,000–30,000

Percent of Population: Less than 1 percent

Population of Jews by Country: Armenia, about 1,000; Georgia, 10,000–20,000; Azerbaijan, 7,000–12,000 (among them 7,000 Mountain Jews)

Languages spoken: Dzhuhuri (Mountain Jews), Judeo-Georgian (Georgian Jews), Judeo-Persian (Azerbaijan Jews); nearly all speak Russian

---

Early Jewish History of the Caucasus

The early history of the Jewish communities of the Caucasus is quite controversial and scattered among numerous historical sources and the oral traditions of the Georgian, Mountain, and Bukharian Jews. Historical sources link the arrival of Jews to the Caucasus and Central Asia with the exile of the ten tribes (720 BCE) or with the destruction of the First Temple (586 BCE). At least three different theories try to explain the arrival and spread of Jewish communities in the Caucasian mountains. According to the Scythian theory, which links the arrival of Jewry in the Caucasus with the steppe nomadic culture that came into existence in the fourth century BCE, Jews arrived in Scythia, the steppe region between the Black Sea and Altai Mountains, as prisoners of war from the Land of Israel. Jews were settled in permanent villages in the region between the Black Sea and the Caspian Sea in the years 635 to 610 BCE and became known as professional craftspeople and traders. According to the Caucasian theory, Jews arrived in the Caucasus region as a result of the defeat of the kingdom of Israel and the exile of its population. The Bosphorus theory seems to be on firmer ground. According to this theory, Jews first settled in the Greek colonies along the North shore of the Black Sea from the fourth century BCE to the first century BCE. Jews arrived and settled there from already extant Diasporas in Asia Minor.

Jewish communities lived and developed under three successive political regimes: the Greek Empire, from the fourth to first centuries BCE; the Roman Empire, first century BCE to fourth century CE; and the Byzantine Empire, fourth to seventh centuries CE. Pagan rule was quite conducive for economic consolidation of the Jewish communities, but the Christian period saw intensifying pressures on non-Christian minorities of Byzantium. Jews began to settle on the shores of the Black Sea and in the Caucasian Mountains as a result of the persecution of the Jews in Byzantium and the ensuing exodus, especially at the beginning of the fifth century.

About 60 Jewish tombstones were found in Phanagoria (Tmutarakan) on the Crimean peninsula. These showed that Jews were influenced by Hellenistic culture, spoke and read Greek, gave their children Greek names, and even prayed in Greek, but their tombstones bear Jewish symbols, such as seven-branch menorahs, shofars, and lulabs. Evidence was also found that Jewish communities enjoyed a certain amount of autonomy and had permanent contacts with the Babylonian Jewish community and the Land of Israel.

From the fifth to the seventh centuries CE, Jewish communities of the Caucasus were strengthened by the immigration of Jews from Asia via Persia. This evidence is supported by Armenian and Georgian chronicles, although the numbers are uncertain.

Khazarian Empire

The Khazars were a Turkic people who originated in Central Asia. In the beginning, the Khazars believed in Tengri shamanism, spoke Turk languages, and were nomadic. Later they adopted Judaism, Islam, and Christianity; spoke Turk, Hebrew, and Slavic languages; and became settled in cities and towns throughout the north Caucasus and Ukraine. The Khazars had a great history of ethnic independence extending approximately from the 5th to the 13th centuries CE. At its maximum extent, the Khazarian Empire included the geographic regions of southern Russia, the northern Caucasus, eastern Ukraine, the Crimea, western Kazakhstan, and northwestern Uzbekistan.

According to most historical sources, Judaism was widespread among the Khazar inhabitants of the Khazarian Empire. The 10th-century Persian historian and geographer Ibn al-Faqih al-Hanadhani, in his book Mukhtasar Kitab al Buldan (Concise Book of Lands), described Khazarian Jews as faithful Jews who took upon themselves the difficult obligations enjoined by the law of the Torah, such as circumcision, the ritual ablutions, the prohibition of work on the Sabbath, and the prohibition of eating the flesh of forbidden animals during feasts. The Khazars wrote Hebrew letters. Khazaria was regarded as the country of Jews in Russian folk literature and even some Alan people, the southern neighbors of the Khazars, also adopted Judaism.

On Khazarian tombstones, Jewish and Turkic tribe symbols (tamgas) can be seen side by side. Many of these tombstones date from the eighth and ninth centuries. Khazarian tombstones on the Crimean peninsula depict shofar, menorah, and the staff of Aaron as well as Turkic tribe symbols. In 2002, a coin from the Viking Spilling Hoard of Gotland, Sweden, was identified as a Khazarian coin from its marks and the inscription, "Moses is the messenger of G-d." Khazarian coins in general were imitations of Arabic coin of the same period, only with inscriptions in Hebrew.

The first Khazar capital was Balanjar. During the 720s, the Khazars transferred their capital to Semender, a coastal city in the north Caucasus noted for its beautiful gardens and vineyards. In 750, the capital was moved again, this time to the city of Itil on the edge of the Volga River.

Jews came to Khazaria from modern-day Uzbekistan, Armenia, Hungary, Syria, Turkey, Iraq, and numerous other places. By the 10th century, the Khazars wrote in Hebrew letters, and major Khazar documents from that period were written in Hebrew. Omelijan Pritsak, a well-known researcher of Khazarian history, estimated that there were as many as 30,000 Jews in Khazaria by the 10th century. During the 10th and early 11th centuries, the young Russian kingdom inherited most of the former Khazar lands. Despite the loss of their nation, the Khazar people did not disappear; some of them migrated to the northern Caucasus or westward into Hungary, Romania, and Poland.

Mountain Jews

Mountain Jews, or Tats, are one of the biggest Jewish communities of the Caucasus. According to the population census of 1992, more than 11,000 Mountain Jews live in the territory of Azerbaijan. Mountain Jews speak Dzhuhuri, a Farsi dialect with a heavy mixture of Hebrew. The community of Mountain Jews was organized as a result of constant migration from Northern Iran to the Caucasian region, as well as migration from Byzantium and the remnants of Khazarian Jews.

In 1254, Flemish Franciscan missionary and explorer William of Rubruck (1220–1299) mentioned large number of Jews in the entire eastern Caucasus region and their constant trade connections with the Jewish communities of the Mediterranean. Muslim historian Ibn Tagriberdi (1409–1470) mentioned the Jews from Cherkessia who frequently visited Cairo, traded with local merchants, and bought Jewish saint books. For example, in the Caucasian city of Kuba Jewish religious books were found that were printed in Venice at the end of 16th or beginning of the 17th centuries. Dutch geographer and traveler Nicolaas Witsen (1641–1717) visited Dagestan in 1690 and found flourishing Jewish communities, the biggest of which were in Buinak village and the Karakaitag region, where more than 15,000 Jews lived. He mentioned numerous Jewish communities north of present-day Azerbaijan and south of Dagestan between the cities of Kuba and Derbent. One of the valleys near Derbent was known as Dzuhud Kata—the Jewish valley—and was populated mostly by Jews. Ava Sava, one of the biggest villages of the valley, was known as the cultural and spiritual center for all the communities of Mountain Jews. Widely known are several piyyutim written by poet Elisha ben Shmuel in 1684.

Beginning in the second half of the 18th century, the status of Mountain Jews changed. In 1730, Persian ruler Nadir Shah sent punitive expeditions to Jewish villages; numerous villages were destroyed and their population murdered or converted to Islam, while the Jewish population of the remaining villages fled to the protection of more tolerant rulers. At the beginning of the 19th century, the eastern Caucasus came under Russian rule. Annexation of the eastern Caucasus did not lead to an immediate change in the status of the Mountain Jews. Only after 1840 did the heads of the Mountain Jewish communities write a petition in Hebrew to the Russian ruler Nicholas, the first with a request to restore and consolidate Jewish communities of the Caucasus and protect them from the constant threat of Muslim neighbors. In the 1840s, 7,649 Mountain Jews became subjects of the Russian empire; 58.3 percent (4,459 persons) were village residents and 41.7 percent (3,190 persons) were city dwellers. The Mountain Jews used to be agriculturists and grew such crops as tobacco, grains, and marena grass. Later, Mountain Jews got involved in businesses as tanners, jewelers, rug weavers, leatherworkers, and weapon makers. The Jewish families of Chanukaev and Dadashev became the first Mountain Jewish entrepreneurs and established the wine industry and fish industry of Dagestan.

Communities of Mountain Jews consisted of two or three big families, each of which consisted of three or four generations and counted 70 or more family members. One big family lived in a separate district and every subfamily had a separate house. Polygamy was widespread among the Mountain Jews; a man was allowed to have two or three wives, and every wife had her own part in a common house and was responsible for a certain number of common family duties. The population of Jewish villages consisted of three to five large families; the head of the community was elected from among the most respectable and numerous Jewish families. In cities, Jews also lived in separate districts or suburbs.

Beginning in the 1860s, Jews began to settle in cities where they had never lived before (Baku, Temir-Shan) and new cities founded under Russian authority (Petrovsk, Nalchik, Grozny). In the same decade, Ashkenazi Jews began to settle in the Caucasus after permission was granted for Jews of the Russian Empire to settle beyond the Pale of Settlement. At the beginning of the 20th century, schools opened in Baku, Debent, and Kuba where secular and religious disciplines were taught together. Both Ashkenazi and Mountain Jews studied in these schools.

Mountain Jews in the Soviet Era

The Jews of the Caucasus supported the rise of Bolshevik power. The National Hebrew Council of Azerbaijan was established at Baku People's Jewish University in 1919; the university was headed by socialists-Zionists and published the first Jewish Zionist periodical in the Dzhuhuri dialect, Tobushi Sabakhi (Sunrise). Strengthening Soviet power and its religious intolerance led Mountain Jews to start emigrating to the Land of Israel. During the 1920s, about 300 large Mountain Jewish families left for Israel. Those who remained in the Caucasus were involved in social and economic reconstruction; Jewish collective farms and state farms were organized all over the Caucasus.

In 1929–1930, the Dzhuhuri dialect was transliterated from Hebrew to Latin script, and in 1938 into Cyrillic script. In 1934, in Derbent, a literature section of the Mountain Jews was organized, and in 1936, it was transformed into the Tats section of the Union of the Soviet Writers of Dagestan. In 1935, in Derbent, the first professional theatre of the Mountain Jews was opened, and in 1934, the first professional dancing group.

During World War II, the Caucasus were occupied by Nazi troops. In cities with a mixed Jewish population (Ashkenazi and Mountain Jews), such as Kislovodsk and Pyatigorsk, all the Jews were killed; in regions with homogenous Mountain Jewish populations, Jews survived, perhaps because the Germans were ignorant of the existence of Jewish communities that differed dramatically from Jewish communities in Europe.

From the late 1940s until Stalin's death in 1953, Soviet authorities undertook a wide anti-Semitic campaign. In 1948–1953 all the schools of Mountain Jews were transformed into ordinary Russian-language schools and the teaching of the Jewish-Tats language was strictly forbidden. In the village of Krasnaya Sloboda, which was inhabited exclusively by Jews, only 1 of the 11 prewar synagogues was still active.

After 1996, it was decided to rebuild two synagogues in Krasnaya Sloboda and restore the ritual mikah. The Ministry of Education of Azerbaijan gave permission to teach Hebrew as a second language in secondary schools of the village. A yeshiva for Mountain Jews was also opened in the village.

At present, three Jewish monthly periodicals are published in Baku. In 2001, a seminar, Mountain Jews: Customs and Daily Life in the Caucasus, was held at the National Academy of Sciences of Azerbaijan. In the same year, the Republican Art Museum and Republican Museum of History held two exhibitions: The Jews of Azerbaijan, and 190 Years of the Settlement of the Ashkenazi Jews in Azerbaijan.

Selected Bibliography

- Christian, David. 1998. A History of Russia, Central Asia and Mongolia. Oxford: Blackwell Publishing.
- Kolarz, Walter. 1952. Russia and Her Colonies. New York: F. A. Praeger.
- Mikdash-Shamailov, Liya. 2003. Mountain Jews: Customs and Daily Life in the Caucasus. Hanover, NH: University Press of New England.
- "The Mountain Jews." In The Red Book of the Peoples of the Russian Empire, edited by Andrew Humphreys and Krista Mits. Institute of the Estonian Language Web site. http://www.eki.ee/books/redbook/mountain\_jews.shtml (accessed May 14, 2007).
- Pincus, Benjamin. 1988. The Jews of the Soviet Union: The History of a National Minority. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Wigoder, Geoffrey. 1994. "Events 1982–1992." In Encyclopedia Judaica. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

Jews in Khazaria

Dan D. Y. Shapira

---

The Khazars, leaders of a tribal confederation in Eastern Europe that lasted from the mid-seventh century until the late 10th century, joined the Jewish world when some of them converted to Judaism. The territories controlled by the Khazars stretched from the Dnieper River in Ukraine to the northern slopes of the Caucasus, then to the Caspian shores and northward to the Ural River in Kazakhstan and Russia. The Khazars were fierce opponents of the Muslim Arabs and resisted their advance into the Caucasus. Khazaria included different ethnic and religious groups: various Turkic tribes (with the ethnic Khazars being just one of them), Iranian, Slavic, Greek-speaking, Finnic, Ugrian, and Caucasian tribes; adherents of different traditional beliefs (i.e., pagans), Jews, Christians, and Muslims.

The original Jewish populations in Khazaria were found in two regions: (1) in the cities of the Taman Peninsula in Southern Russia (e.g., Panticapea and Samkerch al-Yahūd, where Jews had lived since Hellenistic times) and on the opposite shore of the Kerch Straits in the Crimea; and (2) on the western shore of the Caspian (nowadays Dagestan), where Jews from Iran resettled. By the eighth century, Jewish merchants who operated on the northern segment of the Silk Road became the third Jewish group in Khazaria. These merchants, known sometimes as Radhanites, worked from the Danube to Western Siberia, and it is possible that some of them arrived as far east as Western China (Khotan). Their probable role in Judaizing the Khazar royal house finds parallels in the role played by the Sogdian traders among the Eastern Turks, who were converted by these Sogdians to Nestorian Christianity, Manichaeism, and Buddhism.

The exact date of the Khazar conversion is in dispute. Some scholars, including J. Marquart, G. Vernadsky, and C. Zuckerman, used to argue for a conversion date in the 860s. Now there is an indication of an earlier spread of Judaism in Khazaria: in 2002, a coin from the Viking Spillings Hoard of Gotland, Sweden, was identified as having been minted by Jewish Khazars. The coin is an imitation of Arabic coinage and contains the fictitious mintmark "Madīnat as-Salām 779–880." Numismatists conclude that it was actually minted in 837 or 838 in Khazaria. This series of Khazar dirhams bears the Arabic inscription la Ilāha illā-LLāh wa Mūsā rasūlu ALLāh (There is no god but Allah, and Moses is the Messenger of Allah). Authentic Arabic dirhams had Muhammada instead of Mūsā. By substituting Moses in place of Muhammad, the coins proclaimed the Biblical identity of the Khazars. However, an analogy with 12th-century Polish coins bearing inscriptions in Hebrew may suggest that the fact that the coins bore Jewish inscriptions tells only the identity of the minters, not necessarily that of the rulers.

The Arabic-language author al-Mas'ūdī, who wrote between 943 and 947, indicated that in the Khazar capital live "Muslims, Christians, Jews, and pagans; the Jews are the king, his attendants, and the Khazars of his [the king's] kind. The king of the Khazars had already become a Jew in the Khalifate of Hārūn al-Rashīd" (Muruj al-Dhahab wa-Ma'adin al-Jawahir). He immediately contradicts himself about the eteo-Khazar identity of the Jews, adding that since 943–944, when he began his book, Jews fled to Khazaria from Byzantium as the result of a forced conversion to Christianity by Romanus Lecapenus; al-Mas'ūdī also adds examples of earlier waves of Jewish immigration to Khazaria from the lands of Islam. A similar picture of Jewish immigration is also found in the Jewish-Khazar correspondence of the period, where Babylonia, Byzantium, and Khorāsān are specifically mentioned.

The date of the conversion to Judaism as given in al-Mas'ūdī has been explained differently by scholars. For example, al-Dimashqī (ca. 1327) combines the information from al-Mas'ūdī about the anti-Jewish Byzantine emperor and Hārūn al-Rashīd, but ascribes his source to Ibn al-Athīr, who lived from 1160 to 1234. He says the Jews expelled from Byzantium found in Khazaria an intelligent simpleton people (qaum 'uqalā' sādijīn), and the Jews offered the Khazars their religion, which the latter found better than their own and accepted. Marquart demonstrated that no such passage is found in Ibn al-Athīr and that al-Mas'ūdī was meant (Marquart 1903, 6).

According to al-Bakrī (ca. 1094), the king of the Khazar had been a pagan, then accepted Christianity; however, having doubts about this faith, he consulted his adviser, who suggested a debate between representative scholars of Christianity, Judaism, and Islam. The Jews beat the Christian bishop and hired someone to poison the Muslim, and so he won and the Khazar king became a Jew. This account has no parallels in other Islamic texts, and it does not mention a previous Khazar conversion to Islam in 737, but the tradition about a religious disputation and the role of a close adviser of the Khazar ruler has exact correspondences in Hebrew accounts of the event.

Istakhri, writing circa 932 and owing much to a lost account by Balkhī, said the Khazar king, called in their language bak and bāk, is a Jew, as is his court; the Khazars are Muslims, Christians, Jews, and idolaters, but the Jews are the smallest group. Ibn al-Faqīh wrote, circa 903, that “the Khazars are all Jews and have recently become so.” Though admitting that the Khazar supreme ruler and his i[x]shā[d] and their entourage are Jewish, the Persian authors Ibn Rusta (writing ca. 903) and Gardīzī (writing ca. 1050)—basing their information on the lost text of al-Jayhānī, who in turn owed much to al-Jarmī (ca. 846)—noted that Khazar paganism was similar to the religion of the Türks (Gardīzī even specifically mentioned the Oğuz).

Different versions of the conversion are found in the so-called Hebrew-Khazar correspondence, which took place circa 960 and consists of four documents:

1. The letter by Hasdai Ibn Shaprut, the Jewish majordomo of the Omayyad Khalifa of Cordoba 'Abd al-Rahmān III (912–961), penned by Menahem ben Sārūq, to the Khazar ruler Joseph.
2. The short recension (SR) of the reply of the Khazar ruler Joseph to Hasdai Ibn Shaprut, together with Ibn Shaprut's letter in a 16th century copy kept in Oxford, England; the text is extremely close or even identical to the Constantinople editio princeps by Yitzhaq Aqrish (Qôl Mebhassêr 1577).
3. The long recension (LR) of the reply of the Khazar king (not Qağan!) Joseph to Hasdai Ibn Shaprut; this is not an autograph, but a 13th-century copy, containing many errors in transcription, especially in non-Hebrew names.
4. The Schechter (or Cambridge) document, a copy from the 12th century, found in the Cairo Genizah, which is a letter by a Khazar Jew, probably written to the same Ibn Shaprut. The original is dated circa 954. Dunlop made a plausible suggestion that it was written in Constantinople by a Khazar Jew and handed to Yitzhaq bar Nâthân, the envoy of Ibn Shaprut, before Ibn Shaprut wrote his letter to Joseph (Dunlop 1954, 156–157).

The latter three texts are official (LR and SR) or semiofficial (Schechter document), written by Khazar Jews to a high-ranking coreligionist in Spain, with the aim to tell world Jewry the story of the Khazar conversion from the local Jewish point of view. As such, these documents are tendentious; moreover, they demonstrate that there was more than one “Jewish” version of the events. The chronologically first version, that of the Schechter document, seems to represent a rather nonsophisticated version current among the ordinary Khazar Jews, whether “ethnic” or deeply Judaized. Another version, that of the LR (and the SR as it is based on the LR), represents a complicated royal version with the aim of distorting or putting into oblivion certain aspects of the Khazar conversion, while highlighting others.

It should be borne in mind that Rabbinite Judaism allows conversion. In the long historical perspective, it seems unwise to speak of “ethnic Jews” versus “proselytes,” but rather of “Old Jews” versus “New Jews.” The Khazars were not the only alien people or leadership to adopt Judaism—they were preceded by the Edomites, the Ituraeans, the Scytho-Kurdic people of Adiabene, the Yemeni Himyarites, and others.

The Khazar conversion to an exotic, stateless religion like Judaism was by no means unique among Eurasian peoples. Parallels may be found in the adoption of Syriac Nestorian Christianity by Mongols and Eastern Turks and of Manichaeism by Uigurs, not to mention the spread of Buddhism among Eastern Turks and later, among Mongols.

According to the popular Jewish version of the Schechter document, many Jews were scattered among the Khazars from the old days, becoming deeply assimilated and having no Torah; there was no king (mlk = melekh) in Khazaria, but occasionally chieftains successful at war were appointed to be field commanders, thus resembling the system prevalent in Israel in the time of the Judges. According to their ancient custom, a victorious, though ignorant, Jew once became just such a military leader. He returned to Judaism influenced by his Jewish wife, who bore the name of an important biblical heroine, Sarah. Afterward, “this Jewish big chieftain,” having been pressed by the Muslims and the Byzantines, organized a religious disputation, and at a moment of difficulty, the Khazar nobles sought Jewish books that were stored in a cave, certainly reflecting the memory of an old Turkic tradition (with this motif reflected even in Yehudah Halevi’s Kuzari). Obviously, the books they found proved the veracity of the Jewish faith.

The Schechter document presents a rumored Hebraic genealogy for the Khazars: “they say in our country that our ancestors were from the tribe of Shimon, but we are unaware of the accuracy of this matter.” Shimon was chosen by the Khazars as their ancestor for two different reasons: first, this tribe, together with Levi, was said to be dispersed in Israel (Genesis 49.7); second, in the days of King Yehizqiyahu of Judaea, some Shimonites left their country (1 Chronicles 4:42–43), going to Mt. Seir—which is mentioned in Ibn Shaprut’s letter as the place where the Khazars live.

It seems certain that the Schechter document, with its account of the cave, was seen by Ibn Shaprut, who wrote to Joseph: “there was an anti-Jewish persecution ordered and the Mesopotamian army rose angrily”—a clear reference to the wording in the corrupt opening of the Schechter document (“Armenia, and [our] fathers fled before them [. . .] for they were unable to bear the yoke of idol-worshippers”). Ibn Shaprut continues to retell to Joseph the contents of the Schechter document: “and they hid the books of the Torah and the Scripture inside a cave, and this is the reason why they pray inside the cave, and on account of the books they taught their sons to pray inside the cave every evening and morning, and after the passage of many years they forgot the story of the cave and the reason why they pray inside it, but they kept their ancestral custom, without knowing its origin, until there arose a Jewish man who wished to learn the reason for this, and he entered the cave and found it full of books.” This tradition was also known to Judah Halevi.

Then, this heretofore unnamed Jewish military leader and promoter of Judaism had his name changed to Sabriel and was made king (mlk) over them. Before Sabriel was crowned, another reform took place, namely that “the men of the land appointed over them one of the sages as judge; they call him in the language of Khazar kgn; for this reason the name given to the judges who arose after him has been kgn until this day.” It is obvious that this text was written from the point of view of the descendants of Sabriel, particularly the vizier or bek/mlk, who claimed for himself a Jewish progeny. The bek/mlk was trying to convince his readers that the office of the qağan owes its origin to the religious disputation, organized, according to him, by the bek, then merely a military commander. However, the author slipped when he stated that qağan means “judge,” for this harkens back to the days of their “ancient custom”; the word shôphêt must be translated not as merely “judge,” in its modern English usage, but as a biblicism. What the author of the Schechter document meant is that the shôphêt, that is, qağan, holds an ancient—and obsolete—office overshadowed by the rulers of Sabriel’s dynasty. This is similar to what happened when the biblical judges were swept by the kings. It was the conversion itself that enabled the bek/mlk to boost his own office at the expense of that of the qağan. A political system thus emerged that is sometimes dubbed, quite adequately, shogunate, which perhaps represents the same model of rule as exercised by the Qipçâq Mameluks in Fatimid Egypt, with powerful sultans and weak caliphs. Remarkably, what is absent from the version of the Schechter document is the motif of the dream, in which God revealed himself to the Khazar ruler through an angel.

Another, more developed, tradition appears in the letter of the Khazar ruler Joseph. Joseph himself relates that there was one monotheistic king (mlk) called Bwl’n, under whose rule what was probably seen as the second giving of the Torah took place. This still non-Jewish ruler was dubbed king—thus contradicting the version of the Schechter document. An angel revealed himself in a series of dreams to Bwl’n, saying to him, “I saw your conduct and I was satisfied with your deeds,” the statement quoted—in Arabic—much later, in somewhat different wording, by Yehudah Halevi, who certainly was aware of this tradition (and, possibly, of the text under consideration).

This form of direct revelation of God to a man is common in many traditions, including the Jewish one, and there are numerous Central Asian examples of a divine being revealing itself to a ruler in a dream, but here Bwl’n asked the angel to reveal itself to “a certain chieftain of theirs,” who was probably the qağan. The angel did as asked, and the Khazars accepted Judaism. The Khazars hardly saw any difference between their ancient Tengri, invisible and unique god of Heaven, who allots kings their destinies, and the God of Israel. Three points should be noted here:

1. Bwl'n is called mlk (king), which is the same term used in the Schechter document to characterize Sabriel, leaving no doubt that Bwl'n and Sabriel were the same person;
2. In parallel Turkic dream-inspired conversion stories, the dream appears first to the supreme ruler, and later to his vizier, and a religious disputation follows, as was the case, for example, with the conversion of the Uigurs, sandwiched between Buddhist China and the caliphate, to Manichaeism;
3. Joseph did not claim Jewish ancestry and did not try to make his ancestor Bwl'n—who bore a Turkic name—an ethnic Jew, whereas the author of the Schechter document positioned his circumcised Sabriel, with his Hebrew name, as a Jewish (but heavily assimilated) Jew.

This means the author of the letter of Joseph ascribed to Joseph's ancestor the dream of the qağan, something the author of the Schechter document—written only a couple of years earlier—was still unable, probably being too frightened or ashamed, to do, for this reason skipping the dream story altogether.

According to some scholars, Bwl'n acquired his name from the Turkic word bulan, meaning “elk.” However, it may be the case that the names Bwl'n and Sabriel are actually synonymous. The unusual name Sabriel, formed from the root meaning “to think, hope, believe, find out, understand,” is unattested in other Jewish sources as a man's name, but is probably a translation of the Oğuz Turkic bulan, “one who finds out,” or bilen, “one who knows.” The name may have been selected to reference the man's desire to learn why people prayed in the cave and to discover religious truths.

Within the dream, God promised Bwl'n that his descendants will rule for 1,000 generations. This expression finds exact parallels in Turkic royal parlance. According to Joseph, his dynasty owes its royal status to the natural order of things, in accordance with traditional steppe peoples' views on sacred royalty. He also wrote that God sent Bwl'n to plunder the lands of the caliphate, and this war apparently was destined to prove the validity of the revelation and the new religion. Next, God told Bwl'n to build a house for him so he may dwell in it, and articles that had been used in the tabernacle or in the Jerusalem Temple were prepared. It was only then that the religious disputation followed. Remarkably, Joseph's letter does not mention the cave. It is clear that this report about the construction of the sacred objects is a pious legend, whose purpose is to trace the origin of the office of the bek/mlk to the period before the religious disputation under the qağan, thus establishing the leading role of the bek/mlk in the process of Judaization. This construction of the articles that the children of Israel had built in the wilderness runs against everything that Orthodox Judaism, whether Rabbinate or Karaite, stands for, and this activity was seen by some scholars as reflecting an early, “primitive” or “stoichaic” stage of the Khazar conversion to what some dubbed as “pure Biblical Mosaism.” The tradition about the natural, stoichaic stage of the Khazar Judaism may have been coined to present the older Turkic Tengri-religion as a certain form of, if not Judaism, at least monotheism, so as to describe the passage to proper Judaism as having been smoother than it actually was.

Joseph emphasized his Rabbinite affiliation. This is evident not only from the very fact of the correspondence with the Rabbinite Jew from Spain, but also from his short quotation from the ʿAmidâh (including môdîm de-Rabbânân) and Kaddish, from his posing himself as “the wise man who loves sages,” from the quote from the Rabbinite Haggâdâh shel Pésakh, from the explicit statement that the Khazar ruler “brought in sages of Israel from different places and they explicated for him the Torah and arranged for him [the way of fulfillment of] the commandments / . . . he gathered in the sages of Israel . . . and they explicated for him the 24 books [of the Tanakh] and Mishnah and Talmud and the prayer books of the hazzâns,” from the reference to the yeshivas of Jerusalem and Babylonia as the sources of religious authority for the Khazar Jews, and finally, from the mere mention of the festival of Hanukkah.

Khazaria was destroyed in the 960s by attacks of the Rus’ and the Turkic Oğuz tribes. It seems that most of the Jews of Khazaria thereafter accepted Islam. Those who did not, emigrated—some of them to Byzantium, others to Spain—with those Jews they had been in contact with previously. There are theories finding Khazar descendents among different Jewish subgroups, especially Jews of Hungary, and the Ashkenazim and Karaites of Eastern Europe, but they all lack proof.

About 1180, Rabbi Petahiah of Regensburg traveled through Europe and the Middle East. While in Baghdad, R. Petahiah mentioned that an embassy arrived, sent by the seven kings of the land of Meshech. Their envoys said that their seven kings had seen an angel in their dreams. The angel urged the kings to accept Judaism, and this was what the kings did, sending this embassy to the heads of the Babylonian yeshiva and asking for spiritual guidance. The poor Jews of Babylonia began to immigrate to the land of Meshech, seeking employment as teachers and so on. The story told by R. Petahiah is basically the same as described in Judah Halevi’s Kuzari, the Jewish-Khazar Correspondence, and other related sources. Although the Kuzari was published several decades before his journey, R. Petahiah and his editor, R. Yehudah Hasid of Germany, seem to be ignorant of the story of the Khazar conversion as told by Yehudah Halevi.

Petahiah’s account has elements that differ from the other sources: Petahiah has seven kings, not one; the angel speaks unequivocally about Judaism, and not about trying to find the right path by the dreamer himself; and the land of the conversion is called “Meshech.” Meshech is an old code name for a distant wild country in the north, beyond the Caucasus. The name goes back to Ezekiel, who mentions Meshech together with Rosh, Gog, and Magog. In the much later time, Jews came to associate “Rosh Meshech” with Muscovite Russia, because of euphony. However, it is obvious that Petahiah was referring to the Khazar conversion. It is significant, for instance, that both Petahiah and Joseph refer to a request for Jewish sages to come to the land of conversion.

R. Benjamin of Tudela, writing a decade before R. Petahiah, tells that among the Jewish communities under the jurisdiction of the Babylonian Exilarch are those of Babylonia; Sinear; Persia; Khorasan; Seba or Yemen; Diyar-Bakr; Kuth, which is the land of the Mountains of Ararat; Alania, encircled by mountains on all sides except the passage of the Iron Gate made by Alexander the Great; and the land of Syrkih (Benjamin of Tudela 1987, 100–101). Syrkih can probably be reconstructed as Ksryh and would thus seem to be a reference to Khazaria.

Selected Bibliography

- Benjamin of Tudela. 1987. The Itinerary of Benjamin of Tudela: Travels in the Middle Ages. Translated from the Hebrew by Marcus N. Adler. Malibu, CA: Joseph Simon/Pangloss Press.
- Brook, Kevin A. 2006. The Jews of Khazaria. 2nd ed. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield.
- Dunlop, D. M. 1954. The History of the Jewish Khazars. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Golb, Norman, and Omeljan Pritsak. 1982. Khazarian Hebrew Documents of the Tenth Century. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- HaLevi, Yehuda. 1998. The Kuzari: In Defense of the Despised Faith. Translated from the Hebrew by N. Daniel Korobkin. Northvale, NJ: Jason Aronson.
- Kovalev, Roman K. 2005. "Creating Khazar Identity through Coins: The Special Issue Dirhams of 837/8." In East Central Europe in the Early Middle Ages, edited by Florin Curta, 220–253. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Marquart, Joseph. 1903. Osteuropäische und ostasiatische Streifzüge. Ethnologische und historisch-topographische Studien zur Geschichte des 9. und 10. Jahrhunderts (ca. 840–940) [East European and East Asian Wanderings. Ethnological and Historico-Topographic Studies on the History of the 9th and 10th Centuries (ca. 840–940)]. Leipzig, Germany: Dieterich.

Jews in Armenia

Irena Vladimirska

---

General Population: 3,330,000

Jewish Population: Estimates range from 500 to 1,000

Population by City: The Jewish population is concentrated in the cities of Yerevan, Vanadzor, Echmiadzin, Sevan, and Guimri.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Background: Sephardi and Ashkenazi communities; the Ashkenazi Jewish community of Armenia began to grow when eastern Armenia was unified with the Russian Empire in 1828. There is a small Karaite community as well.

Language Spoken: Nearly all speak Russian.

---

Historical Overview

5th century BCE The first mention of the existence of Jews on the territory of Armenia is found in History of Armenia written by Movses Xorenac'i

1st century BCE Armenian king Tigran II (95–56 BC), also known as Tigran the Great, takes many captives from among the Jews of Judea. These Jews are forced to migrate to Armenian cities, where they turn them into flourishing economic centers.

1st century CE A small community of Karaims is removed to Armenia from Assyria and Babylonia. The Karaims, a Jewish minority who accept only Torah teaching and do not accept the Babylonian and Jerusalem Talmuds, are the followers of

- Rabbi Aman, who opposed the Talmudists in Syria. The greater Jewish community in the Caucasus does not recognize the Karaims as Jews; thus, the Karaims do not suffer expulsions experienced by rest of the Jews in the Caucasus.
- 4th century Armenian Jews are exiled to Syria and Iran by Sasanian invaders. Jews are expelled from the Armenian cities of Nakhichevan, Van, and Yervandashat, which have populations consisting mostly of Jews.
- 1170 Benjamin of Tudela mentions numerous Jewish communities on the territories of Armenia and Kurdistan.
- 12th–17th centuries During the Middle Ages, the territory of Armenia is divided among several rival principalities and foreign invaders. Oral Armenian history describes the history of the medieval Armenian dynasties of Bagratuni, Amatuni, and Mamikonian as being Jewish in origin. In 2000–2001, an archaeological expedition of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem discovers a Jewish cemetery, with more than 40 tombstones dating back to the 13th century, in the city of Eghegis located in the region of Vayots Dzor, south and west of Yerevan. Sixteen tombstones have Hebrew and Aramaic inscriptions and provide information on community status and occupation of the deceased. The Jewish community in Eghegis exists for a period of 230 years; even the local church is built on the land bought from the community. Members of the community speak Judeo-Persian language and later move to the territory of Azerbaijan.
- 1813 After the Gulistan peace treaty is signed, the region of Karabakh, with its small communities of Mountain Jews (Tats), becomes part of the Russian Empire.
- 1828 The Turkmanchai peace treaty makes Yerevan, Nakhichevan, and the Erivan khanate an integral part of the Russian Empire. In the Erivan khanate, there are 1,032 Jews and 13 Karaims.
- 1877–1878 As a result of the Balcanian war, the Ottoman Empire gives Russia the territory of northern Armenia, which is returned to Turkey in 1921. The number of Jews in this territory reaches 1,204 persons.
- 1890s–1910s In Armenia, Sephardic and Ashkenazi communities exist side by side. Up to 1924, the Sephardic synagogue Shiek Mordechai in Yerevan is the center of communal Jewish life.
- 1941–1950s During and after World War II, hundreds of displaced Jews move to Armenia, which remains in Soviet hands throughout the war. The Jewish population of Armenia grows to approximately 5,000 persons.
- 1959 In the first postwar population census in the Soviet Union, the Jewish population of Armenia reaches its peak at 10,000 persons.
- 1965–1972 As a result of the Communist Party's call to help the industrial and agricultural development of Caucasian republics, a new wave of Jews arrives in Armenia. Most of the new Jewish migrants arrive from Ukraine, Byelorussia, and the Russian Federation. They are mainly engineers, career soldiers and members of the intelligentsia. At the same time, numerous Jews leave for the United States, France, and Israel.
- 1970 The new population census in the Soviet Union shows 1,048 Jews in Yerevan alone, among them 570 women and 478 men; practically all are married to non-Jews.

- 1989 The last all Soviet Union population census shows that the number of Jews in Armenia numbers around 3,000 persons, among them 1,000 Jews in Yerevan.
- 1990 The Society of Jewish-Armenian friendship, Arev, is established in Yerevan.
- 1991 The Independent Armenian Republic is proclaimed. Jews from Karabakh, a zone of military conflict between Armenia and Azerbaijan, move elsewhere in Armenia.
- 1991 The Armenian Jewish community is officially registered as a nongovernmental organization and is recognized and protected in the constitution of the independent Armenian Republic.
- 1991 The Jewish Sunday school Torah Or opens in Yerevan.
- 1992 The first evening yeshiva opens in Yerevan.
- 1995 The Chabad House is established in Yerevan. Rabbi Gershom Meir Berstein becomes the head of the Jewish community of Yerevan. The Chabad House provides free meals, offers classes in Hebrew and Jewish tradition, and cares for community elderly.
- 1997 The Jewish weekly Kohélet begins publication and is distributed in Yerevan, Sevan, Vanadzor, and Guimri.
- 1999 The People's University of the Jewish Culture of Armenia opens in Yerevan. The university has 500 students in the different cities of Armenia and every month gives two to three lectures devoted to Jewish culture and traditions.
- 1999 A synagogue opens in Yerevan.
- 2002 Rimma Varzhapetian becomes president of the Jewish community of Armenia.
- February 2002 Roman Yepiskoposian publishes an anti-Semitic book. The media and local officials initiate a boycott of the Holocaust memorial.
- 2003 In Yerevan, the state Armenian television channel translates a 20-minute weekly program on culture, tradition, politics, and the economy in Israel.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

In Armenia, representatives of the Sephardic community were traditionally involved in trade and handicrafts. Ashkenazi Jews played an important role in the development of the culture and industry of the republic during the 1930s–1960s.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Jews played an important role in establishing and developing cultural, educational, and medical services in Armenia. During the 1930s, poet and literary critic Osip Mandelshtan lived in Armenia for a short period, as well as writer and literary critic Vasily Grossman and literary critic Yurii Karabichevsky, who wrote about the historical fate of the Jewish and Armenian people. Amatoly Frimerman was a distinguished construction engineer in Armenia; the city of Spitak was his project. His son and grandson became well-known journalists in Armenia. For years, Yosif Kozliner was artistic director of the Yerevan Russian theater; his wife, Polina Shaposhnikova, was a well-known lawyer who represented Armenian victims of the Armenian-Azerbaijan conflict in the city of Sumgait. Sara Gessler was one of the founders of the Armenian national conservatory; her sister Rosa Gessler founded the Department of General Therapy at the Yerevan Medical Institute. Efim Zilman and Rafail Taube initiated the development of geology and mineralogy in Armenia; both won awards for outstanding results in investigating the natural resources of the republic.

Jewish Education and Communal Institutions

Since 1991, a Jewish Sunday school has provided the Jewish community of Yerevan with diverse educational courses, such as Jewish music, history, culture, and language. Hebrew courses have been opened for adults and children, as well. Since 1995, the Jewish community has provided free meals and material aid for the community elderly and needy persons. In 2004, the Jewish community, with the assistance of Chabad, began producing kosher food. The Religious Society of Armenia also supports a second Sunday school and a summer camp, both located in Yerevan. The Jewish community of Yerevan has its own choir and dancing ensemble. The cultural information center provides community members with all the necessary information on Jewish life and activities in the republic.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

Today, the Jewish community of Armenia has between 500 and 1,000 Jews. Half of the community left for Israel, the United States, and France because of economic hardship in the republic and the long-standing conflict with neighboring Azerbaijan. In 1990, 161 Jews left for Israel; in 1991, 108; in 1992, 135; and in 1993, 382. From 2000 to 2003, an additional 346 Jews immigrated to Israel.

Selected Bibliography

- Abраванал, B. Judah. "Poem to His Son (1503)." Translated from Hebrew by Raymond P. Scheindlin. Foundation for the Advancement of Sephardic Studies and Culture Web site. <http://www.sephardicstudies.org/armenia.html> (accessed May 14, 2007).
- "Armenia Country Page." National Conference on Soviet Jewry Web site. <http://www.ncsj.org/Armenia.shtml> (accessed May 14, 2007).
- Brook, Kevin Allen. 2001. "The Unexpected Discovery of Vestiges of the Medieval Armenian Jews." <http://www.sefarad.org/publication/lm/045/4.html> (accessed May 14, 2007).
- Graetz, Heinrich Hirsch. 2000. History of Jews: From the Reign of Hycanus (135 B.C.E.) to the Completion of the Babylonian Talmud (500 C.E.). Vol 2. Boston: Adamant Media.
- Rolin-Jaequemyns, Gustave Henri Ange Hippolyte. 2002. Armenia, the Armenians, and the Treaties. Boston: Adamant Media.
- Scheib, Ariel. "The Virtual Jewish History Tour: Armenia." Jewish Virtual Library Web site. <http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsourc/vjw/armenia.html> (accessed May 14, 2007).
- Southgate, Horatio. 2002. Narrative of a Tour through Armenia, Kurdistan, Persia and Mesopotamia. Boston: Adamant Media.
- Topchyan, Aram. 2006. The Problem of the Greek Sources of Movses Xorenasis: History of Armenia. Leuven, Belgium: Peeters.

Jews in Ancient Armenia: First Century BCE to Fifth Century CE

Aram Topchyan

---

The first ancient Armenian literary source to mention the Jewish population in Armenia is the History of Armenia, which is ascribed to P'awstos Buzand and was probably composed in the third quarter of the fifth century CE. The long passage (IV.55) that refers to multitudes of Jewish families living in Armenian cities concerns one of the most disastrous and fatal events in the history of Armenia, namely the invasion of the country by Persian troops circa 368–369. As a consequence of that invasion, almost all significant Armenian cities were ruined and devastated, and their inhabitants, according to P'awstos, exclusively Armenians and Jews, were captured and taken to Persia. The historiographer speaks of more than 95,000 Jewish families settled in seven Armenian cities: Artašat, Vałaršapat, Eruandašat, Zarehawan, Zarišat, Van, and Naxčawan. This campaign of the Persian king Shāpūr II (who reigned 309–379) was the completion of a series of energetic diplomatic and military actions directed toward the subjection of the disobedient country after the peace agreement concluded with the Roman emperor Flavius Jovian (363–364) in 363. Ammianus Marcellinus (ca. 330–395), the most reliable Greco-Roman source for these events, does not refer to deportation of Jewish captives but corroborates the destruction of a great part of Armenia by the Persians (XXV.vii.12; XXVII.xii.11–12). He writes that Shāpūr's army seized the royal stronghold of Artogerassa, together with other fortified castles, and that the large tract of the country destroyed by the invaders included Artaxata (Artašat, one of the seven cities in P'awstos Buzand). For the deportation, ethnicity, and numbers of the city-dwellers, additional information is provided by Movsēs Xorenac'i (III.35), another early medieval Armenian author (who claims to have lived in the fifth century, but some scholars regard him as a seventh-, eighth-, or even ninth-century author), and by the 9th–10th century historiographer T'ovma Arcruni (X).

P'awstos's information, which is very likely not based on any documentary evidence but just acquired by word of mouth, should not be accepted at face value; no doubt the numbers of Jews are highly exaggerated. Nevertheless, it is clear that if the Jewish settlement in Armenia had not been substantial at the time of the Persian expedition, Buzand would not have mentioned it at all. One may also conjecture that even after Shāpūr II removed those tens of thousands to Persia, Armenian Jewry had by no means become just a distant memory in the time of P'awstos. He was most probably led to speak of more than 95,000 Jewish families figuring in the tragic events of some hundred years before his time by the continuing existence of their descendents as a significant part of Armenia's population. This becomes more apparent in Movsēs Xorenac'i's History of Armenia, in which Jews are often quite conspicuous. Furthermore, one should also suppose that the Armenian word Hreay means both "Jew" and "Judaizer" (including proselytes or just "sympathizers" and Tigran II the Great was king of Armenia in the first century BCE and expanded Armenia's power over the entire Syrian region, although he ultimately lost most of his power to Roman pressure.

(Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

“God-fearers”) rather than simply the ethnos, for otherwise the large numbers of “Jewish” captives and the odd division of the city-dwellers into only two groups, “Jews” and “Armenians,” would be difficult to understand.

P’awstos Buzand says these multitudes of Jews had been brought to Armenia from Palestine by the great Armenian king Tigran (Tigran II, reigned 95–55 BCE), at the time that he also captured the Jewish high priest Hyrcanus. The historiographer has confused different events, which took place in different years. Hyrcanus was captured in the year 40 BCE, when Tigran’s son Artawazd II (reigned 54–33 BCE) was king of Armenia: Tigran died in 55 BCE.

Flavius Josephus (37/38–100 CE), the primary source for the events of 40 BCE (Antiquities of the Jews XIV.330–367 and XV.14; War of the Jews I.248–273), relates that Hyrcanus was taken captive by the Parthians and that Hyrcanus, after being brought to Parthia, was lodged in Babylon. This contradicts P’awstos, who says Hyrcanus was taken captive, together with other Jews, to Armenia. However, it should be noted that Josephus in fact does not clearly distinguish Armenia and the Armenians from Parthia and the Parthians. He writes in the War (I.362–363) that Antony campaigned “against the Parthians.” This is said about the Roman general’s campaign to Armenia, in consequence of which the Armenian king Artawazd II was captured. Then, as Josephus writes, returning “from Parthia,” Antony presented “the Parthian” Artawazd to Cleopatra. This means Josephus sometimes used “Parthian” as a general term to include Armenians. Considering the Iranian influences of Armenian society and that the Armenian Arsacid dynasty was a cadet branch of the Parthian, this is not surprising.

Movsēs Xorenac’i’s History helps to explain both the anachronisms in Buzand and the contradiction between Josephus and the Armenian tradition about where Hyrceanus was brought by the victorious troops. He refers to two deportations of Jewish population to Armenia. The first, according to Movsēs (II.14), took place before the conquest of the Phoenician town Ptolemaïs (Acre) by Tigran II (in 70 BCE: cf. Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews XIII.419–421 and War of the Jews I.116), and the second deportation, he witnessed (II.19), took place later, as a result of the “Armenian-Persian” (= Parthian) invasion of Syria and Palestine: Xorenac’i means the same events of 40 BCE described by Josephus, whose War was one of his main sources. However, Xorenac’i differs from Josephus in a number of points. The main difference is Movsēs’ attribution of the military campaign not exclusively to the Parthians but to the “Armenian-Persian” (= Parthian) joint army commanded by an Armenian named Barzap’ran Rštuni (= the Parthian Barzaphranes in Josephus). Xorenac’i may have taken this information from the other important source he refers to (II.10) alongside Josephus, namely Julius Africanus’ (second–third centuries CE) Chronicle, with the surviving fragments of which Movsēs’ account has verbatim parallels.

Thus, P’awstos has combined different events, placing them at the time of Hyrceanus’ captivity and erroneously thinking that Tigran brought the high priest to Armenia. Movsēs, too, mistakenly thinks Barzap’ran was acting on Tigran II’s order, while in reality Artawazd II was king of Armenia in 40 BCE. However, Xorenac’i clearly, and probably exactly, knows there was a first deportation at the time Tigran invaded Phoenicia (70 BCE). Josephus speaks of Tigran’s siege of Ptolemaïs, keeping silent about any expulsion of Jews. Xorenac’i has drawn data from Julius Africanus’ Chronicle (probably fragments of it) as well as Josephus’ War. The source of Movsēs’ knowledge of the first deportation might well have been Africanus. What one can conclude is that during his military campaigns Tigran II surely took captive and brought substantial numbers of Jews to Armenia. The settlement of Armenian cities by way of synoicism, through shifting multitudes of peoples from the conquered countries, was typical of Tigran’s policy. This information is also contained in Greco-Roman sources, especially in Strabo (64/63 BCE–ca. 23 CE), Plutarch (46–119 CE), Appian (second century CE), Cassius Dio (ca. 150–235 CE), and Justin (third century CE) citing Pompey Trogus (first century BCE–first century CE). According to them, in various years the inhabitants of at least 12 Hellenistic cities of Cilicia, Cappadocia, Mesopotamia, and so on were brought to Armenia. Considerable numbers of Jews lived in several countries that were part of Tigran’s vast kingdom. The Armenian authors say the Jews living in the cities demolished by the Persians had come from Palestine because P’awstos and Movsēs knew the homeland of the Jews was Palestine, and because the Armenian tradition apparently was aware only of the military campaigns of 70 and 40 BCE. Nevertheless, in view of the data available in Greco-Roman sources (although “Jews” are not mentioned in the relevant passages, because, like other non-Greeks, they are referred to as “barbarians”), one may infer that Jews could have been moved to Armenia at least from Adiabene, Mygdonia, Gordyene, Osroene, Iberia, and Syria. Part of the deported peoples were probably assimilated by the Armenians, and others, especially Greeks, returned to their countries, while most Jews, as evident from the Armenian sources, stayed in Armenia and lived separately. The policy of synoicism was very likely continued by Tigran II's successor Artawazd II, whose armed forces, accompanying the Parthians during their incursion into Syria and Palestine, brought Jewish population and settled them in Armenia. Subsequently, since in Armenian tradition Tigran the Great's fame overshadowed all his successors, the military campaign and synoicism of the year 40 BCE, in Artawazd II's days, too, were attributed to him.

After the death of Tigran IV, the last Artašesid king of Armenia, in his battle against "barbarians" in 1 CE, and the abdication of his sister and wife, Queen Erato (Cassius Dio LV.xa.5), Rome and Parthia competed with one another for their protégés to govern the country. This situation lasted until the year 66 CE, when Trdat I, the Parthian king Vologeses I's brother, received the kingdom and the Parthian Arsacids were firmly established on the throne of Armenia. Before that, two kings of Herodian descent are reported to have ruled in Armenia Major for short periods and a third king of Herodian lineage was appointed king of Armenia Minor, where his reign was probably quite long. Those two kings bore the dynastic names Tigran V and Tigran VI, and the king of Armenia Minor was called Aristobulus. The main sources for Tigran V are the bilingual Greek-Latin Monumentum Ancyranum, also known as Res gestae divi Augusti (37), Flavius Josephus (Antiquities of the Jews XVIII.139; War of the Jews I.552; II.222), and Cornelius Tacitus (Annales VI.40). Tigran V, son of Alexander and grandson Herod the Great (reigned 37–4 BCE), was appointed king of Armenia Major in 6 CE by Augustus Caesar (Roman emperor from 31 BCE to 14 CE). His rule, apparently, was not welcomed by the Armenian elite and, having reigned for less than one year, Tigran V was dethroned. As Tacitus reports (Annales VI.40), in 36 CE he was executed, thus becoming one of Tiberius Caesar's (Roman emperor from 14 to 37 CE) victims.

Herod the Great's son Alexander, Tigran V's father, had a brother named Aristobulus. Fearing a plot, Herod put Alexander and Aristobulus to death (Josephus, War of the Jews I.551). Aristobulus had three sons, one of whom was Herod, king of the petty kingdom of Chalcis in Syria. It was this Herod's son Aristobulus who became king of Armenia Minor. Information about him is found in Josephus (Antiquities of the Jews VII.226–227; XX.158 and War of the Jews II.221–222; 252) and Tacitus (Annales XIII.7 and XIV.26). In 54 CE, Nero (Roman emperor from 54 to 68 CE) gave the kingdom of Armenia Minor to Aristobulus, where, presumably, he governed until about 72 CE.

Tigran VI, son of Tigran V's brother Alexander, figures in the last stage (late 50s to mid-60s CE) of the conflict between Rome and Parthia in the first century CE for dominion over Armenia (it ended in 66 CE, when Trdat I was crowned in Rome). Tigran VI was Nero's protégé and was strongly opposed by many Armenians (who preferred Trdat), particularly the powerful Parthians. Therefore, his reign (60–61 CE), like that of Tigran V, was short.

The genealogy of the Herodian kings of the two Armenias is shown in the chart on the next page.

Movsēs Xorenac'i's History contains intriguing information about the Jewish origin of one of the leading princely families of Armenia, the Bagratids (Bagra-tunis). It goes back to the distant past when King Nebuchadnezzar II (reigned ca. 605–ca. 561 BCE) took Jerusalem and deported Jews to Babylonia. Xorenac'i tells the following (I.22): Nebuchadnezzar permitted King Hrač'eay of Armenia to settle one of the captive Jewish leaders, called Šambat, in Armenia. Hrač'eay greatly honors him, and from this Šambat, Movsēs claims, the Bagratuni family descended. Then, in various parts of his History (II, 8, 9, 14, 24, 33, 63), Xorenac'i develops the story of the Bagratids being Jews, for which they were at times persecuted by Armenian kings. This evidence for the Jewish origin of the Bagratids can be neither fully refuted nor accepted uncritically, because there are no reliable sources corroborating or contradicting what we are told by Movsēs (this is also true regarding his testimony on another noble family of Armenia, the Amatunis, to whom, too, he ascribes Jewish origin [II.57]). The claim that the Bagratids were Jews by birth was probably raised by the Bagratids themselves and, consequently, reflected in the work of the historiographer of their family, Movsēs Xorenac'i.

In general, Movsēs appears to be an expert in Jewish matters, and the fact that he speaks much about the Jews and their habits might suggest that in the time of Xorenac'i the "Jewish factor," that is, the presence of Jews and their influence in various spheres, was quite significant in Armenia. Hence, the conclusion would be that even after the captivity of tens of thousands of Jews by the Persians in 368–369, many of them continued living in Armenia at least until the end of the fifth century CE. Moreover, in later sources, both Armenian and foreign, there is evidence of Jewish inhabitants in Armenia in the Middle Ages, the most striking corroboration of their presence being the Jewish cemetery, mainly of the 13th century, discovered in 1996 and studied by Michael E. Stone and David Amit, in the village Ełegis of the Vayoc' Jor district of the Republic of Armenia.

Selected Bibliography

- Artsruni, Thomas. 1985. History of the House of Artsrunik'. Translated and with an introduction and commentary by R. W. Thomson. Detroit: Wayne State University Press
- Khorenaats'i, Moses. 1978. History of the Armenians. Translated and with commentary by R. W. Thomson. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

- Manandian, H. 1963. Tigrane II & Rome: nouveaux éclaircissements à la lumière des sources originales. Translated by H. Thorossian. Lisbon: Bibliothèque Arménienne de la Fondation Calouste Gulbenkian.
- Manandian, H. 1965. The Trade and Cities of Armenia in Relation to Ancient World Trade. Translated by N. G. Garsoïan. Lisbon: Livraria Bertrand.
- Patmut'iwnk, Buzandaran. 1989. The Epic Histories Attributed to P'awstos Buzand. Translation and commentary by N. G. Garsoïan. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Topchyan, A. 2006. The Problem of the Greek Sources of Movses Xorenac'i's History of Armenia. Dudley, MA: Peeters.

Jews in Medieval Armenia

Kevin A. Brook

---

A Jewish community thrived in the city of Eghegis in southeastern Armenia during the 13th through 15th centuries. They apparently arrived in Armenia from Persia.

The evidence suggests that the community of Eghegis practiced rabbinical Judaism in a traditional and devout manner. Some of their gravestone inscriptions quote Hebrew scriptures from the book of Isaiah and the book of Proverbs. The community also studied the Talmud. Some of its members had traditional Hebrew given names, including, among others, Esther and Rachel for the women and David, Eli, and Michael for the men. Some of their other given names derive from Muslim culture, including Sharaf al-Din.

The Persian word khawaja (meaning master or respected person) was used as an honorific in inscriptions preceding the names of important members of the Eghegis Jewish community. The use of this word among the Jews of Eghegis suggests that they spoke Persian. It is also significant that Zaki, a common Persian Jewish given name, was the name of a Jewish man in Eghegis.

Jews and Christians in medieval Armenia appear to have had good relations. Some of the Jewish gravestones from Eghegis were styled like Armenian Christian gravestones (which are called khachkars, meaning "cross-stone," because they feature inscribed crosses in the design). A common workshop may have designed the ornamentation and symbols on both the Jewish and Christian gravestones. They were also made of the same material, suggesting that they were quarried from the same mines. However, there were some differences: the Jewish gravestones obviously lacked crosses, and their Hebrew and Aramaic writing must have been inscribed by Jews.

Some Armenian Jews also owned land outside of Eghegis. For instance, an inscription found on the wall of Spitakavor Saint Astvatsatsin Church indicates that an Armenian Christian man donated land to the church that he had purchased from a Jew.

There is no evidence to link the Jews who lived in Eghegis with the ancient Jews of Armenia. Likewise, there is no known connection between the medieval Armenian Jews and their contemporary coreligionists in nearby Georgia, Azerbaijan, and Daghestan.

The fate of the Jews of Eghegis is a matter of speculation. The only certainty is that they are not the ancestors of contemporary Armenian Jews, who arrived in Armenia from Poland and Persia during the 19th and 20th centuries. It is likely that some Armenian Christians are the descendants of the earlier Jews.

Selected Bibliography

- Amit, David, and Michael E. Stone. 2002. "Report of the Survey of a Medieval Jewish Cemetery in Eghegis, Vayots Dzor Region, Armenia." Journal of Jewish Studies 53, no. 1 (Spring): 66–106.
- Amit, David, and Michael E. Stone. 2006. "The Second and Third Seasons of Research at the Medieval Jewish Cemetery in Eghegis, Vayots Dzor Region, Armenia." Journal of Jewish Studies 57, no. 1 (Spring): 99–135.
- Marr, Nikolay Y. 1912. "Yevreyskaya nadgrobnaya nadpis' 15 veka iz Yerevanskoy gub." [The Hebrew Epitaph of the 15th Century in Yerevan Province]. Khristianskii Vostok 1, no. 3: 353–354.

Jews in Azerbaijan

David Straub

General Population: 7,500,000

Jewish Population: 16,000–25,000

Percent of Population: Less than 1 percent

Jewish Population by City: Most Jews live in the capital, Baku; Krasnaya Sloboda district in the town of Kuba is home to 3,600 Tat-speaking Jews, and several thousand additional Jews live in the surrounding area; Privolnoe village, located 20 miles from the Iranian border in the Talysh Mountains, is home to a small community of Gerim and Sabbotnik Jews; several dozen Jews reside in the disputed Nagorno-Karabakh region.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Jews have lived in the Caucasus for perhaps 2,000 years. The Tat-speaking Mountain Jews claim descent from the 10 lost tribes that fled after the destruction of the First Temple. Another period of migration was in the fifth century CE, when Jewish refugees fleeing persecution in Persia moved into what is now Azerbaijan. Ashkenazim settled in Azerbaijan in the 19th century after the Russian conquest of the Caucasus, and further migrations of European Jews occurred in the 20th century during the Soviet era. In Baku and other towns there are organized Jewish communities for Ashkenazim, Mountain Jews, and Georgian Jews.

The present Jewish population of Azerbaijan can be broken down into three distinct groups: 11,000 indigenous Tat-speaking Mountain Jews, the largest groups residing in Baku and Kuba; Ashkenazim Jews, who number around 4,300 persons, the majority of whom live in Baku; and around 700 Georgian Jews.

Languages Spoken: Most Jews speak Russian and Tat, a tongue from the Iranian language group. Azeri and Georgian are less common. Hebrew is taught in schools and yeshivas.

Historical Overview

- 12th century Chronicler Benjamin of Tudela reports Jewish communities throughout the Caucasus.
- 1730s Nadir Shah of Iran launches an anti-Jewish campaign in the Caucasus.
- 1742 The Khan of Urmia, Fatali Khan, establishes Kuba as a refuge for Jews. Jews from the villages of Kulgat, Kusari, Chipkent, Karchag, Shuduh, and Kryz establish a community in Kuba, situated on the southern bank of the Gudialchai River, opposite a Muslim community on the northern bank.
- 1780s Jews from Gilan in Persia migrate to Kuba.
- 1813 Modern-day Azerbaijan is ceded to Russia and formed into the provinces of Yelizavetpol and Baku. The main Jewish centers are Kuba and the villages of Miudji and Miudji-Aftaran in Baku province, and Vartashen in Yelizavetpol.
- 1835 Of the 5,492 Jews reported in Kuba, 2,718 live in the city of Kuba, and the remainder are dispersed in neighboring villages. At this time the region is closed to European Jewish immigrants.
- 1866 Travelers report 952 Jewish households and 6,282 individuals in Kuba, 145 households and 957 individuals in Miudji, and 190 households and 1,396 individuals in Vartashen.
- 1897 The rapid expansion of the oil industry in the late 19th century brings a large influx of Jews to Baku. The 1897 census records 12,753 Jews in the Baku Gubernia, most of whom are Yiddish-speaking Ashkenazim, including 6,662 individuals in Kuba and 2,341 in the town of Baku.
- 1900 Eleven synagogues and 20 Jewish schools service 972 families in Kuba.
- 1908 A secular Jewish-Russian school is opened in Kuba.
- 1909 The first Judeo-Tat text, a prayer book with Judeo-Tat translation, is published in Russia.
- 1910s The Jewish Communist Party Poalei Zion is active in Baku.
- 1915 The Judeo-Tat language newspaper Ekho gor (The Echo of the Mountains) opens in Baku and publishes three issues before closing.
- 1917 During the Bolshevik Revolution and subsequent civil war, many Jews leave their villages for urban centers, transforming the city of Baku into the region's largest Jewish population center. The village of Miudji is emptied of Jews, and about 3,500 Jews leave Kuba. After the Bolshevik Revolution, the name of the Jewish quarters in Kuba changes from Yevreskaya Sloboda to the Russian Krasnaya Sloboda (Red Village). At this time, 11 synagogues exist in Kuba.
- 1920s Jewish culture and literature enter a period of vibrancy and unprecedented productivity. Numerous literary works are published in Tat in Azerbaijan and elsewhere in the Caucasus. By the end of the decade, a Turkish-Jewish school opens in Vartashen and a school for Mountain Jews is established in Baku. Attempts are also made to convert urban Jews into farmers.
- 1926 The census records 19,000 European Jews and 7,500 Mountain Jews in Azerbaijan.
- 1927 Two hundred and fifty Jewish families are settled as farmers.
- 1928 Tat Hebrew script is replaced with Latin alphabet.

- April 1929 A Mountain Jewish Alphabet Conference is held in Baku, a year after Latin script is adopted for written Judeo-Tat.
- 1932 Judeo-Tat author Mishi Bakhshiev, from Dagestan, publishes the first Judeo-Tat novella Towards the New Life, set in Azerbaijan.
- 1933 The Jewish population of Kuba numbers around 18,500.
- 1934 A Mountain Jewish literary circle is established in Baku. On June 17, 1934, the Communist Party of Azerbaijan agrees to launch a Judeo-Tat newspaper named Kommunist and create a Mountain Jewish department in the official republic publishing house.
- 1936 The Great Terror begins, and the renaissance in Judeo-Tat that began in the 1920s comes to an end. Although much of the Jewish intelligentsia in Azerbaijan is purged by the end of the decade, some Jews continue to work and serve in the government, including Ya'acov Agronov, chairman of the Oil Committee of Baku in the late 1930s.
- 1937 Use of Hebrew is banned. Five rabbis in Kuba are executed and others sent to Siberia.
- 1938 The written script of Judeo-Tat is again replaced, this time by Cyrillic; Russian and Azeri become the language of instruction in Jewish schools.
- 1939 The census records 31,050 Jews in Baku.
- 1945 Azerbaijan is never occupied during World War II, and the Jewish population survives intact.
- 1950s Jews in Azerbaijan are able to pick up Israeli radio.
- 1955 A Baku religious congregation is allowed to organize.
- 1959 The census records 40,204 Jews in Azerbaijan, including 29,197 in Baku and the surrounding region. Of those recorded, 8,357 declared Tat and 6,255 Yiddish their mother tongues.
- 1961 Israeli pianist Pnina Salzman plays a concert in Baku during a tour of the Soviet Union, drawing the keen interest of local Jews.
- 1964 A Mountain Jewish religious congregation is allowed to organize in Kuba, but the synagogues remain closed.
- 1979 The census records 35,500 Jews in Azerbaijan.
- 1988 In February Azerbaijani-Armenian tensions erupt into violence. For the next four years Armenians and Azerbaijanis wage a bloody civil war over the Nagorno-Karabakh region. The number of Jews making aliyah dramatically increases, and the tiny community of Karabakh Jews suffers extreme deprivations.
- 1989 The census records 30,800 Jews, including 22,700 in Baku. By the end of the year, 1,981 Jews emigrate.
- 1990 In January, in the wake of continuing ethnic violence and nationalist protests, more than 20,000 Soviet troops storm Baku in a crackdown on massive anti-Soviet protests. Clashes between troops and protestors last for more than a month and kill 170 civilians, including six Jews. By the end of the year, 7,673 Jews make aliyah.
- 1991 Azerbaijan gains independence. Roughly 80,000 Jews live in the country at this time. The new government is run by secular Muslims who adopt a tolerant attitude toward the country's Jews. Another 5,968 individuals make aliyah.

- 1992 Albert Agaronov, a tank driver from Kuba, is killed in battle in the town of Shusha in Nagorno-Karabakh and posthumously decorated “Hero of Azerbaijan.” By the end of the year, 2,625 Jews make aliyah.
- 1993 A further 3,133 Jews make aliyah. An estimated 17,300 live in Azerbaijan.
- 1996 The government offers to return a synagogue in Baku to the Jewish community; it is one of many Jewish properties confiscated during the Soviet period.
- 2002 A small group of members from a minor Islamic political party protest outside the Israeli embassy and burn an Israeli flag after an Israeli military incursion into the West Bank.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Traditionally, Mountain Jews worked as farmers, tanners, and silversmiths. Since the Russian incorporation of Azerbaijan in the 19th century, Jewish trades have included doctors, engineers, teachers, lawyers, and musicians.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

In the 20th century, the Baku Jewish community has made numerous contributions to science and the arts. Most notable among musicians is concert pianist Bella Davidovich (b. 1928), who worked with major Russian conductors and performed as a soloist with the Leningrad Philharmonic for 28 consecutive seasons. A writer of fame and odd historical circumstance was Lev Nussimbaum (1905–1942), a Jew from Baku who in the 1930s posed as a Muslim noble and expert on the Caucasus and Central Asia. Nussimbaum’s work won great praise in Nazi Germany, until his religious origins were found out. In the world of science, theoretical physicist Lev Landau (1908–1968) won numerous accolades in the Soviet Union and the Nobel Prize in physics in 1962. In recent decades several world-class chess players have emerged from Baku, most notably World Chess champion Garry Kasparov, who was born Garri Weinstein in Baku in 1963. Kasparov dominated Azerbaijani chess as a youth and went on to international fame in the 1980s. Emil Sutovsky (b. 1977) has become a world-ranked chess player in recent years. In 1999 and 2001, the Art Museum and Museum of History in Baku held exhibitions on Jewish history in Azerbaijan.

Present Economic Conditions

The religious community is financed by donations from individuals in Azerbaijan and abroad, including Jews in Russia and the United States. In the Krasnaya Sloboda district of Kuba, the Jewish population enjoys relative prosperity as several Jews who have immigrated to Russia and amassed fortunes in the hundreds of millions of dollars support their native community. Throughout the country, community organizations provide aid to elderly pensioners and the needy.

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

Numerous Jewish communal organizations have been in active in Azerbaijan since the country gained independence in 1991. Some of the first Jewish community organizations in Baku and elsewhere were organized by the Israeli government in the early 1990s. During this time, the Azerbaijan-Israel cultural society was founded, which published its own newspaper, Az-Is. Later, the Israeli embassy opened a cultural center attached to the embassy grounds. The Jewish agency Sohnut has also helped set up educational programs in Baku and other towns. Local community organizations in Baku include the women's charitable groups Havva and the Humanitarian Association of Jewish Women, the charitable organization Hesed-Gershon, and the youth club Hilel; several of these groups have branches in towns across the country. In Baku there are monthly Jewish newspapers, including Tower, Hilel, Orshelyanu, and Amishav. International organizations active in Azerbaijan include Sohnut, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, and Vaad Hatzala.

Jewish secular and religious education is available throughout Azerbaijan. Kindergartens, primary schools, and secondary schools are open in the capital and major towns, and Jewish religious teaching is taught in yeshivas, including the Ashkenazim Jewish College in Baku. Krasnaya Sloboda has a yeshiva, educational center, and cultural program. Hebrew is taught at Baku State University.

The far majority of Jews in Azerbaijan are Ashkenazim and Mountain Jews. A small community of Gerim and Sobbotnik Jews live in Privolnoe, a village in the south of the country. Privolnoe was established early in the 19th century by Gerim, ethnic Russians who converted to Judaism about 200 years ago. The Gerim, also called Gerei Tzedek, or "righteous converts," claim that their ancestors originated from the Volga and Don river valleys and established Privolnoe ("Free") village around 1824. They adhere to Orthodox Ashkenazi tradition and practice their faith in Hebrew and Russian. The Sobbotniks are Karaite Jews who adhere to traditions distinct from Sephardic and Ashkenazi Jews. The village's synagogues were closed in the 1930s, and there are no rabbis today, yet the Gerim and Sobbotnik communities continue to maintain strict religious customs. At its peak, the population of Privolnoe numbered 5,000, but in 1997, a survey recorded only 170 households in the village.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

In the 19th century, the majority of Jews were Mountain Jews who lived in Kuba and the villages of Miudji, Miudji-Aftaran, and Vartashen. In the early 1900s, Jews began to immigrate to Eretz Israel in small numbers; by the end of the century, a large number of European Jews had settled in Baku. The extreme violence of the Russian Civil War drove many rural Jews to relocate to Baku. In the 1970s, emigration restrictions were eased and Azerbaijani Jews began to make aliyah. Civil war and unrest in the late 1980s led to a flood of Jews who left for Israel and America, so that by the turn of the century, the Azerbaijani Jewish population had been reduced by nearly 70 percent.

Selected Bibliography

- Agarunov, Mikhail. 2001. "Jewish Community of Azerbaijan: Country Report." http://www.juhuro.com/pages/english/english\_agarun.htm (accessed April 22, 2007).
- "Exploring the Visual Remnants of the Jewish Community in Azerbaijan." Newsletter 14 (1998). Center for Jewish Art, Hebrew University of Jerusalem. <http://web.archive.org/>

- web/0060717014631/http://www.hum.huji.ac.il/CJA/NL14-Azerbaijan.htm (accessed May 20, 2008).
- “Jewish History of Azerbaijan.” <http://web.archive.org/web/20020211215419/heritagefilms.com/AZERBAIJAN.html> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- “A Letter from Azerbaijan.” Newsletter 13 (1997). Center for Jewish Art, Hebrew University of Jerusalem). <http://web.archive.org/web/20060717044727/www.hum.huji.ac.il/CJA/nl13-1.htm> (accessed May 20, 2008).
- Olson, James Stuart, et al. 1994. An Ethnohistorical Dictionary of the Russian and Soviet Empires. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
- Ro'i, Yaacov, and Avi Beker. 1991. Jewish Culture and Identity in the Soviet Union. New York: NYU Press.
- Swerdlow, Steve. 2001. “The Forgotten Jews of Karabakh.” Institute for War and Peace Reporting, Caucasus Reporting Service. 85, 14 June. <http://www.turkishweekly.net/articles.php?id=19> (accessed May 20, 2008).

Jews in Georgia

Alex Mikaberidze

---

General Population: 4,400,000

Jewish Population: 3,700 (2002 census)

Percent of Population: Less than 1 percent

Jewish Population by City: Most Jews live in the Georgian capital, Tbilisi; smaller communities exist in Kutaisi and Batumi. A large portion of the Georgian Jewish community has immigrated to Israel, where it is concentrated in Tel Aviv and Ashkelon.

Languages Spoken: Georgian, Hebrew, and Russian

---

Historical Overview

8th century BCE Georgian medieval chronicles suggest that the first Jews begin to arrive in Georgia when the Assyrians expand their sphere of influence into the kingdom of Israel.

ca. 586 BCE The Babylonian ruler Nebuchadnezzar's attack on Jerusalem leads a large number of Jews to immigrate to Iberia/Kartli (eastern Georgia), where they settle around the capital city of Mtskheta. There they are given land on the condition that they will pay a tax. Over the following centuries, there are several more migrations.

1st century CE After Romans destroy the Second Temple, another wave of Jewish refugees arrives in Georgia.

1st century CE The Jewish community of Mtskheta is well integrated into Iberian society (Georgian chronicles note that Aramaic, which Jews spoke, is one of the major languages on Georgian territory) and is prominently featured in Georgian Christian tradition, which connects the rise of the first Christian community in Iberia (Kartli) in the first century with Jews residing in Mtskheta. According to tradition, when the word of the preaching of Jesus of Nazareth reached Mtskheta, the local Jewish community sent two of its members, Elioze (Elias) and the Karenian Longinus, to meet the preacher but they arrived late and witnessed Christ's crucifixion. Elioze was able to obtain Christ's chiton from a Roman soldier to whose lot it had fallen and brought it to Mtskheta. Tradition says that Elioze's sister Sidonia, upon seeing the chiton, grasped it and died in a passion of faith. Unable to take the robe from her grasp, she was buried with the holy relic on the bank of the Kura River. Some time later, a large cedar tree grew on her grave. When, in the fourth century, it was decided to build a church on this spot, the builders cut the cedar tree, but its trunk hovered in the air and would not fall down. Only Saint Nino was able, through her prayers, to bring it down, and the tree was used as a main support column for the church that became known as Svetitskhoveli or "Life-Giving Column."

10th–18th centuries Beginning in the Middle Ages, the Jewish community grew in size. In socioeconomic and legal terms, the Jews, like most of the Georgian populace, are serfs and bear the heavy yoke of feudal lords. Like Georgian serfs, the Jewish serfs are divided into royal, church-monastic, and court serfs. However, the Jewish community also includes prosperous merchants, who eventually come to dominate, together with the Armenians, trade and commerce. Georgian Jews are not subjected to ethnic or religious persecution in the Georgian principalities, and the Georgian rulers entrust them with diplomatic missions. Jewish settlements are established throughout Georgia: Tskhinvali, Surami, Ali, Mzovreti, Akhaldaba, Ateni, Tsilkani, Urbnisi, Samachablo, Gremi, Eniseli, Khovle, and elsewhere in eastern Georgia; in Oni, Sachkhere, Chikhori, Chaltatke, Kutaisi, Senaki, and elsewhere in western Georgia. A sizable community also exists in southern Georgia. Among these communities, the Mtskheta community commands particular respect and is considered the center of Georgian Judaism. Georgian Jews maintain strong ties to Jerusalem and take an active part in religious debates. Over the centuries, the Jews become well integrated in the local society, adopting Georgian language and customs, but retaining their ethnic self-awareness and adherence to the Jewish religious traditions. As a sign of the intermingling and cultural closeness of the two peoples, the Jews become known as the "Georgian Jews," as their culture and tradition differ from those of the Ashkenazi and Sephardic Jews.

19th century With the Russian annexation of the Georgian principalities, the status of the Jews changes. Ashkenazi Jews begin to arrive from other provinces of the Russian Empire. Russian Imperial laws are automatically extended to the Georgian Jews, which, in effect, limit or outright revoke their civil rights. The situation worsens in the late 19th century when, after serfdom is abolished in the Russian Empire, many Georgian Jewish serfs are freed without land. This, however, causes them to seek opportunities in trading and crafts, where they form trade unions to support each other. In the last decades of the 19th century, Georgian Jews become active in the Zionist movement.

- 1897 The first Zionist organization in Georgia is established in Tbilisi, and four years later, the First Congress of Caucasian Zionists is held. Rabbi David Baazov emerges as one of the leading Zionists and participates in the Zionist Congress in Basel in 1897. In the same period, Rabbi Abraam Khvoles establishes the first primary school for about 400 Jewish students in Tskhivali, revives the use of Hebrew and provides the youth in the community with vocational training.
- 1918 Georgia becomes independent after the 1917 collapse of the Russian Empire. The new Democratic Republic of Georgia grants full civil and political rights to Jews, which leads to their increased involvement in public events. The All-Jewish Congress is held in Tbilisi.
- 1920s After Georgia is occupied by the Bolsheviks, Zionist activities are repressed and economic restrictions are imposed on the Jewish community. The Georgian Jews endure the Sovietization process in the 1920s and the 1930s.
- 1925 The Jewish dramatic troupe Kadima is founded in Tbilisi.
- 1933 A Jewish historical-ethnographic museum is established; the museum closes in the 1950s.
- 1939–1945 During World War II, Georgian Jews serve in the Red Army and contribute to the home front war effort.
- 1948 The establishment of the State of Israel is welcomed in the Georgian Jewish community, but Soviet authorities suppress all efforts to emigrate.
- 1967 After the Israeli victory in the Six-Day War Georgian Jews challenge official restrictions.
- 1969 More than a dozen Georgian Jewish families write two letters to the United Nations demanding permission to immigrate to Israel. This is the first public demand by Soviet Jews for emigration, and the Israeli government uses it widely to campaign against the treatment of Jews in the Soviet Union.
- 1970s Georgian Jews continue to petition for the right to make aliyah, and in 1971 a group of Georgian Jews go on a hunger strike in Moscow. In the end, the efforts of the Georgian Jews pay off as the Soviet authorities revise their stance on emigration. As the Soviet restrictions on Jewish emigration lessen, thousands of Georgian Jews make aliyah.
- 1980s–1990s The pace of emigration increases in the late 1980s and early 1990s, after the collapse of the Soviet Union and the start of civil turmoil in Georgia. Although there are 24,720 Jews in Georgia in 1989, only 14,000 remain by the late 1990s.
- 2002 Only 3,772 Jews remain in Georgia, and 513 Jews make aliyah to Israel.
- 2006 The Georgian government issues a new postage stamp honoring Rabbi Abraam Khvoles' work.

Contemporary Overview

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

Historically, Georgians have exhibited little anti-Semitic sentiment and the Jewish community is well integrated in the Georgian society. Although the community has significantly diminished, it still remains vibrant. The Georgian Jews who immigrated to Israel maintain close contacts with Georgia, visiting and conducting business. In September 1998, the Georgian government sponsored a major celebration commemorating 2,600 years of Jewish life in Georgia. The event was attended by tens of thousands people, including the former president of Georgia, Eduard Shevardnadze, Israeli president Moshe Katsav, and Israel's Ashkenazi and Sephardi chief rabbis. The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI/Sochnut) and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) have permanent representatives in Georgia. Several Jewish institutions, including the Rahamim (the Jewish Community of Ashkenazi Jews of Georgia), the Shalom Club, Derekh Yehudi (The Association of Georgian Jews), and various schools continue to operate in Tbilisi, and several Jewish newspapers, including Menora, Shalom, and 26 Centuries, are published.

Selected Bibliography

- Arbel, Rachel, and Lili Magal. 1992. In the Land of the Golden Fleece: The Jews of Georgia—History and Culture. Tel Aviv, Israel: Beth Hatefutsoth.
- Chichinadze, Zakaria, and Vakhtang Chikovani. 1990. Kartveli ebraelebi Sakartveloshi. Tbilisi, Georgia: Metsniereba.
- Foundation for International Arts and Education. 2004. Beyond the Golden Fleece: A Cultural History of the Jews of Georgia. Bethesda, MD: Foundation for International Arts and Education.
- Plisetskii, M. 1931. Religiya i byt gruzinskikh evreyev. Moscow: Moskovskii rabochii.
- Vadachkoria, Shota. 2005. Ebraelta sakitkhi da kartuli sinamd vile, 1921–1940. Tbilisi, Georgia: Mematiane.

Jews in Central Asia

David Straub

---

Countries: Afghanistan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan

General Population: 90 million

Jewish Population of Central Asia: 35,000–40,000

Percent of Population: Less than 0.1 percent

Population of Jews by Country: Afghanistan, one person; Kazakhstan, 15,000–20,000; Kyrgyzstan, 1,000; Tajikistan, 250–300; Turkmenistan, 600–1,000; Uzbekistan, 17,453

Languages spoken: Most speak Russian, but a small minority speak Judeo-Tajik or Yiddish.

---

Early Jewish History

The early history of Judaism in Central Asia is clouded in mystery and is scantily recorded in ancient historical texts. Local tradition among Bukharan Jews holds that their ancestors were one of the 10 lost tribes of the Assyrian exile and that the city of Bukhara is Habor, one of the destinations of the exiles recorded in 2 Kings 17:6. Central Asia is mentioned in the writing of Jewish historian Flavius Josephus, who wrote in the first century CE that Gather, the grandson of Noah, was the founder of Bactria. What is of historic certainty is that by the sixth century BCE the ancient Central Asian states of Khwarezm and Bactria had been incorporated into the Persian Empire, which had a large and widespread Jewish population in ancient times. In the early common era, historical texts include references to a Jewish presence in Central Asia, including a reference in the Babylonian Talmud to a fourth-century story about the refusal of an Amora called Samuel bar Bisna to drink wine and beer in Margiana, a historical region that extends into modern Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan. Another likely period of Jewish migration to Central Asia was in the fifth century CE, when the Sassanid rulers of Persia harshly persecuted Jews, causing an outward flow of refugees into neighboring regions.

After the Arabs conquered Central Asia in the seventh and eighth centuries, Jews were one of the few religious groups that successfully resisted conversion to Islam. Flourishing Jewish communities in Samarkand, Khwarezm, Balkh, Merv, Dzhand, Osh, and Yahudlyk are mentioned in numerous contemporary Islamic sources, though details are scarce and population estimates are dubious. Jewish communities in Central Asia shared strong cultural and religious ties with the Jews of Afghanistan and Iran and all three groups spoke the same Judeo-Persian dialect. An example of references to Jews at this time includes a Jew called Akiva, described as a tax collector in Merv. It is likely that Central Asian Jews also had contact with co-religionists in Khazaria, a Jewish state in the Caucasus that was at its height in the 10th century. Notable individuals from this time included Hiwi al-Balkhi, a ninth-century Jewish heretic and philosopher from Balkh in modern day Afghanistan, who was one of the first rational critics of the Torah. Twelfth-century Jewish traveler Benjamin of Tudela reported a thriving community of 50,000 Jews in Samarkand led by a prince rabbi, Obadiah, and a population of 8,000 Jews in Giva (modern Khiva); clear evidence of a Jewish presence in Central Asia, though the population estimates are fantastically high.

The Jewish communities in Central Asia were dealt a mortal blow in 1220–1221 when the Mongols invaded the region and sacked Samarkand, Khiva, and Bukhara, slaughtering or enslaving much of the population. The advent of the Mongols brought about the cultural and economic collapse of Central Asia, which was followed by centuries of strife. A particularly dark period was the reign of Timur in the 14th century, when Jews were targeted for forced conversion and execution, causing survivors to flee the region and decimating the Jewish population. In 1598, the city of Samarkand was destroyed by war and Jews again had to flee, this time to neighboring Bukhara.

The Bukharan Jews

Soon after the death of Timur, the Jewish population of Central Asia began to recover. In the early 15th century, Turkic Uzbek tribes invaded Central Asia and established their capital at Bukhara, a city of great wealth and a center of trade along the Silk Road. It was during the period of Bukharan rule that the Jewish population of Central Asia was united under a single state. Bukharan hegemony was firmly established in what is today Uzbekistan, Afghanistan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, and Turkmenistan, and at times it included northeastern Iran. Jews are first mentioned as inhabitants of the city of Bukhara in the 13th century, and by the 17th century a Jewish quarters was established. Bukharan Jews spoke a dialect of Tajik referred to as Bokhori or Judeo-Tajik, which is still used by Bukharan Jews today. The term "Bukharan Jew" is a European appellation first used in the 19th century; Bukharan Jews describe themselves as Isro'il and Yahudi.

The Bukharan khans officially discriminated against the local Jewish population and pressured Jews to convert to Islam, a fact preserved in a 19th-century Bukharan Jewish poem that celebrates the martyrdom of Nathaniel Hodeidad, who was put to death by Emir Ma'asum of Bukharan because he refused to convert to Islam. Jews were ordered to tie a rope around their waist, forbidden to ride a horse within city limits, and forced to pay the jizya poll tax for all non-Muslims. Despite official anti-Semitism, Bukharan Jewish culture thrived, most notably in the realm of literature. Judeo-Tajik literature, which uses an adapted Hebrew script, can be traced back as early as the 14th century, when Solomon Ben Samuel, a Jew living in Bukharan-controlled territory, wrote a Judeo-Persian dictionary. Beginning in the 15th century, the Bukharan Jewish community produced a great number of writers and poets who wrote in Judeo-Tajik, Persian, and Hebrew. Notable individuals include Moshe Ben David, a poet who wrote in both Hebrew and Persian; Yusuf Yahudi al-Buhori (d. 1755), author of Haft Barodaron (Seven Brothers); and Elisha Raghbi, author of The Prince and The Monk. Bukharan Jewish authors also translated numerous works between Persian and Hebrew. Physically, the Jewish population differed little from their Muslim neighbors. Jews of both sexes wore the colorful traditional ikat robes, which were accompanied by the rope all Jews were forced to wear. Men shaved their heads bare, except for short earlocks and wore traditional Central Asian skullcaps, while women frequently wore a veil in public. The influence of Islam was also felt in the synagogue, where the floor was covered in traditional Central Asian rugs, religiously learned men were referred to as mullos, shoes were removed before entering the synagogue, and prayers were done in a kneeling position. Despite the striking similarities to their Muslim neighbors, Bukharan Jews were a distinct group among the people of Bukhara and filled a niche in the economy as shop merchants, traders, and artisans.

By the 18th century, official persecution, forced conversions, and isolation from Western Jewry had caused Bukharan Jews' observance of religious traditions to lapse. In 1793, Yosef Maman Magrebi of Tetuan, Morocco, arrived in Bukhara and found that the local Jews had fallen into spiritual degeneration. Among the conditions he reported were that local Jews had no rabbis or teachers of religious instruction and that Jews were eating meat slaughtered by Muslims. Maman established himself in Bukhara where he became spiritual leader of the community, replaced local religious customs with Sephardic traditions, and established a yeshiva for study of the Torah. Later, Jews from Baghdad and Aleppo followed in the footsteps of Maman and migrated to Bukhara to study at the yeshiva and eventually become the spiritual leaders of the community. By the mid-19th century, Bukharan Jews had established a sophisticated political and religious structure. The chief administrator of the community was called a kalontar, who was elected by all of the adult men to a lifetime appointment that was ratified by officials of the Bukharan emirate. The kalontar served as the Jewish representative to the government, as well as mediator for legal disputes within the community. In Bukhara the kalontar was aided by a pair of ossagol, who served as heads of the two Jewish quarters in the city. The religious head was the mulloyi kalon, or chief rabbi, and judge in all disputes based on religious law. These institutions would remain intact until the Soviet period.

Russian Rule

In the early 19th century, contacts between Bukharan and Russian Jews were established, causing a great deal of excitement among the latter that one of the ten tribes had been found. The czar was equally pleased to do business with Bukharan Jews and in 1833 granted them the same rights as Muslims to trade in Russian markets. In 1865–1866 the czar's army conquered Central Asia, directly annexed Tashkent and Samarkand, and placed other Russian-controlled territory into the newly created Turkestan Oblast; the Bukhara emirate became a self-governing Russian protectorate. Population estimates of Central Asian Jews in the 19th century vary widely. British missionary Joseph Wolff, a Jewish convert to Christianity, traveled to Bukhara in 1832, reported a population of 13,600 Jews; Michael Zand has estimated that the total number of Jews was around 6,000–6,500; and a contemporary Bukharan traveler reported that at the time of Russian conquest the number of Jews in the city of Bukhara was 7,000.

One significant impact of Russian rule was that Central Asia was opened to immigration and thousands of Russians migrated to the region, including Ashkenazi Jews. By the end of the century many major cities in Russian Turkestan had sizable populations of European Jews, and in some cities Ashkenazim even outnumbered indigenous Bukharan Jews. Relations between the two communities were strained, as the Ashkenazim viewed the indigenous Bukharan Jews as little different from their Muslim neighbors, and intermarriage remained rare, even through the Soviet period. Jewish migration within Central Asia also increased after the Bukharan government placed heavy taxes on Jews and banned the sale of land to Jews; Bukharan Jews in Russian Turkestan, however, were granted Russian citizenship and the right to relocate to Russian territory. The influx of Ashkenazim and Bukharan Jews caused the Jewish population in the cities of Samarkand, Tashkent, and Kokand to increase from only a few hundred to several thousand. Jewish communities were also founded in what would become the urban centers of modern Central Asia: Osh and Bishkek in Kyrgyzstan, Vernyi (modern Almaty) in Kazakhstan, Dushanbe in Tajikistan, and Merv in Turkmenistan. Most Bukharan Jews arrived in Russian Turkestan penniless and had few useful skills, as the traditional trade of cotton dyeing was made obsolete by the introduction of factory-made textiles. Most Bukharan Jews in Russian Turkestan worked as small peddlers, shoe repairers, and hairdressers, but some Jewish merchants became wealthy. Jews were pioneers in converting Central Asian farms for cotton cultivation and a few Jewish families, such as the Va'adiyaevs, Patilahovs, and Davidovs, held monopolies over the cotton and silk trade and achieved great affluence.

In the last two decades of the 19th century, Moscow's anti-Semitic domestic policy reached Russian Turkestan. Jews were designated as "indigenous Jew" and granted full rights equal to local Muslims, or non-resident alien Jews, and given few rights. In 1910–1913, the governor-general of Russian-controlled territories ordered the expulsion of nonnative Jews from the cities of Samarkand, Tashkent, and much of the Fergana Valley, which resulted in mixed success, as many Jews managed to avoid the order. Jews also faced attacks in Bukhara from the Jadid, a secular Muslim reformist movement that in its literature demonized Jews because of their economic good fortunes. During this period, Bukharan Jews migrated to Palestine in increasing numbers. Bukharan Jews first made aliyah in 1827 and from that point on small groups of Jews settled in Palestine. In the 1880s, Zionist emissaries arrived from Palestine to encourage emigration, and from 1889 until World War I more than 1,500 Bukharan Jews, who at this time numbered more than 15,000, moved to Palestine, where they established a Bukharan quarters in Jerusalem. Among these was Yosef Maman's highly educated grandson, Shimon Haham. In 1870, he opened a religious school in Bukhara. A dearth of Jewish texts in Bukhara prompted Haham to translate numerous religious books in Judeo-Tajik, but he had to travel to Palestine to print and purchase the books. In the 1890s, Haham permanently relocated to Jerusalem, where he translated more than 50 books into Bukharan, including the entire Torah. In fact, Palestine, rather than Bukhara, became the center for Judeo-Tajik publications, and 120 books were published in the Holy Land in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. One notable exception was the Judeo-Tajik newspaper Rahamin (Mercy) published from 1910 to 1914 in the city of Skobelev (modern Fergana in Uzbekistan).

Jews in the Soviet Era

When the Bolsheviks first arrived in Central Asia after the revolution of 1917 they took a moderate tone toward religion in an attempt not to anger the region's Muslim majority. Jews held elected positions in many of the various governments that formed across the region, including the Tashkent Soviet. Many Ashkenazim embraced a radical secular stance, and Jews held a dominant position in the Turkestan Communist Party; local Ashkenazim even organized a Turkestan branch of the Yevseksia, the Jewish Communist Party. The Jewish communists at first adopted a tolerant stance toward the use of Hebrew, as it was the only language Ashkenazim and Bukharan Jews had in common, but soon a drive from within the Yevseksia sought to ban the use of Hebrew in Jewish schools and replace it with Yiddish or Judeo-Tajik. In the summer of 1919, the Turkestan Commissariat of Education passed a decree introducing Judeo-Tajik as the language of education for Jews. This act elicited a great debate among Jews within the Communist Party and the decree was publicly denounced at several meetings. In 1920, Z. L. Amitin-Shapiro, a Lithuanian Jew who had been a Hebrew teacher in Turkestan during the time of the czar and later became a leading Jewish Marxist, even published, with permission of the Council for Culture and Education, a geography textbook in Hebrew; Amitin-Shapiro would later condemn the use of Hebrew. It was not until 1921 that the ban on Hebrew was fully enforced and Judeo-Tajik became the language of instruction in schools.

In 1920, communist forces overthrew the emirate of Bukhara, which had a Jewish population of around 15,000, and created the Bukharan People's Soviet Republic. Four years later, the Bukharan and Turkestan soviet republics were abolished and Central Asia was divided into republics based on nationality. The Uzbek Soviet Socialist Republic was created in 1924, and republics were later created for the Turkmen (1925), Tajiks (1929), Kyrgyz (1936), and Kazakhs (1936). The advent of Soviet rule brought an end to the traditional system of Jewish autonomy and replaced it with Jewish committees loyal to the government. Jews who resisted were frequently killed, including the last kalontar of Bukhara, Pinehas Rabbin, who was murdered in 1920 and replaced with a seven-man commission that included a rabbi. In the early 1920s, the Bolsheviks granted leniency to merchants and Jews continued to work in their traditional trades, but by the end of the decade Jews were fully engaged in the collectivized economy. Beginning in 1926, an experiment began in converting Jews into agriculturalists, and by 1929 as many as 30 Jewish collective farms had been created. The Jewish collective farms would fail—all were abandoned by the 1950s—but the government found greater success employing Jews as factory workers and organizing cooperatives of Jewish craftspeople. In Uzbekistan, Jews worked in a silk mill, a soap factory, and a cotton gin, and by 1933 there were 2,500 Jewish factory workers in the republic; that same year, 3,000 Jewish craftspeople were registered members of cooperatives.

During the 1920s and early 1930s, Jewish culture in Central Asia underwent an officially sanctioned renaissance. Jews were employed as actors, directors, musicians, and composers throughout Central Asia, and Judeo-Tajik performances appeared in local theaters. Publications in Hebrew were banned, but Judeo-Tajik literature increased in number. In the late 1920s, only a handful of Judeo-Tajik publications were issued, but by 1933 that number had climbed to 177, albeit most of these were textbooks and government propaganda pieces. Jewish schools were opened, and in 1930 there were 30 schools with 3,000 pupils in Uzbekistan; four years later, the number of students enrolled increased to 4,000. Although cultural experimentation was encouraged, Jewish religious and political autonomy began to be dismantled in 1928 as part of a nationwide antireligious campaign that resulted in the closure of nearly all synagogues in Central Asia by the mid-1930s. Jewish political committees were also closed, and the Yevsektsia was disbanded in 1930. That same year the expropriation of Jewish property began and in 1932 Jewish valuables were confiscated. The government crackdown elicited a new wave of Jewish emigrants, and between 1924 and 1935, when the border was sealed, around 4,000 Jews illegally emigrated from Soviet Central Asia, mostly over the border with Iran and Afghanistan; some settled there and others continued on to Palestine. In the late 1930s and early 1940s, Jewish schools, theaters, and publications were closed, and 1,000 Central Asian Jews, including political leaders and cultural figures, were purged in Stalin's Great Terror of 1937–1938.

During World War II, antireligious campaigns were relaxed and anti-Semitism dropped off. As many as 4,000 Central Asian Jews fought in the war, many of whom perished, and Jewish actors and musicians participated in wartime tours of the Soviet Union. A new wave of thousands of Ashkenazim arrived as deportees and refugees from Europe. In the late 1930s, Jews were deported from the Ukraine, Byelorussia, Poland, and the Baltic States to Central Asia, and thousands more arrived as refugees by the end of the war, further increasing a Jewish population that numbered around 60,000 before the war. After the war a harsh anti-Semitic campaign was launched in 1948 and lasted until Stalin's death in 1953, after which time some synagogues were allowed to reopen and Jews enjoyed limited freedoms. One forbidden topic for Jews was Zionism. The Soviet press embraced anti-Israeli polemics and any praise of the Jewish state met with severe punishment. During the wars between Israel and the Arab states in 1956, 1967, and 1973, Jews were forced to openly condemn Israel in the press, march in the streets in support of the Arab states, and even make financial donations to Israel's enemies. The ban on Jewish cultural, political, or religious organizations continued until the late 1980s. The lack of Jewish education led to a decline in religious observance among youth, and many young Bukharan Jews preferred to speak Russian rather than Judeo-Tajik. In 1971, restrictions on emigration were eased in the Soviet Union and an exodus of Jews left for Israel and the West. By the late 1980s, 17,000 Bukharan Jews, as well as many Ashkenazim, had left Central Asia.

After the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991, the republics of Central Asia gained independence. The continuous stream of Jews leaving Central Asia that began in the 1970s now became a torrent of emigrants. In no country was the exodus greater than in Uzbekistan, where the number of Jews fell from 95,000 to less than a fifth of that number by the end of the decade. In Tajikistan, civil war drove nearly the entire Jewish population, which numbered 14,800 in 1989, to leave the country, including thousands who left in an Israeli emergency airlift in the fall of 1992. In Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Turkmenistan similar declines occurred. Across the Amu Darya River in Afghanistan, more than two decades of war reduced the Jewish population to only a handful of people. Today, the population of Bukharan Jews in Israel (60,000) and the United States (25,000) dwarfs that of all Bukharan Jews in Central Asia (3,000), which in the late 1980s numbered 45,000. Despite their decline in numbers, the remaining 35,000–40,000 Ashkenazim and Bukharan Jews in Central Asia have, in the last two decades, reestablished spiritual and cultural traditions with the assistance of foreign organizations.

Selected Bibliography

- Ben-Zvi, Itzhak. 1963. The Exiled and the Redeemed. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America.
- Facing West: Oriental Jews of Central Asia and the Caucasus*. 1999. Zwolle: Waanders Uitgevers Zwolle.
- Fischel, Walter J. 1964. "The Leaders of the Jews of Bokhara." In Jewish Leaders 1750–1940, edited by Leo Jung, 535–547. Jerusalem: Boys Town.
- Fuzailoff, Giora. "Rabbanic Succession in Bukhara, 1790–1930." Bukharan Jewish Global Portal Web site. <http://www.bjews.com/> (accessed May 19, 2008).

- Gilboa, Jehoshua A. 1982. A Language Silenced: Hebrew Culture in the Soviet Union. Rutherford, NJ: Fairleigh Dickinson University.
- Karmysheva, B. Kh. "The Arabs and Jews of Central Asia." Central Asian Review 12: 271–274
- "Literature of Bukharan Jewry." Bukharian Jews USA Web site. http://www.bjewsusa.com/HI\_literature\_of\_bukharan\_jewry.htm (accessed May 19, 2008).
- Lowental, R. 1958. The Judeo-Muslim Marranos of Bukhara. Washington, DC: Georgetown University.
- Pinkhasov, Peter. "Bukharian Jews in WWII." Bukharan Jewish Global Portal Web site. <http://www.bjews.com/> (accessed May 19, 2008).
- Pinkhasov, Peter. "The History of Bukharian Jews." Bukharan Jewish Global Portal Web site. <http://www.bjews.com/> (accessed May 19, 2008).
- Poujol, Catherine. 1993. "Approaches to the History of Bukharan Jews' Settlement in the Fergana Valley, 1867–1917." Central Asian Survey 12: 549–556.
- Vishnevetsky, Alexander. 2004. "The Exodus of the Jews from Central Asia." Jews of Euro-Asia 3, no. 7 (Sept.–Dec.). http://www.eajc.org/publish\_print\_e.php?rowid=89 (accessed May 19, 2008).
- Zand, Michael. 1979. Bukharan Jewish Culture under Soviet Rule. Soviet Jewish Affairs 9 (2): 15–23.
- Zand, Michael. 1991. "Notes on Culture of the Non-Ashkenazi Jewish Communities under Soviet Rule." In Jewish Culture and Identity in the Soviet Union, edited by Yaacov Roi, 379–443. New York: New York University Press.
- Zand, Michael. 1991. "Patterns of Sovietization of Oriental Jewish Culture: Bukharan Jewish Culture, 1918–1940—A Case Study." Soviet Jewish Affairs 21 (1): 47–52.
- Zand, Michael. Encyclopædia Iranica, s.v. "Bukharan Jews." www.iranica.com (accessed May 19, 2008).

Jews in Afghanistan

Irena Vladimirska

---

General Population: 30,000,000.

Jewish Population: A single known person lives in Kabul.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Jews arrived in Afghanistan during the time of the biblical exodus. Jewish immigrants from Persia and Bukhara would periodically arrive in the country up until the mid-20th century.

Languages Spoken: Afghan Jews are descendants of Persian Jews and speak Judeo-Persian.

---

Historical Overview

8th–6th centuries BCE Traditionally, the Jewish communities of modern Afghanistan trace their beginnings to the Assyrian exile (720 BCE) and the Babylonian Exile (560 BCE), although there is little archaeological evidence to support this traditional belief. The names of some of the local Afghani tribes are said to retain traces of Hebrew origins such as the Durrani (tribe of Dan), the Yussafzai (tribe of Joseph), and the Afridi (tribe of Ephraim).

- 9th century CE The biblical commentaries of Rabbi Sa'adia Gaon (882–942), Karaite Daniel al-Qumisi (ca. 850), and Yaphet ben Eli Hallewi (ca. 900) identified Khorasan as the region to which Jews were exiled. These commentators testify to a thriving Jewish community in the region. The discovery of a Jewish cemetery in the city of Ghur in 1946 testifies to the existence of a large and flourishing Jewish community from the 8th to the 13th centuries BCE.
- 10th century The Jewish community of Balkh is mentioned in Kitab al-Maslik ul-Mamalik (A Book of Routes and Countries), written by the Arab geographer and chronicler Mohammed Abul-Kassem ibn Hawqal in 951 CE. In this book, he refers to those “who called themselves Jews,” probably Khazars or Karaites, and to Jews who can be identified as the Radaniya Jews, a unique group of Jewish international merchants in the late eighth to early ninth century, who maintained close economic ties with the Jewish kingdom of Khazaria.
- 12th century Mohammed El-Idrisi, a Muslim historian and geographer (ca. 1099–ca. 1166), mentions Jewish communities in the cities of Ghazni and Kabul and chronicler Benjamin of Tudela (d. 1173) reports that “Ghaznah is the great city on the river Gozen, where there are about 80,000 Israelites.” It was a city of commercial importance for Central and South Asia. After the Mongolian invasion of the region at the beginning of the 13th century, these community members either scatter or are forced to convert to Islam.
- 18th century The Durrani dynasty comes to power in the Afghan kingdom. At this time, the local Jewish community is isolated from neighboring Diaspora communities.
- 1839–1840 After Jews are forced to convert to Islam, some 200 Jewish families of Mashad, in Iran, flee to Herat, the main Jewish community in Afghanistan. These new immigrants help strengthen the existing Jewish institutions and contribute to Jewish life in general in Afghanistan. For much of the 19th century, and for the first half of the 20th century, Herat is the main Jewish community in Afghanistan.
- Early 20th century There are various estimates regarding the extent of the Jewish population in the territory of Afghanistan at this time. Older sources tend to put the number at close to 40,000 persons living in about 60 communities, but modern researchers consider this number to be greatly exaggerated and generally agree on a much smaller figure of only 4,000 and around 15 communities, with some only hosting a temporary Jewish presence of merchants. Until the middle of the 20th century, the Jews of Afghanistan have little contact with modernity and their links are limited to the neighboring Jewish communities in Iran, Central Asia, and India.
- 1917 The Jewish community receives an upsurge in numbers as Jews flee the neighboring Bukharan emirate after the Bolshevik Revolution. Most of these refugees settled in Kabul and merge with the local community.
- 1930 The two main Jewish communities of Afghanistan are located in the cities of Kabul and Herat, each numbering about 2,000 Jews. Balkh has the third-largest Jewish community, made up of many immigrants from Central Asia: smaller Jewish communities are found in the towns of Ghazni and Kandahar.

- 1933 Jews are allowed to live only in Herat, Balkh, and Kandahar, and are forbidden to leave the city without special permission from the authorities. Jews are forced to live in separate districts; in Balkh, the gates of the Jewish district are closed during the night.
- 1948–1950 Until the 1940s, Zionist activities are banned in Afghanistan, though several thousand Jews manage to emigrate to Eretz Israel and other foreign destinations. The founding of the State of Israel prompts a surge in Jews making aliyah, and from June 1948 until June 1950, 459 Jewish families leave Afghanistan for the Holy Land.
- 1951 Jews are officially allowed to leave Afghanistan.
- 1979 The Soviet Union invades Afghanistan, unleashing a decade of bloody occupation. At this time, as many as 5,000 Jews remain in Afghanistan.
- 1992 The communist government in Kabul falls and Afghanistan collapses into civil war. The Jewish community is decimated by emigration.
- 2007 Western press reports that 44-year-old Zablun Simintov is the last Jew known to live in Afghanistan.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Afghan Jews were active in the cotton and silk trade and specialized in the dyeing process. Making the dye, which is produced from the bodies of the female cochineal insect and indigo, renders the worker's hands blue, causing many to falsely believe this is a characteristic of the Jews of Afghanistan.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

The traditional Afghan Jewish costume was similar to that of the Muslim population with the exception of the black turban worn by all Jewish men. According to one tradition, the black turban was considered a sign of mourning for the destruction of the Temple of Jerusalem. Others believe the Jews were forced to wear black turbans as a mark to distinguish them from the Muslim population.

Jewish Education and Communal Institutions

For a long time, Herat was home to the largest Jewish community in the territory of modern Afghanistan. Located in the western parts of the country, the local Jews were culturally connected to the Jews of Iran. The Jewish community of Herat was strictly hierarchical. The first group, the communal elite, was made up of Jewish immigrants from Mashhad. They spoke Gilkhi—the original dialect of Judeo-Persian language spoken only by rabbis of Mashhad and their descendents. The second group consisted of wealthy local merchants and rabbis who spoke the main dialect of Judeo-Persian language, and the third and the poorest group included immigrants from the Iranian city of Yezd who continued to use their own dialect. There were four synagogues in Herat, all of them built at the end of the 19th to the beginning of the 20th centuries: Samuel, Yoav, Gul, and Gardji. Yoav synagogue was named in memory of Rabbi Yoav Siman Tov, one of the main spiritual leaders of the Herat Jewish community. It was built in the 1880s and was the most beautiful and the biggest of Herat synagogues. Gul synagogue was completed in the 1870s and was the last synagogue to be closed in 1972. Gardji synagogue was built in 1840 with donations from the rich merchant family Gardji; in 1940, it was the first to be destroyed. Samuel synagogue was built in 1902 and named in memory of its first rabbi. All the synagogues served as educational centers for rabbinical studies. The Jews of Afghanistan used Hebrew for liturgy and religious studies, while Judeo-Persian was the main language for day-to-day usage. In addition, there were distinct differences between the dialect of Kabul and those spoken in other communities. War has forced many Jews to leave the country, and in the last decades there has been almost no organized Jewish life in Afghanistan.

Selected Bibliography

- Adler, Markus Nathan, ed. 1907. The Itinerary of Benjamin of Tudela. London: Frowde, 58–59.
- Baram ben Yosef, Noam, ed. 1997. Boi Kala: Manhigei Irosin ve Hatuna shel' Yehudei Afganistan [Bride Bringing In: Engagement and Wedding Customs of the Jews of Afghanistan]. Jerusalem: Israeli Museum.
- Bezalel, Izhak. 1999. Eda bifnei atzma: Yahadut Afganistan ve Hituba bein Edot Paras u Bukhara [A Community of Its Own: The Jews of Afghanistan and Their Classification between the Hews of Iran and Bukhara]. Pe'a'mim 79: 15–40.
- Chaffets, David. 1984. A Journey through Afghanistan. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Ewans, Martin. 2002. Afghanistan: A Short History of Its People and Politics. Repr. New York: Harper Perennial.
- Ferrier, J. P., William Jesse, and Henry Donby Seymour, 1856. Caravan Journeys and Wanderings in Persia, Afghanistan, Turkistan and Beloochistan; with Historical Notices of the Countries Lying between Russia and India. Translated by William Jesse. London: J. Murray.
- Shterenshis, Michael. 2002. Tamerlane and the Jews. London: Routledge.

Jews in Kazakhstan

Irena Vladimirsky

General Population: 14,800,000

Jewish Population: Estimates range from 15,000–20,000 (National Conference on Soviet Jewry)

Percent of Population: Approximately 0.9 percent

Jewish Population by City: Alma Ata is the main Jewish center of the country with approximately 10,000 individuals. Smaller Jewish communities are spread out across the country in such places as Karaganda, Chimkent, Astana, Semipalatinsk, Kokchetav, Dzhabambul, Uralsk, Aktyubinsk, and Petropavlovsk.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Ashkenazi Jews arrived from the Pale of Settlement and later from Russia during the Soviet period. Small communities of Bukharan and Caucasian Jews also reside in the country.

Languages Spoken: Nearly all speak Russian. Yiddish and Judeo-Tajik are rarely spoken.

Historical Overview

- 1825 The first mention of 12 Ashkenazi Jews who work as petty traders in the Semipalatinsk region of the Steppe region.
- 1865–1867 The territory of Kazakhstan becomes part of the Russian Empire. Jews from the Pale of Settlement and retired soldiers and officers receive permission to settle here.
- 1870 Jews with academic degrees are encouraged to settle on recently conquered territories of the Russian Empire. The first three Jews settle in Vernyi (now Alma Ata); they are a veterinarian, a dentist, and a gynecologist.
- 1879 Eighty-one Jews live permanently in Vernyi.
- 1884 The first synagogue opens in Vernyi in a small old wooden building.
- 1897 Ninety-nine Ashkenazi Jews live in Vernyi; in the whole Vernenskii region, the Jewish population is 177 persons.
- 1908 The first Jewish community is officially registered in Vernyi; 101 signatures are added to a request to Nicolas II to register the community with words of blessing to the ruling Romanov's family.
- 1910 The first census on national minorities of Siberia and the Turkestan general-governorship is held. According to the census, 206 Jews live in Vernyi, 35 in Aktyuibinsk, and 154 in Akmolinsk (now Astana).
- 1920s–1930s The Jewish population of Kazakhstan grows steadily. There are two main sources for the growth: the Bolshevik Party encourages Jewish youths were encouraged to help the industrialization and collectivization processes in the backward Central Asian republics, and Kazakhstan becomes the main place of political exile for former Zionists, undesirable party members, and religious leaders.
- 1926 The First All-Union population census is held. The Jewish population of the entire republic is 3,600 persons, 230–240 of whom live in Vernyi (the total population of the city is 45,000).
- 1939 The Second All-Union population census is held. The Jewish population of Alma Ata is 2,216 (population of the entire city is 230,000). In all of Kazakhstan, the Jewish population is 19,200.
- October 1939 Rabbi Levi Yitzhak Schneerson of Lubavitch is exiled, first to a work camp near Kzyl Orda, and later to Alma Ata. His house immediately becomes the center of Jewish life in the city.
- 1941–1945 During World War II, numerous Jews from western regions of the Soviet Union are evacuated to Kazakhstan. The Jewish population of the region doubles.
- 1950 The Alma Ata synagogue is torn down under the pretext of general reconstruction in the city; an alternative building is promised but never provided.
- 1952–1955 The “doctor’s plot,” in which false accusations are made that Jewish doctors plan to eliminate the Soviet leadership, prompts Anti-Jewish activity. The number of Jewish students at the institutions of higher education and the number of officials of Jewish origin in different governmental structures of the republic are strictly limited.

- 1979 The First All-Union population census after World War II shows 8,592 Jews in Alma Ata (0.9 percent of the city's entire population).
- 1985 The politics of openness and glasnost begin in the Soviet Union. All informal voluntary organizations are allowed by Soviet officials.
- 1989 The first Jewish cultural society, Shalom, is organized in Alma Ata
- 1990 The first Jewish newspaper, the Russian-language publication Shalom, is published in Alma Ata.
- 1990–1993 Numerous Jewish cultural and social organizations are founded: Vaad, of the Jewish communities of Kazakhstan; the Association of the Jewish Youth of Kazakhstan; the republican center Dror, for studying and developing Jewish culture; and Maccabi, a sports organization.
- 1992 The Alma Ata synagogue reopens, the republican branch of Bnei Akiva is organized, and the first Jewish kindergarten and first Jewish school open.
- 1994 Rabbi Joshua Cohen of Chabad is appointed the chief rabbi of Kazakhstan.
- 2000 The Jewish Congress of Kazakhstan and the Mitzvah Jewish association begin operations. Three Russian-language Jewish community newspapers are published in Kazakhstan: Davar, Shalom, Mabat.
- November 2002 The first international conference devoted to the history of Jews in Kazakhstan is held in Alma Ata.
- September 2004 The biggest synagogue, Beth Rachel, and Jewish community center in Central Asia open in Astana.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

The first Jewish settlers in Kazakhstan established a system of medical care and assisted the local nomad population. A. Ryazanovskii organized the first public hospital in Vernyi. M. Rosenblum built the first pharmaceutical factory in the region during the 1930s. G. Hamburg built the first factory for refreshment drinks, which was later nationalized by the Bolsheviks.

Jews aided in the realization of the “Virgin Land” policy, the resettlement in Kazakhstan of millions of migrants from Western regions of the Soviet Union, from 1954 to 1960. Jews headed the first agricultural laboratories and developed the study of grain cultures in geographically restricted regions such as the Akmolinskii region.

The modern Jewish community has focused on culture and higher education and economics. Several Jews have taken ministerial and advisory posts in the government of Kazakhstan, including Alexander Mashkevich, a well-known businessman and president of the Eurasian Industrial Association.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Cultural and religious organizations are flourishing and growing in number. Seventeen cities have Jewish social clubs. There are 12 charity Hesed organizations

Jews are active in cultural and educational sectors in Kazakhstan. Evhenii Brusilovsky (1905–1981) settled in Kazakhstan in 1933 and began collecting Kazakh folk music as a member of the local Music Research Institute. Bryssilovsky's first opera, Kyz Zhibek (1934), initiated the development of a Kazakh national opera; it was followed by Zhalbyr (1935), Zolotoe Zerno (1940), Dudaray (1953), and other operas and ballets. He was artistic director of the Kazakh Music Theater (1934–1938) and taught at the Alma Ata conservatory. Natalya Sats (1900–1993), who was arrested during the Stalinist purges in 1937, founded the first theater for children in Kazakhstan.

Jewish Educational and Communal Institutions

The Association of Jewish national republics of Kazakhstan, Mitzva, has been in operation since 1992. In May 1999, the organization received the status of a voluntary public association of the Jewish organizations of Kazakhstan. Mitzvah coordinated the activities of 15 cultural Jewish associations, 12 Hesed charity organizations, and 12 Jewish community centers. The Jewish Congress of Kazakhstan was established in 1999 and its council was elected; among its members are prominent community leaders, for example, the chief rabbi of Kazakhstan, Joshua Cohen. The main purpose of the congress is the popularization and preservation of Jewish culture and traditions, charity work, social programs, and wide support for Jewish education.

There are five synagogues in Kazakhstan; the two in Alma Ata and Pavlodar were sponsored by the congress. The congress supported the program Family Summer Camps, which helped to strengthen ties between different family generations and preserve Jewish traditions. The 14 Jewish day schools that are active in Kazakhstan have more than 700 pupils. The main cities of Kazakhstan have organized community centers for studying Hebrew and Yiddish.

Rabbi Yeshaya Cohen greets guests inside the newly opened Menachem House Jewish Community Center and Levy Yitzhok Synagogue in Almaty, Kazakhstan, 1997. (Reuters/Corbis)

Major organizations include the following:

- The JCK (Jewish Congress of Kazakhstan): founded in 1999.
- HESED: a charity organization that provides financial and food support to needy Jewish families.
- Bnei Akiva: a religious youth organization that has branches in Alma Ata, Astana, Kzyl Orda, and Semipalatinsk.
- Chabad-Lubavitch: an international religious movement with local membership that offers religious and social services in 17 cities, including the main synagogue and educational and community centers in Astana, the new capital of Kazakhstan.
- The Mitzvah Association: it has created educational, cultural, and community programs.
- The Maccabi: a voluntary sports organization for Jewish youth.
- The Moadon: a collection of youth centers that are popular hangouts for Jewish teens; they also teach Jewish culture and history and Hebrew.
- OFEK (Community Festival of Jewish Books): an organization that coordinates annual Jewish book festivals in Alma Ata, Astana, and other cities and distributes the Jewish periodicals Davar, Shalom, and Dror.

Selected Bibliography

- Grinberg, Isaak. 2005. Evrei v Alma Ate: Kratkii istoricheskii ocherk. Alma Ata, Kazakhstan: Iskander.
- "Kazakh Soviet Socialist Republic." 1980. In The New Encyclopedia Britannica, vol. 10. Chicago: Encyclopedia Britannica, 407–411.
- "Kazakhstan." In Encyclopedia Judaica. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 43.
- "Kazakhstan Country Page." National Conference on Soviet Jewry Web site. www.ncsj.org/Kazakhstan.shtml (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Krichevsky, Lev. 2002. "Kazakhstan, Jewish Families Carry on a Tradition Born in Persia." National Conference on Soviet Jewry.
- Medding, Peter Y. 1995. Values, Interests and Identities in a Changing World. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Olcott, Martha Brill. 2002. Kazakhstan: Unfulfilled Promise. Washington, DC: Carnegie Endowment.

Jews in Kyrgyzstan

Irena Vladimirska

General Population: 5 million

Jewish Population: 1,000

Percent of Population: Less than 1 percent

Jewish Population by City: Jewish populations exist in Osh, Karakol, and Dzhahal-Abad.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Most Jews are Ashkenazim who arrived in the late 19th and early 20th centuries and a smaller number of Bukharan Jews.

Languages Spoken: Most speak Russian. Yiddish and Judeo-Tajik are also spoken.

Historical Overview

6th century Jewish traders from Khazaria start visiting Kyrgyz territory. Other evidence of early Jewish history is found in Kyrgyz folklore sources.

8th century Kyrgyz tribes in their homeland in China begin to use the Star of David in their architecture and crafts.

10th century The term dzeet (Jew) is found for the first time in the Kyrgyz national epic poem Manas, which probably incorporates earlier traditions. An entire section of the poem is dedicated to “King Solomon’s times.” Several popular Kyrgyz legends refer to a 130-meter high mountain near the city of Osh as King Solomon’s throne (Takht-i-Sulaiman). The famous Arab geographer Al-Maqdisi (946–1000), who traveled extensively in the lands of Islam, mentions the cities of Osh, Balasagun, Uzgen, Taraz, and others as having communities of akhl-az-zimma, or non-Muslim medieval Jewish traders. Archaeological evidence of Jewish habitation of Kyrgyzstan dating from the 10th century includes bronze and porcelain objects with the Star of David.

13th century The traditional urban centers of Central Asia are destroyed in the Mongol invasions, and Jewish communities are decimated. Kyrgyz tribes migrate from their homelands in China to what is today Central Asia. The Jewish community enters a period of decline.

18th century At the end of the 18th century, a special Imperial law gives affluent Central Asian merchants permission to become members of trade corporations in the Russian Empire. As a rule, in addition to their commercial activity, these traders carry out special diplomatic and espionage missions. Moses Raphailov, a merchant from the Kashghar region (at the time Kyrgyzstan was a part of Kashgharia), collects important strategic information for the Russian government and in 1811 is awarded an important gold medal for his special contribution to the prosperity of the Russian government.

1880s The first Ashkenazi Jews begin to arrive in the region after the Russian conquest of Central Asia in the 1880s. Some of them arrive with the Russian army as kantonists (Jewish youths conscripted by force to the Russian Imperial army and then forced to convert to Christianity).

1900 A population census mentions 800 Jews in Osh and 250 Jews in Bishkek.

1914–1917 During World War I, thousands of Ashkenazi Jewish war refugees and prisoners of war from the German and Austro-Hungarian armies are sent to Kyrgyzstan where they are compelled to work in coal mines, on irrigation projects and railway routes, and as technical personnel in the local factories. In contrast, local Bukharan Jews are conscripted into the Russian military and sent to the front.

- 1917–1920s After the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917, new political activists arrive in Kyrgyzstan, many of whom are communists of Jewish background, including G. Broido, chairman of the Bishkek City Soviet, and members of local city Soviets in Osh, Dzhahal-Abad, and Tokmak. They are subsequently persecuted during the Stalinist purges of the 1930s.
- 1920s At the initiative of the local Ministry of Education, a Jewish institute, with the aim of ending illiteracy, is set up in Kyrgyzstan under the leadership of Simon Dimanshtein, who is later instrumental in organizing a Jewish settlement in Biribidjan. The institute organizes circles and clubs for the conversion of Sephardic Jewish literature to the Cyrillic script and establishes a network of primary schools intended to preserve their unique culture and language—mainly dialects of Persian and Uzbek languages that are spoken by Sephardic Jews. A network of technical colleges is supposed to create a new type of Soviet Sephardic Jews: factory workers and schoolteachers, instead of shop owners and money dealers. From 1920 to 1940, some 750 Judeo-Tajik language books and one newspaper are published by the Soviet authorities in Osh, Bishkek, and Dzalal-Abad, especially by UchPedGiz (The Educational Study Publishing House), which encourages the printing of books, particularly textbooks, in the languages of national minorities.
- 1929 Soviet authorities establish a branch of the Militant Atheist-Marxist Association in Kyrgyzstan. More than 1,880 clerics—priests, rabbis, and mullahs—are denied their electoral rights. Nevertheless, Jews attempt to observe Jewish religious traditions in secret. For the Passover holiday, each family bakes matzoth at home: several families meet together and celebrate the Sabbath and holidays. Circumcision, too, is practiced clandestinely: a number of families organize a ceremony and pay for a mohel to be specially brought to Kyrgyzstan from Tashkent, in neighboring Uzbekistan. Alexander Volodarsky, a former yeshiva student in Vitebsk, who is exiled from Byelorussia because of his religious beliefs, becomes a well-known unofficial leader of the Jewish community in the city of Osh. Volodarsky acts as shohet and is regarded as an authority on kashruth. He repeatedly assails the city authorities with requests for setting up a separate section for Jewish burial in the cemetery of Osh. Thanks to his endeavors, members of the Jewish community of Osh are allowed to be buried in a separate Jewish section until the beginning of World War II. Ashkenazi and Sephardic Jews collect money jointly to maintain the Jewish tombs.
- 1941–1945 During World War II, 20,000 Jews, mostly Ashkenazim, migrate to Kyrgyzstan as war refugees. Authorities lessen religious persecution and synagogues are allowed to open in Bishkek, Osh, and Kant.
- 1945 The Jewish religious community of Bishkek gains official recognition. Jews are allowed to visit synagogue daily, and thousands of Jews attend temple during official Jewish holidays.
- 1950s A nationwide anti-Semitic campaign results in severe restrictions on the religious life of Jews in Kyrgyzstan. Jews continue to secretly collect funds for synagogues and to support the needy and elderly.

1959 The census records 5,800 Jews in Kyrgyzstan.

1989 The census records 5,200 Jews in Kyrgyzstan.

1991 Kyrgyzstan gains independence. Regional political instability and economic impoverishment cause a large number of Jews to emigrate.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Numerous Jews were among the owners of different enterprises and companies in the territory of Kyrgyzstan. Yuri Davidov owned cotton factories in the Fergana Valley; Boris Kagan established a network of bookshops; and the Polyakov brothers founded a branch of the Azov-Don Commercial Bank. In the late years of the 19th century, I. M. Singer & Company, the famous American sewing machine manufacturer founded by Isaac Merritt Singer, opened shops in the territory of Kyrgyzstan as a result of the gradual development of the Fergana Valley into a center of the cotton textile industry based on the local agricultural production. According to the 1905 decree on religious tolerance, members of non-Christian religions were permitted to settle in various parts of the Russian Empire. Kyrgyzstan, a remote region of the Russian Empire that was in great demand for doctors, engineers, teachers, and qualified artisans, attracted Jewish immigrants from Poland, Lithuania, Iran, and Iraq.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Notable Jews of Kyrgyzstan include the following: Amnepodist Varaskin (1820–1878), a famous geographer, cartographer, and former kantonist, investigated the region and drew maps of the northern Tien Shan Mountains, the Balkhash region, and the Chu Valley. Pinkas Lipshits, a former book trader who settled in Bishkek after the Russian occupation of Central Asia. He published not only religious literature—mainly in Hebrew with commentaries in Yiddish or Russian—but also works by Tolstoy, Goethe, and Shakespeare in Yiddish translations from Russian. Historian and revolutionary Zalman Amitin-Shapiro (1894–1944), the son of a rabbi, earned degrees in law and Oriental studies simultaneously from Turkestan University. He was the author of a number of studies on the history of the Jews of Bukhara in Kyrgyzstan: Women at a Wedding Ceremony of the Bukharan Jews of Turkestan (1924), Common Law of the Bukharan Jewish Communities (1926), and On the Practice of Socialization among the Bukharan Jews of Turkestan (1933). In 1937, he was named professor of ancient history at the State Education Institute of Kyrgyzstan, but, a year later, he was arrested, accused of being an enemy of the people, and exiled to Siberia, where he died in 1944.

The first gramophone recordings of Sephardi Jews were made in 1910. The Sephardi Jews published Rahamim, a newspaper that appeared in Fergana and Kokand, while Ashkenazi Jews in Kokand established a Tarbut cultural-educational association with branches all over the territory of Central Asia. A Yiddish theater company was one of the activities promoted by this association. During World War II the Jewish Theatre Company of Warsaw, with the renowned actress Ida Kaminska (1899–1980), was evacuated to Kyrgyzstan. The Jewish theater performed in Yiddish, Polish, Ukrainian, and Byelorussian before returning to Poland after the war.

Religious Denominations

Not much is known about the religious life of the Jews of Kyrgyzstan before the Bolshevik revolution of 1917. The Jewish community of Osh brought their phylacteries and Torah scrolls from Bukhara. Some religious books, mostly editions of Torah and the Babylonian Talmud, with commentaries in the Jewish dialects of Persian or Uzbek languages, were published in Kyrgyzstan in the early 20th century. Until 1915, there were no synagogues in Kyrgyzstan. The nearest synagogues were in Vernyi (now Almaty in Kazakhstan), Tashkent, Samarkand, and Fergana (now in Uzbekistan). Local Jews used to gather for prayer in the houses of local rabbis. The officials of the chevra kadisha (funeral association) were sent to Kyrgyzstan from Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan. A separate Jewish cemetery existed only in Osh. In Bishkek there was a distinct Jewish burial section in the local Muslim cemetery, while in other cities Jews preferred to use separate Jewish sections in Christian cemeteries.

During World War II, the hardships of war brought about a change in the official policy concerning the relationship between state and religion. The Soviet policy during those years assumed that every religion had an important duty in consolidating the Soviet society facing the German enemy. In 1941, for the first time a public synagogue in Kyrgyzstan was allowed to be opened in Bishkek (then known as Frunze). Jews bought a building in the city center and Y. Levin, the first rabbi, donated a Torah scroll. The synagogue provided services of mohel, shohet, and chevra kadisha. A beth midrash and a mikvah functioned on the premises. Special shops selling kosher meat, haloth for Sabbath, and matzoth for Passover opened near the synagogue. Additional synagogues were established in the cities of Osh and Kant.

Jewish Education and Communal Institutions

Since the times of Russian occupation, there has been no primary Jewish education for the Jews of Kyrgyzstan. Some Sephardi Jews sent their children to heder in Samarkand, but Ashkenazi Jews kept Jewish traditions only within the family circle and sent their children to Russian educational institutions.

In the post-Soviet period, Jewish culture and religious life underwent a revival that saw the opening of a Ashkenazi synagogue in Bishkek and several Bukharan synagogues in towns in the Ferghana Valley. In Bishkek, the Menorah Center runs a Sunday school, distributes charity food for the elderly, and publishes the Ma'ayan newspaper. In addition, there is an Aish Hatorah education center, several Maccabi sports organizations, a Jewish theater, and a dance group.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

Ashkenazi Jews settled mostly in the provincial cities of Kyrgyzstan and became an inseparable part of the urban culture of the region. In the city of Karakol (formerly Przhhevsk), in eastern Kyrgyzstan, just one Jew was recorded in 1885, and in 1900 there were seven Jews. Their numbers grew to 15 in 1903, and in 1910 the city had 31 Jewish inhabitants. In 1885, eight Jews lived in Bishkek, but in 1913, the Jewish residents of the city numbered 42. In the city of Osh, Jews of Ashkenazi and Sephardi origin lived separately. Ashkenazi Jews dwelled in the new, European part of the city along with Russians and Tatars, but Sephardi Jews—some considered subjects of the Russian Empire and others regarded as subjects of foreign states—inhabited the old district of Osh. Everyday life of Sephardi Jews was very much like that of their Muslim neighbors: They built their houses in the Uzbek style, consumed similar food, and dressed in similar clothes, but they lived in separate communities from the local Uzbek or Persian inhabitants. According to the report of the local authorities, compiled by the governor-general of Turkestan at the request of the central Tsarist authorities, in 1898, the largest Jewish community was in the Osh region of Kyrgyzstan. Practically all Jews were city residents, as the national policy of the Russian Empire forbade Jews from settling in villages. There was a separate Jewish cemetery near Osh. The grounds for the cemetery were purchased from the local population in the 1880s, as it was difficult to bury Jews in Bukhara.

During World War II, more than 20,000 Jews who fled from the Nazi-occupied western territories of the Soviet Union were resettled in the cities and villages of Kyrgyzstan. The life of Jews resettled in the countryside was particularly difficult as they lacked any previous experience of agricultural labor. In Soviet villages, wages were paid according to the number of working days. As a working day was measured by the quantity of the harvested agricultural products, only people familiar with agricultural work were able to fulfill the norm. Consequently, many Jews received salaries that barely enabled them to survive. The local population's attitude toward Jewish refugees was rather suspicious, and they generally regarded the newly arrived Jews as following the Western capitalist way of life. Several Jews were arrested for their alleged counterrevolutionary activity and spreading of lies about the bourgeois way of life.

In 1990, as many as 1,000 Jews emigrated. Over the next decade, the population continued to decline from more than 5,000 individuals to 1,000 today.

Selected Bibliography

- Allworth, Ed. ed. 1967. Central Asia: A Century of Russian Rule. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Bartol'd, V. V. 1961. Istoriya Kul'turnoi Zhizni Turkestana. Vol. 3, 122–123. Moscow: Akademii Nauk SSSR.
- “Kyrgyz Republic Country Page.” National Conference on Soviet Jewry Web site. <http://www.ncsj.org/Kyrgyzstan.shtml> (accessed April 20, 2007).
- Margolis, Alexander. “Manifestations of Anti-Semitism in Kyrgyzstan (2002–2004).” Euro-Asian Jewish Congress Web site. http://www.eajc.org/program\_art\_e.php?id=20 (accessed April 20, 2007).
- Riss, E. 1993. “The Jews of Bishkek (Frunze): A Socio-Demographic Profile of a Small Jewish Community.” Jews in Eastern Europe 21 (2): 37.
- The Jewish Encyclopedia*. 1904. s.v. “Turkestan.” New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 585–586.
- Yarkov, A. P. 2002 Evrei v Kirgizstane. Bishkek, Kyrgyzstan: Menora.
- Yarkov, A. P. 2002. Ocherk Istorii Religii v Kyrgyzstane. Bishkek, Kyrgyzstan: Ilim.

Jews in Tajikistan

David Straub

---

General Population: 6,864,000

Jewish Population: 250–300 (National Conference on Soviet Jewry)

Percent of Population: Less than 1 percent

Jewish Population by City: Dushanbe, the nation's capital, is the main area of Jewish concentration.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Bukharan Jews first arrived in the mid-1800s, and a large influx of Jews migrated from Uzbekistan in the 1920s and 1930s. Ashkenazim Jews were deported en masse to Central Asia during World War II.

Languages Spoken: Nearly all Jews speak Judeo-Tajik and Russian.

---

Historical Overview

1860s Russia conquers and colonizes Central Asia. Jews first migrate to the Gissar Valley in the mid-19th century and establish quarters in the village of Dushanbe.

Early 1900s The first synagogue is opened in Dushanbe. The first rabbi in Dushanbe is mullo Yuhanon and the first kalontar, or elected head of the community, is David Davydov.

1917–1921 During the Bolshevik Revolution Central Asian Jews rise up in support of the Red Army.

1920s The Soviets begin a repressive secularization campaign that targets Jews, including closing the Dushanbe synagogue. At this time there are only around 600 Jews in Tajikistan.

1924 The emirate of Bukhara is abolished and the Republic of Tajikistan is formed.

Late 1920s The initiation of collectivization brings social upheaval. An attempt is made to convert some urban Central Asian Jewish into farmers. Kolkhozes, or collective farms, are created for Jews in Tajikistan, but they fail and are later discontinued.

1930s Thousands of Bukharan Jews from Uzbekistan settle in Dushanbe, forming the core Jewish settlement in the country. This coincides with a resurgence of Jewish culture and literature. Jewish schools are opened, and Judeo-Tajik and Hebrew literature are published in the new Latin script.

Late 1930s Anti-Jewish activities are stepped up and a ban is placed on Jewish theaters and literature. In spite of persecution many Jews hold academic or bureaucratic positions in the government and Jewish artists excel. The first Ashkenazim arrive in Tajikistan as deportees from European areas of the Soviet Union.

1941–1945 During World War II, anti-Jewish propaganda is curtailed as the nation mobilizes for war. Jews join the Soviet armed forces in mass and many fight valiantly and die in battle. At the same time, thousands of Ashkenazim Jews arrive as refugees fleeing Nazi atrocities in Europe.

- 1948 After World War II, a draconian anti-Semitic campaign is directed at Soviet Jewry. Jewish schools are closed, which leads to a decline in Hebrew and Judeo-Tajik, and anti-Semitic propaganda frequents the official press.
- 1956 During the Sinai campaign, Jewish declarations renouncing Israel appear in newspapers throughout Tajikistan.
- 1958 The Dushanbe synagogue is allowed to reopen, but the building remains state property.
- 1960s At this time, Jews represent 5–7 percent of the 300,000 inhabitants in Dushanbe. Bukharan and Ashkenazim Jews each have their own synagogue in Dushanbe; petitions to the government to open additional synagogues are rejected. Tajikistan's Jewish community enters a period of decline. Regular attendance at synagogue is low and young Jews are increasingly secularized; this is coupled with a decline in Hebrew and Judeo-Tajik among youths, who increasingly choose to speak Russian.
- 1967 After the Arab-Israeli War of 1967, Dushanbe's Jewish community is forced to donate 300 rubles to the Arab states and publicly condemn Israel.
- 1969 Bukharan rabbi Abo Matatov (b. 1878) dies and the community is faced with a dearth of qualified clergy.
- 1970s In 1970, the Jewish community numbers between 10,000 and 20,000, most of whom live in Dushanbe. Smaller pockets of Jews live in towns throughout the republic, including Leninabad (Khujand), where Jews have their own synagogue. Emigration restrictions are eased, and by the end of the decade a large number of Jews, especially the young, leave for Israel and the United States. Soviet authorities strongly discourage emigration and the press showcases examples of Jews who return to Tajikistan.
- 1989 Tajik is made the official language of Tajikistan; Russian-speaking Jews, in particular Ashkenazim, face a jobless future.
- February 1990 Deadly ethnic riots rock Dushanbe. For several days, youths target ethnic Russians and Jews for attacks, and armed Islamic protestors take to the streets. Calm is restored, but Jews remain a target for harassment and thousands emigrate.
- 1991 Tajikistan gains independence, which is followed by civil strife.
- 1992 Civil war breaks out in Tajikistan, and the Jewish Agency evacuates most Jews from the country.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Traditionally, Jews worked in the weaving and silk dyeing trades. These industry collapsed by the early 20th century as factory-produced textiles took over the market. As a result, much of the Jewish community became impoverished. Jewish artists fared better and developed a niche in music and the arts; numerous Jewish composers, singers, and actors found prominence in Tajikistan. During the Soviet period, many Jews held academic or bureaucratic positions in the government.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

A number of Bukharan Jews in Tajikistan rose to the heights of prominence in the arts. In 1944, Suleiman Yudakov (1916–1990) composed the music for the national anthem of Tajikistan. Actress and singer Rena Galibova (1915–1995) performed throughout the Soviet Union during World War II, and was awarded the titles of Merited Artist of Tajikistan (1939) and People’s Artist of Tajikistan (1941). Singer and composer Avner Mullokandov (b. 1911) graduated from the Leninabad School of Music in Tajikistan, and in 1940 relocated to the Aini State Theater for Opera and Ballet, where he worked for the next two decades. In 1941, Mullokandov was decorated as a People’s Artist of Tajikistan. Other notable individuals include composer Yahiel Sabzanov (b. 1929), who wrote more than 300 compositions; novelist Vladimir Voinovich, born in Dushanbe; Lev Knipper (b. 1898), who wrote Vankh and Vakhio Bolo, some of the first Tajik symphonies; Bukharan writer and poet Mordakhay “Muhib” H. Bachayev (1911–2007); and filmmaker Boris Kimiagarov (1920–1979), noted for his series of films on “Firdawsī’s Shohnoma.” Many of these artists would emigrate to the United States and Israel. Meirkhaim Gavriellov was an accomplished writer, journalist, member of the Union of Journalists in both Tajikistan and Uzbekistan, and chairman of the Bukharan Jewish Cultural Society, Khoverim. In 1998, Gavriellov was murdered under suspicious circumstances.

Present Economic Conditions

Historically, Dushanbe has housed a thriving enclave of Bukharan and Ashkenazim Jews, but today the community is mostly elderly and poor. Poverty has driven many young Jews to leave the country in search of better job opportunities.

Religious Denominations

Today, the Jews of Tajikistan lack even basic cultural and religious infrastructure. The vast majority of Jews who remain in Tajikistan are Bukharan, the native Jews of Central Asia. Isolated from Western Jewry for centuries, Bukharans developed their own religious and cultural traditions. The community is currently without a rabbi or kosher butcher, and the only synagogue in Dushanbe is under threat of destruction. First built more than 100 years ago, the synagogue was one of several buildings scheduled for destruction to make way for the construction of a new presidential palace. In early 2006, the mikvah and classrooms were demolished, but the destruction of the main hall was halted after international outcry.

During World War II, thousands of Ashkenazim arrived in Tajikistan. The Ashkenazim and Bukharans were separated by a wide cultural divide and relations between the two groups would remain strained; intermarriage was uncommon. The Russian-speaking Ashkenazim perceived the Bukharan Jews as primitive Asians, and the religious practices of the two groups were dissimilar. There was even resentment among some in the Bukharan community that the Ashkenazi arrived in Tajikistan as refugees while young Bukharan men were fighting at the front.

Jewish Education and Communal Institutions

Jewish religious and cultural customs were strongly repressed from the 1940s until the 1980s. With the advent of perestroika in the late 1980s, Jews gained new freedoms, including the right to study and publish in Hebrew, Yiddish, and Bukharan. A Jewish Cultural Center was opened with the aid of Chabad-Lubavitch in Dushanbe in 1988. The center integrated both the Bukharan and Ashkenazim synagogues and housed a school. The following year, a society for the friends of Jewish culture, Khoverim, opened, and Israeli filmmakers were permitted to travel to Dushanbe to make a documentary on Bukharan Jewish culture. Unfortunately, these community institutions went into decline after most Jews fled the country in 1992.

Historically, the Bukharan community has appointed a kalontar, or elected communal chairman, and this tradition continues to this day. In recent years, the chairmen of the Jewish Community of Dushanbe have been Mikhail Abdurakhmanov, Amnon Iyaev, and, as of 2006, Valery Davydov. Goib Goibov has served as chairman of the Committee on Religious Affairs. From 1992–2000, the president of synagogue and Jewish cemetery was Amnun Fuzaylov, and from 2000–2003, the position was held by Boris Boruhov. The leadership of Dushanbe's Jewish community has been instrumental in drawing international attention to the plight of Jews in Tajikistan. Support from international Jewish organizations has been vital to the survival of the Jewish community in Tajikistan.

Institutions active in Tajikistan include the following:

- JDC (American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee)
- Chabad-Lubavitch
- FJC (Federation of Jewish Communities of the Commonwealth of Independent States)
- Ohr Avner Foundation
- World Congress of Bukharan Jews

Demographic Movement and Emigration

Tajikistan's Jewish community has experienced a precipitous and dramatic decline over the past three decades. Since the early 1990s, civil war, poverty, and growing regional anti-Semitism have driven most Jews to emigrate. In 1989, the Jewish Agency began evacuating olim. After the collapse of the Soviet Union in August 1991, Tajikistan gained independence and a large percentage of non-Muslims, including Jews, left the country. In early 1992, Tajik domestic politics turned to violence and by summer the country was in a state of civil war. Despite pledges by the Islamic opposition to respect Jewish rights and religion, the Jewish Agency evacuated thousands of Jews in the fall of 1992. Over the next decade, most of the remaining thousand Jews emigrated, and today only a few hundred live in Dushanbe.

Selected Bibliography

Pinkhasov, Peter. "Bukharian Jews in WWII." Bukharan Jewish Global Portal Web site. <http://www.bjews.com/> (accessed May 19, 2008).

- Pinkhasov, Peter. "The History of Bukharian Jews." Bukharan Jewish Global Portal Web site. <http://www.bjews.com/> (accessed May 19, 2008).
- "Tajikistan." Federation of Jewish Communities of the CIS Web site. www.fjc.ru/Communities/default.asp?aid=80071&tab=home (accessed April 22, 2007).
- "Tajikistan Country Page." National Conference on Soviet Jewry Web site. www.ncsj.org/Tajikistan.shtml (accessed April 22, 2007).
- "UCSJ Position Paper: Tajikistan." 1998. Union of Councils for Jews in the Former Soviet Union. www.fsmonitor.com/stories/aseml1taj.shtml (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Waanders Uitgevers Zwolle. 1999. Facing West: Oriental Jews of Central Asia and the Caucasus. Zwolle, Netherlands: Waanders Uitgevers Zwolle.
- Zand, Michael. 1991. "Patterns of Sovietization of Oriental Jewish Culture: Bukharan Jewish Culture, 1918–1940—A Case Study." Soviet Jewish Affairs 22 (1): 47–52.

Jews in Turkmenistan

Irena Vladimirsky

---

General Population: 5,042,920

Jewish Population: Estimates range from 600–1,000

Jewish Population by City: The Jewish population of Turkmenistan is concentrated in five cities: Ashgabat, Turkmenbashi, Mary, Turkmenabat, and Dash Oguz.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Bukharan Jews, Iranian Jews, and Ashkenazi Jews arrived at the end of the 19th century and during Soviet rule. Most are Ashkenazi Jews, but about 30 percent are Bukharan Jews.

Languages Spoken: Nearly all speak Russian. Bukharan Jews speak the Judeo-Tajik dialect.

---

Historical Overview

400s–450s Amora Samuel Bar Bisna from Pumpedita Talmudic Academy visits Marguana (region on the southwest of Turkmenistan) and mentions the existence of Jewish traders there.

5th–12th centuries During the Middle Ages Jewish traders live permanently in the city of Merv, which is one of the main trade centers on the Silk Road. During archaeological excavations in the old city of Merv, numerous oil lamps are found with Jewish symbols that date as far back as the fifth to seventh centuries.

1835 Hebrew-Christian missionary Joseph Wolff (1795–1862), while searching for the 10 lost tribes, visits the city of Merv and mentions a small but stable community of Bukharan Jews living there.

1840 About 40 Jewish families from the Iranian city of Mashhad who were forcedly converted to Islam in 1839, thus becoming Jadid-al-Islam, or new converts to Islam. After they settle in Merv the community returns to the Jewish way of life.

1880s–1890s The Russian Empire completes the conquest of Central Asia and all citizens become Russian subjects. The Russian conquest leads to massive migration of Jews from the Bukharan emirate to Russian-controlled territories.

The city of Merv becomes the main center of the Jewish life. In 1895, the Jewish population of the city is 7.5 percent of the city's total population.

- 1890s–1900s With the strengthening of Russian rule over the region, Ashkenazi Jews begin to settle in Central Asia. Some arrive from the Pale of Settlement and some are retired Russian army soldiers and officers who decide to settle in newly established cities. In 1897, the Jewish population of Ashgabat includes 330 Jews (about 10 percent of the total city population); 80 Jews (17 families) settle in Krasnovodsk (8 percent of the total city population); and 500 Jews (121 families) live in Chardzhou, making up about 15 percent of city dwellers. Ashkenazi Jews quickly become part of the local administration, provide medical services, and establish publishing houses and even the first art gallery.
- 1900 Sixteen subbotniki families (120 persons) from central Russia settle in the Ashkhabad region, proclaim themselves Jews, and establish a community with an active synagogue in the village of Yablonovskii.
- 1910 The Russian administration changes the settlement regulations in the territory of the Turkestan general-governorship. Most Bukharan Jews who do not receive legal residency status according to the new regulations are forced to return to the territory of the Bukharan khanate.
- 1917–1918 After the Bolshevik Revolution, Bukharan Jews receive permission from the new authorities to return to their place of former residence, and 750 Bukharan Jews resettle in Merv, about 1,000 Jews in Kerki, and 500 Jews in Chardzhou.
- 1920s–1930s Turkmenistan becomes the preferable place of exile for participants of officially forbidden Zionist organizations and supporters of the Trotsky-Zinoviev wing of the Bolshevik Party. According to the 1926 population census, 2,042 Jews (0.25 percent of the entire republic population) live temporarily in Turkmenistan.
- January 1938 As many as 6,000 Iranian Jews living on the Iran-Afghanistan border in the south are resettled in northern (desert) regions of Turkmenistan.
- 1941–1945 The Jewish population of Turkmenistan increases considerably; estimates range from 7,000 to 12,000.
- 1991 After the collapse of the Soviet Union, Saparmurat Niyazov, former first secretary of the Communist Party of Turkmenistan, became the first president of the independent republic of Turkmenistan. New regulations covering the religious and cultural life of ethnic minorities ban the establishment of an organized Jewish community; a request to build a synagogue is also rejected. According to the regulation on religious and cultural life of national minorities, 50,000 signatures of community members are required to be registered officially as an ethnic or religious community.
- 1993–1994 The government of independent Turkmenistan strengthens friendly ties with Iran and other Muslim countries. Because of domestic and foreign policy concerns, numerous Jews decide to emigrate—to Israel, the United States, Canada, Germany, and the Russian Federation.
- 2001 Only small Jewish communities are left in Ashgabat, Chardzhou, and Nabit Dag.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

In Turkmenistan, traditional divisions existed between the Ashkenazi and Bukharan Jewish communities. Bukharan Jews were traditionally involved in trade, and even nowadays they provide a colorful landscape of the local open markets. Ashkenazi Jews played an important part in establishing modern industry and agriculture, as part of collectivization and industrialization plans. Today, several Jews who have family relations with Niyazov's family clan hold high posts in the gas industry.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Jews played an important part in establishing medical services and an educational system in Turkmenistan. In 1928, in response to a request from the government of Turkmenistan, six prominent composers from Moscow wrote songs for Turkmen schoolchildren; four of them, Z. Levin, Z. Kompaneets, B. Shekhter, and V. Bely, were Jewish. This trend was greatly developed. Many Jewish composers visited Turkmenistan for some time to write their works, and even settled there for longer periods. Boris Shekhter (1900–1961), a highly talented musician, wrote the first Turkmen symphony works, The Turkmenian Suite (1932), and the first Turkmen opera, Yusup and Akhmet (1941). In 1944, he was awarded the title of People's Artist of Turkmen Soviet Socialist Republic.

Jewish Education and Communal Institutions

Before 1991, there were three active synagogues in Ashkhabad, Mary (former Merv), and Kerki. Under the totalitarian rule of Saparmurat Niyazov, all Jewish religious life was against the active regulations on minority activities. The government of Turkmenistan allowed opening ulpan for studying Hebrew in Ashgabat and Chardzhou. Leaders of the Jewish community of Turkmenistan were forbidden to meet their colleagues from other former Soviet republics, or to participate in Jewish activity outside the borders of Turkmenistan.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

Today, the Jewish community of Turkmenistan is in decline. By 2003, most Jews had left for Israel, the United States, the Russian Federation, and Germany. From 1989 to 2003, 1,375 Jews arrived in Israel from Ashkhabad, the same number of Jews left to reside in the United States and Canada, and about 1,000 Jews received Russian Federation citizenship.

Selected Bibliography

- "The Jewish Population of the World (2006)." Jewish Virtual Library Web site. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/Judaism/jewpop.html (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Sloane, Joanna. "The Virtual Jewish History Tour: Turkmenistan." Jewish Virtual Library Web site. <http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/vjw/Turkmenistan.html> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- "Turkmenistan Country Page." National Conference on Soviet Jewry Web site. www.ncsj.org/Turkmenistan.shtml (accessed April 22, 2007).

"UCSJ Position Paper: Turkmenistan." Union of Councils for Jews in the Former Soviet Union Web site. <http://www.fsmonitor.com/stories/asemltuk.shtml> (accessed April 22, 2007).
 Wolff, Joseph. 1846. Narrative of a Mission to Bokhara. Repr. London: John W. Parker.

Jews in Uzbekistan

David Straub and Irena Vladimirska

General Population: 22 million

Jewish Population: 17,453 Former Soviet Union Jewish Council

Percent of Population: Less than 1 percent

Jewish Population by City: Jews are mainly concentrated in Tashkent, Samarkand, and Bukhara. Jews also live in some of the smaller cities in the Fergana Valley.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Jews arrived in Uzbekistan perhaps as far back as the sixth century BCE. Historical texts record Jewish occupation of major cities after the Arab conquest of Central Asia in the seventh and eighth centuries. In the 19th century, Iranian Jewish refugees arrived in Bukhara. Ashkenazim arrived in the mid-19th century and during World War II.

Languages Spoken: Bukharan or Judeo-Tajik, Russian, and Hebrew

Historical Overview

10th century Historical texts first mention the settlement Yahudlyk, which literally means "place inhabited by Jews," in the Fergana Valley. The settlement is home to 100 Jewish families.

12th century Benjamin from Tudela mentions a Jewish community in Samarkand with a nasi as the head of the community. Jews are allowed to settle in Bukhara and Urgench provided that their numbers do not exceed 100.

1339 In Urgench Samuel Ben Samuel composes Sefer Ha Melitz, a Talmudic dictionary with commentaries on the Judeo-Persian language.

1598 Jews are expelled from Samarkand.

1843 Joseph Wolff, a Jewish convert to Roman Catholicism, travels to Bukhara. Two years later, he publishes Narrative of a Mission to Bukhara, which includes extensive details of the daily life of Jews in Bukhara.

1865–1878 Central Asia is conquered by Russia. The Jewish population of the region welcomes Moscow. Soon after Russian Turkestan is established, the Jewish population is granted rights equal to that of the Muslim population and Jadid Al Islam, whereupon Jews forced to convert to Islam are able to return to Judaism. The Jewish population increases from 100 to 1,300 individuals in Tashkent, from 168 to 3,792 in Samarkand, and from 6 to 1,000 in Kokand.

1887 Changes in the settlement regulations in Russian Turkestan require all Jewish traders to register as permanent residents or leave the region. Around 5,000 Bukharan Jews are affected and threatened with expulsion.

- 1894 The First Jewish communities of Bukharan Jews are registered in the Fergana Valley. According to the Turkestan general-governorship, 3,113 Jews reside in different cities of the Fergana Valley. In addition, 1,891 Jews are registered in Samarkand, which is under separate administration from the rest of Russian Turkestan.
- 1896 The Russian Turkestan government issues regulations that forbid Jews to purchase land or other real estate on the territory of Turkestan, with the exception of property in the Fergana Valley.
- 1897 The first population census of Russian Turkestan records 1,029 permanent Jewish residents in Kokand, 721 in Andizhan, 652 in Old Margelan, 188 in New Margelan, 121 in Namangan, and 46 in Osh.
- 1900 The administrators of Russian Turkestan declare a Central Asian Pale of Settlement for Jews. Jews are allowed to settle in the towns of Katta Kurgan, on the border of the Bukharan emirate; Petro Aleksandrovsk, bordering the Khivan khanate; and Osh. Later, Russian trading companies intervene in order to retain commercial relations with Jewish-owned businesses, and the cities of Samarkand, Kokand, and Old Margelan are reopened to Jewish settlement.
- 1908 Yosef Davydov (1855–1914), a fabric merchant and one of the wealthiest people in Bukhara, is elected kalontar of the Bukharan Jewish community of Tashkent.
- January 1910 As part of a nationwide pogrom in Russian territories, 300 Bukharan Jews are expelled from Tashkent.
- 1910–1914 The Judeo-Tajik language newspaper Rakhamim is published in Skobelev, now named Fergana.
- 1917 Yakov-Hai Pinkhasov (1890–1968), great-grandson of Yosef Maman, is elected kalontar of the Jews of Bukhara; and Rafael Potelyahov (1865–1936), a wealthy Jewish merchant, serves as a minister in the short-lived Kokand government, which is crushed by the Soviets. Trade Unions of Local Working Jews are set up by the Bolsheviks in cities throughout the Ferghana Valley, including Samarkand and Tashkent; members of the Unions may number in the hundreds and include artisans and merchants. The Samarkand Union establishes a school that includes the study of Hebrew. Records show 30 synagogues in Samarkand.
- 1918 The Turkestan Autonomous Soviet Republic is created, excluding the protectorates of Bukhara and Khiva. An anti-Semitic fervor among the Muslim population of Bukhara causes the Jewish population to barricade themselves in their quarters, and the Emir sends troops to protect them.
- November 1919 The Commissariat of Education in Tashkent approves the publication of Z. L. Amitin-Shapiro's Hebrew-language geography textbook.
- 1920 A convention of Turkestani Jews passes a resolution supporting the Red Army and the Bolsheviks. In Tashkent, editor Rahmin Badalov (1897–1991) opens the Bukharan Jewish newspaper Rost, only to end publication in 1922.
- 1921 Hebrew is banned from the classroom.
- 1922 The Yevseksia begin publishing the newspaper Bayraki Hurriyat.
- 1923 The Yevseksia begin publishing the Bukharan-language newspaper Roshinoi.

- July 1923 The periodical Emes publishes an article that chastises Bukharan Jewish women for religious piety and calls for Bukharan Jews to not study “Hebrew but the language in which they converse,” that is, Judeo-Tajik.
- 1925 Rahmin Badalov becomes head of the Bukharan-Jewish Institute of Education in Tashkent.
- 1926 The first population census is held in Uzbekistan, including the Tajik Autonomous Republic, recording a total of 18,172 Jews in the republic.
- 1928 The rabbinical court is discontinued and replaced by a Jewish People’s Court. The first separate Jewish cemetery is organized.
- 1930 There are 30 active Jewish schools, and lessons are taught in Judeo-Tajik.
- 1933 The chief rabbi of Poland issues an appeal to Soviet authorities for 16 pious Jews sentenced in Tashkent to three years’ hard labor for illegally crossing the border. At this time there are 15 community centers and 28 “red tea houses” for Bukharan Jews.
- 1934 The number of pupils in Jewish schools is around 4,000, and the number of teachers reaches 170.
- 1935 A single synagogue remains open in Samarkand.
- 1937 The census records 25,437 Jews living in Uzbekistan.
- 1938 Rahmin Badalov is arrested but spared execution.
- 1939 A Yiddish and a Bukharan theater operate in Tashkent
- 1941–1945 During World War II, about 30,000 Jewish refugees from Ukraine, Poland, Byelorussia, and Lithuania arrived in Uzbekistan; some refugees return home after the war, and others settled in Central Asia.
- February 1955 In Tashkent, the first Yiddish language theatrical production is performed since before World War II.
- 1955 Records show 20,000 Bukharan Jews and several thousand Ashkenazim Jews in Tashkent.
- 1956 Jewish Community of Tashkent is forced to publicly renounce Israel and support Egypt during the Suez Crisis.
- 1959 Ashkenazim synagogues are closed in Samarkand and Tashkent, although Bukharan synagogues in those cities are allowed to remain open.
- 1967 The American Jewish Conference on Soviet Jewry reports that Jews are beaten in Tashkent in the wake of the Arab-Israeli war.
- 1977 The All Union population census records 250,000 Jews in Tashkent and more than 100,000 Jews in the territories of Samarkand, Bukhara, and the Fergana Valley.
- 1989 The first Jewish cultural center opens in Tashkent. Of the 100,000 Jews that remain in Uzbekistan, 15,000 are in Samarkand.
- 1990 Bukharan Jewish cultural centers open in Tashkent and Bukhara.
- 1993 Jewish organizations established in Uzbekistan include the Central Asia regional center of Judaic and Jewish research; an association of Jewish scientists, engineers and businesspeople; and the trade organization “Israel-Uzbekistan.”
- July 30, 2004 An Islamic suicide bomber detonates an explosion near the entrance to the Israeli Embassy in Tashkent. Five civilians are killed, but no Israeli Embassy staff or members of the Jewish community are wounded.

February 2006 Rabbi Abraham Yagodeev (1970–2006) is killed on his way to morning synagogue prayer.

June 2006 Karina-Rivka Loifer (1986–2006), secretary of the chief rabbi of Uzbekistan, is brutally murdered in her home, together with her mother.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

In the first decades of Russian rule, local Jewish entrepreneurs played an important role in developing economic ties between Central Asia and Russia. By 1898, in the Fergana Valley alone, Jews owned a total of 693 trade and industrial enterprises, or 91 percent of all such businesses in the region. Jewish merchants were even able to borrow money from major Russian banks. Common Jewish laborers provides services to Jews and Gentiles alike, including butchers, tailors, bakers, shoemakers, goldsmiths, hairdressers, and chefs. Poor Jewish women with talents in singing and dancing (sazonda) performed at wedding ceremonies and holiday parties for Jews and non-Jews. Jews in the Fergana Valley found employment in the textile industry and developed new methods of coloring cotton threads with indigo paint.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Jewish actors have reached the height of prominence in Uzbek theater and opera, and Jewish musicians are renowned for their mastery of Uzbek folk music and classical Central Asian shash makom. From the 1920s until the late 1930s, Yiddish- and Bukharan-language theater was performed in large cities throughout the republic. In the late 1930s, Jewish theaters and publications were closed and Jewish leaders,

Arks containing Torah scrolls in Uzbekistan; their shape and style indicate the Oriental/ Sephardi influence on the community. (Center for Jewish Art, The Hebrew University of Jerusalem) actors, and writers were purged. In the 1950s, the restrictions on Jewish productions were lifted and Jews flourished in Uzbek theaters. During World War II, Uzbek Jews joined theater groups that traveled the country to perform for soldiers. Notable Uzbek Jewish artists include Georgy Mushel (1909–1989), one of the creators of the Uzbek opera; Boris Tseydman (b. 1908), who taught Uzbek composers at Tashkent Conservatories; Gavriel Mullokandov (1900–1972), a prolific Bukharan Jewish singer and musician who was decorated People's Artist of Uzbekistan; Ilyas Malayev (b. 1936), a famous classical Bukharan musician from Tashkent; Suleyman Takhalov (b. 1935), notable musical performer, conductor, and professor of music history; Aulov Semen Borisovich (b. 1924), art director and producer of Bukharan Jewish Theater; and opera tenor Misha Raitzin (1930–1990).

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

In 2003, there were six active synagogues in Uzbekistan: three in Tashkent and one each in Andijan, Bukhara, and Samarkand. Major sponsors of charitable organizations in Uzbekistan include Or Avner and Yad Chana, the latter funded by Israeli businessman Lev Levayev. With the help of these organizations, numerous facilities have opened, including Beit Chana, a girl's school; Chaya Mushka, a women's college; Ohel Menahem, a kindergarten; and Tomhei Tmimim, a yeshiva college in Tashkent. In addition, there was the Gan Torah kindergarten in Samarkand, a yeshiva and Sunday school in Fergana, and a secondary school in Bukhara Or Avner. In 1990, Aba David Gurevitch of Chabad was elected chief rabbi of Uzbekistan. The Russian-language magazine Shofar is published monthly.

In Samarkand and Bukhara, mahallas (traditional communities of Bukharan Jews), are still home to large Jewish populations. Samarkand is also home to a museum located in what was once a Jewish-owned mansion that still contains a synagogue.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

Soon after the Bolshevik takeover of Central Asia Zionist operations continued illicitly under the guise of Tarbut, a youth league, and the leadership of Zevi Hefetz. Tarbut members were harassed by the Yevseksia, the Jewish communists, and in 1922 the last Tarbut public event was shut down and all present were arrested. That same year the Zionist Bukharan-language newspaper Rahamim discontinued publication. Tarbut continued clandestine Zionist activities into the 1930s. Aliyah was again permitted in the 1970s, and since 1989 more than 60,000 Jews have migrated to Israel.

Most of the Jewish population in Tashkent is Ashkenazim, with a smaller Bukharan population. Jewish populations in Samarkand and Bukhara are nearly all Bukharan Jews.

Selected Bibliography

Ben-Zvi, Itzhak. 1963. The Exiled and the Redeemed. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America.

- Facing West: Oriental Jews of Central Asia and the Caucasus*. 1999. Zwolle, Netherlands: Waanders Uitgevers Zwolle.
- Fuzailoff, Giora. "Rabbanic Succession in Bukhara, 1790–1930." Bukharan Jewish Global Portal Web site. <http://www.bjews.com/> (accessed May 19, 2008).
- Gilboa, Jehoshua A. 1982. A Language Silenced: Hebrew Culture in the Soviet Union. Rutherford, NJ: Fairleigh Dickinson University.
- Gitelman, Zvi Y., Musya Glants, and Marchall L. Goldman, eds. 2003. Jewish Life after the USSR. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Pinkhasov, Peter. "Bukharian Jews in WWII." Bukharan Jewish Global Portal Web site. <http://www.bjews.com/> (accessed May 19, 2008).
- Pinkhasov, Peter. "The History of Bukharian Jews." Bukharan Jewish Global Portal Web site. <http://www.bjews.com/> (accessed May 19, 2008).
- Roi, Yaacov, ed. 1997. Russian Jews on Three Continents: Migration and Resettlement. London: Routledge.
- "Uzbekistan." Am Yisrael Web site. <http://www.amyisrael.co.il/cis/uzbekistan.htm> (accessed April 22, 2007).

East Asia

Jews in China

M. Avrum Ehrlich

---

General Population: 1.3 billion

Jewish Population: 6,000–7,000

Percent of Population: 0.0005 percent

Jewish Population by City: Shanghai, approximately 4,000 (250 includes those registered in the Jewish community and other irregular attendees, but the larger group has no affiliation with the formal community); Hong Kong, 3,000; Beijing, 2,500; Guangdong, 500; Taiwan, 200; and Shandong, 50. In addition, Kaifeng has several hundred identified Jewish descendants and as many as several thousand may have memories of Jewish roots.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: The various waves of immigration include, first, the Persian Jewish traders over the Silk Road, the Baghdadi traders of the 1800s, the Russians of the 1920s, and the German and Europeans of the 1930s and 1940s. Then most Jews left for the United States, Canada, Australia, the United Kingdom, and Israel, creating a diverse Diaspora of Chinese Jews. Many of these migrants succeeded in building business empires or successful careers and putting down networks and connections based on their Jewish heritage and their Chinese experiences. Most recently, Jews have begun to immigrate back to China because of China's growing economy.

Languages Spoken: English, Russian, Kavkavi, Hebrew, French, Chinese

---

Historical Overview

2nd century BCE Unverified myths and assumptions regarding Jewish merchants entering China at different times and various routes begin to circulate.

960–1127 (Northern Song Dynasty) Jewish merchants—presumably of Persian origin—pass over the Silk Road into China and begin a settlement in Kaifeng, which is, at the time, the Chinese capital. This is the earliest clear documentation of Jews in China. Some come by sea, and they gradually penetrate from Zhejiang and Jiangsu Provinces to the mainland. Some come by land along Persia and India on the Silk Road. The emperor himself gives the earliest Jewish immigrants Chinese names such as Gao, Li, An, Mu, Zhao, Jin, Zhou, Bai, and so on. Ancient Chinese history books called them shushu, deya, and youtai, and their religion is called you tai jiao. They and the Han people live together and use their Chinese family names. Some Jews likely convert or live as Muslims, becoming part of the Hui nationality of minority Chinese Muslims. Jews are also known by the Han majority as “blue capped Muslims” indicating that the Han are not able to easily tell the two groups apart. It is possible that an unknown number of Chinese Jews continue to exist in the shadow of a larger Muslim minority, eating ritually slaughtered meat, avoiding pork, and celebrating festivals and the Sabbath, as Muslims. The Jews of Kaifeng have an 800-year intact history until around 1840 when religious activity stops as a result of a series of fires and floods. The community is reestablishing itself, as described in the next essay.

- 1163 A synagogue is established in Kaifeng.
- 1489 A stone tablet is erected at the Kaifeng synagogue; it is the earliest existing self-document of the Chinese Jews.
- 1605 Ai Tian, a Kaifeng Jew and middle-level government official, meets Jesuit missionary Matteo Ricci in Beijing. This encounter brings news of the existence of Chinese Jews to European Jews and Christians.
- 1800s New waves of Jewish immigrants come to China. The first group is mainly Baghdadi Jewish businessmen representing their families or seeking new trade horizons through the European trading companies in Asia. Baghdadi Jews begin to settle in Shanghai, one of the treaty ports established as a result of the first Opium War, which had ended six years earlier. Jewish immigrants go to Shanghai, Hong Kong, India, Singapore, Malaysia, and Japan. Many become very wealthy and successful, buying huge tracts of land in what are now the centers of Shanghai and Hong Kong. Others contribute in different ways, leaving a unique mark of distinction wherever they are. Shanghai business is mainly in trade. The Hong Kong Jews are engaged in finance and banking.
- 1850s After years of decline and repeated floods, disasters, and reconstructions, the Kaifeng synagogue is completely destroyed. This also marks the disintegration of the community as such. Yet Jewish identity persists in various forms.
- 1899 The first Russian Jews settle in Harbin, in northeastern China, creating a fast-growing community and reaching its peak with 13,000 people in 1931.
- 1900 Shanghai Jews found the Shanghai Society for the Rescue of Chinese Jews, with little results.
- 1900 The Ohel Leah synagogue is consecrated in Hong Kong.
- 1905 During the Russo-Japanese War many Jews opt to remain in Japanese and ultimately Chinese territory. Jewish businesses and corporations are very successful in Harbin.
- 1910 Canadian Anglican bishop William Charles White establishes the Henan Diocese in Kaifeng. During his 25-year mission he acquires the land of the former synagogue and the stone steles. He is also involved in a Christian attempt “to re-organize the Chinese Jews of Kaifeng,” which is a euphemism for converting them to Christianity.
- 1920 A surge in the number of Russian Jews relocating to the northern Chinese city of Harbin—which is at the time occupied by Russia—burgeons its population to 13,000 Jews. Gradually some move on to places like Dalian, Tianjin, Qufu, and Qingdao in Shandong province; many also move to Shanghai. The Ohel Rachel synagogue is established in Shanghai, marking the peak of the Baghdadi community in Shanghai. Russian Jewish immigrants establish the Shanghai Ashkenazi community. The Zionist program is publicly supported by Sun Yat-sen whose eagerness to support what he terms “the civilization of the world” helps lay the foundation for a fruitful relationship with China, through which numerous political milestones are later achieved.

- 1929 Harbin reaches the peak of Jewish immigration, and Jews begin to seek other places to immigrate to from the United States, Canada, Australia, and Israel.
- 1938–1940 Some 20,000 Jewish refugees from Nazi Europe find safe haven in Shanghai, including the entire Mir Yeshiva. This miraculous story evolves to serve as a symbol of friendship between Jews and China that is much quoted by diplomats and politicians, especially regarding Sino–Israeli relations. Ultimately, there are about 40,000 to 50,000 Jews living in China. The number of Jews living in Shanghai was about 30,000.
- 1945–1949 The Jews begin to leave China, especially after 1949, and the numbers dwindle to a few who remain: those married to Chinese, those who work with the Chinese Communist Party, and those who do business or continue their often interesting lives.
- 1949 The People’s Republic of China (PRC) is established. Israel is one of the first governments to recognize the Chinese state. David Ben-Gurion is eager to develop ties with China and its socialist credentials are appealing to the socialist-oriented new Israelis.
- 1949 Within the next several years most of the Jews in Shanghai, Harbin, and the smaller contemporary communities leave for Israel, Australia, the United States, and Canada.
- 1950 While Stalin’s anti-Semitic horror campaign is in full swing throughout the Soviet Union, lack of opposition to Jews and Zionists and welcoming words from Mao Zedong lead to increasing numbers of Jews entering China, a trend that would continue through 1955. Although many might be tempted to suggest that very little occurs during the so-called Cold War period (1950–1991), this time seems to mark the beginning of what is now becoming mutual cooperation and development between Israel and China.
- 1952 Two delegates from Kaifeng represent the Jewish community in the National Day celebrations in Beijing. They meet President Zhou Enlai and ask that the Jews be recognized as a national minority. The request is politely denied, yet on a local level, some descendants continue to be recognized as Youtai ren (Jews) in their residential documents.
- 1955–1956 The PRC seems more interested in pursuing diplomatic relations with other Arab and third-world nations at the price of relations with Israel. It is argued that China chooses to focus on its struggles with the Soviet Union, whose attempts to infiltrate the Middle East it strategically opposes. Anti-Israel propaganda from China, which lasts until 1976, paints a picture of the PRC as anti-Israel.
- 1978 China begins to purchase military equipment and technology from Israel, through the efforts of Menachem Begin, Israel’s prime minister, and Shoul Eisenberg, a former Jewish refugee in China and successful Israeli businessman. This process marks genuine political commitment to establishing a clear agenda of mutual defense strategy.
- 1980 Israel ships more significant amounts of military technology and equipment to China, allowing trade to flourish; it is the first of many such exchanges that take place throughout the 1980s.

- 1992 China and Israel establish full diplomatic relations. For China, diplomatic relations with Israel possibly means greater ability to penetrate into American political economy through Jewish connections. China–Israel relations develop on the basis of four important criteria: Sino–Israeli defense relations; civilian trade relations; agriculture and agricultural technology; and science, technology, and education exchanges.
- 1992 The Kaifeng municipal government allows the founding of the Society for the Research of Jewish History and Culture of Kaifeng, headed by Jewish descendant and scholar Zhao Xiangru. Local scholar Wang Yisha publishes his detailed study of the Jewish descendants, Spring and Autumn of the Chinese Jews.
- 1992 The first Jewish studies conference is held in China. Many more will continue to be held at the universities in Shanghai, Harbin, and Shandong.
- 1993 The Kaifeng municipal government officially authorizes the construction of the synagogue according to its old structure. Officially, it is designated to serve only as a museum rather than as an active synagogue.
- 1993 Ministries of agriculture in Israel and China sign a memorandum of understanding, and throughout the 1990s the two nations launch several highly successful agriculture experiments, greatly benefiting trade and improving the standards of their cooperation. This year also sees deeper levels of cooperation in the fields of water resource management and purification technologies.
- 1995 China and Israel sign a document endorsing deeper cooperation in education, and foreign students are more openly permitted to travel abroad to participate in scholarly exchanges.
- 1996 The local government closes down the construction office for the Kaifeng Jewish center/museum, whereby the reconstruction plan is abolished.
- 1996 A decision is implemented to erase the designation as “Jews” from all residential documents. Jewish descendants are given the option to choose Hui (Muslim Chinese) or Han (ethnic Chinese) as their nationality. This represents the government’s vigilance toward any sort of revival of Jewish identity in Kaifeng.
- 1998 Rabbi Shalom Greenberg settles in Shanghai and reestablishes Orthodox Jewish communal activities, including synagogue prayers and kosher dining.
- 1998 The municipal government of Shanghai conducts an extensive renovation of the Ohel Rachel synagogue. Used for many years as a storage facility, the venerable ivy-covered building had stood virtually empty within the grounds of the Ministry of Education. With some 700 seats in its main sanctuary, it is the largest remaining synagogue in the Far East. Ohel Rachel has been visited by a succession of the world’s dignitaries, among them German chancellor Gerhard Schroder and former U.S. president Bill Clinton and First Lady Hillary Clinton. Shanghai also boasts a center of Jewish Studies, which conducts classes in Hebrew, produces films and television programs, and conducts tours of Jewish sights in Shanghai.
- 1999 The Shanghai Jewish community is allowed to convene for New Year’s prayer in the Ohel Rachel synagogue, recently renovated by the local government. Trade between Israel and China reaches $550 million.

- 2001 Rabbi Shimon and Dini Freundlich move to Beijing from Hong Kong and set up a Chabad center and educational facilities.
- 2004 The national government's Ministry of Higher Education sponsors a key research institute in the social studies in the area of Jewish religion and funds the Centre for Judaic Studies at Shandong University in Jinan, capital of Shandong Province, under the leadership of Professor Fu Youde. This center begins translating Jewish classics into Chinese and training a generation of scholars in Judaism, classical texts, and religious, philosophical, and cultural studies.
- 2004 China-Israel trade reaches $2.2 billion, but when trade with Hong Kong is added, the actual numbers are as high as $5.7 billion.
- 2005 Professor M. Avrum Ehrlich is appointed a professor of Jewish studies in the Department of Philosophy and at the Centre for Judaic and Inter-Religious Studies at Shandong University.
- 2005 Various Jewish bodies and individuals attempt to preserve the old Jewish ghetto area of Hongkiao district, where Jews found refuge against the Nazi Holocaust during World War II. The efforts have sympathetic interest from the Shanghai municipal government, which has signaled its willingness to save some of the buildings in this historic neighborhood.
- 2005 After living six years in Jerusalem without official status, Kaifeng Jewish descendant Jin Guangyuan (Shlomo) and his family complete conversion to Judaism, thereby obtaining Israeli citizenship. This raises hope in Kaifeng that more descendants will be able to make aliyah, the facilitation of which the Jerusalem-based institute Shavei Yisrael has taken up as one of its primary goals.
- 2006 Israel's chief Sephardi rabbi, Shlomo Amar, visits Shanghai and hopes to convince the Chinese government to recognize Judaism as an official religion.
- 2006 A new Jewish Center containing a synagogue, school, kosher restaurant, and women's ritual baths opens in Shanghai.
- 2007 A new Jewish center, ritual baths, and school open in Beijing under the leadership of Rabbi Freundlich.

Bibliography

- Ehrlich, Avrum, ed. 2008. The Chinese-Jewish Nexus. London: Routledge.
- Goldstein, Jonathan, ed. 1999. China and Israel, 1948–1998, A Fifty Year Retrospective. London: Praeger Publishers.
- Kublin, Hyman, ed. 1971. Jews in Old China: Some Western Views. New York: Paragon Book Reprint.
- Leslie, Donald Daniel. 1984. The Chinese-Hebrew Memorial Book of the Jewish Community of K'aifeng. Belconnen, Australia: Canberra College of Advance Education.
- Shapiro, Sidney. 1984. Jews in Old China: Studies by Chinese Scholars. New York: Hippocrene Books.
- Weisz, Tiberiu. 2006. The Kaifeng Stone Inscriptions: The Legacy of the Jewish Community in Ancient China. New York: Iuniverse.

Jews of Kaifeng, China

Noam Urbach

---

General Population: 780,000 in the city, 4,510,000 including its rural jurisdiction

Jewish Population: Estimates range from several hundred up to 5,000

Percent of Population: Less than 1 percent

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: The Jewish community was established by traders around the 11–12th century, presumed to be Jews of Sephardic origin arriving either through the Silk Road via Persia or by sea via India.

Languages Spoken: Local Kaifeng dialect of Mandarin. The younger and more educated also speak standard Mandarin and different levels of English.

---

Historical Overview

The Kaifeng Jewish community is the only documented Jewish community in pre-modern China; thus, its mere existence throughout most of the past millennium has significance that far transcends its numerical size, which at its peak numbered no more than a few thousand. Jews are assumed to have settled in Kaifeng in several waves beginning as early as the Tang Dynasty (618–907), yet their synagogue—a one-of-its-kind fusion between a synagogue and a Chinese temple—was first built in 1163, while Kaifeng was under the rule of the foreign invading Jin Dynasty (1115–1234). The synagogue, or Hall of Pure Truth (Qingzhensi—also the Chinese term for “mosque”), was repeatedly destroyed and rebuilt until its final destruction in mid-19th century, an event that marks the end of Kaifeng Jewry as a viable community.

Termed by one foreign visitor as the orphan colony, there is extremely scant hard evidence or historical sources to help researchers learn about what Chinese Judaism was like. Nonetheless, the few existing relics were analyzed thoroughly by a wave of Chinese and Western (Christian and Jewish) scholars. And justifiably so, as the Jewish syncretism with Chinese religion and culture (primarily Confucianism) is a case worthy of deep observation because of its intrinsic value and its correspondence to the larger-scale Christian and Muslim experiences in China.

The primary source about the community, which express the way its members saw themselves, or how they wanted the Chinese to view them, are three stone tablets with writings dating from 1489, 1512, 1663, and 1679. Although the 1663 stone has disappeared (survived only by rubbings), the other two are still held in a deteriorating state at the Kaifeng Municipal Museum. These tablets present the Kaifeng Jews' own narrative—such as when their ancestors entered China (Northern Song [960–1127] according to one tablet and Han dynasty [206 BCE–220 CE] according to another). Much of the writings are aimed at Chinese readers, as they attempt to justify the Jews' existence in Kaifeng and the legitimacy of their religion, which is demonstrated as being highly compatible with both Confucianism and traditional Chinese history. The Bible story of creation is shown as being compatible with Chinese myth and unifying Hebrew and Chinese mythological ancestors. For example, Noah is identified with the mythological Chinese forefather Nu-wa, and Adam with the Chinese mythological figure of Pan Gu. The 1489 stone tells how the Jewish merchants entering China were accepted by the Song emperor himself and presented him with worthy gifts from the land of the West.

The stones are also interesting for their theological consolidation of Jewish and Confucian tenets. For instance, the Torah is presented using the Chinese term of Dao (known as Tao in the West) and reverence to parents and deceased ancestors is stressed. These aspects are valuable for comparing the experiences of Christianity and Islam in China, beyond mere academic curiosity. The Kaifeng Jewish experience aided the Jesuits during the famous Chinese rites controversy that took place between different Catholic orders, in which the Jesuits argued that just as the Jews accommodated Chinese ancestral worship rites, Catholics should likewise do.

Another valuable and rare original text is the Memorial Book of the Dead, which was studied exhaustively by Professor Daniel D. Leslie (1984). It is the only source from Kaifeng known to be written by the community itself (whereas the tablets may have been written by non-Jews). It lists names of the deceased, most of whom have both Hebrew and Chinese names. Leslie claims that the many appearances of “bat Adam” (“daughter of Adam”) shows that intermarriage with Chinese women was prevalent, but also that they had probably gone through some sort of conversion to Judaism.

The West discovered the existence of Chinese Jews (which also prompts Chinese interest in the Jews) by way of the Jesuit priest Matteo Ricci, the pioneer missionary to China. In a much retold story, in 1605 a Jew from Kaifeng named Ai Tian was in Beijing and came to visit Ricci. At first Ricci thought his Chinese visitor was a remnant of ancient Chinese Christianity, whereas Ai Tian thought the foreigner was a Jewish rabbi. After the mistake was clarified, Ai Tian invited Ricci to denounce Christianity and take up office as rabbi of Kaifeng, while Ricci informed the Vatican of his discovery, which in turn spurred up interest in this community of Chinese Jews, first in Jesuit-Christian circles, and in turn in Europe in general. The central factor in this early Christian interest in Kaifeng Jews was related to the age-old Christian suspicion that rabbinical Judaism had introduced changes in the Bible, supposedly cutting out the phrases that envisaged the coming of Jesus. Later, Jesuit missions to Kaifeng managed to read through these Torah scrolls and, to their disappointment, found them to be identical in essence to the Torah known to the world.

Another interesting result of the effects the news of Chinese Jews had in Europe was that the mid-17th-century Dutch Jewish rabbi-activist Manasseh ben Israel used this knowledge in his attempt to persuade English ruler Oliver Cromwell to readmit Jews to England, where they had been barred since 1290. His line of reason was based on the Christian belief that Jesus the Messiah would reappear only after Jews are truly scattered to all ends of the world. Seeing that Jews had already reached China in the Far East, settlement in England—being the far north—would be the last requirement for the world’s redemption. Whether or not Jewish readmission to England, which soon began progressing, was due to this line of reasoning is unclear.

Modern scholars have been so enchanted by the case of Kaifeng Jewry that they have attempted to answer two seemingly contradictory questions: Why was this offshoot of the Diaspora lost to assimilation, whereas other no less far-off communities—such as that of India—survived? On the other hand, how is it that against all odds, such a tiny community, detached from any other Jewish community, has nevertheless maintained a basic Jewish identity even after losing many other traits of Judaism (e.g., rituals)?

An extremely interesting attempt to answer the latter question, made by Irene Eber (1993), speculates that it was in fact the Jews' "Sinification," namely their adoption of the Chinese lineage system (a famous local phrase terms them as "Seven surnames, eight clans"), and their definition as a Chinese religious sect (jiao) that has secured some degree of Jewish identity even up to the 20th century, when practically no religious trait or community organization has prevailed.

Since the final destruction of the synagogue in the mid-19th century, a Jewish community in Kaifeng does not exist as such, yet various families have sustained some degrees of Jewish identity. Anglican bishop Charles W. White, stationed in Kaifeng during 1910–1934, made contact with many of the descendants and researched their history. He also managed to purchase control of the site of the former synagogue, the stone tablets, and shipped to his home base in Canada the few physical relics of the community he could collect; these are now housed at the Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto. In 1919, he arranged on behalf of a separate fundamentalist Protestant mission an "attempt to reorganize the Chinese Jews of Kaifeng." One of the goals of this attempt was to "teach them that Jesus Christ is the savior of the Jews." At approximately the same time, Jews from the Sephardi community in Shanghai made two failed attempts of reviving the Kaifeng Jews through the Society for the Rescue of Chinese Jews of Kaifeng.

Jews of Kaifeng, China, about 1900.
(Isadore Singer, ed., The Jewish Encyclopedia, 1901)

The surprising outcome of this is that in 1952, soon after the People's Republic of China (PRC) was established, the living remnants of the Kaifeng Jews were able to send a representative to Beijing requesting recognition as a national minority. Though this was politely turned down, some Jewish identity survived the notorious Cultural Revolution (1966–1976) to reach its latest quest for revival at the end of the last century.

Contemporary Overview

Soon after the founding of the PRC in October 1949, two issues central to the Communist Party's hold on power became clear. One was the status and classification of the various national minorities (minzu), and the other was consolidation of religion. The status of the disassociated collection of individual families in Kaifeng, who were descendants of the once intact community of local Jews, was a question touching both politically sensitive core issues. The following chronological outline may help explain how the sensitivity surrounding this numerically insignificant group involves not only China but also Israel and even the United States. It also serves as a curious example of how an ethnic and religious identity thought to have been completely extinct, may, under the right circumstances, rise up again (the primary source of this entry is Urbach 2007).

Scholars agree that at least since the final destruction of the synagogue in the mid-19th century, Kaifeng Jewry ceased to exist as a viable community, although some basic form of identity as Jews has persisted. During the Republican era (1927–1949), China recognized only five major nationalities. Soon after the reunification of China and the establishment of the PRC, the Communist Party set out on a political-anthropological campaign to recognize and classify all the national minorities. In 1952, two Jewish descendants (or Youtai houyi, as they have become to be known in Kaifeng) came to Beijing to participate in a National Day celebration held by premier Zhou Enlai, who hosted representatives of the various ethnic groups. The delegation officially asked to be recognized as a national minority. Though the request was declined, the central government instructed Kaifeng local authorities that the Youtai “be cared for and not discriminated against” (Xu 2003, Appendix A). In fact, locally some of the descendants maintained a classification as “Jewish” (Youtai) under the nationality rubric of their household registration cards.

During the Cultural Revolution, any diversion from the norm—whether ethnic or religious—was not merely discouraged, but downright dangerous. Therefore, the period that followed, known as the reform and opening up period, saw an upsurge of religious revival on the one hand, and some degree of renegotiation of ethnic definitions on the other. In the case of the Kaifeng Jews, this was the most turbulent period since their disintegration as a community 150 years earlier.

The reform era marked a turning point for the heretofore “extinct” Jewish community. Though Kaifeng is a historic former capital of Northern Song dynasty, it is not a major attraction for foreign tourists. So when foreign visitors—Jews as well as Christians primarily interested in “discovering” the “lost” Jews of China—began arriving in Kaifeng, this could not be overlooked by local officials. The local government monopoly tourism company, together with other relevant political organs, devised a system to accommodate these visits: a group of elderly Jewish descendants were carefully picked for meetings with foreigners. They were briefed regarding what to say and what not to say. Not having any interest in Jewish religious and customs and no affinity to Israel was part of the line they were required to keep to.

The growing wave of visitors had a dual effect—on the one hand, it convinced local authorities that the Jewish theme is, in fact, a gold mine for the local economy in terms of the potential for foreign tourism. On the other hand, as far as the descendants were concerned, it raised their awareness of belonging to a greater outside “mother group,” and served to strengthen the Youtai identity. Local tourist authorities contemplated that the lack of any Jewish-related physical structure was preventing the development of Kaifeng into a true attraction for big numbers of foreign tourists (by way of comparison, the neighboring provincial capital of Xi’an draws millions of tourists a year, and aside from the famous Terra Cotta Warriors, the local Great Eastern mosque is a major tourist magnet). Yet during the 1980s, the idea of erecting a physical structure was not seriously considered. The main reason was the lack of formal relations with Israel, which intensified the religious and ethnic sensitivities already surrounding the Youtai case.

In 1989, Israel and China began a publicized process of thawing their relationship, and full diplomatic missions were set up in 1992. This radically changed the political atmosphere in Kaifeng regarding the Jewish theme. Authorities began discussing how the potential of “Jewish tourist resources” could be exploited. First, in late 1992, the municipal government authorized the establishment of the Society for the Research of the History and Culture of Chinese Jews in Kaifeng. The society was made up of officials, scholars, and Jewish descendants. Soon after, in January 1993, the municipal government made a major decision—to reconstruct the former synagogue, though not as an active synagogue, but merely as a museum. Assurances were made that this future structure would not actually serve for religious rituals.

Nevertheless, it was becoming clear in Kaifeng that the project to rebuild the synagogue was bringing along with it a “Jewish revival” of some sort. Descendants were growing more secure in their contacts with foreigners. They were active in the construction office in charge of establishing the Jewish museum. It had become expected that once the structure would be up, Youtai descendants would naturally make up its personnel, and they would indeed use the structure for religious and social gatherings. Other “Jewish” projects were initiated, such as a community cemetery, a Jewish hotel, a Jewish school, and even an Overseas Jewish Economic Development District. Kaifeng Jews also attracted another wave of Christian missionary attention (as had accrued periodically in the past). In October 1995, an entire international arts and music troupe participating in a local flower festival turned out to be a mission led by American Jewish-Messianic televangelist Sid Roth to introduce Jesus primarily to Kaifeng Jews. With their unconcealed missionary activity, the havoc they created caused much embarrassment to local officials.

These developments, which clearly affected a rise in Youtai identity, resulted in a 1996 reversal of the official authorization of the plan to construct the Jewish museum. Local descendants felt a growing pressure from authorities, especially regarding their contacts with foreigners. This caused three descendants to attempt to make contact with the Israeli embassy in Beijing, in the hope of obtaining some sort of confirmation of their status and perhaps immigrating to Israel as Jews. However, since its establishment in 1992, the embassy had made it a policy to take no stance on the issue of Kaifeng Jews. There is a strong, though unconfirmed, rumor that, at the time, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin gave the Chinese government a personal commitment regarding the total separation between Israel as a state and any sort of Judaism as a religion or ethnic group in China. The first Israeli ambassador, Ze'ev Sufott, refused to authorize a Jewish Agency delegation to China because it was interested in visiting the Jews of Kaifeng, and he feared any such Israeli involvement in what China defines as its interior affairs might endanger the two countries' tender relations. Noting that Kaifeng Jews were "as Jewish as I am Chinese," Sufott also believed such a delegation was intrinsically pointless. Since then, descendants report being refused entry to the embassy.

This time, the three Youtai descendants who traveled to Beijing succeeded in obtaining an Israeli stamp of authentication on a Chinese document that confirmed their Jewish status. Though a mere technicality on the part of the Israeli Consulate, once news of this reached the Kaifeng authorities in late 1996, a radical campaign was implemented—to cross out Youtai as "nationality" from all the Household registration cards of all those who were defined as such, forcing the Kaifeng descendants to choose classification as either Han (ethnic Chinese) or Hui (Muslim Chinese). In a country where ethnic identity is so closely attached to state definitions, this sort of campaign is tantamount to an attempt to obliterate an identity. Though reports of this arrived at the Israeli embassy, it made no action and voiced no response.

It would nevertheless be wrong to attach Israel's indifference toward the plight of Kaifeng descendants for recognition solely to its consideration of China's apprehension from any external involvement. Israel, in fact, had its own interior reasons. After generations of marriage with non-Jewish women who did not go through any conversion (giyur), Kaifeng Jews, who are identified as such according to the Chinese standard of patrilineal descent, could not be regarded Halachically (that is, by Jewish law) as Jews. Therefore, they are not legally entitled to immigrate to Israel according to the Law of Return. Yet Israel's short history has shown that these definitions are far from rigid. The definition of various communities remote from the core of world Jewry as entitled or not for aliyah is based not only on Jewish law, but maybe even more so on political and social pressures coming both from within Israel and from world Jewry and even Christian pressure groups. Such are the cases of Ethiopian Jewry and the Bnei Menashe from India.

Given these circumstances, the Israeli public, media, and political and bureaucratic establishments have developed a sort of inherent suspicion toward emerging groups of "lost Jews." When these come from Third World countries, the tendency in Israel is to dismiss such cases as utter inventions aimed exclusively at poor people's hope for immigration to a developed country such as Israel. The fear then arises of an uncontrollable wave of immigrants all claiming to be Jews. As a former director-general of Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs indicated to this author when discussing Israeli regard (or disregard) to Kaifeng Jewish descendants, "Any Jewish group needs to have a lobby in Israel to support their cause. Those in Kaifeng had no such lobby."

There is an American connection as well. In recent years, religious freedom has become a major point of both dialogue and confrontation between the United States and China. In February 1998, President Clinton sent a delegation of three religious leaders to investigate this issue in China, including Rabbi Arthur Schneier, president of the Appeal of Conscience Foundation in New York. When Schneier met with President Jiang Zemin, he made an appeal that China would consider recognizing Judaism—being one of the world's major religions—as an official religion in China, together with the five already recognized religions (Taoism, Buddhism, Protestantism, Catholicism, and Islam). Jiang, of course, did not oblige. Once again this exemplifies how this minor issue in an off-route city has relevance that stretches far beyond.

In late 1999, Jewish descendant Jin Guangyuan, along with wife and daughter, managed to move to Israel with the aid of a Finnish Christian-Zionist movement. For several years they lived in Jerusalem with no official status, insisting on being recognized as Jews. Turned "Shlomo" Jin, he first shunned the idea of going through conversion to Judaism, insisting they were Jews already. Seeing himself as the "door opener" for the rest of Kaifeng Jews, conversion would not mark an achievement that would affect his community in large. When the Jins later decided to go through conversion, it still took much time, effort, and active assistance by their dedicated sympathizers in Israel, including a minister and a Supreme Court judge. In 2005, they finally became the first Kaifeng Jewish descendants to complete conversion and obtain Israeli citizenship.

In Kaifeng, the erasure of the Youtai designation from household documents did not mark a complete end to the quest for Jewish revival. In 2003, a young American-Israeli settled in Kaifeng and has devoted much of his time and effort to educating willing descendants in Hebrew and Judaism. His understandably secretive mission was aimed primarily at enabling Jewish descendants to immigrate to Israel. To that end he opened a makeshift Hebrew school where he taught adults and children; it also served as a place for the Shabbat community gatherings he initiated. In 2005, a team of two Israeli rabbis led by Michael Freund and his Shavei Israel Institute came to visit the school, trying to assess the feasibility of converting more descendants and arranging their aliyah. One of the results of the visit was that soon after, the young teacher was expelled from China. Yet what is surprising is that authorities turned a blind eye toward his activities during the years he lived in China.

China is very apprehensive about the emergence of any new religion or ethnic minority. Any recognition of a heretofore unrecognized national minority may unleash demands from many other unrecognized ethnic groups. "Building a harmonious society" is China's current slogan, and new sprouting religions are not viewed as a constructive contribution to this goal. Particular factors may explain why the Jewish case in Kaifeng is especially sensitive: a strong Muslim population in Kaifeng raises the fearful possibility that the Arab-Israeli conflict will be imported to the heart of China. In addition, the power of world Jewry, exemplified by President Clinton's official envoy expressing care for Jews in China, suggests that there is such an international dimension to the issue that it is best for the government to deny its existence altogether. As a result, the official dictum is clear—Chinese Jews have completely and irreversibly assimilated into the Han, Hui (Muslim), and other recognized nationalities.

China's decisive approach brought Shalom Salomon Wald, writer of the Jewish People's Policy Planning Institute strategy paper entitled China and the Jewish People: Old Civilizations in a New Era, to criticize various Jews' efforts on behalf of Kaifeng Jewish descendants. In the chapter "The Trouble with Kaifeng," he concludes: "[S]upporting a group of impoverished Jewish descendants is certainly a noble gesture, but will do nothing to improve the standing of the Jewish people in China, and could even damage it if it triggers new demands from other small minorities and raises serious problems for the authorities. The sympathy and help that the group certainly deserves must not come at the expense of broader Jewish policy objectives" (Wald 2004, 77). This seems to be the prevailing stance in other major Jewish institutions as well. Yet Shavei Israel is continuing its efforts to bring more Kaifeng youngsters to Israel for education toward conversion and citizenship. With China in a constant mode of change, there is no telling what the future holds for the Kaifeng Youtai, in terms of revival in Kaifeng itself or in terms of aliyah to Israel.

Bibliography

- Leslie, Donald Daniel. 1972. The Survival of the Chinese Jews: The Jewish Community of Kaifeng. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Malek, Roman, ed. 2000. From Kaifeng . . . To Shanghai: Jews in China. Sankt Augustin, Germany: Monumenta Serica Institute.
- Needle, M. Patricia, ed. 1992. East Gate of Kaifeng: A Jewish World inside China. Minneapolis: China Centre, University of Minnesota.
- Wald, Shalom Salomon. 2004. China and the Jewish People: Old Civilizations in a New Era. Jerusalem: Jewish People Policy Planning Institute.
- Weisz, Tiberiu. 2006. The Kaifeng Stone Inscriptions: The Legacy of the Jewish Community in Ancient China. New York: Iuniverse.
- Xu, Xin. 2003. The Jews of Kaifeng, China: History, Culture, and Religion. Jersey City, NJ: KTAV.

Survey of Historical Jewish Personalities in China

M. Avrum Ehrlich

---

There was speculation that a number of the Kaifeng Jews were prominent members of the emperor's court, but the most outstanding and curious role of Jews in China comes in the early 20th century. Few foreigners had the opportunity to observe from close and even participate in the tumultuous rise of the new republic of China. Of those few an exceptionally high number were Jews. Through separate and unrelated series of events Jews were involved in different roles in the history of modern China. Their stories are fascinating and sometimes touching and not popularly known, but these stories lay the foundations for the future relationship and sense of collegiality between the Jewish and Chinese nations.

Morris "Two Gun" Cohen

Morris Abraham Cohen (1887–1970) was born into an impoverished Polish-Jewish family in Radzanów, Poland, that eventually fled to London's East End, where Cohen was essentially a delinquent. His love of the theater and the boxing arena may have indicated potential in his character, but Cohen's first arrest when he was very young seems to have laid the foundation for a life of delinquency and chaos. He was eventually sent to the Hayes Industrial Home for Wayward Jewish Lads, and in 1905, he was sent to Western Canada. Although he spent some time living a farmer's life in western Canada, Cohen was destined for an exciting life as an adventure seeker. On more than one occasion, his flare for colorful and exciting antics, gambling, and playing with trouble as a real estate broker landed him in jail. Oddly enough Cohen established a connection with a number of exiled Chinese and wound up joining Sun Yat-sen's anti-Manchu organization. His business activities with Sun Yat-sen and other dubious activities, mainly in Shanghai and Canton, led him to develop a reputation, but his nickname was the result of a shooting incident that led Morris to carry two guns. He is said to have been the personal bodyguard for Sun Yat-sen and to have helped the Nationalists establish their intelligence operations. Some even credit him with getting China to abstain from voting against the establishment of the State of Israel in 1947.

Jacob Rosenfeld

Dr. Jacob Rosenfeld (1902–1952) was born in Lemburg, now Mvov, which is part of western Ukraine. Rosenfeld was fortunate enough to escape the fate of so many captured Jews in Austro-Hungarian territory and Nazi Germany. When Rosenfeld was conditionally released in 1939, he made haste to enter one of the only territories that did not require a visa. He soon found himself in what many called "little Vienna" in Shanghai, China, along with some 25,000 other European Jews, but the political turmoil and horrors of war influenced Rosenfeld to join the New Fourth Army in 1941. He lived in Jinan in the Shandong province. Rosenfeld quickly rose up the ranks in the army and in active duty as a medical officer, improved and organized hygienic conditions and trained medical staff. Eventually his position was elevated to the rank of general in the Mao's Red Army. He became a hero for many during the war with the Japanese, and there is a statue of him at one of Jinan's oldest hospitals. After returning home to Vienna to a devastating loss of family and friends, Rosenfeld tried to return to China but was denied a visa. He eventually went to Israel, where he died in 1952. His grave was a pilgrimage spot for the first official Chinese delegations that arrived after diplomatic relations were restored in 1992.

Robert Pollitzer

Dr. Robert Pollitzer (1885–1968) graduated from Vienna University with a degree in medicine, before moving to Harbin, China, in 1919. There Harbin's plague prevention unit hired him permanently. During that time, Pollitzer became one of the world's leading authorities on the plague and cholera, through his research and numerous publications and practice of medicine throughout China, mainly in plague prevention. Many Chinese considered him a hero as he moved around the provinces trying to cure disease. He went on to become an internationally known epidemiologist and former member of the League of Nations Anti-Epidemic Commission. Eventually, Pollitzer relocated to Geneva, Switzerland, with his family, where he worked at the World Health Organization headquarters, before moving to the United States. There has recently been talk among some Chinese artists and filmmakers of making a movie about his life.

Ruth Weiss

Ruth Weiss (1908–2006) was a Jewish-born Austrian-Chinese educator, journalist, and lecturer, and a witness to the Chinese Revolution and the early stages of the establishment of the People's Republic of China. Weiss was born in Vienna, Austria, and graduated with a degree in German and English studies from the University of Vienna. In 1933, she traveled to Shanghai, at a time when many European Jewish refugees were escaping the Nazis. There, Weiss worked as a freelance journalist, while employed at a Jewish school, at the School of the Chinese Committee of Intellectual Cooperation, and at the West China Union University. Eventually, she took a post at a radio station in New York, although she returned to China from 1952 to 1965, where she was a lecturer for the Publishing House for Foreign Literature.

In 1955, Weiss was one of about 100 foreign-born residents to receive Chinese citizenship, and in 1983, she was named 1 of 11 foreign experts by the Communist Party of China, part of membership of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference. She died in Beijing, aged 97.

Aaron Avshalomov

Aaron Avshalomov (1894–1956) was born in Nikolayevsk in eastern Siberia. As a child growing up on the Amur River, Avshalomov came to love the Beijing opera pieces and Chinese folk songs sung by the local Chinese population. In 1916, after study in the Zurich Conservatory, Avshalomov went directly to Beijing, Tianjin, and Qingdao, where he collected folk songs that would be incorporated into later compositions. He lived in China from 1916 to 1946, with a brief stint in the United States. He was a key figure in the evolution of modern Chinese music and the introduction of Chinese themes into musical performances in the West. He returned to Shanghai from the United States in 1929 where he worked as a librarian and conductor of the Shanghai City Symphony. He also composed works for the piano and violin, such as The Twilight Hour of Yan Kuei Fei (1933) and The Great Wall (1933–1941), which was premiered at the site in 1945. His first opera drawing from Chinese sources was Guan Yin, produced in Beijing in 1925. Today his work is described as a particular fusion of traditional elements of Chinese music, in the “colorful Russian style” of Rimsky-Korsakov. He premiered his first work in Beijing in 1925, an opera entitled Kuan Yin.

In 1932, Avshalomov arrived in Shanghai and met Nie Er, the composer of The March of the Volunteers. Avshalomov produced the first orchestration of this song, which later became the national anthem of the People’s Republic of China.

Avshalomov went on to write the ballet Soul of Qin and the pantomime Intense Shadows. His masterpiece, The Great Wall, was a musical drama based on the tragic story of a woman named Meng Jiangnu, who lived in the Qin dynasty (221–206 BCE). It was performed in Shanghai in November 1945. During World War II he was placed under house arrest by the occupying Japanese forces. At the encouragement of U.S. general Albert C. Wedemeyer, Avshalomov traveled to the United States with the hope of staging The Great Wall there. He was stranded in the United States by the Chinese Civil War, and remained there until his death. Before his death in 1956 he completed another musical drama based on Chinese themes, The Twilight of Royal Lady Young. In 1985, Jacob Avshalomov, Aaron’s Chinese-born son and conductor of the Portland (Oregon) Junior Symphony Orchestra, came to China to attend commemorations of what would have been his father’s 90th birthday. In Beijing and Shanghai Jacob had the honor of conducting all of his father’s China-related works.

Sydney Shapiro

Sydney Shapiro (b. 1915) lived in Beijing for nearly 40 years and became a Chinese citizen in 1963. Throughout his 58-year career as a magazine copy editor, translator, and writer he has been critically acclaimed in China and around the world as an important Jewish thinker on contemporary China.

Shapiro was important throughout the earliest stages of China’s path toward modern development, raising awareness of China’s past, present, and future. This is especially clear through his numerous translations of Chinese works into coherent and accurate English. Shapiro has guided the West into developing an understanding of Jews in old China, contemporary China, and even Chinese literature. Perhaps his most recognized work, Shapiro’s autobiography is entitled I Chose China.

Israel Epstein

Israel Epstein (1915–2005) was born in Warsaw, Poland, but with the increasing anti-Semitism and the approach of the German army, his family moved to China. When Israel Epstein was just 15 years old he began to work for the Peking Times and the Tientsin Times as a journalist. Epstein was privileged to have covered a variety of exciting news stories as a journalist in the early stages of the establishment of the People's Republic of China. His exploits, including the time he was forced to fake his own death to escape the Japanese, were even covered in the New York Times.

In 1944, Epstein left China to travel to Britain and the United States with his first wife. Eventually, he returned to China in 1951 and worked for China Today until his retirement at the age of 70. He was given the title of editor emeritus for the remainder of his days. In 1957, Epstein was granted Chinese citizenship; he became a member of the Communist Party of China in 1964 and the Standing Committee of the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference in 1983. Epstein was also given the honor of meeting most of the leaders of China from Zhou Enlai to the present leader Hu Jintao, who also attended Epstein's funeral service, held at Babaoshan Cemetery for Revolutionaries.

Sam Ginsbourg

Sam Ginsbourg (1914–1980) was the son of a Russian Jew from a small town in southeastern Byelorussia, who eventually became an enterprising lumber trader. His Jewish Russian mother graduated from the Omsk Medical Institute, with honors, as a dentist.

His first experiences in China were in Harbin in 1919–1922. He experienced anti-Semitism for the first time, as a child in a small community in Imianpo (about 100 kilometers from Harbin), when he was attacked by some children. Ginsbourg's family finally moved to Shanghai on October 24, 1926. There, over a period of years, Ginsbourg frequently experienced the political unrest and war as a result of Japanese invasion of China. Eventually, after 1932, he moved to Nanking where he was employed as a stenographer, eventually gaining experience and education throughout China in a number of fields. Finally, in October 1948, Ginsbourg moved to Jinan, where he began to teach Russian, while supervising translation of Russian works into Chinese, including The Ideological and Political Education of Middle School Pupils in the Soviet Union.

Ginsbourg stayed in Jinan, Shandong, for the next three and half decades, where he was employed as a professor in Shandong University. In his autobiography, entitled My First Sixty Years in China, at least politically, Ginsbourg seems to have been a modest and quiet man, but throughout the early years of political uncertainty and great turmoil, until his death in 1980, he witnessed some of the most important political changes in Chinese contemporary history. He became well known at Shandong University and his role at the university and his friendship with the university president may have influenced Jewish studies at the university and the establishment of a center for Jewish studies, which is presently the most important academic center for research in Jewish philosophy, culture, and texts.

Jews in Shanghai

Carl Hoffman and M. Avrum Ehrlich

---

General Population: 19 million

Jewish Population: Estimated at approximately 4,000

Percent of Population: 0.0026 percent

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Israel, the United States, Australia, France, Tunisia, and other Western countries (and additional tourists, businesspeople, and temporary residents)

Languages Spoken: English, Hebrew, French, Chinese

---

Historical Overview

Shanghai was an ancient coastal settlement at the mouth of the Yangtze River that gradually grew in size and importance. Already a rising business center by the start of Ming Dynasty (1368–1644), Shanghai became a major seaport and trade entrepôt during the succeeding Ch'ing or Manchu period (1644–1898). After the Opium Wars and a series of treaties and agreements between the aggressive colonial powers of the West and a weak China, Shanghai became a colonized city, carved up into foreign “concessions” and open for business to one and all. The city thus became a magnet for a colorful influx of businesspeople, traders, missionaries, and adventurers from all over the world. Not surprisingly, many of these—especially businesspeople and traders, along with a few of the adventurers—were Jews.

Soon after the Hong Kong British trading house of Jardine Matheson arrived in Shanghai and began to do business, several Jewish families from the Indian city of Bombay came hard on their heels. These Jewish families, who traced their descent from the Sephardi community of Baghdad, had names—Sassoon, Kadoorie, and Hardoon—that were to resonate loudly through the next several decades of Shanghai's history. As soon as the Sassoons, Kadoories, and Hardoons settled into Shanghai and established their businesses, they began to attract large numbers of Jews from Bombay, Baghdad, and Cairo. These new arrivals also began to do business—some as employees of the three prominent Jewish business families, others as independent entrepreneurs. A number of the new arrivals purchased large tracts of real estate throughout the booming city. The Kadoories alone were said to own upward of 1,900 buildings. All of these Sephardi Jewish families contributed more than their share to building Shanghai and establishing its commerce during the early decades of the 20th century.

In addition to building the city, these Sephardi families set out to develop a thriving Jewish community in this Chinese coastal city at the mouth of the Yangtze. Shortly after the turn of the century, Nissim Ezra and Silas Hardoon established the first Jewish day school, followed a few years later by the construction of a magnificent synagogue, Ohel Rachel, built by Victor Sassoon in memory of his wife Rachel. The Jewish community proclaimed itself an organizational entity in 1910 under the leadership of David Abraham, who remained its head for the next 30 years. A particularly colorful figure during this period was Silas Hardoon, who was a favorite among the Chinese for his philanthropic support of Chinese causes and institutions. Married to a Chinese woman and an admirer of the Buddhist religion, Hardoon contributed heavily to Buddhist schools and charities. When Hardoon and his wife realized they were unable to have children, they adopted more than a dozen children of various nationalities and gave each $1 million as a start in life.

The Sephardi Jews were soon joined, in much larger numbers, by Russian Jews fleeing czarist pogroms throughout the Jewish Pale of Settlement. Settling mostly in Harbin and Shanghai, by 1908, the Russian Jews numbered upward of 8,000 in Harbin, and in Shanghai they soon outnumbered the Sephardic Jews. Their numbers virtually doubled after the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917. Unlike the Sephardim, most of the Jews from Russia arrived largely destitute, with little more than the clothes on their backs. Most became shopkeepers of one sort or another; a few became bakers and milliners.

As in Harbin, the Jews found a home in Shanghai. In a 1920 letter to one of the leaders of the Jewish community, no less a personage than Dr. Sun Yat-sen, founder and first president of the Republic of China, wrote, "All lovers of democracy cannot help but support the movement to restore your wonderful and historic nation, which has contributed so much to the civilization of the world and which rightly deserves an honorable place in the family of nations."

During the 1930s, Shanghai became one of the few ports of refuge for Jews fleeing Nazi Germany. An open city that required no passports, visas, or other documentation, Shanghai provided a home and haven to some 30,000 Jews before the Nazis and the war stopped the flow of Jewish refugees. Madame Sun Yat-sen led a delegation from China that met with the German consul in Shanghai to lodge a strong protest against the Nazi's treatment of Jews in Germany, and numerous protest rallies were staged in the city, protesting Germany's war against the Jews.

After Japan's invasion of China and occupation of Shanghai in 1937, the Japanese imposed no special restrictions on the city's Jewish population. Although nominally allied with Nazi Germany, the Japanese were at best mystified by the Germans' anti-Semitism, which they neither understood nor paid much attention to. Jews could move about the city freely and live wherever they wished. Many chose to live in the Hongkew district, a crowded Chinese neighborhood where the Jewish residents soon established a thriving community, with newspapers, theatrical groups, orchestras, and cafes. Shelters and soup kitchens were established for those in need.

In 1940, these Jews were joined by the thousands of Polish Jews saved by Chiune Sugihara, the Japanese consul in Kovno, Lithuania. Against clear and strict orders from Japan's Foreign Ministry, Sugihara—often called the "Japanese Schindler"—issued some 10,000 transit visas to Jews desperately trying to escape the Nazi Holocaust. Many of these refugees, including the entire Mir Yeshiva, spent the war years in Shanghai's Hongkew district.

Throughout the war, the Japanese continued to resist the relentless pressure from their German allies to impose the "Final Solution" on Shanghai's Jews. The Japanese “compromised” by declaring the city’s Hongkew district the “Hongkew Ghetto.” Shanghai’s Jewish residents were troubled no further, however, and lived through the war unharmed.

After the war, reports of the Holocaust in Europe horrified the Jews of Shanghai, many of whom had fled Europe and left family members behind. This, along with increasing political turmoil in China—as fighting between the communists and the Nationalist government spread throughout the country—induced most of Shanghai’s foreign community to leave. The new State of Israel became a powerful magnet for many of Shanghai’s Jews. The last Jewish wedding in Shanghai took place in 1948; virtually all Jews had left by the following year.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

Today, most of the Jews in Shanghai come to set up their own trade companies or source goods, to work in international corporations, to teach English, or to study Chinese or Chinese history, culture, or business.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

As far as Shanghai is an international city and shares in international culture, many Chinese artists, performers, writers, directors, and an array of other professions, collaborate with Jews around the world, and there is an active exchange of Jewish–Chinese relations in these disciplines.

Jewish tourism to Shanghai is active, and there are a number of interesting sites of Jewish cultural value. A good deal of Shanghai’s most expensive properties, including its most prestigious downtown shopping streets and the site of the municipal government quarters, was owned by Jews in the first half of the century. Many books and accounts of life in Shanghai and photo albums and studies of Jewish architecture and music in Shanghai have been produced. Parts of the Jewish ghetto are intact, and a museum is housed in one of its synagogues. Discussions with local authorities have taken place as to the extent that this area should be preserved and reconstructed to reflect its Jewish component. The local authorities, while keen to bring Jewish tourism into the city, only allow access to the beautiful Ohel Rachel synagogue in Shanghai and other select synagogues. The grave stones from the dismantled Jewish cemetery of Shanghai were found in villages and rivers where the rubble was dumped, and many have been restored due to the efforts of Dvir Bar Gal, an Israeli artist and journalist residing in Shanghai.

Jewish Education, Religious Denominations, and Communal and Political Institutions

The original Jewish communities and their buildings and properties were nationalized in the early 1950s. The first modern community was a Sephardi minyan, which has been taken over with the arrival of the Chabad rabbi Shalom Greenberg and his wife in 1998. The new Jewish community is a distance from the historic centers of Jewish life, rupturing the sense of continuity between the two. While tourists and travelers may prefer to spend time on the Bund or the Honqiao ghetto area or Nanjing road, the long-term residents of Shanghai may prefer to live in the Honkao area of villas and more Gentile living, next to the domestic airport.

Jewish ghetto in Shanghai. (Photo by Jono David)

A large number of Jews, mainly Israelis, do not identify with the organized Jewish community, but they maintain groupings in different areas of Shanghai. A new Chabad center has been opened in Pudong, the banking and development area of Shanghai, where many corporations, banks and multinationals are based and Jews live.

Anti-Semitism, Anti-Zionism, and Existential Problems of the Community

The Shanghai municipality is proud of Shanghai's role in saving tens of thousands of Jews from the Nazi Holocaust and enjoys a unique sense of friendship and respect for the old Jews of Shanghai. In one major Shanghai municipal museum there is a permanent exhibition about Shanghai's Jews with a large wall prominently displaying the sentiments "while the enlightened nations of the earth closed their doors to the fate of the Jews running for their life to escape the death camps of Europe, the only city on earth that welcomed them with equality and respect was Shanghai."

The Chinese are generally enthusiastic about meeting Jews and have general and widespread ideas that the Jews are "very clever," "rich," "influential," "upright," “tough negotiators,” and so on. There is a renewed interest in Jewish issues, and Shanghai publishers have produced several books, albeit superficial in nature, on Jewish subjects; for example, How to be a Jewish Millionaire and The Secrets to Jewish Life. There is a small center for Israel and Jewish studies at the Shanghai Academy of the Social Sciences led by Professor Pan Guang. He is also the editor of a history and pictorial book commemorating the Jews of Shanghai. The center especially focuses on the study of political issues relating to China and Israel and the Jews, so, for example, there are papers and studies on Israel–China relations and on the Jewish lobby in the United States.

Many Jews have arrived in Shanghai and have found it convenient to associate with the Jewish community. Some have even become more identified with religious observance while in Shanghai, and a curiously high number of people have become Orthodox while in Shanghai. This may be attributed to the largesse of the city, to the eclectic mix of people coming to Shabbat dinners at the Chabad center, and to the perceived diversity and richness of Jewish life. It also may be attributed to the strong positive affirmation of the Chinese toward Jews, making Jewish identity more attractive. Many Jewish and Israeli men have met Chinese girlfriends, and many have begun to convert to Judaism or have married and are slowly negotiating their mixed Chinese–Jewish identity.

Bibliography

- Heppner, Ernest G. 1993. Shanghai Refuge: A Memoir of the World War II Jewish Ghetto. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.
- Kranzler, David. 1976. Japanese, Nazis and Jews: The Jewish Refugee Community of Shanghai, 1938–1945. New York: Yeshiva University Press.
- Liberman, Yaacov. 1998. My China: Jewish Life in the Orient: 1900–1950. Jerusalem: Geffen.
- Pan, Guang. 1996. The Jews in Shanghai. Shanghai: Shanghai Pictorial Publishing House.
- Tobias, Sigmund. 1999. Strange Haven: A Jewish Childhood in Wartime Shanghai. Urbana: University of Illinois.
- Tokayer, Marvin, and Mary Swartz. 1979. The Fugu Plan: The Untold Story of the Japanese and the Jews during World War II. New York: Paddington Press.

Jews in Major Chinese Cities; Beijing, Guangzhou, Shenzhen, Macau, Jinan, Qingdao

M. Avrum Ehrlich

---

Contemporary Overview

The 21st-century Jewish migration to China has many different features. China is becoming a political, economic, and cultural hub of Asia and the world and is thus a magnet to many individuals and peoples, Jews among them. It is a curiosity that individual Jews have played supportive roles regarding China over the past few hundred years. Some of the great sinologists of Hungary, Germany, and Britain have been Jews. Many of the recent advisers on Asian affairs to U.S. presidents have been Jewish and have been identified as having helped bridge the American–Chinese divide. Prominent among them was Henry Kissinger. Some of the only Westerners to remain in China through its period of isolation were Jews. Some of the first people to enter into business and cultural relations in the late 1970s and 1980s were Jews. Of the 10 foreign-born members of the Central Government's People's Consultative Conference, 6 are Jewish.

In response to the growing expatriate communities in China's major cities, the Chinese government came to a not so formalized understanding that these groups may convene for their ritual practice without government interference, providing they strictly adhere to the rule that no Chinese nationals may attend these activities. Unlike other religious groups, this limitation is not a problem for Jews because of the nonproselytizing nature of the religion; however, this is not always understood by Chinese authorities concerned with fears of the spread of foreign religion in China.

Even though the Chinese government does not formally recognize Judaism as a legal religion in China, it has opened relations with the State of Israel and has made accommodations with the Jewish community, accepting the rights of Jews to congregate, for example. The inevitable process of full recognition as a religious group seems to be waiting for the right time. Meanwhile, local governments in Harbin, Tianjin, and Shanghai are commemorating their Jewish populations and funding the renovations of cemeteries, synagogues, and important historical places. Chinese officials are generally proud of their liberal and humane relations toward the Jews during the Nazi persecutions.

The issue of the Jewish descendants of Kaifeng is still a delicate subject for the Chinese government, and only a few of the descendants have been formerly recognized on their identity card as being of Jewish nationality. The sensitivity emerges from fears that the Muslim population in the same region may react to this and provoke unrest. The government was also concerned that recognizing a small group of 600 Jewish descendants as an ethnic minority could legitimize the claims and requests of many other small minorities for formal recognition and rights. Nevertheless, the small Jewish community in Kaifeng draws a lot of international interest. Many journalists, senators, diplomats, and distinguished Jews from all walks of life have visited the Jewish community of Kaifeng, and it must confound the government how such a small group of very poor and nondescript Chinese workers, in an old and forgotten Chinese city, can attract the attention and imagination of so many influential foreigners.

Today, China attracts different types of Jews from different countries and with different backgrounds, cultures, and languages. The attraction for many people, no less to Jews, is the prospect of meaningful employment opportunities and a cheap alternative to competitive Western cities. Some Jews have come to China in their golden age to work, teach, and live cheaply with their pensions or savings intact. Some are married to Chinese women and work in China, and some intermarriage results in conversion to Judaism. Most Jews come as skilled professionals or for their own businesses. Many come for trade fairs and live in China for short periods. Some Jewish individuals moved to China to establish businesses and have since settled, and others are here for long periods of time, from 5 to 10 years. A large number of people remain in China for 2–3 years before moving on or returning to their homes. Many have decided to remain, developing deep business or employment relations, mastering Chinese, and building lives in China. Gradually, the community of permanent residents is growing.

The Chabad movement is the most dominant Jewish presence in China with rabbis in Shanghai, Beijing, and Guanzhou and with new communities and satellite community centers opening up with kindergartens and schools, mikvah, and kosher food, becoming a hub for community life. A cross section of Jewish existence in China is poetically illustrated at Shabbat or festival meals in Beijing, Shanghai, and Guangzhou telling more about the diversity and individuality of the Jews living in China.

Shanghai and Beijing are the major sites of the contemporary evolution of new Jewish communities in China. In both cases, liberal congregations were established first, and Chabad-Lubavitch moving in later—to Shanghai in 1998 and Beijing in 2001. Guangzhou and Shenzhen in the south draw many Jewish traders and business people to its trade shows, and Chabad has set up a center accommodating Shabbat and holiday provisions for the Jews who live there permanently. Qingdao and Jinan in Shandong province are developing communities, the former mainly Israelis and trade oriented, and the latter attracting academics to Shandong University and tourist groups as well as those fostering Chinese–Jewish relations.

At a Shabbat dinner at a Chabad center, there can easily be a group of Jewish businesspeople from Iran, a French Moroccan Jewish family living and trading in the city, or students of political science or Chinese culture and language from all over the Jewish world sitting with Hasidic Jews from Brooklyn who work in the garment trade or supervise kosher product manufacturing.

Many diplomatic, advisory, and government positions in the American, Australian, Argentinean, European Union, and Israeli embassies and consulates are Jews. Israeli travelers, investors, traders, and foreign experts may constitute up to 40 percent of the Jewish population of China.

American, Australian, South African, and European businesspeople have come to China to work and stay for periods of time. Foreign experts, including teachers, heads of companies, and senior executives from large multinational corporations now live in major Chinese cities.

With expatriate communities continuously strengthening their presence in many parts of China, and with many people settling down for longer periods of time, it seems that Jewish communities in China are on a road to greater strength and expansion, both in numbers as well as in terms of influence and stature. These communities are far from transient.

A large number of Jews revisit China on pilgrimages to the graves of their family members or to revisit places they lived. Jewish heritage tours to Kaifeng, Shanghai, and Harbin attract a few thousand Jews every year. The influx of so many well-to-do Jewish people to these areas is noted by the local Chinese authorities, and they have made efforts to ensure the preservation of cemeteries and cultural sites of interest to Jewish tourism. However, there is still no agreement regarding the property rights over the old Shanghai synagogues and the tracts of land confiscated from Jews and nationalized during modern China's establishment.

The kosher industry in China is a fast-growing business, and many of the well-known kosher supervisors work in China. In addition, tens if not hundreds of ultra-Orthodox supervisors come to China every year to ensure the production of kosher products. The sight of ultra-Orthodox Jews entering second-tier industrialized Chinese cities to check the production of a food line at a factory is unusual, but the trend looks as if it will grow.

A number of Chinese artists, singers, directors, and cultural leaders have collaborated with Jews in their respective fields and developed Chinese–Jewish cultural relations. The field of Jewish studies is being taught in many cities around China. A number of Beijing universities teach Hebrew language. Nanjing University has courses in Jewish history, Henan University in Kaifeng teaches Holocaust studies, and the Shanghai Academy of the Social Sciences teaches Israel and political studies. Shandong University in Jinan was appointed to set up a key research institute in Jewish studies and given a mandate to train a generation of Chinese scholars in Jewish studies and undertake large translation projects that would make Jewish culture and wisdom available in the Chinese language.

The way Chinese scholars happened upon areas relating to Judaism was incidental and usually occurred because research in another discipline unearthed a Jewish component of interest. Because Jewish studies intersects many major fields, such as philosophy, theology, literature, sociology, history, music, and politics, every so often a Chinese scholar would stumble on the Jewish component or experience and take a deeper interest.

The Chinese attitude toward Jews is very positive. There seems to be a general sentiment that Jews are clever and successful and should be admired. Many also see Israel as brave and innovative, and Israeli corporations with various agricultural industries in China have succeeded in winning the esteem of many Chinese.

Jews in Beijing

The Jewish population in Beijing is estimated at approximately 2,500 people, and there is a particularly large presence of students scattered in Beijing's numerous universities. Many have little to no contact with the Jewish community because of Beijing's large size and because the universities are far from the foreign business and diplomatic areas. Being the country's capital, the diplomatic corps is large, and it is estimated that some 30 percent of the American embassy staff members are Jewish, and in the past even the ambassador was Jewish. There are also large numbers of businesspeople and traders and administrators and consultants working for large companies.

Migration routes and ethnic backgrounds of the Jews in Beijing can be traced to Israel, the United States, Russia, and other Western countries. Many become experts in Asia and remain for many years. The Jews in Beijing typically speak English, Hebrew, Russian, and Chinese.

Jews in Beijing are primarily businesspeople, executives of global organizations, students, executives in the clothing trade or multinational companies, lawyers, computer consultants, English teachers, and academics. The kosher (and hallal) industry is also growing in China.

People who come to China to work are usually living a middle-class existence and remain for financial benefit. Many of Russian and Azerbaijani Jews are involved in the textile industry and trade. Western Jews serve as professionals.

There is not yet a chief rabbi of China, but it may be a model for organizing and representing the growing Chinese Jewish communities to the Beijing authorities. There is also talk about establishing a Jewish museum and a major center for Jewish studies in Beijing, but various diplomatic hurdles have to be overcome first. It is felt in many quarters that a Jewish–Chinese cultural relationship is important, but the State of Israel is mainly concerned with diplomatic and economic relations.

The first Jews to live and work in Beijing were Roberta Lipson and Alisa Silverstein. They built a series of medical services in Beijing and helped found the first Reform Jewish community in 1988. Jewish expatriates began to gather for Shabbat evening services. These services grew so that on the High Holidays a rabbi is brought over from abroad. The Passover seder is held at Lipson's home and the entire community and other Jews visiting Beijing are invited to attend. Shabbat services are attended by a few dozen people.

In 2002, Rabbi Shimon and Dini Freundlich moved to Beijing from Hong Kong and established the second Chabad synagogue in mainland China, after Shanghai. Congregating in the rabbi's family home, dozens of people, sometimes a hundred, gather for weekly shabbat prayers and meals. The people who congregate are highly mixed—students, professionals, diplomats, businesspeople, travelers, tourists, and adventurers from all over the world. Some are Orthodox, some traditional, and others nonobservant. As it is in many international hubs, the mix is eclectic.

In 2003, a Jewish kindergarten ganeinu was set up as part of an international school. The schools have continually grown and a new education facility was opened up with the support of the Rohr family fund, which included a mikvah and a small museum of Chinese Jewry. The rabbi has continually found ways to develop the community and the services for Jews living or visiting Beijing. The kosher industry supports many of these initiatives; kosher food is prepared for Beijing–Tel Aviv flights, Jewish tourist groups, religious businesspeople, and the local community's needs.

It should be noted that Chabad discourages the attendance of Chinese nationals at any of its activities. Chinese interested in observing or participating in Jewish meals, even accompanying Jewish friends or intimates, have often been very politely told that this would be in breach of an agreement with the Chinese authorities.

The Russian and Azerbaijan (Azeri) Jews in Beijing

In the 1990s, an influx of Jews, mainly from the Azerbaijani city of Kuba, with some from Tajikistan and Georgia and others from Moscow, arrived in Beijing for trade and business purposes. Today they number about 300, mostly male Jews. Their wives and families are mainly in Azerbaijan, Moscow, Israel (in Tirat ha Karmel), and New York. Many arrived in Beijing as young as 17 years old and remained for trade. The average age is about 40 to 50, but some people in their 60s also live in Beijing. They own their own businesses and gather together in their own restaurants. They have a strong hold on certain industries, including the garment industry and the over-land freight cargo trade with Moscow and elsewhere.

Some wives and children have moved to Beijing, and their children have begun to attend the Chabad kindergarten and education system. They identify very proudly, if simply, with their Jewish heritage. They often know the prayers by heart, are demonstrative about their associations, treat the national Jewish days with sincerity, and generally only seek Jewish wives from their home community. Marriage to Chinese, even if they convert, is rare. They like to consider themselves Russian Jews, though they still have proud associations with their region and respect their Rabbi Adam, who is still in Kuba.

Few from this community speak English, so their participation in the Western-style Chabad center was not as active, and they decided to open a center catering to this community and people living in the more central areas of Beijing. The Chabad rabbi speaks Russian and knows the community and its needs, well.

Jews in Guangzhou and Shenzhen

Chabad houses have been established in these trade and manufacturing cities in the south of China. As a mainland extension of Hong Kong and the gateway to Chinese exports, many Jewish-owned businesses and traders come to the trade shows here, such as the famous Canton Fair, to see and buy goods. Many have permanent offices and apartments and visit regularly. Since 2006 there has been a permanent Chabad presence, and festivals are celebrated together and kosher food is available for Orthodox Jews attending the fairs. These gatherings of Jewish businesspeople have brought together American, Moroccan, Iranian, Syrian, and Russian Jews, not to mention, Israelis, Europeans, South Africans, and Australians.

Jews in Macao

Because Macao was a Portuguese colony, many Portuguese Jews were there, and although they had to disguise their faith for the benefit of the Inquisition, there are nevertheless signs and indications of a Jewish presence. A handful of American-Jewish China traders resided in Macao from approximately 1790 to 1846, when Canton was closed to Western traders. Apart from the fact that these Jews did not attend church or support Christian missionaries, they were indistinguishable from their Christian colleagues in South China. Nevertheless, they were victims of the anti-Semitism of their Christian compatriots. John Heard wrote that Joseph Moses “sports now a ferocious whisker, dirty moustache, and a coat which a Christian would not be seen in.” Nathan Kinsman wrote that “it is astonishing to me that Miss King permits that dissipated Jew Moses to gallant her about, [sic] there is no accounting for tastes, however, as the old woman said when she kissed the cow.”

Today, Macau is a gambling haven, an extension of Las Vegas in the Orient, extending its services to hotel and hospitality and the growing international conference island. As such, a number of American Jewish property and casino interests have invested in Macao. There is no organized Jewish community.

Jews in Jinan and Qingdao

Jinan, the capital of Shandong province, has had an interesting role in Jewish–Chinese relations. Dr. Jacob Rosenfeld, who was to become a hero in Chinese history for serving as a doctor in the front lines in the war against the Japanese, and who eventually became the doctor for Mao Zedong, lived and worked in Jinan's well-known Qilu hospital. He was buried in Israel and his gravesite has become a quasi-shrine for Chinese government delegations to Israel.

Sam Ginsbourg, who was born in Harbin, later moved to Jinan and served as a professor of Russian literature at Shandong University, one of China's oldest and most respected academic centers. He penned an autobiography entitled My First Sixty Years in China, which tells the fascinating story of Chinese history from the eyes of a Chinese-born person of Jewish persuasion, who actively participated in modern Chinese history.

In a somewhat causal relationship, through a related series of events, a center for Jewish studies was set up at Shandong University in the 1990s headed by a well-known Chinese professor of philosophy, Fu Youde. Over a decade he developed this center to become the foremost institute of Jewish studies, endorsed and funded by the Chinese Central Government's Higher Education Department to train a generation of scholars in Jewish thought, language, and history and to undertake large translation programs. Related to this, the author of this article was invited to take up a position at Shandong University.

A number of Jews live in Jinan, and many academics, tourists, conference attendees, kosher supervisors, and Jewish traders come through Jinan, which combines a large industrial city with China's most productive agricultural lands. Several Israeli businesses have collaborated with Chinese agricultural farms to develop irrigation and green house techniques. The Shandong people are generally aware of Jews and grateful for Israeli contributions. Sister city relationships have been set up between Jinan and Israeli cities. Finally, a larger number of Israelis and some American Jews have settled in Shandong's coastal city of Qingdao where they participate in trade and freight delivery and manufacturing.

Jews in Harbin

Jonathan Goldstein

---

General Population: Estimated at 1,163,000 in 1953, 2,000,000 in 1970, and 2,928,000 in 2000

Jewish Population: Estimated at one in 1899, 13,000 in 1931, 5,000 in 1935, 3,000 in 1937, one in 1980, and one in 2007

Percent of Population: Never more than 2 percent even at the community's high point in 1931

Languages Spoken: Russian, Yiddish

---

Historical Overview

- 1898 Czarist Russia builds Harbin as a railroad hub on land leased from Imperial China.
- 1899 The first Jewish settler arrives in Harbin.
- 1931 The Harbin Jewish population reaches a high point of 13,000.
- 1933 White Russian thugs kidnap and murder the Jewish musician Simeon Kaspe, son of the owner of Harbin's Hotel Moderne.
- 1936 The Soviet Union sells the railroad zone to Japan.
- 1945 The Soviet Red Army liberates Harbin and imprisons Dr. Abram Kaufman and other communal leaders.
- 1950 Most Harbin Jews leave for Israel, the United States, Australia, Canada, Japan, and the Soviet Union.
- 1982 The Jewish community consists of one elderly resident, Anna Agre, who keeps many of the communal archives under her bed.
- 2004 The Israel vice-premier, Ehud Olmert, visits to China with a delegation of Israeli businesspeople. He and his brother Amram inspect their grandfather's grave in the Harbin Jewish Cemetery and set in motion the process of restoring the entire 700-grave Jewish cemetery.
- 2005 One hundred Israelis of Harbin origin hold a gala reunion and historical conference in their ancestral city and pay their respects at Rabbi Kisilev's grave.
- 2007 One Israeli teaches English at the provincial university, and the synagogue re-opens as a museum with special exhibits on Albert Einstein, Jacob Rosenfeld, and Israel Epstein.

Historical Migration Patterns

Harbin, China, is located 1,500 miles inland in Heilongjiang Province, a region also referred to as Manchuria. The city is a railroad hub, constructed in 1898 by Czarist Russia on land leased from China. Here Jews enjoyed residential permission plus an array of other economic and political rights unavailable in Czarist Russia. These fundamental rights remained when the Soviet Union acquired the railroad zone and when the Soviets, in turn, sold the zone to Japan in 1936.

The fundamental factor that explains Jewish settlement in Harbin is the city's status as a railroad hub. It is located at a point on the Sungari (Songhua) River where the railroad intersects with extensive river traffic. Jews developed businesses ranging from fur export to maritime insurance to the management of hotels. They exchanged goods and services with their kinspeople in European Russia, China, Japan, Korea, and the United States as well as with ethnic Russians, Chinese, Japanese, Koreans, and native Siberian peoples.

In addition to enjoying a “boom town” experience from an economic point of view, Jews helped turn Harbin from a cultural backwater into a sophisticated metropolis. In the early 20th century, Moshe Levitin established a Hebrew, Yiddish, and Russian publishing company. It brought out the Hebrew and Russian-language tractates of Harbin’s long-serving rabbi, Aharon Moshe Kisilev (1866–1949), who had embraced the pre-Herzlian religious Zionism of Rabbi Shmuel Mohilever while a student at the Volozhin Yeshiva. Kisilev was author of the religious treatise Mishbere Yam: Sheelot U-Teshuvot Be-Arbaah Helke Shulkan Arukh (The Waves of the Sea: Responsa on the Four Parts of ‘The Set Table’). He also wrote Zionist and secular tracts, notably Natsionalizm i Evreistvo: Stat’i, Lecktsii, i Doklady (Nationalism and the Jewish People: Articles, Lectures and Reports), published in Harbin in 1941.

Kisilev’s secular counterpart was Dr. Abram Yosifovich Kaufman (1886–1971). Unable to study medicine in Russia because of the quota system, both Kaufman and his wife matriculated in medicine in Switzerland. Kaufman then became a physician in Admiral Kolchak’s Siberian army. Kaufman then became director of Harbin’s Jewish hospital. It was under the communal leadership of Kisilev and Kaufman that Harbin Jews became overwhelmingly Zionist.

Twelve Russian-language Jewish periodicals were published in Harbin, including Evreiskaya Zhizn’ (Jewish Life) and Gadegel (the Cyrillic rendition of the Hebrew “ha-degel,” literally meaning “the flag” and having specific reference to the blue-and-white Zionist flag). The very freedoms that allowed those publications to flourish also enabled the left-leaning Yiddish-language newspaper Der Vayter Mizrekh (The Far East), edited by Meir Mendelevich Birman, to appear. The city hosted a variety of political movements ranging from the anti-Zionist Jewish Workers’ Bund of Lazar Epstein to the general Herzlian Zionism of Kaufman to the ultra-religiosity of the non-Zionist Agudat Israel. Harbin also had a tiny community of Karaites, who were not formally recognized as Jews in Israel until the mid-20th century. Among the best known Karaites were the tobacco merchants Eli Aaronovitch (1874–1936) and Abraham Aaronovitch Lopato (1877–1953), originally from Trakai (Troki), Lithuania. There were 41 Karaite graves in Harbin’s Foreign Catholic Union Cemetery before its demolition in the 1950s. Research on this subject has been undertaken by Professor Wang Zhijun of Heilongjiang University in Harbin.

There was also a largely clandestine Communist Party in which some Jews were active, notably Lazar Epstein’s son Israel Epstein, who later became a member of the People’s Republic of China’s National People’s Consultative Congress, a largely advisory and ceremonial body. Approximately 50 Jewish communists from Harbin repatriated to the Soviet Union in the late 1920s and in the period 1945–1950.

Because Harbin was a Russian-speaking community, it also became the East Asian entry point for Vladimir Ze’ev Jabotinsky’s Zionist Revisionist movement. Most Revisionist literature in the late 1920s was in Russian. Among the better-known Revisionists from Harbin were Israeli Herut Party leaders Eliahu Lankin and Yaacov Liberman and the firebrand activist Judith Ben Eliezer (née Hasser). Even Harbin’s two major Jewish sports organizations reflected the community’s ideological richness and diversity: Maccabi for the General Zionists and Betar for the Revisionists. These two groups would occasionally cooperate to combat the virulent anti-Semitism of the openly fascist White Russian organizations that also thrived in Harbin's relatively unrestricted political climate. There were shouting matches and occasional scuffles between these groups. Perhaps the most recent expression of Harbin's Jewish diversity and vitality is the well-publicized, ongoing saga of the Harbin connections of the family of Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert. Ehud's parents and grandparents reached Harbin from Samara, which was part of European Russia at the time of the Bolshevik Revolution. His grandfather died in Harbin and is buried in the city's vast Jewish cemetery, the largest in East Asia. His parents were among the first Harbin Jews to embrace Revisionism and immigrated to Palestine "to till the land." In the summer of 2004, Ehud "returned" to China with a delegation of Israeli businesspeople. He and his brother, an agricultural attaché at the Israeli Embassy in Beijing, were much photographed reciting the Jewish prayer for the dead at their grandfather's tomb. They set in motion the process of restoring the entire Jewish cemetery. Their visit inspired a subsequent visit of about 100 Israelis of Harbin origin in 2005. This time the former residents held a gala reunion and historical conference their ancestral city.

As of 2007, the city's main synagogue has been refurbished. It contains exhibits on three Jewish personalities: Albert Einstein, Harbin's Israel Epstein, and Jacob Rosenfeld, a Jewish physician with Mao Zedong's Eight Route Army who subsequently went to Israel and is buried in Tel Aviv. In an expression of the ties that bind former Harbin Jews to their ancestral home, Abram Kaufman's son Theodor, who is president of both the Tel Aviv-based Association of Former Jewish Residents of China and the Israel-China Friendship Society, and Qu Wei, a professor at Heilongjiang Academy of Social Sciences, collaborated on a volume appropriately entitled The Homesick Feeling of the Harbin Jews. In a modern Jewish history replete with instances of butchery, pogroms, and the Holocaust, the positive ties that bind Harbin Jews to their mother city are distinct and ongoing.

Bibliography

- Bresler, Boris. 1999. "Harbin's Jewish Community, 1898–1958: Politics, Prosperity, and Adversity." In The Jews of China. Vol. 1, Historical and Comparative Perspectives, edited by Jonathan Goldstein, 200–215. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe.
- Epstein, Israel. 2000. "On Being a Jew in China: A Personal Memoir." In The Jews of China. Vol. 2, A Sourcebook and Research Guide, edited by Jonathan Goldstein, 85–97. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe.
- Fogel, Joshua A. 2000. "The Japanese and the Jews in Harbin, 1898–1930." In New Frontiers: Imperialism's New Communities in East Asia, edited by Robert Bickers et al, 88–108. Manchester, UK: Manchester University Press.
- Lieberman, Yaakov. 1998. My China. Hewlett, NY: Gefen.
- Menquez, Alexander. 2000. "Growing Up Jewish in Manchuria in the 1930s: Personal Vignettes." The Jews of China. Vol. 2, A Sourcebook and Research Guide, edited by Jonathan Goldstein, 70–84. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe.

Jews in Hong Kong

Judy Green and Judy Diestal

---

General Population: More than 7 million

Jewish Population: Estimated at more than 3,000

Percent of Population: Approximately 0.05 percent

Jewish Population by City: Most Jews live on Hong Kong Island and a few in Kowloon.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: The first Jews to settle in the mid-1800s were mainly Sephardim from Iraq via Bombay. Ashkenazim refugees from Eastern Europe began arriving in 1880s and 1890s. The next major influx was from China in 1948. This included both Sephardim who had established themselves in Shanghai and Ashkenazim from Germany and Eastern Europe who had sought refuge in China during World War II. In recent years the community has become more cosmopolitan with Jews from all over the world.

Languages Spoken: English mainly, as well as Hebrew, French, and a little Cantonese and Mandarin.

---

Historical Overview

1832 During a prolonged period of Jewish persecution in Persia, David Sassoon, son of the wealthy Sheikh Sason, court banker to the pashas of Baghdad, flee to Bombay. His son Elias (E.D.) is the first Jewish merchant to settle in Canton in 1844, and by the time David Sassoon & Sons is established in Hong Kong, the family-controlled business is immensely successful and profitable, chiefly trading in opium. Later, they branch out into shipping, banking, real estate, and cotton. The Sassoons are deeply observant and staff their offices and warehouses, both in Bombay and in Southeast Asia, almost exclusively with ex-Baghdadi Jews, many of them family members and relatives. Among them the Nissims, Hayeems, Eliases, Ezras, Gubbays, Kadoories, Solomons, and Raymonds form the nucleus of the Hong Kong Jewish community. The Sephardic ranks are later swelled by the Belilioses, Judahs, Benjamins, and others, mostly Iraqi Jews from Bombay and Calcutta.

1841 Hong Kong Island, ceded to the British by the Chinese emperor Daoguang after the Opium Wars is dismissively described by Lord Palmerston, the British Foreign Secretary, as “a barren island with hardly a house upon it.” However, it does not take long for British free-trade policy and assurances of security and protection to attract both Chinese and foreign merchants from all over the globe. With its deep harbor and sheltered anchorage, the newest British Crown Colony is an ideal base for trade with China and soon businesses are being registered and land sold for offices and warehouses. The history of the Jewish communities in the Far East in the 19th century closely mirrors the rising tide of British imperialism in Asia, and the Hong Kong Jewish community is no exception.

- 1843–1844 The first Jews to arrive in Hong Kong are believed to be Samuel Cohen and Jacob Phillips. Of the former little is known, but British-born Phillips builds up a profitable China trade business and returns to England in 1851.
- 1855 The land for a Jewish cemetery is purchased behind the Chinese village of Wong Nei Chong.
- 1857 The first burial in the Jewish cemetery is Leon Ben Buruel, although there is no further record of his identity
- 1870s The Bombay-based trading companies David Sassoon & Sons and E.D. Sassoon & Co are established in Hong Kong and sufficient Jews live in Hong Kong to consider renting temporary premises for a synagogue.
- 1880 Baghdadi-born Elly (Eleazar Silas) Kadoorie joins the Sassoons as an employee in Bombay and is soon transferred to China. Shortly thereafter he resigns, goes into business on his own in Hong Kong, and prospers in trade, property, and hotels. The Kadoorie brothers, Elly and Ellis, both of whom received knight-hoods for their philanthropic contributions to the Hong Kong community, are the main benefactors of Hong Kong's Jewish community once the focus of the Sassoon family shifts to Shanghai and to Britain.
- 1880s and 1890s Ashkenazim begin to arrive from Russia and the Balkans escaping pogroms. These newcomers are not merchants; for the most part they are poor and shabby and find employment as barkeepers, bouncers, and employees in second-class hotels. It is even reported that some of the women have to resort to prostitution. The Iraqi Jews, by contrast, are now well established and respected and hold themselves aloof from these coreligionists. They do not pray together but lend a Sepher Torah to the Ashkenazim to celebrate the High Holidays in rented premises.
- 1901 The foundation stone for the first permanent synagogue is laid, financed by the grandsons of David Sassoon. The synagogue named Ohel Leah in memory of their mother, Leah Gubbay. At this time, the Hong Kong census report estimates a total of 165 Jews in Hong Kong: 99 males and 66 females.
- 1905 During the tenure of Hong Kong's sole Jewish governor, Sir Matthew Nathan, an adjoining piece of land is acquired to extend the Jewish cemetery.
- 1905 Brothers Elly and Ellis Kadoorie build the Jewish Club adjacent to the synagogue where Jewish social life is centered.
- Early 1900s The fortunes of Hong Kong as a trading port fluctuate, and the importance of the colony is gradually eclipsed by the burgeoning success of Shanghai. Many Jewish merchants, including the Sassoons, relocate north to Shanghai. The Jewish population in Hong Kong reaches a peak of about 231 by 1911.
- 1921 Hong Kong's Jewish population dwindles to approximately 50. The community is often without a rabbi, and services are led by a cantor or one of the more learned members. At this time, with a second influx of Jews from Russia and Eastern Europe, the balance of the community begins to shift from its traditional Sephardic majority to an Ashkenazic one.
- Late 1930s Jewish numbers again rise to more than 100.
- 1937 The Japanese bombing of Shanghai marks the start of the World War II for China. Canton falls to the Japanese in 1938, and as the Japanese Army pushes south, Hong Kong prepares for the worst. Ironically, this is a period of strong economic growth for Hong Kong, as trade is diverted from Shanghai, but it does not last.

As the threat of invasion becomes ever more real, the expatriate population of Hong Kong rallies to the cause. Dr. Solomon Bard, then a medical student at the University of Hong Kong, recalls that “most of the young men and women of the Jewish community joined voluntary organizations, and many of us joined the Hong Kong Volunteer Defence Corp. Older able-bodied members of the Jewish community also volunteered for duty in the Nursing Service, Fire Service or in the Air Raid Precaution service.”

December 7, 1941 The Japanese army invades Hong Kong. Notwithstanding Sir Winston Churchill's foreboding that there is “not the slightest chance of holding Hong Kong or relieving it,” British and Commonwealth troops fight fiercely, ably assisted by the Hong Kong Volunteers.

December 25, 1941 Despite holding off the Japanese with determined and often heroic resistance, Hong Kong surrenders and endures three and a half miserable years of Japanese occupation. Allied nationals, including many of the Hong Kong Jewish community, are herded into the civilian prisoner-of-war camp on the Stanley Peninsula, while those who had fought with the volunteers are imprisoned in the military camp at Sham Shui Po. Conditions in the camps are dire, with starvation rations, no medicines, and sporadic sadistic, senselessly brutal treatment. Bard recalls that there is no discrimination in the camps against Jews and that “Jewish prayer books were allowed into the camp and a group of us were able to form a Saturday minyan, ably conducted by Nathan Rakusen.” Lawrence Kadoorie (son of Sir Elly and later to be elevated to the peerage) remembers that on a good day, the ration was “one cigarette, a small tin of watery rice, some boiled lettuce and a little soup.”

The Japanese armed forces requisition the Ohel Leah synagogue, and all community records are lost. The once thriving Jewish Club is reduced to rubble and the Hong Kong Jewish community ceases to operate. Happily, the Sifrei Torah, many brought from Bombay by the Sassoons, are spirited out of the synagogue and kept hidden until the Japanese surrender.

August 1945 With the unconditional surrender of the Japanese, prisoners of war stumble out of the camps in poor health to find a deforested city with no food, no electricity, little housing, and an administration struggling to reestablish itself and to inspire faith in the future of Hong Kong. The priorities, according to Admiral Sir Cecil Harcourt, who accepts the Japanese surrender of Hong Kong, are “freedom, food, law and order, and a stable currency.”

June 13, 1948 A memorial tablet is unveiled at a special service at the Ohel Leah synagogue to commemorate the 13 members of the Jewish community who lost their lives defending Hong Kong during the war.

1949 Hong Kong is well on the road to recovery, only to be brought to its knees once again with the founding of the People's Republic of China. This momentous event precipitates a massive influx of refugees from across the border, and the population of Hong Kong swells from 1 million in 1949 to 2.4 million by the end of 1950. The Jewish community also grows from an estimated 100 before

The Ohel Leah Synagogue in Hong Kong, beautifully preserved in a city of skyscrapers and rapid development, sits adjacent to a six-floor Jewish community complex.
(Photo by Jono David)

the war to 250 by 1954. Many members of the Shanghai Jewish community choose to settle in Hong Kong.

At about the same time, hundreds of German and Eastern European Jews arrive in Hong Kong from Shanghai to pick up visas for resettlement in the West. These are some of the 20,000 refugees who had fled the Nazis at the beginning of the war to seek safe haven in the visa-free port of Shanghai. The Hong Kong Jewish community is tasked with looking after the refugees, who are hastily housed in the synagogue, in small hotels, and at the Peninsula Hotel, where the Kadoorie family sets up makeshift dormitories. Joan Saphiere (Zirinsky), herself a recent arrival from Shanghai, recalls going with Lawrence Kadoorie once a week with lists of names to petition the Hong Kong immigration authorities to allow the refugees to stop in Hong Kong.

December 1949 Rosie Weill lays a stone to commemorate the reopening of the Jewish Club, newly built and financed in part by contributions but mostly by Lawrence Kadoorie and his brother Horace. The postwar Jewish community swells to include both Sephardim and Ashkenazim from Shanghai. The Abrahams, Hayims, Ezras, Eliases Silases, and Gattons, together with the Diestels, Blochs, Godkins, Fleischmanns, Freimans, Dorfmanns, Morgulevs, Greens, and many other families breathe new life into the synagogue and the Jewish Club.

1960s With China closed to the West, Hong Kong regained its importance as a commercial and financial centre, as well as a listening post for China watchers.

1961 The Jewish community appoints a rabbi for the Ohel Leah synagogue

1969 Community members start a Hebrew school, which would later become the Carmel School.

- 1970s Hong Kong's strong economic position attracts an influx of Jewish business-people and professionals, including bankers, lawyers, and academics.
- 1974 Israel appoints its first career consul-general to Hong Kong
- 1984 The Sino-British Joint Declaration on Hong Kong, and agreement for the eventual handover of the island to mainland China, is signed by both parties.
- 1985 The Jewish community is estimated at approximately 230 families, or more than 600 people, and they represent 25 different nationalities.
- 1989 For the first time, the High Holy Days see four sets of services. The Ashkenazi Orthodox, the Sephardi Orthodox, the Reform-Liberal, and the Lubavitch. This watershed marks the break up of the Jewish community into separate congregations. On June 4, the Tiananmen Square incident in Beijing exacerbates unease in Hong Kong about the eventual reunification of the island with the mainland.
- 1990 The Jewish Club site is redeveloped. The synagogue is preserved and a new mikvah is built.
- 1991 The Jewish community founds the Carmel School, an independent Jewish day school, which is open to children from all congregations. Classes include pre-primary and primary.
- 1995-1996 Major restoration work is undertaken on the Ohel Leah synagogue.
- October 1995 The new Jewish community center officially opens for members of all congregations.
- June 30, 1997 The British hand Hong Kong back to the People's Republic of China with much pomp and ceremony. The spectre of the handover instills feelings of anxiety, uncertainty, and insecurity in the citizens of Hong Kong. Many of those who can afford it leave with their families to settle in the West, the economy slumps, and it seems Hong Kong will not survive this final hurdle. The Jewish community loses many families who believe their futures are at risk, and although Jewish life continues much as before, it is with severely depleted numbers.

The worst fears prove unfounded. It is agreed that Hong Kong will operate as a Special Administrative Region under the concept of "one country-two systems" and will maintain its freedoms and way of life for 50 years. Once these assurances are seen to be working and the Chinese government is judged to be sincere in its pledge to leave Hong Kong to prosper in its own unique way, the tide of emigration begins to turn.

- 1997 Major restoration work is undertaken on the much-loved Ohel Leah Synagogue, financed by the Ohel Leah Synagogue Trust. At the rededication ceremony in October 1998, the chairman of the trust, Michael Green, declares that the project demonstrates the Jewish community's commitment to the future of Hong Kong.

The ranks of the Jewish community swell to include an influx of young, energetic professionals, many with families, who seek to be part of Hong Kong's future and are content in the knowledge that Hong Kong also offers established Jewish institutions.

The Jewish population of Hong Kong is estimated to be about 3,000. The community worships at four main congregations and several lesser ones, which cater to its divergent religious needs. The Carmel School, which celebrates its first decade in 2001 continues to grow in size and excellence, and the Jewish community center with its kosher restaurants, library, swimming pool, and inclusive, welcoming atmosphere provides a meeting place for all of Hong Kong's Jewish community and the many Jewish visitors who come to Hong Kong for business or pleasure.

2004–Present Hong Kong's economy gradually recovers, encouraged by the strong economic growth in China. This brings an increase in the number of Jews in Hong Kong, which is estimated to be about 3,000 at the time of writing.

Contemporary Overview

Types of Industries, Trades, and Professions

A high proportion of the expatriate community as well as permanent residents are employed in financial services, legal profession, hi-tech businesses, manufacturing, and commerce, especially trade with China and Asia. Jews are also prominent in utility and hotel businesses, academia, and other professions.

Culture, Science, and the Humanities

Concerts, arts festivals, and all cultural events in the greater community are well attended. For special occasions the community sponsors musicians, and visiting scholars in residence. The Jewish Film Festival is an annual, well-supported event in November, and films are screened in a local theater.

Present Economic Conditions

The business environment is thriving because of free trade, low taxation, and excellent market conditions. The 79 Israeli companies registered with the Economic and Trade Department of the Consulate include 37 diamond dealers, 13 telecommunications companies, 9 high-tech companies, 4 information technology companies, and 4 transportation companies, including El Al and Zim. In addition, 12 companies specialize in banking, security, medical equipment, business development, and import/export. The multicultural, multiethnic Jewish community is diverse, very successful, and boasts a supreme court judge, a high court judge, a university professor, doctors, dentists, teachers, barristers, lawyers, businesspeople, entrepreneurs, and many in the financial service industry. The community is growing. Young people are often educated overseas and return to find great opportunity in the growing, dynamic business center. with opportunities here and in rest of Asia.

Religious Denominations

Hong Kong has five organized congregations. Ohel Leah, housed in a beautiful 100-year-old synagogue, is Modern Orthodox. Three other orthodox communities are Chabad, Shuva Israel, and Kehillat Zion. The United Jewish Congregation represents Conservative/Reform levels of observance.

Jewish Education

Carmel School is a full-time independent Jewish Day school that educates children from nursery to middle school. It is Modern Orthodox and has a strong Zionist commitment. Fully accredited by the Western Association of Schools and Colleges, the day school has 220 students. In addition, the individual congregations all run education programs focused on enrichment of Jewish life. Conversions are dealt with by individual rabbis, and a Sunday school is run by the United Jewish Congregation.

Communal Institutions

The community is well organized, and the main funding body is the Ohel Leah Synagogue Charity, which supports the Ohel Leah Synagogue, Jewish community center, mikvah, chevra kadisha (burial society), Jewish Benevolent Society, and cemetery. It gives partial funding to other institutions and congregations.

Major organizations include the following:

- Jewish community center: The center houses a library, which includes the Sino-Judaic Collection and archives of material found about the Jews in China and Southeast Asia. The center's facilities include two kosher restaurants, a mini-supermarket (Koshermart), function rooms, and a swimming pool. Restaurants are under full-time supervision to ensure a high level of kashrut, and the center imports a wide range of product from Israel, Australia, South Africa, and the United States.
- Jewish Historical Society: Created to promote interest in the Sino-Judaic experience, the Jewish Historical Society has established a center for the collection and preservation of historical material relating to the history of the Jews in Hong Kong and China. Current projects include researching Jewish cemeteries in Southeast Asia, recording gravestones from the Hong Kong cemetery, recording interviews with long-time residents to preserve the oral history of the community, and conducting walking tours of historical areas.
- Mikvah (ritual bath): The mikvah is located next to the Ohel Leah synagogue and is for the use of members of the community.
- Chevra Kadisha (burial society): This organization takes care of all matters according to Jewish Law and tradition for burial in the Jewish cemetery in Happy Valley or for repatriation of remains.
- Jewish Benevolent Society: The society supports members who require temporary help or emergency assistance. It provides crisis management and repatriation when needed.
- Jewish Women's Association: This fund-raising body has strong ties to Israel. Managed by a committee of volunteers, the association was established in 1947 to assist refugees arriving from Shanghai. Now it raises funds for local charities as well as Israel. The main events are the Annual Bazaar and Independence Day Ball. The group also hosts lectures and social events.
- United Israel Appeal: The local branch of Keren Hayesod is managed by a board of directors and achieved charitable status in Hong Kong for educational contributions to Israel. An annual dinner is the main fund-raising event, and face-to-face canvassing raises 80 percent of funds. In 2003, a permanent shaliach was appointed to oversee fund-raising, raise level of awareness, and expand operation within Asia.

- Jewish National Fund: The local branch of Keren Kayemet has had a presence since the 1950s. Volunteers enthusiastically collect funds for trees for various occasions.
- Israel Chamber of Commerce: The 80 members of this independent, volunteer business organization promote business between Hong Kong, China, and Israel, increasing the level of awareness of Israel as a business partner. The chamber organizes business seminars, promotes active participation internationally, and encourages inter-chamber events. The group also develops successful trade and investment links and provides a dialogue with government and policy makers.
- Consulate General of Israel: A full range of consular services is managed by the capable staff of the consul general. Relationships with local government, business leadership, and the Jewish community are encouraged. Growing trade is developed by the Economic and Trade Department of Israel's Ministry of Industry, Trade, and Labour.
- Jewish Times Asia: This newly established regional newspaper carries local news and advertisements.

Anti-Semitism and Anti-Zionism

Anti-Semitism does not exist in any organized form. A communal security officer has recently been appointed to advise on all matters pertaining to security.

Demographic Movement and Emigration

The Hong Kong community is growing as new families choose to relocate to Hong Kong for various reasons, including economic and religious reasons. As pressures arise in other parts of the world, people find their religious needs fulfilled and an economic advantage here. There is some intermarriage with the Asian community, and conversions are carried out where possible.

Jews in Taiwan

Don Shapiro

---

General Population: 23,036,087

Jewish Population: 200–300

Jewish Population by City: Mainly in Taipei

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Business-related migration from the United States, Europe, and Israel as well as students of Chinese and Asian studies.

Languages Spoken: English, Mandarin, and Hebrew

---

Historical Overview

The Taiwan Jewish Community, despite its small size, has remained vibrant for some four decades, ensuring the continuation of Jewish life in this important corner of East Asia.

A key figure in history is Dr. Fengshan Hoa, the Taiwanese diplomat to Vienna and Germany between 1937 and 1938, who issued 1,200 visas to desperate Jews. Hoa helped rescue thousands of Jews, many of whom managed to flee to Shanghai. He was known as the “Chinese Schindler.” He was honored by Israel’s Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial with the title “Righteous Among the Nations.”

The history of the Jewish community dates back to the 1950s when Jewish servicemen in the American military began to be stationed in Taiwan. They were later joined by businesspeople from the United States, Israel, and Europe as the island’s industrial and trading capacity underwent rapid growth. During that period Shabbat and holiday services were held regularly in the U.S. military chapel (open to civilians as well as military personnel), ordinarily officiated over by lay leaders. The nearest rabbi was the U.S. military chaplain based in the Philippines, who would visit Taiwan a few times a year.

During the 1960s, an informal Orthodox congregation began to meet at the President Hotel, then the leading business hotel in Taipei. Taiwan was then emerging as a major export center, and Jewish buyers of garments, shoes, and other products were constantly visiting the island. A minyan was ensured for virtually every service, consisting both of visitors and residents, and the hotel kitchen was taught how to bake hallah and other delicacies.

In the mid-1970s, a Taiwan Jewish Community Center was established in a rented house in the suburban area of Tienmu, where many of the expatriate families resided. In 1975, the community received formal recognition from the government when it was allowed to register as a nonprofit organization. Among the founders was Yaacov Liberman, who became the community president for the first decade. Liberman, who had grown up in China as part of the Russian-Jewish community that had sought refuge there, was the Taiwan representative of the Eisenberg trading group from Israel. At its peak in the late 1970s and early 1980s, the community membership consisted of more than 50 families, and functions were held at the center several times a week.

Regular community events are still held, and religious services for Shabbat and holidays are held at the Ritz Landis Taipei Hotel, which took over from the President Hotel as the venue in the 1980s. The present-day synagogue is located in a small room with a Torah and a Holy Ark. The average weekly turnout is about eight or nine people. On High Holy Days, Rosh Hashanah (Jewish New Year), and Yom Kippur (Day of Atonement), a congregation numbering 60 to 100 may be counted on.

Services are officiated by the only Rabbi in Taiwan, Austrian-born Dr. Ephraim F. Einhorn, who has lived in Taipei for more than 20 years. In addition, the rabbi also keeps a private library of Jewish works at the hotel, which he asserts is the largest in Asia. In addition to his work as a rabbi, Einhorn has helped the Taiwanese government achieve ground-breaking work in seeking diplomatic relations with Eastern Europe. He also runs a successful trading company of his own, is an honorary member of the Rotary Club, and is chairman of Republicans Abroad Taiwan for the U.S. Republican Party.

Many Jewish visitors to Taipei who observe Shabbat according to Jewish law choose to stay at the Landis because of the convenience in attending services. The hotel has also been trained to provide kosher meals of fish cooked in aluminum foil. The numerous Buddhist vegetarian restaurants, many of which offer buffets (some of them quite elaborate), are also a solution for those keeping kosher.

The Jewish community consists of unusual and diverse groups: People who have lived in Taiwan for many years, people who have lived in Taiwan for a few years on assignments, and businesspeople who visit regularly. These may include Jewish Americans, Canadians, English, Israeli, Brazilian, Costa Ricans, Panamanians, Puerto Ricans, Moroccans, and Germans. Diplomatic representatives and expatriates working for multinational corporations may also be found in the congregation. The makeup of congregants has significantly shifted over the course of time. There were the American military, followed by long-term foreign businesspeople in manufacturing industries such as textiles, shoes, and toys. These businesspeople have now been replaced by high-tech professionals.

During the past decade the Israeli presence in Taiwan has expanded. High-tech companies and individuals with technical skills have found many opportunities in Taiwan, often in cooperation with Taiwanese enterprises. The match of Israeli technology and Taiwanese manufacturing capabilities made for a strong partnership. An example of the Israeli companies active in Taiwan is Orbotech, which provides testing equipment and services to the semiconductor industry.

The growing business potential prompted the Israeli government to establish the Israel Economic & Cultural Office (ISECO) in 1993. ISECO maintains a staff of about 15 Israeli nationals and local employees. Like the Taiwanese trade offices of most other nations, ISECO is similar in function to an embassy. But because Israel has formal diplomatic relations with Beijing, the ties with Taiwan must be carried out unofficially.

The numbers of Jews has dwindled significantly over the years, because of changes in Taiwan's economic structure. Some of the industries in which the members were most active, especially garments and footwear, became less competitive in Taiwan as labor costs increased. Many of those individuals relocated to other countries in Asia. Many foreign Jewish tradespeople have moved to China to seek business opportunities there.

Bibliography

- Gross, David C. 1981. The Jewish People's Almanac. New York: Doubleday.
- Lieberman, Yaacov. 1998. My China; Jewish Life in the Orient 1900–1950. Jerusalem: Gefen.
- Steinberg, Neil. "A Down-Home Davening ... in Taiwan." August 9, 2002. Jewish World Review. http://www.jewishworldreview.com/0802/steinberg\_down\_home.asp (accessed June 22, 2008).
- Yiu, Cody. "Taipei's Jewish Community has Deep Roots." February 14, 2005. Taipei Times. <http://www.taipeitimes.com/News/taiwan/archives/2005/02/14/2003223007> (accessed June 4, 2008).

Jews in Japan

Marvin Tokayer and Steve Hall

---

General Population: 40 million

Jewish Population: 600–1,000

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: In the late 19th–early 20th centuries a small number of European and North American Jews settled in Japan; the post–World War II period saw an influx of foreign Jewish populations from North America, Europe, and Israel who arrived for business and study.

Languages Spoken: English and Japanese

---

Historical Overview

Scholars and historians have paid little attention to the Jewish experience in Japan. To date, a comprehensive history of the Jewish communities of Japan, and the role of Jews in Japan, has yet to be written.

The myth and unsubstantiated theory that some of the ancient lost tribes of Israel reached Japan has been the focus of much interest, primarily from Japanese Christians. Much literature and a Web site are available on this subject, and ritual and cultural comparisons have been noted, including that the fringes on the corners of the Shinto priestly robe are similar to the biblical tzitzit (fringes) and that the round phylactery worn by the Yamabushi sect are similar to biblical phylacteries (tefillin). A Japanese Christian minister studied the rural folk songs of Japan, and in two volumes posited that the songs have biblical themes and Hebrew words. Surprisingly, the prestigious Jewish Encyclopedia of 1904, in its article on the ten lost tribes, prominently includes this evidence that the lost tribes reached Japan.

The subject of secret Jews or Marranos reaching Japan has also been ignored. That Marranos reached Portuguese India is now well documented, and records have been found of Inquisition trials of secret Jews in the Philippines, but the subject of Marranos in Japan has not yet garnered academic interest.

1537–1558 Evidence suggests that Mendes Pinto, a Portuguese merchant who wrote the earliest and best eyewitness reports about Japan, which became popular reading in Europe, was a secret Jew. Another probable Marrano was Dr. Luis Almeida, who arrived in Japan in 1552, introducing European medicine and building the first hospital. Almeida writes reports of his experiences in Japan, describing Japanese castles, the rickshaw, and, for the first time, the tea ceremony.

19th century When Japan reopens to the outside world during the Meiji restoration, numerous Jews from Europe and America, who have been denied opportunities to advance in society because of prevalent anti-Semitism, seek opportunities in Japan, which has no inherent discrimination or prejudice against Jews.

- 1858 Alexander Marks, who was born in Albany, New York, and raised in England, comes to Japan at the age of 21 and surprisingly masters the Japanese language. He is one of the organizers of the Jewish community of Yokohama, writes articles on Japan for the London Jewish Chronicle, and engages in commerce as the pioneer importer of wool from Australia and the machinery and equipment to start the wool clothing industry of Japan. Marks serves as Japan's consul to Australia for 18 years and sparks the development of diplomatic relations between Japan and Australia. He is honored with two prominent imperial awards.
- 1861 Raphael Schoyer, an American Jew from Baltimore, arrives in Japan and is credited with producing the first newspaper in Japan, the Japan Express, a copy of which is presented to the emperor. Schoyer is the first auctioneer in Yokohama, which demonstrates Japan's trust and confidence in the foreign community. Schoyer's printing presses are used to print the first Christian tracts in Japan, which are actually illegal. He is elected president of the municipal council where he attempts to demonstrate the concept of local government. His wife Anna is instrumental in introducing photography to Japan. Schoyer's tombstone is very prominent in the Yokohama foreign cemetery, adjacent to the present Jewish section.
- 1886 Albert Mosse, an expert on administrative law, comes to Japan, where he serves as the legal consultant to the Japanese cabinet for four years. He helps develop the legal system of modern Japan and is one of the prominent authors of the Meiji constitution, in which he emphasizes the importance of a constitutional government. Mosse writes many beautiful poems about Japan and the Japanese people, and the Japanese respect him for his common sense and sensitivity. During the Nazi period, the Japanese government requests special and humane treatment for the Mosse family in appreciation for his contributions to Japan.
- 1887 Many talented Jewish professors in Europe have little opportunity for advancement because of the common and accepted discrimination against Jews. One such academic, Ludwig Riess, a brilliant historian from Germany, comes to Japan to serve as the pioneering professor of history at the University of Tokyo (Todai) from 1887 to 1902. Riess is the first to teach the methodology of history, including the collection of documents and their critical evaluation. The Japan Biographical Encyclopedia states that the study of history began with his arrival in Japan, and he is considered as the "father of Japanese historiography."
- 20th century In contrast to the West, where Jews are excluded from opportunities of success and advancement until the middle of the 20th century, Jews see Japan as a haven of opportunity, because one's Jewish origins are of no concern. Many Jews come to Japan despite the distance, problems of language and strange customs, and even the danger of angry samurai. Few are aware that one of the pioneering personalities of the Zionist movement was deeply influenced by Japan.
- 1900–1920s The general migration route of immigrants from Europe to America was across the Atlantic. However, if the transatlantic route was dangerous or closed, an alternative was to leave via Russia through Siberia and then go to the United States from Japan, via the Pacific. In 1917–1918, in addition to the danger of transportation during World War I, the communist revolution in Russia leaves tens of thousands of refugees, including Jews, stranded in Europe and Asia. Suddenly the ruble is worthless and there is a universal fear of the spread of communism. There are thousands of refugees in Manchuria, Japan, and along the Trans-Siberian Railroad, when this disaster strikes. Their money is worthless, and entry and transit visas are cancelled. Japan, on the Russian border, is very unhappy about these stranded and suspicious refugees. Benjamin Fleisher informs Jacob Schiff of the serious situation of the stranded Jewish refugees, and Schiff intercedes with the U.S. government. Japan reciprocates the favor owed to Schiff and waves the entry visa fee for the destitute refugees. The Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society provides medical care, and the Royal Hotel of Yokohama is made available to the Jewish refugees. While waiting for the United States to reactivate the visas, a kosher restaurant opens on the main street of Yokohama, a synagogue is erected, a Jewish weekly paper is published, and classes in civics (and American customs such as baseball) are taught. All in all, 1,706 Jewish refugees are stranded in Japan, including 624 women and 910 children.

July–August 1940 Perhaps the crown jewel of the Jewish experience in Japan is the dramatic epic of the 4,664 refugees who are saved from the Holocaust by Japan. Chiune Sugihara, the Japanese consul in Kaunas (Kovno), Lithuania, at the start of World War II, issues transit visas to Japan to enable trapped Jews to escape certain death by the Nazis. The transit visas are issued for 10–14 days, a long enough time to enable the refugees to find a country willing to accept them. For those who can find no welcoming nation, the Japanese foreign minister extends the transit visas for 9 months.

Included among the refugees that find asylum in Japan are 79 rabbis, 341 yeshiva students, and 60 children as well as the future chief rabbis of Argentina, Mexico, and Montreal, the founder of the largest yeshiva in the United States, a cabinet minister of Israel who signs their declaration of independence, and the signer of rabbinic ordination at Yeshiva University. The only yeshiva to survive the Holocaust (Mir Yeshiva) receives visas to Japan from Sugihara. Sugihara was honored as a “righteous Gentile” by Yad Vashem in Jerusalem, and many articles, books, plays, and television programs have depicted his heroism. The foreign ministry of Japan has a plaque to note his courage and exemplary achievements, and a commemorative stamp has been issued in his honor. Because of his actions, 50,000 Jews survived the Holocaust.

1946 General Douglas MacArthur leads the occupation and rebuilding of Japan. Jews play a significant role in the postwar reforms of Japan. The goal of the occupation is to transform Japan into a democratic and peace-loving nation. MacArthur assembles a team of gifted and dedicated military officers and civilians, committed to the idea of social and political change. The most influential Jewish member of the occupation is Colonel Charles Kades, an attorney who graduated from Cornell University and Harvard Law School. Kades is the moving spirit behind the political reforms of the occupation. Another prominent Jewish figure is Wolf Ladejidsky, the father of Japan's land reform. Born in the Ukraine, he immigrates to the United States, graduates from Columbia University, and is the U.S. expert on agriculture in Asian countries. MacArthur believes the land reform of Ladejinsky is the most significant achievement of the occupation. Theodore Cohen is chief of the labor division and has a background in Japanese studies from City College in New York and Columbia University. Alfred C. Oppler, born in Germany, and had come to America in Nazi times. As he is well versed in the European legal system, he is the principal architect of the legal and judicial reforms. He also establishes the family courts and the civil liberties bureau. Beate Sirota, who was raised in Japan, the daughter of Leo Sirota, a professor at the Tokyo Music Academy, is fluent in Japanese and writes the civil liberties clauses of the new constitution, including the section that gives Japanese women social, political, and economic equality.

1945–Present Jewish communities are reestablished in Tokyo and Kobe with a full range of activities, including synagogue services, kosher meals, classes, Hebrew school, mikvah, cultural programs, and all necessary activities to enhance Jewish life.

Prominent Historical Figures

Marcus Samuel (1853–1927) was born in London and educated in Jewish schools. At the age of 19 he sailed to the Far East and, together with his brother, established the Samuel and Samuel trading company in Yokohama and Kobe. They traded in tea, rice, feathers, and pepper but specialized in seashells, which are used for ornamental boxes. In searching for a product that was not locally available but vitally needed, Marcus Samuel concluded that the most singular product needed was oil, which he discovered in the Dutch East Indies in 1898, in the Dutch East Indies. With a new supply of oil, Marcus built refineries, depots, storage tanks, and docks; designed the first oil tanker; and became the primary supplier of oil products from India to Japan. His new oil company, named the Rising Sun Petroleum Company, had a shell logo and eventually became Shell Oil Company. Samuel received the imperial award, Kiokujitsu—commander of the rising sun. In his native London he became lord mayor and was knighted as Lord Bearstead.

Jacob A. Schiff (1847–1920) was the Jew who probably made the most significant contribution to Japan. As a penniless 18-year-old, he arrived in the United States from Germany started to work in a bank. Ultimately, he became head of Kuhn Loeb and made it a major investment bank. Schiff was involved with every major Jewish charity and became a leader of the American Jewish community. At the beginning of the 20th century in Asia, Russia and Japan were on a collision course over Manchuria and Korea, which would lead to the Russo-Japanese War. An Asian nation had never defeated a European nation, and Europeans believed in the superiority of the Caucasian race. This confrontation was perceived as a “color war,” and the czar called the Japanese “yellow monkeys.” The war started in February 1904, but Japan had insufficient funds for the war. Baron Korekiyo Takahashi was sent to the United States and London to borrow vital funds. His mission failed as no bank was anxious to lend money to the potential loser, for how would that country repay the loan? By chance, Schiff was in London and was introduced to Takahashi at a cocktail party with prominent bankers. From this accidental meeting, Schiff saved Japan from defeat and humiliation by providing a war loan to Japan of $196,250,000. Schiff chose to support Japan because of its “national will” and because of anger over Russia’s continued pogroms against the Jews. Japan’s victory shocked the world. Schiff was invited to Japan as a state guest, and on March 28, 1906, he shared lunch and toasts with Emperor Meiji, at the Imperial Palace. Schiff helped negotiate the settlement between Japan and Russia and became a national hero in Japan. His name was entered in Japanese textbooks as “the one man who believed in Japan, a Jewish banker.” Schiff became a major influence in Japanese attitudes toward Jews.

Yosef Trumpeldor (1880–1920) served in the Czarist Russian army during the Russo-Japanese War. In the battle of Port Arthur, he lost an arm, spent 100 days in a field hospital, returned to the front line, was cited for his bravery, and became a prisoner of war (POW) when Port Arthur fell to the Japanese. At the Hamadera POW camp near Osaka he became the leader of 500 Jewish prisoners and 10,000 Russian prisoners. Trumpeldor used his leadership skills to establish a school to teach 2,500 prisoners how to read and write, even writing his own textbooks. He created a Zionist society and published a weekly Jewish newsletter, Yeureiskaya-Zhizhn (Jewish Life). He created a Yiddish theater in the POW camp, built a library for the prisoners, produced Jewish New Year cards, and enhanced general prison life. Trumpeldor was very influenced by the Japanese love of land, loyalty, discipline, organizational skills, and especially their national spirit. He believed Jews could learn many significant ideas from the Japanese and dreamed of creating a “Jewish Japan in Israel.” He was one of the early pioneers in Palestine but was killed by the Arabs.

Benjamin Wilfred Fleisher (b. 1870), owner-editor of the Japan Advertiser-Japan Times, was another influential journalist in Japan. Fleisher was born in 1870 into the Philadelphia family of the Fleisher Yarn company, which was very prominent in the Jewish community as philanthropists and patrons of the arts. Fleisher traveled to Japan in 1908 and soon purchased the Japan Advertiser. He founded the China Press, an American-oriented newspaper in Shanghai, became the Far East correspondent for the New York Times and United Press, and built the Japan Advertiser into the leading English-language newspaper of Asia. Fleisher imported the first linotype machine in Japan, and promising young journalists and future foreign correspondents served as apprentices with Fleisher. Under his dynamic and imaginative leadership, the Advertiser won a special Pulitzer Prize and became the model for Japanese newspapers. Fleisher was considered the “unofficial American ambassador in Japan.”

Jewish Communities in Japan

Since World War II, the Jewish community has been reestablished across Japan, with core communities in Tokyo and Yokohama. Jewish organizations provide a full range of activities including synagogue services, kosher meals, classes, Hebrew school, mikvah, cultural programs, and all necessary activities to enhance Jewish life.

Jews in Nagasaki

In the mid-19th century, Jews arrive in the port city of Nagasaki, on the southern island of Kyushu, when Nagasaki was a center of foreign trade. Jews were primarily involved in providing local supplies for incoming ships, owning bars and inns, and importing goods such as jellies, chocolates, and spirits for foreign residents.

In 1900, the small Jewish community of 100 established a synagogue, Hebrew school, cemetery, and mikvah. A local artist, Ken Tagawa, made a wood block print of the synagogue. The British tradition of social discrimination prohibited Jews from joining the private social clubs, and Jewish children could not attend the private foreign schools that taught in English. Surprisingly, Jews were not allowed to live on the picturesque bluff overlooking the majestic harbor but were forced to live in slums, which were permeated with the odors of sewage and garbage. This importation of discrimination among foreigners surprised the Japanese.

In 1904, with the Russian-Japanese War in full swing, many Jews from Eastern Europe were considered enemy nationals. Many departed for Shanghai, and even the Torah scrolls were sent to Shanghai. Sigmund David Lessner was the capable and talented leader of the Jewish community at the time,

Jews in Yokohama

With the opening of Japan to the outside world in the mid-19th century, Jews from America and Europe settled in Yokohama, which became the center of the foreign community. Some were diplomats from Belgium and Turkey, and some were seeking a haven and opportunities free of anti-Semitism. Alexander Marks, who later settled in Australia, was the first leader of the Jewish community, and Raphael Schoyer, the “mayor” of the foreign community, was also highly respected. The community gathered for religious services on the holidays, created a model Jewish Benevolent Society, and developed a Jewish cemetery with an entrance adjacent to Motomachi, the fashionable shopping street of Yokohama.

In the 1930s, after the devastating earthquake of Tokyo and Yokohama and great loss of life, writings on tombstones indicate that the Jewish survivors re-established themselves in Kobe. During that time, there was a revival of the Jewish community which was very fortuitous, as the community helped many refugees escaping the Holocaust.

Jews in Kobe

Jews came to Kobe in small numbers from Holland, Russia, the United States, and the Middle East. Jews were traders and provided supplies to incoming ships at this busy port in central Japan. Sam Evans was the first Jew to become a Japanese citizen, taking the name Subaru Ebansu. He was very philanthropic and devoted himself to the needs of the Jewish community; he was also very generous to the Japanese.

With the sudden arrival of thousands of refugees, with transit visas, who were escaping the Holocaust, this Ashkenazi community mustered all its resources to help the penniless refugees find housing, arrange kosher food, house an entire yeshiva, provide medical care, and secure visas to their final destination. Anatole Ponve deserves special recognition for his extraordinary efforts on behalf of the refugees. After the war, a small Sephardic community remained, and currently the Ohel Shelomah synagogue has a Sephardic Chabad rabbi from Israel.

Jews in Tokyo

After World War II, Russian Jews from Harbin and Shanghai, a few Sephardic Jews from Shanghai, and American Jews created a Jewish community in Tokyo. A home was purchased under the direction of Anatole Ponve, which became the Jewish community of Japan. It consists of a synagogue, school, restaurant, library, mikvah, pool, and recreational facilities, and it has had a rabbi since the 1960s. Walter J. Citrin was a very capable leader of the community, always striving to keep the community of several hundred families united. The community was very charitable, and the Japan Israel Women's Welfare Organization's bazaar was generally patronized by the imperial family. Shoul N. Eisenberg, a noted entrepreneur, was a refugee in Japan during World War II, and later became most successful in a variety of activities in the Far East. The Tokyo synagogue is dedicated to his father. Currently, the Jewish population consists of diplomats, investment bankers, attorneys, journalists, and students of oriental medicine and the martial arts.

Contemporary Overview

Although there seem to be no Jewish publications in Japan, any talk of the Jews in the publishing field is likely to incite fairly immediate reaction. In this case, when the Weekly Post published a fairly stereotypical story pertaining to Jewish acquisition of a Japanese bank, the reaction was so strong that the story was immediately retracted, followed by an official apology.

On the other hand, it seems that the Japanese maintain a close connection with some Jewish ideologies, such as kibbutz. Tezuka Nobuyoshi established Japan's Kibbutz association, which boasts more than 30,000 members, in 1963. A pro-Israel group—Japanese Christian Friends of Israel—has more than 10,000 members. In addition, Makuya, a pro-Israel Christian group, has more than 60,000 members. The group is politically active and even staged a rally in front of the United Nations in 1971. After a 1972 Japanese terrorist attack in Tel Aviv's airport, one of their spokespeople traveled to Israel to issue a formal apology to victims of the attack. A Japanese-Jewish Friendship and Study Society was also established in 1995.

The very first concert of the Tokyo symphony in 1923 was conducted by the Jewish musician Jacques Gershowitz. Jews had a great impact on Japan in the field of music. The Japanese are great admirers of classical music and in the 1930s Japan was the world's largest market for classical records. Many prominent Jewish musicians who suffered discrimination in Europe settled in Japan and served as teachers at the prestigious Tokyo Ongaku Gakko, including Klaus Pringshein (brother-in-law of Thomas Mann), violinist Aleaner Mogilevski, pianist Leo Sirota, and pianist Leonid Kreutzer, who was the chief piano instructor at the Berlin Music University until he was dismissed by the Nazis in 1933. The major musicians of Japan became students of refugee Jewish professors. Joseph Rosenstock, who conducted opera in Germany until his dismissal by the Nazis in 1933, was invited to Japan and appointed conductor of the Tokyo symphony orchestra. He remained in this position throughout the World War II, despite Nazi protest. The official Japanese government response to the German protest was, ". . . our government does not support racial discrimination or take any position against the Jews."

There is a Holocaust Education Center in Hiroshima. In Kobe, where Jews have been present for more than a century, the Ohel Shelmoh Synagogue, an Orthodox synagogue with an attached community center, was established to serve Kobe's 15 Jewish families.

In Nagasaki, although there is not a Jewish community, there remains an old Jewish cemetery at Sakamoto Gaijin Bochi. In Okinawa an average of 200–300 Jews serves in the U.S military. Additionally, there are services held regularly in a chapel in the area. In Tokyo at least 160 Jewish families are active in the community. There is a library, a Hebrew school, and regular Sabbath services. A Jewish Club, complete with recreational facilities, is being developed. The Jewish community of Tokyo maintains a solid affiliation with the World Jewish Congress.

In addition, several thousand Israelis regularly travel and remain in Japan for varying periods of time, working and developing their own businesses, especially manufacturing and selling jewelry. There is an extensive Israeli network of street vendors and traders.

Selected Bibliography

- Goodman, David G. and Masanori Miyazawa. 1995. Jews in the Japanese Mind. New York: Free Press.
- "The Jewish Communities of Japan." Am Yisrael Web site. <http://www.amyisrael.co.il/asia/japan/> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Kapner, Daniel Ari, and Stephen Levine. 2000. "The Jews of Japan." Jerusalem Letter, March 1. Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs Web site. <http://www.jcpa.org/jl/jl425.htm> (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Kranzler, David. 1976. Japanese, Nazis and Jews. New York: Yeshiva University Press.
- Shillony, Ben-Ami. 1991. The Jews and the Japanese: The Successful Outsiders. Rutland, VT: Charles E. Tuttle.
- Sofer, D. 2004. "Seek and Save." Jewish World Review, October 21. http://www.jewishworldreview.com/1004/japanese\_convert.php3 (accessed April 22, 2007).
- Tokayer, Marvin, and Mary Swartz. 1979. The Fugu Plan, the Untold Story of the Japanese and the Jews during World War II. New York: Paddington Press.

India and Pakistan

Jews in India

Shalva Weil

---

General Population: 1.11 billion

Jewish Population: 4,500

Percent of Population: 0.0004 percent

Jewish Population by City: Greater Mumbai, including Konkan, 3,600; Ahmedabad, 350; Pune, 300; Calcutta, 150; Cochin, 50; New Delhi, 50

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Linguistic and biblical evidence of Jewish migrations in the first millennium BCE; in the 11th–13th centuries, Arab-speaking Jewish traders arrive at subcontinent; in the 17th century, Jews settle in Madras, Calicut, and other cities.

There are three major Jewish Indian communities today: the Bene Israel, the Cochin Jews, and the Baghdadis. In recent years, other groups, notably the Shinlung or Bnei Menashe of the Indo-Burmese borderlands, are claiming Israelite status and identifying as Jews (their numbers are not counted in the Jewish population listed at the beginning of this entry). The Bene Israel arrived on the Konkan coast in a shipwreck ca. 175 BCE; Cochin Jews may have arrived on the Malabar coast with Saint Thomas in the first century CE; and the Baghdadis settled in Calcutta and Bombay during the 19th and 20th centuries.

Languages Spoken: Marathi, Hindi, Malayalam, Gujarati, and English

---

Historical Overview

1000 BCE Linguistic evidence confirms the possibility of ancient Jewish communities and early commercial connections between India and the Holy Land. The biblical book of Kings mentions that King Solomon's ships carry kofim (apes), tukim (peacocks), and almag (sandalwood = valgum) of Indian origin.

500 BCE In the book of Esther, King Ahasuerus's kingdom stretches from Hoddu (generally accepted to be India) to Kush (generally accepted to be Ethiopia).

175 BCE Legend tells of the arrival of the Bene Israel community on the shores of India.

1st century CE South Indian Christian writings date the arrival of Cochin Jewry in India to the first century. Thomas the Apostle and Abbanes, an Indian merchant, arrive at Cranganore, the ancient capital of Cochin, on the wedding day of the king's daughter. Thomas recites poetry in Hebrew and only a Jewish flautist understands him and falls in love with him. He subsequently converts her to Christianity. However, the legend proves the existence of Jews on the Malabar coast before the first century CE.

200 BCE–200 CE Travelers' tales in the Talmud mention trade with India, including such specific commodities as Indian ginger and iron.

9th century CE Jewish merchants known as Raadanites traded between east and west, from the Middle East to South Asia and back.

- 962–1020 CE During the reign of Bhaskara Ravi Varman, the Kochin Jews of Kerala are granted 72 privileges, attested and encribed on copper plates preserved until the present.
- 11th–13th century Jewish texts discovered in the Cairo Genizah include documents describing the trade carried out between Arab-speaking Jews and Hindu partners in spices, pharmaceuticals, textiles, metals, gold, silver, and silks.
- 1568 After Vasco da Gama's expedition to India, some European Jews from Spain, the Netherlands, Aleppo, and Germany settle in Cochin and join their Jewish Malabari brethren. They are called Paradesi (white) and establish a synagogue.
- 1694–1771 Ezekiel Rahabi of the Paradesi community rises to prominence under Dutch rule; he acts as the principal merchant for the Dutch in Cochin and signs his memoranda in Hebrew.
- 17th century Jewish merchant centers are established in Madras, Calicut, and other places.
- 1730 Joseph Semah arrives in India from Baghdad and founds the Surat Synagogue.
- 1798–18th century Baghdadhi and Syrian Jews continue to arrive in India, including Shalom Cohen, a merchant who settles in Calcutta in 1798.
- 19th century Jewish emissaries travel to Asia to make contact with the Jews in far-flung places, often in the belief that they are members of the 10 lost tribes of Israelites who were exiled from the Kingdom of Israel by Assyrian kings in the eighth century BCE.
- 20th century Most of the Bene Israel have set up synagogues and communities in urban centers, such as Pune, Ahmedabad, New Delhi, Karachi, and even Aden.
- 1950 After the State of Israel is established, most of Bene Israel gradually immigrates to Israel.
- 1964 Bene Israel's Jewish status is recognized by the chief rabbinate and the Israeli Knesset.

Jewish Communities in India

The largest of India's Jewish communities is the Bene Israel (Children of Israel). They claim to have come from the north, perhaps as early as 175 BCE. According to legend, their ancestors were shipwrecked off the Konkan coast and lost all their holy books; they only remembered the Shema prayer, which declared their faith in monotheism. The seven men and seven women who survived took refuge in the village of Navgaon, where they buried the bodies of their relatives and friends. The local Hindus offered hospitality to the survivors, and the Bene Israel took up the occupation of oil pressing becoming known as Shanwar Telis (Saturday Oilmen), because they refrained from work on the Jewish Sabbath.

When discovered by David Rahabi (possibly in the 18th century), the Bene Israel observed the Sabbath, dietary laws, circumcision, and many of the Jewish festivals. To ascertain whether the Bene Israel were indeed Jews, Rahabi asked the women to prepare him a fish meal. When they singled out the fish with fins and scales—that is, separated the kosher fish from the nonkosher fish—Rahabi was convinced of the Bene Israel's Jewish identity and agreed to instruct them in the tenets of Judaism. From the 18th century on, under the influence of the British, the Bene Israel began to move out of the Konkan villages south of Bombay (today Mumbai) to the metropolis and set up synagogues and communities.

The religious customs of the Bene Israel were unique. On Yom Kippur, known as the Festival of the Closing of the Doors, the Bene Israel arrived in synagogue before dawn so as to avoid contact with other people. They also observed particular folk customs, such as hair-shaving ceremonies for babies, pilgrimages, and special ways of celebrating festivals. An unusual feature of Bene Israel religious worship is the intensive belief in Eliyahu Hannabi (Elijah). Whereas most Jews believe Elijah ascended to heaven from a site somewhere near present-day Haifa in Israel, the Bene Israel fervently believe he departed on his chariot from a village called Khandalla in the Konkan. Bene Israel go on pilgrimage to the site, which is also revered by local Hindus, where they claim that they can see the footprints of Elijah's horses. There, they make wishes for the redemption of vows or offer prayers of thanksgiving.

The Bene Israel community boasts a relatively large number of educated members, among them lawyers, professors, doctors, mayors, and authors, who have contributed to the cultural life of India. After Indian independence in 1947 and the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948, most of the Bene Israel gradually immigrated to Israel. At first, some rabbis did not fully recognize them as Jews for marriage purposes. In 1962, the Bene Israel staged a strike in Jerusalem claiming that they were full Jews in every respect, and in 1964, they were acknowledged as such, both by Israel's chief Rabbinate and by Israel's Knesset.

Today, some 5,000 Bene Israel remain in India, largely in the Maharashtra region, and more than 60,000 live in Israel. In Israel they are settled in development towns, or new settlement communities, from Kiryat Shmone in the north to Eilat in the south, with the largest concentration in the town of Dimona.

The miniscule community of Cochin Jews numbered 2,400 people in 1947, but only about 20 Jews remain on the Malabar coast today. The settlement of the Cochin Jews on the Malabar coast is ancient. Documentary evidence of Jewish settlement in Kerala can be found in the famous Cochin Jewish copperplates inscribed in an ancient Tamil script (dated 1000 CE). In that year, during the reign of Bhas-kara Ravi Varman (962–1020 CE), the Jews were granted 72 privileges, which included the right to use a day lamp, to erect a palanquin, to blow a trumpet, and to be exempt from certain taxes.

One legend holds that they arrived with King Solomon's merchants. The most popular local legend in South Indian Christian writings attributes the arrival of Cochin Jewry in India to the first century. Thomas the Apostle and Abbanes, an Indian merchant, arrived at Cranganore, the ancient capital of Cochin, on the wedding day of the king's daughter. Thomas recited poetry in Hebrew and only a Jewish flautist understood him and fell in love with him. He subsequently converted her to Christianity. However, the legend seems to prove that Jews were already residing on the Malabar coast before the first century CE.

The Cochin Jews were dispersed in five major settlements in eight communities in Kerala—Cochin, Ernakulam, Chendamanglam, Mala, and Parur. After Vasco da Gama's expedition to India, some European Jews (the "Paradesi," sometimes referred to as "foreigners'" or "whites") from Spain, the Netherlands, Aleppo, and Germany, settled in Cochin and joined their Jewish Malabari brethren. The Paradesi synagogue was established in 1568. One member of that community who rose to prominence under Dutch rule, was Ezekiel Rahabi (1694–1771); he acted as the principal merchant for the Dutch in Cochin and signed his memoranda in Hebrew.

In wedding ceremonies among all the communities of Kerala's Jews, the groom recites the benedictions. Under the chuppah (bridal canopy), he holds a gold chalice containing wine in which the wedding ring, tied to a loop made with seven strings, is immersed. He announces that he is betrothed to his bride according to the Laws of Moses and Israel. He drinks from the cup, gives it his bride, and then places the ring on the index finger of her right hand, with the words "Behold, thou art consecrated to me." A young boy then reads the ketuba (marriage contract), according to Shingli (Cochin) custom.

The Cochin Jews were acclaimed in 1968 when Prime Minister Indira Gandhi celebrated the quatercentenary of the Paradesi synagogue, and the Indian government honored the community by issuing a commemorative stamp on the occasion. After the State of Israel was established, most of the Jews from Cochin, motivated by Zionism, decided to emigrate. The Malabar Jews live largely in moshavim (agricultural settlements), the largest concentration being found in moshav Nevatim, south of Beersheba; some have also moved to the cities.

In 2005, the Kerala government completed the restoration of the synagogue in the village of Chennamangalam in Kerala. In February 2006, an exhibition on the Jews of Chennamangalam before and after their immigration to Israel was held on the premises.

The grandest Jewish community in India is that of the Jews from Iraq and Syria, often known as the "Baghdadis," who migrated to two major urban centers, Calcutta and Bombay, beginning in the 18th century. One of the founders of the Bombay community was Joseph Semah, who arrived in India in 1730 from Surat; another was Shalom Cohen, a merchant who settled in Calcutta in 1798. These Jewish merchants, who escaped deteriorating conditions in Iraq and the pogroms of Daud Pasha in the mid-19th century, were followed by other Jews, who established thriving businesses in the East, as far afield as Singapore, Hong Kong, and Shanghai. The Sassoon dynasty built prayer houses and synagogues as well as hospitals, libraries, and schools in India for the benefit of Jews and non-Jews alike. In Calcutta, as many as eight Baghdadi synagogues operated regularly, as well as several Hebrew and Judeo-Arabic printing presses, which translated holy texts into local vernacular and published original works.

Among the Baghdadi Jews, a number of complex rituals were devised to protect the mother and child around birth, including wearing charms and amulets or hanging them at their bedside. Often nutmeg, garlic, a small blue bead, and the God's name were pinned on the baby to safeguard him or her against a premature death and avert the evil eye. Sometimes when an elderly person died, a piece of the shroud was used to make a garment for a newborn child, to ensure its long life.

After the British withdrew from India, many of the Baghdadi Jews, with whom they had associated as nonnative Indians, decided to immigrate to England and other English-speaking countries, and a couple of thousand went to Israel. Today, there are less than 200 Jews of Iraqi origin left in India.

India's Jews have never suffered from anti-Semitism at the hands of their fellow Indians. The histories of the different Indian Jewish communities in India, which tend to remain relatively unknown, are therefore unusual compared with any other Jewish Diaspora. Influenced by their Hindu or Muslim neighbors, all three recognized groups of Jews developed special customs in their religious worship.

Contemporary Overview

There are three major Indian Jewish communities in the world today: the Baghdadis, the Bene Israel, and the Cochin Jews. In addition, a recently and emerging group claiming Israelite ancestry is known as the Shinlung. This group has adopted Judaic practices since the 1960s; they have set up Jewish prayer halls in India and observe certain Jewish customs. Groups claiming to descend from the 10 lost tribes have also emerged in Andhra Pradesh and other regions of India.

Indian Jews today can be divided into two subgroups: those who remain in India because of their overriding attachment to India, and those who immigrated to Israel and reunited with their families and the majority of their community. The former smaller group of no more than 5,000 Jews includes Indian nationalists, non-Zionists, and those who are too old, or cannot envisage, emigration. The latter group of some 70,000 worldwide includes Zionists who see the eventual future of the Indian Jewish community in Israel (while not negating their Indian homeland) and members of Diasporic communities in English-speaking countries, such as Canada, the United States, England, and Australia. There are transnational visits between kin and friends in India and other countries.

The Baghdadi community, which at its peak numbered 5,000 during World War II, had accumulated tremendous wealth and power in India, and its business empire stretched far and wide. Yet it has dwindled to a mere 100 or 200, mostly the infirm and the ailing. The vast majority of the Indian Baghdadi Jews who had left for Israel, England, and the United States visit India occasionally with their offspring and pay respects to remaining kin or their lost community in Calcutta or Mumbai. In Calcutta, the two magnificent synagogues, Maghen David and Beth-El, take turns holding a minyan (quorum). Mumbai still has two functioning synagogues, Magen David and Knesset Eliahu, but sometimes they do not have regular services if there are not enough tourists. In Pune, the Ohel David synagogue, named after David Sassoon and erected in 1867, with its famous churchlike spire and clock tower, is a landmark in the city. The Baghdadis, as they were known, were extremely adaptable, and many in England and the United States married local Jews and merged with the local Jewish communities. Today, several Baghdadi Jews in England and the United States have written books, memoirs, and even a West End musical about their comfortable lives under the Raj.

The Bene Israel represent the largest group of Indian Jews. In 1947, the British departed from India and in the following year, the State of Israel was declared. Today, due to natural increase, some 60,000 Bene Israel reside in Israel; more than 4,500 remain in India, making them the largest Indian Jewish group and the majority Indian Jewish group in India. Owing to large-scale immigration to Israel, communal activity has declined in India and Bene Israel newspapers and periodicals, once prolific, are now published infrequently. The Jacob Sassoon Free School, founded at the end of the 19th century as an English medium school for Baghdadi children in Bombay, at first imposed a quota for Bene Israel pupils. However, by the 1970s nearly all of the Jewish pupils (125 out of 400) were Bene Israel. Today, there is scarcely a Jewish pupil at the school.

Through force of circumstances, consolidation has taken place between the different Indian Jewish communities in India. In 1979, the Council of Indian Jewry was established to represent the interests of all Indian Jews. Because of lack of numbers, members of the Bene Israel and Baghdadi communities, and Jews of other origins, cooperate to maintain communal institutions. The Stree Mandel, which was established in 1913 as a women's organization, is still active today. A variety of other sports clubs, Zionist organizations, and charitable and credit associations organize community events in this cosmopolitan city. In 2005, at Pesach (Passover), members of the Mumbai Jewish community together baked matzoth (unleavened bread) on the premises of the Magen David synagogue, which once was the exclusive synagogue of the Baghdadi Jews, and distributed them to all Jews in Mumbai.

In many ways, a mini religious revival has been taking place in Mumbai in the past couple of years. The Bombay ORT school for boys was established in 1962 and the school for girls in 1970. In 2001, a small number of Jewish pupils was still receiving technical and vocational training; many of them later immigrated to Israel with knowledge of Hebrew. Today, ORT has been reorganized and runs a successful ORT preprimary school and other educational activities. The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee is providing a varied educational and cultural program to many Mumbai citizens and reaching out to many more through the Internet: they publish a monthly newsletter, Kesher, which provides information on communal activities, gatherings, and lectures, as well as news about different Jewish communities and religious matters. In addition, a weekly newsletter on the Parashat Hashavua (Portion of the Week) is distributed regularly. Recently, a Bene Israel Genealogy Centre was established at Tiphereth Israel synagogue. More Bene Israel are concentrating in Thane, a suburb of Mumbai, around Shaar Rahamim (the Gate of Heaven) Synagogue, which today has the largest Jewish population in India. Kosher fowl is available in some places.

Today, with the liberalization and globalization in India, intermarriage with non-Jews (Hindus, Christians, Muslims, and Parsees) is occurring more frequently in urban centers such as Mumbai, although it is not the norm. More than 20 synagogues and prayer halls have been built in India, all of which follow the Orthodox tradition, except the Reformist Jewish Religious Union (founded in Bombay in 1925 by Dr. Jerusha Jhirad, a Bene Israel gynecologist, who in 1966 received the distinguished Padma Shri award for outstanding services in the field of social welfare). In 2006, only a handful of these are able to maintain a regular service on Saturdays, and in the villages outside Mumbai several beautiful synagogues remain shut. The Bene Israel themselves never had a rabbi of their own, although individuals versed in both Sephardi and exclusive Bene Israel liturgy acted as hazanim (cantors). In recent years, several visiting rabbis have been sent to Mumbai and have served for short spells, as well as representatives of the Chabad-Lubavitch movement, who are increasingly active in the city. This movement is very busy in the north of India, where thousands of Israeli backpackers visit each year, and they have opened hostels and prayer halls in Dharmasala, Manali, and other centers. In 2007, hundreds of Israelis attended services in Pushkar, in the middle of the Rajasthan Desert. Outside Mumbai, there is an active Bene Israel community in Ahmedabad, a prayer hall often filled with visitors from abroad in New Delhi, and a minyan (quorum) on a regular Saturday in Pune.

The Bene Israel adhere to their own traditions and rites. In the marriage ceremony, the bride is dressed in a white sari and goes to meet the groom as he sings the special Bene Israel "groom song" from the bimah (podium) of the synagogue. Elijah the prophet is invoked on all auspicious occasions, including circumcisions and purification after childbirth.

The most important Jewish festivals for the Bene Israel are Rosh Hashanah (New Year), Yom Kippur (Day of Atonement), Simchat Torah (Day of Rejoicing of the Law), and Pesach (Passover). On Rosh Hashanah the whole community appears in its finery in synagogue, and between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur it is customary to visit friends and family. On Yom Kippur the community dresses exclusively in white and arrives at the synagogue before dawn, On Simchat Torah they celebrate by dancing merrily in the synagogue with the Torah scrolls. On Pesach, Bene Israel make matzoth from rice not wheat, whitewash their houses, and tin their copper pots.

In Israel, the Bene Israel organize as a community, spinning family and ethnic ties tighter and tighter. Although there is increasing marriage with other Jews in Israel, for the vast majority, marriages are still contracted within the ethnic community. Marriage is sometimes negotiated across national borders; social relationships and political orientations are conducted irrespective of territorial blocks. Indian cultural life is active and Indian films and clips are viewed in every Indian home. Each year 4,000 persons of Indian origin congregate in Eilat for three to four days to celebrate the Hoduyada (Gathering of Indian Jews) festival, which incorporates a rich Indian cultural program. Some Bene Israel adults in Israel read and write in Marathi newspapers, like Mai Bolli, and participate in Marathi plays and programs.

Along with regular young Israeli backpackers, hundreds of Bene Israel from Israel travel to India in organized groups to visit the synagogues and buy the latest Indian fashion and jewelry. These Indian tourists to India return with suitcases stuffed with spices, gold, silks, and scarves, as well as letters and gifts for friends and relatives who could not make the journey. They then return to the Israeli homeland with tangible pieces of their previous homeland, India. In addition, they keep up ties between Israel and other smaller Bene Israel Diasporas in the United Kingdom, Canada, the United States, and Australia.

The process of emigration and the adaptation of the Bene Israel in their new homeland in Israel entailed many changes in social and religious life. At first, the Bene Israel were not accepted as full Jews in Israel, and they were only recognized as such after a two-year struggle with demonstrations and strikes in 1962–1964. Their nonacceptance by other Jews is still a bitter memory today. In Israel, the Bene Israel adapted some of their traditions and took on others. For example, in India, the Bene Israel used to visit Elijah the prophet's holy site in the Konkan; in Israel, they frequent Elijah's site on Mount Carmel. They have also adopted many items from the Oral Law, which they did not know years back. However, a surprising number of Indian traditions live on, such as the pre-wedding mehendi (henna). The evening before the wedding, the mehendi ceremony takes place simultaneously in the houses of the bride and groom, who wear flowers tied round their heads and have henna daubed ritually on their forefingers. A dish called melida is prepared, composed of rice flour and sugar covered with fruit and decorated with a rose in the center, while frankincense is burned by the side. The melida is blessed and distributed, and Elijah the prophet is invoked. The younger generation of Indians define themselves as Israelis, and most claim that they are traditional in their religious way of life.

Almost the entire community of Cochin Jews lives in Israel, where they number some 8,000 (including spouses who married into the community). In 2006, some 10 Paradesi (once known as "White") Cochin Jews and 40 Malabar (once known as "Black") Cochin Jews remained in Kerala. The Cochin Jews in Israel live primarily in moshavim (agricultural settlements), and although there is no wider Cochin Jewish Diaspora, Cochin Jews have also begun to move between Israel and India, particularly in the past few years, when some Cochin Jews visited Kerala on trips to explore their roots. In February 24, 2006, the 1614 synagogue in the village of Chennamangalam was restored by the Kerala Archaeological Survey in conjunction with the Kerala Department of Tourism, and this author and others inaugurated an exhibition inside the restored synagogue that was attended by scores of Cochin Jews, many from Israel.

In Israel, there is a synagogue in nearly every moshav with a concentration of Cochin Jews, the largest being Nevatim. Cochin Jews pray according to Shingli rites and enact their religious ceremonies according to Cochin custom, but they are also influenced by general Israeli trends. At Nevatim, there is a Cochin Jewish heritage museum, and at the Israel Museum in Jerusalem, the Kadavumbagham Synagogue, imported from Cochin, has been reconstructed. Cochin Jewish Malayalam folk songs, traditionally sung by Jewish women in Kerala, are currently being revived and a CD has been produced in an international collaborative project. These Malayalam Jewish folk songs cover biblical, wedding, historical, and other themes.

The Indian Jews in India today represent a small, struggling yet vital community, surviving through the efforts of Jewish organizations like the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee. Owing to large-scale emigration, many synagogues and prayer halls have shut down, and communal activity has declined. Notwithstanding, a mini religious revival and consolidation between the different Indian Jewish communities have been taking place quite recently, and connections have been forged with different Jewish groups in Israel and elsewhere.

Selected Bibliography

- Abrahams, Margaret. 1995. "Marginality and Community Identity Disintegration among the Jews of India." In Studies of Indian Jewish Identity, edited by Nathan Katz, 175–199. New Delhi: Manohar.
- Ezra, Esmond David. 1986. Turning Back the Pages: A Chronicle of Calcutta Jewry. London: Brookside Press.
- Isenberg, Shirley Berry. 1988. India's Bene Israel: A Comprehensive Inquiry and Sourcebook. Bombay: Popular Parakashan.
- Israel, B. J. 1998. The Jews of India. New Delhi: Mosaic Books.
- Katz, Nathan. 2000. Who Are the Jews of India? Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Katz, Nathan, and Ellen S. Goldberg. 1993. The Last Jews of Cochin. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press.
- Lentin, S. S. 2004. "The Jewish Presence in Bombay." In India's Jewish Heritage: Ritual, Art and Life-Cycle, 2nd ed., edited by Shalva Weil, 22–35. Mumbai: Marg.
- "The Myth of the Ten Lost Tribes of Israel." The Database of Jewish Communities Web site. <http://www.bh.org.il/Communities/Archive/TenLostTribes.asp> (accessed May 25, 2008).
- Parfitt, T. 2002. The Lost Tribes of Israel: The History of a Myth. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson.
- Roland, Joan. 1998. The Jewish Communities of India, 2nd ed. New Brunswick, NJ: Transactions.
- Samuel, Shellim. 1963. Treatise on the Origin and Early History of the Beni-Israel of Maharashtra. Bombay.
- Silliman, J. 2001. Jewish Portraits, Indian Frames: Women's Narratives from a Diaspora of Hope. Hanover, NH: University Press of New England, Brandeis University Press, Seagull Books.
- Weil, Shalva. 1974. "Bene Israel in Britain." New Community 3 (1–2): 87–91.
- Weil, Shalva. 1996. "The Preservation and Transformation of Indian Culture and Identity among Bene Israel in Israel." In Israel in the Nineties: Development and Conflict, edited by F. Lazin and G. Mahler, 169–193. Gainesville: University of Florida Press.
- Weil, Shalva. 2004. "Bene Israel Rites and Routines." In Indian Jewish Heritage: Ritual, Art and Life-Cycle, edited by Shalva Weil, 78–89. Mumbai: Marg.
- Weil, Shalva. 2004. "The Contributions of the Jews of India." In India's Jewish Heritage: Art, Ritual and Life-Cycle, 2nd ed., edited by Shalva Weil, 110–121. Mumbai: Marg.
- Weil, Shalva. 2004. "The Heritage and Legacy of Indian Jews." In Indian Jewish Heritage: Ritual, Art and Life-Cycle, edited by Shalva Weil, 9–21. Mumbai: Marg.
- Weil, Shalva. 2004. "The Heritage and Legacy of the Jews of India." In India's Jewish Heritage: Ritual, Art and Life-Cycle, 2nd ed., edited by Shalva Weil, 9–21. Mumbai: Marg.
- Weil, Shalva. "The Bene Israel of India." The Database of Jewish Communities Web site. <http://www.bh.org.il/Communities/Archive/BeneIsrael.asp> (accessed May 25, 2008).

Jewish-Indian Contacts over the Ages

Nathan Katz

---

Relations between Hindus and Jews have always been characterized by mutual respect and affection. Jewish-Hindu dialogue may go back nearly 3,000 years when luxury goods from India were exported to ancient Israel, which was then ruled by King Solomon. Sanskrit and Tamil words for such items of commerce as peacocks, ivory, ginger, and linen are found in the Hebrew Bible, and legends about King Solomon and the Buddha using their wisdom to mediate a quarrel between two women about who was the mother of a child are found in the Mahoṣṣidha Jfitaka and the Hebrew Bible (1 Kings 3:16–28). In postbiblical sacred literature, there are four references to India in the Talmud, the definitive commentary on the Jewish Bible. Josephus, the famous Jewish historian of the Second Temple era (first century BCE) recorded that the leader of the Jewish resistance to Roman rule, Eleazar, admonished his followers to heroism by citing the example of Hindus (Katz 1991).

During medieval times, Jewish merchants and scholars regularly plied sea and land routes between India and Israel. For example, it was an eighth-century Jewish scholar who brought Indian mathematics to the West, where written numbers are wrongly called “Arabic” numerals (Isenberg 1988, 20). Many letters by medieval merchants have been preserved, and they provide a unique perspective on life in India between the 11th and 13th centuries (Goitein 1973).

India has been home for six distinct Jewish communities, each with its own history, customs, and language. Each has enjoyed not only complete freedom of religion but also respect, affection, and in some cases high social position. The oldest Jewish community in India is in Kerala. According to their traditions, they arrived at Cranganore (known in the Jewish world as Shingli and to the Romans as Muziris) just after the destruction of Jerusalem in 72 CE, and were warmly received by the local mahfirfija. In 379 CE (scholars say during the 11th century), the local Chera king granted Joseph Rabban, the Jews’ leader, aristocratic privileges, which were engraved on copper plates (Katz and Goldberg 1993, 42–45). To this day, these copper plates are reverently stored in the Holy Ark of the Cochin Synagogue. The Cochin Jews were loyal subjects of their Nfiyar rulers; they were among the finest soldiers of the region, and Ezekiel Rahabi (1694–1771), the mahfirfija’s prime minister, has been called “the Malabar’s Kissinger” (Parasuram 1982, 45).

Cochin Jews wrote poetry in Malayalam as well as in Hebrew, and their greatest kabbalist (mystic), Nehemia Mota (d. 1615), is revered by Jews, Hindus, Christians, and Muslims alike. His tomb near Cochin’s Jew Town is a striking example of how such saints helped extrinsic religions become integrated into local religious culture in India. The Cochin Jews’ integration into the fabric of Cochin culture and society is evidenced in the rich local flavor of their literature and in the many borrowings from Hinduism in their unique system of observance of Jewish calendric and life-cycle rituals (Katz and Goldberg 1993, 163–249). Once numbering around 2,500, emigration to Israel since 1950 has reduced this community to a few dozen souls.

The Bene Israel community of Bombay and the Konkan coast is by far the largest of India's Jewish communities. Their arrival in India is legendary: local traditions hold that seven Jewish couples were shipwrecked and landed at Navgoan in the Konkan District. As their Torah scrolls were lost at sea, in time they forgot their Hebrew and most Jewish practices—save for the Jewish system of dietary laws known as kashruth, the observance of the Sabbath as a day of rest, and the central affirmation of Judaism known as the Shema (“Hear O Israel, the Lord Is Thy God, the Lord Is One”), which they would recite on any occasion when prayer seemed appropriate (Isenberg 1988, 3–18). In the rural Konkan, they were oil pressers known as the shanwar teli caste (Saturday oil pressers) because they abjured work on Saturdays.

Unlike the mercantile Cochin Jews, the Bene Israel were cut off from world Jewry. Therefore, they became the most Indianized of India's Jews. They had no sense of being part of an extrinsic religion known as Judaism until an 18th-century Cochin Jew, David Rahabi, “discovered” them. (Bene Israel tradition is that David Rahabi came from Egypt, not Cochin.) Rahabi began “the first Bene Israel religious revival” (Isenberg 1988, 10) by teaching them the rudiments of normative Jewish practice and installing three of his disciples as kajis, who functioned as priests to the community.

Economic opportunities arose with the development of Bombay, and many Bene Israel were attracted there. They then encountered learned Cochin Jews, who became their teachers and ritual officiants, as well as Christian missionaries, who attempted to convert them but unwittingly increased their commitment to Judaism by teaching them the Bible and English, which gave them a link language with world Jewry. This era is known as “the second Bene Israel revival.” In cosmopolitan Bombay, the Bene Israel were exposed to such world-shaking forces as modernization and nationalism—both the Indian nationalism of the swaraj movement and Jewish nationalism, known as Zionism. As a result, their very identity was transformed from members of an obscure, oil-pressing caste of the Konkan, into modern, urbanized Indians and members of the world Jewish community (Roland 1989). There were once as many as 25,000 Bene Israel in India; today they number around 5,000 or 6,000, mostly in Bombay, but also in small communities in Konkan towns, Ahmedabad, Pune, and New Delhi.

An obscure Jewish community comprised merchants and courtiers during the Mughal period. Persian speakers, these Jews were scattered throughout the empire; their only known synagogue was in Agra. Perhaps the most lasting Jewish influence on Mughal-era India was made by an eccentric Jewish-Sufi-Yogi known as Sa'id Sarmad. Best known for haunting quatrains written in Persian, Sarmad was a fervent mystic who cared little for the niceties of exoteric religion. He adopted the persona of a naked faqir and ultimately became tutor and guru to Dara Shukoh, son and heir apparent of Shahjehan (ruled 1627–1666). Intrigues within the Red Fort led to an alliance between the mystically inclined Dara and his guru Sarmad, the Maratha leader Shivaji, and Guru Hargobind of the Sikhs (ruled 1606–1645). Theirs was a liberal alliance against the stern-minded Shahjehan and his fanatical son, Aurangzeb (ruled 1666–1707). The alliance collapsed when Aurangzeb beheaded both his brother and Sarmad in a palace coup that resulted in draconian anti-Hindu policies and contributed to the downfall of the Mughals. Today, Sarmad's mazar (saint's tomb) guards the main entrance to Delhi's Juma Masjid, and most assumed he was a Muslim (Katz 1992).

Jews from the Middle East, chiefly Basra in Iraq, migrated to India's port cities, especially Bombay, Calcutta, and Rangoon, during the British raj. Known as "Baghdadis," they played major roles in the development of their cities. Bombay, for example, has had three Jewish mayors. They were led by the House of Sassoon of Bombay and the Elias family of Calcutta and played major roles in the textile and film industry. The Baghdadis were never really integrated into Indian culture—their home language went directly from Arabic to English—and most left India soon after independence. Several hundred Baghdadis remain in India, mostly in Calcutta, Bombay, and Pune.

There have always been a few European Jews, known as Ashkenazim, who made their way to India, but they never formed a distinct community. During World War II, a significant number reached India seeking refuge from Hitler. Many were physicians who made lasting contributions to public health—most notably, Walter M. Hafkine developed the cholera vaccine and an institute named for him flourishes in Bombay. But British and Indian physicians did not welcome the competition, and India's doors of asylum were soon closed.

Finally, recent years have seen a curious phenomenon in far eastern India, in Mizoram, Manipur, and Tripura. There, thousands of Chin-kuki tribals began experiencing dreams and revelations that convinced them of their lost identity as one of the scattered tribes of ancient Israel. Many have studied Judaism seriously, and several thousand have undergone formal conversion.

Jewish-Hindu dialogue has begun in America, where the two communities resemble each other very closely in demographics, education, and professions. Both are concerned about the quality of public education, fundamentalist extremism (whether Muslim or Christian), and promoting public appreciation of religious and cultural pluralism.

Selected Bibliography

- Goitein, Solomon D. 1973. Letters of Medieval Jewish Traders. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Isenberg, Shirley Berry. 1988. India's Bene Israel: A Comprehensive Inquiry and Sourcebook. Bombay: Popular Prakashan.
- Katz, Nathan. 1991. "Contacts between Jewish and Indo-Tibetan Civilizations through the Ages: Some Explorations." The Tibet Journal 16 (4): 90–109.
- Katz, Nathan. 1992. "Sarmad 'the Everlasting': An Eccentric Jewish Sufi of Mughal India." Journal of the Society of Rabbis in Academia 2 (1): 13–17.
- Katz, Nathan, and Ellen S. Goldberg. 1988. "The Last Jews of India and Burma." Jerusalem Letter 101: 1–8.
- Katz, Nathan, and Ellen S. Goldberg. 1993. The Last Jews of Cochin: Jewish Identity in Hindu India. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press.
- Parasuram, T. V. 1982. India's Jewish Heritage. New Delhi: Sagar.
- Roland, Joan G. 1989. Jewish in British India: Identity in a Colonial Era. Hanover, NH: University Presses of New England.

Bene-Israel and Baghdadi Jews in India: Early 20th Century

Yulia Egorova

---

At the end of the 18th century, the Bene-Israel began moving from the villages to the towns of Pen, Panvel, Thana, and Bombay, and they became artisans of all kinds. Many Bene-Israel served in the Bombay army and reached the highest ranks open to native officers. The Bene-Israel graduates who began to emerge from universities at the turn of the century took jobs as clerks in the British administration. Although the majority of the Bene-Israel worked in the lower echelons of the departments of ports, railways, telegraphs, and the post office, some of them rose to the very top ranks in these services, and individual Bene-Israel became eminent specialists in the fields of medicine, engineering, and law.

As late as the first half of the 20th century, it appears that the Bene-Israel were still called Telis (oil pressers) by their neighbors, though oil pressing was no longer their distinctive occupation, and by that time some had moved considerably up the socioeconomic ladder. In other words, the rules regulating the relations between the members of different castes affected the relations between the Bene-Israel and their Hindu neighbors. Interestingly, some members of the community attempted to raise their status in the local hierarchy by trying to become associated with higher castes. The legend of the origin of the Bene-Israel, which states that they are the descendents of the seven men and seven women who survived a shipwreck, resembles that of the Chitpavans, a group of Maharashtra Brahmins. The legend told on the Konkan states that the Chitpavans are descended from 14 foreigners who perished in a shipwreck but were then restored to life by Parashurama, one of Vishnu's incarnations, who taught them Brahmin rites. The Bene-Israel had their own version of this legend, according to which both groups had a common origin.

Some Bene-Israel did not attempt to change their position in the caste hierarchy but preferred to support the movements that challenged the dominance of higher castes and struggled for equal educational opportunities for everybody irrespective of caste affiliation. Some Bene-Israel preferred to dissociate themselves from the caste system completely, arguing that as they were Jewish, they did not belong to it at all.

As far as their place in the colonial hierarchy was concerned the Bene-Israel never desired to be included in the European constituency. However, some were ready to demand a special representation for the Jews, although this initiative was not supported by all of its members. In 1926, Solomon Moses, one of the leaders of the community, argued at a Bene-Israel Conference session that his community should not take part in the competition for special reservations started by other minority groups. At the same time, other Bene-Israel put forward the idea of a special representation for the Jews, but they never submitted this request to the colonial authorities.

The Baghdadi Jews

The position of the Baghdadi Jews of India differed greatly from that of their other Indian coreligionists. Socially and economically they were much closer to other small communities of non-Indian origin, which is not surprising given that their group was formed in the subcontinent far more recently than those of the Bene-Israel. At the same time, it should be noted that Baghdadi periodicals often praised the religious tolerance of the Indians and stated that in India Jews were absolutely free from any form of discrimination.

The history of the Baghdadi Jews of Calcutta in the first half of the 20th century was marked by their struggle for the status of the Europeans. They identified their interests with those of the British and never ceased displaying their loyalty to Great Britain. They were eager to enter the colonial elite of the subcontinent, and by the end of the 19th century the community was becoming more and more anglicized. Up until 1885, the Baghdadi Jews were classified as Europeans on the subcontinent, while the Jews of Cochin and the Bene-Israel were assigned to the Indian section of the population. It is not clear what exactly led the British administration to single out the Baghdadis among Indian Jewry and what made them change their status in 1885, but it is obvious that the British distinguished among different Jewish groups of the subcontinent and were acquainted with the histories of their formation. The members of the community attempted to change their status in 1919, the time of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms, which introduced special constituencies for a number of religious communities and socioeconomic interest groups of India. In the early 1930s, during the period of the Round Table Conferences in London at which the Indians were invited to take part in discussing a new constitution subsequently introduced under the 1935 Government of India Act. However, it did not happen in either case. Apparently, only a limited number of the Baghdadis were fighting for the status of the Europeans. The Baghdadi Jews of Bombay did not show much interest in this matter and supported the requests of their Calcutta coreligionists only once.

It may be argued that the general discourse of Indian Jews of the later British period reflected the diversity of their perceptions of their place in colonial India and a degree of anxiety about their future in the light of the political developments on the subcontinent; however, it expressed practically no concern about the contemporary attitudes of the Indians toward the Jews.

Selected Bibliography

- Brown, J.M. 1994. Modern India, the Origins of an Asian Democracy. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Musleah, E. N. 1975. On the Banks of the Ganga—The Sojourn of Jews in Calcutta. North Quincy, MA: Christopher.
- Roland, J. 1999. The Jewish Communities of India. New Brunswick, NJ: Transactions.

The Benei Menashe of India

Myer Samra

---

The Benei Menashe are a community from northeast India and northern Burma who have adopted Judaism, believing they are descendants of the biblical tribe of Manasseh. In March 2005, Israeli chief rabbi Shlomo Amar accepted their claim to Jewish ancestry, calling for their formal conversion and reintegration with the Jewish people.

The Benei Menashe have emerged from the culturally and linguistically linked Chin-Kuki-Mizo tribes, found predominantly in the hill districts of the Indian states of Manipur and Mizoram and Chin State in Burma. Historically, they were subsistence swidden cultivators. The total population of these tribes is estimated at around 2 million, most of them staunch Christians, although many also take pride in their reputed Israelite origins. The Benei Menashe, those members of these tribes who are practicing Judaism, presently number under 10,000. Nearly 1,000 have settled in Israel.

The territories inhabited by the Chin-Kuki-Mizo tribes came under British control in the 1890s. To protect them from exploitation by the more sophisticated Indians and Burmese, the British restricted entry into the region but encouraged Protestant missionaries who commenced work in Mizoram and Manipur in 1894 and in Chin State in 1896.

The Chin-Kuki-Mizo people were preliterate animists before contact. The missionaries utilized the Roman script to create a written form of their language. In 1912, missionaries were handed complete control over education in Mizoram. Consequently, Christianity spread quickly throughout the region, and the Mizos now have the second highest literacy rate in India. However, Christianity and use of the Roman script increased their cultural distance from their neighbors. Entry into Manipur and Mizoram remains restricted, and special permits are required even for Indian citizens from outside the territories.

With their introduction to the Bible, many Chin-Kuki-Mizo tribespeople saw parallels between their pre-Christian traditions and those of the ancient Israelites, particularly with regard to sacrificial practices and ethical teachings. In 1951, Challianthanga, head deacon of the United Pentecostal Church in the village of Bualawn in Mizoram, had a vision from God telling him the Mizos were descendants of the Israelites. To survive Armageddon, they must return to their original homeland and practice their ancient religion. The vision did not reveal to which of the tribes of Israel the Mizos belonged, but Challianthanga came to assert descent from the tribe of Manasseh on the strength of advice from a puithiam (priest) from Burma. When facing any dangerous situation, the Chin-Kuki-Mizo peoples would call out to the spirits present not to harm them as they were “the children of Manasi” (or Manmasi). This Manasi/Manmasi was now identified with Manasseh son of Joseph in the Bible.

As descendants of Israelites, Challianthanga's followers, the “Buallawn Israel,” sought to follow the commandments God had given the Israelites, such as keeping Saturday as the Sabbath, observing the pilgrim festivals, and refraining from eating unclean animals. They turned to the Bible to learn how they should fulfill these precepts. They saw no inconsistency in continuing to revere Jesus, seeing both the faith in Jesus and God's instructions to the Israelites as coming from the same source.

News of Challianthanga's vision spread widely through the Chin-Kuki-Mizo lands, and messengers were sent off to proclaim the thrilling news. In the mid-1950s, many people sold their property, abandoned the cultivation of their land, and withdrew their children from school to prepare for their return to Israel. As time went by and no evidence of the redemption was in sight, most eventually returned to normal life. However, a small group, residing in Buallawn and its surrounds, clung to their Israelite beliefs.

In 1966, after a famine that was mishandled by the Indian authorities, Mizoram revolted against Indian rule and fought for its independence. Although Challianthanga had died in 1959, his followers sympathized with the rebels, whose leader, Laldenga, they saw as God's instrument. The Indian army recaptured the territory, but the rebels maintained the insurrection for many years. Having popular sympathy, they could melt back into the civilian population after a raid. To counter this, the Mizos were clustered into larger villages where the army could better control them. The inhabitants of Buallawn were transferred to a larger village, Ratu, and warned against disseminating their subversive beliefs.

The rebels were sympathetically received among the ethnically related population of Churachandpur in Manipur, where interest in their possible Israelite origins was now developing. Many Mizos, including members of the Buallawn sect, fled to Churachandpur in 1966. The same year, a Bible tract awoke in several influential leaders (both locals and Mizo exiles) a concern that the Sunday observed by the Christian missionaries was not the Sabbath ordained in the Bible. The book of Daniel condemned those who "think to change times and laws," thereby challenging God. Christianity, it seemed, was guilty of such transgressions, both by ignoring the Sabbath and festivals and by abrogating the clear laws in the Bible forbidding the consumption, in particular, of pork.

Several communities sprang up in the Churachandpur district, seeking to return to the biblically ordained practices, which they combined with belief in Jesus. These included various strands of the Church of God, and a residential cluster called "Jews' Colony" was set up near Kotian village outside Churachandpur. In May 1972, the "Manipur Jews Organisation" was formed, led by Khaikhopau Vaiphei (also known as "Moses Isaac") as president and Vumzakap Ngaite (Kapu Stephen). Kapu Stephen, who had taught himself to read some Hebrew, guided this community. Although men wore skullcaps and women prayed with scarves over their heads, their beliefs remained essentially Christian.

During the 1970s, many groups published little booklets, some in English, others in the various dialects spoken in Mizoram and the Churachandpur district, recounting the history of the tribes of Israel who had been taken captive by the Assyrians in the eighth pre-Christian century, and resettled on the borders of Assyria. These booklets identified their tribal communities with the Israelites, recording their eastward wanderings over the centuries, through Afghanistan, through Central Asia to China, and on to Burma and northeast India where they are found today.

A Benei Menashe family poses in front of a monument erected on the grounds of the Beth Shalom Synagogue in Churachandpur, India, during Hanukkah, 2001. The monument, at the "mother" congregation of the Benei Menashe, marked 25 years of Judaic practice in the region. (Courtesy Dr. Myer Samra)

Despite their identification with the Israelites, particularly the tribe of Manasseh, the booklets reveal a familiarity with the New Testament as well as the Old and incorporate Christological elements. The most influential of these booklets, Israel Ihiuve (We are Israelites), appeared in 1974 in the Thadou dialect and was written by Thangkholum Lhungdim (who took the name "T. Daniel"), Jangkhothang Lhanghal (Joseph Jacob), and Sumkhothang Haokip (Sum Samuel).

Between 1972 and 1976, leaders of the Manipur Jews Organisation, the Church of God (Zionist), and others sought contact with the established Jewish communities of India in Bombay and Calcutta, to whom they turned for support and advice on the practice of Judaism. That Jews did not recognize Jesus as the Messiah came as a surprise, as did the fact that Jews sanctified the Sabbath with wine, whereas the Christian missionaries had steadfastly opposed the use of alcohol.

Such revelations led the members of the "Jewish" groups in Manipur to reconsider what they were doing. T. Daniel resolved to follow normative Judaism and sought to pass on to his colleagues all he had learnt from the Jews of Bombay. In October 1974, a new group, called the United Jews of North East India (UJNEI), was formed but came to grief as its members, Sabbath observers all, had differing religious orientations.

On April 8, 1976, T. Daniel returned from his latest trip to Bombay with a tallith, tefillin, a (paper) Torah scroll, a siddur, and a copy of the Code of Jewish Laws, donated to the community by Mrs. Esther, a Jewess from Bombay who had voluntarily given instruction in Judaism to T. Daniel and Moses Isaac during their visits to Bombay. She had arranged their circumcisions, and their first call-up to the Torah in synagogue. The community records April 8, 1976, which happened to fall within the festival of Passover, as marking the "birth" of Judaism in the region. On August 12, 1976, the first synagogue, Beith Shalom, was inaugurated in Churachandpur.

In October 1976, T. Daniel handed over leadership of UJNEI, which was seen as the organization for those professing Judaism, to Vanlalmalsawm (Vania Levy Benjamin), a Mizo-speaking Vaiphei. Although the congregation was small, through the preaching of its dedicated members it was able to attract followers in both Manipur and Mizoram, particularly from erstwhile members of the Church of God (Zionist). The spread of this new faith to Mizoram was hastened by the return of Mizo "refugees," particularly Rohluma Chachuak (Joseph Rei), and Chahuak's invitation to the "speaker" of the group, Joseph Jacob, to tour Mizoram. Whereas Dr. H Thangruma (Dr. Solomon) the leader of the Church of God (Zionist) also preached that the Chin-Kuki-Mizo people were Israelites, he was not prepared to adopt Judaism, clinging to belief in Jesus while asserting his flock should be entitled to settle in Israel under the Law of Return.

On a visit to Bombay, V. L. Benjamin was able to secure the support of Mr. Gurej, director of ORT India, for selected students from Manipur and Mizoram to train for a trade such as printing, draftsmanship, stenography, or hairdressing, along with Jewish studies, and to reside at the ORT hostels, all without charge.

In 1979, the group initiated contact with Rabbi Eliyahu Avichail and his Amishav organization, which was searching for the lost tribes, hoping to bring them back to Judaism and thereby to help bring on the Messianic era. Rabbi Avichail proved very sympathetic to this community, which was identifying itself with one of the tribes, and keen to follow Judaism. Until then, Judaism in Manipur and Mizoram had been largely the creation of members of the local community. Henceforth, Rabbi Avichail assumed the role of spiritual authority for the Benei Menashe and guided them in their religious evolution.

In 1981, Rabbi Avichail made a trip to India to meet with members of the Benei Menashe, and he encouraged the community to select two young men to go to Israel to study in a yeshiva. The two selected, Vanlalkhuma Chachuak (Gideon Rei) and Simeon Gin Vaiphei arrived in Israel in January 1982. On their return to India, each took an active role in the religious development of the community. In 1988, Amishav arranged for a beth din to visit Bombay to conduct conversions. The beth din accepted around 30 Benei Menashe proselytes. However, these conversions were not recognized in Israel and the proselytes had to go through the process once more when they came to Israel.

Between 1989 and 2004, Rabbi Avichail and Amishav were responsible for the immigration of around 800 Benei Menashe to Israel. Because they were not recognized as Jews when they arrived, however, they were not entitled to the benefits enjoyed by most immigrants to Israel until they underwent conversion. Rabbi Avichail assumed responsibility for finding sponsors to cover the airfares of these new immigrants, their accommodation and work opportunities, and religious training to prepare them to appear before the beth din for conversion. Given their limited entitlements when they arrived in Israel, the Benei Menashe generally found such opportunities in settlements in Yehuda and Shomron in the West Bank and in Gush Qattif, along the Gaza Strip, until its evacuation in August 2005.

Members of the community in Israel have shown a strong attachment to the State of Israel and many have exhibited tenacity and bravery in the army. They have remained devout, practicing Jews and willing workers, although the better educated have experienced a loss of status, having to accept menial labor jobs in Israel.

From September 2004, a new group, Shavei Israel, led by Michael Freund, took over from Amishav. It established and financed Hebrew Centers in Manipur and Mizoram to train candidates for conversion. Shavei Israel hosted a delegation of rabbis from Israel who investigated the claims and the practices of the Benei Menashe, leading to the recognition of the group by Rabbi Amar.

Since Rabbi Amar's pronouncement, Shavei Israel has built kosher mikvahs, ritual baths for immersing proselytes, in both states to facilitate conversion before emigration, so they can settle in Israel with the same privileges as other Jewish immigrants. In August 2005, a rabbinical delegation from Israel formally converted around 220 individuals in Mizoram, but their permits to enter Manipur were withdrawn. The rabbis were portrayed as agents of a foreign state (Israel) attempting forcibly to convert Indian nationals. The Benei Menashe responded by asserting they were not converting them to a new religion but regularizing their status in the religion they already practiced, as a community with an Israelite heritage.

Despite this setback, it is likely that all the members of the Benei Menashe will eventually be formally converted to Judaism, and thereby achieve the right to settle in Israel under the Law of Return. The settlement of Benei Menashe in Israel has had a powerful impact on other Sabbath-observing Chin-Kuki-Mizo groups. From 1992, some congregations went over en masse to Judaism, as the acceptance of the Benei Menashe as settlers in Israel appeared to validate their religious practices. Rabbi Amar's decision to accept their claims will doubtless stimulate further interest in Judaism among a wider segment of the Chin-Kuki-Mizo people.

Selected Bibliography

- Halkin, Hillel. 2002 Beyond the Sabbath River: In Search of a Lost Tribe of Israel. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.
- Haokip, Lemuel Henkhogin. 2001. Souvenir: The 25th Anniversary Foundation of Judaism in North East India. Manipur, India: Benei Menashe Council.
- Katz, Nathan, and Ellen S. Goldberg. 1989. "The Mysterious Chin-Kuki Tribal Jews of the Indo-Burmese Border Region." Journal of the American Association of Rabbis 5 (1): 11–19.
- Parfitt, Tudor. 2002. "The Land of Strangers." In The Lost Tribes of Israel: The History of a Myth. London: Weienfeld & Nicolson.
- Samra, Myer. 1991. "The Tribe of Manasseh: 'Judaism' in the Hills of Manipur and Mizoram." Man in India 71 (1, special): 183–202.

- Samra, Myer. 1992. "Judaism in North East India: By-product of Christian Mission." The Australian Journal of Jewish Studies 6 (1): 7–22.
- Samra, Myer. 1996. "Buallawn Israel: The Emergence of a Judaizing Movement in Mizoram, Northeast India." In Religious Change, Conversion and Culture, edited by Lynette Olson. Sydney, Australia: Sydney Association for Studies in Society and Culture.
- Weil, Shalva. 2004. "Lost Israelites from the Indo-Burmese Borderlands: Re-Traditionalisation and Conversion among the Shinlung or Bene Menasseh." The Anthropologist 6 (3): 219–233.

Jewish Parsis Relations in India and Pakistan

Rashna Singh

---

Dubbed "the Jews of India," largely because of their intellectual and commercial achievements, the Parsis and some communities of Jews in India would seem to have much in common. Because Pakistan was not created until 1947, the history of the relationship between the two communities runs parallel until that point. Jews in India fall into three groups: the Cochin Jews, the Bene Israel, and the Baghdadi Jews.

The Cochin Jews are the oldest community. Their settlement, which possibly dates as early as the first millennium BCE, was probably a result of trade contacts between the Mediterranean region and the west coast of India. The Bene Israel lived along the Konkan Coast in and around Bombay, Pune, and Ahmedabad for almost 2,000 years. Unlike the Cochin Jews, they were a rural community, oil pressers by occupation, and maintained little contact with other Jewish communities. However, they retained a memory of their original faith and practiced the Sephardic rite without rabbis, and the synagogue was the center of religious and cultural life. The Baghdadi Jews, the latecomers of India's Jews, emigrated from various parts of the Middle East, mostly from an area that is now modern Iraq (hence the appellation) from the end of the 18th century, in the wake of trade contacts established by the British Empire. The Baghdadi Jews settled in Bombay and Calcutta, where many of them became wealthy and participated in the economic leadership of these growing cities.

Although the Parsis share the closest cultural, economic, and social similarities with the Baghdadi Jews, significant aspects of the foundational histories of the Parsis, the Cochin Jews, and the Bene Israel are analogous. The experience of the Parsis and these two Jewish communities in India was one of acculturation rather than assimilation. They maintained their distinct religious, cultural, and social identities even while blending in and borrowing traditions from their local host communities. Transplanted to a new country, their identity required continuous negotiation, their selfhood strategized for historical and cultural reasons.

For both communities, Parsis and Jews, originary narratives contributed to the process of acculturation. "Parsi" was the term used to describe the new immigrants from Pars. Zoroastrian by faith, they left their homelands in Persia, fearing further persecution after the Arab conquest of 641 CE. After a short hiatus on the Arabian Sea island of Diu, they arrived in Surat on the western coast of India, where they sought permission from the local Hindu raja, Jadhav Rana, to settle in his kingdom. Legend has it that when the newcomers first asked to live among his people, Jadhav Rana sent a bowl of milk filled to the brim to signal that there was no space for any more people in his kingdom. The people from Pars added sugar to the milk and returned the bowl. The message was that they would dissolve like the sugar without displacing the milk and, in fact, sweeten it and thus, symbolically, the land.

The origin legend of the Bene Israel is one of a shipwreck on Indian shores. Like the Parsis they were religious and political refugees. Only 14 of their group, seven men and seven women, are said to have survived the shipwreck, and these were cast ashore at a village called Nawgaon, also on the western coast of India. The Cochin Jews had their own originary tales and legends of arrival. The commonality in all of these apocryphal accounts is that they provide foundational myths that serve a metaphorical purpose in expressing community identity and adaptation to changed cultural contexts and circumstances. The Baghdadi Jews immigrated to India in stages and within recorded history and thus do not have a single story of origin and arrival. In Bombay, especially, as an affluent and highly educated community, Parsis served as a reference group and role model for the Baghdadis, particularly for the purpose of societal orientation.

The Baghdadis and Parsis shared a history of economic and social prominence in Bombay and were renowned for the philanthropy of their leading families. The Sassoons, Jeejeebhoy, Tatas, and others left a philanthropic legacy in the city of Bombay, a legacy of libraries, colleges, hospitals, parks, and shipyards, while streets and statues extol their names. Outstanding members of both communities emulated the British and maintained a staunch loyalty to British rule. However, although the Baghdadis were classified as Europeans in 1885, the Parsis were not (Katz 2000, 155). In addition, many Parsis were prominent leaders in the struggle for independence. Both communities saw the economic and social advantages of cooperation with the British and, along with the Ismaili Khojas, were engaged in the opium trade for a period. All three communities were also active in the cotton mill industry, which flourished in the 19th century. Of the eight Indians in the Bombay Presidency who were made hereditary baronets during British rule, three were Parsis and three were Jews.

Both the Jewish and the Parsi communities in India and Pakistan have seriously dwindled for various demographic reasons. Attenuation of Jewish communities has occurred chiefly as a result of immigration to Israel because of cultural and social considerations, whereas among the Parsis a number of factors come into play. Endogamy, late marriages, low birth rate, and the strictures against proselytization all contribute to the dwindling of the community. In India, both communities have lived among tolerant and welcoming host communities that allowed the free practice of religion and customs. Unfortunately, the Shiv Sena, a fundamentalist and extremist nationalist group that has in recent times dominated politics in the state of Maharashtra, where many Jews and Parsis live, has generated increasingly nativist sentiments that can only bode ill for such tiny minority groups. M.S. Golwalkar, ideologue of the Hindu extremist party, the RSS (Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh), describes Jews and Parsis as “guests,” and Muslims and Christians as “invaders.” In general, however, both the remnants of Jewish communities and the Parsis continue to live in India in peace and prosperity.

In Pakistan there are only about 2,831 Parsis. They are accepted with far less prejudice than Hindu or even Christian minorities and are deemed apolitical. As in India their contributions, especially economical and educational, are enormous, particularly when one considers their minuscule presence. Barely any Jews remain in Pakistan, and the few that remain tend to live in relative anonymity, some even passing as Parsis. The creation of the State of Israel and subsequent Middle Eastern tensions adversely affected the perception of Jews in Pakistan and practically all have immigrated to India, to Israel, or to other places.

The relationship between Zoroastrians and Jews goes back all the way to the seventh century BCE when the Achaemenian emperor of Persia, Cyrus, who was Zoroastrian by faith, defeated Babylonia and allowed captive Jews to return to Israel, even financing the construction of the Second Temple. Leaders of these two communities, which in India share a record of prodigious achievement, particularly in relation to their small size, jointly contributed toward building the Gateway to India in what Katz (2000, 140) calls “a striking example of intercommunal philanthropy.” The major contributions to this monument came from two of Bombay’s leading citizens: Sir Jamsetji Jeejeebhoy and Shaikh David Sassoon. As music director for life of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra, Maestro Zubin Mehta keeps the links between the two communities alive to this day.

Selected Bibliography

- Katz, Nathan. 2000. Who Are the Jews of India? Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Mandelbaum, David G. 1984. “Social Stratification among the Jews of Cochin in India and in Israel” [Hebrew translation]. In From Cochin to the Land of Israel, edited by Shalva Weil, 60–91. Jerusalem: Kumu Berina.

Jews in Indian Public Life

Rashna Singh

---

The long history of the Jews in India has produced many prominent personages active in public life. Although not necessarily involved in politics as such, they were and are presences on the political, social, economic, and cultural scenes. Shalom Obadiah Hakohen established the first Baghdadi community in India in Calcutta in 1798 and went on to great commercial success. In Calcutta, the name of David Joseph Ezra is associated with some of the city’s grandest buildings—esplanade mansions, Ezra mansions, and Chowringhee mansions, as well as Ezra Street. David

Joseph Ezra's fortune came from prime real estate. Elia David Ezra, son of David Joseph Ezra, built the city's most splendid synagogue—the Magen David Synagogue. D. J. Cohen and the Reverend E. M. D. Cohen played a more direct part in civic affairs and social work. Under Cohen's proprietorship, the Hebrew newspaper Pariah had a circulation of 500 copies a week in the 1880s. The most famous name in Indian Jewry is that of the Sassoon family. Along with Parsi industrialists such as the Tatas, the Sassoons loom large in the industrialization and building of Bombay. In 1828, Shaikh Daud Sassoon (1792–1864) arrived in Bombay after fleeing Basra to escape Daud Pasha's plunder. A native of Baghdad, David Sassoon's father was the chief treasurer for the Ottoman rulers but, although he inherited his father's role, he was soon obliged to flee the oppression of the pasha. Sassoon found his way into the city's import-export trade, which was dominated by the Parsis and the British. "Beginning with opium and expanding into real estate and textiles, Sassoon became patriarch of one of the wealthiest and most expansive Jewish families in the world, 'the Rothschilds of the East'" (Katz 2000, 139).

The Sassoons were so successful that word spread throughout Asian Jewry that any Jew in need of employment could find it in the Sassoon family's mills. David Sassoon's eight sons dispersed throughout the world and thus the Sassoon empire was established, not only in Bombay and Calcutta but also in Singapore, Hong Kong, Shanghai, Kobe, Molucca, Baghdad, Amsterdam, London, and New York. Bombay's first Baghdadi synagogue, Magen David, was built by David Sassoon, while his grandson, Sir Jacob Elias David Sassoon, built Keneseth Eliyahoo in 1884. Elias's brother, Solomon Sassoon, expanded the family's commercial enterprises worldwide, and his wife, Flora, after whom Bombay's famous Flora Fountain is named, "truly internationalized the family businesses as she continued its philanthropic endeavors" (Katz 2000, 141).

The Sassoons founded a number of educational institutions. In Bombay, David Sassoon built and endowed a number of Jewish educational institutions, including a Talmud Torah in 1861. The David Sassoon Benevolent Institution was founded for the purpose of acculturating the children of his immigrant employees from Iraq who were taught languages, arithmetic, vocational skills and shehitah or the ritual slaughter of animals. A reform school and a mechanics' institute were also built, and David Sassoon's son Abdullah built Bombay's well-known Elphinstone High School. The Sir Jacob Sassoon Free School was founded in 1903 to educate indigent Baghdadi children in English.

Other prominent Jewish personages in Indian public life include Subedar Abraham David Charikar, who was appointed superintendent of police in 1863, although not much is known about his life. A well-known and well-loved figure was Nissim Ezekiel, one of the leading lights of Anglophone Indian literature. Ezekiel was a poet and journalist who wrote for The Illustrated Weekly of India a now-defunct magazine that enjoyed great popularity in the past. He joined the magazine as an assistant editor in 1953. Ezekiel also worked as a broadcaster on arts and literature for All India Radio. Ezekiel was honored with the Sahitya Akademi cultural award in 1983 and the Padma Shri in 1988. The Padma Shri is awarded to recognize distinguished service to the nation, in any field, including services rendered by government servants. Nissim Ezekiel became a professor of English and a reader in American literature at the University of Mumbai during the 1990s, and secretary of the Indian branch of the international writers' organization PEN. Some of his best-known poems include "Night of the Scorpion," "The Professor," "Case Study," and "Poster Prayers."

Perhaps the best-known Jewish public personage in Indian today is Lieutenant General J. F. R. Jacob, whose full name is Jacob-Farj-Rafael Jacob. Jacob was born in 1923. His father, a successful businessman, sent him to a boarding school in Darjeeling, about 500 kilometers from Calcutta, when he was only nine years old. At the age of 18, he enlisted in the Indian army, which was under British command. "My father was against my enlistment," he recalls, "but after I found out about the atrocities of the Nazis and their treatment of the Jews, I decided that I would be a military man" (DesPardes). Jacob joined an artillery brigade that was dispatched to North Africa to reinforce the British army against the German army under Field Marshal Erwin Rommel. The brigade arrived too late: the battles were over. Jacob's unit was subsequently sent to Burma. "I wanted to fight Germans," says Jacob, "but in the end I fought for three years against the Japanese."

Educated in artillery schools in England and the United States and specialized in advanced artillery and missiles, Jacob first came into the public eye when he served with Lieutenant General Jagjit Singh Aurora on the eastern front in the 1971 war against Pakistan when India's eastern wing broke off and became the independent nation of Bangladesh. Jacob made the arrangements for the surrender ceremony in Dhaka, where Aurora accepted the document of surrender from Pakistan's General A. A. K. Niazi. In the late 1990s, he became the governor of the state of Goa and subsequently governor of the state of Punjab. Jacob is the author of Surrender at Dacca: Birth of a Nation. Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin invited Jacob to attend the Jerusalem 3,000 celebrations and, since the establishment of diplomatic relations between India and Israel, Jacob has paid many visits to Israel.

Although tiny in terms of numbers, the Jews of India are akin to the Parsis in that they have made substantial contributions to the political, economic, educational, and cultural life of India. Those who remained in India, like General Jacob and Nissim Ezekiel, continued as outstanding public servants.

Selected Bibliography

- "The Jewish General Who Beat Pakistan." DesPardes Web site. <http://www.despardes.com/newsmakers/gen-jacob-sep8.htm> (accessed June 6, 200)
- Katz, Nathan. 2000. Who Are the Jews of India? Berkeley: University of California Press.

Jews in Pakistan

Shalva Weil

---

General Population: 135 million

Jewish Population: 300

Percent of Population: Less than 1 percent

Jewish Population by City: The remaining Jews mainly live in the port city of Karachi, although there are some in Islamabad and Peshawar.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Most of the Karachi Jews moved to Israel and live in Dimona, Beersheba, Lod, and Ramle and other cities in Israel. Their offspring intermarry with other Bene Israel and with other Jews in Israel. In Quetta and other cities, there were also other Jewish traders of Middle Eastern, Iranian, or Afghan origin.

Languages Spoken: The Bene Israel speak Marathi, which they originally spoke in Maharashtra, and Urdu, the local language. Most also speak English. Prayers are conducted in Hebrew.

---

Historical Overview

1768 The Bene Israel are first reported in the West in a letter from Ezekiel Rahabi of Cochin to his Dutch business partner, Tobias Boas. Rahabi indicates that Jews known as Bene Israel are found throughout the Maharatta province, which today is the Indian state of Maharashtra.

19th century Bene Israel migrate from the western part of Maharashtra to nearby cities, chiefly Bombay but also Poona, Ahmedabad, and Karachi, the latter in present-day Pakistan. At this time the main occupation of the Bene Israel is oil pressing. The Bene Israel are also known as Shaniwar Telis or Saturday Oil Pressers because they do not work on Saturdays

1893 A Bene Israel, Solomon David Umerdekar, inaugurates the Karachi Magen Shalom Synagogue on the corner of Jamila Street and Nishtar Road.

Early 20th century There are approximately 1,000 Jews in the following major centers in Pakistan: Karachi, Peshwar, Quetta, and Lahore. Most of the Jews hail from the Bene Israel community of Bombay and the Konkan villages; they have reached Pakistan with the British as railway workers or soldiers in the British army. At this time Pakistan and India are still united.

1903 The community sets up the Young Man's Jewish Association.

1912 The synagogue is extended by Umerdekar's two sons, Gershon Solomon Umerdekar and Rahamim Solomon Umerdekar. A community hall named "Sheeoolabai Hall" is built by Abraham Reuben Kamerlekar in memory of Sheeoolabai Solomon Umerdekar, wife of Solomon David Umerdekar.

1916–1918 The Karachi Jewish community opens a Hebrew school on the synagogue premises and in 1918 builds the Nathan Abraham Hall. The Karachi Bene Israel Relief Fund is established to support poor Jews in Karachi and the Karachi Jewish Syndicate is formed in 1918 to provide housing for poor Jews at reasonable rents. The All India Israelite League, founded by two prominent Bene

- Israel, Jacob Bapuji Israel and David S. Erulkar, first convenes in Karachi in 1918.
- 1919 The Karachi Jewish community entrusts Abraham Reuben (Kamerlekar), president of the All India Israelite League, to represent the 650 Bene Israel living in Sind province, which covers Karachi, Hyderabad, Larkana, Mirpur-Khas, and Sukkur. In relation to the Zionist movement, Reuben and his family had already gone on pilgrimage to the Holy Land in 1902. Bene Israel from other centers in India frequently join their Bene Israel brethren in Karachi for High Holiday prayers. There is also a prayer hall that serves Afghan Jews residing in the city.
- 1936 Abraham Reuben becomes the first Jewish councillor on the Karachi city corporation. In pre-partition India, the Jews are treated with tolerance and equality.
- 1941 A government census records 1,199 Pakistani Jews. Reissner, in his census of the Indian Jews, records 1,051 Jews in Karachi alone, of whom 220 are employed in transportation and 70 in commerce; 358 are clerks, 150 are employed in government service, and 80 are in the professions. The remainder are retired or serve the community.
- 1947 The first anti-Jewish riots around the time of the India-Pakistan partition cause the small community of Jews, with two prayer halls serving the mainly Persian and Middle Eastern Jewish traders in Peshawar in the North West Frontier Province, to close.
- 1947 Moses Samuel Reuben (Satamkar), the leader of the community and a foreman in the carriage and wagon shops in Mogulpura on the North Western Railway, is attacked in Lahore in July. He and his family flee to Karachi, as do the remaining Jews in the city.
- 1948 Demonstrators attack the Karachi synagogue and Jews in the city on Palestine Day (Israel's Independence Day) in May. Some members of the community immigrate to Israel via India and others settle in the United Kingdom. Many Karachi Jews move to Bombay.
- 1956 Pogroms against the Jews recur during the Suez War and the Six-Day War.
- 1967 Most of the remaining Jews immigrate to Israel or the United Kingdom.
- 1968 The Pakistan Jewish community numbers only 350 Jews in Karachi. The community has one synagogue, a welfare organization, and a recreational organization.
- 1979 Iranian Jews, escaping persecution in their country, secretly pass through Pakistan to reach India. However, the route is discovered and closed in 2000.
- July 17, 1988 The Magen Shalom Synagogue is destroyed by order of Pakistan's President Zai-Ul-Hak to make way for a shopping plaza in the Ranchore Lines neighborhood of Karachi.
- 1989 The original Ark and podium are stored by a non-Jew in Karachi, and a Torah scroll case is taken by an American Jewess to the United States. In 2004 she donates synagogue registers covering the period 1961–1976 to the Ben-Zvi Institute Library in Jerusalem. In these ledgers, a circumcision was recorded in 1963 and several weddings in 1963–1964. In 1973, only 15 names were written down, of whom 9 were listed as “left Karachi.”

2005 A meeting between members of the Pakistani and Israeli ministries of foreign affairs in September kindles renewed interest in the Jews of Pakistan. According to unofficial sources, several Jews remain in Pakistan, including doctors and members of the free professions who pass themselves off as members of other religions.

Selected Bibliography

- Glatzer, Michael. 2006. "Ledgers of the Jewish Community of Karachi." Tapasam: A Quarterly Journal of Kerala Studies 1 (3): 589–595.
- Katz, Nathan. 2000. Who Are the Jews of India? Berkeley: University of California Press.

The Pathans of Pakistan and Afghanistan and Their Israelite Status

Shalva Weil

---

Numbering more than 15 million, the Pathans (also known as Pashtun, Pakhtun, Afghan, and more) are the largest single tribe in the world. They inhabit an extensive area from Afghanistan through Pakistan to Kashmir in India. In Afghanistan alone, out of 25,315,000 people, the Pathans constitute 38 percent of the population. They speak Pushtu, or Pukhtu, an Aryan tongue that borrows from Persian and Hindustani and uses Arabic script; some words are similar to Hebrew. They are divided into distinct local subtribes reminiscent of the 10 lost tribes: Rabbani may be Reuben, Shinwari = Shimon, Efridar = Ephraim, Daftani may be a corruption of Naftali, Jajani = Gad, Ashuri = Asher, and so on. The tribal group of Yusuf-Zai straddles the Pakistani-Kashmiri border, and its members may be the descendants of the sons of Joseph. The Afghan royal family claim they are descendants of the tribe of Benjamin.

The 10 lost tribes of Israel were exiled by the Assyrians in the eighth century BCE, while the members of the Kingdom of Judah remained in Israel. The fate of the lost Israelites has always been something of an enigma, but Jews and Christians alike have generally believed they remained intact but would eventually be reunited with the descendants of the tribe of Judah.

Pathan legend has it that King Saul fathered a son by the name of Jeremiah, whose birth is not recorded in Jewish texts. Jeremiah fathered a royal prince called Afghana, whose descendants fled to Jat in Afghanistan. In 662 CE, the descendants of Afghana converted to Islam at the explicit request of Mohammed. The mission was accomplished by his emissary Khalid ibn al-Walid, who returned to his master in Arabia with proof of his activities: 76 converts and seven leaders of the "Children of Israel," including a descendant of Afghana named Kish. Kish later changed his name to Ibn Rashid and was entrusted by Mohammed to spread the Islamic word. Many of the Pathan today claim direct descent from Ibn Rashid.

Afghan and Western scholars alike have investigated the historical, anthropological, and philological origins of the Pathans and concluded they are of Israelite origin. This may have been encouraged by their physical appearance: They have sallow skins and dark hair and eyes, wear beards and sidecurls, and have a typically “Jewish” profile. They also wear shawls with fringes called kafan, similar to the four-cornered garments, the tallith, that Jewish males wear. According to 2 Kings 17:6, the 10 lost tribes were exiled to the geographic area inhabited by the Pathans. The Pathans themselves have shown exceptional tenacity in adhering to the legend that they are indeed “Bene Israel” or the “Children of Israel.”

There have been reports, particularly current among Afghan Jews but also recorded by British army officers in the 19th century, that the Pathans circumcise their boys on the eighth day; that their women observe purification laws similar to those prescribed in the Torah; that they have a bridal canopy like a chuppa; and that they wear amulets, reportedly containing the words “Shema Yisrael” (Hear O! Israel) The Pathans do not eat horse or camel meat, and, according to some sources, observe dietary laws similar to kashruth (Jewish dietary laws).

A Bukharan Jew, Gabriel Barukhoff, traveling to Kabul in 1935, told Israel’s second president, Yitzchak Ben-Zvi, that he had encountered fierce Pathan tribespeople who wore an embroidered Hanukkah lamp on their backs, had mezuzot on their doorposts, wrapped themselves in prayer shawls, and lit candles on Friday night. Ben-Zvi recorded this and similar accounts in his book The Exiled and the Redeemed (1958).

The Pathans’ ancient code of hospitality, Pukhtunwali, by which generosity and protection of guests are paramount, is sufficient proof for some of their Jewish affiliation, though hospitality is also a Muslim trait. Revenge (bahal) is one of the driving forces of Pathan society. If attacked, or if their pride is wounded, the Pathans will wage a jihad against the invaders. They succeeded in repulsing the British on the Northwest Frontier in the 19th century and resisted the communists in the late 20th century. In an ironic twist, in view of their purported Israelite connection, Pathan today make up the core of the Taliban movement, led by the wanted terrorist Osama bin Laden.

Although members of the Pathan tribes reiterated to this writer that they were definitely Bene Israel, the Pathans are notably anti-Zionist and certainly do not identify with other Israelite communities or Jews.

Selected Bibliography

- Ben-Zvi, Itzhak. 1958. The Exiled and the Redeemed. London: Valentine Mitchell.
- Godbey, Allen. 1930. The Lost Tribes: A Myth. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Weil, Shalva. 1991. “Beyond the Sambatyon: the Myth of the Ten Lost Tribes.” Ariel 85–86: 25–31.
- Weil, Shalva. 2001. “Our Brethren the Taliban?” The Jerusalem Report, October 22: 22.

Southeast Asia

Jews in Southeast Asia

Jonathan Goldstein

---

General Population: 545,079,159 in mid-2004 according to Europa World; see entries for each individual country.

Jewish Population: 813 overall in 2007, exclusive of about 100,000 Israeli tourists per year in Thailand

Percent of Population: Microscopic

Jewish Population by Country: As of 2007, the approximate Jewish populations are as follows: Indonesia, 100; Malaysia, 3; Myanmar, 10; Philippines, 100; Singapore, 300; and Thailand, 300 resident and about 100,000 Israeli tourists per year.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: It is impossible to generalize about the complex migration routes and diverse ethnic backgrounds of Jews in the 11 sovereign nations that make up Southeast Asia. See entries for each individual country.

Languages Spoken: English, Hebrew, Arabic, and Farsi overall, plus the local language[s] of each country.

---

Historical Overview

According to Europa World, as of mid-2004 Southeast Asia had more than 545 million people. Its 11 sovereign nations contained approximately 8.7 percent of the world's population of 6.3 billion. Southeast Asia's vast manufacturing sectors create several of the world's fastest-growing economies, namely those of Indonesia, the Philippines, Thailand, Singapore, and Vietnam. In the mid-1970s, and again in 2006, Singapore was the world's largest seaport in terms of gross tonnage. Bangkok and Manila do not lag far behind.

For nearly 200 years, Jews have traded and settled across this vast region, from Zamboanga on the Philippine Island of Mindanao to Mandalay on Myanmar's upper Irrawaddy River. There has been a continuous and significant Jewish presence in Singapore plus resilient Jewish enclaves in Indonesia, Myanmar (formerly Burma), the Philippines, and Thailand (formerly Siam). Georgetown, on Penang Island in Malaysia, has the remains of what once was a Jewish settlement. Only Brunei, Cambodia, Laos, Timor-Leste and Vietnam have had no substantial resident Jewish population, synagogues or cemeteries.

1601 The earliest literary reference to a Jewish presence in Siam appears in Marcello de Ribandeneira's History of the Philippines and Other Kingdoms.

1683 Abraham Navarro, an interpreter aboard the British East India Company ship "Delight," stops in Siam en route to China. This is the earliest fully documented record of a Jewish arrival in Siam.

1850 According to an 1850 census, a Rumanian Jewish merchant named Goldenberg makes a fortune in the Burmese teakwood trade and is the first recorded permanent Jewish resident in Burma.

- 1858 Jacob Saphir, visiting Singapore on a fund-raising mission for Jewish institutions in the Land of Israel, reports that 20 Jewish families of Baghdadi origin are engaged in the opium trade.
- 1861 Jacob Saphir visits Batavia and reports that 20 Jewish families of Dutch or German origin, including members of the Dutch colonial forces, live in the Dutch East Indies.
- 1866 Jacob Saphir publishes Even Saphir (The Sapphire Stone) in Lusk, Russian Poland. It is the first eyewitness account about Singapore and Batavia to be published in Hebrew.
- 1878 The Waterloo Street synagogue (Maghain Aboth) opens in Singapore.
- 1884 Salomon Rinmon, a Galician Jew, publishes Masot Shelomoh (Solomon's Travels) in Vienna. It is the first eyewitness account about Burma to be published in Hebrew.
- 1885 Britain annexes all of Burma. Under the protective umbrella of British rule more Bene Israel Jews arrive from Bombay to create an overwhelmingly oriental (Mizrachi) community.
- 1885–1890 Max Rosenberg is the first Jew recorded to have settled in Bangkok.
- 1898 After the United States replaces Spain as the Philippines's new colonial master, openly Jewish immigrants begin to arrive from Europe and America. Turkish, Syrian, and Egyptian arrivals help create a multiethnic community of approximately 50 people.
- 1905 Menasseh Meyer opens Chesed El Synagogue adjacent to his home in Singapore.
- 1918 At the request of Shanghai Zionist Association president Elly S. Kadoorie, Devawongse Varoprakar (1858–1923), the Siamese prince and foreign minister, publicly calls for the creation of a Jewish homeland in what had been the Ottoman Turkish province of Palestine. Siam thus becomes the first Asian and first non-Christian nation to issue a pro-Zionist declaration.
- 1921 British Zionist fund-raiser Israel Cohen visits the Dutch East Indies and finds about 2,000 Jews enjoying great political and economic privilege. He observes a similar situation in Manila, Rangoon, and Singapore.
- 1922 Menasseh Meyer becomes the founding president of Singapore's Zionist Society, an affiliate of the World Zionist Organization established by Theodor Herzl.
- 1924 A synagogue is finally built in Manila by a wealthy Ashkenazi benefactor. It has no full-time clergy and is rarely used up to World War II.
- 1926 Nederlands Indische Zionistenbond (Dutch Indies Zionist Association) is organized in Surabaya and Padang.
- 1929 Great Britain's King George V knights Menasseh Meyer of Singapore.
- 1937 On September 8, 28 German Jews from Shanghai arrive in Manila aboard the Norddeutscher Lloyd steamship Gneisenau. This unexpected arrival enervates Manila's Jewish Refugee Committee into further action to help refugees from Hitler.
- 1939 On February 15, Philippine president Manuel Quezon sends a message to the Philippine congress urging the admission of 10,000 German Jewish professionals - and recommending a Philippine $300 million subsidy to help them settle in Mindanao. Although this grandiose scheme never materializes, hundreds of Jews fleeing Hitler find refuge in the Philippines through other means.

- 1941 On December 8, Japanese troops land in the Gulf of Siam. They are subsequently given transit rights by the Thai government. Unlike Jews in the rest of Southeast Asia, the Jews of Thailand remain unscathed throughout the Pacific War.
- 1941 On December 9, Japan attacks the Philippines. The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee aids Jewish refugees until then. Some aid before that date and all assistance for the duration of the war come from the Manila Jewish community itself. The Japanese intern several hundred Jews with American, Belgian, British, British Commonwealth, Dutch, and Polish citizenship, along with 5,000 non-Jews, in the Santo Tomas and Los Banos detention camps. “Third party aliens” or “stateless Jews” are registered with the Japanese words “Mu Kokuseki Yudayajin” (Jews without citizenship or country) stamped in their passports. Community members who hold Iraqi, Filipino, and—ironically—Austrian and German passports, initially escape detention as they are from countries not at war with Japan.
- 1941 On December 24, Japan begins bombing Rangoon.
- 1942 In March Japan invades the Dutch East Indies. On March 9, Rangoon surrenders, causing most of city’s 2,200 Jews, along with most of the British colonial population, to flee to the relative safety of India.
- 1943 In August the entire civilian Dutch East Indies Jewish community—men, women, and children, and irrespective of nationality—is taken to prison camps on the advice of German diplomats in Tokyo.
- 1945 On February 10, several Jewish refugees are butchered in cold blood by the Japanese during a rampage in the Manila Red Cross Hospital.
- 1945–1950 Indonesia achieves independence from the Netherlands.
- 1947 Members of the Philippine Jewish community who are close to postwar Philippine president Manuel A. Roxas are instrumental, along with key advisers to U.S. president Harry Truman, in convincing the Philippine delegation to the United Nations to vote in favor of the November 29 partition of Palestine into Arab and Jewish territories. The Philippines thus becomes the only Asian nation to vote for Israeli independence. It is also among the first to establish full diplomatic relations with Israel.
- 1947 Due to turmoil at home, Prince Wan Waithayakorn, the Thai delegate to the United Nations, is not present in New York for the November 29 partition resolution that leads to the creation of the State of Israel.
- 1948 On January 4, Britain grants total independence to Burma.
- 1948 On May 14, the State of Israel is reborn.
- 1949 In December, President Chaim Weizmann and Prime Minister Ben-Gurion of Israel send telegrams to President Sukarno and Vice President Muhammad Hatta of Indonesia congratulating them on their Treaty of Independence with the Netherlands.
- 1950 In January, Israeli foreign minister Sharett sends Indonesian vice president Muhammad Hatta a telegram granting Indonesia full diplomatic recognition.

- 1950 After the last organized transport of Jewish immigrants from China reaches Israel, the Surabaya-based Zionist Organization of Indonesia is the only full-fledged Zionist organization in East or Southeast Asia.
- 1953 Barely a handful of Jews remain in Burma to watch the government of Premier U Nu establish full diplomatic relations with Israel.
- 1954 On June 23, Thailand establishes full diplomatic relations with Israel. The Jewish state is represented in Bangkok by an honorary consul general until 1958, when a permanent embassy is established.
- 1955 David Saul Marshall ben Farha (1908–1995), an Iraqi Jew by origin, is elected Singapore's first chief minister.
- 1956 In November, when Burma's Muslim minority riots in the streets in the aftermath of the Sinai campaign, most of the remaining Jewish stalwarts leave the country.
- 1964 The Jewish Association of Thailand formally registers as a legal organization in Thailand.
- 1965 Israeli experts begin to train Singapore's new armed forces.
- 1966 Israeli agricultural project opens in Hup Kapong, Thailand. Israeli experts advise 130 Thai farm owners on collective and cooperative farming based on the models of the Israeli kibbutz and moshav.
- 1969 Full diplomatic relations and closer military ties are established between Singapore and Israel.
- 1970 Israeli experts begin teaching irrigation techniques at Thailand's Khon Kaen University.
- 1974 A Thai-Israel Friendship Foundation is founded in Bangkok.
- 1988 Thailand opens a trade office in Israel.
- 1990 A Thai-Israel Chamber of Commerce is established in Bangkok.
- 1996 Thailand opens an embassy in Israel; thousands of Thai migrant workers begin to arrive in Israel.
- 2004 On January 23, in the presence of Thailand's Princess Maha Chakri Siridhorn, Khon Kaen University opens a permanent Thai-Israel Techno-Demo Unit for irrigated high-value crops.

Jews in Indonesia

Jonathan Goldstein

---

Former Name: Dutch East Indies

General Population: 184,600,000 (1989); 217,587,504 (2004)

Jewish Population: In 1921, there were approximately 2,000 Jews; in 2007, there were approximately 100 Jews.

Jewish Population by City: Traditionally, most Jews resided in Surabaya with smaller enclaves in Bandung, Jakarta, Malang, Medan, Padang, Semarang, and Yogyakarta. As of 2007, the Jewish population is almost exclusively in Surabaya and Jakarta.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: In 1861, Jerusalem-based Jacob Saphir visited Batavia, the capital of the Dutch East Indies, as part of a larger fund-raising trip to India and Australia. He met a Jewish merchant from Amsterdam who named 20 Jewish families of Dutch or German origin, including members of the Dutch colonial forces. Their forebears had begun to settle in the Indies in the late 1700s. He also recorded some Jews living in Surabaya on the eastern side of the island of Java. He observed that few had links with Judaism. Most had intermarried and had even abandoned the custom of circumcision. Baghdadi, Dutch, and German Jews continued to populate the Indies until Indonesia achieved independence in the period 1947–1950. Most Jews then left for Israel, the Netherlands, Singapore, and the United States.

Languages Spoken: Dutch, Indonesian Malay, English, and German

---

Historical Overview

When Zionist fund-raiser Israel Cohen visited the Dutch East Indies in 1921, he found the Jewish community in many ways similar to what Jacob Saphir had observed in 1861. About 2,000 Jews enjoyed great political and economic privilege. The Dutch census of 1930 recorded slightly less than 300 Jews in Surabaya, making it the single largest, and only organized, Jewish community of many strewn across the archipelago. The resident governor of Surabaya, variously referred to as “Coen” and “Cohen,” was a Jew. Several other Jews held governmental positions and many engaged in commerce. The community included Russian and Rumanian Jews and an emigrant from the Palestinian colony of Zichron Yaakov. Ritually observant Jacob Saphir, rabbi and world traveler.

(Isadore Singer, ed., The Jewish Encyclopedia, 1901)

Baghdadi and Adeni Jews had followed the Europeans and become a majority of the Jewish community of Surabaya. These Levantine Jews spoke Arabic and English at home, Dutch in school and in social circles, and Malay to their servants. Baghdadis such as the Bahars, Benjamins, Mizrahis, and Solomons retained close commercial ties with their brethren in Bombay, Calcutta, Hong Kong, Shanghai, and Singapore.

The religious life of Baghdadi Jewry in the Indies resembled that of their brethren in the aforementioned cities. The freedoms they enjoyed, plus their memory of persecution in Baghdad, motivated many of them to deepen their Jewish identity. Indeed, the Baghdadis were the only Jews in Surabaya to organize as a community. They had a central board of directors, which set up a burial society, purchased land for a cemetery, and engaged local Chinese carpenters and masons to build a synagogue and an adjoining club. On the other hand, Israel Cohen reiterated Jacob Saphir's observation of some six decades earlier, that in this seductive environment, many Jews "concealed or denied their Jewish origin." A Rumanian Jew who gave Cohen a generous contribution was married to a Madurese, as were five or six other Jews in the city. Cohen went so far as to say that, because of assimilation and intermarriage, it was "impossible to form an [accurate] estimate" of the number of Jews in Surabaya.

The community divided over the question of Zionism, which had been introduced by European immigrants. Cohen described an Austrian Jew who "proclaimed himself a skeptic on the advisability of bringing the Jews back to Palestine and made no secret of his views that they should be absorbed among the nations." His mentality was typical of the bulk of the Jews in Java who, according to Cohen, chose to ignore persistent "anti-Semitic pinpricks" in the local newspaper. Cohen complimented his Zionist colleagues for having "bravely succeeded in maintaining their enthusiasm in this spiritually asphyxiating atmosphere."

In 1926, a handful of Surabaya's and Padang's European Jews organized the Nederlands Indische Zionistenbond (Dutch Indies Zionist Association). The group affiliated with the World Zionist Organization, which had been established by Theodor Herzl some three decades earlier. On September 9, the group began publishing the monthly journal Erets Israel (Het Joodsche Land or the Land of Israel) in Dutch, German, and English. The founding editor was S. J. van Creveld. Surabaya also became the Indies headquarters for the Zionist charitable foundation Keren Hayesod. By 1928, Keren Hayesod had opened branch offices in Bandung, Batavia, Malang, Medan, Padang, Semarang, and Yogyakarta. The rise of Central and Eastern European fascism in the late 1920s directed more Jewish refugees to Surabaya and further energized its Zionist movement. By 1934, Zionist fund-raiser Benzion Shein, from Jerusalem, received a much warmer welcome and had greater financial success in Surabaya and Medan than had Israel Cohen 13 years earlier.

Japan invaded the Indies in March 1942, but Japanese control of this remote outpost of empire was decentralized. At least initially, Jewish civilians were able to escape punitive treatment because of bureaucratic inertia and because local Japanese officials believed Jews and Armenians were "peoples without countries" who could simply be left alone. In the viewpoint of those local officials, the “Chrysanthemum nation” only saw itself at war with countries, not peoples. The Japanese treated Jewish prisoners-of-war such as Nathan Gutwirth, a Dutch national who was a member of the Dutch East Indies Volunteer Army, no differently than other Dutch soldiers.

The situation for Jewish civilians changed in August 1943 when Dr. Helmut Wohltach, a German envoy from Tokyo, arrived in Surabaya. At the urging of Wohltach and Eugene Ott, the German ambassador in Tokyo, the entire civilian Dutch East Indies Jewish community—men, women, and children, and irrespective of nationality—were no longer exempted as “peoples without countries” and were taken to prison camps. Internment effectively put a halt to Zionist and all other Judaic activity in the Indies. From then on Indies Jews suffered the same hardships as all white people who were not under the protection of neutral governments or nations allied with Japan. Some dark-skinned Jews managed to escape the Japanese dragnet by virtue of their skin color. When viewed from the broad perspective of the entire Southeast Asian region, the Indies Jews suffered far worse than the unscathed Jews of Thailand, a wartime ally of Japan, or the Jews of Rangoon, most of whom were able to flee to India for the duration of the war. Their fate was comparable to that of the interned Jews of Hong Kong, Manila, Shanghai, and Singapore.

When the Indian journalist Percy Gourgey visited Surabaya shortly after the end of the war, he found that “many (Jews), broken in health but not in spirit, emerged from the camps, and [then] went through another ordeal brought about by the Indonesian revolution.” By this time a Zionist leadership had reconstituted, promoted by a British Forces Jewish captain and chaplain named Bloch, who was based in Singapore, and E. J. (Vaandrig) Seeligmann, chaplain to the Jews among the Dutch forces who were trying to recapture the Indies. On November 15, 1947, Captain Joost Straus, one of Seeligmann’s servicemen, advised the Zionist executive in Jerusalem of the hardships facing Surabaya’s Baghdadi Jews. He wrote that “this group expects that by clever maneuvering of competitors they will be completely cut off [of] their possibilities to earn a decent living. There are also those who fear aggression against their person. These people [who] have no ties with Europe or America and can not go back to Iraq have no other choice than Israel.” Straus was even more explicit with respect to the Jews of European origin who remained in the Dutch East Indies. He wrote that “after what happened [e.g., Dutch collaboration with the Nazis during the Holocaust] the wish to go back to Holland is not so big, so many of them see the only way . . . is aliyah [immigration to Israel].”

Because of the efforts of Bloch, Seeligmann, Straus, and others, most Indies Jews evacuated to Israel in 1948–1950. After the last organized transport of Jewish immigrants from China reached Israel in 1950, the Surabaya-based Zionist Organization of Indonesia was the only full-fledged Zionist organization in East or Southeast Asia. A trickle of immigration from Indonesia to Israel continued into the mid-1950s. In May 1955, F. Dias Santilhano, chairman of both the Indonesian Jewish community (Vereniging voor Joodse Belangen) and the local Zionist organization, requested that the Jewish National Fund send some Israeli movies “to maintain contacts with our small community here from which occasionally there are going some olim [immigrants] to our country.” Santilhano and his family would themselves immigrate to Israel in October 1955.

Indonesia achieved independence under Sukarno in 1945–1950. It thereby became the world’s largest independent Muslim nation. Sukarno brushed aside Israel’s recognition of his regime and other friendly gestures. Instead, it demonstrated unrelenting hostility toward the Jewish state. Despite an official policy of Pancasila, or secularism, independent Indonesia also displayed hostility toward its own Jewish population. Unlike independent Singapore, which gave full recognition to its small Jewish population, Indonesia recognized only five legitimate religions—Islam, Protestantism, Catholicism, Hinduism, and Buddhism. It demonstrated scant toleration of indigenous beliefs. According to the American ethnologist Jeffrey Hadler, who made no secret of his Jewishness while doing research in Surabaya in 1994–1995, “foreign Jews encouraged one another to proclaim themselves ‘Buddhist’ or, better yet, ‘Unitarian,’ rather than face the prejudicial and bureaucratic headaches that could come with being Yahudi.” Hadler noted that Surabaya’s David Mussry had “Hebrani” on his national identity card until 1998, when he was shifted into the “approved and uncontroversial ‘Hindu’ category.” Shortly thereafter, Mussry immigrated to the United States, as did the keeper of the synagogue. The sign on the building was removed, although a Star of David remains on the door. The Jews of the Netherlands Indies, in a period of one century, with painful memories of Baghdad behind them, saw their place of refuge turn hostile. Some would rebuild their lives in the Netherlands, Singapore, and the United States. Many would do so in a reborn State of Israel.

Selected Bibliography

- Barton, Greg, and Colin Rubenstein. 2005. “Indonesia and Israel: A Relationship in Waiting.” Jewish Political Studies Review 17 (1 and 2, Spring 2005): <http://www.jcpa.org/JCPA/Templates/ShowPage.asp?DBID=1&LNGID=1&TMID=111&FID=253&PID=0&IID=1802> (accessed June 5, 2008).
- Cohen, Israel. 1925. The Journal of a Jewish Traveller. London: John Lane.
- Gourgey, P. S. 1953. “My Visit to Jewish Communities of the Far East.” India and Israel 20 (April): 37.
- Hadler, Jeffrey. 2004. “Translations of Antisemitism: Jews, the Chinese, and Violence in Colonial and Post-colonial Indonesia.” Indonesia and the Malay World 32 (94): 295–299.
- Hamonic, Gilbert. 1988. “Milieux Marchands et Tentatives Commerciales: Note sur la communauté Juive de Surabaya” [Mercantile Environments and Commercial Ventures: A Note on the Jewish Community of Surabaya]. Archipel 36: 183.
- Kashani, Reuven. 1982. Kehillot Ha-Yehudim Be-Mizrah Ha-Rachok [The Jewish Communities in the Far East]. Jerusalem: Sephardic Council.
- Saphir-Halevy, Yaakov. 1866. Even Saphir [The Sapphire Stone]. Lusk, Poland: Hevrat Mekitzey Nirdamim.
- Schwarzbart, Isaac. 1957. The Rise and Decline of Jewish Communities in the Far East and Southeast Asia. New York: World Jewish Congress.
- Shanson, Lindsey. 1994. “Indonesian Jews: 5,000,000 to 1.” Points East 9, no. 1 (April): 12–13. Previously published in The Jerusalem Report, November 18, 1983.
- Yegar, Moshe. 2006. “The Republic of Indonesia and Israel.” Israel Affairs 12 (1): 136–156.

Jews in Malaysia

Jonathan Goldstein

---

As of 1990, three Jewish families were left in Georgetown on Penang (Pulau Pinang) Island. The synagogue at 28 Jalan Nagore was closed. There was a small Jewish cemetery on Jalan Yahudi (Jewish Street). See the “Jews in Singapore” entry regarding the brief period in the 1960s when Singapore, and its substantial Jewish community, was part of Malaysia.

Jews in Myanmar

Jonathan Goldstein

---

Former Name: Burma

General Population: Approximately 14,667,146 (1931); 18,489,000 (1956); 38,900,000 (1984); 40,800,000 (1989); 45,922,000 (2002); 50,003,988 (2007)

Jewish Population: Possibly 10 people in 2007

Percent of Population: Microscopic

Jewish Population by City: Almost entirely concentrated in Yangon, formerly Rangoon; scattered traders and settlers are in Mandalay and elsewhere.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: The original Jewish settler in Burma may have been Solomon Gabirol, a Marathi-speaking Bene Israel from the Bombay region of northern India. He served as a commissar in the army of King Alaungpaya, who ruled from 1752 to 1760. According to an 1850 census, a Romanian Jewish merchant named Goldenberg made a fortune in the Burmese teakwood trade. In 1851, Salomon Rinmon, a Galician Jew, arrived in Rangoon as a supplier to the British military. He quickly established retail stores around the region. His Masot Shelomoh (Solomon’s Travels), published in Vienna in 1884, contains a long chapter on Burma and is the first Hebrew account of the country and its towns.

Rangoon was incorporated into British India after the second Anglo-Burmese War of 1852–1853. By 1885, Britain had annexed all of Burma. Under the protective umbrella of British rule, more Bene Israel arrived from Bombay, creating an overwhelmingly oriental (Mizrachi) community. It included Arabic-speaking Jews from Syria and Yemen and Malayalam-speaking Cochinites from Kerala, in South India. In 1896, the community built its major synagogue, Musmeah Yeshuah (Mazmiach Yeshu’a), followed shortly thereafter by a Jewish day school. A second synagogue, Beth El, opened in 1932.

Languages Spoken: Burmese, English, Marathi

---

Historical Overview

In the course of the 19th and 20th centuries, approximately 2,000 Jews fled Ottoman and Iraqi persecution and found haven in Rangoon. Baghdadis were the plurality of Rangoon's Jewish community for much of its existence. They maintained what ethnologist Chiara Betta terms "overlapping identities." After leaving the Ottoman Empire, they became anglicized but retained strong links to their Judeo-Arabic heritage. In this relatively unrestricted environment, remembrance motivated many Baghdadi Jews toward an intensification of ethnic identity.

For other Jews, the same rights and privileges that enabled intensification of belief provided opportunities for intermarriage and assimilation. When Israel Cohen, a London-based official of the World Zionist Organization, visited Rangoon in February 1921, he observed the mixed blessings of toleration. On the one hand, he stayed in the palatial residence of A. J. Cohen, a Baghdadi who had extensive gardens and 36 Burmese servants. The main Baghdadi synagogue was maintained by rents from adjacent shops. Baghdadi Jews served as magistrates, municipal councillors, commissioners, and at least once as sheriff of Rangoon. Yehuda Ezekiel Street honors one of several Jews who served as mayor. Cohen received significant contributions for institutions in the Land of Israel. On the other hand, Cohen saw Jews engaged in pitched legal battles with one another, including a much-publicized lawsuit between rival factions within one synagogue. He observed much intermarriage, including a Jewish merchant born in London who was married to a Burmese woman and another wed to a Japanese woman.

The Japanese invasion of 1941 shattered the peaceful environment the Burmese Jews once knew. On December 24, Japan began bombing Rangoon. On March 9, 1942 the city surrendered. Japanese rule caused most of Rangoon's 2,200 Jews, along with most of the British colonial population, to flee to the relative safety of India. Their flight overland was of epic and traumatic proportions. Between December 8, 1941, and the end of 1943, Burmese officials estimated that 500,000 residents fled the colony and at least 10,000 lost their lives on the trek. Actual census figures list 393,735 Burmese who evacuated to India. Approximately 1,000 Rangoon Jews settled in Calcutta alone. They relied chiefly on the hospitality of that city's 2,500 resident Baghdadi Jews and on occasional relief from the government of Bengal. Fewer than 400 Jews returned to Rangoon after the war.

During the Japanese occupation Burma gained nominal independence under the Burmese Independence Army. It was trained on Hainan Island and led by Aung San, father of Burmese Nobel laureate Daw Aung San Suu Kyi. Of the handful of Jews who remained in Burma during the war, a few were singled out for their "pro-British leanings," but never because they were Jews. The large synagogue remained protected with a sign identifying it as "enemy property." All 120 silver-cased Torah scrolls were still intact when the war ended.

On January 4, 1948, Britain granted total independence to Burma. Shortly thereafter, on May 14, 1948, the State of Israel was reborn. Both of these independences had major consequences for Burmese Jews. On April 20, 1949, Eliyahu Mordecai, a former Rangoon Jew living in Ramat Gan, Israel, appealed to the Jewish Agency, the quasi-governmental authority involved in immigrant absorption, for "the immediate granting of 150 visas to Burmese Jews and [the subvention of] their transportation to Israel. The Jews of Rangoon are living under war conditions—a neutral community in a country torn with strife between the Karens, Communists, and Burmans [sic]. Their existence is precarious in every respect. Their only fervent hope is to come to Israel." On May 3, 1949, Charles Manasseh wrote the Jewish Agency from Rangoon about "the chaotic conditions brought about by armed insurrection against the present government. Businesses have been stagnant owing to restrictive measures imposed by the government. Black marketeering is rampant and the cost of living has gone up by leaps and bounds. Law and order are things of the past. Armed robbery is the order of the day. What with communist threats from the north [China] and internal friction, I am inclined to think that the sooner people are evacuated to Israel the happier will be their lot." Manasseh described 45 destitute families who had left Burma during the Japanese invasion, returned to Burma after the war, and "need immediate repatriation to Israel."

For these reasons, by 1953 most Burmese Jews evacuated to Israel and other countries. In November of that year Israeli journalist Gershon Agron cabled Keren Hayesod, the Zionist charitable foundation, that the Rangoon Jewish community had "dwindled almost [to a] vanishing point." In that same year, barely a handful of Jews remained to watch the government of Premier U Nu solidify relations with the Israel of Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion and Foreign Minister Moshe Sharett. In November 1956, when Burma's Muslim minority rioted in the streets in the aftermath of the Sinai campaign, most of the remaining Jewish stalwarts left the country. Although the Jews of Burma had never been discriminated against, the country had ceased to be a nurturing haven for them. At precisely the same time a New Jerusalem beckoned.

Selected Bibliography

- Cernea, Ruth. 1988. "End of the Road." Bnai Brith Jewish Monthly 102, no. 10 (June–July): 26–30.
- Cohen, Israel. 1925. Journal of a Jewish Traveller. London: John Lane; 223–226.
- Hacohen, David. 1963. Yoman Burmah [Burma Diary]. Tel Aviv: Am Oved.
- Hacohen, David. 1974. Et Le-Saper. Tel Aviv: Am Oved. Reprinted as Time to Tell, translated by Menachem Dagut. New York; Cornwall, 1985.
- Hyman, Mavis. 1995. Jews of the Raj. London: Longdunn Press.
- Kashani, Reuven. 1982. Kehillot Ha-Yehudim Be-Mizrah Ha-Rachok [The Jewish Communities in the Far East]. Jerusalem: Sephardic Council.
- Rinman, Salomon. 1884. Masot Shelomoh Be-Erets Hodu, Birman Ve-Sinim [Solomon's Travels in the Land of India, Burma, and the Chinese]. Vienna: Ba-defus shel G. Brag.
- Schwarzbart, Isaac. 1957. The Rise and Decline of Jewish Communities in the Far East and Southeast Asia. New York: World Jewish Congress.
- Sharett, Moshe. 1957. Mi-shut Be-Asiyah: Yoman Masa [From Traveling in Asia: A Travel Diary]. Tel Aviv: Davar.
- Yegar, Moshe. 1984. "A Rapid and Recent Rise and Fall." Sephardi World (July–August): 8.

Jews in the Philippines

Jonathan Goldstein

---

General Population: Estimated at 19,234,182 (1956); 54,500,000 (1984); 64,900,000 (1989); 75,967,000 (2002); 81,617,024 (2004)

Jewish Population: Estimated at 1,000 (1946); 600 (1948); 400 (1949); 250 (1968); 80 (1987); 150 (1990); possibly 100 (2007)

Percent of Population: Microscopic

Jewish Population by City: The country's Jewish population is almost entirely in Manila and its suburbs.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: When Manila was the capital of the Spanish Philippines, a handful of Marranos, or secret Jews, experienced persecution at the hands of the Inquisition. The Marrano, or "new Christian" brothers Jorge and Domingo Rodriguez may have been the first secret Jews to arrive in the Spanish Philippines. They are recorded as resident in Manila in the 1590s. By 1593, both had been tried and convicted at an auto-da-fé in Mexico City because the Inquisition did not have an independent tribunal in the Philippines. The Inquisition imprisoned the brothers and subsequently tried and convicted at least eight other Marranos from the Philippines.

After the United States became the new colonial master of the Philippines in 1898, openly Jewish immigrants began to arrive from Europe and America. Turkish, Syrian, and Egyptian arrivals helped create a multiethnic community of approximately 50 people. The early 20th-century newcomers also included American servicemen discharged in Manila after the Spanish-American War and World War I, plus Russian Jews fleeing the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917. These immigrants engaged in the import and export trade and in portside land development. Because Manila Jews were not ethnically homogenous, they did not interact with a cohesive international Jewish merchant Diaspora. In this respect they differed from the Baghdadi Jews of Southeast Asia whose commerce was overwhelmingly characterized by ethnic networking.

Languages Spoken: English, Tagalog

---

Historical Overview

By 1920, Manila Jewry included the founder of the Makati Stock Exchange, the conductor of the Manila Symphony Orchestra, physicians, and architects. Apart from these purely secular achievements, 22 years after the U.S. occupation began, there had been almost no Jewish institutional development. Although Spanish repression may explain this phenomenon before 1898, it does not account for the absence of institutional development under the Americans. A synagogue was finally built by a wealthy Ashkenazi benefactor in 1924. In that year the community began importing clergy and lay leaders from Shanghai and elsewhere for short stints. Full-time, ordained clergy rarely serviced the synagogue.

Manila's Jews clearly experienced precious little of the type of intensified rabbinic Judaism found in Singapore. Although some Manila Jews faded completely into the seductive woodwork of what community historian Annette Eberly calls "the good life out there," others assumed a secularized Jewish identity. The fullest expressions of this identity were the significant assistance Philippine Jews extended to Jewish refugees fleeing from Hitler, the solidarity within the community during the Japanese occupation of 1941–1945, and the community's support for the creation and maintenance of the State of Israel.

The rise of Hitler mobilized some of Manila's most secularized Jews into communal service. The niece of the founder of the infrequently used Manila synagogue asserted that "we only became Jewish conscious in a deep way when the terrible threat came out of Europe and suddenly there were Jews in desperate need of help." Local Philippine Jews were able to assist Jews fleeing Hitler because of anomalies within the Philippine immigration system. The Philippines, as already noted, became an American territorial possession in 1898. Until the Philippines passed its own comprehensive immigration legislation on January 1, 1941, the immigration restrictions imposed by the United States Congress in 1924 theoretically applied in both the continental United States and the Philippines. But in practice the Philippines had some flexibility when it came to implementing immigration policies.

The first two German Jewish refugees from Hitler to reach the Philippines may have been Karl Nathan and Heinz Eulau, from Offenbach. They arrived in Manila in June 1934 on affidavits of support from Eulau's cousin, Dr. Kurt Eulau, who had lived in the islands since 1924 and would sponsor many other immigrants. On September 8, 1937, 28 German Jews from Shanghai arrived in Manila aboard the Norddeutscher Lloyd steamship Gneisenau. In this bizarre episode, Hitler's government evacuated these German Jews and an approximately equal number of ethnic Germans as a humanitarian gesture. In what surely must have been a bureaucratic lapse, the Nazi government wished to protect "all Germans" from Sino-Japanese hostilities. That was the extent of Nazi Germany's assistance to these and all other Jews who had fled to Shanghai to escape Hitlerian repression.

A Jewish Refugee Committee of Manila mustered to assist these unexpected arrivals. It quickly realized that it might be able to assist other Jewish refugees. Jack Rosenthal, an American-Jewish friend of Philippine president Manuel A. Quezon, was able to interest Quezon in the overall plight of European Jewry. The committee informed U.S. High Commissioner Paul McNutt, and ultimately Quezon himself, about the skills many Jewish immigrants could bring to the underdeveloped Philippine islands, especially Mindanao. On February 15, 1939, Quezon sent a message to the Philippine congress urging the admission of 10,000 German Jewish professionals and recommending a Philippine $300 million subsidy to help them settle Mindanao.

Although this grandiose scheme never materialized, Rosenthal, Alex and Philip Frieder, and other Jewish residents were able to persuade Quezon to independently authorize the admission of perhaps as many as 1,000 Jewish refugees from Hitler. Even these admissions were problematical. The Philippines had no independent consular service and relied on U.S. diplomatic personnel for the worldwide implementation of its immigration policy. In the blunt words of Jack Netzorg, son of Morton Netzorg, president of the Manila Jewish community, "wherever the American consular staff was friendly to the Jewish people Jews got out, and where they shrugged their shoulders Jews did not get out." Netzorg added that although "the Jewish community was very small [it] practiced tithing to help the refugees. Five hundred were brought over in a three year period.” Quezon himself donated seven and a half acres of a country estate at Marikina for a working farm for Jewish refugees. Marikina Hall was dedicated on April 23, 1940, and housed 40 residents.

Most refugees arrived penniless and on two-year temporary visas. Joseph Schwarz, the first full-time, ordained rabbi to serve in the Philippines, arrived with his wife from Germany in 1938. They ministered to the Manila community until moving abroad in 1949. Schwarz’s job was then filled by another refugee, Cantor Joseph Cysner.

The Philippine Jewish community’s effort to assist refugees is all the more impressive when one considers that after the Japanese attack of December 9, 1941, the entire archipelago was a battle zone. The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee aided Jewish refugees until then. Some aid before that date and all assistance for the duration of the war came from the Manila Jewish community itself. The Japanese interned several hundred Jews with American, Belgian, British, British Commonwealth, Dutch, and Polish citizenship, along with 5,000 non-Jews, in the Santo Tomas and Los Banos detention camps. “Third party aliens” or “stateless Jews” were registered with the Japanese words Mu Kokuseki Yudayajin (Jews without citizenship or country) stamped in their passports. Community members who held Iraqi, Filipino, and—ironically—Austrian and German passports, initially escaped detention as they were from countries not at war with Japan. These exempted individuals were in a position to aid the Jewish internees.

The community suffered heavy losses during fighting in and around Manila in 1944–1945, when 79 individuals, or approximately 10 percent of the Jewish community, became wartime casualties, a rate similar to that experienced by Manila’s overall population. The Japanese arrested, tortured, and murdered several Jews at Fort Santiago, alleging that they collaborated with anti-Japanese resistance. Some, such as the ritual slaughterer Israel Konigsberg, were indeed active participants in the resistance. Several Jewish refugees were butchered in cold blood by the Japanese during a rampage in the Manila Red Cross Hospital on February 10, 1945.

Despite these difficulties the Jewish community of Manila managed to save perhaps 1,200 Jews from almost certain obliteration at the hands of the Nazis. For many members, the community’s postwar rebirth and embrace of Zionism were a natural outgrowth of the community’s wartime sacrifices on behalf of European refugees and significant losses at the hands of Hitler’s allies.

In the spring and summer of 1945, American servicemen helped the war-ravaged Manila Jewish community to reorganize. The community raised $15,000 to rebuild the synagogue, which had been demolished during the February 1945 Battle of Manila. Simultaneously, four American Jewish servicemen organized a Kvutsa chaverim (group of friends) for the Jewish youth of Manila. Apart from social activities, the main function of the chaverim was to study modern Hebrew. In 1947, members of the Jewish community who were close to postwar Philippine president Manuel A. Roxas were instrumental, along with key advisers to U.S. president Harry Truman, in convincing the Philippine delegation to the United Nations to vote in favor of the partition of Palestine into Arab and Jewish territories. The Philippines thus became the only Asian nation to vote for Israeli independence, and it was among the first to establish full diplomatic relations with Israel.

Philippino Zionism and Ties with Israel

As was the case in independent Singapore, Manila's Jewish community worked diligently to cultivate Philippine-Israeli economic and cultural ties. In 1951, the Philippines signed an aviation agreement with Israel. In that same year, retired Lt. Col. Shaul Ramati, of the Israeli Defence Forces, paid a fund-raising visit. As a result of that campaign, Israeli consul Ernest E. Simke was able to write to the Central Zionist Executive that "the appeal was the highest collection ever made in the Philippines." In 1956, Simke wrote that "although the community is small, there is a strong Zionist sympathy." In that same year the Philippines welcomed Moshe Sharett, Israel's outgoing foreign minister and former prime minister, on a semiofficial visit. Sharett was accompanied by the deputy director of the Israeli Foreign Ministry, Elaishiv Ben-Horin.

Jewish emigration from the Philippines to Israel and elsewhere shrunk the Manila community from an immediate postwar peak of perhaps 2,500 to 1,000 in 1946, 600 in 1948, 400 in 1949, 250 in 1968, and approximately 80 families in 1987. Some families, such as the Simkes, had Filipino citizenship and chose to remain. The community remains a mix of Ashkenazim, Sephardim, Oriental Jews, Americans, Israelis, and ethnically Filipino spouses and/or converts. Its history exemplifies a secularized Jewish identity. Manila never had been a Yiddishe Gemeinde, or Jewish community in the classic European or even Baghdadi sense. Although small in numbers and weak in formal aspects of religiosity, the Jewish community in one of the world's largest cities and seaports remains secular, Jewish, Filipino, and overwhelmingly Zionist.

Selected Bibliography

- Berger, Joseph. 2005. "A Filipino-American Effort to Harbor Jews is Honored." Points East 20, no. 2 (July): 15–16.
- Cohen, Israel. 1925. Journal of a Jewish Traveller. London: John Lane.
- Cohen, Israel. 1956. A Jewish Pilgrimage. London: Valentine Mitchell.
- Cowen, Ida. 1971. Jews in Remote Corners of the World. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall; 141–147.
- Eberly, Annette. 1975. "Manila? Where? Us? The Good Life Out There." Present Tense 2, no. 3 (Spring): 162–163.
- Ephraim, Frank. 2003. Escape to Manila: From Nazi Tyranny to Japanese Terror. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Netzorg, Jack. n.d.. Manila Memories. Laguna Beach, CA: Pacific Rim Books.
- Sharett, Moshe. 1964. Mi-shut Be-Asiyah: Yoman Masa [From Traveling in Asia: A Travel Diary]. Tel Aviv: Davar/Am Oved.

Jews in Singapore

Jonathan Goldstein

---

General Population: Estimated at 557,745 (1941); 940,824 (1956); 2,500,000 (1984); 2,700,000 (1989); 3,567,000 (2002); 4,240,300 (2007)

Jewish Population: Estimated at 300 (1988); 250 (1990), 300 (2007)

Percent of Population: Microscopic

Jewish Population by City: The island, city, and independent nation of Singapore are one and the same.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: Baghdadi Jews reached the British city/island/colony of Singapore in the mid-19th century by way of Bombay. They took full advantage of the favorable economic conditions created by the British colonial presence. They engaged in the opium trade and reinvested their profits in the import and export of other commodities and in land development. Because they spoke Arabic (and readily learned English but not Chinese) they tended to trade with other Baghdadi Jews as well as with ethnically Arab traders from the Hadramaut who had settled in Borneo, Burma, India, Java, Penang, and Sumatra.

Languages Spoken: English, Malay, Arabic, and some Chinese (Hokkien and Mandarin)

---

Historical Overview

By 1907, Baghdadi trader and stockbroker Nissim Adis had built Singapore's Grand Hotel de l'Europe. For his private residence Adis built Mount Sophia, described as "one of the finest mansions east of Suez." Menasseh Meyer was Singapore's supreme Jewish entrepreneur and, by one account, "the community's revered benefactor." He was born in Baghdad in 1846, raised in Calcutta, and arrived in Singapore in 1873 to join his uncle's opium trading business, the largest in the port. He expanded the firm's real estate holdings to include the Adelphi and Sea View hotels. By 1900, he owned about three fourths of the island. One contemporary described Meyer as "the richest Jew in the Far East," exceeding even the Sassoons, Harpoons, and Ka-doories of Shanghai and Hong Kong. Another source claims that Meyer "eventually owned more real estate in Singapore than any other person." In 1929, Meyer was knighted by Great Britain's King George V. By all accounts, Sir Menasseh dominated and shaped the identity of the Jewish community for 60 years.

In the nurturing political and economic environment of Singapore, traditional rabbinic Judaic belief intensified. Simultaneously, Jews embraced secular culture, participated in local politics, and developed a Zionist movement. Singapore historian Charles Buckley notes that the pioneering Jewish merchant Abraham Solomon, while having much to do with the synagogue, educated his children "in an English school here, an advantage Baghdad did not offer." Many Anglophilic Baghdadis, including Sir Menasseh, followed Solomon's example when it came to their children's education. Meyer also oversaw the building of the monumental Magen Aboth synagogue and its religious school. In 1905, after a disagreement over who should run Magen Aboth, he built a second palatial synagogue, Chesed El, adjacent to his home.

Magen Aboth Synagogue in Singapore. (Photo by Jono David)

Sir Menasseh was also devoted to building Jewish institutions in Palestine. His efforts were contemporaneous with those of European Zionists but of a quite different origin. He was influenced by the pre-Herzlian religious Zionism of Hakham Yoseph Hayim of Baghdad, who officiated there from 1859 to 1909 and inspired many Iraqi Jews to visit and dwell in the Holy Land. Meyer took his family on a journey to Jerusalem “to inculcate in them a love for Israel.” In Palestine he maintained a house for Talmudic study as well as a small synagogue for Baghdadi Jews. Meyer subsequently affiliated with Herzl’s World Zionist Organization. By 1921, Meyer contributed £3,000 to World Zionist Organization activities, the largest individual gift Anglo-Jewish emissary Israel Cohen received on his Asia/Pacific fund-raising tour of that year. In the following year, Meyer became the founding president of Singapore’s Zionist Society, an affiliate of Theodor Herzl’s worldwide organization. Meyer’s home then became, according to one contemporary, a “beehive” of Zionist activity. In 1922, when Albert Einstein passed through Singapore on a fund-raising mission for the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Meyer hosted a reception for 200 people that netted £10,000 of pledges for the fledgling school.

During Sir Menasseh’s later years, his daughter Mozelle Nissim broadened the scope of his Zionist philanthropy. In 1929, she committed £3,000 to build a school at Kfar Vitkin, then among the northernmost, and most strategically important, Jewish settlements in Palestine. Nissim quickly developed an international reputation for her charitable work. Zionist emissary to the Far East, A. Goldstein, writes back to the Zionist Executive that she “is really one of the best women our movement should be proud to have.”

After Sir Menasseh's death in 1930, the Zionism that he had promoted among Singapore Baghdadis continued to thrive. In early 1941, Singaporean Flora Shooker, in the tradition of her Baghdadi predecessors, established an educational trust for use in Palestine, Baghdad, and Singapore.

Singapore was overrun by the Japanese during World War II. Most of its Jews and other "enemy aliens" were incarcerated. In a major roundup on April 7, 1943, 481 Jews who were long established in the region were sent to the Sime Road camp. The men were later taken to Changi prison, where they suffered in horrendously overcrowded quarters. After the war the Baghdadi community and its Zionist movement rebounded. In 1955, one member of the community, David Saul Marshall ben Farha (1908–1995), was elected Singapore's first chief minister. In that capacity he gave Singapore its first measure of internal self-government and set the colony on its path to complete independence, which was achieved shortly after Marshall left office.

Jews enjoyed the same full equality in an independent Singapore as they had under the British colonial system. Singapore's long-term prime minister, Lee Kuan Yew, and other leaders of independent Singapore also came to realize that there was much to be learned from the newly independent Jewish state, Singapore's Zionists labored diligently to cultivate such ties with Israel. A March 1962 visit and lecture by Keren Hayesod's director, Shlomo Temkin, was followed by a series of trade and technical aid agreements between Singapore and Israel and continuing visits by public figures, ministers, and other senior officials.

In 1965, Israeli experts began to train Singapore's new armed forces. Israeli diplomats, consultants, and businesspeople arrived on temporary assignments and were informally referred to as "the Mexicans." In 1969, this process culminated in the establishment of full diplomatic relations and even closer military ties between Singapore and the Jewish state.

The strengthening of Baghdadi Jewish life in Singapore and the strengthening of ties between Singapore and Israel occurred simultaneously with the almost complete disintegration of Jewish communal life in Iraq. In 2007, the core of Jewish residents of Singaporean citizenship remained overwhelmingly Baghdadi. Indeed, if one wishes to see a functioning Baghdadi Jewish community in the early 21st century, one only needs to visit Singapore. The community consists of about 180 people. Joan Bieder, an American academic who attended a Sabbath service in one of the Baghdadi synagogues in Singapore in 2000, observed both the recent diversity and traditional characteristics of the community. She wrote:

On the right side sit the old-timers, the men of Baghdadi origin who lived through the Japanese occupation. On the left side sit the wealthier members of the community and the younger generation of Jews and expatriate Israelis, some of whom have become important, active members of the community . . . When Frank Benjamin, President of the Jewish Welfare Board, stepped down from participating in the Torah service, he walked the room and wishes Shabbat Shalom [Sabbath peace] to all. The gesture is heartfelt and inclusive, consistent with his determination to bring all Jews living in Singapore together.

Frank Benjamin and others are determined to keep their community vibrant without sacrificing the basic Orthodox traditions that inspired Singapore's first Baghdadi Jews in the early 19th century.

Selected Bibliography

- Bieder, Joan. 2003. "Jewish Identity in Singapore: Cohesion, Dispersion, Survival." Sino-Judaica 4: 54–55.
- Chee, Chan Heng. 1984. A Sensation of Independence: A Political Biography of David Marshall. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Cohen, Israel. 1956. A Jewish Pilgrimage. London: Valentine Mitchell.
- Nathan, Eze. 1986. History of Jews in Singapore. Singapore: Herbilu.
- Sharett, Moshe. 1964. Mi-shut Be-Asiyah: Yoman Masa [From Travelling in Asia: A Travel Diary]. Tel Aviv: Davar/Am Oved.
- Yegar, Moshe. 1974. "Le-Toldot Ha-Kehillah Ha-Yehudit Be-Singapoor" [On the History of the Jewish Community in Singapore]. Gesher 1 (78): 50–65.

Jews in Thailand

Jonathan Goldstein

---

General Population: Estimated at 17,324,581 (1956); 51,700,000 (1984); 55,600,000 (1989); 61,399,000 (2002); 63,693,660 (2004)

Jewish Population: Estimated at 1 (1683); 130 (1948); 40 (1954); 60–70 (1963); 300 (1983); 250 (1990); 250 resident and 100,000 per year transient, mostly Israeli (2007)

Percent of Population: Microscopic

Jewish Population by City: The resident Jewish population is almost entirely concentrated in Bangkok.

Migration Routes and Ethnic Backgrounds: For more than 400 years there have been Jewish travelers to the nation referred to internationally as Siam up to 1939 and as the Kingdom of Thailand ever since, with the exception of the years 1945–1949, when the name reverted to Siam. Overall, Thai Buddhism has been tolerant of Jews and Judaism, although intolerance may have occasionally been practiced by individuals. Indeed, the Jewish encounter with Thai Buddhism stands in contrast to the Jewish interaction with virulent Roman Catholicism in the Spanish Philippines and with Christian and Islamic fundamentalism in the Dutch East Indies and independent Indonesia.

The earliest literary reference to a Jewish presence in Siam appears in Marcello de Ribadeneira's 1601 History of the Philippines and Other Kingdoms. Ribadeneira describes some "Jews who having married Siamese women, worshipped in their own synagogues, where they preached the laws of Moses." The earliest fully documented record of a Jewish arrival in Siam occurs in 1683 when Abraham Navarro, a supercargo, negotiator, and interpreter aboard the British East India Company ship Delight, stopped in Siam en route to China.

Max Rosenberg is the first Jew recorded to have settled with his family in Bangkok, sometime between 1885 and 1890. He was born in Romania and went to Ceylon to become a tea exporter. He and his wife Rosa then migrated to Bangkok, where Rosenberg owned the Hotel Europe. Beginning in 1917, Jewish refugees from Soviet Russia began to arrive. The interwar years also saw the genesis of a resident Mizrachi, or Oriental Jewish, community. Yehuda Assia, originally from Iraq, and Isaac Djemal, originally from Aleppo, Syria, arrived in Bangkok via Kobe in the early 1940s. Their presence sparked an influx of Jews from their home countries as well as from Afghanistan, Egypt, Gibraltar, Iran, the Land of Israel, Libya, and Uzbekistan. Many Mizrachi Jews became dealers of precious stones and jewelry settings. They worshipped in private homes and with borrowed Torah scrolls until the organization of Even Chen Synagogue. For decades Aleppo-born Salim Eubani has been the lay leader of the Mizrachi community, the president of Even Chen since 1984, and an active participant in overall Jewish community affairs.

Languages Spoken: English, Hebrew, Thai, Arabic, Farsi

---

Historical Overview

Beginning in the late 1920s, the tiny Jewish community of Bangkok, along with much larger Jewish populations elsewhere in East and Southeast Asia, faced the prospect of confrontation with Imperial Japan as it edged toward an alliance with German Nazism. The situation in Bangkok was complex. There were historical grounds for trepidation on the part of Bangkok's Jewish community. King Rama VI, writing under a pseudonym sometime between 1910 and 1925, praised Japan and denounced Siam's resident Chinese as "the Jews of the East." This comment may simply have been an application of 20th-century European prejudice to the Chinese, a significantly large Siamese minority, as well as to the Jews, a microscopic Siamese minority. A much more troubling episode occurred in 1938 when, in a public lecture, the popular Thai writer Luang Wichit compared the Chinese in Siam to the Jews in Germany. Far from denouncing Hitler's treatment of the Jews, Wichit implied that Hitler's policies toward the Jews were worth considering vis-à-vis the Chinese of Siam. From 1938 to July 24, 1944, Colonel (later Field Marshal) Luang Phibunsongkhram served as prime minister. He also saw the authoritarian nationalism of Germany, Italy, and Japan as a possible model for Siam and aimed to glorify the Thai nation at the expense of its Chinese minority. Amid this troubling rhetoric, beginning in 1937, members of the Bangkok Jewish community nevertheless convinced the Siamese immigration authorities to allow approximately 120 German Jewish refugees to enter the country. Many came as capitalists.

The entire matter of further Jewish immigration became a moot point on December 7, 1941, with the escalation of war in the Pacific and Indian Oceans. Combat effectively closed commercial shipping lanes and terminated nonmilitary travel. On December 8, 1941, Japanese troops landed in the Gulf of Siam. The Japanese ambassador demanded transit rights across Thailand to Burma and Malaya. According to historian George Kahin, Phibunsongkhram chose "cooperation over the martyrdom of an independence which had been preserved through the worst of European imperialism." Phibunsongkhram's government permitted Japanese troops to be stationed in Thailand as "friendly allies." The tiny Jewish community of Thailand was a beneficiary of these machinations. In Thailand, unlike other Axis-occupied parts of Asia, resident Jews were never ghettoized or in any other way discriminated against. The pro-Japanese Thai government did arrest some Jewish refugees from Iraq, Syria, and Russia as potential collaborators from enemy countries and their assets were frozen, but incarcerated Jews were treated on precisely the same basis as non-Jewish “enemy aliens.” There was, in short, no explicitly anti-Semitic policy, discrimination, or persecution.

For many Jewish refugees, especially the Germans who spent the war years in Bangkok, the city had always been a port in a storm. Most left as soon as the war was over. In 1948, approximately 130 Jews remained in Thailand. Most of these were not religiously committed. In 1953, Israeli journalist Gershon Agron reported that the community had dwindled “almost [to the] vanishing point.” When ophthalmologist Franz Jacobsohn was appointed the first honorary Israeli consul in Thailand in 1954, he wrote pessimistically that “we have shrunk considerably to about 40. I wonder how many will attend the Purim party.”

But the community grew by other means. By 1973, near the end of America’s Vietnam War, there were approximately 100 Jewish families in Bangkok, 10 in Rajburi, 3 in Chiang Mai, and 1 in Kalasin. There were also approximately 20 American Jewish servicemen at nearby U.S. Air Force bases. There was at least one resident Jewish chaplain, Rabbi David Sobel, a Reform rabbi from West Hartford, Connecticut, who died tragically in an automobile accident in Bangkok. After American forces left Thailand in 1975–1979 the Jewish community again dwindled to 35 families and a handful of single people. It vacillated between 300 individuals in 1983, 250 individuals and 100 families in 1984, and 75 families in 1987.

As early as 1954, there was a loosely organized, officially unregistered Jewish communal structure in Thailand. Religious services were held in private homes on the High Holidays and occasionally on the Sabbath. In 1960, Singapore’s Jewish Welfare Board presented Bangkok’s Jews with a Torah scroll. In 1964, the Jewish Association of Thailand (JAT) formally registered as a legal organization. Under Thai law only Thai citizens or Thai corporations could own property, so it was important that JAT be officially recognized. The Thai citizens on the JAT Board filled this requirement, although none were ethnic Thais. Both Henry and Michael Gerson served as long-term presidents of JAT. In 1969, Elizabeth Zerner gave JAT land off Sukhumvit Road with a house that could be used for a synagogue. Zerner’s will provided additional funds to replace that old structure and build a new community center, which opened in 1981. In 1975, the community received a jolt of religiosity in the form of a surprise visit from a Rabbi Zohn of New York. He arrived because of a rerouted KLM flight that was originally scheduled to land in Bombay. Zohn lectured to the community and motivated some of its unobservant members to newfound religiosity. Several sought religious education outside Thailand and ultimately immigrated to Israel.

In 1988, JAT consisted of approximately 300 individuals in 70–80 families, a status it retained as of 2007. It is an ethnic mix of Jews from Afghanistan, Australia, Egypt, Europe, Gibraltar, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Libya, Syria, the United States, and Uzbekistan. Most members are lawyers, financial consultants, gem dealers, and other types of businesspeople. Bangkok has three Orthodox synagogues, Beth Elisheva, Even Chen, and Ohr Menachem. Beth Elisheva and Even Chen are independent corporate entities.

All three Bangkok synagogues are serviced to a greater or lesser extent by rabbis from Chabad, the worldwide Hasidic religious and social welfare organization. Chabad Rabbi Yosef Kantor serves as communal ritual slaughter and kashruth supervisor. As of 2007, Even Chen pays part of Kantor's salary. On practically every Sabbath morning he makes the long trek from Sukhumvit to Even Chen, which is located on the opposite side of Bangkok in the Shangrila Hotel. Furthermore, because he does not return home until nightfall, he runs a class before the evening service. When Kantor is away other young men from the Chabad House in Khao San assist with Even Chen's services and kashruth supervision.

Chabad also helps run a religious school, ritual bath, cemetery, and kosher restaurant in Bangkok. Beyond Bangkok, it maintains centers in Chiang Mai, Phuket, and Ko Samui. In 2005, Chabad and several other important international Jewish organizations provided valuable assistance to Jewish and non-Jewish victims of the tsunami that devastated coastal Thailand. These multiple services have led some Bangkok Jewish residents to speak of "the chabadization" of Thailand.

Zionism and an Israeli Presence in Thailand

The connections of Thailand and its resident Jews to the Zionist movement and the State of Israel go back decades. On August 22, 1918, at the request of Shanghai Zionist Association president Elly S. Kadoorie, Siamese prince and foreign minister Devawongse Varoprakar (1858–1923) publicly called for the creation of a Jewish homeland in what had been the Ottoman Turkish province of Palestine. Siam thus became the first Asian and first non-Christian nation to issue a pro-Zionist declaration. Because of turmoil at home, Prince Wan Waithayakorn, the Thai delegate to the United Nations, was not present in New York for the November 29, 1947, partition resolution that led to the creation of the State of Israel. Nevertheless, Thailand's friendliness to the Jewish state was demonstrated on June 23, 1954, when it established full diplomatic relations with Israel. The Jewish state was represented in Bangkok by an honorary consul general until 1958, when a permanent embassy was established. Thailand opened a trade office in Israel in 1988 and an embassy in 1996.

Political and diplomatic relations have remained low key. There have been low-level visits of the Thai royal family to Israel. No sitting head of state of either country has ever visited the other's country, however. Israeli visitors to Thailand have included the former prime minister Moshe Sharett; Yitzhak Rabin in his capacity as army chief of staff; and Moshe Dayan, Abba Eban, Golda Meir and Shimon Peres in their capacities as foreign ministers.

The two countries nevertheless enjoy extensive cultural and economic ties. In 1974 a Thai-Israel Friendship Foundation was founded in Bangkok. It is similar to associations that Israel, China, the Soviet Union and many other countries established around the world to promote cultural ties. In 1990, a Thai-Israel Chamber of Commerce was established in Bangkok. It annually takes about 20 Thai businesspeople to Israel. As a result of this and other focused promotional activity, between 1990 and 1996 bilateral trade expanded from $166 million to $500 million. By 2004 bilateral trade had expanded to $777 million.

The centerpiece of Thai-Israeli economic cooperation has been the agricultural projects sponsored by MASHAV, the Israeli Foreign Ministry's Center for International Cooperation. MASHAV began operating in Thailand at the personal initiative of Foreign Minister Golda Meir, who wrote in her autobiography that "I am prouder of Israel's International Cooperation Program . . . than I am of any other single project we have ever undertaken." Large-scale bilateral cooperation began in 1966 in Hup Kapong and lasted for five years. In that royally approved project, Israeli experts advised 130 Thai farm owners on collective and cooperative farming based on the models of the Israeli kibbutz and moshav. Between 1973 and 1983, 730 Thais traveled to Israel for professional training, and 29 were enrolled as of 2004. In that same year 342 Thais participated in MASHAV courses taught in Thailand by Israeli experts. In 1970, Israeli experts began teaching irrigation techniques at Khon Kaen University. On January 23, 2004, in the presence of HRH Princess Maha Chakri Sirirhorn, that university opened a permanent Thai-Israel Techno-Demo Unit for irrigated high-value crops.

Israel has exported large amounts of military hardware to Thailand, including Uzi submachine guns, Gabriel sea-to-sea missiles, communications and electronic intelligence systems. In 1979, Israel sold Thailand the Arava, a short-distance take-off reconnaissance aircraft; in the 1980s, the Python air-to-ground missile; and in 2005, a more advanced version, the Python IV. In 1993, Thailand and Israel signed an aviation agreement. As of 2007, Israel's national carrier, El Al, and charter company, Israir, provide nonstop service between Bangkok and Tel Aviv. Thailand has waived requirements for Israelis to obtain visas before arrival, sparking an onrush of tourists. Most are backpackers who have just completed their basic army service and make up about 60,000 of an estimated 100,000 Israelis visiting Thailand each year. Chabad maintains six Hebrew-speaking campuses in Thailand to minister to the social and religious needs of these travelers. Additionally, since 1994 a growing number of Thais have been working in Israel in the agricultural sector; about 30,000 were employed in that capacity in 2007.

Selected Bibliography

- Assia, Yehuda. 2005. Ha-gesharim shel Chayai: Baghdad, Kobe, Japan, Bangkok, Geneva, Tel Aviv [Bridges of My Life: Baghdad, Kobe, Japan, Bangkok, Geneva, Tel Aviv] Tel Aviv: no publisher given.
- Embassy of Israel. 2004. Reflections on 50 Years of Friendship: A Jubilee of Diplomatic Relations between the Kingdom of Thailand and the State of Israel 1954–2004. Bangkok: Embassy of Israel.
- Fischel, Walter J. 1956. "Abraham Navarro—Jewish Interpreter and Diplomat in the Service of the English East India Company (1682–1692)." In Proceedings of the American Academy for Jewish Research 25 (Part One): 39–62.
- Kahin, George M. 1969. Governments and Politics of Southeast Asia. Ithaca: Cornell University Press; 19–23.
- Kashani, Reuven. 1982. Kehillot Ha-yehudim Ba-mizrah Ha-rahok [Communities of Jews in the Far East]. Jerusalem: Sephardic Council.

Glossary of Diaspora Concepts, Themes, Names, Places, People, and Organizations

Abravanel, Benvenida (ca. 1473–ca. 1560) Influential and wealthy Jewish woman during the Italian Renaissance.

Adler, Hermann Son of Nathan Marcus Adler; British chief rabbi, 1891–1911

Adler, Nathan Marcus British chief rabbi 1845–1890

ADMOR Acronym for Adoneinu Moreinu ve-Rabeinu (our master, our teacher, and our rabbi). The term is used in reference to the Hasidic rebbes.

Agape Love feast; a meal celebrated by early Christians on Sunday.

Aggadah The nonlegal contents of the Talmud and midrash, including ethical and moral teaching, theological speculation, and legends.

Agudat Ha-Rabonim An organization of rabbis; the umbrella organization of American Orthodox rabbis in the 1940s.

Agudat Hasidei Habad An organization of Habas Hasidim (Aguch), established in the 1930s, which became the umbrella organization for other Habad enterprises.

Agudat Israel A political organization that was started in Germany in 1912 to oppose political Zionism and spread to Israel and the United States. Presently, it represents ultra-Orthodoxy, is involved with political Zionism, and has a strong Hasidic representation.

agunah (pl. agunot) A woman whose husband is missing or has deserted her and who may not remarry until she gives proof of his death or obtains a bill of divorce.

Ahavah Rabbah/Ahavat Olam Prayers said once in the morning and once in the evening acknowledging the gift of Torah.

Ahenu b'Eretz Israel Means “Our brethren in the Land of Israel.”

ahi temimim “My Pure Brothers”; the name of RaYYaZ’s old boys’ organization comprising ex-yeshiva students from the Lubavitch yeshiva system. Originally an Eastern European organization, it was established in the United States in the 1930s.

Ahiever A youth Zionist organization in Baghdad in the beginning of the 1930s.

Aleinu A prayer said at the end of every service.

Aleppo Codex Hebrew manuscript of the Bible written by the scribe Shlomo Ben Buya’a during the first half of the 10th century (or 896) and then verified, vocalized, and annotated by Aaron Ben-Asher in Tiberias.

alienation This sociological term refers to a person or group’s sense of distance from and uninvolvedness with the dominant society. Jews, because of their minority status, have often been associated with such an experience. Many anthropologists and sociologists consider alienation a sign of modernity in the Western world and Jews as emblematic of that condition.

aliyah Hebrew word meaning “ascent” or “going up.” It is widely used to refer to Jewish immigration to the State of Israel. Originally it was the ultimate goal of members of the Zionist movement.

aliyah, second Immigration to Israel, then called Palestine, of Jews between 1904 and 1914, mainly from Russia. This group established Israel’s first kibbutz and the city of Tel Aviv.

Alliance Israelite Universelle (AIU) The AIU was founded in France in the mid-18th century in response to the rise in anti-Semitism related to the Damascus Affair. The AIU’s goal is to protect human rights of Jews as citizens of countries where they live. The - organization focuses on education and professional development and operates a number of Jewish day schools, many in the Middle East.

- Ameinu The successor of the Labor Zionist Alliance, Ameinu has a 100-year history and works for a progressive Israel and America.
- America-Israel Friendship League A nonprofit organization dedicated to strengthening ties between the United States and Israel.
- American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) The prominent force of advocacy in support of Israel in the United States; AIPAC has 100,000 members in the 50 states.
- American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) American-based global charitable organization that provides humanitarian assistance to global Jewish communities.
- American Zionist Movement (AZM) The American affiliate of the World Zionist Organization, the AZM is a coalition of Zionist groups and individuals.
- Americans for Israel and Torah (AMIT) This group supports Israeli youth from diverse backgrounds and bolsters frameworks of academic achievement, religious values, and Zionist commitment.
- Amidah From the Hebrew word la 'amod, meaning “to stand,” and used to describe the prayer also known as the Eighteen Benedictions, which is recited three times daily by Jews and is a series of blessings at the center of every religious service.
- Amir, Eli An Israeli writer who was born in Baghdad in 1937 and immigrated to Israel via Kibbutz Mishmar Haemek at the age of 13. The author of four novels, Amir has served in various public roles, including work as an adviser on Arab affairs in the prime minister’s office and as an emissary in the United States.
- Amishav An organization formed in 1975 by Rabbi Eliyahu Avichail to search for descendants of the lost tribes of Israel and help them return to the Jewish fold. The group worked in particular with members of the Chin-Kuki-Mizo communities of northeast India who identified as descendants of the tribe of Manasseh and with Peruvian villagers Avichail designated the Benei Moshe, arranging the immigration of hundreds of members to Israel, where they studied for conversion to Judaism.
- Amram Ga’on A Babylonian rabbinic authority in the ninth century.
- Anderson, Benedict Benedict Richard O’Gorman Anderson was born in China on August 26, 1938, and is a professor emeritus at Cornell University. His book Imagined Communities: Reflections on the Origin and Spread of Nationalism (New York: Verso, 1983) argues that national identity is culturally constructed. His approach valorizes members of communities living in exile or Diaspora and can be understood to affirm the Jewish Diaspora experience.
- Antichrist, the This term, which appears in the New Testament, was used by Christian theologians to identify the false messiah whom God will allow Satan to send to the Jews because they refuse to believe in the true Messiah, Jesus. According to Christian folklore in the Middle Ages, the Antichrist, the son of the devil and a Jewish prostitute, would rule for a period of years in desolation and brutality until a great climactic battle between “Jewish evil” and “Christian good” would inaugurate the reign of heaven.
- Antioch A city in Syria (now Turkey) with a noted Jewish community.
- anti-Semitic laws Laws, adopted in 1940, and modeled on Nuremberg racist legislation.
- anti-Semitism Basically, fear and hatred of the Jews. The term applies to all negative ideas about and feelings and behavior toward Jews; it can be expressed as avoidance, anti-locution, calumny, discrimination, assault, expropriation, expulsion, physical attack, torture, murder, and mass murder.
- anusim (Hebrew) “The forced ones”; term preferred, along with bnei anusim (offspring of anusim), by many crypto-Jews in Spain and Portugal today, especially to avoid the pejorative term “Marrano.”

- Aristotelians Disciples of the ancient Greek philosopher Aristotle (384–322 BCE) who functioned in the Greek and Roman empires and influenced subsequent Muslim, Jewish, and European Christian philosophers
- Ashkenaz Identified as a great grandson of Noah in Genesis 10:3, and as one of the kingdoms that would rise up to destroy Babylon in Jeremiah 51:27. By medieval times, Ashkenaz came to mean Germany, and Jews from Germany are known as Ashkenazim. This designation, contrasted with Sephardim, embraces Jews of a particular cultural-religious tradition, which spread from France and Germany through to Northern and Eastern Europe, and remains the tradition of most of the Jews in North and South America, Australia, and South Africa. It embraces a distinct system of pronouncing Hebrew and its own liturgical and Halachic traditions, the historical use of Yiddish or Judaeo-German as a spoken language in locations far removed from Germany, and a shared cuisine. Although significant differences have developed between the traditions of Poland and Germany, these are relatively minor compared with the differences from the Sephardim. Although most of the Jews murdered during the Holocaust were Ashkenazim, today they are significantly more numerous than Jews of all other backgrounds.
- Ashkenazification Long-term influence of Ashkenazic Jewry on the community, which resulted in the loss of Judeo-Arabic culture.
- Asociación Mutual Israelita Argentina (AMIA) One of the principal Jewish institutions in Buenos Aires, Argentina. The AMIA suffered a terrorist attack on July 18, 1994, in which 86 people perished in an explosion that destroyed the building housing the AMIA.
- Aufklärung The German word for “Enlightenment,” the term has also come to denote the specific German version of Enlightenment thought, centered on such individuals as Christian Wolff, G. E. Lessing, Moses Mendelssohn, and Immanuel Kant, which in some significant ways differed from its counterparts in Britain, France, and elsewhere.
- Auschwitz The largest German extermination camp used by the Nazis during the Holocaust (full name Auschwitz-Birkenau). Situated in Poland (Auschwitz being the German name for the Polish town Ozwiecim), it is estimated that 1.1 million people died in this camp, at least 90 percent of whom were Jews.
- Avichail, Eliyahu A Jerusalem rabbi who took on the task of searching for the lost tribes of Israel in the belief that the coming of the Messiah was imminent and restoring the tribes could hasten his appearance. To that end, Avichail founded the organization Amishav in 1975.
- Avinu Malkenu (Our Father, our King) A prayer used on solemn occasions.
- Ba’al Shem Tov (Master of the Good Name) Refers to the leader of the Hasidic movement —Yisrael, the son of Eliezer, in particular; however, many Ba’alei Shem were believed to be practicing in Eastern Europe in that period. This name suggests that the “master” may manipulate and recite the “good name” of God in secret combinations, thus wielding mystical powers and being able to perform wonders.
- Ba’al Teshuva A newly repentant Jew.
- Baba Sali Synagogue A Sephardi congregation in Sydney between 1994 and 2003, which met in the premises of the South Head Synagogue. Formed by Rabbi Joseph Bendavid, it attracted a predominantly Hebrew-speaking congregation, Jews from North Africa and the Middle East who had lived in Israel before settling in Australia.
- Babylonian Exile The period and situation of Jewish existence in Babylonia caused by the deportations from Judah at the beginning of the sixth century BCE.
- Baghdadi The Anglo-Indian name given to the community of Jews of Middle Eastern origin who settled in Indian port cities during the British raj.
- Bar Kokhba revolt Bar Kokhba was a Jewish revolutionary leader who led a revolt against Rome with the intention of reestablishing an independent Jewish state in the Land of Israel. One of Bar Kokhba's few rabbinic followers was Rabbi Aqiba, who hailed Bar Kokhba as the long-awaited messianic king. The Bar Kokhba revolt followed the first war against Rome, fought in the Land of Israel, both in Galilee and then in Judea, from 67 through 73 CE. The war reached its climax in August of 70 CE, when on the ninth day of the Hebrew month of Ab, the Temple was captured and burned by the Romans. Resistance continued for some time. The Bar Kokhba revolt, also referred to as the second war against Rome, was fought from 132 through 135 CE, probably in the expectation that after three generations had passed, Israel would regain Jerusalem, as had happened in the aftermath of the loss of Jerusalem to the Babylonians in 586 BCE and its restoration three generations later, under Cyrus of Persia. The war was fiercely fought against Rome at the height of its power. When it was over, Jews were forbidden from entering Jerusalem, and the Temple was plowed over and a pagan temple was constructed in its place.

- bar mitzvah Rite of passage to adulthood for males; takes place in the 13th year of birth.
- bath mitzvah Rite of passage to adulthood for females; it takes place in the 12th year of birth.
- Bayazid (1481–1512) As sultan he granted privileges to Jews in the Ottoman Empire.
- beit midrash Torah study hall; an institution of higher Jewish learning.
- bek Title of the king of Khazaria, also identified by the Hebrew term mlk/melekh. The bek held most of the political and military power in Khazaria during the Jewish era.
- ben Asher, Jacob The author of the first printed book in the printing house in Constantinople (1493).
- Bene Israel The largest Jewish community of India, originating in the coastal Konkan villages south of Bombay. The Bene Israel have a tradition that they are descendants of seven men and seven women, survivors of a shipwreck, who were washed up near the village of Navgaon many centuries ago. They became integrated into the caste system of the region as specialists in sesame oil production but did not work on the Sabbath. While retaining only a rudimentary knowledge of Judaism, they were keen to accept rabbinical Judaism when they came into contact with the Jews of Cochin in the 18th century and with Baghdadi Jews who settled in Bombay during the 19th century.
- Benei Menashe Judaizing community that has developed in the states of Manipur, Mizoram, and Assam in northeast India and the state of Chin in Burma since the 1970s. Its members identify as descendants of the biblical tribe of Manasseh.
- Benjamin of Tudela A Spanish Jew famed for his travels to Jewish Diaspora communities throughout Europe and Asia from 1160 to 1173, which he documented in Sefer ha-Masa'ot (The Book of Travels). He frequently noted the population sizes and customs of these communities and mentioned the names of their most prominent members. He also documented some of the Jews' occupations.
- Benonia (Vidin) Ancient center of Jewish life in Roman Empire.
- Ben-Yehuda, Eliezer (1858–1922, born Perelman) A Hebrew revivalist.
- Bernard of Clairvaux (1090–1153) A Cistercian monk and promoter of the Second Crusade (1147–1149). Bernard denounced the violence against Jews in Europe by crusading Christians on their way to Palestine, but his treatise, "In Praise of the New Knighthood," written to encourage the Knights Templar to seize Jerusalem from "infidel" Muslims, contributed to the climate of fanaticism that made attacks on Jews possible.
- Beroia Ancient center of Jewish life in Roman Empire.
- Besamim Rosh (Chief Spices; Exodus 30:23) Spurious responsa attributed to R. Asher ben Yehiel.
- Bet Yosef—The Caro Synagogue Congregation following the Sephardic tradition, formed in Sydney in 1992 after Rabbi Marc Sevy left the Sephardi synagogue. Members of this congregation tend to be more observant than other Sephardi congregations in the city.

beth (pl. batei) din A rabbinical court.

Bevis Marks Synagogue in London, founded in 1656 by Portuguese Jews from the Netherlands; the central institution of Sephardi Jewish life in England.

Big Aliyah The biggest wave of immigrants to Israel (1948–1949).

Bildung The closest translation of this key German word is “education,” but this does not completely cover the full sense of what Bildung stood for in 19th-century German liberal bourgeois society. Bildung meant both a form of German humanist, liberal arts education as well as a sense that this educational form would realize both the aesthetic and moral potential of the individual being or gebildet. The sense of moral improvement implicit in the concept was particularly appreciated by the ideologues of Jewish emancipation and hence the need for Bildung became a central tenet of the ideology of emancipation that was so central to 19th-century Central European Jewish culture and thought.

Biltmore Conference Held in the Biltmore Hotel in New York City in May 1942. Representatives of Zionist and non-Zionist organizations convened what was called an “extraordinary Zionist conference” and issued (in what became known as the Biltmore Program) a call for unlimited Jewish immigration to Mandatory Palestine and the establishment of a Jewish Commonwealth.

Black Code A law signed by Louis XIV in 1689 stipulating the expulsion of the Jews from the French Caribbean islands in America.

blood libel Accusing a particular group of killing people as human sacrifice and using their blood in various rituals. A common point of slander used against the Jews in medieval Christianized Europe.

B'nai B'rith lodge A local chapter of the organization B'nai B'rith, a world Jewish service organization.

Bnai Zion Founded in 1908, Bnai Zion is a charitable organization that supports humanitarian projects in Israel and the United States.

Bodo Chaplain to the court of Carolingian emperor Louis the Pious, Bodo caused a stir when he converted to Judaism in 838 and engaged in public disputations over the relative truth of the Jewish and Christian religions.

Bolshevik Revolution A major social upheaval in Russia in 1917, which overthrew the monarchy of the czar and replaced it with a communist regime known as the Soviet Union.

bride wealth Patrilineal societies consider women to be valuable resources of lineage continuation, sexuality, and work force. Upon marriage, the groom's lineage acquires the rights to the bride's powers of childbearing and sexuality and the bride's lineage by paying bride wealth in money and/or property.

Buallawn The village where Chhallianthanga preached and where a Judaizing sect arose in Mizoram in northeast India.

Bukharan Jews The indigenous Jews of Central Asia. The group takes its name from the city of Bukhara in Uzbekistan.

Bukovina Acquired from the Ottoman Empire by Austria in 1775, this territory on the eastern borderland of the Habsburg monarchy had as its capital Czernowitz (Cernauti), where a German-speaking university was established in 1875. Almost one third of Czernowitz's population was Jewish around 1910.

Bulgaria One of the oldest European states, Jews have lived there more than 20 centuries.

Bund General Jewish Workers' Union, a secular, socialist Jewish party opposed to Jewish religious life. It was founded in Vilna in 1897 to support Jewish national rights. It was Yiddishist and anti-Zionist and operated in Eastern Europe from the 1890s to the 1930s.

Bwl'n (Bulan) The first king (melekh) of the Khazars to practice Judaism. He was also known as Sabriel.

- caliphate The Islamic state established after the death of the Muslim prophet Muhammad in 632 CE; it became a vast empire resulting from conquests in the following decades.
- Carolingian dynasty The princely house founded by Pepin the Short in 751 and reaching its greatest extent under Charlemagne (742–814), who unified most of the Christian states of Western Europe under his rule. The dynasty fell in 887 with the deposition of Charles III (“the Fat”) but returned intermittently to power until 987. Carolingian rulers generally treated the Jews well, seeing them as useful contacts in the Mediterranean trade.
- Carvajal, Luis de Jewish victim of the Spanish Inquisition in 16th-century Mexico. Famous for the detailed written accounts of his persecution.
- catholicos The representative leader of Persian Christianity recognized by the Sasanian Dynasty. This position, held by the bishop of Seleucia, probably began in the fourth century CE.
- Cattaoui, Moise de (1850–1924) Member of a leading Egyptian Jewish family and president of the Jewish community of Cairo, Egypt, for more than 50 years.
- Central Conference of American Rabbis (CCAR) The CCAR, which was founded in 1889 by Rabbi Isaac Mayer Wise, is the principal organization of Reform rabbis in the United States. The CCAR publishes responsa, resolutions, and platforms, but in keeping with the principles of Reform Judaism, their positions are nonbinding on individual rabbis or congregations.
- Central Council of Jews in Germany The official representative of German Jewry. Its aim is to promote and foster religious and cultural activities within local Jewish communities and to look after Jewish political interests. One important aspect of this work is to integrate Jewish immigrants from the former Soviet Union by providing language courses, political education, religious instruction, and other integration measures. Additionally, the Central Council aims to promote understanding and mutual respect between Jews and non-Jews in Germany. On the international level, the group maintains close links with Jewish communities around the world.
- Chabad A Jewish religious movement, considered the most intellectual of the Hasidic movements that originated in Eastern Europe in the early 19th century.
- Challianthanga Catechist with the United Pentecostal Church in Mizoram. After what he understood to be a divine revelation in 1951, he began to preach that the Mizos were descendants of Israelites and had to return to the practices ordained in the Bible. He founded a colony of people who sought to follow the precepts given to Israelites in the Bible, while retaining a belief in Jesus as the Messiah.
- Champagne During the 12th and 13th centuries, this region of France was ruled by counts who were independent of the French monarchy. The region prospered because of its rich agriculture—most famously its wines—and seasonal commercial fairs. Champagne was home to the great biblical and Talmudic commentator Rashi (1040–1105) of Troyes and many of his successors, the Tosafists.
- chavruta Study in pairs; a traditional method of Torah (particularly Talmud) study whereby two individuals grapple with a text, studying, analyzing, and discussing the passages together to arrive at a better understanding of the text.
- chevra kadisha A Jewish burial society.
- Chin-Kuki-Mizo Terms used to refer to a coterie of around 45 related tribes in northeast India and northwest Burma. Most have accepted Christianity, although a judaizing movement among them arose during the second half of the 20th century (the Benei Menashe). The terms “Chin,” which is used in Burma, and “Kuki,” which is used in India, were general terms for these tribes, imposed from outside their communities. Members chose a term of their own, “Mizo,” meaning “hill people,” to identify themselves. However, this term has come to be identified with the residents of the territory known as Mizoram since 1952, making it problematic as a term for people not residing there.

- Chmielnicki massacre Massacre of tens of thousands of Ukrainian Jews between 1648 and 1649. Bogdan Chmielnicki led a campaign to incite the Cossacks against the Jews in his attempt to rid the Ukraine of Polish domination.
- Christian Socialism (Austria) The roots of the Christian Social Party go back to the early 1880s when artisans launched anti-Semitic protests against the supposedly Jewish perpetrators of their economic distress. An alliance of Catholic social theorists, democratic radicals, lower-middle-class economic anti-Semites, German nationalist racial anti-Semites, and opportunist politicians led in 1887 to the formation of the United Christians in 1887 under the leadership of Karl Lueger. Under the name of the Christian Socials, this group then took power in Vienna's city council in 1895 and did not relinquish it until 1918. The party combined shrewd populist propaganda and an extensive program of municipal socialism with an often vitriolic rhetoric of anti-Semitism, which was reflected in several discriminatory policies against Jews.
- Chufut-Qal'eh (Chufut-Kale) A city near Bâhçe-Sarây that saw Jewish settlement activity by the 14th century. Originally called Qırqyer, it served as the capital of the Crimean khanate for 100 years. After the khanate transferred the capital to Bâhçe-Sarây, Qırqyer became known by its new name, Chufut-Qal'eh, meaning "Fortress of the Jews" and continued to be the home of an important Karaite Jewish community.
- Churachandpur The second-largest town in Mamipur. Here, in around 1976, T. Daniel introduced Judaic practices to the region. Until then, judaizing groups had sought to combine observance of the precepts ordained in the Jewish Bible with faith in Jesus as Messiah.
- circumcision The removal of the foreskin of males, performed ritually for Jewish males, normally on the eighth day after birth or upon conversion to Judaism. It is considered the sign of the divine covenant with Abraham, as described in Genesis 17:1–14 and Leviticus 12:3.
- City Committee for Assistance of Haganah Volunteer organization set up in 1947, under the auspices of the consistory, to support Israeli army.
- Cochin (Kochi) A port on the coast of Kerala in southwest India that has been home for a significant Jewish community since at least 1341.
- Cohen, Shalome Merchant and jeweler from Aleppo in Syria, who became the first Jewish settler in Calcutta in 1797; he attracted around him a community of Iraqi and Syrian Jews. He was appointed court jeweler to the nawab of Lucknow in 1816.
- Comtat-Venaissin A papal enclave in the Provence region of southern France, including the cities of Carpentras and (from the 14th century) Avignon. Outside the jurisdiction of the French crown, the comtat became a refuge to Jews who were expelled from France in 1394, and subsequently from independent Provence in the 15th century. Confined to ghettos and subjected to humiliating restrictions, they nevertheless developed a vibrant form of Judaism with its own Judeo-Provençal liturgy and literature. Many Jews from the comtat migrated to Bordeaux and Bayonne in southwestern France in the 18th century, where they formed separate communities alongside the Portuguese Sephardim.
- Conservative Judaism This American Jewish movement began as a rejection of Reform Judaism in the United States. It drew on the Positive Historical School of Judaism founded by Zechariah Frankel in Germany. In the United States, Solomon Schechter, who shaped the movement through his tenure as head of the Jewish Theological Seminary, made Zionism an important part of the movement.
- Constantine Constantine ruled as emperor from 306 until his death in 337 and made Constantinople (modern Istanbul) his capital and Christianity the official religion of the Roman Empire.
- converso The term for a Spanish or Portuguese Jew who had to convert to Catholicism under the pressure of persecution in the 15th and 16th centuries.

- covenant This theological concept claims that God has a special relationship with the Jewish people. Some Jews emphasize the role of a chosen land, the Land of Israel, as part of this covenant. Other Jews claim that covenant depends on obedience to Jewish laws independent of national status and that Jews in the Diaspora live a covenantal life no less than those in the State of Israel.
- Cranganore The Anglo-Indian name for the town of Koungallur (Malayalam), a former capital city known to the Romans as Muziris and in the Jewish world as Shingly. Cranganore is the ancestral home of the Jews of Cochin.
- Cresson, Warder (1798–1860) Born a Quaker in Philadelphia, Cresson converted to Judaism and in the 1840s became the first American consul in Jerusalem. After changing his name to Michael Boaz Israel, he circulated plans for the agricultural development of the Holy Land.
- crypto-Jew A hidden or secret Jew; the term was in use especially in Spain and Portugal during the Inquisition.
- Cyrus the Great (ca. 585–529 BCE) The first Achaemenian emperor of Persia, Cyrus issued a decree in 538 BCE that gave permission to Jews who had been exiled by the Babylonians to return home.
- dayan (pl. dayanim) A judge in a rabbinical court.
- Decalogue The ten words or Ten Commandments publicly revealed to the people of Israel at Mount Sinai as described in Exodus 20:1–17 and Deuteronomy 5:6–21 and written on the two stone tablets of the covenant.
- Deutero-Isaiah Designation for the anonymous biblical prophet whose words are preserved in chapters 40–55 of the book of Isaiah.
- Development Corporation for Israel/State of Israel Bonds Since 1951, sales of Israel bonds have helped Israel's Finance Ministry support projects in key sectors. Bond sales have exceeded $25 billion.
- dhimma, dhimmi, dhimmitude Translated as “protection” or “covenant,” the legal and social condition in Islam whereby indigenous non-Muslim people were subjected to Islamic rule and protected from the rules of jihad against infidels by their submission to Islamic supremacy without fighting. These were the “People of the Book” (mostly Jews and Christians); they were afforded communal autonomy and religious liberty in exchange for subservient social status and a head tax, called jizya, in exchange for military protection and religious autonomy. According to the Koran, dhimmi status did not entitle Jews to the same or equal rights as Muslim citizens.
- di groyse aktie Yiddish for “the great action,” where many Jews were killed in a mass murder raid in Lithuania in October 1941.
- Diaspora A term from ancient Greek meaning “a scattering” or “sowing of seeds.” It is used to describe any ethnic group forced or induced to leave their traditional ethnic homeland. It is commonly used to describe Jewish communities living outside the Land of Israel. It is often translated to the Hebrew word galut, or exile, although the Hebrew word tefutzot (dispersions) is the more exact equivalent. Usually this term implies a more favorable view to these communities, although Jeremiah 25:34 uses the term in conjunction with the slaughter of Jews. Diaspora, then, may be used to indicate a neutral view of Jewish dispersion, a favorable view, or even a negative view. Medieval Christian theologians interpreted the Diaspora as divine punishment for the crucifixion and rejection of Jesus.
- Didache An early Christian document dating from the second or third century outlining early church discipline.
- din (pl. dinei) Torah A rabbinical arbitration.
- divine presence (in Hebrew, Shekhinah) A Talmudic concept representing God's dwelling and immanence in the created world, especially among the people of Israel.

- dual residence Jews have been accused of having a divided loyalty to the nation in which they live and to world Jewry or to Jews in the State of Israel. Mordecai M. Kaplan coined the term “dual residence” as a contrast to either “dual loyalty” or “dual citizenship.” Jews, he claimed, could see themselves as living fully in two places—their Diaspora home and the Land of Israel. Such dual residence did not, he argued, entail any ambivalence toward either of the two places in which someone would reside.
- Dubnow, Simon (1860–1941) Born in White Russia, Dubnow later became one of the founding fathers of modern Jewish historiography. Besides his monumental book, History of the Jewish People, he dedicated many years to research on the Hasidic movement and East European anti-Semitism. He was murdered by the Nazis in Riga in the Rumbula massacre.
- East From biblical times to the present, Jews have faced Jerusalem when they pray. As Jews moved westward away from Israel, east came to symbolize Jerusalem, the source of Jewish faith and national memory. East became a holy direction in Jewish prayer, and a seat on the eastern wall of the synagogue became a sign of high social status. In many Jewish homes, a calligraphic design called a mizrach hangs on the eastern wall to aid meditation and prayer and to orient the Jewish householder toward Jerusalem.
- Eastern Jewish Association An organization catering to the religious needs of some of the Sephardi Jews in Sydney, Australia. Formed as a breakaway group from the New South Wales Association of Sephardim in 1960, the association attracted a membership largely among Jews of Iraqi origin from India, Burma, and other East Asian settlements. Although it fostered some social and cultural activities in its early years, its main function has been the organization of religious services during the High Holy Days.
- ecumenical council An assembly of bishops and priests from all parts of the known world to discuss and regulate matters of church doctrine and discipline.
- Edirne A town in the Ottoman Empire that was populated with Jews after 1496.
- Egeria A religious woman who made a pilgrimage in the fourth century to the holy places in the Land of Israel and left a description of her travels and the early Christian liturgies in Jerusalem.
- Eghegis Located in southeastern Asia, Eghegis was a small city during the Middle Ages, but the population gradually shrank until it became a town and eventually merely a village. During the period when Jews are known to have lived in Eghegis, the Orbelian family of princes resided in the city and this region of Armenia was prosperous.
- Elephantine A city on an island in the Nile; the site of an ancient Jewish community.
- Elias, Benjamin Nissim A Calcutta Jew who developed a large range of commercial and manufacturing concerns across India, which came to be a major source of employment for members of the community.
- Elijah Biblical prophet who lived in the ninth century BCE during the reign of King Ahab and Queen Jezebel. By the end of the prophetic period, the biblical figure of Elijah achieved legendary stature as a harbinger of Messianic redemption. According to Jewish tradition and lore, Elijah will blow the shofar at the End of the Days, revealing the primal light of creation, reviving the dead, rebuilding the Temple, and heralding the dawn of the Messianic age when the Jewish exiles will return to Zion.
- Emunah of America Chapters and divisions of this organization around the United States support Israel’s largest religious Zionist educational and social welfare organization.
- Epicureans Disciples of the ancient Greek philosopher Epicurus (341–271 BCE) who functioned in the Greek and Roman empires and influenced subsequent Muslim, Jewish, and European Christian philosophers.
- Eretz Israel (sometimes Yisrael) The Land of Israel.
- Esau Son of Isaac and twin brother of Jacob, who appears in the later events in the book of Genesis. In rabbinic symbolism he was often equated with the despised Roman Empire.

- ethical nationhood The term, coined by American Jewish theologian Mordecai M. Kaplan, points to a “transnational” identity by which Jews embrace the needs of all humanity through their affirmation of Zionism. For Kaplan, Zionism is ethical because it seeks the welfare of humanity and looks beyond its own national borders to an international constituency whose needs shape Israel’s national policies. He sees this type of nationhood as a model for all modern nations.
- Etz Hayyim (Tree of Life) From Proverbs 3:18; a medieval English Halachic work.
- Eucharist Meaning “thanksgiving”; a sacred Christian liturgy using the elements of bread and wine to represent the presence of Jesus.
- Eusebius A church historian of the fourth century who wrote the early history of the church.
- exilarch The foremost leader of Babylonian Jewry in the Sasanian era (224–651 CE) and in the 7th to 11th centuries. Based in the empire’s capital, the exilarch was the official representative of the Babylonian Jews before the crown. Rabbinic literature is the main source so the image of the exilarch reflects its mixed relationship with the rabbis. The rabbis criticized the exilarchate as a symbol of Persian cultural assimilation and for its lack of identity with rabbinic ideals, but the exilarch was also the focus of Babylonian Jewish patriotism vis-à-vis Palestine.
- Ezekiel A Judean prophet during the first Babylonian Exile at time of destruction of Jerusalem (586 BCE) who presented a particularistic interpretation of the relationship between God and Israel.
- faqir A Hindi term, borrowed from the Arabic, meaning poor; the designation for a Muslim holy man, it was inaccurately applied to Hindu mendicants as well.
- farbrengin (gathering) A Yiddish term for a Hasidic gathering. If the rebbe is present, he gives a Hasidic discourse or talks about Hasidic issues. If the rebbe is not present, songs are sung, stories are told praising the rebbe, and people commit themselves to greater piety and more devotion. Alcohol contributes to the intimate nature of these gatherings.
- Farhud A pogrom in Baghdad against Jews perpetrated on June 1, 1941, by the pro-Nazi Iraqi government.
- Firkowicz, Avraham A 19th-century Karaite collector and communal functionary who discovered and publicized many Hebrew, Arabic, and Samaritan manuscripts and burial inscriptions. He is controversial because of his attempts to change texts and his outright forgeries. One of his aims was to prove that the Karaites had been separate from rabbinical Jews since ancient times.
- Freud, Sigmund (1856–1939) The originator of the model of the mind and corresponding method of psychotherapy known as psychoanalysis. A Viennese psychiatrist, Freud first made significant contributions to the field of neurology. In the last decade of the 19th century, his focus shifted to the psychology of the human mind, beyond neurological elucidation. Freud saw neuroses as resulting from unconscious forces, particularly suppressed complexes of a taboo nature stemming from early childhood. He developed the psychotherapeutic method of dream analysis and free association that would theoretically shed light on the unconscious and, in so doing, alleviate the neuroses.
- Friedenwald, Harry (1864–1950) An ophthalmologist from a prominent Baltimore Jewish family, he served as president of the Federation of American Zionists before World War I. After the British conquest of Palestine during the war, Friedenwald served as chairman of the Zionist Commission and was involved in war recovery and health projects in the Yishuv.
- ga’on (pl. ge’onim) “excellency”; term referring to the head of a Babylonian academy, 6th–11th century.
- Galicia The part of Poland under Habsburg control from the time of the partition of Poland at the end of the 18th century. The major cities were Krakow in the west and the provincial capital, Lemberg (Lviv), in the east. Approximately one tenth of Galicia’s population was Jewish. Approximately one quarter or more of the population of both Lemberg and Krakow was Jewish in the 19th century, and Jews were the majority in several Galician towns.

galut Hebrew word for exile, captivity.

Gaon Rabbi Elijah ben Judah Solomon Zalman, a literary Torah genius, was known as “the Vilna Gaon.” He and his followers opposed the Hasidic movement and were known as “mitnaggedim,” or opponents.

Gaul The region of ancient Europe that includes present-day France, southern Belgium, western Germany, and northern Italy. Gaul was conquered by Julius Caesar in 58–50 BCE and administered as Roman provinces until the fifth century CE. The Jewish presence in Gaul dates from the fourth century CE.

Gehenna (or Gehinnom) In rabbinic discourse, the place of dreadful punishment, or hell, for the unrighteous in the afterlife; it is usually identified with an infamous site of child sacrifice in the biblical era.

genizah A store of religious books and appurtenances, especially in Cairo.

Geonic The literature composed by the Geonim. The Geonim were the leading rabbis in Babylonia and Palestine who lived under the Muslims and wrote in Hebrew, Aramaic, and Arabic.

ger toshav (righteous Gentile) A non-Jew whom rabbinic Judaism affirms will have a share in the world to come when the world is redeemed at the end of days.

ger, gerim A biblical term that means alien resident; in rabbinic Judaism, the term comes to mean a convert.

German Immigration Law The law went into force on January 1, 2005, after a long and difficult legislative process and an intense public discussion. For the first time in Germany, immigration is officially recognized and a legislative framework is provided to control it. Key principles are to manage immigration in a way that takes Germany’s economic and social needs into account, to fulfill humanitarian obligations derived from the German constitution, to integrate legal immigrants living permanently in Germany, to advocate Germany’s views within the European Union and the United Nation, and to ensure the protection and security of Germany and the people who live there.

Geshem Prayer for rain.

get (pl. gittin) Religious divorce.

Golda Meir (Meyerson) (1898–1978) Israel’s fourth prime minister (1969–1974). Born in Kiev in 1898, she immigrated to the United States as a young child and then moved to Palestine in 1921. After spending some time on a kibbutz, she became a leader of the Histadrut, Israel’s labor union. She was one of the signers of Israel’s Declaration of Independence and served in various ministerial positions before becoming prime minister.

Goren, Shlomo (1917–1994) Chief rabbi of the Israel Defence Forces and, later, of the State of Israel (1949–1968).

goy (pl. goyim) In the Bible, the term means a member of any nation; in rabbinic Judaism, it comes to mean a non-Jew.

Guide of the Perplexed The major text on Jewish philosophy by Moses Maimonides.

Habad An acrostic form of the initial letters of the Hebrew words hokhma (wisdom), binah (understanding), and da’at (knowledge), these are the first three of the ten sefirot. Habad is also the name of the intellectual school of Hasidism founded by Shneur Zalman of Liadi and otherwise known as Lubavitch.

Hacı-Girây Khan of the Crimean khanate from the 1440s until 1466. His rule was beneficial for Crimean Jews. In 1459, he granted a bill of rights to the Jews living in Qırqyer.

Hadassah A women’s international Zionist service organization founded in the United States in 1912 by Henrietta Szold (1860–1945). The largest women’s and Zionist membership organization in the United States, Hadassah has more than 300,000 members.

- Hadith, the A body of writings that developed in the century after Muhammad's death in 632 that narrates what he and his companions did and said and redacts much oral tradition, law, and legend; it is central for commentary and interpretation of the Koran. It is scathing in its relentless vituperation against the Jews.
- haftarah (pl. haftarot) Prophetic readings.
- haham (pl. hahamim) Means sage; literally, "wise one"
- Haketía (also known as North African Judeo-Spanish) A fusion language spoken by North African Sephardim; it is composed of elements originating in Old Castilian and other medieval Ibero-Romance varieties, Hebrew and Aramaic, North African Arabic, Berber, and French, with significant internal innovations. See also Judezmo.
- hakham bashi Chief rabbi appointed by the Ottoman government to be head of the community and pay and collect taxes. He was distinguished by his fine robes, ceremonial medals and gold embroidery, the size and color of his turban, and the long, wide sleeves of his outer garments. The hakham bashi had two government-appointed bodyguards who carried his staff of office and cleared the way for him.
- Halabies Syrian Jews from Aleppo.
- Halacha The generic term for the entire body of Jewish law, religious and civil law as opposed to the nonlegal or Aggadic aspect of Judaism.
- Halevi, Yehudah A 12th-century Spanish Jewish philosopher and poet best known for his religious philosophy book Sefer ha-Kuzari (The Book of the Kuzari). He based the book on the story of the conversion of the Khazar king Bwl'n to Rabbinical Judaism and intended to prove the truth and beauty of the religion.
- halutz A pioneering Zionist who worked on the land or in industry, generally in the pre-1948 period. The term is rife with connotations, referring to a new sort of pioneering Jew. Primarily, but not exclusively, it is associated with Labor Zionist heritage and often refers to a Zionist pioneer who worked on the communal settlements.
- Hamburg A German city with noted Sephardi and Ashkenazi traditions.
- Hannover, Nathan A 17th-century kabbalist, historian, and liturgist.
- Hanukkah The Jewish festival celebrating the rededication of the Temple by the Maccabees after it was desecrated by Greek invaders.
- Haquitia (also written Haketia and Hakitia) Today this Jewish-Moroccan language, also known as Djudeo Español or Ladino Occidental, is almost extinct. It was spoken on the northeast coast of Morocco and used by many Moroccan Jews who immigrated to the Amazon region. It is a mix of old Spanish, Hebrew, and Arabic words and was originally written using Hebrew letters.
- harbi An unprotected infidel targeted by jihad.
- Harbin The capital city of northeast China's Heilongjiang Province when thousands of Jewish people lived here between the late 19th century and mid-20th century.
- Harkavy, Alexander (1863–1939) A philologist and author of Yiddish dictionaries.
- Hasdai ibn Shaprut A 10th-century Spanish Jewish diplomat and physician, Hasdai wrote letters to various Jewish communities, including those of Babylonia and Khazaria. His letter to King Joseph of Khazaria, in which he asked Joseph about the country and its people, is one of his most famous writings.
- Hashofar Periodical publication of the Bulgarian Zionists.
- Hashomer Hatsair A Zionist youth organization, established in Bulgaria in 1921.
- Hasid (pl. Hasidim), Hasidic (pious) Followers of Israel ben Eliezer (1698–1760) and other Hasidic masters
- Hasidim Members of the Jewish religious group of Hasidic Judaism, which began in Eastern Europe in the 18th century. From the Hebrew "chasidut," meaning "piety," and the Hebrew root word "chesed," meaning "loving kindness."

- Hasidut Hasidic philosophy based on Kabbalah and its application in social wisdom.
- Haskalah (Enlightenment) A movement to assimilate Jews into modern European culture and promote secular education (1750–1880).
- hassagat gevul (Deuteronomy 19:14) Encroachment on another's territory.
- hazzan (pl. hazzanim) cantor.
- heave-offering (Hebrew, terumah) According to biblical law, a portion of the produce that must be separated from the total output and assigned to the priests, to be consumed only in a state of purity.
- Hebrew Christian A Jewish convert to Christianity who leaves the Jewish community and joins a Christian church. They do not consider Jewish life to be a matter of covenant responsibility and attach little or no importance to Jewish continuity.
- Hebrew Scriptures The Jewish canon of the Bible.
- heder A yeshiva system in Israel in which young men mandated to fulfill military duty (high school graduates) can instead do a combined program in which they both perform their army service and study in yeshiva over a five-year period.
- herem A decree of religious excommunication or a ban based on Numbers 18:14.
- Herod The often ruthless king of Judea who ruled from 37 BCE to 4 CE.
- Herzl, Theodor (1860–1904) Herzl was the founder of the political Zionist movement, which called for the migration of Jews to Palestine. Herzl sought to open up Palestine, which was then a territory of the Ottoman Empire, to Jewish immigration. In 1897, Herzl organized and was elected head of the First Zionist Congress. When the Ottomans rejected Jewish immigration to Palestine, Herzl approached the British government with plans to permit the creation of Jewish colonies in Egypt and Uganda. He died prematurely before a Jewish homeland could be created.
- Herzog, Isaac HaLevy (1889–1959) The first Ashkenazi chief rabbi of the State of Israel.
- Hibat Zion (literally, “Lovers of Zion”) Groups of Jews who organized in the 1880s in Eastern Europe for aliyah immigration and settlement in Ottoman-controlled Palestine.
- Hoffmann, David An Orthodox leader; rector of Hildesheimer seminary 1899–1921.
- Holocaust denial (commonly called Holocaust revisionism) The belief that the Holocaust did not happen as described by mainstream historiography. The belief fundamentally rejects the facts that the Nazi government targeted Jews, those with Jewish ancestry, and Gypsies for extermination as peoples; that more than 6 million Jews were systematically killed by the Nazis and their allies; and that tools of efficient mass extermination, such as gas chambers, were used in extermination camps to kill Jews.
- Hoshen mishpat (Breastplate of Judgement; Exodus 28:15) Halachic work on civil law.
- Iberia, Iberian Refers to the Iberian Peninsula and islands: today's Spain and Portugal.
- Ibn Khurradadhbih Ninth-century Islamic geographer whose treatise Kitab al-Masalik wa'l-Mamalik (Book of Roads and Kingdoms) includes descriptions of many distant lands, including India, Burma, China, and the Spice Islands, then familiar to the Islamic world. In particular, Ibn Khurradidhbah reports the prodigious trading routes followed by the Jews of Radhan.
- Ibn Nahmias, David and Shmuel Owners of the first printing house in the Ottoman Empire, 1493–1518.
- intifada An Arabic word meaning “uprising.” It has come into common English usage to describe two Palestinian directives aimed at ending Israeli military presence. The first intifada occurred from 1987 to 1991 or 1993 (when the Oslo Peace Accords were signed). The Al-Aqsa Intifada (the second) was the violent conflict that began in 2000.
- Isaiah A Judean prophet during the first Babylonian exile who presented a universalistic interpretation of the relationship between God and Israel.
- Israel Ihiuve Booklet in the Thadou language prepared by T. Daniel and his colleagues, Joseph Jacob and Sum Samuel, proclaiming the Chin-Kuki-Mizo people to be descendants of Israelites. This booklet was influential in setting the course for the adoption of Judaism in the region.

Israeli A term used to describe citizens of the modern State of Israel. It also refers to the modern Hebrew language in distinction from Biblical Hebrew.

Istria (Siliistra) Ancient center of Jewish life in the Roman Empire.

Ivan-Asen II King of Bulgaria who received the “heretic” Jews from Hungary in 1238.

Izmir An important Turkish town in Jewish history in the 17th and 18th centuries.

Jackson-Vanik amendment U.S. law signed in January 1975 that denied normal trade relations to states that restrict emigration rights. This bill was intended to place pressure on the Soviet Union, which was then preventing Jews from emigrating.

Jakov, Frank Pseudo-messiah from Nikopol in the 18th century.

Jewish National Fund (JNF) The JNF was created by the fifth Zionist Congress in 1901 as a national fund to purchase land in Palestine. Over the past century, the JNF has planted more than 240 million trees and has developed more than a quarter million acres of land throughout Israel.

Jewish National Party (Austria) Closely associated with (indeed a domestic political form of) the Zionist movement, this political party contested elections to Austria’s parliament, sending three deputies from Galicia to Vienna in 1907.

Jews for Jesus A Protestant evangelical missionary organization that represents a Hebrew Christian orientation toward Jewish life and identity; it should not be confused with Messianic Jews, Messianic Judaism, or Messianic synagogues.

jihād The Islamic war waged to impose Islamic law over the world.

jizya Head tax paid by the head of the Jewish or Christian community based on male head of household. The tax was paid to the Muslim government as part of the dhimmi status of Jews or Christians.

Joseph II (1740–1790) The son of Maria Theresa, Joseph became Holy Roman emperor in 1765 and sole ruler of the Habsburg monarchy in 1780. He was an enlightened absolutist of conviction and introduced many rational and radical reforms in the Habsburg monarchy, including a set of Toleration Edicts for his Jewish subjects in Bohemia (1781), Moravia (1782), Hungary (1783), and Galicia (1789). Although these have subsequently been criticized as a harsh attack on Jewish communal autonomy, at the time many maskilim saw them as progressive measures of emancipation.

Joseph, King of the Khazars He succeeded to the throne after the death of his father, King Aaron. As the ruler of Khazaria in the middle of the 10th century, Joseph struggled against increasingly dangerous military threats from neighboring Kievan Rus’ and the Pecheneg people.

Josephus A Jewish historian in the employ of the Romans who wrote a history of the Jews in the first century and several other books.

Judah Ha-Levi (d. 1140 CE) A medieval Jewish philosopher and poet from Muslim Andalusia who presented a distinctively particularistic interpretation of the Jewish people.

Judah Ha-Nasi (b. ca. 135 CE) A rabbi who governed Judea as a nasi (president of the ruling rabbinic assembly, the Sanhedrin) during the first and second century CE.

Judea The historical Jewish territory in present-day Israel. The land became a united Jewish entity in the second millennium BCE and was conquered by the Babylonian empire in the sixth century. From the fourth to second centuries it was ruled by the Hellenic Greeks. In 141 BCE, Judea became an autonomous Jewish state. Self-rule lasted until 63 BCE when it became a Roman possession. In 400 CE, Judea came under the control of the Byzantine Empire, and in 638 CE, it fell to Arab rule. In the 1500s, Judea was annexed to the Ottoman Turkish Empire, and in 1919 it was incorporated into the British-ruled Palestinian Mandate.

- Judenrat Administrative bodies that the Germans required Jews to form in each ghetto in Nazi-occupied Europe in the 1930s and 1940s.
- Judeophobia Irrational hatred of Jews, sometimes grounded in rational opposition to Judaism.
- Judezmo (also known as Djidyó, Ladino, Judeo-Spanish, Spanyol) A fusion language spoken by Ottoman Sephardim, composed of elements originating in Old Castilian and other medieval Ibero-Romance varieties, Hebrew and Aramaic, Arabic, Turkish, Greek and other Balkan languages, Turkish, Italian, and French, and exhibiting significant internal innovations. See also Haketía.
- Justinian (527–565) Byzantine emperor; during his reign anti-Jewish legislation came into force.
- Kabbalah Collective term for all forms of Jewish mysticism; the chief work is the Zohar.
- Kaddish Prayer of sanctification; versions include Mourner's Kaddish.
- Kadoorie Baghdadi Jewish family of industrialists, businessmen, and philanthropists, based in Hong Kong beginning in the late 19th century. Their commercial interests included hotels, banking, power generation, textile manufacture, and mass transport facilities. While living outside Iraq, the family showed continued interest in the country, endowing separate schools for Jewish boys and girls (both academic and an atelier for training in sewing) in various towns, agricultural schools for Jews and Arabs, an eye hospital, and a school for the blind. Other educational facilities supported by the family included a school for the Marathi-speaking Bene Israel in Bombay, agricultural schools in Israel and Canton, a chair in physics at Hong Kong University, and a contribution toward establishing the Hebrew University. Several members of the family were honored with knighthoods, and Baron Laurence Kadoorie of Hong Kong (1899 to 1993) was made a British life peer in 1981.
- Kaffa A city situated on the Crimean Peninsula, today called Feodosiya. Jews were living in Kaffa by the late 13th century. As it developed, it included both Karaite and Rabbinical Jews. The Rabbinical community was quite diverse, consisting of Ashkenazim, Sephardim, Romaniots, Babylonians, and others.
- Kafka, Franz (1883–1924) A world-renowned author of alienation and a leading figure in the literary movement of German Expressionism, Kafka also saw the German usage of Central European Jews as a “minor language” unto itself, a view that has fascinated many students of the immense contribution of German-speaking Jews to modern German and world literature.
- kahal (pl. kehillot) The official governing body of the traditional Jewish communities in Russia. This body was elected every year by all taxpayers and was dominated by the local financial elite. Beside its role as the official representative body of the Jewish community, the kahal was mainly involved in internal affairs, such as setting annual regulations in regard to tax payments, providing the sources and supervising the methods of weekly charity distributions to the poor and needy, providing basic education for orphans and children of poor families, assisting poor brides, and running the local burial system. The institution of the kahal was abolished by the Russian government in 1844.
- Kaifeng City in China with historic Jewish tradition.
- kaji The religious and communal leaders of the Bene Israel during the 18th and 19th centuries in rural Konkan. The term “kaji” was given by their “discoverer,” patron, and teacher, David Rahabi of Cochin.
- Kallen, Horace (1882–1974) Jewish American philosopher. Kallen received his bachelor's degree and doctorate from Harvard University and developed his influential theory of cultural pluralism from 1915 through the 1920s.

- Kaplan, Mordecai Menahem (1881–1983) Kaplan was associated with the Conservative movement in American Judaism his entire life. In 1934, he published Judaism as a Civilization: Toward a Reconstruction of American-Jewish Life in which he set out the principles of Reconstructionist Judaism. He emphasized Judaism as a religious culture that embraced both a Jewish homeland in Israel and a vibrant Diaspora community.
- Karaism, Karaite A form of Judaism based on the Hebrew Bible to the exclusion of rabbinic oral tradition. In the 10th and 11th centuries, Karaism was marked by a flourishing center in Jerusalem with writers producing a wide range of material, including biblical commentary, Halachic compendia, and philosophy, among others.
- karet (excision) A penalty prescribed in the Torah for several serious sins: “the soul shall be cut off from among its people.” According to the standard rabbinic interpretation, it refers to a divinely inflicted premature death.
- Karo, Josef Author of the famous Halachic work, Shulan Aruh.
- kashruth Dietary laws (adjective, kosher).
- Kassin, Jacob (1900–1994) Chief rabbi of Brooklyn’s Syrian and Near Eastern Jewish community from 1933 until his death.
- kavvanah Intention, meditation.
- Keren ha Yesod The main fund for the construction of Palestine.
- ketubah (pl. ketuboth) The Hebrew term for a marriage contract. This economic contract, instituted in the rabbinic period to guarantee financial resources for widows and divorcées, includes details of the amount payable to a wife after her husband’s death or dissolution of her marriage.
- Kfar Habad Habad Hasidic village in Israel, just outside Tel Aviv.
- khachkar An Armenian word meaning “cross-stone.” A khachkar was an Armenian Christian gravestone that featured inscribed crosses in the design. Jewish gravestones in medieval Armenia had similar ornamentation and symbols, but lacked the Christian-specific cross motif.
- kharaaj A land tax imposed on non-Muslim *dhimmi*s in Muslim societies.
- khawaja A Persian word meaning “master, respected person.” It was in use by the Jews of Eghegis, Armenia, and is one of several clues pointing to the probable Persian origins of Armenia’s medieval Jewish community.
- Khazar Seminomadic Turkish people from Central Asia who led a powerful state in the northern Caucasus from the 7th to the 10th centuries. Originally Shamanists, some of them converted to Judaism, others to Islam or Christianity. They founded a polity in the Caucus region in which Judaism became the official religion.
- kipa (pl. kipot) Yarmulke; skullcap worn by religiously observant males and, more recently, some females.
- Kitzur Shulchan Aruch The 19th-century legal commentary that is supposed to be a summary of the Shulchan Aruch, a Jewish law code.
- Knesset The parliament of Israel; literally means “assembly.”
- kollel (pl. kollelim) Institute of fellowship-supported Talmud study, typically for married men.
- Konkan Coast Located immediately south of Bombay (Mumbai), the Konkan Coast has been home to a Jewish population for centuries.
- Koran The Muslim holy book believed by them to have been revealed by God to Muhammad the Prophet over the course of his lifetime. The canonical version dates from about 651, when Caliph Othman promulgated it, having destroyed all other competing versions. It is both negative and positive in its references to the Jews, but over the centuries commentators have ignored or obscured the positive references.
- kosher Food prepared in accordance with Jewish laws.
- Kozer, José Jewish Cuban author.

- Kristallnacht* (Night of Broken Glass) A massive nationwide pogrom in Germany and Austria on the night of November 9, 1938 (including the early hours of the following day). It was directed at Jewish citizens throughout the country and preceded the events of the Holocaust.
- Law of Denaturalization A law passed by the Iraqi parliament on March 9, 1950, authorizing Jewish emigration for a period of one year. The Jews who registered had to give up their Iraqi citizenship and were obliged not to return.
- Lazarus, Emma (1849–1887) This Jewish American poet affirmed her Jewish heritage only toward the end of her life, in response to the plight of Russian Jewry and the pogroms of 1880. She recognized two streams of Jewish exile—some turning to their ancient homeland in Israel and others to the new hope of Western civilization, the United States. This latter idea animates her most famous poem, “The New Colossus,” which is inscribed on the Statue of Liberty in New York harbor.
- Lebenson, Abraham (Adam Ha-Cohen; 1794–1878) The most famous Hebrew poet in mid-19th-century Eastern Europe, Lebenson was also known as a playwright and philologist. He was a key figure in the early Jewish enlightened circles in Vilnius and served as a teacher in the local governmental rabbinic seminary.
- Leeser, Isaac (1806–1868) A Philadelphia-based rabbi and a leading Jewish spokesman in the United States in the middle decades of the 19th century. As editor of the Jewish periodical The Occident, and in numerous other ways, Leeser influenced processes of change and continuity in American Judaism.
- Leschchinsky, Jacob (1876–1966) An economist and sociologist, head of the department of economy and statistics in YIVO, the Jewish scientific institute.
- Levinas, Emmanuel (1906–1995) Major post-World War II French Jewish philosopher. Noted works include Difficult Freedom: Essays on Judaism (1963) and Humanisme de l'autre homme (1972).
- Lilienthal, Max (1815–1882) Born in Munich, Lilienthal migrated to the United States after serving the Russian government in its attempt to modernize its Jewry. From 1855 onward he was an influential leader and spokesman for American Reform Judaism. He stressed the “spirit of our glorious American institutions” and sought to foster a uniquely American Judaism.
- limpieza de sangre Spanish term for having no Jewish ancestry; it translates roughly as “clean blood.”
- Lopato brothers The representatives of Karaites in Harbin were Ely Aaronovitch Lopato (1874–1936) and Abraham Aaronovitch Lopato (1877–1953). They built a large tobacco factory in Harbin in early 20th century.
- Luria, Isaac (“The Ari”) Kabbalistic thinker in 16th-century Safed.
- ma'amad Money sent to the rebbe for his upkeep.
- ma'amar A Hasidic discourse.
- Magain Shalome Synagogue Built in Karachi in 1893 by Shalome Solomon Umerdekar and his son Gershone Solomon, the synagogue was torn down by property developers in the 1980s to clear the ground for a commercial building.
- Magen David Adom Israel's national emergency medical, disaster, ambulance, and blood bank service. The name means “Red Shield of David,” but is usually translated as “Red Star of David.”
- maggid (pl. maggidim) A preacher.
- Maggid-Shteichneider, Hillel Noah (1829–1903) A stonemason and the first historian of the Vilna Jewish community. By using different types of sources, including thousands of epitaphs from the local Jewish cemeteries, he composed and published a collective communal biography: Ir Vilna (The City of Vilnius).

- Magyarization The policy and process used after Hungary achieved autonomy in 1867 by which non-Magyar speakers in Hungary (approximately 60 percent of the population in 1867) were turned into Magyar speakers in order to strengthen and confirm Hungarian (Magyar) national unity. This process was largely part of education policy and was partly voluntary, as was the case with the linguistic transformation within the Jewish community. In other cases, especially regarding Romanians and Slovaks, the process was associated with harsh coercive measures.
- mahzor Prayer tradition; festival prayer book.
- Maimonides, Moses (1135–1204) An influential rabbi-philosopher and the most important Jewish physician in premodern times. A citizen of Cairo, expelled from his native Spain by an intolerant Islamic sect, Maimonides achieved renown for codifying Jewish law and applying Aristotelian logic to the Jewish scriptures and the Talmud by distinguishing between what is to be taken literally and what is to be interpreted allegorically, figuratively, or hyperbolically. A physician by profession, Maimonides also systematized and codified the classical Greco-Roman medical texts, while making his own contributions, particularly in the field of mental health.
- mamzerim A biblical term for illegitimate offspring, who may not marry other Hebrews. According to the prevalent rabbinic interpretation, this status applies primarily to the children of incestuous or adulterous unions.
- Manmasi/Manasi Putative ancestor of the Chin-Kuki-Mizo people, frequently identified with Manasseh in the Bible.
- Ma'oz Tzur Hymn sung on Hanukkah.
- Marrano (literally, “pig”) A pejorative designation the Spaniards used for Jews who converted to Catholicism, whether unwillingly or not. In Portugal the term often does not have such a strong negative association; nevertheless, in both Spain and Portugal other terms are preferred.
- mashgiah (pl. mashgihim) Kosher supervisor.
- matricentric family group A matricentric group is based on the mother and her children, centered on the mother, and is typical of patriarchal societies. The mother forms close affectionate ties with her children. Strong affectionate ties are also found in sibling groups. In patriarchal societies, the father is often perceived by his sons and daughters as a remote, formal, demanding figure, but the mother is perceived as a warm, nurturing, close, caring, informal, supportive figure. In such societies, women gain considerable informal power through their influence over their children. This is the source of the folk image of the “Jewish mother” or “Italian mother.” Within patrilineal patriarchal extended family households women acquire great behind-the-scenes power over their husbands and daughters-in-law through their control over their sons.
- matzo Unleavened bread for Passover festival.
- Mekhilta Early midrashic collections on the book of Exodus. Two Mekhiltas are known, that of Rabbi Ishmael and that of Rabbi Simeon ben Yohai.
- Mercaz USA The Zionist membership organization of the Conservative movement, Mercaz USA represents Conservative Jewry within the World Zionist Organization.
- Merkaz L'Inyanei Hinukh (Centre for Educational Issues) The primary organization of the Habad movement under Ramash.
- Messiah (English adjective: messianic) From the Hebrew for “anointed.” In biblical times, the ceremonies for installing priests and kings involved the ritual anointing of their heads with olive oil. Hence, the vision of restored Jewish sovereignty in a redeemed future came to be associated with the figure of an anointed monarch from the line of King David, who will rule over an ideal and united Israel in the end of days.

- Messianic (Judeo-Christian) communities These are synagogues where all facets of Jewish teaching, worship, and way of life are understood and practiced in the light of Messiah Yeshua (Jesus). Messianic synagogues are the communal context in which Messianic Jews live out their covenant responsibilities as Jews.
- Messianism Belief in the coming of the Messiah.
- Metz A city in northeastern France. Formerly an independent city within the Holy Roman Empire, Metz came under French control in 1552. It was the first home to Ashkenazi Jews in France after the expulsion of 1394, and by the 18th century, Metz was a center of Talmudic scholarship. Geographically part of the region of Lorraine, Metz became German after the Franco-Prussian War (1870–1871). It returned to French control after World War I.
- midrash The component of ancient rabbinic teachings and literature that is related to the Bible. The term “midrash” (from a root meaning “search, seek”) can refer to the method of interpretation, to the teachings themselves, or to the collections and books in which they appear. Midrash can be exegetical, focusing on the systematic interpretation of biblical texts, or homiletic, artistically using biblical quotations to fashion a structured literary sermon.
- midrashot (pl. midrashah) Institutions of higher Jewish learning for women.
- mikvah A ritual bath containing some water of natural origin, such as rain water, spring water, lake water, and the like, which are used by Jewish married women and men.
- Mikveh Israel First permanent Jewish house of worship in Pennsylvania in 1740.
- millet system Separates the non-Muslim population into religious communities with internal autonomy in Ottoman Empire.
- minhag (pl. minhagim) Custom, religious tradition.
- minyán (pl. minyanim) A quorum of 10 Jewish males with whom it is permissible to recite certain prayers.
- Mishawites A movement based on teachings of the ninth-century Mishawayh al-‘Ukbari. Mishawites observed a solar calendar and differed with other Jews on dietary laws. They were known in 12th-century Byzantium, but likely died out in the 13th century.
- Mishnah The first document of rabbinic Judaism, a legal composition edited early in the third century CE by Judah Ha-Nasi. It is the first legal code to define Jewish practice and belief but contains statements attributed to rabbis who lived over the preceding approximately 200 years. Referred to variously as a legal code, a transcript of scholastic debates, or a rabbinic study book, the Mishnah presents in highly formalized language anonymous rules as well as discussions by named rabbis on a wide range of issues important to the implementation of rules only briefly sketched in the Hebrew Bible. Judaism views the Mishnah as the central core of the Oral Law (Torah She’BI Peh) understood to have been transmitted by God to Moses at Mount Sinai along with the written revelation preserved in the Hebrew Scriptures. Accordingly, although the Mishnah’s rules are cited in the names of specific rabbinic authorities, they are understood to have their ultimate legitimacy as aspects of the original revelation of God to the people of Israel. This Mishnah stands at the foundation of the Palestinian and Babylonian Talmuds, the defining documents of rabbinic religion, which are commentaries on the Mishnah’s laws and discussions.
- Mishneh Torah The major text in Jewish law; it was written by Moses Maimonides in the 12th century.
- Mithraism The worship of Mithras, the Persian god of light often identified with the sun; the religion was especially popular among the Roman military and was a strong rival to Christianity in its early stages.
- mitnagged (pl. mitnaggedim) Refers to mainstream Orthodoxy, which opposed the Hasidic movement.

- mitzvah (commandment) Religious duty or obligation.
- Mizoram State in northeast India with a population of around 800,000, more than 90 percent of whom belong to the Chin-Kuki-Mizo tribes.
- modernity The period in Jewish history, beginning in the last quarter of the 19th century, marking the political end of rabbinic governance, when Jews in large numbers accepted citizenship in European nation states.
- mohel (pl. mohels) A circumciser.
- Montefiore family A distinguished Anglo-Italian Jewish family, various members of which have played a role in the development of the Australian Jewish community. Sir Moses Montefiore was a benefactor to many congregations across the continent in the 19th century. Jacob Montefiore was 1 of 11 commissioners appointed to establish the city of Adelaide in 1835. Joseph Barrow Montefiore became a pastoralist and businessman in the first half of the 19th century. Denzil Sebag Montefiore, president of the World Sephardi Federation, financed the purchase of property to build the first Sephardi Synagogue in Australia in 1962.
- Mourners of Zion (also known as Mourners for Zion) A medieval Jewish movement in Constantinople during the middle ages whose ideology was centered on the loss of the Temple and its absence in the Exile. It was characterized by pietism, religious rigor, and a positive concern for Jerusalem and the Land of Israel.
- Musar movement An ethical movement developing in the latter part of the 19th century among Orthodox Jewish groups in Lithuania; founded by R. Israel Lipkin.
- National Committee for Labor Israel A group created in 1923 in New York that supports Israel's labor sphere; working with the American labor movement and Jewish communities, the organization supports labor Zionist institutions.
- National Council of Jewish Women A women's service organization founded in the United States in 1893 by Hannah Greenebaum Solomon (1858–1942).
- Nebuchadnezzar King of Babylon between 604 BCE and 561 BCE. He was traditionally thought to act cruelly toward the people he conquered, including the Israelites. Under his rule Jerusalem and the Temple were destroyed and the Israelites were exiled from the Land of Israel.
- New Christians The term (Cristianos Nuevos in Spanish and Cristãos Novos in Portuguese) used to refer to the Jews and Muslims (Moors) who converted to Christianity and their baptized descendants. After the expulsion of the Jewish population from Spain in 1492 and Portugal in 1497, the remaining Jewish population became officially Christian. The Spanish Inquisition in 1478 and the Portuguese Inquisition in 1536 were created because of a claimed need to fight heresy. Although much of the apostasy was related to Christian paganism, the Church also believed many New Christians were practicing their original religion in secret. The inquisitional concept of cleanliness of blood (limpieza de sangre, in Spanish, limpeza de sangue, in Portuguese) divided New Christians from society, independent of their degree of sincerity as Christian converts.
- nussah Jewish prayer text and tradition (including melodies).
- oleh (pl. olim) A Jew who immigrates to Israel. The term literally means ascender, as Israel, the Holy Land, is viewed as the highest land spiritually.
- One Million Plan A Zionist plan, designed in 1943–1944, to bring 1 million Jews from Europe and the Middle East to Palestine as a means and a stage to establish a state. It was the first time the Jews of Islamic countries were explicitly included in a Zionist plan.
- ORT Charitable program founded in 1880 in Czarist Russia; it was originally called Drop of Milk and was later known as ORT (in Russian Obshestvo Remeslenofo zemledelcheskofo Truda, which means Organization for the Distribution of Artisanal and Agricultural Skills among the Jews). It has worked in many countries where Jews were in need.

- Orthodox Judaism Modern Orthodox Judaism can be traced back to Samson Raphael Hirsch (1808–1888) and other traditionalist rabbinic leaders in Italy and Germany who resisted efforts to reform Jewish religious life. Orthodoxy originally rejected Zionism (although Hirsch's grandson Isaac Breuer [1883–1946] embraced religious Zionism). This movement encompasses traditionalists who reject Zionism and modernization as well as modernists, many of whom affirm the State of Israel and negate the Diaspora.
- other A specialized term used in medieval Jewish philosophy to denote God as a being who is beyond description, and in modern French philosophy to identify the person with whom individuals enter into moral relations. The counterpart to this term in modern German Jewish philosophy is the “neighbor.”
- Ottoman Sephardim Descendants of medieval Iberian Jewry who, after expulsions and forced conversions, made their home in the former Ottoman Empire, its successor states, and immigrant communities elsewhere.
- Pact of Umar Laws created in 717 CE that set the foundation for the way Muslims treat Christians and Jews living in Muslim lands. They included regulations such as wearing distinctive dress, not riding horses or any animal that would make a Muslim look up to a Jew, not building new synagogues or churches, and not selling alcoholic beverages.
- Pale of Settlement An area in western Russia, from 1762 to 1917, in which Jews were permitted to reside. Areas of Russia beyond the Pale were closed to Jewish settlement; a small number of Jews could live there only with special permission.
- Palestinian messengers (Hebrew, Shlichot Me-eretz Yisrael) Refers to itinerant rabbis who visited such places as colonial America to collect money for Jewish settlements in Israel and who also brought Jewish culture to Diaspora communities.
- paradise (Hebrew, Gan Eden) In traditional Jewish thought it is the place of eternal reward for the righteous in the afterlife.
- Parsi A member of the Zoroastrian community based in the Indian subcontinent. Parsis are descended from Persian Zoroastrians who immigrated to the Indian subcontinent more than 1,000 years ago to escape religious persecution after the Islamic conquest. Their population is seriously declining due to various reasons. Over the centuries the Parsis have integrated into Indian society while maintaining their distinct religion, customs, and traditions. Their lingua franca is Gujarati, and Avesta is the language of the ancient religious texts. Their contributions to India and Pakistan in the areas of education, medicine, commerce, and the arts and sciences have been outstanding.
- patrilineal descent According to the Halacha (Jewish law) the offspring of a Jewish mother and a non-Jewish father are recognized as Jews, but the offspring of a non-Jewish mother and a Jewish father are considered non-Jews. In 1983, the Central Conference of American Rabbis declared that children are “under the presumption of Jewish descent if either of their parents are Jewish.”
- Pesach (Passover) A festival celebrating the exodus of the Jews from Egyptian slavery.
- Philipopolis (Plovdiv) One of the most significant towns in the eastern part of the Balkan Peninsula where the oldest known synagogue in Bulgaria was found.
- Philippi A town in Thrace (modern-day Greece), mentioned in the biblical book of Acts, or Apostles' Deeds, as a Jewish settlement.
- pidyon haben Redemption of first-born son (Numbers 18:15).
- piyyut (pl. piyyuyum) A liturgical poem.
- pogrom An act of group violence, often organized or permitted by the government, against Jews in Eastern Europe.
- posek (pl. poskim) The term for an authoritative decider on Halacha.
- Purim A festival marking events in Book of Esther.
- rabbanit The wife of a rabbi; a learned or highly respected woman.

- rabbi (my master) A title that came into use toward the end of the first century CE to designate an ordained authority on Jewish tradition, authorized to serve as a judge on a religious court and to issue rulings on matters of religious law and practice. “Rav” is an alternative form for the title “rabbi,” bestowed on Babylonian teachers who did not acquire full ordination.
- rabbinic Judaism The form of postbiblical Judaism in which officials identified as rabbis govern the Jewish people by a tradition of decisions by earlier rabbis whose authority rests on a claim that the words of the Torah are divinely revealed.
- Rabbinite A term to identify Jews and Judaism whose communities and leadership are rabbinic, in contradistinction to Karaism and other nonrabbinic types of Judaism.
- Radhan A quarter of medieval Baghdad, the Jewish inhabitants of which were renowned for their trading routes, which stretched right across Europe and Asia.
- Radhanites Rabbinical Jewish traders in Europe and Asia during the early Middle Ages who dealt in such commodities as spices, jewelry, and furs. They probably played a role in encouraging the Khazars to convert to Rabbinical Judaism.
- Rahabi, David (1720–1791) Son of and successor to Ezekiel Rahabi. A Hebrew author and merchant who “discovered” the Bene Israel and recognized their Jewishness.
- Rashi An 11th-century leading commentator on Bible and Talmud in northern France.
- rebbe A Hasidic spiritual leader.
- rebbetzin A Yiddish term for the wife of a rabbi; a learned or highly respected woman.
- Reconquista The recapture by Christian Spaniards of parts of Spain conquered by the Moors in 711; the Reconquista ended in 1492 with the expulsion of the Moors and Jews.
- Reconstructionist Judaism This recent movement in American Jewry follows the teachings of Mordecai Kaplan. While resisting creating a new Jewish movement, Kaplan organized the Society for the Advancement of Judaism (1922), the Jewish Reconstructionist Foundation (1941), and the Federation of Reconstructionist Congregations (1955). Finally, in 1967, he was persuaded to break with the Conservative movement by founding a Reconstructionist Rabbinical College.
- Red de Juderías en España (Network of Spanish Jewish Quarters) A Spanish organization open to towns that choose to celebrate their Jewish history with various types of events.
- redemption The sought after state of the entire universe in the end of days.
- Reform Judaism This form of modern Judaism began in Germany under the influence of such figures as Abraham Geiger (1810–1874). It emphasizes the evolving nature of Jewish belief and practice. Although American Reform Judaism rejected Zionism through the 1940s and affirmed the importance of Diaspora Judaism, after the establishment of the State of Israel anti-Zionism was rejected. Reform Judaism today honors the State of Israel but still gives primacy to the Jewish communities of the Diaspora.
- refusenik Someone, especially a Jew, who was refused permission to emigrate (usually to Israel) from the former Soviet Union; someone who refuses to comply with laws or follow orders, especially as a protest.
- Reizen, Zalman (1887–1940) A key figure among the “Yiddishists” in Vilnius, Lithuania, and editor of several Yiddish newspapers and journals (e.g., Vilner Tog, Yivo Bletter). Among his many publications is the lexicon of Yiddish literature, press, and philology.
- Religious Zionists of America (RZA) The American branch of the World Mizrahi/Hapoel Hamizrachi movement, the RZA cultivates religious Zionist commitments among American Jews and supports affiliate religious Zionist organizations, including the Bnei Akiva youth movement.
- Reshit Tzemihat Ge’ulatenu (the beginning of the flowering of our redemption) The return to Zion, the return of the Judean exiles to Jerusalem after the Babylonian Exile, under the Persian king Cyrus, in the sixth century BCE, as described in the biblical books of Ezra and Nehemiah.

Romaniotes Refers to Jews of Greek origin.

Romanus Lecapenus Reigned as Byzantine emperor from 920 to 944 and had a strong commitment to Orthodox Christianity. His persecutions and forced conversions of Byzantine Jews led many to migrate to Khazaria.

Romm Printing and Publishing House Established in Vilnius, Lithuania, in the beginning of the 19th century by Mannes Romm. During the second half of the century, this firm, which was the biggest and the most important publishing house in the Jewish world, was headed by Deborah Romm. According to her business policy, the company printed and published a variety of books, pamphlets, and other materials of a religious nature and of general interest. Her most famous project was a new edition of the Babylonian Talmud, known all over the Jewish world as Shas Vilna.

Rosh Hashanah A New Year Festival and name of a Talmudic tractate.

Rosh Hodesh A minor holiday marking the first day of each Jewish month.

Russian Social-Democratic Labour Party (RSDLP, also known as the Russian Social-Democratic Workers' Party and the Russian Social-Democratic Party) A revolutionary socialist Russian political party formed in 1898 in Minsk to unite the various revolutionary organizations into one party. The RSDLP later split into Bolshevik and Menshevik factions, and the Bolsheviks eventually became the Communist Party of the Soviet Union.

Sa'adia Gaon 10th-century philosopher, philologist, and biblical commentator.

Saatchi Family of Iraqi Jews in Britain, founders of a highly successful advertising agency and patrons of the arts. Responsible for establishing a synagogue in London.

Sabbatai Zevi (Shabbatai Zvi; 1626–1676) A pseudomessiah who led a widespread messianic movement that resulted in his conversion to Islam and the apostasy of some of his followers. His followers are referred to as Sabbateans.

sabbatical year According to the law of the Torah, the land must remain fallow and uncultivated every seventh year; its produce treated as ownerless and debts forgiven.

Safra v'Safya (book and sword) A reference to the philosophy of Israel's national religious community whose men attend Hesder yeshiva programs, which enable them to both serve in the army and study Torah.

Samizdat The clandestine copying and distribution of government-suppressed literature or other media in Soviet-bloc countries.

Sanhedrin (high court) The Sanhedrin (a term derived from Greek) was the Jewish assembly of 71 people that constituted the supreme legislative and judicial authority of the Jews during the Second Temple period and some time thereafter.

Sassoon, House of Founded by Shaikh David Sassoon (1792–1864), one of the leading commercial and industrial houses in British India. Headquartered in Bombay, it had branches throughout South, Southeast, and East Asia, eventually spreading as far as London and New York.

Schindler, Oskar (1908–1974) German industrialist who saved 1,200 of his Jewish workers during World War II.

Schnitzler, Arthur (1862–1931) Leading figure in the modernist literary group of "Young Vienna," Schnitzler is famous for evoking the decadent sensuality of Vienna in 1900, in such plays as his 1897 work Reigen (La Ronde). He was a most perceptive observer of his times, and his novel Der Weg ins Freie (The Road to the Open, 1908) is a brilliant depiction of the problem of Jewish existence in turn-of-the-century Vienna.

Seder The highly ritualized meal on the first night of Pesach.

Seder Olam Zuta An Aramaic composition that provides a genealogical list from Adam until the descendants of a certain sixth-century CE exilarch named Mar Zutra. It incorporates additional material and a lengthy narrative section toward the end. The aim of this work was to demonstrate that the progeny of Mar Zutra, who lived in Palestine, were the only surviving descendents of the Davidic line.

semikah Rabbinic ordination.

Sepharad The term appears once in the Bible, in Obadiah 1:20, which declares that “the captivity of Jerusalem, which is in Sepharad, shall possess the cities of the south.” Wherever this Sepharad was meant to be, by medieval times the term came to mean the Iberian Peninsula, and Jews from that area came to be called Sephardim. More broadly, this term is used, in contrast with Askhenazim, to include, along with the descendants of Jews who had lived in Spain and Portugal, most Jews who hail from communities throughout the Middle East, North Africa, and Asia (apart from the Jews of Yemen) who share with the descendants of Spanish Jews a liturgical tradition, a system of pronunciation of Hebrew, and acceptance of Joseph Caro’s codification of Jewish law.

Sephardi (pl. Sephardim) Originally, a Jew of Spanish origin who speaks Ladino. More broadly, the term refers to all Jews who are not Ashkenazic. Jews of the Iberian Peninsula (Spanish), their descendents, and those Jews who have adopted the Sephardic rite, especially in lands around the Mediterranean.

Sephirot Originally referred to the primordial numbers. In later kabbalistic writings, Sephirot refers to the emanations and manifestations of the Godhead according to the teachings of the Kabbalah.

Septuagint The Greek translation of the Torah; the term was later used to designate the Greek translation of the entire Jewish Bible plus additional books.

Serdica (Sofia) This Bulgarian city has been home to a Jewish settlement since the first century CE.

shaatnez A forbidden mixture of textiles (Leviticus 19:19).

Shabbat (pl. Shabbatot; Sabbath) Jewish day of rest falls on a Saturday and is both celebratory as well as being characterized by strict legal restrictions on work and technology.

shaharith The morning prayer service.

Shaham, Nathan Born in Tel Aviv in 1925, Shaham has been a member of Kibbutz Beit Alfa since 1945. A prolific author, his almost 40 books have been published in a number of languages.

Shalev, Meir Born in 1948 in Nahalal, Israel, Shalev is the author of such acclaimed novels as Blue Mountain (1988), Esau (2001), and The Pigeon and the Youth (2006). Shalev has written children’s books and is a frequent presence in Israeli media.

shaliah (pl. shlichim) Emissaries of religious or secular Jewish/Zionist organizations.

Shammies Syrian Jews from Damascus.

Shaniwar Telis The name by which the Bene-Israeli Jewish community in India was first known. They claim to be descended from Jews who escaped persecution in Galilee in the second century BCE. Although they assimilated into the local culture to become a caste of oil pressers (teli), they retained their dietary restrictions and the practices of circumcision and observing the Sabbath.

Sharansky, Natan (Anatoly Shcharansky) A Russian refusenik, Sharansky served more than 10 years in Soviet prison on false charges. After worldwide political pressure, he was released in a prisoner exchange and immigrated to Israel, where he served in its government.

Shavei Israel Organization founded by Michael Freund, a Jerusalem Report staffer and former adviser to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in 2004. Shavei Israel has assumed responsibility from Amishav for the conversion and settlement in Israel of the Benei Menashe from northeast India. It has advocated on behalf of Sabbotniks (Russians whose ancestors had adopted Judaism during Czarist times) for the right to settle in Israel and has

- funded rabbis to assist the Anousim (Marranos) in Portugal, the remaining Jews in Portugal, and the descendants of Jewish settlers in the Andean upper reaches of the Amazon.
- She'elot Ut'shuvot (Questions and Answers) Halachic rulings.
- Shearith Israel First permanent Jewish house of worship in North America, established in 1730.
- shehitah Ritual slaughter of animals for food.
- Shekinah (she who dwells) A divine aspect of God. In biblical literature, Shekinah is associated with the portable Tabernacle and then the Temple in Jerusalem. In rabbinic literature, the Shekhinah is characterized as feminine, and sometimes described as having absented herself from the Jewish people after the destruction of the First Temple or having gone into exile with the Jewish people after the destruction of the Second Temple. In Kabbalah, the Shekhinah is identified as the lowest and most immanent of the 10 sefirot (divine emanations of the Godhead), separated from the Godhead at Creation. It is the task of the Jewish people to reunify—through prayer, study, and performance of the mitzvot (commandments)—God's primal unity, thus ending God's own exile.
- Shema Daily proclamation of monotheistic faith.
- shlichut Work undertaken by an ambassador; a mission.
- Shlilat Hagola (negation of the Diaspora) One Zionist interpretation holding that Jewish life in the Diaspora is necessarily beholden to humiliation, persecution, and strife. The act of Jewish state-building was often conceptualized as rejection or "negation" of Diaspora life.
- Shoah The Hebrew word for the Holocaust; it means "catastrophe."
- shohet The person who slaughters kosher animals, pursuant to Jewish religious law.
- shtetl Jewish small-town community in Eastern Europe.
- shul Yiddish for synagogue.
- Shulhan Arukh (Laid Table) A 4-volume code of Jewish law by Joseph Karo (16th century).
- siddur (pl. siddurim) Prayer book.
- Sifra An early midrash to the book of Leviticus.
- Sifré Early midrash to the books of Numbers and Deuteronomy.
- Simhat Torah End and recommencement of annual Torah reading.
- Simon, Silas First rabbi of the Sephardi synagogue in Sydney, Australia, serving the congregation between 1963 and 1980. Born in Calcutta while his wife came from Egypt, the couple reflected the two main strands within the Sephardi community that developed in Australia after World War II.
- Singer, Simeon (1846–1906) British rabbi and editor of the standard prayer book in late 19th century.
- Society for the Dissemination of the Enlightenment among Russian Jewry Founded in 1863 in St. Petersburg by Jewish oligarchs under the leadership of Baron Y. Y. Ginzburg. Until its abolition in 1930, the society was involved in many aspects of Russian Jewish cultural lives, mainly by promoting and supporting hundreds of educational and literary projects.
- Society of Mekitsei Nirdamim Founded in 1862 by Eliezer Silberman, the editor of the Hebrew newspaper Ha-Magid, to promote the scientific publication of historical and literary Hebrew manuscripts.
- sopher (pl. sopherim) Scribe.
- Spinoza, Baruch (1632–1677) Rationalist philosopher whose thinking predated modernity by centuries. An Amsterdam-born son of refugees from the Portuguese Inquisition, as a young man Spinoza was excommunicated from the synagogue for his rationalist view of religion. In his philosophical writings, Spinoza consistently used the words "God" and “divine,” but equated these with the whole of nature (and natural laws), refusing to recognize any supernatural entity. Nevertheless, Spinoza, by sheer geometric exposition, proposed very “saintly” guidelines to ethical living and obtaining higher knowledge. His works would also influence the fields of psychology and physiology.

Star of David A six-sided star used as the Israeli national symbol and Jewish religious symbol.

Strashun, Matityahu (1817–1885) Born to a rabbinic family and a Talmudic scholar himself, Strashun was also known as a historiographer, publicist, and communal leader as well as the owner of a large private library and a collection of rare manuscripts.

Suichmezov, Assen Member of the delegation from Kyustendil to Sofia on March 9, 1943, to protest against the deportation of the Jews.

sujets locaux Term to designate those among the non-Muslim minority groups who, although natives of Egypt, never acquired or were never granted Egyptian nationality and remained stateless.

Sura One of major Talmudical academies in Babylon.

synagogue A place where Jewish religious services are conducted.

Szold, Henrietta (1860–1945) The daughter of a Baltimore rabbi, Szold studied at the Jewish Theological Seminary and worked with Russian Jewish immigrants and the Jewish Publication Society before dedicating her energy to Zionism. After founding Hadassah before World War I, she spearheaded the emergence of the Women’s Zionist Organization of America as a major presence in the American Jewish scene and an important contributor to the health and social welfare spheres of the Jewish state-in-the-making.

taharat mishpachah* (family purity) A euphemistic reference to the body of Jewish law that governs the periods of intimacy and separation for a married couple.

tallith (pl. tallithim) Prayer shawl.

Talmud One of two monumental commentaries on the Mishnah collecting the opinions and debates of Jewish religious scholars beginning in the third century CE and lasting for several centuries afterward. Two Talmuds survive: the Jerusalem or Palestinian Talmud and the Babylonian. Though the two works are similar in their purpose and structure and contain much common material, it was the Babylonian Talmud that achieved prominence during the Middle Ages and is usually referred to as “the Talmud.” The Talmuds are composed in a combination of Hebrew and Aramaic. They are distinguished by the intricate modes of logical argumentation that the rabbis apply to the interpretation of the Mishnah and to other topics. The opinions of the participating rabbis are subjected to critical scrutiny and logical analysis and are compared to proof-texts from the Bible and other statements by the rabbis. Although they are organized principally as critical expositions of the religious law of the Mishnah, the Talmuds contain diverse types of material, including biblical exegesis, homiletics, moralistic teachings, case law, legends about biblical figures and rabbis, and much more.

tannaitic From the Aramaic root tana, meaning to teach, or shana in Hebrew, it refers to the generation of rabbis living in the first and second centuries CE who wrote the mishnah, the oral torah codified by Yehudah Ha Nasi at the end of the second century CE.

Targum Onkelos Aramaic translation/paraphrase of the Torah by Onkelos, a proselyte.

Tcherikover, Eliyahu (1881–1943) Head of the history department of YIVO and the editor of the institute’s historical journal Historische Schriften. Tcherikover published extensively on the history of East European Jewry; among his most known books are books on the history of the Society for the Dissemination of the Enlightenment among Russian Jewry and on Jews in times of revolution.

Temple The sanctuary in Jerusalem that was, according to biblical law, the only place where sacrificial worship might be conducted. The Bible relates that the First Temple was built by King Solomon and destroyed by the Babylonians under Nebuchadnezzar. The Second Temple was constructed by the exiles returning from the Babylonian Captivity and destroyed by the Romans in 70 CE.

Thessalonica A Jewish community in existence since the first century CE.

tikkun olam The commandment or injunction to repair or improve the world.

Tishah B'Av A fast marking the destruction of First and Second Temples.

tithe (Hebrew, Ma'aser) According to biblical law, a tenth of the produce must be set aside for the Levites. From this the Levites must assign a tenth to the priests. A second tithe must be separated, which must be consumed by the owners in Jerusalem; or (in certain years) assigned to the poor.

tkhines* (Hebrew, t'hinnot) The Yiddish word for personal supplicatory prayers in the vernacular intended for women to use in the synagogue and in their domestic lives. They began to appear in print in the 16th century.

Torah (teaching or instruction) Torah is applied most specifically to the first five books of the Hebrew Bible (also known as the Pentateuch or "Five Books of Moses"), which Jewish tradition regards as the most important and authoritative section of the Bible. In a more general sense, the term is used to refer to the full range of Jewish religious teaching.

Tosefta A collection of oral teachings composed as a supplement to the Mishnah and following its general structure. It contains alternative traditions and some explanations. It was probably composed in the early or mid-third century CE.

tsedaka Technically charity, but taken to mean an injunction to behave with righteousness and to promote social justice.

tzimtzum* (contraction) In Lurianic Kabbalah, the process whereby God, who is all, withdraws or contacts himself sideways so as to leave a kind of primordial space or nondivine vacuum within which creation can take place.

Umma The Islamic religious and political world community.

Unetanneh Tokef High Holy Day prayer attributed to Amnon of Mayence from the 10th century.

Union of Jewish Women A Jewish women's service organization founded in Great Britain in 1902.

United Israel Appeal (UIA) The major power block within the United Jewish Appeal, the UIA's mission is to raise funds for Israel.

United Jewish Communities (UJC) Formerly the Council of Jewish Federations (CJF), the UJC is the umbrella organization of more than 150 Jewish federations that advocate for Jewish needs as well as raise and allocate funds for the philanthropic and social service institutions of the American Jewish community.

Vilna Gaon (1720–1797) The Vilna Gaon, or Rabbi Elijah, son of Solomon Zalman, known also as the Gra, was the most famous rabbinic scholar in the last quarter of the 18th century. He was the ultimate representative of the rationalistic scholar, a method that was adopted in all the Lithuanian yeshivas. Unlike other contemporary scholars he was interested not only in the study of the Babylonian Talmud but also in the Jerusalem Talmud, Kabbalah (Jewish philosophy), and general studies (mathematics, astronomy, and the like). Though did not hold any official rabbinic post, he was considered most influential in public matters and was spiritual leader of the opponents of the Hasidut.

Vitry A town in northern France that was the site of a renowned Jewish community in medieval times.

Wessely, Hartwig (1725–1805) One of the more prominent members of the Haskalah, his book, Words of Truth and Peace, was a pedagogical manifesto aimed at supporting the efforts of Joseph II to integrate Habsburg Jewry fully into secular society.

Western Wall Also known as "the Wailing Wall," a section of the western supporting wall of the Temple Mount, the only remaining part of the destroyed Second Temple. For centuries, this remnant has been the focus of mourning for the destruction of the Temple and the exile of the Jewish people. After the Western Wall was returned to Jewish rule during the Six-Day War in June 1967, it became a symbol of the ingathering of Jewish exiles to the State of Israel. Images of the Wall have appeared in Jewish folk art, symbolizing both the Exile as well as the continued hope of redemption and return to the land.

White Australia Policy Policy adopted in 1901, when the Australian colonies federated, to exclude non-European immigrants. Jews from the Middle East, Asia, and North Africa were affected by this policy, which was not formally repealed until 1973.

Wise, Isaac Meyer (1819–1900) Wise emigrated from Bavaria to the United States and established the major institutions of Reform Judaism—its seminary, union of congregations, and rabbinical association. He considered the American environment a unique opportunity to create a Diaspora Judaism. He named his revised prayer book Minhag America (Custom of America) to emphasize his acceptance of this Diaspora culture.

Wissenschaft des Judentums (Scientific Study of Judaism) This post-Enlightenment Jewish movement, which began in Germany, was dedicated to promoting the rational, scientific, and critical study of Jewish religion, history, and culture.

WIZO The Women's International Zionist Organization is a nonpartisan movement dedicated to the advancement of the status of women, support of all sectors of Israeli society, and encouragement of Jewish education in Israel and the Diaspora.

Yekke A German Jew; a member of the German Jewish community.

yeshiva (pl. yeshivas) An academic establishment for the study of Torah (the central document of Judaism; the first five books of the Hebrew Bible and the basis of Jewish law) and Talmud (a record of rabbinic discussions pertaining to Jewish law, ethics, customs, and history) within Orthodox Judaism, primarily attended by males.

Yeshuat Israel The first permanent Jewish house of worship in New England, founded in Newport, Rhode Island, in 1763.

Yiddisher Wissenschaftelecher Institute (YIVO or Institute for Jewish Research) Founded in 1925 in Vilnius, Lithuania, as a research center for the culture and history of central and east European Jewry.

yishuv (Hebrew, settlement) Term used in the Zionist movement to refer to the Jewish settlement in Palestine before the establishment of Israel. The settlers and new residents became known collectively as “the Yishuv.”

Yom Ha'atzmaut (Israeli Independence Day) Commemorates the Declaration of the Independence of Israel in 1948. It falls on the 5th of the Jewish lunar month, Iyar. It is the day after Yom Hazikaron, Remembrance Day for fallen Israeli soldiers, which occurs on the 4th of Iyar.

Yom Kippur Day of Atonement, marked by a 25-hour fast.

Yom Tovim The high holidays of the Jewish communities, including Rosh Hashanah, the New Year, and Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement.

Yomtov Sheni Shel Galuyyot Second day of festivals in the Diaspora.

Yulee, David In 1845, he became the first Jew elected to the U.S. Senate.

Zaddik (pl. Zaddikim; Righteous) A term used in particular reference to the hasidic rebbes, believed to be perfect.

zar (pl. zarim) A term that in the Bible means a foreigner but that comes to mean an idolater in rabbinic Judaism.

Zionism This term formally and narrowly applies to the movement begun by Theodor Herzl (1860–1904) in 1887 to seek a political route to an independent Jewish state. More generally, however, the term refers to all Jewish theories and movements aimed at restoring the Jewish people to their homeland. Used this way, many who preceded Herzl, such as Moses Hess (1812–1875) and Leo Pinsker (1821–1891), as well as many who disagreed with him, such as Asher Ginsberg (known as Ahad Ha-Am, 1856–1927) and Jacob Klatzkin (1882–1948), are part of Zionism. As a movement, it supported the national liberation of Jews and a homeland for the Jewish people in Israel.

Zionist Organization of America (ZOA) The ZOA has a national membership of 30,000 and chapters across the United States. It works today to strengthen U.S.–Israeli relations via educational activities, public affairs programs, and Israel advocacy on Capitol Hill, campuses, and elsewhere.

Index

- Aaron, 292
Aaron, Aaron, 528
Aaron, Reuben, 528
Aaron of Lincoln, 930
Aaronovitch, Eli, 1184
Abadi, Shaul Matlub, 791
Abayudaya, 451, 515
Abbas, 501
Abbasid Caliphate, 768
Abd-al-Nabi b. al-Mahdi, 794
Abdurakhmanov, Mikhail, 1145
Abennamias, Santo, 877
Abensour, Miguel, 165
Aboab, Immanuel, 318
Aboab da Fonseca, Isaac, 650–651, 726
Aboriginal Reconciliation body, 524
Aboulke, Jose, 457
Abrabanel, Isaac, 875
Abrabanel, Jacob, 875, 877
Abrabanel, Joseph, 875
Abrabanel, Judah, 875
Abrabanel, Samuel, 875, 877
Abraham, 18, 128, 449, 751
Abraham, David, 1088, 1173
Abraham, Pearl, 249
Abraham, Robert, 1081
Abraham family, 357, 1189
Abraham Fund, 627
Abraham-Ishmael story, 151
Abrahams, Israel, 498
Abrahamsen, Rita, 1085
Abrahamson, Abe, 519
Abrahamson, Leizer, 519
Abramovich, Jayzuño, 730
Abramovitch, Sholem-Yankev, 1043
Abravanel, Benvenida, 253
Abravanel, Yitzhak, 31, 317
Abulafia, Hayyim, 32–33
Abulafia, Meir, 909
Abulafia, Abraham, 84
Abyssinia, Ethiopia, 450
Abzug, Bella, 621
Academy Board of Jewish Education, Sydney, Australia, 525
Acción Revolucionaria Mexicana, Mexico, 674
Acher, Paul, 728
Achron, Joseph, 212, 213
Ackerman, Boris, 733
Activa Business Center, 677
Adam, 5, 292, 1161
Adani, Solomon, 798
Adas, Shafiq, 378, 379
Adass Israel, Melbourne, Australia, 525
Addiel, King, 82
Adeb, 799
Adelaide, Australia, 521, 528
Aden, 799
Ades, Victor, 528
Adis, Nissim, 1247
Adler, Hermann, 334, 934, 935
Adler, Nathan Marcus, 924–925, 934
Adler, Rachel, 406, 622
Adler, Sam, 226
Adler, Solomon Alfred, 935
Adolph, José, 709, 736–737
Adventist Church, 633
Afendopolo, Caleb ben Elijah, 93
Affonso Henriques, King, 893
Afghanistan, 1129–1132
lost tribes of Israel and, 85
Africa, Jews in, 449–452. See also countries in
historical overview, 449–452
African Jewish Congress (AJC), 492, 498
African National Congress (ANC), 500
Agaronov, Albert, 1117
Agbai, Avishai, 493
Age groups and Jewish populations (1897–2004), 400 (table)
Aggadic Ein Ya'akov, 797
Agippa I, 69
Agippa II, 69
Agitators, 121–122
Agosin, Marjorie, 708
Agre, Anna, 1183
Agrippa, 70
Agron, Gershon, 1242, 1252
Agronov, Ya'acov, 1116
Agudat Hasidei Habad (AGuCH or Union of Habad Hasidim), 605
Agudat Hasidim Anshei Habad (ACHACH or the Union of Hasidim), 605
Agudath Israel, 612
Aguilar, Grace, 319
Aguinis, Marcos, 707–708
Ahaba Ve Shalom, Mexico, 675
Aharon, Beth, 980
Ahasuerus, King, 1204
Ahi Ezer Yeshiva, 618–619
Ahi Temimim, 605
Ahiyau, 755
Aisenstadt, Hirsch, 1026
Ai Tian, 1161
Akiva, 81–82, 133, 351
Akum, Ferede, 470
Akselrod, Meir, 231
Aksum, 467
Aladjem, Israel, 958, 961
Al-Aksa Intifada, 588
Alaouite Dynasty, 482
Alaungpaya, King, 1240
Al-Bakri, 1099
Al-Balkhi, Hiwi, 1123
Albania, 942–946
Alberta, Canada, 550
Albert V, King, 805
Albo, Joseph, 910
Al-Buhori, Yusuf Yahudi, 1124
Alcades, Jacques, 730, 733
Alcazarquivir, Morocco, 488, 489
Alcurnia, 159
Aleichem, Shalom, 178, 195, 234, 235
Aleppan Jews, 615
Aleppo, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790
Syrian Jews and, 218–219
Aleppo Codex, 786, 787, 790–791
Alexander, 1111, 1112
Alexander, Emperor, 1037
Alexander, Theodora, 955
Alexander I, Emperor, 992, 1010
Alexander II, 102, 690
Alexander II, Czar, 925
Alexander II, Emperor, 1025, 1035, 1036
Alexander III, Emperor, 1011, 1036
Alexander the Great, 73, 87, 477–478, 752, 856, 953, 1103
Alexandria, 752
Jewish settlement in, 449
Alfasi, Yitzhak, 315
Alfonsin, Raul, 711
Alfonso I, King of Aragon and Sicily, 875, 877
Alfonso X of Castile and Leon, 905
Algazi, Hayyim, 858
Algazi, Isaac, 216, 217

- Algeria, 514
 Arab period in, 456
 contemporary overview of, 457–458
 French invasion of, 456–457
 French period in, 456–457 important personalities in, 458
 Jews in, 455–458
 Turkish period in, 456
 World War II (1941–1945) and, 457
- Algerian Zayyanids, 456
- Algiers, 455
- Alhadeff, Bohor, 859
- Alhadeff, Gabriel, 370
- Alhadeff, Maurice, 370, 462
- Alhambra, 228
- Al-Hanadhani, Ibn al-Faqih, 1094
- Al-harar, Eliyah b., 312, 313
- Alia, Ramiz, 945
- Al-Jarmi, 1099
- Al-Jayhani, 1099
- Alkabets, Shelomo, 776
- Alkalai, Sason, 958
- Alkalai, Yehudah, 33, 37, 319
- Allen, Woody (Allen Stewart Konigsberg), 243, 246, 247, 709
- Allenby, Edmund, 131
- Alliance Israélite Universelle, 469, 485, 489, 512–513, 778, 792, 798
- Al-Maqdisi, 1137
- Almeida, Luis, 1196
- Almohads, 450, 456, 482, 510
- Almoravids, 456, 482
- Almosnino, Gabriel, 957, 958
- Alonso, Hernando, 673
- Alperavicius, Simeonas, 1038
- Alpha-Thalassemia (a-T), 278
- Al Qaeda, 511
- Al Qaradawi, Yusuf, 929
- Al-Qumisi, Karaite Daniel, 1130
- Al-Rahman, Abd, I, 913
- Al-Rahman, Abd, III, 913, 915
- Alshansky, Naum, 948
- Alsheh, Eliezer, 966
- Alsheikh, Moshe, 776
- Altenberg, Peter, 45
- Amalgamated Clothing Workers, 593
- Aman, Rabbi, 1105
- Amar, Shlomo, 1159, 1218, 1222
- Ameinu, 640
- America. See also United States
 art by Jews before World War II, 237–242 attitude of Jewish thinkers toward Diaspora, 566–570 denomination and Jewish identity in, 613–614
 Jewish Diaspora in, 571–591
 Jewish Orthodoxy in, 608–612
 Jewish renewal in, 624–629
- Jewish women of early West, 563–565 women's contributions to, 620–623
- La America* (newspaper), 561
- America-Israel Friendship League, 640
- American Catholicism, 634
- American Christian attitudes, to Jewish Diaspora, 632–634
- American Federation of Teachers, 593
- American film industry, Jewish contributions, 238–242
- American Friends of Likud, 640
- American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), 639, 640
- American Jewish Committee, 597, 638, 640
- American Jewish Liberalism, 580–586
- American Jews
 Israel and, 586–589 portrayal of, in Israeli literature, 645–649 radicalism and, 592–596 response of, to Holocaust, 597–601
 State of Israel and, 642–645
- American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), 471, 599, 742
- American pragmatism, 626
- American Reform Judaism, 568, 642
- American Sephardi Federation (ASF), 562
- Americans for Peace Now, 640
- American universities, Jewish studies in, 629–631
- American Zionist Movement, 635–641
- Amir, Eli, 380, 646, 648–649
- AMIT, 640
- Amit, David, 1112
- Amitin-Shapiro, Z. L., 1126, 1150
- Amram, gaon of Sura, 25
- Amster, Enrique, 708–709
- Ancient Armenia, 1108–1113
- Ancient world literature, 64–71
 Artemidorus, 70
 Cicero, 65
 Dio, 70–71
 Diodorus Siculus, 64
 Hecataeus of Abdera, 64
 Horace, 65–66
 Juvenal, 69–70
 Libanius, 71
 Martial, 67
 Ovid, 65
 Petronius, 66
 Plutarch, 67
 Quintilian, 66
 Seneca the Younger, 66
 Suetonius, 68–69
- Strabo, 65
 Tacitus, 67–68
 Tibullus, 65
 Valerius Maximus, 66
- Ancona, Ronni, 897
- Andalucian melodies and poetry, 484
- Andromachus, prefect of Syria, 87
- Andy Statman Klezmer Orchestra, 227, 228
- Angel, Saúl, 746
- Anglo-American colonies, Judeo-Portuguese in, 553–559
- Anglo Boer War (1899–1902), 494
- Anglo-Dutch Wars (1652–1654), 555
- Anglo-Jewish community, 113
- Anissimow, Myriam, 839
- Anski, Solomon, 965
- Ant, Clara, 722
- Antin, Mary, 236
- Antioch, Syria, 752, 789
- Antiochus, King, 855
- Anti-Semitism, 485–486, 501, 504
 in Australia, 525–526
 in Austria, 807–808
 in Baltic States, 1019–1024 in Belarus, 950–951
 in Belgium, 814
 in Brazil, 718–719, 721–722
 in Canada, 550, 551–552
 in Central Europe, Eastern Europe, and Russia, 940–941 Christianity and, 109, 130 classic images and, 119
 demonization of Jews, 104–105
 distinguishing new from criticism of Israeli policy, 120–121 economic and political reasons, 76, 105 emergence of Christianity and, 104
 Enlightenment, 105
 Euro-Arab, 115–118
 in Europe, 804
 in Finland, 1075–1076
 in Hong Kong, 1193
 in Hungary, 977
 in Italy, 870
 in Latin America, 691, 692–693 literary, 107–111
 in Mexico, 674, 675, 680
 in Middle Ages, 104–105 nationalist, 105–106 new, 118–122
 in North America, 548
 in Norway, 1087
 in Poland, 987
 in Russia, 996–997
 in Scandinavia, 1056
 in Scotland, 899
 in Shanghai, 1175–1176
 in Sweden, 1091–1092

- in Switzerland, 920–921
 in Tunisia, 514
 in Ukraine, 1015
 in United Kingdom, 928–929
 in Uruguay, 744
 varieties of, 103–107
 in Venezuela, 749
 Worldwide Report on, 118
 in Zimbabwe, 519–520
- Anti-Zionism, 485–486
 in Australia, 525–526
 in Austria, 807–808
 in Belgium, 814
 Bund, 335–336
 in Canada, 551–552
 in Central Europe, Eastern Europe, and Russia, 940–941
 Diaspora, 333–340
 in Europe, 804
 in Finland, 1075–1076
 in Hong Kong, 1193
 in Hungary, 977
 in Mexico, 680
 in North America, 548
 in Norway, 1087
 in Poland, 987
 in Russia, 996–997
 in Scandinavia, 1056
 in Scotland, 899
 in Shanghai, 1175–1176
 in Sweden, 1091–1092
 in Switzerland, 920–921
 in Tunisia, 514
 in Ukraine, 1015
 in United Kingdom, 928–929
 in Uruguay, 744
 in Venezuela, 749
- Antokolsky, Mark, 1037
 Antonescu, Ion, 989
 António Vaz, 557
 Apartheid, 497
 Apion, 108
 Apocrypha, 11, 15
 Appian, 1110
 Aquila, 13, 133, 134
 Aquinas, Thomas, 812
 Arab countries, Jewish refugees from, 382–386
 Arab League, 511, 514
 Arafat, Yasir, 336
 Aragawi, 469
 Aramaic, 167, 171–172, 177–178
 Aram Soba, 787
 Aranha, Oswaldo, 719
 Aranne, Zalman, 348
Arbeiter Ring, 593
 Archelaus, King, 1112
 Arch of Titus (photo), 20
 Arcrumi, T'ovma, 1108
 Arendt, Hannah, 42, 837
 Arequipa, Peru, 735
 Arevalo, Juan Jose, 667
 Argentina, Jews in, 690, 691, 693,
   694, 710–715
 Arias, Pedro, 671
 Aridjis, Homero, 695
 Arihi, 755
 Aristobulus, King, 1111, 1112
 Aristotle, 296
 Armed Islamic Group, 458
 Armenia, 1104–1107 ancient, 1108–1113 medieval, 1113–1114
 Armstrong, Diane, 524
 Arnheim, Arthur, 1063–1064
 Aron, Raymond, 830
 Artawazd II, King, 1109, 1110, 1111
 Artemidorus, 70
 Artemisa, Cuba, 664
 Artists at work in SS camps,
   816–820
 Arts, Jewish contributions to,
   233–250
 Arts Advisory Council, 544
 ArtScroll and Mesorah
   Publications, 610, 611–612
 Aruba, Jews in, 655, 656–657
 Arzila, Morocco, 488, 489
 Asa, King, 80
 Asad, Abukarib, 793
 Asceticism, 91
 Asch, Sholem, 234
 Aschberg, Olof, 1090
 Ascher, 143
 Asenath, 19
 Ash, Shalom, 628, 965
 Asher, Kasiel Noah, 967
 Asher, tribe of, 79, 82, 84
 Ashkelon, Libya, 481
 Ashkenazi, 452, 507
   Balkan conduit for, 186
   German-Jewish and German anti-semitic thought, 48–52
   Hasidic philosophy and music, 211 idealization of Sephardi, 49–50 internal and external influences, 27
   Jewish music, 208–209
   liturgy, 25, 218–219
   reform congregations, 561
   Slavo-Turks, 185
   tradition variants, 26–27
   Yiddish songs, 210–211
 Ashkenazi, Bezalel, 35
 Ashkenazi, Eli, 961
 Ashkenazi, Ilko, 966
 Ashkenazi, Isaac Luria, 35
 Ashkenazy, Vladimir, 1081
 Ashur, 752
 Asociación de Médicos Judíos
   (Association of Jewish Doctors), 730
 Asociación Israelita de Venezuela,
   746, 748
 Asociacion Juvenil Judia de Cuba,
   664
 Asociación Mutual Israelita
   Argentina (AMIA), 698, 702,
   712, 714
 Asociación Unión Hebreo-Polaca,
   746
 Asociación Menorah, Mexico,
   675
 Assa, Greddi, 967
 Assia, Yehuda, 1251
 Assimilation, 20, 76
 Association Culturelle Israelite de la Martinique, 660 Association of Reform Zionists of America/World Union
   North America, 640
 Associations of Friends of Universities, 681
 Assurbanipal, 3
 Assyria, 80–81, 96
   Israelites and Judeans in,
   754–756
 Aston, William, 528
 Astor, Alexander, 544
 Astrukov, Emil, 966
 Ateek, Naim, 132
 Attali, Jacques, 458
 Attas, Ivonne, 747
 Attia, Yitzhak, 791
 Auckland, New Zealand, 535,
   538–539, 541
 Auckland Hebrew Congregation,
   544
 Auerbach, Berthold, 44
 Auerbach, Charlotte, 897
 Augustine, Saint, 104, 295
 Augustus, Philip, II, 100, 821
 Augustus Caesar, 1111
 Aurangzeb, 1214–1215
 Aurora, Jagjit Singh, 1227
 Auschwitz, 115
 Australia, Jews in, 521–531
   contemporary overview,
   523–526
   conversion to Judaism in Sydney Jewish community, 531
   historical overview, 521–523
   Sephardi, 526–530
 Australia/Israel and Jewish Affairs
   Council, 525
 Australian Jewish Historical Society, Victoria, Australia,
   532
Australian Jewish News
   (newspaper), 522
Australian Jewish Times
   (newspaper), 522
 Australian Jewish Welfare Society,
   522, 528
 Australian Wallabies, 524
 Austria, 805–808
   Jewish immigration, 114 society, politics, and medicine in Vienna, 301–302
 Austria-Hungary, 75
 Aventura, Florida, 562
 Averroës, 821
 Avicenna, 821

- Avichail, Eliyahu, 85–86, 1221, 1222
- Ávila, Marquitos Karushansky, 737
- Avinum de Lima Semah de Varenca, Ydelfonso, 662
- Avni, Haim, 704
- Avshalomov, Aaron, 1169–1170
- Avshalomov, Jacob, 1170
- Awret, Azriel, 816, 819, 820
- Awret, Irene Spicker, 819, 820
- Azancot, Miriam, 223
- Azerbaijan, 1114–1119
- Azerbaijan Jews in Beijing, China, 1180–1181
- Azgur, Zair, 949
- Azoulay, Andre, 484
- Azulai, Haym Joseph, 352
- Azulay, Jom Tob, 700
- Baal Teshuva movement, 627–628
- Baazov, David, 1121
- Babylonia, 752
  - Jewish leadership in, 762–767
  - Judeans in, 757–762
- Babylonian Captivity of Judah, 453
- Babylonian exile, 1, 7, 72
- Babylonian Jewish Heritage Center, 481
- Babylonian Talmud, 768
- Baby Snooks, 243
- Bacharach, Naphtali Hertz, 37
- Bachayev, Mordakhay “Muhib” H., 1144
- Badalov, Rahmin, 1150, 1151
- Badoglio, Pietro, 479
- Badt, Gustavo, 729
- Baghdad, 768, 771
- Bahamas, Jews in, 662–663
- Bahia, Dutch occupation of, 650
- Bahri, Sadok, 512
- Baiz, Jacobo, 667
- Bajer, David, 672
- Baker, Mark, 524
- Bakhshiev, Mishi, 1116
- Bakovitch, Tuvia, 465
- Bakst, Leon, 949
- Bala Sali, 529
- Balbo, Italo, 479
- Balfour Declaration (1917), 131, 636, 741
- Balkans, Jewish settlements in, 186
- Balkenende, Jan Peter, 889
- Ballarat, Australia, 521
- Balta, José, 728
- Baltic States
  - anti-Semitism in, 1019–1024
  - countries in, 1017
  - Estonia, 1025–1028
  - general population, 1017
  - historical overview, 1017–1019
  - Jewish population in, 1017
  - Latvia, 1028–1034
  - Lithuania, 1034–1045
  - Nazi occupation (1941–1944), 1021–1022
  - postwar era, 1024
  - Soviet rule, 1021, 1022–1024
  - Vilnius as Jewish city, 1046–1049
- Banco Comercial, 712
- Banco del Caribe, 748
- Banco del Nuevo Mundo, 733
- Banco de Venezuela, 748
- BancoFondoComún, 748
- Banco Mayo, 713
- Banco Mercantile, 712
- Banco Patricios, 713
- Banu Hilal, 456
- Banu Nadir, 752
- Banu Qaynuga, 752
- Banu Qurayza, 752
- Barabbas, 104
- Barak, Aharon, 1038
- Barbados, Jews in, 657
- Barbarossa, 455
- Barbary Wars, 455
- Bar Bisna, Amora Samuel, 1146
- Barcelona, Venezuela, 745
- Barcelona Haggadah, 210
- Bard, Solomon, 1188
- Barenboim, Daniel, 712
- Bar Gal, Dvir, 1174
- Bar Hanina, Yosé, 7
- Bar Moshe, Yitzhak, 380, 381
- Bar Nahman, Samuel, 7
- Bar Nâthân, Yitzhaq, 1099
- Barnato, Barney (Isaacs), 496, 519
- Barnett, John, 544
- Barnett, Louis, 543
- Baron, Ben, 520
- Baron, Phillip, 520
- Baron, Salo, 90
- Barouch, André, 512
- Barre, Raymond, 829
- Barreto de Menezes, Francisco, 555, 556–557, 651
- Barrios, Rufino, 667
- Barros Basto, Artur de
- Barsimson, Jacob, 558
- Bartal, Professor, 348
- Bartov, Hanoch, 646, 647–648
- Baruchia Russo, 781
- Baruh, Armand, 961
- Baruh, Emi, 967
- Baruh, Josef Marko, 958
- Baruh, Viktor, 961, 967
- Barukhoff, Gabriel, 1231
- Bar Yohai, Shimon, 316
- Bashyachi, Elijah ben Moses, 93
- Basir, Yusuf, al-, 92
- Basra, 771, 773, 774
- Basri, Yosef, 775
- Bassan, Yehiel, 858
- Bassatine cemetery, 466
- Batar youth movement, 341
- Batei din (house of judgment), 419–421
- Batory, Stefan, King, 1008
- Battenberg, Alexander, 958
- Batto Sfez, 511
- Bat Yam, Libya, 481
- Baume, Lulah, 543
- Bayezid I, Sultan, 956
- Bayezid II, Sultan, 34
- Bearstead, Lord, 1199
- Beck, Andrej Kozar, 1006
- Becker, Jurek, 47
- Beer, Amalie, 262
- Beer-Hoffman, Richard, 45
- Begin, Menachem, 587, 746, 950
- Behar, Nansen, 966
- Behar, Ruth, 701
- Behar, Viktoria, 967
- Beijing, China, 1176–1182
- Beirut Declaration by the League of Arab States, 722
- Beit, Alfred, 519
- Beit, Lipper, 519
- Bela IV, King, 972, 1001
- Belarus, 946–952
- Belev, Alexander, 960
- Belgium
  - See also* Luxembourg, Belgium
  - anti-Semitism, anti-Zionism, existential community problems, 814
  - artists at work in SS camps in, 816–820
  - contemporary overview, 813–815
  - culture, science, and the humanities, 813
  - demographic movement and emigration, 814
  - economic conditions, 813
  - general population, 812
  - historical overview, 812–813
  - Holocaust art, 815–820
  - industries, trades, and professions, 813
  - Jewish education, religious denominations, communal and political institutions, 813–814
  - Jewish population in, 812
  - languages spoken in, 812
- Believing Youth, 795
- Belisario, J. M., 527
- Belize, 656
  - Jews in, 668
- Belkovski, Zvi, 958
- Bell, Francis Dillon, 536
- Bell, Francis Henry Dillon, 535, 536–537
- Bell, Margaret Hort, 536
- Bellew, H.W., 85
- Bellow, Saul, 244, 245
- Belo Horizonte, Brazil, 720
- Belski, Asael, 948
- Belski, Zus, 948
- Bely, V., 1148
- Bénabou, Marcel, 839

- Ben Abraham Anav, Zedekiah, 866
 Benacerraf, Baruj, 458, 747
 Benacerraf, Margot, 748
 Benacerraf, Paul, 458
 Benai Menashe family, 1220
 Ben-Ali, 512
 Benamor, Abraham, of Mekenes, 489–490
 Benamozegh, Eliyahu, 319
 Benaroya, Mois, 966
 Ben-Asher, Aaron, 208, 790
 Benatar, Abraham, 462
 Benatar, Gabriel, 369
 Benatar, Mousa, 369
 Benatar, Salomon, 369, 462
 Benattar, Hayyim, 32–33
 Ben-Avi, Itamar, 200
 Benavides, Oscar, 729
 Benbassat, Albert, 967
 Ben Buruel, Leon, 1187
 Benda, Julien, 835
 Bendavid, 143
 Ben David, Anan, 90
 Ben David, Mordechai, 226
 Ben David, Moshe, 1124
 Ben-David, Yosef, 530
 Bender, A. P., 498
 Bendigo, Australia, 521
 Benedict XIII, 910
 Benedict XVI, 131
 Benedikt, Moriz, 59
 Benei Menashe of India, 1218–1223
 Bene-Israel and Baghdadi Jews in India (20th Century), 1216–1217
 Ben Eliezer, Israel, 211, 1009
 Ben Eliezer, Judith, 1184
 Ben Eliezer, Tovia, 954
 Ben Eli Hallewi, Yaphet, 1130
 Ben Eliyahu Israel, Moshe, 858
 Ben Farha, David Saul Marshall, 1235, 1249
 Ben Gabbai, Meir, 317
 Benghazi, Cyrenaica, 480
 Ben-Gurion, David, 37, 115, 640, 1157, 1234, 1242
 Ben Hananiah, Joshua, 133
 Ben Harash, Matya, 14
 Ben Hatar, Moses, 849
 Ben Hayyim, Abraham, 866
 Ben-Horin, Elaishiv, 1246
 Ben Hyrcanus, Eliezer, 133
 Beniesh, Mois, 961, 966
 Beni Musa, legend of, 454
 Ben Isaac, Nathan, 311
 Ben Isac Abrabanel, Iehuda Leão, 875
 Ben Israel, Manasseh, 82, 84, 144, 318, 363, 923, 1161
 Benjamin, 18
 tribe of, 78, 79
 Benjamin, Ethel, 543
 Benjamin, Frank, 1249
 Benjamin, Israel Joseph, 353
 Benjamin, Rabbi, 1103
 Benjamin, V. L., 1221
 Benjamin, Walter, 42, 43–44, 837
 Benjamin of Tudela, 84, 351, 352, 464, 786, 794, 1008, 1105, 1115, 1123, 1130, 1149
 Ben Jerham, Salmon, 92
 Ben Josef Sason, Aharon, 980
 Ben Joseph, Aaron, 92
 Ben Judah, Gershom, 252
 Ben Judah, Jacob, 25
 Ben Judah Solomon Zalman, Elijah, 1035
 Benkow, Jo, 1085
 Ben Lev, Josef, 980
 Ben Levi, Joshua, 5–6
 Benlolo, Jack, 221
 Ben Mahir Ibn Tibbon, Jacob, 351
 Ben Meir ha-Kohen, Shabbetai, 1041
 Ben Moses Farhi, Estori, 351
 Ben-Moshe, Danny, 118
 Ben Moshe Moskona, Judah, 980
 Ben Nahman, Moshe, 316
 Ben Nissan, Mordecai, 93
 Benny, Jack (Benjamin Kubelsky), 241, 243
 Benoliel, Abraham, 459
 Benoliel, David, 459
 Benoliel, Esther Benathar, 459
 Benoliel, Judah, 849
 Ben Porat, Mordechai, 378, 775
 Benros, Gardenia, 459
 Benros, Isaac, 459
 Ben Samuel, Baruch, 352
 Ben Samuel, Samuel, 1149
 Ben Samuel, Simhah, 25
 Ben Samuel, Solomon, 1124
 Ben Samuel Adrabi, Ishaak, 980
 Ben Sarûq, Menahem, 1099
 Ben Schloyme Zalmen, Eyliohu, 211, 1038, 1041
 Ben Shmuel, Elisha, 1095
 Bensusan, Menahem, 958
 Benvenisti, Maxim, 966
 Ben Yahi, Yahia, III, 893
 Ben Yehuda, Baruch, 347
 Ben-Yehuda, Eliezer, 197, 200, 201, 1038, 1044
 Ben Yohai, Simeon, 6
 Ben Yonah, Benjamin, 980
 Ben Zakkai, Rabban Yohanan, 5
 Benzaquén, Willy, 730
 Ben-Zvi, Yitzchak, 1231
 Ben Zvi Institute, 791
 Ber, R'Dov, 326
 Berab, Jacob, 35
 Berakhiah, 7
 Berav, Yaacov, 31
 Berdichevsky, Micha Joseph, 403
 Berendsen, Ivar, 1069
 Berenson, Bernard, 235, 1037
 Berg, Gertrude, 242
 Bergen-Belsen, camps at, 479
 Berger, Adolfo, 733
 Berger, Elmer, 339
 Berger, Victor, 593
 Bergson, Peter, 599–600
 Berle, Milton (Mendel Berlinger), 243
 Berlin, Irving, 237
 Berlin, Isaiah, 1031, 1032
 Berlin, Saul, 933
 Bermant, Chaim, 897
 Bernard of Clairvaux, 129
 Bernburg (Liepman), Paul, 1052, 1078
 Bernhardt, Sarah, 825
 Bernice (wife of Aristobulus), 1112
 Bernice, Queen, 69, 70–71
 Bernstein, Aaron Simcha, 635
 Bernstein, Eduard, 846
 Bernstein, Herman, 943
 Bernstein, Leonard, 227, 238
 Bessantchi, Jewish member of Parliament, 366
 Bessels, Emil, 353
 Bessis, Albert, 512
 Beta Israel, Ethiopia, 450, 468–469, 472, 473
Betar (Likud), 499, 664, 733, 743
 Bet-El Community, Mexico, 675
 Beth Israel Community Center, Mexico, 675
 Beth Knesset Siyahh Israel, Abuja, 493
 Betta, Chiara, 1242
 Bettelheim, Bruno, 59–60
 Bet Yosef, 529–530
Beyachad Communal Centre, Johannesburg, 498
 Beyda, Raymond, 616
 Bezalel, 292
 Bezmozgis, David, 249
 Biale, Rachel, 406
 Bialik, Hayim Nahman, 234
 Bibas, R. Hayim, 488
 Biberach, camps at, 479
 Bible, 11–12
 Abraham-Ishmael story, 151
 Greek versions, 132–135
 Moses, 151
 symbols of diaspora, 17, 18–22
ta'amim (marking signs), 215 vernacular translations, 178, 253
 Biblical cantillation, 215–216
 Biblical Hebrew, 193
 Biblical literature, 1–4, 5
 Biblical prehistory of Israel and symbols of diaspora, 17–18
 Bieder, Joan, 1249
 Bild, Benjamin, 1084
 Biller, Maxim, 47
 Billy, André, 836
 Binger, Louis Gustave, 353
 Birmajer, Marcelo, 709
 Birman, Meir Mendelevich, 1184
 Birnbaum, Nathan, 46
 Birnbaum, Solomon A., 193

- Bismarck, Otto von, 192, 845
 Bismüth, Roger, 512
 Bizerte crisis (1961), 511
 Black Code, 659–660
 Black Death (1348–1349), 76, 98
 Blaisten, Isidoro, 698
 Blanc, Herman, 734
 Blanco, Antonio Guzmán, 746
 Blau, Amram, 336
 Blaumanis, Rudolf, 1032
 Blaustein, Jacob, 640
 Bleich, Yaakov Dov, 1014
 Bleichröder, Gerson, 845
 Blida, 458
 Bloch, Ernest, 227, 919
 Bloch family, 1189
 Block, Abraham, 476
 Bloemfontein, South Africa, 494
 Bloom syndrome, 278
 Bluestone, Joseph Isaac, 635
 Blum, Karen, 491
 Blum, Léon, 827
 Blumenthal, Nissan, 212
 B'nai Akiva, 743
 B'nai Brak, 513, 514
 B'nai B'rith, 523, 525, 551, 597, 665, 668, 670, 672
 B'nai Jerusalem, 554
 B'nai Zion, 640–641
 Bnei Akiva (Religious Zionist), 499, 541, 768
 Bnei Akiva youth movement, 341, 641
 Bnei Ephraim, 451
 Bnei Gat, 451
 Bnei Menashe, 451
 Bnei Zebulun, 451
 Boas, Franz, 353
 Boas, Tobias, 1228
 Boa Vista, 459, 460
 Bodson, Victor, 885
 Boemas, Abraham, 1034
 Boerne, Ludwig, 43
 Boers, 494
 Bogale, Yona, 469
 Bohbot, Mercedes, 220–221
 Bolado, C., 720
 Bolaffi, Albert, 528
 Boleslaw V, Prince, 983
 Bolívar, Simón, 745
 Bolivia, Jews in, 694
 Bomasz, M., 985
 Bonder, Nilton, 721
 Bonnet, Charles, 143
 Bonnier, Albert, 1055, 1090
 Bonnier, Eva, 1054, 1090
 Bonsenior, Judah, 906
 Borchardt, Rudolph, 45
 Bores, Tato, 698
 Borges, Jorge Luis, 695
 Borinsky, Alicia, 709
 Boris, Ernst, 299
 Boris, Prince, 954
 Boris III, King, 960
 Borisovich, Aulov Semen, 1153
 Borokhov, Ber, 1043
 Borowitz, Eugene, 568
 Borsippa, 759
 Borsky, Maros, 231
 Borso I, 877
 Boruhov, Boris, 1145
 Botswana, Jews in, 452
 Botz, Gerhard, 808
 Bougie, 455
 Bourguiba, Habib, 511, 512
 Boyington, Mike, 160
 Brandeis, Louis, 344, 636–637
 Brandes, Georg, 1069
 Brandon, David Henry, 672
 Brandwein, Naftule, 228
 Brann, Ross, 154
 Brasch, Charles, 543
 Brazil
   Jews in, 690, 693, 694, 716–722
   Portuguese, 650
   transatlantic trade and, 723–727
 Brazilian Marranism, 160–166
 Brazilian National Commission for Catholic-Jewish Dialogue, 720
 Breast cancer, 278–279
 Breen, Joseph I., 240
 Bremer, Max, 733
 Brenner, Sydney, 502
 Breuer, Isaac, 336
 Brice, Fanny (Fania Borach), 243
 Bridgetown, Barbados, 657
 Briem, Helgi, 1079–1080
 Brigham, Daniel, 461
 Brisbane, Australia, 522
 British
   chief rabbinate, 933–936 influence on world Jewry, 936–937
 British East Africa, 475. See also Kenya
 British Levant Company, 789
 British Mandatory Palestine, 572, 598
 British South African Company, 518
 Brit Millah, 511
 Brod, Max, 970
 Broder, Henryk M., 47, 107
 Brodie, Israel, 935
 Broido, G., 1138
 Broken Hill, Zambia, 516, 517
 Bronze medal depicting Gracia Nasi, 253
 Brooks, Mel (Melvin Kaminsky), 243, 246
 Brown, David, 895
 Brown, Denise Scott, 517
 Bruce, Lenny (Leonard Schneider), 243
 Bruller, Jean, 837
 Brusilovsky, Evhenii, 1134–1135
 Buber, Martin, 42, 46, 80, 403, 404, 625, 628
 Buchenwald concentration camp, 396
 Buchwald, Theo, 730, 733
 Buckley, Charles, 1247
 Buenos Aires, 713–714
 Bukharan Jews in Central Asia, 1123–1125
 Bukiet, Melvin Jules, 249
 Bulawayo Hebrew Congregation in Rhodesia, 518, 519, 520
 Bulgaria, 953–967
   contemporary overview, 963–967
   ethnic backgrounds, 953
   general population, 953
   historical overview, 953–963
   important personalities, 966
   Jewish contributions, 966–967
   Jewish population in, 953
   languages spoken, 953
   migration routes, 953
   synagogue in Sofia, 965
 Bulliet, Richard, 140
 Bulz, Emmanuel, 884
 Burchardt, Hermann, 353
 Burghal, Ali, 478
 Burman, Daniel, 702
 Burns, George (Nathan Birnbaum), 243
 Burrows, Abe, 238
 Bursa, 776
 Burshtein, Chaim, 1037, 1038
 Burstein, Zuño, 733
 Burton, Monatgue, 932
 Buzaglo, David, 216
 Buzand, P'awstos, 1108, 1109, 1110
 Bwl'n, 1102
 Byzantine Empire and Karaites, 92
 Cadmus, 64
 Caesar, Julius, 68
 Caesar, Sid, 243
 Cahan, Abraham, 236, 594, 836
 Cairo Genizah fragment, 311
 Calah, 752, 755
 California gold rush, 671
 Calles, Plutarco Elias, 674
 Calochristianakis, Police Chief, 366
 Camaguey, Cuba, 664
 Canada, Jews in, 548–552
 Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy, 550, 551
 Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), 549, 551
 Canavan disease, 279
 Canetti, Elias, 919, 963, 966
 Cantares, 487
 Cantor, Eddie (Israel Iskowitz), 243
 Cape Santo António, 557–558
 Cape Verde, Jews in, 459–461
 Cape Verde-Israel Friendship Society, 461

- Cap Francais, Haiti, 660, 661
 Cap Haitien, Haiti, 660
 Caracalla, Emperor, 865
 Caracas, Venezuela, 746
 Cardenas, Lázaro, 674
 Cardoso, Isaac, 318
 Cardozo, Aaron, 849
 Cardozo, Benjamin Nathan, 563
 Caribbean Islands and hidden
   Jews, 158–159
 Carlebach, Ezriel, 157
 Carlebach, Shlomo, 214, 226, 625,
   628, 629, 721
 Carlo V, King, 871
 Carlton, Australia, 522
 Carlyle, Thomas, 931
 Carmel, Yosef, 429
 Caro, Joseph, 797
 Carter, Jimmy, 385, 583
 Carthage, Jewish settlement in, 449
 Casa de la Comunidad Hebrea de Cuba, 664
 CASA Sefardita, 714
 Casa Sephardi, Argentina, 712
 Casipoera, 654
 Cassab, Judy, 524
 Cassel, Ernest, 932
 Cassell, Curtis, 338
 Cassin, René, 830
 Castan, Ron, 524
 Castan, Siegfried Ellwanger, 722
 Castiel, Carol, 461
 Castro, Fidel, 664
 Cathedral Synagogue, Sydney, 521
 Catherine I, Empress, 1009
 Catherine II, Empress, 1009, 1010
 Catherine of Braganza, 489
 Caucasus, 1093–1097
 Caucasus and Central Asia
   Afghanistan, 1129–1132
   ancient Armenia, 1108–1113
   Armenia, 1104–1107
   Azerbaijan, 1114–1119
   Caucasus, 1093–1097
   Central Asia, 1122–1129
   Georgia, 1119–1122
   Kazakhstan, 1132–1136
   Khazaria, 1097–1104
   Kyrgyzstan, 1136–1141
   medieval Armenia, 1113–1114
   Tajikistan, 1142–1146
   Turkmenistan, 1146–1149
   Uzbekistan, 1149–1154
 Cayman Islands, Jews in, 663
 Cedex Malta, Charles V, Emperor,
   886
 Ceiba, Honduras, 669
 Celan, Paul, 42
 Céline, Louis-Ferdinand, 837
 Center for Jewish Art rescue and preservation of Diaspora cultural heritage, 229–233
 Center for Jewish History, New York City, 562
 Center for Sephardic Studies, 747
 Central African Zionism
   Organization, 518
 Central America. See also
   countries in
   Jews in, 667–673
 Central and Eastern Europe and Russia
   Albania, 942–946
   Belarus, 946–952
   Bulgaria, 953–967
   Central Europe, Eastern
   Europe, and Russia, 938–942
   Czech Republic, 968–971
   Hungary, 971–979
   Poland, 982–988
   relationship between Habad Hasidism and Russia,
   998–1001
   Republic of Macedonia,
   979–982
   Romania and Moldova, 988–992
   Russia, 992–997
   Slovakia, 1001–1004
   Slovenia, 1004–1007
   Ukraine, 1007–1016
 Central Asia, 1122–1129
   Bukharan Jews, 1123–1125 countries, 1122
   early Jewish history, 1122–1123
   general population, 1122
   Jewish population in, 1122
   languages spoken, 1122
   Russian rule, 1125–1126
   Soviet Era, 1126–1128
 Central Europe, 938–942 anti-Semitism, anti-Zionism movements, and community existential problems, 940–941
   contemporary overview, 939–941
   culture, science, and the humanities, 939
   demographic movement and emigration, 941
   economic conditions, 939–940
   general population, 938
   historical overview, 938–939
   Jewish education, religious denominations, communal and political institutions, 940
   Jewish population in, 938
 Central Europe and Jewish women
   (19th–20th centuries),
   260–263
 Central Sephardic Jewish Community of America, 562
 Centro Deportivo Israelita (CDI),
   675, 685
 Centro Hebreo, 667
 Cerro, Sánchez, 729
 Ceuta, Morocco, 487, 489
 Chachuak, Rohluma, 1221
 Chachuak, Vanlalkhuma, 1221
 Chacrón, Isaac, 709
 Chad, 454
 Chagall, Marc, 231, 819, 827, 829,
   836, 949
 Chaim, Chafetz, 950
 Chaim Weizmann Research Institute, 747
 Challianthanga, 1218–1219
 Chaluchuapa, 668
 Chamama, Banat, 512
 Chamberlain, Houston Stewart,
   51–52, 106
 Charikar, Abraham David, 1226
 Charity Organization Society, 564
 Charlemagne, 821, 842
 Charles I, King, 923
 Charles II, King, 489, 658, 923
 Charles IV, Emperor, 968
 Charles VI, King, 822, 969
 Charles VIII, 866
 Charles X, 825
 Charlestown, Barbados, 658
 Chaskalson, Arthur, 502
 Chaucer, Geoffrey, 110
 Chávez, Hugo, 749
 Chechuen, 487, 489
 Cherikover, Elyahu, 1048
 Chervonenko, E., 1014
 Chester, Ilan, 748
 Child-rearing in Scandinavia, 1060
 Chile, Jews in, 690, 694
 Chilova, Nina, 966
 China, 1155–1159
   See also Beijing, Kaifeng and Shanghai, China
   contemporary overview, 1176–1179
   ethnic backgrounds, 1155
   general population, 1155
   historical Jewish personalities, 1167–1171
   historical overview, 1155–1159
   Jewish population in, 1155
   languages spoken, 1155 major cities, 1176–1182
   migration routes and ethnic backgrounds, 1155
 Chinandega, Nicaragua, 669
 Chirac, Jacques, 829
 Chironomy, 208
 Chlimper, José, 731
 Chmielnicki, Bogdan, 101
 Chmielnicki massacres, 76
 Chocrón, Isaac, 748
 Christ. See Jesus
 Christchurch, New Zealand, 535
 Christensen, Karsten, 1062
 Christianity
   anti-Semitism and, 104,
   109–110, 130
   dissemination of early beyond
   Jewish Diaspora, 123–125 emphasis on divine vulnerability, 62
   Jewish converts to, 138

- Christianity (continued)
 Jewish Diaspora and spreading of, 126–132
 Jewish influence on formation of Scripture, 132–136
 Pauline mission, 123–124
 Roman Empire and, 123–124, 127
 Samaritans, 124
 as threat to Jewish Diaspora, 129 transformation in relations between Jews and, 130
- Christian IV, King, 1050, 1062
- Christian–Jewish dialogue, 141–146
- Christian lands, expulsion from, 129–130
- Christian populations indicated by delegates to Council of Nicaea, 124–125
- Christians
 censorship of Jewish worship, 27
 Greek-speaking, 133–134 influencing love for Judaism, 149
- Christian Zionists, 131
- Christina, Queen, 1050, 1088
- Chronology of Jewish travelers and explorers, 351–354
- Chrysostom, John, Saint, 104
- Churchill, Winston, 112, 1188
- Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, 632–633
- Cicero (106–43 BCE), 65, 104
- Cinematheca National, 748
- Circolo Sion, 479
- Citrin, Walter J., 1202
- Civil rights end, 847–848
- Classical liberalism, 74
- Claudius, Emperor, 69–70
- Clement VII, 83
- Clinton, Bill, 1158, 1166, 1167
- Clinton, Hillary, 1158
- Clore, Charles, 932
- Clovis, King, 821
- Club Social y Deportivo Hebraica, Venezuela, 748
- Coalition for the Advancement in Jewish Education, 548
- Code Noir*, 559
- Cohen, A. J., 1242
- Cohen, Albert, 837, 919
- Cohen, Arthur, 248
- Cohen, Ben, 601
- Cohen, D. J., 1226
- Cohen, E. M. D., 1226
- Cohen, Elliot, 595
- Cohen, Francis Lyon, 28
- Cohen, Henry Freeman, 502
- Cohen, Hermann, 337, 404
- Cohen, Isaac, 365, 366, 896
- Cohen, Israel, 1236, 1237, 1242, 1248
- Cohen, John Jacob, 522
- Cohen, Joshua, 1134, 1135
- Cohen, Judith R., 228
- Cohen, Leonard, 550
- Cohen, M. L., 492
- Cohen, Marcel, 839
- Cohen, Matt, 550
- Cohen, Morris Abraham “Two Gun,” 1168
- Cohen, Moss (Paddy), 519
- Cohen, Philip, 137
- Cohen, Phillip Joseph, 521
- Cohen, Robert, 458
- Cohen, Robert Waley, 935
- Cohen, Samuel, 1186
- Cohen, Sandro, 709
- Cohen, Sara, 966
- Cohen, Sathie, 355
- Cohen, Shalom, 512, 1205, 1207
- Cohen, Shalome, 355, 356–357
- Cohen, Simon “Sam,” 491
- Cohen, Theodore, 1199
- Cohen, Tobias, 352
- Cohen, Yeshaya, 1135
- Cohen modal haplotype, 450
- Cohen-Tannoudji, Claude, 458
- Cohn, Felice, 564
- Cohn, Ferdinand, 299
- Cohn, Harry, 240
- Colegio Sinai, 747
- Colegio Yavne, Cuba, 664
- Colombia, Jews in, 690
- Colón, Cristóbal, 651
- Colón, Diego, 651
- Colón, Isabel, 651, 658
- Colón, Louis, 651
- Colón, Portugallo, 658
- Colorectal cancer, 279–280
- Columbus, Christopher, 352, 689
- Comision Coordinadora de lasw Sociedades Religiosas Hebreas de Cuba, 664
- Comité Central de la Comunidad Judía de Mexico, 679
- Comité Central Israelita del Uruguay, 743
- Comité Central Israelita de México, 674
- Comité de Orden y Vigilancia, Mexico, 679
- Comité de Protección de Ayuda al Inmigrante (Protection Committee to Help Immigrants), 730
- Comite Israelita Cubano de Ayuda a los Aliados, 664
- Comité Peruano Pro Palestina Hebrea (Pro Hebrew Palestine Peruvian Committee), 730
- Comite udio Anti-Nazi, 664
- Commerce in Salonica, 860–864
- Communication in premodern diaspora, 38–42
- Communist Party (CPUSA), 593, 594–595
- Community-based kollels, 428
- Como, Moise, 874
- Comsejo Mexicano de Mujeres Israelitas, Mexico, 679
- Comte d’Estaing, Jean Baptiste Charles Henri Hector, 660–661
- Concejo Central Sionist, 742
- Conchillos, Lope de, 665
- Confederação Israelita do Brazil (CONIB), 720
- Confederación de Asociaciones Israelitas de Venezuela, 748–749
- Confederation of Jewish Associations of Venezuela (CAIV), 747
- Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, 640
- Congruence principle (multiple causation), 204
- Consejo Central Comunitario Hebreo de Panama, 672
- Consejo Central de la Comunidad Judia de Guatemala, 668
- Conservative Judaism, 225–227, 271, 613
 in Canada, 550, 568
- Consistoire d’Algerie, 458
- Constantine, 127, 455, 865
- Constantine I, Czar, 992
- Constantinople, 753
- Samaritans and, 88
- Contemporary Diaspora conversion patterns into Orthodox Judaism, 421–424
- demography of modern Diaspora Jewry, 392–402
- Habad movement organizations and influence in Diaspora, 430–447
- insight into workings of Batei Din, 419–421
- international network of religious Zionist Kollels, 427–429
- Jewish day school education in French-speaking Europe, 424–426
- Jewish values and philanthropy, 407–412
- reflections on modern nate and Jewish community, 416–418
- responses to intermarriage, 412–416
- self-revitalization of Diaspora Life, 402–407
- Contemporary Jewish music in America, 225–229
- Contemporary migration patterns of Russian Jews to Germany, 386–391
- Contreras, Eleazar López, 746
- Cook, Michael, 153

- Copland, Aaron, 237
 Cordova, Emmanuel de, 549
 Cordovero, Moses, 34, 35, 317, 776
 Cornelius Hispalus, 66
 Coro, Venezuela, 745
 Cortés, Hernán, 673
 Corvinus, Matthias, 972
 Cosgrove, Hazel, 897
 Cosimo I of Florence, 866
 Cosmides, G., 368
 Costa Rica, Jews in, 694
 Costeff optic atrophy syndrome (3-methylglutaconicaciduria type 3), 280
 Cotler, Irwin, 550
 Cotton, Jack, 932
 Coughlin, Charles, 634
 Council for Zambia Jewry, 516
 Council of Jewish Communities in Iran, 770
   in Morocco, 485
 Council of Jewish Federations, 643
 Council of Jewish Women, 522
 Countries with largest Jewish populations (2005), 398 (table)
 Crema, Rafael, 874
 Cremasco, Isaco, 874
 Crémieux, Adolphe, 825
Crémieux decree (1870), 455, 457 reinstatement of, 457 repeal of, 457
 Cresques, Abraham, 352
 Cresques, Jehuda, 352
 Cresson, Warder, 635
 Cromwell, Oliver, 363, 658, 923, 930, 1161
 Crone, Patricia, 153
 Cronenberg, David, 550
 Crusades, 97–98, 129
 Cuba, Jews in, 663–665
 Cuernavaca, Mexico, 679
 Cultural Zionists, 75
 Cultures, 73
 Curaçao, Venezuela, 660, 745
   Jews in, 654–656
 Curiel, Morris E., 747
 Curitiba, Brazil, 720
 Cutha, 752
 Cutler, Ivor, 897
 Cyprus and Jewish rebellion, 71
 Cyrene, 449, 477
   Jewish revolt in, 70, 71
   Jewish settlement in, 449
 Cyril of Alexandria, Bishop, 96
 Cyrus, Emperor, 2, 81, 767, 1225
 Cysner, Joseph, 1245
 Cystic fibrosis, 280
 Cytrynowicz, Roney, 708
 Czech Republic, 968–971
 Czeller, Arthur, Dr., 292

 Da Joao III, King of Portugal, 161
 Da Bahia, Salvador, 726
 Da Bozzolo, Viviano, 874
 Da Costa, Isaac, 654
 Dacosta de Andrade, Benjamin, 659
 Dacy, Marianne, 123
 D'Aguilar, Moses Rafael, 651
 Dahan, Yitzhak, 791
 Dahlberg, Edward, 595
 Dahya, 510
 Daiches, David, 897
 Daiches, Salis, 896
 Damascene Jews, 615
 Damascus, Syria, 218–219, 753, 786, 787, 788
 Damasio, Antonio, 165
 Dan, tribe of, 79, 82, 84
 Danas, 64
 Danby, Michael, 525
 Daniel, 19
 Daniel, Andrei, 966
 Daniel, Ida, 966
 Daniel, Isak, 966
 Daniel, Leon, 966
 Daniel, T., 1220–1221
 Danish Virgin Islands, 671
 Dannecker, Theodore, 960
 Danovski, Boyan, 966
 Darius, 767
 Darmon, Raoul, 512
 Darwish, Shalom, 381
 Da Silva, Lula, 722
 David, 79, 196, 292, 751, 787
 David, Larry, 244
 David ben Zimra (Radbaz), 468
 Davidov, Yuri, 1139
 Davidovich, Bella, 1117
 Davidovich, Efim, 948
 Davidovs family, 1126
 Davidson, Henrik, 1090
 Davidsson, Elias, 1081
 Davis, Edmund, 517
 Davis, Ernest, 542
 Davis, Samuel, 491
 Davydov, Valery, 1145
 Davydov, Yosef, 1150
 Dayan, Moshe, 1253
 Day school education in
   French-speaking Europe, 424–426, 832–834
 Dead Sea Scrolls, 133, 791
 De Barros Basto, Arthur Carlos, 893, 894
 De Beers Diamond Mining, 496
 Deborah the prophetess, 79
 De Carvajal, Luis, 700
 De Castro, Aida, 672
 De Castro, Benedictus, 1088
 De Castro, Herbert, 672
 De Castro, Hernand, 663
 De Cattaoui, Pasha Moise, 527
 De Champlain, Samuel, 548
 De Dios Porta, Dolores, 663
 De Fano, Menahem Azariah, 22
 De Hevesy, George, 975
 De Hirsch, Baron Maurice, 701, 711, 717
 Deive, Carlos Esteban, 665
 Dekalo, Fenya, 967
 DeKeyser, Desire, 812
 De Klerk, Willem, 497
 De la Barre, Lefebvre, 652
 De Lagarde, Paul, 452
 De la Motthe, Jacques, 557
 De la Torre, Raúl, 702
 De Leão, Duarte Nunes, 163
 Delegacion de Asociaciones Israelitas Argentinas (DAIA), 714
 De Leon, Moshe, 316
 De Lesseps, Ferdinand, 826
 De Lima, Duarte, 1062
 Delvalle, Max Shalom, 672
 De Marchena, Enrique, 666
 De Marchena, Rafael de
   Mordeciah, 666
 De Medici, Ferdinando I., Grand Duke, 362
 De Medina, Samuel, 317, 980
 De Meneses, Luís, 555
 De Mercado, Rafael, 657
 Democracies, 112–113
 Democratic Republic of Congo, 452
   Jewish community of, 461–463
 Democritus, 108
 Demography of modern Diaspora Jewry, 392–402
 Dengel, Sarsa (1563–1597), 468
 Denmark, 1062–1070
   general population, 1062
   historical overview, 1062–1070
   Jewish population in, 1062
   languages spoken, 1062
   migration routes and ethnic backgrounds, 1062
 Denomination and Jewish identity, in America, 613–614
 De Parquet, M., 659
 De Pass, Aaron, 490–491
 De Pass, Elias, 490–491
 De'Pastorini, Giovan Michele, 253
 De Piérola, Nicolás, 728
 De Puig, Luis Maria, 117
 De Rothschild, Edmund, 469
 Derrida, Jacques, 165, 458, 830, 839
 De Salomo Levi Maduro, Moses, 656–657
 De Sola, Abraham, 549
 De Sola, Herbert, 668
 De Sola Pool, David, 562
 D'Este, Ercole I, 877
 D'Este, Ercole II, 877, 881
 De Thiery, Baron, 671
 De Torres, Luis, 663
 De Tudella, Benjamin, 955
 Deutero-Isaiah, 2
 Deutsch, Carol (Karel), 818
 De Vallsecha, Gabriel, 352
 Development Corporation for Israel/State of Israel Bonds, 641

- De Vidas, Eliyahu, 776
 De Villadestes, Mecia, 352
 De Vushal, Moshe, 858
 Dewey, John, 627
 Dey, Hussein, 455, 456
 Deyfus, Salomón Joseph, 730
 Dhamar, 799
Dhimmi (statute), 455, 456, 510
 Diamond, David, 227
 Diaspora
   aliyah, 344
   anti-Zionism, 333–340
   attitude of American Jewish thinkers toward, 566–570
   batei din (house of judgment), 419–421 contemporary Judeo-Christian communities, 146–150 demography of modern Jews, 392–402 dissemination of early Christianity beyond, 123–125
   education, 340–341
   education in Israel about, 345–350 engagement with Israel, 340–345 generational factor, 345 genetic diseases, 287–292
   Habad movement, 430–447
   history of, 64–94
   history of Judeo-Christian communities, 136–139 immigration to Israel, 331–332 influences on modern Hebrew, 200–205
   Jewish Enlightenment and impact on, 320–324
   Jewish music, 206–214
   Jewry as archetypal, 54–57 languages of, 167–207
   Lurianic kabbalah and, 34–38
   medicine, 294–300
   philanthropy and Jewish values, 343–344, 407–412 political activism, 344
   Portuguese Jews, Italy and beyond, 875–883 role of women, 251–255 self-revitalization, 402–407 and spreading of Christianity, 126–132 symbols of, 17–23
   transition from negation to Jewish continuity, 346–347 varieties of languages, 171–180 volunteering, 342–343
   Yiddish, 193–197
   youth movements, 341–342
 Diaspora Batei Din, insight into workings of, 419–421
 Diaspora cultural heritage, rescue and preservation by Center for Jewish Art, 229–233
Diaspora Jiosy Gasy (Diaspora Jewish Malagasy), 452 Diaspora languages
   Aramaic, 177–178
   Yiddish, 193–197
 Diaspora themes
   biblical literature, 1–4
   communication in premodern diaspora, 38–42 concept of Sephardi and Ashkenazi in German-Jewish and German anti-semitic thought, 48–52
   German-Jewish literature and art, 42–48
   Hellenistic period, 8–16
   Jewish identity, 61–63
   Jewish self-hatred, 57–60
   Jewry as archetypal Diaspora, 54–57
   Joseph B. Solovetchik, 52–54
   liturgy, 23–30
   Lurianic Kabbalah and idea of diaspora, 34–38
   Sephardi exile and diaspora concepts, 31–34
   symbols of diaspora, 17–23
   Talmudic thought, 4–7
 Diaz, Porfirio, 690
 Dickens, Charles, 110
 Didi, 514
 Diestel family, 1189
 Dighet, 509
 Dik, Aizik Meir, 1047
 Dik, Isaac Meir, 1043
 Dillon, Francis Henry, 545
 Dimanshtein, Simon, 1138
 Dina, Abraam (of Fontanella), 874
 Dinur, Ben-Zion, 347
 Dio, 70–71, 1110
 Diocletian, 124
 Diodorus Siculus (late first century BCE), 64
 Diogenes, 68–69
 DioGuardi, Joe, 945
 Dionis, Albert, 1050
 Dionysus, 67
 Dioscorides, 915
 Diseases. See Genetic diseases
 Dispensationalism, 633
 Disraeli, Benjamin, 925
 Djemal, Isaac, 1251
 Djerassi, Robert, 966
 Djerba (island), 509, 513
 Djerrada, 483
 Djibouti, 451
 Dobkin, Barbara, 406
 Döblin, Alfred, 43, 47
 Dohm, Christian W., 143–145
 Domin, Hilda, 47
 Dominican Republic, Jews in, 665–666
 Dominican Republic Settlement Association (DORSA), 666
 Domitian, Emperor, 71
 Donme, 780, 781, 782, 783–785
 Dorfman, Ariel, 698, 708
 Dorfman family, 1189
 Douek, Ezra, 530
 Dov Ber, Shalom, 439
 Dov-Ber Lebensohn, Abraham, 1044
 Drabinsky, Garth, 550
 Dreifuss, Ruth, 919
 Dreyfus, Alfred, 240–241, 826, 827, 835
 Dreyfus, Augusto, 728
 Dreyfus, George, 524
 Dreyfus affair, 457
 Drory, Rina, 154
 Drucker, Jack, 491
 Druckman, Chaim, 429
 Drumont, Edouard, 826
 Dubinsky, David, 593, 596
 Dubnow, Simon, 335, 949, 1032, 1048
 Dunedin, New Zealand, 535
Dunera, 523
 Dunn, James, 127
 Durban World Conference against Racism (2001), 501 Durkheim, Émile, 627, 825
 Dushan the Great, 980
 Dutch Brazil, 650–651
 Dutch invasion of Brazil, 162
 Dutch West India Company, 558, 559, 651, 654, 726
 Dvorkis, D., 1014
 Dylan, Bob, 226
 Early Jewish history
   Caucasus, 1093–1094
   Central Asia, 1122–1123
 East Asia
   China, 1155–1159
   historical Jewish personalities in, 1167–1171 major cities in, 1176–1182
   Harbin, 1182–1185
   Hong Kong, 1186–1193
   Japan, 1196–1203
   Kaifeng, China, 1160–1167
   Shanghai, 1172–1176
   Taiwan, 1193–1195
 Eastern Diaspora, 11, 15
 Eastern Europe, 938–942
   anti-Semitism, 940–941
   anti-Zionist movements, 940–941 beginnings of Hasidism, 325–327
   communal institutions, 940 community existential problems, 940–941
   contemporary overview, 939–941
   culture, 939
   economic conditions, 939–940
   emigration, 941
   general population, 938
   historical overview, 938–939
   humanities, 939

- Jewish education, 940
 Jewish population by country, 938
 Karaites, 93
   political institutions, 940
   religious denominations, 940
 Eastern Jewish Association, 529
 Eban, Abba, 1253
 Ebansu, Subaru, 1202
 Eber, Irene, 1162
 Eberly, Annette, 1243
 Ecuador, Jews in, 694
 Ecumenism, 626
 Edelstein, Heinz, 1081
 Eden, 17
 Edict of Expulsion, 689
 Edirne, 776
 Edison, Thomas, 239
 Edmonton, Canada, 551
 Edom, 20, 80
 Education, 340–341
   challenges and activities, 349–350
   Diaspora, 340–341
   international network of religious Zionist kollels, 427–429
   in Israel about Diaspora, 345–350
   Jewish continuity efforts in Israeli, 347–349
   Jewish day school in French-speaking Europe, 424–426, 832–834
 Edward I, King, 99–100, 923
 Edward VII, King, 932
 Egalitarianism and women in American Judaism, 271–274
 Egypt, 71, 73, 449, 450, 453 attack on Israel, 80 exile to, 18–19
   Jewish rebellion in, 71
   Jews expelled from, 64
   Jews in, 4, 8, 463–467
   Karaites, 92, 93
   migration routes, 375–378
   Samaritans, 87, 89
   Therapeutic community, 252
 Ehrenpreis, Markus, 958
 Ehrlich, M. Avrum, 1159
 Ehrlich, Paul, 299
 Eichmann, Adolf, 346, 452, 711, 816, 974
 Eidelman, Samuel, 729
 Einfeld, Marcus, 524
 Einfeld, Sydney D., 377, 528
 Einhorn, Ephraim F., 1194
 Einstein, Albert, 42, 233, 358, 919, 965, 1183, 1185, 1248
 Eisenberg, Shoul, 1157, 1202
 Eisenmenger, Johannes, 98
 Eishel, 679
 Eisner, Kurt, 847
 Eitinger, Leo, 1055, 1085
 Eitingon, Max, 949
 Elafrit, Cheikh, 512
 Elam, 768
 Elat Hayyim, 626
 Elbaz, Massoud, 507, 508
 Eldad Ha-Dani, 468
 Eldad of tribe of Dan, 82
 Eleazar, 6, 1213
 Elephantine, Egypt, 752, 761
   Jewish military colony in, 449
 Eli, Japheth ben, 90–91, 141
 Elias, Benjamin Nissim, 357
 Elias, Ney, 353
 Elias family, 1187, 1189, 1215
 El-Idrisi, Mohammed, 1130
 Eliezer, 31, 82, 954
 Eliezer, Matzliah, 506
 Elijah, 19, 1210, 1211
 Elijah, Aaron ben, 92
 Eliot, George, 130, 201
 Eliot, T. S., 110
 Eliez (Elias), 1120
 Elisabeth, Queen, 817
 Elisabethville (now Lubumbashi), 462
 Elisa or Dido, Carthage, 510
 "Eli the Fanatic," 246
 Eliyahu, Mordechai, 429
 Elizabeth, Queen, 923
 Elizabeth Petrovna, Empress, 1009
 El Kahina, 454
 Elkan, Sophie, 1055, 1090
 Elkes, Elhanan, 1037
 Elkin, Judith Laikin, 696, 704, 705
 El Levi, Ferrer, 877
 El Salvador, Jews in, 668–669
 Elstätter, Julius, 845
 Elyah, Matzliah b., Rav., 312, 313
 Emancipation struggle for Jews in Germany (1848–1933), 844
 Emigration motivation, 387–389
   Syrian Jews, 218
 Emmanuel, King of Portugal, 101
 Emmanuel, Taamrat, 469
 Emunah of America, 641
 Engel, Joel, 212
 England, 99–100, 104, 113–114, 119, 254
 English, integration of Yiddish into, 197–199
 Enlai, Zhou, 1157, 1163, 1171
 Enlightenment, 74, 75
   anti-Semitism, 105
   Germany, 192
   philosophy of tolerance, 142
 Ensor, James, 818
 Entebbe, Uganda, 789
   rescue of Israeli hostages from, 477
 Entrepreneurial niches in Salonica (1912), 863
 Epelbaum, Rene, 712
 Ephraim, tribe of, 79–81
 Epiphanius, 133
 Epstein, Israel, 1170–1171, 1183, 1184, 1185
 Epstein, Lazar, 1184
 Equal rights in theory and practice, 844–846
 Erato, Queen, 1111
 Ercole I, 877
 Erik, Max, 1048
 Eritrea, 451
 Erter, Isaac, 323
 Erulkar, David S., 1229
 Esau, 18, 20
 Esh, B'not, 406
 Esharhaddon, king of Assyria, 2
Esnoga (synagogue in Portuguese), 362
 Essequibo (Republic of Guyana), 652
 Esther, Mrs., 1221
 Esther, Queen, 19, 158
 Estonia, 1025–1028
 Ethical nationhood, 568
 Ethiopia, 451, 453
   contemporary overview, 471–474
   historical overview, 467–471
   Jews in, 25, 86, 467–474
 Euchel, Isaac, 322
 Eugenius IV, 866
 Eulalia, Saint, 158
 Eulau, Heinz, 1244
 Eulau, Kurt, 1244
 Euro-Arab anti-semitism, 115–118
 Europe, 801–804 anti-Israeli strategy, 117
   anti-Semitism, 76
   Arab/Muslim policies, 115–116 increase in Christianity's power, 129 Jewish day school in French-speaking countries, 424–426, 832–834 modern, 298–299
   Reformation, 101
 European Jewish Diaspora languages, 193–194
 Eusebius, 124
 Evans, Sam, 1201–1202
 Evian Conference (1938), 522, 600, 666
 Evolution of Jewish genealogical studies, 292–294
 Executive Council of Australian Jewry (ECAJ), 523, 525
 Exile, 17–19, 31
   applying to human condition, 61 biblical characters associated with, 19 distinction between holy and profane, 37 final end of, 37
   finding meaning in, 61
   Garden of Eden, 61
   as harsh and humiliating punishment, 6

- Experts Conference on Latin America and the Future of Its Jewish Communities, 703–705
Expulsion of Heliodorus from the Temple, The (Raphael), 10
 Ezekiel, 2, 81
 Ezekiel, Nissim, 1226–1227
 Ezra, 3, 667, 751, 761
 Ezra, David Joseph, 1225–1226
 Ezra, Elia David, 1226
 Ezra, Rachel, 527
 Ezrachi, Alan, 586
 Ezra family, 357
 Ezras family, 1187, 1189
 Ezrat Nashim, 622
- Fackenheim, Emil, 897
 Factor XI deficiency (FXI), 280–281
 Faitlovitch, Jacques, 469–470
 Falasha, Ethiopia, 470, 471, 472–473
 Falkon, Jack, 734
 Falmouth, Jamaica, 658
 Familial dysautonomia, 281
 Familial Mediterranean fever (FMF), 281
 Fanconi's anemia, 281–282
 Fardis, Nikos, 365
 Farjeon, Benjamin, 527
 Farrisol, Abraham, 352
 Fasilades, 468
 Fatimids, 456
 Federación Sionista Territorial Unificado, 681, 742
 Federación Zionista, 749
 Federal B'nai B'rith, 525
 Federal Jewish National Fund, 525
 Federal United Israel Appeal, 525
 Federation of American Zionists (FAZ), 636
 Federation of Australian Jewish Welfare Societies, 525
 Federation of Jewish Community Centers of Argentina, 714
 Federation of Oriental Jews, 562
 Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, 516, 517, 518
 Feher, Shoshanah, 148
 Feierstein, Ricardo, 697, 698, 699, 707, 708, 709
 Feijóo, Beda Docampo, 702
 Fein, H., 476
 Feinberg, Kai, 1085
 Feinstein, Moshe, 950
 Feiwei, Berthold, 46
 Feldman, A., 1014
 Felesmura, 471
 Félix, Rachel, 825
The Feminine Mystique (Friedan), 621
 Ferdinand I, Grand Duke, 881
 Ferdinand I, King, 969 [czech]
- Ferdinand of Aragon, King, 101, 316, 866, 901, 912, 980
 Fernando I, Grand Duke of Livorno, 875
 Ferrante I, King, 875
 Ferrer, Vicente, 910
 Ferrin, Marx, 565
 Fettmilch, Vincent, 102
 Feuchtwanger, Lion, 43, 45, 965
 Fez, Morocco, 482, 483, 487
 Fierstein, Harvey, 248
 Fifth aliyah, 329
 Fiji, Jews in, 532–533
 Final Report of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, 731
 Finberg, L., 1013
 Finberg, Mikhail, 949
 Fineshriber, William, 339
 Fingueret, Manuela, 699
 Finkas, Hizkiah, 469
 Finkel, Nossou Tzvi, 1038
 Finkielkraut, Alain, 830
 Finland, 1071–1076
 Finn, Samuel Joseph, 1047
 Fintzi, Itzko, 967
 Firer, Ruth, 346
 Firestone, Reuven, 151
 Firestone, Shulamith, 621
 First aliyah, 328
 First Barbary War, 456
 First Crusade (1095), 76
 First Narayever, Toronto, Canada, 551
 First Temple in Jerusalem, 509
 First Zionist Congress, 635
 Fischer, Robert (Bobby), 1081
 Fischer, Stanley, 517
 Fishbein, M., 1013
 Fisher, Woolf, 538, 544
 Fishman, Sylvia Barack, 233
 Flaccus, governor of Asia, 65
 Flannery, Edward, 131
 Flatbush, Brooklyn, New York, 562
 Fleg, Edmond, 835
 Fleischman, Cyrille, 839
 Fleischmann family, 1189
 Fleisher, Benjamin, 1198
 Fleisher, Benjamin Wilfred, 1200
 Flexner, Abraham, 299
 Flexner, Simon, 299
 Flores, Lourdes, 734
 Foer, Jonathan Safran, 249
 Folkist/Bundist Naye Yiddishe Shule, 684
 Fonds-de-Isle de Vaches, Haiti, 660 Football Federation Australia, 524
 Ford, Henry, 240, 307
 Fort de Fance, 660
 Fostat (Old Cairo), 450
 Foulds family, 825
 Founder principle, 203
 Fourier, Charles, 825
- Fourth aliyah, 329
 Fox, Vicente, 680
 Fox, William, 239
 Fraenkel, Siegfried, 496
 France, 820–832
   contemporary overview, 829–831
   culture, science, and the humanities, 829–830
   demographic movement and emigration, 831
   emancipation of Jews, 212
   ethnic backgrounds, 820
   general population, 820
   historical overview, 820–829
   industries, trades, and professions, 829
   Jewish education and communal institutions, 830–831
   Jewish population in, 820
   languages spoken, 820
   migration routes and ethnic backgrounds, 820
   persecution and expulsion, 100
   religious denominations, 830
 France, Mendes, 660
 Francis II, Emperor, 1005
 Francis Joseph, Emperor, 301, 973, 1010
 Franco, Rahamim, 859
 Franco, Vitaly, 733
 Frank, Anne, 890
   House (Amsterdam), 890
 Frank, Hannah, 897
 Frank, Jakob, 957
 Frank, Mayer, 967
 Frankel, Judy, 228
 Frankfurter, Felix, 601, 637
 Franks, Moses, 662–663
 Franz II, 973
 Franzos, Karl Emil, 44
 Fraser, Malcolm, 529, 530
 Frederick III, King, 805
 Frederick the Great of Prussia, 44
 Frederick VII, 662
 Frederick William, 841
 Frederik, Crown Prince, 1067
 Freed, Isadore, 213
 Freedman, David, 527
Freiheit, 593
 Freilich, Segal Alicia, 697
 Freiman family, 1189
 French Alliance Israelite Universelle, 478
 French Guiana, Cayenne, Jews in, 651–652
 French literature, Jewish identity and society (20th century), 835–840
 French Polynesia, Jews in, 533–534
 French-speaking Europe, Jewish day school in, 424–426, 832–834

- Freud, Sigmund, 42, 233, 299, 301–304
- Freund, Michael, 1166, 1222
- Freundlich, Dini, 1159, 1180
- Freundlich, Rabbi, 1159
- Fridman, Naftali, 1036
- Fried, Avraham, 226
- Friedan, Betty, 621
- Friedenwald, Aaron, 635
- Friedenwald, Harry, 636
- Frieder, Alex, 1244
- Frieder, Philip, 1244
- Friedlaender, 143
- Friedlander, Marti, 543
- Friedman, Debbie, 226
- Friends of Israel Defense Forces, 641
- Frimerman, Amatoly, 1106
- Frisch, Efram, 46, 47
- Frumkin, Esther, 1043
- Fuchs, Daniel, 236, 595
- Fuentes, Carlos, 695
- Fujimori, Alberto, 731, 732, 734
- Fundación Activa, 677
- Fundación Menorah Erej of Naamat, 679
- Fundacion Tzedakah Uruguay, 742
- Fundamental Pact (1857), 511
- Fur and Leather Workers' Union, 593
- Fuzaylov, Amnun, 1145
- Fuzes, Peter, 524
- Gabirol, Solomon, 1240
- Gabler, Neal, 238
- Gabrovsky, P., 960
- Gad, tribe of, 79, 82, 84, 85
- Gadhafi, Mu'ammarr, 480
- Gadol, Moise, 561
- Galante, Abraham, 858, 859
- Galaun, Abe, 517
- Galaun, Michael, 517
- Galemire, Julia, 709
- Galen, 296
- Galibov, Zafer, 967
- Galibova, Rena, 1144
- Galilee, Sea of, 32
- Galleon Trade, 671
- Galut* (exile), 4, 61–62, 73, 126, 346, 347
- Galvin, Patrick, 377
- Gama, Vasco da, 352, 1205, 1206–1207
- Gamaliel, Simeon b., 766
- Gamedze, Natan, 452
- Gamonike, 557, 559
- Gandhi, Indira, 1207
- Gandhi, Mahatma, 496
- Gans, Herbert, 572
- Gaon, Hai, Rav, 312, 314
- Gaon, Nessim, 505
- Garcia, Alan, 730, 732
- Garcia, Hananiel, 549
- Gardizi, 1099
- Garfield, John, 242
- Garfinkle, Bouena Sarfatty, 221
- Garfinkle, Jacob Julius, 242
- Garti, Moshon, 957
- Garti, Rahamim Moshonov, 958
- Gather, 1123
- Gatton family, 1189
- Gaucher's disease type 1, 282
- Gaulle, Charles de, 116, 828
- Gavriellov, Meirkhaim, 1144
- Gediminas, Grand Duke, 1034
- Gediminas, Yagiello (Wladislawll), 1034
- Gedye, G. E. R., 808
- Geelong, Australia, 521
- Geiger, Abraham, 50, 150
- Gelber, Mark H., 107
- Gelfand, Michael, 520
- Geller, Samuel, 732
- Gellert, C.F., 44
- Gellert, Christian G., 142
- Gelman, Juan, 698
- Gelvan, Katie, 496
- Genealogic studies, evolution of, 292–294
- Genealogy and Marranos, 157
- General Law of Population, 674
- Generational factor and Diaspora, 345
- Genetic diseases, 275–287
- alpha-Thalassemia (a-T), 278
  - Ashkenazi Jewish population, 276
  - Bloom syndrome, 278
  - breast cancer, 278–279
  - Canavan disease, 279
  - colorectal cancer, 279–280
  - costeff optic atrophy syndrome (3-methylglutaconicaciduria type 3), 280
  - cystic fibrosis, 280
  - Diaspora, 287–292
  - Factor XI deficiency (FXI), 280–281
  - familial dysautonomia, 281
  - familial Mediterranean fever (FMF), 281
  - Fanconi's anemia, 281–282
  - Gaucher's disease type 1, 282
  - glycogen storage disease, 282–283
  - hereditary inclusion body myopathy, 283
  - inflammatory bowel disease, 283
  - mucopolidosis IV (MLIV), 283–284
  - myotonic dystrophy, 284
  - Niemann-Pick disease type A, 284
  - nonclassical congenital adrenal hyperplasia (CAH), 284–285
  - Sephardic and Oriental Jewish populations, 277
  - Tay-Sachs disease (TSD), 285–286
  - torsion dystonia, 286
  - Usher's syndrome (US), 286
- Genetic mutations, 291
- Genetics, medicine, and genealogy
- evolution of Jewish genealogic studies, 292–294
  - Freud, Judaism, and emergence of psychoanalysis, 301–304
  - genetic diseases and the Diaspora, 287–292
  - Jewish genetic diseases, 275–287
  - Jews, Diaspora, and medicine, 294–300
- Genghis Khan, 768
- Gens, Jacob, 1037
- George I, King, 924
- George II, King, 924
- George V, King, 522, 1233, 1247
- Georgia, 1119–1122
- Gerchunoff, Alberto, 697, 701, 706
- German-Jewish literature and art, 42–48
- German-Jewish thought, concept of Sephardi and Ashkenazi, 48–52
- German Nazism, 737
- German Schutztruppen, 491
- German South West Africa, 491
- Germany, 192
- achievements and frustrations, 846
  - anti-Semitic thought concept of Sephardi and Ashkenazi, 48–52
  - Christian-Jewish dialogue, 141–144
  - civil rights end, 847–848
  - contemporary migration patterns of Russian Jews to, 386–391
  - contemporary overview, 843
  - emancipation of Jews, 212
  - emigration admission policy, 387–389
  - Enlightenment, 192
  - Enlightenment and Mendelssohn, 143
  - equal rights theory and practice, 844–846
  - general population, 840
  - historical overview, 841–842
  - Jewish immigrants from former Soviet Union, 389 (table)
  - Jewish population in, 840, 841
  - Jews, 840–848
  - languages spoken, 841
  - migration routes and ethnic backgrounds, 841, 843
  - Second German Reich, 192
  - struggle for emancipation, 841
  - Third German Reich, 192–193
  - war, revolution, and democracy, 847
  - women, family, and identity (1871–1918), 264–267

- Gerovitsch, Eliezer, 212
 Gershon, Rabbenu, 40, 127, 414, 841, 842
 Gershov, Solomon, 231
 Gershowitz, Jacques, 1202
 Gershwin, George, 238
 Gershwin, Ira, 238
 Gerson, Henry, 1252
 Gerson, Michael, 1252
 Gertopan, Susana, 707
 Gervitz, Gloria, 708
 Gessler, Sara, 1106–1107
 Ghana, 451, 454
 Ghardaia, 457
 Ghriba Synagogue, 509
 Ghurayr, 795
 Gibbons, James Cardinal, 634
 Gibraltar, 449, 460, 848–854
 Gideon (judge), 79
 Gideon, Sampson, 931
 Gideon, tribe of, 80
 Gihon Synagogue, 493
 Gilgil, Kenya, detention camp in, 476
 Ginsbourg, Sam, 1171, 1182
 Ginsburg, Mordechai-Aaron, 1044
 Gin Vaiphei, Simeon, 1221
 Giordano, Ralph, 47
 Giraud, General, 457
 Girrema, 757
 Gitai, A., 720
 Gitlow, Benjamin, 593
 Glantz, Margo, 699
 Glaphyra, 1112
 Glaser, Eduard, 795
 Glass, Jonathan, 427
 Glaxo, 538
 Gleim, J.W.L., 44
 Glickman, Nora, 697
 Global (NGO) Forum, 501
 Gluckman, Henry, 496
 Gluckman, Peter, 543
 Gluzman, Michael, 570
 Glycogen storage disease, 282–283
 Godbey, Allen, 85
 Godkin family, 1189
 Goethe, 45, 57
 Goibov, Goib, 1145
 Goitein, S. D., 151
 Gold, Ben, 593
 Gold, Mike, 595
 Goldansky, Vitaly, 949
 Goldberg, B. Z., 720
 Goldberg, Daniel, 701
 Goldberg, David, 1053, 1084
 Goldberg, Molly, 242
 Goldberger, Joseph, 300
 Goldblatt, David, 502
 Goldblatt, Israel, 491
 Goldblatt, Sidney, 502
 Goldemberg, Efraim, 731, 734
 Goldemberg, Isaac, 697, 698, 708, 733, 737
 Goldenberg, Merchant, 1232, 1240
 Goldfaden, Abraham, 211
 Goldman, Dave, 242
 Goldman, Emma, 1038
 Goldman, Nahum, 43
 Goldschmidt, Levin, 845
 Goldsmid, Isaac L., 931
 Goldstein, A., 1248
 Goldstein, Moritz, 45
 Goldstein, Perez, 974
 Goldstein, Pétur, 1080–1081
 Goldstein, Rebecca, 248
 Goldstein, Warren, 498
 Goldstone, Richard, 503
 Goldwyn, Samuel, 239
 Goloboff, Mario, 697, 699
 Gomer, Rabbi, 1026
 Gomez de Leon, Francisco, 663
 Gonatas, General, 366
 Gondar, 468
 Goodman, Allegra, 248
 Goodman, Isadore, 524
 Goodman, Richard, 275
 Gorbachev, Mikhail, 948, 994
 Gordimer, Nadine, 501–502
 Gordon, Robert, 516
 Gordon, Yehuda-Leib (Leon), 1044
 Gorelick, Nahum, 492
 Gorelick, Zvi, 492
 Goren, Shlomo, 29, 470
 Gornick, Vivian, 621
 Gorriti, Juana Manuela, 736
 Gottheil, Richard, 636
 Gourgey, Percy, 1238
 Gover de Nasatsky, Miryam, 708
 Gozan, 755
 Grade, Chaim, 234
 Grade, Haim, 1048
 Grade, Michael, 926
 Gradis, David, 660, 824
 Graf, Gerhard, 338
 Grana, split between Tounsa and, 513
 Granada, 487
 Granados, Jorge Garcia, 667
 Grasiani, Moreno, 958
 Graumann, Harry, 496
 Grazi, Shlomo, 616
 Great Britain
   See also United Kingdom
   British chief rabbinate, 933–936
   history of Jewish wealth, 930–933 influence of British Jewry on world Jewry, 936–937
 Great Famine (1888–1892), 469
 Great Synagogue, Aleppo, 786, 787
 Great Synagogue, Sydney, 521
 Great Trek, 494
 Greece, 855–857
   population transfer on Jews of Thessaloniki, 364–369
 Green, Arthur A., 405, 406
 Green, Michael, 1190
 Green, Philip, 932
 Greenberg, Blu, 406
 Greenberg, Harold, 550
 Greenberg, Hayim, 76–77, 595
 Greenberg, Shalom, 1158
 Greene, Graham, 110
 Green family, 1189
 Green March (1975), 484
 Greite, Augustus, 519
 Griffith, D. W., 239
 Grigorius IV, 955
 Grill, Marcus, 517
 Grimberg, Susana, 708
 Grimsson, Olafur Ragnar, 1081
 Grossman, Vasily, 1106
 Gruenberg, George, 734
 Grünewald, Isaac, 1054, 1090
 Grünfeld, Berthold, 1085
 Guadeloupe, Jews in, 660
 Guang, Pan, 1176
 Guangyuan (Shlomo), Jin, 1159, 1166
 Guangzhou, China, 1181
 Guantanamo, Cuba, 664
 Guas Nigshu, Kenya, 475
 Guatemala, Jews in, 667–668
 Guatemala City, 668
 Gubbay, Abraham, 359 (photo)
 Gubbay, Leah, 1187
 Gubbay, Menashe, 359
 Gubbay, Sima, 359
 Guðmundsson, Haraldur, 1078
 Guedemann, Moritz, 334
 Guggenheim, Paul, 919
 Guiana, Pomeroon, Jews in, 652–653
   Guide for the Perplexed (Maimonides), 482 Guinea-Bissau, Angola, 460
 Gumperts, 143
 Günther, Hans F.K., 106–107
 Gurary, Shmaryahu, 442, 607
 Gurej, Mr., 1221
 Gurevitch, Aba David, 1153
 Gurevitch, Sofia, 1043
 Gurock, Jeffrey, 609
 Gurvits, M., 1013
 Gurvitz, E., 1014
 Gushen, 468
 Gusinski, Vladimir, 996
 Gutwirth, Nathan, 1238
 Gwelo, 518
 Gweru, 519
 Gymnasien (Vienna, Austria), overrepresentation of Jews, 809–811
 Ha'am, Ahad, 404
 Habad, 523, 525
 Habad Hasidism, unique relationship between Russia and, 998–1001
 Habad movement, 430–447
   campus outreach, 431–432 drawbacks of outreach, 438–439 emissaries/missionaries, 435–436

- fund-raising, 446–447
 Habad House, 442–444
 Habad Yeshiva system, 439–442 history of, in United States, 602–607 modern technology, 437–438 other organizations, 444–446 outreach concept, 430–431 public relations, 436–437 synagogues, 432–433
 Habal, 799
 Habonim (Labour Zionist), 499, 541
 Habor, 81
 Habsburg, Maximilian of, 673
 Hacoaj, 714
 Ha-Cohen, Adam, 1047
 Hadani, 82
 Hadassah, 254
 Hadassah, Puerto Rico, 599, 637–638, 641, 665
 Hadassi, Judah, 92
 Haddad, Ariel, 1006
 Hadini, Eldad, 351
 Hadler, Jeffrey, 1239
 Hadrian, Emperor, 88, 126, 127
 Hafkine, Walter M., 1215
 Hafsids, 510
 Haganah, 772, 774–775
 Haggai, 2
 Ha Halutz ha Dati, 768
 Haham, Shimon, 1126
 Hahn, Otto, 897
 Haifa, 452
 Haim, Shemuel b., 313
 Haiti, Jews in, 660–661
 Hajinuj, Vaad, 677
 Haketia, 487
 Hakim, al-, Caliph of Fatimite Egypt, 306
 Hakim, Samuel b. Moses ha-Levi ibn, 92
 Hakoah Club, Sydney, Australia, 524
 HaKohen, Mordekhai Amiess, 513
 Hakohen, Obadiah, 1225
 Halabo, 7
 Halah, 81
 Haleva, Izak, 181
 Halevi, Abraham, 35
 Halevi, Judah, 31, 37, 153, 315, 317, 821, 915, 1101, 1103
 Halévy, Fromenthal, 825
 Halévy, Joseph, 469, 794
 Halimi, Ilan, 829
 Halkin, Hillel, 85–86
 Hall, Nathan Abraham, 1228
 Hallenstein, Bendix, 544
 Hamadan, 768
 Hamburg, G., 1134
 Hamilton, Alexander, 658
 Hamilton, New Zealand, 535, 549
 Hammerstein, Oscar, 238
 Ha-Naggid, Shemuel, 315
 Hananel, Asher, 961, 962
 Hananel, Rav, 313
 Hanina, 7
 Hannover, Nathan, 28
 HaNoar HaTzioni, 733–734, 743
 Haokip, Sumkthoang, 1220
 Hara, 514
 Harare, 518, 519, 520
 Harbin, 1182–1185
 Harcourt, Cecil, 1188
 Harden, Maximilian, 59
 Hardoon, Silas, 357, 1173
 Hardoon family, 1172, 1247
 Harissa.com, 513
 Haritopoulos, 368
 Harizi, Judah al-, 798
 Harkavy, Alexander, 1048
 Harran, 755
 Harris, Ann, 499
 Harris, Cyril, 499
 Harrtz, Michael, 476
 Hart, Aaron, 549, 933
 Hart, Moses, 933
 Hartwig, Jacob, 1065
 Harvey, Laurence, 502, 1038
 Hashomer, 733
 Hashomer Hatzair, 341, 664, 743
 Hasid, Yehudah, 1103
 Hasidic Lubavitch movement, 485
 Hasidism, 625–626 beginnings in Eastern Europe, 325–327 types of groups, 326–327
     Yiddish, 196
 Haskalah, 234–235, 253–254, 320–324
 Hassan Ibn Numan, 454
 Hassan II, 485
 Hasson, Leon, 370
 Hastings, New Zealand, 535
 Hatikva, Mexico, 675
 Hatta, Muhammad, 1234
 Hatzala, 679–680
 Hayeem family, 1187
 Hayes, Isaac Israel, 352, 353
 Hayesod, Keren, 501
 Hayim, Ellis, 357
 Hayim, Yoseph, 1248
 Hayim family, 1189
 Hays, Will, 240
 Hazoni, Yoram, 348
 Hazzan, Eliyahu, 506
 Heard, John, 1181
 Hebraic University, Mexico, 677
 Hebreá B'nai B'rith de Venezuela, 749
 Hebrew, 167
     Diaspora influences on, 200–205
     Diaspora influences on modern, 200–205 illuminated manuscripts, 231 linguistics, 188
     sacred texts and formal prayers, 167
 Hebrew Benevolent Society, Panama, 671
 Hebrew Haskalah, 771
 Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society (HIAS), 714
 Hebrew Israeli songs, 227
 Hebrew literature, 154
Hebrew Standard of Australasia (newspaper), 522
 Hebrew Union College, 568
 Hecataeus of Abdera (fourth century BCE), 64
 Hecht, Ben, 241
 Hecht, Raúl, 709
 Hecksher, Eli, 1055, 1090
 Hedaya, Moshe, 791
 Hegel, 44
 Hehalutz Hatza'ir youth movement, 664, 773
 Heifetz, Jascha, 1037
 Heilbuth, Herman, 1069
 Heilpin, Angelo, 353
 Heine, Heinrich, 43, 49–50, 105, 235, 352
 Heiwot, Gebra, 469
 Hekatia, 484
 Hellenistic period Siaspora, 8–16, 20
 Heller, Joseph, 243
 Helprin, Mark, 248
 Henle, Jacob, 298
 Henri II, 822
 Henriques, Basil, 338
 Henriques, Ruben, 1051, 1077
 Henriquez y Carvajal, Federico, 666
 Henriquez y Carvajal, Francisco, 666
 Henry III, Duke, 812
 Henry III, King, 823
 Henry III, King of England, 99
 Henry the Navigator, 490
 Heraclius, Byzantine emperor, 97
 Herbst, Karl, 958, 966
 Herder, Johann Gottfried, 105, 143, 174
 Hereditary inclusion body myopathy, 283
 Hermann, Georg, 44–45
 Hermias, Gete, 469
 Hermlin, Stephan, 47
 Herod of Palestine, 69–70
 Herod the Great, 1111, 1112
 Hersch, Jeanne, 919
 Hershkovich, Isidor, 966
 Hertz, Joseph Herman, 497, 935, 937
 Herz, Henri, 825
 Herz, Marcus, 143, 144
 Herzberg, Jacobo, 729
 Herzl, Joseph, 635, 636
 Herzl, Theodor, 131, 262, 333, 334, 708, 826, 958, 965, 977, 1036, 1233, 1237
 Herzl Association, 479

- Herzog, Chaim, 538
 Herzog, Isaac, 29, 935
 Herzog, Jacob, 935
 Heschel, Abraham Joshua, 403, 406, 568, 569–570, 625
 Hess, Moses, 43
 Hesse-Cassel, South Africa, 494
 Heyman, Edgard, 733
 Hezbollah, 749
 Hezekiah, King, 81
 Hibat Zion Eretz Israel, 635
 Hibat Zion movement, 635
 Hicham, Moulay, 488
 Hidden Jews
   applying to Jewish communities to regain heritage, 156
   Brazilian Marranos, 160–166
   Caribbean Islands, 158–159 widespread phenomena of Marranism and, 156–160
 Hilfsverein der Deutschen Juden, 476
 Hillel, Shlomo, 378
 Hillman, Sidney, 593, 596, 1038
 Hillquit, Morris, 593
Hiloulot, 485
 Himmelfarb, Milton, 589
 Himmler, Heinrich, 114, 115
 Hippocrates, 296
 Hirsch, Maurice, 696–697
 Hirsch, Moshe, 336
 Hirsch, Samson Raphael, 934
 Hirsch, Samuel, 884
 Hirschel, Solomon, 924–925, 934
 Hirszfeld, Ludwik, 299
 Historical migration patterns in Harbin, 1182–1185
 History of Diaspora
   history of Jews as minority, 72–78
   Jews and Judaism in ancient world literature, 64–71
   Karaites Diaspora, 90–94
   lost tribes of Israel, 78–86
   Samaritan Diaspora, 87–89
 Hitler, Adolf, 112, 115, 120, 162, 240, 304, 452, 522, 597, 1215, 1234, 1244, 1251 alliance between Mussolini and, 479 anti-Semitism reappearing in France, 827 historical overview of Jews in Germany, 841
   Nazi Party leadership, 847
   Pétain seeking collaboration with, 828
 Hiyya, Rabbi Abraham bar, 7, 37, 766
 Hizbollah, 747
 Hoa, Fengshan, 1194
 Hobart, Australia, 521
 Hobart Hebrew Congregation, 527
 Hodeidad, Nathaniel, 1124
 Hod Yoseph, 513
 Hoffman, David, 30
 Hoffmann, Frank, 543
 Hoffmannsthal, Hugo von, 45
 Hogar del Inmigrante, 730
 Hogar Javad Lubavitch, 747
 Hokitika, New Zealand, 535
 Holland. See Netherlands
 Hollander, Leo H., 665
 Hollander Law, 665
 Holliday, Judy, 242
 Holocaust
   American Jewry's response to, 597–601 art in Belgium, 815–820 communication and, 42
   decimation of Yiddish language and culture, 195 denial, 122
   differentiating Jews and Germans identities, 176
   Western democracies and, 112–115
 Holocaust Centre, Perth, Australia, 524
 Holocaust Museum, Melbourne, Australia, 524
 Holocaust Remembrance Day, 540
 Holzman, Rodolfo, 733
 Honduras, Jews in, 669
 Honen Dalim, 656
 Hong Kong, China, 1186–1193
   anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism, 1193
   communal institutions, 1192–1193
   contemporary overview, 1191–1193
   culture, science, and the humanities, 1191
   demographic movement and emigration, 1193
   economic conditions, 1191
   general population, 1186
   historical overview, 1186–1191
   industries, trades, and professions, 1191
   Jewish education, 1192
   Jewish population in, 1186
   languages spoken, 1186
   migration routes and ethnic backgrounds, 1186
   Ohel Leah Synagogue, 1189
   religious denominations, 1191
 Honigman, Barbara, 47
 Honigsman, Y., 1013
 Hook, Sidney, 595
 Horace, 65–66
 Horkheimer, Hans, 730
 Hort, Abraham, 535, 536, 537
 Hoshea, 81, 754
 Hospital of Israel, 681
 Host countries, settling in, 55–56
 Host culture, impact on women, 251–254
 Host desecration, 95, 96, 98
 Host society, 127–129
 Houel, M., 660
 Hoveve Zion society, New York, 635
 Howard, Leslie, 926
 Howard, Lord, 917
 Howe, Irving, 595
 Hrac'eay, King, 1112
 Hudson, Henry, 554
 Hugh of Lincoln, 923
 Huli, Yaacov, 318, 778
 Humala, Ollanta, 734, 735
 Humboldt, Wilhelm von, 144
 Humor and satire in Judeo-Spanish song, 220–222
 Huna, Ray, 7
 Hungarian uprising (1956), 536
 Hungary, 971–979
   alternative Jewish culture, 976
   anti-Semitism, anti-Zionism, community existential problems, 977 communal and political institutions, 977
   contemporary overview, 977–979
   culture, science, and the humanities, 975–976
   demographic movement and emigration, 977
   Dohany Synagogue (Budapest), 978
   economic conditions, 976
   general population, 971
   historical overview, 971–977
   industries, trades, and professions, 975
   Jewish education, 976
   Jewish population in, 971
   languages spoken, 971
   migration routes and ethnic backgrounds, 971
   religious denominations, 976–977
 Hur, 292
 Hurwitz, Ezra, 672
 Hushiel, Rabbenu, 513
 Hussein, Saddam, 117
 Husseini, Haj Amin al-, 116, 384
 Hyams, Harry, 932
 Hyde, Orson, 633
 Hyksos, 108
 Hyman, Paula, 406
 Hycranus, 1109
 Iavelberg, Iara, 721
 Iberian crypto-Jewish identity, music and reconstruction of, 222–224
 Ibibio, 493
 Ibn Abi Zimra, David, 317
 Ibn Adret, Solomon, 909
 Ibn Al-Walid, Khalid, 1230
 Ibn Daud, 313

- Ibn Ezra, Abraham, 315, 351, 915
 Ibn Ezra, Moses, 315, 915
 Ibn Gabirol, Shelomo, 315
 Ibn Hawqal, Mohammed
     Abul-Kassem, 1130
 Ibn Khurradadhbih, 354
 Ibn Megas, Joseph, 908
 Ibn Naghrillah, Samuel, 905, 915
 Ibn Naghrillah, Yusuf, 915
 Ibn Nahmiyas, David, 956
 Ibn Nahmiyas, Shmuel, 956
 Ibn Pakuda, Bahya, 315
 Ibn Paqudah, Bahya, 153
 Ibn Rashid, 1230
 Ibn Rusta, 1099
 Ibn-Saleh, Sason, Sheikh, 355
 Ibn Shaprut, Hasdai, 315, 905, 914, 1099, 1100
 Ibn Tagriberdi, 1095
 Ibn Tibbon, Judah, 297
 Ibn Yahia, David, Rabbi, 877
 Ibrahim I, 753
 Iceland, 1077–1082
 Idel, Moshe, 37
 Ideological extremism, 346
 Idriss I, 482
 Igbo, 492–493
 Ignaski, Paul, 119
 Ilan, Nahem, 505
 Iliescu, Ion, 990
 Imam al-Mutawakkil, 794
 Imar, Vivián, 701
 Imber, Sofia, 748
 Imperial Germany, women, family and identity, 264–267
 Ince, Thomas, 239
 Inchiquin, Lord, 489
 India, 1204–1212
     Baghdadi Jews, 1217
     Benei Menashe, 1218–1223
     Bene-Israel and Baghdadi Jews in, 1216–1217
     contemporary overview,
         1208–1212
     general population, 1204
     historical Jewish-Indian contacts, 1213–1215
     historical overview, 1204–1205
     Jewish communities, 1204–1208
     Jewish Parsis relations,
         1223–1225
     Jewish population in, 1204
     Jews in Indian public life,
         1225–1227
     Jews in Pakistan, 1228–1230
     Jews in public life, 1225–1227
     languages spoken, 1204
     migration routes and ethnic backgrounds, 1204
     Pathans of Pakistan and
         Afghanistan, 1230–1231
 Indonesia, 1235–1239
 Inflammatory bowel disease, 283
 Innocent III, Pope, 97
 Inquisition, 157, 160–163
 Institute for Contemporary Jewry of the Hebrew University, 704
 Institute of Jewish Affairs,
     703–705
 Instituto Venezolano de Investigaciones Científicas
     (IVIC), 747
 Integration of Yiddish into English, 197–199
 Intercommunity links, 39–40
 Interfaith Initiative, 501
 Interfaith marriage, 577–580
 Inter-marriage, 240, 412–416,
     1057–1061
 International Council of Jewish
     Women, 666
 International Jewish Movie
     Festival, Mexico, 675
 International Ladies Garment
     Workers, 593
 International network of religious Zionist kollels, 427–429
 International War Crimes
     Commission (1994–1996), 503
 International Workers' Order, 593
 Ioffe, Yu., 1014
 Ipekci, Abdi, 784
 Ipekci, Cepil, 784
 Ipekci, Nukhet Izet, 784
 Iquitos, 730
 Iran
     Jews in, 767–770
     lost tribes of Israel and, 85
 Iraq, Jews in, 771–775 arriving at Lod Airport, 380 immigration to Israel in Operation Ezra and Nehemya, 378–382
     migration patterns, 354–360 snowball effect, 381–382 yearning for Zion, 379–381
 Iriss II, 482
 Isaac, 18, 128, 292, 449
 Isaac, Aaron, 1051, 1088
 Isaac, Isaac, 522
 Isaac, Moses, 1221
 Isaac, Solomon, 469
 Isaac, Yahya, 799
 Isaacs, Jeremy, 897
 Isaacs, Jorge, 696
 Isaacs, Nathaniel, 496
 Isaac the Jew, 821
 Isabel, Queen, 80
 Isabella, Queen, 101, 316, 689, 901,
     912, 980
 Isaiah, 2
 Isfahan, 768
 Ishaq, 468
 Ishmael, Moulay, 483
 Isin, 759
 Islam influence on liturgy, 27
     Jewish influence on, 150–156
     Jews under Muslim rule,
         305–309
 Islamization and Jews in Medieval
     Middle East, 139–141
 Israel, 325
     American Jews and state of,
         642–645
     biblical prehistory and symbols of diaspora, 17–18
     Christian attitudes toward,
         130–131
     continuing educational challenges and activities,
         349–350
     Diaspora immigration to (1948–2000), 331–332 funds raised by U.S. organizations, 343
     immigration of Iraqi Jews to,
         378–382
     immigration to pre-state and modern Israel, 328–333
     Jewish arrivals (1948–1951), 330
     Jewish arrivals from Asia and Africa, 330
     Jewish continuity efforts in education, 347–349
     lost tribes of, 78–86 modern Hebrew, 201
     transition from negation of Diaspora to Jewish continuity, 346–347
 Israel, Abraham, 362, 858
 Israel, David, 556
     American Jewry and, 586–589
 Israel, Edmond, 885
 Israel, Eliyahu, 858
 Israel, Jacob Bapuji, 1229
 Israel, Michael Boaz, 635
 Israel, Michael Yaacov, 858
 Israel, Mikve, 654
 Israel, Moshe, 858
 Israel, Raphael, 857
 Israel, Raphael Yitzhak, 858
 Israel, Reuben Eliyahu, 858, 859
 Israel, Victor, 730
 Israel, Wilfrid B., 926
 Israel Aliya Center, 644
 Israel and Diaspora
     anti-Zionism, 333–340
     education about Diaspora, 345–350
     engagement with Israel,
         340–345
     Jewish immigration to pre-state and modern Israel, 328–333
 Israel Association for Ethiopian
     Jews, 473–474
 Israelawi, 472
 Israel brothers, 370
 Israel Defence Forces or National Service, 473
 Israeletoch, 472
 Israeli-Arab War (1948), 483
 Israeli-Arab War (1967), 486
 Israeli-Arab War (1973), 486
 Israeli Beneficial Society, 746

- Israeli education, Jewish continuity efforts in,
347–349
- Israeli Independence Day, 540
- Israeli Knesset, 474
- Israeli literature, portrayal of American Jews in, 645–649
- Israeli Mossad, 470
- Israeli Sephardi, 450
- Israeli's Red Cross (Magen David Adom), 472
- Israelite Congregation of Argentina, 714
- Israelites, 78–81
- Issachar, tribe of, 79, 82
- Isserlein, Israel, 1004
- Istakhri, 1099
- Istanbul, 181–183, 776
- Istiqlal Party, 483–484
- Italy, 865–870
See also Milan
anti-Semitism, 870
contemporary overview, 868
demographic movement and emigration, 869–870
general population, 865
historical overview, 865–867
Jewish education and communal institutions,
868–870
Jewish population in, 865
languages spoken, 865
migration routes and ethnic backgrounds, 865
Portuguese Jews of Diaspora,
875–883
religious denominations, 868
Samaritans and, 88
- Itamaracá, 557
- Itshaki, Selomo, 182
- Ivan Alexander, King, 955
- Ivan-Asen II, King, 955
- Ivanova, Anna, Empress, 1009
- Ivcher, Baruch, 732
- Ivory Coast, 451
- Iyaev, Amnon, 1145
- Iyasu II, 469
- Izmir, 776
- Izmirim, 781
- Jabad Lubavitch de Venezuela,
748
- Jabès, Edmond, 839
- Jabotinsky, Vladimir (Ze'ev), 919, 1184
- Jabukowicz, Salomón, 748
- Jacmel, Haiti, 660
- Jacob, 79, 449, 751
- Jacob, Jacob-Farj-Rafael, 1227
- Jacob, Joseph, 1220, 1221
- Jacobi, Fernando, 728
- Jacobi, Segismundo, 728
- Jacob of London, 933
- Jacobs, Frances Wisebart, 564
- Jacobs, Gertie, 476
- Jacobs, Louis, 926, 927
- Jacobs, Sammy, 476
- Jacobsohn, Franz, 1252
- Jacobson, Dan, 502
- Jacobson, Matthew F., 572
- Jacobson, Naomi, 491
- Jaffe, Mordechai, 1041
- Jagello, E., 985
- Jagiello, Wladyslaw, II, King, 1008
- Jagiellonczyk, Aleksander, King, 1008
- Jagiellonczyk, Kazimierz, IV, King,
1008
- Jaime I of Aragon-Catalonia, 905
- Jakob, Benno, 43
- Jakobson, Max, 1074
- Jakubowicz, Jonathan, 747
- Jamaica, Jews in, 658–659
- James, Sid, 502
- Jamestown, Virginia, 554
- Japan, 1196–1203
contemporary overview,
1202–1203
general population, 1196
historical overview, 1196–1199
Jewish communities, 1200–1201
Jewish population in, 1196
Kobe, 1201–1202
languages spoken, 1196
migration routes and ethnic backgrounds, 1196
Nagasaki, 1201
prominent historical figures,
1199–1200
Tokyo, 1202
Yokohama, 1201
- Jeejeebhoy, Jamsetji, 1225
- Jeejeebhoy family, 1224
- Jehoiakin (Judean king), 752, 757, 758
- Jehoshaphat, King of Judah, 80
- Jehovah's Witnesses, 633
- Jekabpillis, 662
- Jeremiah, 2–4, 81, 464, 751
- Jeremie, Haiti, 660
- Jerome, 134, 135
- Jerusalem, 21–23, 449, 752, 776 establishment of Karaite community, 91–92
restoration of, 2–3
- Jerusalem Day, 540
- Jerusalem Foundation, 501
- Jesofovich, Isaac, 947
- Jesofovich, Michael, 947
- Jesus, 104, 105, 955
Bernardim Ribeiro's works, 876 events in life of, 109 introducing to Kaifeng Jews,
1164
Jewish followers of, 126–128
Jewish Scriptures highlighting role, 123
Jews as killers of, 95, 96, 109
Jews not recognizing as Messiah, 1220
as Messiah, 131, 134, 136, 146, 1161 preaching reaches Mtskheta, 1120
- Jesus-believing Jews, 136
- JewBu (Jewish-Buddhist) phenomenon, 628
- Jewish
day school education in French-speaking Europe,
832–834
emancipation, 74
Enlightenment and impact on Diaspora, 320–324
entry into western artistic activities, 234–235 identity in French literature and society (20th century), 835–840
influence on formation of Christian Scriptures, 132–135 influence on Islam, 150–156
- Jewish-Arabic, 168
- Jewish-Aramaic, 167, 193
- Jewish art, symposiums on,
231–232
- Jewish authors and literary
anti-Semitism, 110–111
- Jewish Board of Deputies, 518
- Jewish Colonization Association,
696–697, 701, 717
- Jewish Communal Appeal, Sydney, Australia, 523
- Jewish communities
adopting language of Gentile neighbors, 178–179
basing existence on law of host society, 127–128
close geographical association, 124 converts and Jewish languages, 184–185
courts to handle disputes, 72
Egypt, 73
example of genetic mutations in, 291 (table)
hidden Jews applying to regain heritage, 156
host society and, 251
India, 1204–1208
under Islamic rule, 150
Istanbul, 181
Middle High German, 191
modern, 74
rabbi's reflections on, 416–418
social changes to benefit
women, 253–254
- Jewish Community Council, 514
- Jewish contributions to arts, 233–250
active participants in modern Western culture, 233–234
after 1960s, 247–249
American art by Jews before
World War II, 237–242

- American film industry, 238–242
- American Jewish immigrant realities, 235–237
- comedy, 242–243
- entry into Western artistic activities, 234–235
- films, 243–244
- Jewish novelists, 237
- Jewish performers in American culture, 242–244
- Jewish writers, 247–249
- music, 237
- post-World War II, 244–247
- show business, 237–238
- stereotypes, 246–247
- theater and musical theater, 237–238
- The Jewish Daily Forward* (newspaper), 593, 594
- Jewish day school education in French-speaking Europe, 424–426, 832–834
- Jewish dialects, 73
- Jewish Diaspora in America, 571–591
- American Christian attitudes to, 632–634
- Jewish education, 170
- Jewish Education Service of North America, 548
- Jewish Federations of North America, 714
- Jewish feminism, 622
- Jewish followers of Jesus, 126–127
- Jewish genealogic studies, 292–294
- Jewish genetic diseases, 275–287.
See also Genetic diseases
- Jewish Greek, 167
- Jewish Helping Hand and Burial Society, 498
- Jewish identity, 61–63
- Inquisition, 163
- language as symbol of, 179
- Jewish Immigrant Aid Society, Canada, 549
- Jewish immigrants from former Soviet Union in Germany, 389 (table)
- Jewish immigration to pre-state and modern Israel, 328–333
- Diaspora immigration to Israel, 331–332
- Jewish arrivals in Israel (1948–1951), 330 (table)
- Jewish immigrants from Asia and Africa, 330 (table)
- Jewish-Indian contacts over the ages, 1213–1215
- Jewish institutions, reconfiguration of, 74–75
- Jewish international migration, 395 (table)
- Jewish-Islamic mutual influences, 150–156
- Jewish languages, 172
- Aramaic, 167
- biblical Hebrew, 193
- bilingual dialectology, 189
- borrowing from Hebrew and Aramaic, 175
- borrowing from other Jewish languages, 173
- characteristics of, 167–171
- converts to Jewish community, 184–185
- culture areas and, 190
- documenting, 177
- dying as spoken languages, 179
- Hebrew, 167
- Hebrew-Aramaic alphabet, 173
- interest in, 177
- Jewish-Aramaic, 167, 193
- Jewish Greek, 167
- Judeo-Spanish (Ladino), 167
- linguistic geography, 189
- listing of, 175–176
- non-Jewish alphabets, 171
- writings in, 178
- Yiddish, 167
- Jewish literary sources, 230
- Jewish migration, 34
- Jewish Museum of Australia, Melbourne, Australia, 524, 525
- Jewish National Fund, 540, 641, 749
- Jewish novelists, 237
- Jewish Ollanta lobby, 735
- Jewish Orthodoxy, in America, 608–612
- Jewish Palestine Brigade, 479
- Jewish particularism, 247–249
- Jewish People's Fraternal Order, 593
- Jewish performers in American culture, 242–244
- Jewish persecution and expulsion, 95–103
- Jewish population
- 15 countries with largest (2005), 398
- future demographic change, 401
- international migration, 395
- major regions (1700–2005), 394
- official language of country of residence (1931–2005), 397
- by official language of country of residence (1931–2005), 397
- refugees from Arab countries and descendants, 385
- selected by main age groups (1897–2004), 400
- 20 metropolitan areas with largest (2005), 399
- Jewish Relife Committee of Honduras, 669
- Jewish renewal, in America, 624–629
- Jewish Savanna, 653, 654
- Jewish self-hatred, 57–60
- The Jewish Spectator*, 599
- Jewish studies, in American universities, 629–631
- Jewish Theater Festival, 677
- Jewish Theological Seminary, Argentina, 713
- Jewish Theological Seminary of America (JTS), 599, 645
- Jewish travelers and explorers, chronology of, 351–354
- Jewish values and Diaspora philanthropy, 407–412
- Jewish Welfare Board, 665, 671
- Jewish women in Central Europe: 19th–20th centuries, 260–263
- Jewish women in Yemen, 267–271
- Jewish women's contributions to contemporary American and Jewish life, 620–623
- Jewish Women's Welfare Organization, 670
- Jewry as archetypal Diaspora, 54–57
- Jews
- as active participants in modern Western culture, 233–234
- adoption of Arabic, 152
- affirming Jewishness, 51
- in Africa, 449–452
- in Algeria, 455–458
- ancient world literature, 64–71
- from Arab countries, 384
- in Argentina, 710–715
- assimilation into bourgeoisie, 244–247
- in Australia, 521–531
- in Baltic States, 1019–1024
- in Brazil, 716–722
- in Canada, 548–552
- in Cape Verde, 459–461
- in Central America, 667–673
- converts to Christianity, 138
- Egyptian origin of, 64
- emphasis on education, 244
- in Ethiopia, 467–474
- in Europe
- contemporary overview, 803–804
- development of medical practices in Gibraltar, 851–855
- historical overview, 801–803
- expulsions from Christian lands, 129–130
- in Fiji, 532–533
- in French Polynesia, 533–534
- hidden language, 60
- history as minority, 72–78
- history of persecution and expulsion, 95–103
- in Iran, 767–770

- Jews (continued) in Iraq, 771
 Islamization in Medieval Middle East, 139–141
 in Kenya, 475–477
 in Libya, 477–481
 in Macedonia, 981
 medicine, 294–300
 in Middle East, 751–799 as minority, 72–78
 in Morocco, 481–486
 under Muslim rule, 305–309
 in Namibia, 490–492
 in New Zealand, 534–545 in Nigeria, 492–493
 in North America, 546–649
 in Ottoman Empire, 776–779 in Peru, 728–735 rise of scripturalism, 90–91
 Second German Reich, 192
 in South Africa, 493–503
 in Sudan, 503–505, 505–509
 Third German Reich, 192–193
 in Tunisia, 509–514
 in Uganda, 515
 in Uruguay, 741–745
 in Venezuela, 745–750
 world population by major regions (1700–2005), 394 (table) yearning for Zion and its meaning, 379–381
 in Yemen, 793–799
 in Zambia, 516–517
 in Zimbabwe, 518–520
- Jews, Diaspora, and medicine,
 294–300
- Jews Diaspora engagement with Israel, 340–345
- Jews for Jesus, 138–139, 147
- Jews of Thessaloniki population transfer, 364–369
- Jhirad, Jerusha, 1210
- Jiangnu, Meng, 1170
- Jiang Zemin, 1166
- Jiménez, Marco Pérez, 747
- Jinan, China, 1182
- Jintao, Hu, 1171
- Joao, D., III, 161
- João II, King, 875
- Jodensavanne, 739, 740
- Joel, Moses, 896
- Joel, Solly, 517
- John, King of England, 99, 933
- John II, Duke, 812
- John II, King of Portugal, 101
- John III, King of Portugal, 83
- John of Ephesus, 88
- John Paul II, 131, 868
- Johnston, Lieutenant-Governor, 917
- Joint Emergency Committee on European Jewish Affairs, 600
- Jolson, Al, 236, 1037
- Jonah, 751
- Jónasson, Hermann, 1078, 1079, 1080
- Jorge, Francisco, 878
- Josef II, Emperor, 1009, 1010
- Joseph, 18–19, 80, 151, 414, 464, 751
- Joseph, Khazar ruler, 1101, 1102, 1103
- Joseph, Micah, 1044
- Joseph II, Emperor, 44, 144, 322,
 805, 969, 972, 1002
- Josephson, Ernst, 1054, 1090
- Josephson family, 1090
- Josephus, Flavius, 72, 82, 477, 757,
 767–768, 965, 1109, 1110,
 1111, 1122–1123
- Joshua, 2, 79
- Journou, Victor, 512
- Jovian, Flavius, Emperor, 1108
- Juan Carlos, King, 902
- Judah, 756
 tribe of, 78–81
- Judah, Rav, 7
- Judaism, 66
 in ancient world literature,
 64–71
 emergence of psychoanalysis, 301–304
- Judaized German, 186, 190
- Judea, 752
- Judeans, in Babylonia, 757–762
- Judenrat*, 457
- Judeo-Arabic, 172–173, 190 separation between Jews and Arabs, 176
 women's songs, 209
- Judeo-Aramaic linguistics, 188
- Judeo-Castilian, 190
- Judeo-Catalan, 190
- Judeo-Christian communities contemporary, 146–150 history in Jewish Diaspora,
 136–139
- Judeo-French, 190
- Judeo-Greek studies, 189
- Judeo-Ibero-Romance languages,
 187–191
- Judeo-Italian, 190
- Judeo-Latin, 188, 190
- Judeo-Portuguese, 190
 in Anglo-American colonies, 553–559
- Judeo-Provençal, 190
- Judeo-Romance languages,
 188–189
- Judeo-Spanish, 167, 172, 189, 190, 193–194
 distinctive from Gentile forms of language, 173
 humor and satire in songs, 220–222
- Istanbul, 182–183
- Jewish music, 209–210
- migration routes of Rhodian
 Jews, 369–374
- Sephardi, 180
 in Turkish social context, 180–184
- Juderia*, 488
- Julius III, 879
- Jung, Carl Gustav, 304
- Jusid, Juan José, 697, 701
- Justin, 1110
- Justinian I, 455
- Juvenal, 69–70
- Kades, Charles, 1198–1199
- Kadima* (magazine), 463
- Kadima, Mexico, 675, 679
- Kadimah, Australia, 522
- Kadish, Sharman, 231
- Kadoma, 519, 520
- Kadoorie, Ellis, Sir, 357, 358, 1187
- Kadoorie, Elly (Eleazar Silas), Sir,
 894, 1187, 1188, 1233, 1253
- Kadoorie, Horace, 357, 1189
- Kadoorie, Lawrence, 357–358,
 1188, 1189
- Kadoorie family, 1172, 1187, 1189, 1247
- Kafka, Franz, 42, 43, 970
- Kafri, 765
- Kagan, Boris, 1139
- Kagan, Israel Meir HaCohen, 950
- Kahan, Louis, 529
- Kahanoff, H. E. Ruth, 532
- Kahin, George, 1251
- Kahina Dahiyah Bint Thabitah ibn
 Tifan, 454, 455, 456
- Kahn, Florence Prag, 564
- Kahn, Julius, 338
- Kaidonover, Aaron Samuel, 1041
- Kaifeng, China, 1160–1167
 contemporary overview,
 1163–1167
 general population, 1160
 historical overview, 1160–1163
 Jewish population in, 1160
 languages spoken, 1160
 migration routes and ethnic backgrounds, 1160
- Kairouan, Tunisia, 450
- Kaiser, Alois, 213
- Kakungulu, Semei, 515
- Kalagu Khan, 768
- Kalev, Eliezer, 957
- Kalev, Mosei, 957
- Kalev, Yeshua, 958
- Kalisher, Abraham, 37
- Kallas, Miklos, 974
- Kallen, Horace, 595, 636
- Kallenbach, Hermann, 496
- Kalman, King, 1001
- Kalmanovitch, Zelig-Hirsh, 1043
- Kalo, Emil, 966
- Kalonymus, 865
- Kámán, Theodor von, 975
- Kamerlekar, Abraham Reuben, 1228, 1229
- Kaminska, Ida, 1139–1140

- Kanem-Bornu empire, 454
 Kanovich, Grigory, 249
 Kant, Immanuel, 105, 106, 143
 Kantor, Yosef, 1253
 Kaplan, Mendel, 501
 Kaplan, Mordecai, 404, 568–569, 626, 1038
 Kapo, Josef, 956
 Karabichevsky, Yui, 1106
 Karaism
     History of Diaspora, 90–94
     Islam instrumental in rise of, 152–153
 Karaites, 90–93, 154, 465
 Karl XI, King, 1050, 1088
 Karl XIV Johan, King, 1052, 1089
 Karo, Yosef, 317, 776
 Karp, Eliane, 734
 Kasparov, Garry, 1117
 Kaspe, Simeon, 1183
 Kasrils, Ronnie, 502
 Kassir, Jacob S., 616, 619
 Kassir, Rafael, 791
 Kassir, Shaul, 790
 Kassir, Yehuda, 790
 Katsav, Moshe, 1122
 Kattan, Naim, 550
 Katz, Eduardo, 746
 Katz, Jacob, 76
 Katz, Mane, 829
 Katzenelson, Yitzhak, 838
 Kaufman, Abram Yosifovich, 1183, 1184, 1185
 Kaufman, George S., 238
 Kaufman, Moisés, 748
 Kaufman, Nikolai, 966–967
 Kaufman, Theodor, 1185
 Kaunda, 517
 Kawkaban, 799
 Kay, Colin, 542
 Kaye, Danny (David Daniel Kaminsky), 243
 Kazakhstan, 1132–1136
 Kazimierz III the Great, King, 983, 1008
 Keegstra, James, 550
 Keetmanshoop, Namibia, 491
 Kehath (Ka'ti) family, 451
 Kehillah, 684
 Kenen, I. L., 639
 Kentridge, Sidney, 502
 Kentridge, William, 502
 Kenya, 451
     Jews in, 475–477
 Kerby, George, 491
 Keren Hayesod, 681, 749
 Keren Kayemet, 681
 Kermanshah, 768
 Kern, Jerome, 237
 Kerouan, 513
 Kerren Kayemet Leisrael, 749
Kessotch, 473
 Key, John, 545
 Kfar Batya, 470
 Khair ad Din, 455
 Khan, Buta, 1008
 Khan, Fatali, 1115
 Khartoum, Sudan, 504, 506
 Khattab, 'Umar ibn al-, 140
 Khaybar Oasis, 753
 Khazaria, 1097–1104
 Khazarian Empire, 1094–1095
 Khazzoum, Saleh, 527, 528
 Khuzestan, 768
 Khvoles, Abraam, 1121
 Kierkegaard, Soren, 130
 Kifu-Qen (1888–1892), 469
 Kikoine, Michel, 949
 Kilda, St. Hebrew Congregation, Melbourne, 521
 Kilez, 789
 Kimiagarov, Boris, 1144
 King, Alan (Irwin Alan Kniburg), 243
 King, Miss, 1181
 Kingdom of Judah, 80
 Kingston, 549, 658–659
 Kinsman, Nathan, 1181
 Kiriath Bialik, 329
 Kirkuk, 774
 Kirschbaum, Simon, 733
 Kisch, David Montague, 518
 Kisch, Egon Erwin, 970
 Kise Rahamim Yeshiva (Bnai Brak), 513
 Kish, 759, 1230
 Kishon, Efrem, 965
 Kisilev, Aharon Moshe, 1183, 1184
 Kissinger, Henry, 1177
 Kitwe, Zambia, 517
 Kjartansson, Aliza, 1081
 Klages, Ludwig, 58
 Klapheck, Elisa, 891
 Klarsfeld, Serge, 837
 Klatshko family, 1044
 Klatzkin, Jacob, 43
 Klausner, Israel, 1048
 Klausner, Joseph, 1048 klezmer music, 227–228
 Kligman, Mark, 214
 Kliman, Evelyn, 709
 Klug, Aaron, 502, 1037
 Kluger, Wladyslaw, 729
 Knipper, Lev, 1144
 Kodron, Hizkiah, 859
 Kodutto, Angelo, 943
 Koen, Leo, 966
 Koen, Shlomo, 980
 Koffinas, Moshe, 371
 Kohanim, 450, 509
 Kohinov, Moisei, 958
 Kohler, Max, 568
 Kohn, Pinchas, 1048
 Kolchak, Admiral, 1184
 Koloman, King, 971
 Kol Shearit Israel Burial and Charitable Society, 671
 Kommissar, Vera, 1085
 Kompaneets, Z., 1148
 Kompert, Leopold, 44
 Konforti, Leo, 966
 König, Karl, 897
 Konviser, Maurice, 520
 Konyoses, 781
 Kook, Abraham Isaac, 36
 Kook, Hillel, 599–600
 Koran, 150–151
 Kordon, Bernardo, 699
 Koritzinsky, Ephraim Wulff, 1084
 Koskas, Marco, 512
 Kosmin, Barry, 119
 Kossuth, Lajos, 973
 Kottler, Moses, 502
 Koukiya, 454
 Kovadloff, Santiago, 699
 Kovner, Abba, 1038
 Kovno Gubernia, 494–495
 Kozer, José, 708
 Kozliner, Yosif, 1106
 Kraus, Karl, 59
 Kremegne, Pinchus, 949
 Kremer, Arkady, 336
 Kremer, Elijah, 1046
 Kremer, Isaias, 707
 Krespin, Mordecai, 859
 Kreuse, Ethel, 708
 Kreutzer, Leonid, 1203
 Krinski, Shlomo, 1038
Kristallnacht pogrom, 599
 Kroner, Karl, 1079–1080, 1081
 Krudo, Leon, 957
 Krüger, August, 1089
 Kruger, Paul, 496
 Kubitschek, Juscelino, 375
 Kuh, Anton, 58
 Kulanu, 451, 515
 Kulbak, Moyshe, 1043
 Kuli, Yakov, 957
 Kulka, Henry, 543–544
 Kultur Verein Morris Vintschevsky, 741
 Kun, Bela, 976
 Kupfer, Thomas, 920
 Kurzweil, Arthur, 292
 Kusayla, 456
 Kutama of Kabylie, 456
 Kwe Kwa, 519
 Kyi, Daw Aung San Suu, 1242
 Kyrgyzstan, 1136–1141

 Labaton, Haim Mordecai, 791
 Labaton, Helfon, 791
 Labaton, Isaac, 791
 Labaton, Sarah, 791
 Labi, Shimon, 478
 Lacretable, Jacques, 837
 Ladejidsky, Wolf, 1199
 Ladies' Hebrew Benevolent Societies, 565
 Ladino, 167, 172, 189, 193–194, 484
     music, 209–210, 228
     publications, 778
 Ladislav VI, King, 972
 Laemmle, Carl, 239
 Lafer, Celso, 721

- Lag B'Omer, 485, 513
 Lagos, 477
 La Kahéna, 510
 Lakshin, R' L.M., 604
 Laldenga, 1219
 Lamm, Martin, 1055, 1090
 Lamms family, 1090
 Landau, Judah Leib, 497
 Landau, Lev, 1117
 Landau, Lon (Leon), 816, 818–819
 Landauer, Gustav, 847
 Landsteiner, Karl, 299
 Lane, Michael, 517
 Langbehn, Julius, 51
 Langermann, Max, 496
 Languages of Diaspora
   Aramaic, 171–172
   characteristics of Jewish languages, 167–171
   Congruence principle (multiple causation), 204
   Diaspora influences on modern Hebrew ("Israeli"), 200–205
   integration of Yiddish into English, 197–199
   Judeo-Ibero-Romance, Yiddish, and Rotwelsch, 187–191
   Judeo-Spanish in the Turkish social context, 180–184
   two-tiered relexification in Yiddish, 184–187
   varieties of, 171–180
   Yiddish, 172, 193–197
   Yiddish-German irony, 191–193
 Lankin, Eliahu, 1184
 Lantos, Robert, 550
 Lantos, Tom, 945
 Laqe, 755
 Larache, Morocco, 488, 489
 Las Comisas Doradas, Mexico,
   674
 Lasker, Eduard, 845
 Lasker-Schüler, Else, 42, 43
 Laskin, Bora, 549
 Lasky, Jesse, 239
 Lasry, Abraham, 746 Latin America. See also
   countries in
   Jewish identity in cinema,
     700–702
   Jewish identity in fiction,
     695–699
   Jews in, 650–750
 Latin American Jewish Congress,
   714
 Latin American Jewish literature,
   705–710
 Latin American Jewish Studies
   Association, 703, 704, 705
 Latin American studies, Jewish studies as subject of, 703–705
 Latrun internment camp, 451
 Latvia, 1028–1034
 Lau, Meir, 747
 Lauder, Estée, 979
 Launceston, Australia, 521
La Vara (newspaper), 561
 Lavater, Johann C., 143, 144
 Lawrence, Ian, 537
 Lazar, Ruth, 545
 Lazon, Morris S., 339
 Lazarova, Becca, 966
 Lazarus, Emma, 563, 567–568
 Leah, 18
 Lebanon, 774
   2006 war in, 541
 Lebanon War (1982), 587
 Leaser, Isaac, 635
 Leib Gordon, Judah, 323, 324
 Leibler, Isi, 523
 Leibler, Mark, 523, 524, 525
 Leib Lilienblum, Moshe, 323
 Leib Mieses, Yehudah, 323
 Leibowitz, Necham, 1032
 Leibowitz, Yeshayahu, 1031, 1032
 Lelouch, Claude, 458
 Lemba, 450
 Lemchen, Chatzkel, 1038
 Lemlij, Moisés, 733
 Lemor, David, 734
 Lemor, José, 733–734
 Lenin, Vladimir, 920, 993
 León, Luis, 708
 Leon, Nicaragua, 669
 Leon, Tony, 500
 Leonard Hoffman, 503
 Léopold, Duke, 823
 Leopold II, King of Belgium, 462
 Leopold III, King of Belgium, 817
 Le Pen, Jean-Marie, 829
 Lerich, Robert, 152
 Lerner, Jacobo, 737
 Lerner, Michael, 405
 Les Cayes, Haiti, 660
 Leschchinsky, Jacob, 1048
 Leslie, Daniel D., 1161
 Lessing, G.E., 44
 Lessing, Gotthold E., 142–144
 Lessing, Theodor, 57–58
 Lessner, Sigmund David, 1201
 Levertin, Oscar, 1055, 1090
 Levertoff, Paul, 137
 Levi, 5
   tribe of, 78, 79
 Levi, Aron, 1090
 Levi, Elizabeth, 967
 Levi, Etien, 967
 Levi, Joseph, 896
 Levi, Leon, 967
 Levi, Robert, 462, 967
 Levi, Sylvain, 337
 Levi, Venice, 967
 Levi de Barrios, Daniel, 662
 Leviev, Lev, 996
 Leviev, Milcho, 967
 Levieva, Yana, 967
 Levin, Hirschel, 933, 934
 Levin, Mona, 1055, 1085
 Levin, Robert, 1055, 1085
 Levin, William Hort, 537
 Levin, Y., 1140
 Levin, Z., 1148
 Levinas, Emmanuel, 839, 1037
 Leviné, Eugen, 847
 Levinson, Jack, 491
 Lévi-Strauss, Claude, 830
 Levitas, I., 1013
 Levitin, Moshe, 1184
 Levitz, Fischel, 516
 Levy, Assar (Asher), 556
 Lévy, Bernard-Henri, 830
 Levy, Daniel, 522
 Levy, Enrique, 746
 Levy, Isaac, 733
 Levy, Jaco, 733
 Levy, Mark John, 137
 Levy, Michiel, 496
 Levy, Moise M., 462
 Levy, Nello, 512
 Lévy, Raphaël, 512
 Lévy, Samuel, 823
 Lévy, Solly, 220
 Levy, Uriah P., 563
 Lewandowski, Louis, 212
 Lewin, Kurt, 59
 Lewis, Bernard, 306
 Lewis, Jerry (Joseph Levitch), 243
 Lhanghal, Jangkhothang, 1220
 Lungdim, Thangkholun, 1220
 Libanius (fourth century CE), 71
 Liberman, Yaacov, 1184, 1194
 Libermann, Max, 46
 Libson, Gideon, 154
 Libya, 514
   Italian occupation of, 478–479
   Jews in, 477–481
 Lichtenberg, Julius, 653
 Lichtenstein, Aaron, 429
 Lichtenstein, Isaac, 137
 Lichtenstein-Herschensohn,
   Yehiel Tsvi, 137
 Lieberman, Joseph I., 612
 Liebes, Ernesto, 668–669
 Liebshtein, Jacob, 593
 Lilien, Moses, 46
 Lilienthal, Max, 568
 Lima, 730
 Lincoln, Abraham, 159
 Lindo, Don Joaquin Fernandez,
   669
 Lindo, Edward Maduro, 672
 Lindo, Joaquin Fernandez, 668
 Lindo, Juan, 668, 669
 Linstead, Jamaica, 658
 Lion, Dimitry, 231
 Lipchitz, Jacob Chaim, 1037
 Lipchitz, Jacques, 827, 1037
 Lipke, Zanis, 1031
 Lippert and Albu brothers, 496
 Lipschitz, Jacques, 836
 Lipschitz, Lippy, 502
 Lipshits, Pinkas, 1139
 Lipson, Roberta, 1180
 Lisenheim, Moses Henry, 896
 Literary anti-Semitism, 107–111

- Literature, 154
 anti-Semitic, 107
 Portugal, 163
 Yiddish, 178, 194–195
- Lithuania
 contemporary overview, 1037–1039
 culture, science, and the humanities, 1037–1038
 demographic movement and emigration, 1039
 general population, 1034
 historical overview, 1034–1037
 Jewish culture on, 1040–1045
 Jewish education and communal institutions, 1038
 Jewish population in, 1034
 Jews in, 1034–1039
 languages spoken, 1034
 migration routes and ethnic backgrounds, 1034
 Vilnius as Jewish city, 1046–1049
- Little St. Hugh of Lincoln, 99
- Liturgical music of Sephardi Jews, 214–218
- Liturgical rites, 207–209
- Liturgy, 216–217
 Ashkenazi, 25, 218–219
 Diaspora themes, 23–30
 Sephardi, 26, 218–219
 Syrian Jews, 218–220
- Livingstone, Ken, 929
- Livingstone, Zambia, 516, 517
- Livnat, Limor, 348
- Livornese Jews, 514
- Livornian Jews, 456
- Livorno, 478
- Llosa, Mario Vargas, 736
- Lobengula, 518
- Locke, John, 142
- Loeb, Jacques, 300
- Loesser, Frank, 238
- Loew, Marcus, 239
- Loewenberg, Ida, 564
- Loez, Isak Magrisso Meham, 957
- Loifer, Karina-Rivka, 1152
- Lojamei Jerut, Mexico, 675
- Lombard, Carole, 241
- Lombroso, Judah, 878
- London, M. W., 476
- London, Meyer, 593
- London Society for Promoting Christianity, 469
- Long, Breckinridge, 600
- Long, Edward, 658
- Loos, Adolf, 544
- Lopato, Abraham Aaronovitch, 1184
- Lopez, Roderigo, 923
- Lopez de Pas, Michel, 660
- Lopez de Sequiera, Juan, 671
- Lopez-Penha, Haim Horacio, 666
- Lorenzo II Magnifico of Florence, 866
- Lost tribes of Israel, 78–86
- Lotman, Jury, 1027
- Louis IX (Saint Louis), 100, 822
- Louis Philippe, 456
- Louis the Pious, 821
- Louis X (Louis the Stubborn), 822
- Louis XIV, 659–660, 822
- Louis XV, 822
- Loukanov, Andrewi, 963
- Lovestone, Jay, 593
- Lowy, Frank, 524
- Luanshya, Zambia, 517
- Lubavitch movement, 498, 719–720
- Lubitsch, Ernst, 241
- Lueger, Karl, 301
- Lumbroso, Moses, 556
- Lumbrozo, Jacob, 559
- Lumet, Sidney, 242, 249
- Lunel, Armand, 836
- Luperon, Gregorio, 666
- Luria, Isaac, 26, 35
- Luria, Solomon, 1041
- Lurianic cosmology, 36
- Lurianic Kabbalah and idea of Diaspora, 34–38
- Lusaka, Zambia, 516
- Lusaka Hebrew Congregation, 517
- Lusitano, Amato, 878, 879
- Luther, Martin, 101, 104, 105, 129
- Lutz, Charles, 974
- Lutzki, Simha Isaac, 93
- Luxembourg, Belgium, 883–886
- Luxemburg, Rosa, 335, 846
- Lyon, Hart, 933
- Lyon, Herman, 896
- Lyons, Israel, 352
- Ma'asum, Emir, 1124
- Macabich, Isadoro, 903
- Macao, China, 1181–1182
- Macarthur, Douglas, 1198, 1199
- Maccabee, Judah, 865
- Maccabi clubs, 664, 668, 712, 746, 1134
- Macedonia, 979–982
- Mack, Julian, 637
- Mada, 493
- Madagascar, 452
 Jews in, 452
- Madagascar Plan, 452
- Madjar, Simantov, 966
- Maduro, Delvalle, 672
- Maduro, Ricardo, 669
- Magen David Yeshiva, 618, 620
- Maggid Mesharim* (journal), 528
- Maggid-Shteinschneider, Hillel Noah, 1047
- Maghreb, North Africa, 510, 512
 Semitic migrations into, 453–454
- Magid of Mezeritch, 998
- Magnin, Mary Ann Cohen, 564
- Magnus, Elias, 1088
- Magnus, Laurie, 337
- Magnuses family, 1090
- Magnuss, Duke, 1029
- Magrebi, Yosef Maman, 1124
- Maguen David, 667
- Maguen David Youth Cultural Center, Mexico, 675
- Mahari, Abba, 469
- Mahdi, al-, 504, 794
- Mahdia, 513
- Mahmut II, 782
- Mahoza, 752
- Mailer, Norman, 243
- Maimon, 143
- Maimon, Solomon, 949
- Maimonides, Moses (Moses ben Maimon), 37, 129, 296, 297, 302, 315–317, 450, 464, 482, 797, 910 codification, 40 on converts, 423
 fleeing from Spain and Morocco, 383
 messianic age, 31
 ruling on ritual purification, 92
- Maimonides, Abraham, 153
- Maisels, Isie, 499
- Majorca hidden Jews, 157
- Makashov, Albert, 994
- Malamud, Bernard, 244, 245
- Malawi, 516
- Malaysia, 1240
- Maldonado Da Silva, Francisco, 696
- Mali, 451, 454
 Jews in, 451
- Malka, Eli, 504, 505, 508
- Malka, Shlomo, 504, 505, 506
- Malki, Ezra, 857, 858, 859
- Mallah, Asher, 366
- Malta, 886–887
- Maltzen, Heinrich Freiherr von, 382
- Maman, Yosef, 1126, 1150
- Ma'mun, Caliph al-, 306
- Managua, Nicaragua, 669
- Manasseh, 1–2, 79, 84, 1218
- Manasseh, Charles, 1242
- Mandari, al-, 487
- Mandela, Nelson, 497, 499, 500
- Mandelstam, Osip, 1106
- Manetho, 108
- Mann, Hans, 1080
- Mann, Helene, 1080
- Mann, Thomas, 1203
- Mannheimer, Herman, 1090
- Mannheimer, Theodor, 1090
- Mapu, Abraham, 1038, 1044
- Marad, 759
- Marcellinus, Ammianus, 1108
- Marcus, Gill, 502
- Marcus, J., 476
- Marcus, Jacob, 1090
- Margarita Island, 747
- Margrethe, Queen, 1070
- Margules, Paula, 709
- Mariam, Mengistu Haile, 470

- Mariamme (wife of Herod the Great), 1112
- Maria Theresa, 101, 969, 972
- Marich, David, Rabbi, 877
- Marilus, I. M., 990
- Mark, Henry, 532
- Mark, Yehezkel, 990
- Marks, Alexander, 1197, 1201
- Marks, David W., 934
- Marks, Herbie, 524
- Marks, Sammy, 496
- Markus, Otto, 476
- Marlowe, Christopher, 110
- Marquart, J., 1098
- Marr, Wilhelm, 59
- Marrakesh, 483
- Marranism, phenomena of, 156–160
- Marranos (New Christians), 100–101, 689
- avoiding attention to secret way of life, 158
  - Brazilian, 160–166
  - dual personalities, 165
  - family names, 157
  - genealogy, 157
  - Jewish customs and laws, 157–158
  - Portugal, 161
  - practicing Judaism in secret, 164–165
  - youth and, 158
- Marriage
- across cultural bounds, 240
  - Messianic, 147
  - patterns of, in Scandinavia, 1058
  - restrictions, 72
- Marshall, David, 358
- Marshall, Louis, 638
- Marthinsen, K. A., 1084
- Martí, José, 696
- Martial (late first century CE), 67
- Martin, David, 524
- Martin, Pope, 866
- Martínez, Ferrand, Archdeacon, 100
- Martinique, Jews in, 659–660
- Martov, Julius, 335
- Martyr, Justin, 88, 134
- Marx, Chico, 243
- Marx, Groucho, 243
- Marx, Harpo, 243
- Marx, Karl, 42, 43
- Mary, mother of Jesus, 876
- Mar Zutra, 766
- Mashhad, 768
- Mashkevich, Alexander, 996, 1134
- Mashonaland, 518
- Masliah, Sahl ben, 92
- Mason, Jackie (Yacov Moshe Moaza), 243
- Matanzas, Cuba, 664
- Matatov, Abo, 1143
- Matheson, Jardine, 1172
- Matsiyahu, 228
- Mattuck, Israel, 338
- Maurice of Nassau, 726
- Maurícia, 557
- Mauritius, Jews in, 452
- Max, Lesley, 544
- Maximillian, Emperor, 669, 690, 969
- May, George, 491
- Mayer, Alain, 885
- Mayer, Kurt, 730
- Mayer, Louis B., 239–240
- Mazarita, 466
- Mazouz, Matsliah, 513
- Mazursky, Paul, 245
- Mbabane, Jews in, 452
- Mbale, 515
- McCarthy, Joseph, 240
- McGovern, George, 583
- McNutt, Paul, 1244
- Mecca, 752
- Mecid, Abdul, 782
- Medem, Vladimir, 336
- Medes, 81
- Medicine, 294–300
- American century, 299–300
  - Biblical and Talmudic background, 296
  - European reawakening, 297
  - Gentiles choosing Jewish doctors, 295–296
  - in Gibraltar, 851–855
  - Islamic Era, 296–297
  - Jews choosing profession, 295–296
  - Modern Europe, 298–299
  - recent developments and future trends, 300
  - Vienna, Austria, 301–302
- Medicks, Simon, 476
- Medieval Armenia, 1113–1114
- Medieval Spain
- See also* Spain
  - changing conditions in Jewish community, 910–911
  - daily life as Jew, 909–910
  - expulsion and final stage, 911–912
  - Jews and Jewish communities in, 905–913
  - leadership of Jewish community, 907–909
  - relations between Jews and Muslims in, 913–916
- Medina, Benjamin, 730, 752, 753
- Mediterranean basin migration routes of Rhodian Jews, 369–374
- Megorashim*, 487
- Mehoza, 764, 765
- Mehta, Zubin, 1225
- Mehubad, Feizolla, 769
- Meier, Jeanette Hirsch, 564
- Meiggs, Enrique, 729
- Meiji, Emperor, 1200
- Meir, Golda, 743–744, 747, 1253, 1254
- Meir, R., 766
- Meir, Yosef, 380
- Meir Berstein, Gershom, 1106
- Mekenes, Morocco, 487
- Mekler, Issac, 734–735
- Melbourne, Australia, 521, 522, 528
- Melchior, Michael, 1085, 1086
- Melchior, Yoav, 1085
- Melilla, Morocco, 489
- Mellahs*, 483
- Memmi, Albert, 511, 512, 838
- Memmi-Sandhaus, Lynda, 512
- Men, acculturation in Central and Western Europe (19th and early 20th century), 254
- Menasse, Robert, 47
- Mendel, Menachem, 947, 998
- Mendelevich, Yosef, 994
- Mendelian disorders, 288–290 (table)
- Mendelowitz, Shraga Feivel, 609
- Mendelsohn, Moses, 781
- Mendelsohn, Oscar, 1085
- Mendelsohn, Emmanuel, 496
- Mendelsohn, Felix, 235
- Mendelsohn, Moses, 43, 44, 142–145, 235, 253–254, 321, 1065
- Mendes, Grácia Nási, 880
- Mendes, Henry Pereira, 319, 561
- Mendès-France, Pierre, 660, 830
- Menelik, 468
- Menem, Carlos Saul, 711
- Menophilius, 67
- Menuhin, Yehudi, 919
- Menzies Commission, 523
- Mercado, Judith, 556
- Mercas USA, 641
- Merenids, 482
- Meridor, Yaakov, 476
- Merrick, David, 237
- Merseburg, Thietmar von, 865
- Messele, Adisu, 474
- Messiah, 31–33, 306
- criteria, 37
  - utopianism, 91
- Messianic age, 31
- Messianic communities. See Judeo-Christian communities
- Messianic Jews, 138
- Messianic synagogues, 127, 147–149
- Metchnikoff, Eli, 299
- Metropolitan areas with largest Jewish populations (2005), 399 (table)
- Mevorah, Valeri Nisim, 966
- Meico
- contemporary Jewish identity in, 685–688
  - history of Jewish migration to, 682–685
  - Jews in, 673–681, 690, 694

- Meyer, Elias, 358
 Meyer, Marshall, 693
 Meyer, Menasseh, 358, 1233, 1247, 1248
 Meyers, Bertha Frank, 565
 Meyerson, Golda, 994
 Meza, Abraham, 745
 Meza, Ricardo, 745
 Micas, João, 880
 Michaelis, Johann D., 142, 143
 Michaels, Anne, 550
 Michelstaedter, Alberto, 1006
 Michlin, Irwin, 671 Middle Ages
   anti-Semitism, 104–105
   high literacy rate of Jews, 39
   Karaites, 90
 Middle East. See also countries in Islamization in, 139–141
   Jews in, 139–141, 751–799
 Middle Eastern Jews, in United States, 560–563
 Midia, 768
 Midler, Bette, 248
 Midrash, 11, 13
 Miesis, Matisyohu, 193
 Migal, Arcady, 949
 Migdal, Zwi, 697, 702
 Mignogna, Eduardo, 702
 Migration
   chronology of Jewish travelers and explorers, 351–354 contemporary migration patterns of Russian Jews to Germany, 386–391 of Egyptian Jews, 375–378 of Iraqi Jews, 354–360
     Jews of Iraq migrated to Israel in Operation Ezra and Nehemya, 378–382 modern Jewish refugees from Arab countries, 382–386 patterns of Iraqi Jews, 354–360 population transfer of the Jews of Thessaloniki, 364–369 of Rhodian Jews, 369–374 westward migration routes of Sephardi Jews, 361–364 Mihalev, Petar, 960
 Milan (1535–1597), 870–874
 Milan, Gabriel, 661, 1064
 Milan, Italy, 872–873
 Milhaud, Darius, 836
 Miller, Arthur, 238
 Miller, Henry, 243
 Miller, William, 633
 Millin, Sarah Gertrude, 501
 Milstein, Cesar, 712
 Mindlin, José, 721
 Minorca, 916–918
 Minute Book, 492
 Miramer, Isaac, 549
 Miró, José María, 695
 Mishkin, Jacobs, 730
 Mishnah, 11, 13
 Mithridates, 70
 Mitman, Bronislav, 730
 Mitten, Richard, 808
 Mnaseas, 108
 Moab, 80
 Moati, Nine, 512
 Moatti, Rene, 457
 Mobutu, 462
 Mocatta, Solomon, 527
 Moch, Regina, 564
 Modena, 867
 Modern Diaspora Jewry
   demography of, 392–402
   prospective, 401
   17th century to World War II, 393–395
   World War II to present, 396–401
 Modern Jewish refugees from Arab countries, 382–386
 Modern period communication, 40–42
 Modiano, Patrick, 839
 Modigliani, Amedeo, 829, 836
 Moellin, Jacob, 208
 Mogador (now Essaouira), Morocco, 460
 Mogilevski, Aleaner, 1203
 Mohamed VI, 485
 Mohammed, 296, 1230
 Mohammed, Moulay, 483
 Mohammed V, 483, 484
 Mohilever, Shmuel, 1184
 Moïssis, Asher, 365
 Mokotoff, Gary, 293
 Molcho, Solomon, 83
 Moldova, 988–992
 Molho, Salamon, 980
 Molhov, Yako, 961
 Molina, Tirso de, 165
 Molon, Apollonius, 108
 Momchilov, Ivan, 960
 Monash, John, 522, 926
 Monastir, 776
 Mondolfi, Alejandro, 746
 Mongols, 83
 Monis, Judah, 630
 Monogamy, 252
 Montagu, Edwin Samuel, 337
 Montagu, Samuel, 931
 Montaigne, 165
 Montefiore, Claude, 130, 337
 Montefiore, Jacob, 526–527
 Montefiore, Joseph Barrow, 527
 Montefiore, Moses, 483, 527, 925, 931, 934, 1035
 Montesinos, Vladimiro, 734
 Montevideo, Uruguay, 741, 742, 743–744
 Montreal, Canada, 549, 550, 551, 552
 Monza, Rica, 874
 Mordecai, Eliyahu, 1242
 Mordecai, Haim, 791
 Morgenthau, Henry, Jr., 600–601
 Morgulev family, 1189
 Moriah College, Sydney, Australia, 523, 525
 Morin, Edgar, 165
Moriscos, 487
 Moroccan High Institute for Hebrew Studies, 485
 Moroccan Marinids, 456
 Morocco, 450
   Jewish community in, 481–486
   Sephardic Jews in, 220–221, 487–490
 Morse, Arthur, 112
 Mortality differentials according to religious affiliation in Gibraltar, 853 (table)
 Morteira, Saul Levi, 727
 Moses, 64, 79, 464, 751
   Bible versus Koran stories, 151 dire prophecies about future of Israel, 22 holding ten commandments (illustration), 24 instigator of malice, 66
   intermarriage, 414
 Moses, Joseph, 1181
 Moses, Moisés, 729
 Moses, R., 865
 Moses, Solomon, 1216
 Moses Isaac, 1219
 Moshe, Shmuel, 366
 Moskona, Leon-Judas, 954
 Mossad le-Aliyah Bet, 772
 Mosse, Albert, 1197
 Mosse, George, 143, 145
 Mosse, Rudolf, 846
 Mostel, Zero, 246
 Mosul, 771, 773
 Mota, Nehemia, 1213
Moukadem, 456
 Mound, Gloria, 156
 Mountain Jews, 1095–1097
 Mount of Olives, 466
 Mount Scopus College, Melbourne, Australia, 523, 525
 Moussaëff, Dorrit, 1081
 Mozambique, 460
   Jews in, 452
 Msika, Habiba, 512
 Mucopolipidosis IV (MLIV), 283–284
 Mugabe, Robert, 518
 Muhammad, 150–151, 153, 306, 753
 Muhammad, Askia, 454
 Mullokandov, Avner, 1144
 Mullokandov, Gavriel, 1153
 Mumford, Lewis, 595
 Mung, Leon, 980
 Mung, Yehuda Lev, 954
 Muni, Paul, 213, 242
 Muñiz-Huberman, Angelina, 698–699, 708
 Munz, Peter, 543

- Murashu, 760
 Musaphia, Benjamin, 1062
 Musgrave, Lord, 352
 Mushel, Georgy, 1153
 Music
   in America, 213–214
   Ashkenasi, 208–209
   choral singing, 217, 228
   contemporary in United States, 225–229 detachment from Eastern European styles, 226 folk, 212, 226
   Hasidic, 211
   Hebrew Israeli songs, 227
   history of post-Temple, 206–207 humor and satire in Judeo-Spanish song, 220–222
   influence of Islam, 208
   Jewish contributions to the Arts, 233–250 klezmer, 227–228
   Ladino, 209–210, 228
   liturgical, of Sephardi Jews, 214–218 liturgical music, 207–209, 212
   men's songs, 209, 210
   Middle East tradition, 215
   Near East tradition, 215
   New York avant-garde jazz style, 228
   North Africa tradition, 215–216 overview of Diaspora Jewish, 206–214 paraliturgical, 219 popular song, 209–211
   psalms, 207
   reconstruction of Iberian Crypto-Jewish identity and, 222–224 rescue and virtual preservation of Diaspora cultural heritage by the Center for Jewish Art, 229–233
   Sephardi, 208, 209, 214–218, 228
   Southern Arabian Peninsula tradition, 215 symphonies, 227
   of Syrian Jews, 218–220 traditional, 207–209
   women's songs, 209–210
   Yiddish, 210–211, 227
 Musica Aviva, 524
 Muslims
   Jews under rule of, 305–309 relationships with Jews in medieval Spain, 913–916 Mussolini, 869
   alliance between Hitler and, 479
 Mussry, David, 1239
 Mutations prevalent among Jews and other populations, 291 (table)
 Myanmar, 1240–1242
 Myers, Arthur, 542
 Myers, Joseph Hart, 895
 Myers, Michael, 537, 543
 Myotonic dystrophy, 284
 Na'amat, 679, 681
 NAAMAT USA, 641
Nação Portuguesa, 558
 Nacon, Yitzhkan, 747
 Nahmanides, Moses, 37, 317, 908, 909, 910
 Nairobi Hebrew Congregation, 475, 476
 Najara, Israel, 776
 Najenson, Luis, 709
 Najran, 794
 Namib, 490
 Namibia, Jewish community of, 490–492
 Nantes Code, 559
 Naphtali, tribe of, 79, 82, 84
 Napoleon, 825, 844, 867, 886, 984, 1067
 Napoleon, Louis, 888
 Napoleon III, 673
 Naqqash, Samir, 382
 Narkiss, Bezalel, 230
 Nascimento, Janeiro, 461
 Nasi, Gracia, 253, 880
 Nási, José, 880
 Nasi, Judah, 787
 Nasi, Yosef, 31
 Nassau, 663
 Nasser, Gamal, 308, 464–465
 Nasserism, 511
 Nassy, David, 651
 Natan, R., 766
 Nathan, David, 544
 Nathan, Fritz, 1052–1053, 1078
 Nathan, Joseph Edward, 537–538
 Nathan, Karl, 1244
 Nathan, Matthew, 1187
 Nathan, Nathan, 662
 Nathan of Gaza, 83, 980
 Nathanson, M. L., 1052, 1066, 1067, 1068
 National Anti-Chinese and Anti-Jewish league, Mexico, 674
 National Commerce Day, Mexico, 674
 National Committee for Labor Israel, 641
 National Conference of Brazilian Bishops, 720
 National Council of Jewish Women, 525
 Nationalist anti-Semitism, 105–106
 National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives, 564
 National Society for Hebrew Day Schools, 609
 Naumbourg, Samuel, 212
 Navarro, Abraham, 1232, 1250
 Navon, Yitzchak, 472
 Nazis, 47, 106, 112–114
   Karaites, 93
   occupation of Baltic States, 1021–1022
   Sephardi differences and, 52
 Nebuchadnezzar II (King of Babylon), 449, 752, 757, 1111, 1119
 Nechemias, Baruch, 1050, 1088
Nefesh B'Nefesh, 644
 Negoosie, Hiob, 469
 Nehardea, 764, 765
 Nehemia, 422, 423
 Nehemiah, 292, 751, 760, 761
 Nelson, Admiral Lord, 924
 Nelson, New Zealand, 535
 Neo-Hasidism, 628–629
 Nero, 1111
 Netanya, 481, 513
 Netherlanders, 555–556
 Netherlands, 887–892
 Netto, Isaac, 849
 Netzer (Reform), 499
 Netzorg, Jack, 1244
 Netzorg, Morton, 1244
 Neubauer, Adolf, 85
 Neuman, John von, 975
 Neusner, Jacob, 573
 Nevis, Jews in, 658
 New Amsterdam, 553, 554–555, 557, 559, 560, 654
 New Andalusia, Venezuela, 745
 New anti-Semitism, 118–122
 New Christians, 160–162, 650, 658
 New Jewish Agenda, 627
 New Left, 596
 Newman, Frederick, 543
 New Middleburgh, Essequibo, 652
 New Right, 583
 New South Wales Legislative Assembly, 522
 New York, Syrian Jews in, 615–620
 New Zealand, Jews in, 534–545
New Zealand Jewish Chronicle (newspaper), 540
 New Zealand Jewish Council, 541
 New Zealand Opera Company, 544
 Ngaite, Vumzakap, 1219
 Niazi, A. A. K., 1227
 Nicaragua, Jews in, 669–670
 Nicholas, 1095
 Nicholas I, 992, 1035
 Nicholas II, 1036, 1133
 Nicoidski, Clarisse, 839
 Nicolai, 143
 Niebuhr, Reinhold, 132, 633–634
 Niego, Alberta, 733–734
 Niemann-Pick disease type A, 284
 Nieto, David, 318
 Nieuhof, Johannes, 726
 Niger, Shmuel, 595
 Nigeria, 451
   Jews in, 492–493
 Nikolas I, 954
 Nimroy, Leonard, 199

- Nineteenth Amendment, 564
 Nineveh, 751, 752, 755, 756
 Ninio, Albert, 528
 Ninio, Henry, 528
 Ninio, Jacqueline, 528
 Nippur, 752, 757, 759, 761
 Niskier, Arnaldo, 721
 Nissán, Rosa, 699, 701, 708
 Nissenson, Hugh, 248
 Nissim, Mozelle, 1248
 Nissim, Rav, 314
 Nissim family, 1187
 Nixon, Richard M., 583
 Niyazov family, 1148
 Noah, 17, 18, 292, 1123, 1161
 Noah, Mordechai, 635
 Nobile, Umberto, 354
 Noll, Chaim, 47
 Nonclassical congenital adrenal hyperplasia (CAH), 284–285
 Nordau, Max, 44, 1078
 Norden, Benjamin, 496
 North African desert war (1941–1943), 479
 North America, 546–649. See also America
     Jews in, 546–649
 North American Conference on Ethiopian Jewry (NACOEJ), 471
 Northern Rhodesia, 516, 518
 Norway, 1082–1087
 Novinsky, Anita Waingort, 160
 Nowakowsky, David, 212
 Nunes, Ricke, 556
 Nunez Martinez, Elias, 671
 Nussah S'farad, 26
 Nussbaum, Felix, 817–818
 Nussimbaum, Lev, 1117
 Nu-wa, 1161
 Nuwas, Dhu, 794
 Nyasaland, 516, 518

 Obadiah, Prince, 1123
 Obadiah, Rabbi, 857
 Ochs, Jacques, 816, 817, 818
 Odets, Clifford, 238
 Old Testament, 797
 Olinda, Brazil, 650
 Oliver, Haim, 961
 Olmert, Amram, 1183
 Olmert, Ehud, 1183, 1185
 Omdurman, Sudan, 505–506
 Omri, King of Israel, 80
 Operation Defensive Shield, 118
 Operation Ezra and Nehemya, 378–382
 Operation Magic Carpet, 795
 Operation Moses, 470
 Operation On Eagles' Wings, 797
 Operation Sheba, 470
 Operation Solomon, 470–471
 Ophir, 453
 Opis, 759
 Oppenheim, Samuel, 557
 Oppenheimer, Enrique, 729
 Oppenheimer, Ernest, 496, 517
 Oppenheimer, Joseph, 841
 Oppler, Alfred C., 1199
 Oral Law, 469, 473, 796
 Oran, 455, 458
 Orange River Colony, 494
 Order of the Tunisian Republic, 512
 O'Reilly, Justo Sierra, 696
 Orgambide, Pedro, 697
 Oriental Jewry, history of religious leadership, 309–315
 Orloff, Chana, 836
 Ornitiz, Samuel, 595
 Orpha, 789
 Or Shalom, 551
 Or Shalom Center (Bat Yam), 481
 Orthodox Comunidad Maguén David, Mexico, 675
 Orthodox Comunidad Sefaradí, Mexico, 675
 Orthodox Judaism, 550, 566, 613–614 contemporary conversion patterns into, 421–424 growth of music, 225–226
     Halacha (Jewish law), 272
 ORT Uruguay, 744, 769
 Or Yehuda, Libya, 481
 Osar Hatorah, 485
 Oslo Peace Process, 514
 Osnapar, 3
 Ostraca, 754–755
 Ostrowski, Grisha, 966
 Ott, Eugene, 1238
 Ottawa, Canada, 549
 Otto, Julius Conradus, 895
 Ottolenghi, Giuseppe, 867 Ottoman Empire collapse of, 131
     Jewish exiles and, 254
     Jews in, 776–779
     migration routes of Rhodian Jews, 369–374
     Sabbatean movement in, 779–785
 Ottósson, Hendrik Siemsen, 1077, 1078, 1079, 1080–1081
 Otzar ha-Torah, 770
 Ouaknin, Marc-Alain, 839
 Oudtshoorn, 497
 Oujda, 483
 Ovid, 65
 Ovsishcher, Lev, 948
 Oz, Amos, 965
 Ozick, Cynthia, 248

 Pacific Foundation for Health, Education, and Parent Support, 544
 Pacifico, Don, 925
 Pact of Umar, 798
 Pahlavi, Mohammad Reza, 769
 Pakistan, 1228–1230
 Palestine
     Arabs from, 384–385
     capture of, 131
     decline of authentic traditions, 25
     Jewish immigration to, 113–114
 Palestine Brigade, 480
 Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), 116, 501, 514
 Palley, Ahrn, 520
 Palmerston, Lord, 925, 1186
 Palmerston North, New Zealand, 535
 Paltiel, Julius, 1085
 Panama, Jews in, 670–673
 Pan Gu, 1161
 Pann, Abel, 231
 Papeete, Tahiti, 533
 Pappenheim, Bertha, 262
 Paqatha, 755
 Paraliturgical music, 219
 Paramaribo, 653–654, 739, 740
 Pardes Hayeladim, Iraq, 771
 Pardo of Salonika, Josiau, 654
 Parker, Dorothy, 836
 Parmet, Simon, 1074
 Parsis relations in India and Pakistan, 1223–1225
 Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education, 548
 Pascin, Jules, 829, 966
 Pasha, Daud, 355, 528, 1226
 Pasha, Heykal, 384
 Pasha, Syuleiman, 957
 Paskhaver, A., 1014
 Passi, Solomon, 966
 Passion Plays, 98–99, 109–110
 Passover seder, 551
 Paszkowski, Diego, 699
 Pataki, Lazlo, 669
 Pathans of Pakistan and Afghanistan, 1230–1231
 Patilahovs family, 1126
 Patinkin, Mandy, 228
 Paul, Apostle, 8, 104, 123, 147
 Paul, Saint, 856
 Pauli, Hanna, 1054, 1090
 Paul II, 877
 Paul III, 879
 Pauline mission, 123–124
 Paul IV, Pope, 866, 879–880
 Paull, Laura, 701
 Paulli, Holger, 1064
 Paul of Tarsus, 127, 128
 Paul V, Pope, 972
 Pavlova, Mihailina, 966
 Paxton, Tom, 226
 Paykel, Maurice, 538, 544
 Pehle, John, 115
 Peixotto, Jessica, 564–565
 Pelinka, 808
 Pen, Yehuda, 819, 949
 Peña, Saúl, 733
 Pepin the Short, 821
 Pereira, Duarte, 878

- Pereires, 825
 Perelman, Eliezer Yitzhak, 1038
 Peres, Shimon, 747, 950, 1253
 Perets, David, 966
 Peretz, Avraham, 367
 Peretz, Y. L. (Yehuda Leib), 178, 195, 234, 628
 Pérez, Alan García, 734
 Perez, Young, 512
 Perez de Almazan, Miguel, 665
 Pergament, Moses, 1055, 1090
 Perl, Yosef, 323
 Perlman, Eliezer, 1044
 Perlman, Elliot, 524
 Perlman, Itzhak, 228
 Pernambuco, Brazil, 650
 Peron, Juan, 711
 Persecution, 95–103
   dissemination of early Christianity beyond Jewish
     Diaspora, 123–125
   Euro-Arab anti-semitism,
     115–118
   history of, 95–103
   literary anti-semitism, 107–111
   massacre of Jews in York, 99
   new anti-Semitism, 118–122
   riot instigated by Fettmilch, 102
   in Russia, 102–103
   in Spain, 100–101
   varieties of anti-Semitism, 103–107
   in Vienna, 98
   Western democracies and the Holocaust, 112–115
 Persia, Jews in, 156, 752
 Perspective on Judeo-Ibero-Romance, Yiddish, and Rotwelsch, 187–191
 Perth, Australia, 528
 Perth Hebrew Congregation, 527
 Peru, Jews in, 690, 694, 728–735
   in literature of, 735–737
 Peruvian Commercial Stock
   Market, 728
 Peruvian Jewish Association, 735
 Peshev, Dimitar, 960
 Petachya of Regensburg, 786
 Petahiah, Rabbi, 1103
 Petah Tikvah, Libya, 481
 Petain, Philippe, Marshall, 455,
   457, 827, 828
 Peter I, 1009
 Pethahiah, 351
 Petronius (first century CE), 66
 Petrov, Valeri, 961
 Phibunsongkhram, Luang, 1251
 Philanthropy
   Diaspora, 343–344
   Jewish values and, 407–412
 Philip II, King of Spain, 870
 Philip IV (Philip the Fair), 822
 Philippines, 1243–1246
 Philippino Zionism and ties with Israel, 1246
 Philipson, Aron, 1052, 1089
 Philipson, Charles, 1085
 Philistines, 80
 Phillips, Jacob, 1186
 Phillips, Lionel, 496
 Phillips, Philip Aaron, 537, 542
 Philo of Alexandria, 8, 252, 464,
   466, 767
 Phipps, Captain, 352
 Pichanick, Harry, 520
 Pichanick, Ivor, 520
 Pick, Israel, 137
 Picon, Molly, 242
 Picquart, Georges, 826
 Pidal, Ramón Menéndez, 487
 Pieters, Laurie, 492
 Pietersen, Solomon, 558
 Pietre's Point, 660
 Pilosof, Vladimir, 967
 Pinchuk, V., 1014
 Pincus, Arieh Louis, 501
 Pinhel, Duarte, 877
 Pinkhasov, Yakov-Hai, 1150
 Pinochet, Augusto, 698
 Pinson, 513
 Pinter, Harold, 926
 Pinto, António Dias, 878
 Pioneer Corps, 518
 Pirani, Frederick, 527
 Pirani, Henry Cohen, 527
 Pisko, Seraphine Eppstein, 564
 Pissarro, Camille, 829
 Pius V, 98
 Pius X, 131
 Pivín, José, 709
 Plager, Silvia, 698, 708
 Plaskow, Judith, 406
 Platek, Felka, 818
 Pliny the Elder, 82
 Plutarch (ca. 46–ca. 120 CE), 67, 1110
 Poalei Zion, 741
 Pogrund, Benjamin, 502
 Pointe-à-Pitre, 660
 Polak, Henry S. L., 496
 Poland, 101–102, 982–988
   anti-Semitism, anti-Zionism, and community existential problems, 987
   contemporary overview, 986–987
   general population, 982
   historical overview, 983–986
   Jewish education, religious denominations, communal and political institutions,
     986–987
   Jewish population in, 982, 983
   languages spoken, 983
   migration routes and ethnic
     backgrounds, 983
   rebirth of young Jewish life, 987
   Reform Judaism Tempel
     Synagogue (Kazmierz), 986
 Polanyi, Michael, 975
 Polemon, 70
 Polhemiu, Dominus Johannes, 556
 Political activism during Diaspora,
   344
 Pollak, Hayyim Yedidyah (Lucky), 137
 Pollitzer, Robert, 1169
 Polyakov brothers, 1139
 Polygamy, 259
 Polygyny, 252
 Pompey, 68
 Pontius Pilate, 109
 Ponve, Anatole, 1202
 Popkin, Richard, 165
 Popper, Karl, 543
 Popper-Lynkeus, Josef, 301
 Popular song, 209–212
 Population transfer on Jews of Thessaloniki, 364–369
 Port Antonio, Jamaica, 658
 Port-au-Prince, Haiti, 660
 Port Cortes, Honduras, 669
 Porto Alegre, Brazil, 720
 Port Royal, Jamaica, 651, 658
 Portugal, 101, 161–164, 892–895
 Portuguese Brazil, 650
 Portuguese Jews of Diaspora:
   Italy and beyond, 875–883
 Porzecanski, Teresa, 708 Post-World War II period, focusing on Jewish assimilation into bourgeoisie, 244–247
 Potelyahov, Rafael, 1150
 Potok, Chaim, 247, 436
 Poujade, Pierre, 829
 Prag, Mary Goldsmith, 564
 Prayers, 27–29
 Premodern diaspora communication in, 38–42
   protecting themselves, 75–76
 Pressner, Irene, 748
 Preston, Betty, 884, 885
 Pretoria, Zimbabwe, 518
 Preuß, Hugo, 847
 Primrose, Hannah, 897
 Principe, 460
 Pringshein, Klaus, 1203
 Pritsak, Omeljan, 1095
 Progressive King David,
   Melbourne, Australia, 525
 Progressive movement, 525
 Proust, Marcel, 835
 Prouville de Tracy, Alexandre, 652
 Prussian Emancipation Edict
   (1812), 144
 Psalmody, 207, 216
 Psalms, 207
 Pseudepigrapha, 11, 15
 Psychoanalysis, emergence of,
   301–304
 Ptolemaic dynasty, 73
 Ptolemy, 477, 856
 Ptolemy Lagus, 87
 Puerto Rico, Jews in, 665
 Pumbedita, 752, 765

- Pupkewitz, Harold, 491, 492
 Pupkewitz, Max, 491
 Purim Burghal, 478
 Purim Sherif, 478
 Pyrrard de Laval, Françoise, 725
- Qarase, Laisenia, 532
 Qingdao, China, 1182
 Qozmos, 468
 Quartet, 722
 Quebec City, Canada, 549
 Queen of Sheba, 793
 Quetzaltenango, 668
 Quevedo, Fray Juan, 663
 Quezon, Manuel, 1233, 1244, 1245
 Quintilian, 66
 Qumisi, Daniel ben Moses al-, 91
 Quota Act (1930), 495
 Qwara, 470–471
- Rabat, Morocco, 459, 460
 Rabb, Maurice, 517
 Rabban, Joseph, 1213
 Rabbin, Pinehas, 1127
 Rabbinate, rabbi's reflection on modern, 416–418
 Rabbinic Judaism, 61–62, 251
 Rabbinic legend, symbols of diaspora, 18–21
 Rabbinic scholarship, 1041–1043
 Rabbis ordination of women as, 254
   reflections on modern nate and Jewish community, 416–418
 Rabin, Yitzhak, 747, 1165, 1227, 1253
 Rabinovich, V., 1014
 Rabinovici, Doron, 47
 Rabinowitz, Joel, 498
 Rabinowitz, Joseph, 137, 138
 Rabinowitz, Louis I., 497–498
 Rabinowitz, Moritz, 1084
 Rachel, 18, 19
 Rachid, Moulay, 482
 Rachman, Z. W., 492
 Racial anti-Semitism, 106–107
 Racial science, 51, 106–107
 Raczymow, Henri, 839
 Radicalism, American Jews and, 592–596
 Radner, Gilda, 244
 Radonski, Henrique Capriles, 747
 Rafael de Aguilar, Moses, 726
 Ragen, Naomi, 248
 Raghib, Elisha, 1124
 Rahabi, David, 1205, 1214
 Rahabi, Ezekiel, 1205, 1207, 1213, 1228
 Rahy, Philip, 595
 Raitzin, Misha, 1153
 Rakusen, Nathan, 1188
 Ramalovski, Hirsh, 958
 Ramati, Shaul, 1246
 Rama VI, King, 1251
 Rambam, 529, 795–796
 Rami, Ahmed, 1054
 Raphael de Aguilar, Moses, 726
 Rapoport, Solomon J. L., 25
 Rashbam, 822
 Rashi, 822
 Rashid al Davia, 768
 Rasmussen, Anders Fogh, 1070
 Rathenau, Emil, 491
 Rathenau, Walther, 59, 491, 847
 Rathjens, Carl, 799
 Rav Shimon ben Zemah Duran, 456
 Rav Yitzchak ben Sheshet Perfet, 456
 Rayda, 798, 799
 Raymond family, 1187
 Reading, Fanny, 522
 Rebecca, 18
 Recanati, David, 366
 Recife, Brazil, 650, 651, 716, 720, 726
 Reconstructionist Judaism, 550, 566, 568, 626–627
 Redemption
   Islam, 153
   Lurianic Kabbalah, 36
 Reder, Bernard, 1070
 Reflexification and Sorbs, 185
 Reformation
   demonization of Jews, 104–105
   persecution and expulsion, 101
 Reform Beit Shalom Synagogue, 528
 Reform Judaism, 550, 566, 568, 636
   German Lutheranism and, 129 religious contexts for Jewish music, 225–226 women as rabbis, 254
 Rehoboam, 79
 Rei, Gideon, 1221
 Rei, Joseph, 1221
 Reich, Ranicki, Marcel, 47
 Reich, Steve, 227
 Reinach, Jacques, 826
 Reinach, Joseph, 334
 Reinhart, Harold, 338
 Rejzen, Zalman, 1048
 Relativism, 122
 Relexification, 184–186
 Religions communication, 38–39
   sharing ethical values, 144
 Religious (pagan) anti-Semitism, 108–109
 Religious affiliation and cause-specific mortality differentials, 853 (table)
 Religious contexts, 225–227
 Religious fusion and interaction
   Brazilian Marranism, 160–166
   Christian-Jewish dialogue (18th Century), 141–145 contemporary Judeo-Christian communities in Jewish Diaspora, 146–150 history of Judeo-Christian communities in Jewish Diaspora, 136–139
   Islamization and Jews in Medieval Middle East, 139–141
   Jewish Diaspora and spreading of Christianity, 126–132
   Jewish influence on formation of Christian Scriptures, 132–135
   Jewish-Islamic mutual influences, 150–156
   widespread phenomena of Marranism and hidden Jews, 156–160
 Religious leadership of Oriental Jewry, 309–315
   Sicily and community subordination, 312–314 super-communal authorities, 309–312
 Religious Right, 583
 Religious Zionists of America, 641
 Remak, Rober, 298
 Rendev, Petar, 958
 Reuben, tribe of, 79, 82, 84
 Reubeni, David, 35, 82–83
 Reyzen, Zalmen, 1043
 Rezeph, Syria, 752
 Rhodes, 776
 Rhodes, Cecil John, 496, 518, 519
 Rhodes, Jews in, 857–860
 Rhodian Jews of Ottoman Empire migration routes, 369–374
 Ribeiro, Bernardim, 876, 877
 Ricardo, Mordechai, 745
 Ricci, Matteo, 1156, 1161
 Rich, Lewis, 496
 Richard I, King, 129
 Richard the LionHeart, 99
 Richler, Mordecai, 246, 839
 Richter, Elise, 261 (photo), 262
 Richthofen, Ferdinand von, 786
 Riegner, Gerhart, 599
 Riess, Ludwig, 1197
 Riesser, Gabriel, 844
 Rifkind, Malcolm, 897
 Riklis, E., 720
 Riley-Day syndrome. See Familial dysautonomia
 Rimmon, Salomon, 1233, 1240
 Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, 716, 717, 720
 Rio Group, 722
 Riot instigated by Vincent Fettmilch, 102 (photo)
 Ripstein, Arturo, 700
 Ritual murder, 95–96
 Ritual objects, 230–231
 Rivadavia, Bernardino, 711
 Rivera, Andrés, 699
 Rivers, Joan (Joan Sandra Molinsky), 244
 Rivkes, Moyshe, 1041
 Rivonia Trial (1964), 499

- Robinson, Dove-Meyer, 537, 542
 Rodgers, Richard, 238
 Rodney (Admiral), 657, 661
 Rodrigues, João, 879
 Rodriguez, Jorge, 1243
 Rodriguez de Fonseca, Juan, 665
 Rodriquez, Domingo, 1243
 Rohling, August, 307
 Roitman, Marcos, 733
 Romanelli, Samuel Aaron, 352
 Romania, 988–992
 Romano, Albert, 958
 Romanovich, Daniil, 1008
 Romans
   anti-Semitism and, 104
   Bar-Kokhba Revolt and, 200
   Christianity and, 123–124, 127
   harsh tax on Jews, 69 impact of Judaism on, 66 persecution and expulsion and, 96
 Romanticism, 75
 Rome, 65, 67–68, 70
   Arch of Titus in, 20
   Samaritans, 88
 Rommel, Erwin, 1227
 Roosevelt, Franklin Delano, 112, 522, 582, 596, 597, 599
 Rosen, Jonathan, 248
 Rosen, Kipps, 520
 Rosen, Moses, 990
 Rosen, Muriel, 520
 Rosenbaum, Thane, 249
 Rosenberg, Harold, 595
 Rosenberg, Lev, 949
 Rosenberg, Max, 1233, 1251
 Rosenberg, Rosa, 1251
 Rosenblum, M., 1134
 Rosenblum, Myer, 524
 Rosencof, Mauricio, 698
 Rosenfeld, Jacob, 1168–1169, 1182, 1183, 1185
 Rosenman, Samuel, 601
 Rosenstein, I, 1012
 Rosenstock, Joseph, 1203
 Rosenthal, Jack, 1244
 Rosenthal, Moyshe, 1044
 Rosenwald, Lessing J., 339
 Rosenzweig, Franz, 42, 404
 Roseznic, Boris, 733
 Rosh Hashanah, 513, 629
 Rosowsky, Solomon, 212, 213
 Ross, Tamar, 406
 Rosten, Leo, 195, 198
 Roth, Cecil, 934
 Roth, Henry, 236, 595
 Roth, Laurence, 429
 Roth, Philip, 244–247, 249, 709, 839
 Roth, Sid, 1164
 Rothko, Mark, 1031
 Rothkowitz, Marcus, 1031
 Rothschild, 825, 835
 Rothstein, Marshall, 550
 Rottberger, Felix, 1080
 Rottberger, Olga, 1080
 Rottenberg, Dan, 292
 Rotwelsch, perspective on, 187–191
 Rowe, Leo Stants, 665
 Roxas, Manuel A., 1234, 1245
 Rozanov, Yosif, 961, 966
 Rozier, Gilles, 839
 Rubenson, Moritz, 1052, 1089
 Rubinstein, Rabbi, 1048
 Rubinstein, William D., 112
 Rubio, Pascual Ortiz, 674
 Rudolf II, King, 969
 Ruhr, Hans, 732–733
 Rusape, Zimbabwe, 451
 Russia, 75, 102–103, 938–942, 992–997
   anti-Semitism, anti-Zionism, and community existential problems, 996–997
   contemporary overview, 995–997
   culture, 939
   demographic movement and emigration, 997
   economic conditions, 939–940
   general population, 938, 992
   Great Choral Synagogue (St. Petersburg), 995
   historical overview, 992–994
   humanities, 939
   Jewish education, religious denominations, and communal and political institutions, 995–996
   Jewish immigration from, 494–495
   Jewish population in, 938, 992
   languages spoken, 992
   migration route and ethnic backgrounds, 992 relationship between Habad Hasidism and, 998–1001 Russian Jews
   in Beijing, China, 1180–1181
   contemporary migration patterns to Germany, 386–391
 Russian rule in Central Asia, 1125–1126
 Rustamids, 456
 Ryazanovskii, A., 1134
 Ryvel, 512

 S. Jacobs Pty Ltd, East Africa, 476
 Sa'ada, 798, 799
 Sa'adia Gaon, 25, 154, 450, 464, 786, 821, 1130
 Saadian Dynasty, 482
 Saana (probably Yemen), 450
 Saatchi, Charles, 360
 Saatchi, Maurice, 360
 Sabbatai Zevi, 32, 41, 83, 129, 627, 781, 794, 855, 943, 957, 980, 1063

 Sabbatean movement, in Ottoman Empire, 779–785
 Sabbath, 65, 67, 69, 146
 Sabriel, 1101, 1102
 Sabzanov, Yahiel, 1144
 Sachs, Albie, 502
 Sachs, Maurice, 839
 Sachs, Nelly, 1055, 1090
 Sachs, Solly, 496
 Sachses family, 1090
 Sacks, Jonathan, 430, 927, 935
 Sa'd al Davla ibn Hibbat Allah ibn Munsab Ebheri, 768
 Sadowitz, Jerry, 897
 Sadrian, Hans, 808
 Safed, 776
 Safed, Israel, 34
 Safra, Edmond, 789, 919
 Saint Croix, Jews in, 661–662
 Saint Eustatius, 657, 665, 668
   Jews in, 656
 Saint Louis, Haiti, 660
 Saint Maarten, 655
 Saint Martin, Jews in, 657
 Saint Thomas, Jews in United States, 661–662
 Sakuua, 755
 Saleh, Shalom, 775
 Salih, Yahya, 797
 Salisbury, 518, 519
 Salmon, Alexander, 352
 Salome (daughter of Herod the Great), 1112
 Salomon, Augustin, 671
 Salomon, Moses, 1088
 Salonica, 860–864
 Salonika, 776
 Salvador, Brazil, 720
 Salvador, Luis, Prince, 903
 Salzman, Pnina, 1116
 Samaritans, 754
 Samaritan Diaspora, 87–89
 Sambation, 453–454
 Saminsky, Lazare, 212, 213
 Sammons, Jeffrey, 49
 Samoilvich, Rudolph L., 354
 Samson, 79
 Samuel, Edwin, 937
 Samuel, Herbert, 926
 Samuel, Howard, 932
 Samuel, Lord of Wych Cross, 932
 Samuel, Marcus, 1199
 Samuel the Nagid of Andalusia, 313–314
 Samuilov, Viktor, 967
 San, Aung, 1242
 Sana'a, 799
 Sananes, Moisés, 746
 Sandler, Adam, 244
 San Pedro Sula, Honduras, 669
 San Salvador, 668
 Santa Clara, Cuba, 664
 Santana, Pedro, 665
 Santiago de Cuba, Cuba, 664
 Santiago de la Vega, Jamaica, 658

- Santilhano, F. Dias, 1238, 1239
 Santo Antao, 460
 Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic, 666
 Santos, Brazil, 720
 Santos, Silvio, 721
 São Paulo, Brazil, 720
 São Tiago, 460
 São Tomé, 460
 São Vicente, 460
 Saphiere (Zirinsky), Joan, 1189
 Saphir, Jacob, 527, 1233, 1236, 1237
 Sapire, Stanley, 452
 Šapur I, 763
 Sarah, 18, 1100
 Sarfaty, Sassone, 730
 Sargon II, King, 3, 81
 Sarmad, Sa'id, 1214–1215
 Sartre, Jean-Paul, 837
 Sason, Sheikh, 1186
 Sasson, Aaron, 771
 Sassoon, Abdullah, 1226
 Sassoon, David, 355, 356, 527, 1186, 1187, 1208, 1225, 1226
 Sassoon, Elias, 355, 1186
 Sassoon, Jacob Elias David, 1226
 Sassoon, Rachel, 1172
 Sassoon, Solomon, 1226
 Sassoon, Victor, 357, 1172
 Sassoon family, 1187, 1207, 1224, 1226, 1247
 Satamkar, Moses Samuel Reuben, 1229
 Sater, Ana Lya, 704
 Satire in Judeo-Spanish song, 220–222
 Satmar Hasidic sect, 795
 Sats, Natalya, 1135
 Satz, Mario, 698
 Saul, King, 79, 80, 1230
 Savanna, Jewish, 652
 Savanna la Mar, Jamaica, 658
 Sayagh, Joseph, 885
 Sberro, Bernard, 512
 Scandinavia, 1050–1057
   anti-Semitism, anti-Zionism, and community existential problems, 1056 attitudes toward intermarriage, 1058–1059
   child-rearing, 1060
   contemporary overview, 1054–1056
   culture, science, and the humanities, 1054–1055
   demographic movement and emigration, 1056
   Denmark, 1062–1070
   Finland, 1071–1076
   general population, 1050
   historical overview, 1050–1054
   Iceland, 1077–1082
   industries, trades, and professions, 1054
   intermarriage, 1057–1061
   Jewish education, religious denominations, and communal and political institutions, 1055–1056
   Jewish population in, 1050
   languages spoken, 1050
   marriage patterns, 1058
   migration routes and ethnic backgrounds, 1050
   Norway, 1082–1087
   Sweden, 1087–1092
   weinuke, 1060–1061
 Schachter-Shalomi, Zalman, 405, 406, 625, 628
 Schaeffer, Shepsal, 635
 Schalit, Heinrich, 213
 Schally, Andrew, 1037
 Schauder, Adolf, 496
 Scheer, Eva, 1085
 Schenirer, Sarah, 272
 Scherbacovsky, Elías, 709
 Scherman, Nosson, 611
 Schiff, David Tevele, 933, 934
 Schiff, Jacob A., 638, 1198, 1199, 1200
 Schiller, Shlomo, 347
 Schindel, Robert, 47
 Schlesin, Sonia, 496
 Schneerson, Levi Yitzhak, 1133
 Schneerson, Menachem Mendel, 430–445, 607, 1000
 Schneerson, Shalom Dob Ber, 602–607
 Schneerson, Yosef Yitzchak, 602, 624–625, 993, 998, 999, 1000
 Schneider, Elia, 748
 Schneiderman, David, 707
 Schneier, Arthur, 1166
 Schnirer, Sarah, 261
 Schnitzler, Arthur, 45
 Scholem, Gerschom, 42
 Schönberg, Arnold, 301
 School-based kollels, 428
 Schorr, Baruch, 212
 Schorsch, Ismar, 645
 Schotz, Benno, 897
 Schoyer, Raphael, 1197
 Schrift, Shirley, 242
 Schroder, Gerhard, 1158
 Schück, Henrik, 1055, 1090
 Schück, Heyman, 1090
 Schudrich, Michael, 986, 987
 Schwartz, Samuel, 222
 Schwartz, Zeev, 429
 Schwarz, Joseph, 1245
 Schwarz-Bart, André, 838
 Schwimmer, Rosika, 262
 Schyfter, Guita, 701
 Science of Judaism, 44, 230
 Scliar, Moacyr, 696, 697, 707, 709, 721
 Scotland, 895–900
 Scotus, Duns, 100
 Second aliyah, 328
 Second Barbary Wars, 456
 Second Council of Nicea, 136
 Second Crusade, 129
 Second Palestinian Intifada, 514
 Second Temple, 21, 81, 126, 206
 Sedek, Kehillat Shaare, 615–616
 Seeds of Peace, 627
 Seeger, Pete, 226
 Seeligmann, E. J. (Vaandrig), 1238
 Sefrou, 484
 Sefwi Sui, Ghana, 451
 Sefwi Wiawso, Ghana, 451
 Segel, Binjamin, 58
 Seghers, Anna, 47
 Seinfeld, Jerry, 244
 Selassie, Haile, 469, 470
 Self-revitalization of Diaspora Life, 402–407
 Seliar, Moacyr, 707
 Seligmann, Rafael, 47
 Seligson, Esther, 708
 Selznick, David O., 239, 240
 Semah, Joseph, 1205, 1207
 Semah, Najema, 355
 Seminario Rabínico, Buenos Aires, 693
 Sender, Anne, 1085
 Seneca the Younger, 66
 Senna, 768
 Señor de Castro, David, 729
 Sepharadi Museum, 747
 Sephardi, 487–490
   in Australia, 526–530
   biblical cantillation, 215–216 broken societal conventions, 255
   choral singing, 217
   concept in German-Jewish and German anti-Semitic thought, 48–52 destruction of families, 255 exile and Diaspora concepts, 31–34 history, 215
   Iberian Peninsula, 160 influences on Karaites, 92–93 influencing Syrian Jews, 218 insights into intellectual history, 315–320
   Jewish music, 208, 209
   Judeo-Spanish, 180
   lauding biblical figures, 209
   liturgical music, 214–218
   in Middle East, 560–563
   music, 228
   network of communities, 215 songs of Spanish history and tradition, 210 tradition variants, 26–27
   in United States, 560–563 westward migration routes of, 361–364 women, marriage, and family (16th–17th centuries), 255–260

- Sephardi, Oriental, and Ashkenazi ethnicities and culture beginnings of Hasidism in Eastern Europe, 325–327 history of religious leadership of Oriental Jewry, 309–315 insights into Sephardic intellectual history, 315–320
 Jewish Enlightenment and impact on Diaspora, 320–324
 Jews under Muslim rule, 305–309
- Sephardi Association of Victoria, Sydney, Australia, 530
- Sephardic Angel Fund, 617
- Sephardic Bikur Holim, 617
- Sephardic Community Federation, 618
- Sephardic kabbalists, 31–33
- Sephardim, 452
- Sephardim Society of Israelite Benevolence, 729
- Sephardi Shevet Ahim, Cuba, 664
- Sephardi Synagogue, Sydney, Australia, 529
- Sepher Torah, 527
- Septuagint, 453
- Serfaty, Rosalinda, 748
- Serour, Mordecia, 454
- Set, Shimon, 954
- Setif, 457
- Setton, David, 619, 711
- Seutonium (second century CE), 68–69
- Sfez, Leila, 512
- Sforim, Mendele Moykher, 178, 195, 1043
- Sforza, Francesco, II, 871
- Shabazi, Mori Shalom, 794, 798
- Shah, Nadir, 1095, 1115
- Shah Abbas, 768
- Shaham, Nathan, 646–647
- Shahn, Ben, 1037
- Shakespeare, William, 110, 923
- Shalev, Meir, 648
- Shalit, Gilad, 342
- Shalmaneser V, King, 81
- Shalom, Eric, 672
- Shalom, Rabbi, 955
- Shalom, Sylvan, 512
- Shalom, Yitzhak, 616
- Shalomi, Zalman Schachter, 721
- Shalom Institute, Sydney, Australia, 525
- Shamir, Yitzhak, 950
- Shanghai, China, 1172–1176
- Shapira, Avraham, 429
- Shapira, Nathan, 36
- Shapiro, J., 720
- Shapiro, Meyer, 595
- Shapiro, Sydney, 1170
- Shaposhnikova, Polina, 1106
- Shapür II, King, 1108
- Sharansky, Natan (Anatoly Shcharansky), 120, 994
- Sharett, Moshe, 1234, 1242, 1246, 1253
- Sharon, Ariel, 119, 120, 332
- Shatz, Boris, 966
- Shayo, Ezra, 791
- Shazar, Zalman, 950
- Shchokin, G., 1015
- Shearith Israel, New York, 554, 560, 561
- Shearit Israel, 213
- Sheba, 468
- Shein, Benzion, 1237
- Shekhter, Boris, 1148
- Shemsn, Eitan, 380
- Shenzhen, China, 1181
- Sher, Anthony, 502
- Sherif, Ibrahim, 478
- Sheshbazzar, 2
- Sheshet, Isaac b., 909
- Sheshet, Rav, 765
- Shevardnadze, Eduard, 1122
- Shifrin, David, 604
- Shikne, Lauruska Mischa, 1038
- Shils, Edward, 586
- Shimon, Rabbi, 1159, 1180
- Shining Path, 731, 737
- Shinwell, Emmanuel (Manny), 897
- Shiraz, 768
- Shmelkes, Yitzchak, 423
- Shmuskevich, Yacov, 1038
- Sholem Aleichem, Melbourne, Australia, 525
- Shooker, Flora, 1249
- Shoua, Farag, 507
- Shrimski, Samuel, 542
- Shteyngart, Gary, 249
- Shúa, Ana María, 698, 699, 707
- Shubert, J.J., 237
- Shubert, Lee, 237
- Shubert, Sam, 237
- Shukoh, Dara, 1214
- Shulhan Arukh, 790
- Shulman, Kalman, 1047
- Shwartz, Eddi, 967
- Shwartz, Eddy, 966
- Shwartz, Moni, 967
- Siboni, Haim Refael, 506
- Sicily, 312–314
- Siddur, Vadim, 231
- Sidon, Karol, 970
- Siegfried, Count, 883
- Sigismund II, King, 1034
- Sigismund III, King, 1035
- Silas, Simon, 529
- Silases family, 1189
- Silberhaft, Moshe, 492
- Silivri, Turkey, 664
- Silva, Antônio José da, 696, 700
- Silver, Abba Hillel, 600, 639
- Silver, Joan Micklin, 248
- Silverstein, Alisa, 1180
- Silverstone, Mark, 542–543
- Simelovitz, Kopel, 816, 819–820
- Simintov, Zablón, 1131
- Simke, Ernest E., 1246
- Simmel, Georg, 44
- Simon, Gauleiter Gustav, 884
- Simon, Neil, 238
- Simon, tribe of, 79, 82
- Simon Magus, 88
- Simpson, R' Eli, 605
- Simpson, W. E., 668
- Sim Shalom* (periodical), 654
- Singapore, 1247–1250
- Singer, Alvy, 246
- Singer, Andre, 722
- Singer, I. J., 234
- Singer, Isaac Bashevis, 178, 195, 234, 235, 709, 965
- Singer, Isaac Merritt, 1139
- Singer, Isadore, 311, 322
- Singer, Paul, 846
- Sippar, 756, 759
- Siridhorn, Maha Chakri, 1235, 1254
- Sirota, Beate, 1199
- Sirota, Leo, 1199, 1203
- Sium Hashas*, 610
- Six-Day War (1967), 480, 511, 523, 586, 587, 590, 630, 634, 639, 642, 749
- Sixth aliyah, 329
- Siyum Hashas*, 612
- Sklare, Marshall, 609, 613
- Skwy, 755–756
- Slavic Yiddish, 186
- Slavo-Turks, 185
- Slovakia, 1001–1004
- Slovenia, 1004–1007
- Slovo, Joe (Yossel Mashel Slovo), 502, 1038
- Smith, John, 554
- Smith, Joseph, 632–633
- Smolenskin, Peretz, 1044
- Snyder, A. Cecil, 665
- Sobel, David, 1252
- Sobel, Henry, 721
- Soccer Australia, 524
- Socialist Party, 592–593, 596
- Social psychology and Jewish self-hatred, 59–60
- Sociedad de Beneficencia Alianza Monte Sinai, Mexico, 674
- Sociedad de Beneficencia–Hilfsverein, Guatemala, 667
- Sociedad de Beneficencia Israelita, 729
- Sociedad Hebraica, Argentina, 712
- Sociedad Israelita Ash-kenazit de Caracas, 746
- Sociedad Israelita de Guatemala–Beth El Reform, 667
- Society of Jewish Intelligentsia, Iran, 769
- Society of Jewish Women, 769
- Society on Studying of Hebrew, 768
- Sociodemographic background and integration, 389
- Sofer, Chatam, 1003

- Sofer, Moses, 976
 Sojnut, Mexico, 681
 Solbena Company, 462
 Solomon, 79, 414, 468, 793, 1137, 1204, 1206, 1213
 Solomon, Abraham, 1247
 Solomon, Anna Freudenthal, 564
 Solomon, Bertha, 496
 Solomon, Dr., 1221
 Solomon, Saul, 496
 Solomon family, 1187
 Solovetchik, Joseph, 52–54, 130, 272
 Somalia, 451
 Somen, Israel, 476
 Somen, Vera, 476–477
 Sondheim, Stephen, 238
 Songhai empire, 451, 454
 Sonnemann, Leopold, 846
 Sorbs, 185
 Sosnowski, Saúl, 699
 Sosua, Dominican Republic, 666
 South Africa, 492, 493–503 historical overview of, 494–497
   Jews in, 451–452, 493–503
 South Africa Campaign, 491
 South African Jewish Board of Deputies (SAJBD), 498, 500
 South African Zionist Federation, 498
 South Australian Board of Deputies, 528
 South Australia Zionist Federation, 528
 Southeast Asia, 1232–1235
   general population, 1232
   historical overview, 1232–1235
   Indonesia, 1235–1239
   Jewish population in, 1232
   languages spoken, 1232
   Malaysia, 1240
   migration routes and ethnic backgrounds, 1232
   Myanmar, 1240–1242
   Philippines, 1243–1246
   Singapore, 1247–1250
   Southeast Asia, 1232–1235
   Thailand, 1250–1254
 Southern Rhodesia, 516, 518
 South Pacific Pictures, 544
 Soutine, Chaim, 827, 829, 836, 949
 Soviet Jewry, 523
 Soviet Union, 229
   in Central Asia, 1126–1128 rule in Baltic countries, 1021, 1022–1024
 Sowden, Lewis, 502
 Spain, 450, 900–904
   See also Medieval Spain
   contemporary overview, 902–904
   culture, science, and the humanities, 902 demographic movement and migration, 903–904
   general population, 900
   historical overview, 901–902
   Jewish education and communal institutions, 902–903
   Jewish population in, 900
   languages spoken, 900
   migration routes and ethnic backgrounds, 900
   religious denominations, 902
 Spanish Inquisition, 100–101, 180
 Spanish-Moroccan war (1859–1860), 460
 Spanish-Portuguese Jews, 650
 Speightstown, Barbados, 657
 Spicker, Irene, 816
 Spigelman, James, 524
 Spilliaert, Leon, 818
 Spinoza, Baruch, 888
 Spinoza, Benedict, 165, 233, 298, 302
 Spire, André, 835–836
 Sports Center, 685
 Srole, Leo, 609
 SS camps, artists at work in, 816–820
 Stagnaro, Juan Bautista, 702
 Stanislas, Duke, 823
 Stark, Edward, 213
 Starobinski, Jean, 919
 Stavans, Ilan, 698, 709
 Stefánsson, Stefán, 1079
 Steimberg, Alicia, 698, 699
 Stein, Marc Aurel, 354
 Steincke, K. K., 1070
 Steinem, Gloria, 621
 Stephen, Kapu, 1219
 Stephen, Saint, 971
 Stereotypes, 60, 106–107, 246–247
 Stern, Fritz, 51
 Stern, Irma, 502
 Stern, Malcolm, 292–293
 Stern, Moritz Abraham, 844
 Sternberg, Leo, 354
 Sternberg, Peter, 520
 Sternberg, Robert, 520
 Stevenson, Robert Louis, 352
 Stewart, Commodore, 849
 Stone, Michael E., 1112
 Strabo, 65, 72, 1110
 Strashun, Matityahu, 1047
 Strassfeld, Michael, 405
 Straus, Adolph Delisle, 669
 Straus, Joost, 1238
 Straus, Oscar S., 354
 Straus, Sarah Lavenburg, 354
 Strauss, Herman, 476
 Streisand, Barbra, 228, 248
 Struensee, Johann, 1051, 1066
 Stuyvesant, Peter, 558, 654
 Suasso de Lima, Joseph, 496
 Sub-Saharan Africa, migrations into, 454
 Sudan, Jewish community in, 503–505, 505–509
 Suetonius, 68–69
 Suez, Perla, 697
 Suez Canal, 789
 Suez Crisis, 528
 Sufism, 153
 Sufott, Ze'ev, 1165
 Suichmezov, Assen, 960
 Sukkoth, 22
 Sulaiman, Moulay, 488
 Süleyman II, Sultan (the Magnificent), 464, 880
 Sulzer, Salomon, 143, 212
 Sum Samuel, 1220
 Sunni Islam, 152
 Sunnism, 456
 Sun Yat-sen, 1156, 1168, 1173
 Sura, 752
 Suriname, 652
   Jews in, 653–654, 738–740
 Surkis, G., 1014
 Surozhon, Sultana, 966
 Susenyos (1607–1632), 468
 Susiana, 768
 Susman, Elie, 516–517
 Susman, Harry, 516–517
 Sustana, 752
 Sutovsky, Emil, 1117
 Sutskever, Abraham, 1048
 Suva, Fiji, 532
 Suzman, Helen, 499
 Suzman, Janet, 502
 Suzman, Moses, 502
 Sviatopolk, Prince, 1008
 Swakopmund, Namibia, 491
 Swaything, Lord, 931
 Swaziland, Jews in, 452
 Sweden, 1087–1092
 Switzerland, 918–922
 Sydney, Australia, 528
   conversion to Judaism in, 531
 Sydney Jewish Museum, Sydney, Australia, 524
 Symbols of Diaspora, 17–23
 Symmachus, 133, 134
 Synagogue Council of America, 599
 Synagogues, 432–433
   exteriors, 129
   inscriptions found in, 13–14
   Jewish communities, 23–24
   symbolizing grief, suffering, and decline, 70
   Western Christian lands, 127 women in positions of leadership, 252
 Syria, 774
   history of Jews in, 786–792
 Syrian Jews, 65
   liturgy and music of, 218–220 in New York, 615–620
 Syrkin, Nachman, 595
 Szemanski, Jacob, 237
 Szenes, Hannah, 974
 Szychman, Mario, 697
 Szilard, Leo, 975

- Szold, Henrietta, 635, 637, 639
(photo)
- Szold, Robert, 665
- T. Daniel, 1220–1221
- Tabachnik, I., 1013
- Taboury, Binyamin, 427
- Tacitus, 67–68, 104, 108
- Tacitus, Cornelius, 1111
- Tadger, Avram, 958
- Tagawa, Ken, 1201
- Tahert, 455
- Taieb, Hai, 513
- Taiwan, 1193–1195
- Ta'iz, 799
- Tajer, Yehuda, 775
- Tajikistan, 1142–1146
- Takahashi, Korekiyo, 1196–1200
- Takhalov, Suleyman, 1153
- Takkanah, 619
- Talmud, 11, 20, 97, 796
- Talmudic background, 296
- Talmudic thought, 4–7
- Talmud Torah education, 618
- Talmud Torah system, reforms in, 478
- Talmud Tora Teodoro Herzl, Cuba, 664
- Tam, Rabbenu, 822
- Tam David Yahia, Jaakov, 980
- Tangier, Morocco, 460, 489–490
- Tanzania, Jews in, 452
- Tarica, Hizkiah Shemuel, 859
- Tarica, Yedidiah Shemuel, 859
- Tarjih, 799
- Tarras, Dave, 228
- Tarsa, Hayyim, 859
- Tarshish, 453
- Tasmania, Australia, 521
- Tata family, 1224
- Taub, Isaac, 976
- Taubman, Craig, 227
- Taylor, James, 226
- Tay-Sachs disease (TSD), 285–286
- Teatro Hebraica, 733
- Tegucigalpa, Honduras, 669
- Teheran, 768, 769
- Teheran Charity Center, 769
- Teichtal, Yehuda, 388 (photo)
- Teitelbaum, Joel, 336
- Teixeira, Bento, 696
- Teixeira, Samuel, 1064
- Tela, Honduras, 669
- Tel Aviv, 514, 759
- Teller, Edward, 975
- Telo, Antoni6 José, 893
- Teman*, 793
- Temkin, Shlomo, 1249
- Tenekedjieva, Dessi, 967
- Tetouan, Morocco, 483, 485
- Tetuan, Morocco, 487, 488, 489, 490
- Tewodros II, 469
- Thailand, 1250–1254
- Thalweg, Irving, 240
- Thalwitzer, Maximilian, 496
- Thangruma, H., 1221
- Thatcher, Margaret, 360
- Theodor Herzl Club, Melbourne, Australia, 524
- Theodotion, 134
- Theological anti-Semitism, 105
- Therapeutic community, 252
- Thessaloniki, population transfer on Jews of, 364–369
- Thies, Harmen, 231
- Third aliyah, 328
- Third Crusade, 129
- Thomas, Saint, 671
- Thomas the Apostle and Abbanes, 1204, 1206
- Thurloe, John, 652
- Tian, Ai, 1156
- Tiberius, Emperor, 68–70
- Tibullus (ca. 54–ca. 18 BCE), 65
- Tiempo, César, 697, 708
- Tiglath-Pileser the 3rd, 767
- Tigran II, King (Tigran the Great), 1104, 1109, 1110, 1111
- Tigran IV, King, 1111
- Tigran V, King, 1111, 1112
- Tigran VI, King, 1111, 1112
- Tijuana, Mexico, 675
- Tillich, Paul, 132
- Timaru, New Zealand, 535
- Timbuktu, 451, 454
- Timmerman, Jacobo, 698, 712
- Timur, 1123
- Tintner, Georg, 544
- Tisha B'Av, 21–22
- Titus, 69, 71
- Tiv, 493
- Tlemcen, 455
- Tobago, 652
- Jews in, 662
- Toledo, Alejandro, 734
- Tolerance, 142
- Toller, Ernst, 847
- Torah, 417
- international network of religious Zionist kollels, 427–429
- public reading of, 207–208
- Torah Umesorah, 609
- Torarica, Suriname, 653
- Toronto, Canada, 549, 551, 552
- Torquemada, Tomás de, 901, 980
- Torsion dystonia, 286
- Toueg family, 357
- Tounsa, split between Grana and, 513
- Touyier, Paul, 830
- Tov, Baal Shem, 1009
- Tov, Yoav Siman, 1131
- Tov Nahmias, Shem, 877
- Tozaj, Neshat, 945
- Trades. See Industries, trades, and professions
- Traditional music, 207–209
- Trahtemberg, León, 729, 731
- Transvaal, Southern Africa, 450, 494, 519
- Trdat I, 1111
- Treason Trial (1956–1961), 499
- Trebitsch, Arthur, 58
- Tribuna Israelita, Mexico, 675, 679
- Trier, Herman, 1069
- Trigano, Shmuel, 839
- Trilling, Diana, 595
- Trilling, Lionel, 595
- Trimberg, Süsskind von, 43
- Trinidad, Jews in, 662
- Trink, Isak, 943
- Tristán, Flora, 735–736
- Trogus, Pompey, 1110
- Troki, Solomon ben Aaron, 93
- Trotsky, Leon, 335, 920
- Trotto, Marcelo, 701
- Truman, Harry, 1234, 1245
- Trumpeldor, Yosef, 1200
- Truth and Reconciliation Commission hearings, 499
- Tsaban, Yair, 471
- Tsadikov, Mois, 958
- Tsegaya, Mekuria, 469
- Tseydman, Boris, 1153
- Tucacas, Venezuela, 655, 745
- Tucker, Sophie (Sophie Kalish), 243
- Tunis, 514
- Tunisia, 453
- Jews in, 509–514
- Tunisian Hafsids, 456
- Turkish social context and Judeo-Spanish, 180–184
- Turkmenistan, 1146–1149
- Turnovsky, Frederick, 544
- Tuvim, Judith, 242
- Twersky, Moise, 836
- Tzedaka Foundation, 714
- Tzedaka Umarpe, 684
- Tzedek, Shaarei, 656
- Uasin Gishu plateau, Kenya, 475
- Uganda, 451, 475
- Jews in, 515
- Ukraine, 1007–1016
- anti-Semitism, anti-Zionism, and community existential problems, 1015
- contemporary overview, 1013–1015
- culture, science, and the humanities, 1013–1014
- demographic movement and emigration, 1015
- economic conditions, 1014
- general population, 1007
- historical overview, 1007–1013
- industries, trades, and professions, 1013
- Jewish education, religious denominations, and communal and political institutions, 1014–1015

- Jewish population in, 1007
 languages spoken, 1007
 migration routes and ethnic backgrounds, 1007
- Ultra-Orthodox communities, 179
- Umbral, 679
- Umerdekar, Gershon Solomon, 1228
- Umerdekar, Rahamim Solomon, 1228
- Umerdekar, Sheeoolabai Solomon, 1228
- Umerdekar, Solomon David, 1228
- Unión Israelita de Caracas, Venezuela, 746, 748
- Unión Israelita de Perú (Israeli Confederation of Peru), 729
- Unión Macabi Universal, 733
- Union of Jewish Women, 499
- Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America, 561
- Union of Sephardic Congregations, 562
- Union of South Africa, 494
- Union Sionista de Cuba, 664
- United Company of East Indies, 554
- United Hebrew Trades, 594
- United Israel Appeal, 643
- United Jewish Appeal (UJA), 643
- United Jewish Communities (UJC), 643
- United Jewish Communities
 Argentinean Jewish Relief, 714
- United Kingdom, 922–930
 anti-Semitism, anti-Zionism, and community existential problems, 928–929
 contemporary overview, 927–929
 culture, science, and the humanities, 927
 demographic movement and emigration, 929
 demography, 927
 general population, 922
 historical overview, 922–927
 industries, trades, and professions, 927
 Jewish education, religious denominations, and communal and political institutions, 927–929
 Jewish population in, 922
 languages spoken, 922
 migration routes and ethnic backgrounds, 922
- United Nations (UN), 118–119
 High Commission for Refugees, 120
 Special Committee on Palestine, 667
- United Sisterhood of the Progressive Jewish movement, 499
- United States. See also America
 American Judaism, women, and egalitarianism, 271–274 contemporary Jewish music in, 225–229 history of Habad movement in, 602–607 immigration quotas, 113
 Jewish music, 213–214
 native racism, 238
 plans for rescuing Jews, 114
 Sephardi and Middle Eastern Jews in, 560–563
 War Refugee Board in, 115
- University-based kollels, 428
- Urban II, 841
- Urhobo, 493
- Uris, Leon, 242
- Urofsky, Melvin, 636
- Uruguay, Jews in, 690, 691, 741–745
- Usher's syndrome (US), 286
- Usque, Abraão, 876, 877
- Usque, Samuel, 875, 876, 877
- Uzan, Rafael, 512
- Uzbekistan, 84, 1149–1154
- Uziel, Benzion, 423
- Vaad ha-Hatzala, 599
- Vaàdiyaevs family, 1126
- Vagenstein, Anjel, 961, 966
- Vagenstein, Grisha, 966
- Vagenstein, Roni, 966
- Vaiphei, Khaikhopau, 1219
- Vaisberg, Abraham, 733
- Vaksberg, Tatiana, 967
- Valensi, Lucette, 513
- Valentin, Hugo, 1055, 1090
- Valerius Maximus, 66
- Valobra, Lelio Vittorio, 1005
- Vancouver, Canada, 549, 551
- Van Creveld, S. J., 1237
- Van Geldern, Simon, 352
- Vanni, Sam, 1074
- Van Praagh, Joe, 520
- Van Staveren, Hermann, 537, 544
- Varaskin, Amnepodist, 1139
- Varman, Bhaskara Ravi, 1205, 1206
- Varoprakar, Devawongse, 1233, 1253
- Varzhapetian, Rimma, 1106
- Vatican II, 634
- Veil, Simone, 830
- Venclova, Tomas, 1049
- Venezuela, Jews in, 690, 694, 745–750
- Venizelos, Greek Premier, 366–367
- Verbitsky, Bernardo, 697–698
- Verbitsky, Horacio, 698
- Vernadsky, G., 1098
- Versano, Simon, 967
- Veseli, Refik, 945
- Vespucci, Amerigo, 352
- Vichy government, France, 455, 483
- Victoria, Australia, 521
- Victoria, British Columbia, 549
- Vidal, Leon, 367
- Vienna, Austria, 98, 301–302
 overrepresentation of Jews in Gymnasien, 809–811
- Vigodski, Dr., 1048
- Vilhjalmsson, Dr., 1081
- Vilnius (Lithuania) as Jewish city, 1046–1049
- Viñas, David, 699
- Virgin Islands
 Danish, 671
 Jews in, 661–662
- Vital, Hayyim, 35, 317, 776
- Vitautas, Grand Duke, 946, 1008
- Vladigerov, Pancho, 966
- Vogel, Julius, 535, 536, 542
- Vogt, Carl, 51
- Voice of Jacob*, 527
- Voinovich, Vladimir, 1144
- Voldarsky, Alexander, 1138
- Volitzer, Eva, 964, 967
- Vologeses I, King, 1111
- Volozhin, Chaim, 947
- Voltaire, 96, 105
- Voluntarias Judeo Mexicanas, 679
- Volunteering in Diaspora, 342–343
- Von Arnstein, Fanny, 262
- Votes-for-Women-Club, San Francisco, CA, 564
- Vytautas, Prince, 1034
- Wad Madani, Sudan, 506
- Wagner, Richard, 60, 105–106
- Wahl, Shaul, 947
- Wahnon de Carvalho Veiga, Carlos Alberto, 459
- Waisman, David, 734
- Waithayakorn, Wan, 1234, 1253
- Waksman, Selman, 300
- Wald, Salomon, 1167
- Waldman, Marilyn R., 151
- Waldmann, Alex, 137
- Wallenberg, Raoul, 601, 974
- Wansbrough, John, 152, 153
- Ward, Vincent, 544
- Wardi, Rafael, 1074
- Warner, Harry, 240
- Warner, Jack, 240
- Warner, W. Lloyd, 609
- War Refugee Board, 601
- Washington, George, 198
- Waskow, Arthur, 405, 406, 626
- Wassermann, Jakob, 45
- Wasserstein, Bernard, 112
- Wasserstrom, Steven, 153
- Watchtower Tract Society, 633
- Waten, Judah, 524
- Wattadis, 482

- Webe, Debtera Beroo, 469
 Weber, Max, 930
 Wedemeyer, Albert C., 1170
 Weh-Ardašir, 764
 Wei, Qu, 1185
 Weidman, Jerome, 246
 Weiler, Moses Cyrus, 498
 Weill, Rosie, 1189
 Weinberger, Moses, 608
 Weiner, Lazar, 213
 Weininger, Otto, 58–59, 107
 Weinreich, Max, 193, 1043, 1048
 Weinreich, Uriel, 1038
 Weinstein, Garri, 1117
 Weinueke (Scandinavia), 1060–1061
 Weinzierl, Erica, 808
 Weisenfreund, Muni, 213, 242
 Weiss, Ruth, 1169
 Weisskopf, F. C., 970
 Weissmandel, Michael Dov, 115
 Weiss-Rosmarin, Trude, 622
 Weizmann, Chaim, 344, 637, 638, 919, 925, 937, 950, 1234
 Welensky, Roy, 517, 519
 Wellington, New Zealand, 535, 538–539, 541
 Wellington Fire Brigade, New Zealand, 537
 Wellington Jewish Social Club, New Zealand, 537
 Wenceslas, Emperor, 968
 Werfel, Franz, 45, 970
 Wergeland, Henrik, 1083
 Wessely, Naphtali Herz, 322
 West Africa, migrations of Jews into, 453–454
 Western democracies and Holocaust, 112–115
 Western Diaspora, 11–16
 Western Europe
 Austria, 805–808
 Belgium, 812–815
 British chief rabbinate, 933–936
 Europe, 801–804
 France, 820–832
 Germany, 840–848
 Gibraltar, 848–855
 Greece, 855–857
 Holocaust Art in Belgium, 815–820
 influence of British Jewry on world Jewry, 936–937
 Italy, 865–870
 Jewish commerce in Salonica, 860–864
 Jewish day school education in French-speaking Europe, 832–834
 Jewish identity in French literature and society in the 20th century, 835–840
 Jewish wealth in Britain, 930–933
 Jews and Jewish communities in medieval Spain, 905–913
 Jews and Muslims in medieval Spain, 913–916
 Jews of Island of Rhodes, 857–860
 Luxembourg, 883–886
 Malta, 886–887
 Milan (1535–1597), 870–874
 Minorca (18th century), 916–918
 Netherlands, 887–892
 Portugal, 892–895
 Portuguese Jews: Italy and beyond, 875–883
 Scotland, 895–900
 Spain, 900–904
 Switzerland, 918–922
 United Kingdom, 922–930
 Vienna's Gymnasien, 809–811
 Western literature, 110
 Western Sephardi migration routes, 361–364
 West India Company, 553
 Wex, Michael, 198
 White, Charles W., 1162
 White, Thomas W., 522
 White, William Charles, 1156
 Wicht, Luang, 1251
 Wiesel, Elie, 247, 838
 Wieviorka, Annette, 838
 Wieviorka, Wolf, 836, 838
 Wigner, Eugene, 975
 Wilder, Gene, 246
 Willemstad, 654
 William of Norwich, 923
 William of Rubruck, 1095
 Williams, Thomas, 540
 William the Martyr, St., 96
 Willoughby, Francis Lord, 653
 Willoughby, Henry, 652
 Wilowsky, Jacob David, 608
 Wilson, Woodrow, 338
 Winder, Ludwig, 970
 Windhoek, Namibia, 491
 Windsor Proclamation, 658
 Winestone, Belle Fligelman, 564
 Winnipeg, Canada, 549, 552
 Winter, Jean Pierre, 165
 Winter, Mendel, 732
 Winter, Samuel, 732
 Winters, Shelley, 242
 Wise, Isaac Mayer, 334–335, 568
 Wise, Stephen S., 597–598, 600
 Wise, Steven, 344
Wissenschaft des Judentums, 630
 Wissmann, H. von, 799
 Witold the Great, 1041
 Witsen, Nicolaas, 1095
 Wittgenstein, Ludwig, 42, 301
 Wohltach, Helmut, 1238
 Wolf, Adolph Grant, 665
 Wolf, Lucien, 337
 Wolfenson, Alex, 734
 Wolfenson, Moisés, 731, 734
 Wolff, A. A., 1068
 Wolff, Egon, 557
 Wolff, Freida, 557
 Wolff, Joseph, 1125, 1146, 1149
 Wolffsohn, Solly, 668
 Wolfgang Rosenberg, 543
 Wolfskehl, Karl, 46, 47, 543
 Wolfsohn, David, 1038
 Wolfson, Harry, 595
 Wolfson, Isaac, Sir, 932
 Wolsey, Louis, 339
 Women in Central and Western Europe, 254 in Central Europe, 260–263 in early American West, 563–565 in Imperial Germany, 264–267 role of, 251–255
 Sephardi, 255–260
 in Yemen, 267–271
 Women's International Zionist Organization (WIZO), 476, 525, 540, 641, 664, 668, 669, 672, 679, 681, 749
 Workingmen's Circle, 594
 Workmen's Circle, 593, 594
 World Jewish College, 749
 World Jewish Congress, 120 (photo), 483–484, 706
 World Jewish population, by official language (1931–2005), 397 (table)
 World Jewry, influence of British Jewry on, 936–937
 World ORT, 714
 World Sephardic Federation, 505
 World Summit on Sustainable Development (2002), 501
 World War II
 Jews in Algeria in, 457
 Tunisia and, 511
 World Zionist Organization, 636
 Wortman, Daniella Azria, 512
 Wouk, Herman, 246
 Wulfsohn, Harry, 517
 Wunderbar, Reuben, 1029
 Wurttemberg, Duke of, 841
 Wyman, David S., 112
 Wynberg synagogue (Cape Town), bombing of, 501 Xerxes, 767
 Xiangru, Zhao, 1158
 Xorenac'i, Movses, 1104, 1108, 1109, 1110, 1111, 1112
 Yaacov Ibn Haviv, 776
 Yaavets, Yosef, 317
 Yaffo, Libya, 481
 Yagiello, Alexander, 1034
 Yagodeev, Abraham, 1152
 Yahudu, 759–760
 Yahya Kafih, 798
 Yaker, Moico, 733

- Yakoviyim, 781
 Yarim, 799
 Yavani, Moshe, 955
 Yazid, Muley, 483, 488, 490
 Yehiel, Asher b., 905, 909
 Yehizqiyahu, King, 1100
 Yehudah Israel, Hayyim, 858
 Yehudah Israel, Rahamim Hayyim, 858
 Yemen, Jews in, 267–271, 793–799
 Ye'or, Bat, 115
 Yeshiva, 620
 Yeshiva College, 530, 608
 Yeshiva Naveh Shalom-Ozar Hatorah, Tripoli, 480
 Yeshua, 137–138, 146–148
 Yew, Lee Kuan, 1249
 Yeziarska, Anzia, 236
 Yibir (or Hebrew) tribe, 451
 Yiddish, 129, 167–170, 172, 190
   abandoning in Germany, 192
   Ashkenasi songs, 210–211
   bilingual Germano-Slavic southeast Germany, 189
   Diaspora language and its future, 193–197 distinctive from Gentile forms of language, 173 as distinctive language, 176 geographically separated from German, 176 grammar and phonology, 186
   Hasidim, 196
   High German origin, 186 integration into English, 197–199
   Jewish culture and, 177
   Judeo-French and Judeo-Italian components, 188
   Judeo-Romance components, 188
   literature, 178
   modern Hebrew based on, 201 official language of Diamond exchange, 813 perspective on, 187–191 predicting lexical elements used, 186
   relexification, 184
   Saul Bellow and, 245
   Slavicization of, 186
   songs in, 227
   southwestern German dialects, 186 special metaphysical status, 176 standardizing, 192
   two-tiered relexification in, 184–187
 Yiddishe Shule, 684
 Yiddish-German irony, 191–193
 Yiddish-language materials, 235–236
 Yisha, Wang, 1158
 Yishuv, 774
 Yisroel, Adass, 530
 Yisroel, Adath, 529–530
 Yitzhak, Menguistu, 469
 Yitzhak, Yosef, 430, 436, 442
 Yitzhak Shalom zt'l, 616
 Yitzhak the Blind, 316
 Yoelson, Asa, 1037
 Yohannes I, 469
 Yom Kippur, 551
 Yom Kippur War (1973), 477, 630, 749
 Yom Tov Semach, 797
 Yoruba, 451
 Yosef, Ovadiah, 470
 Yosef ben Shlomo, 464
 Youde, Fu, 1159, 1182
 Young Judea, Puerto Rico, 665
 Young Men's Hebrew Association, 671
 Young Turks, 786, 789, 790
 Youth Aliyah, 599, 638
 Youth movements in Diaspora, 341–342
 Ysrael de Piza, Abram, 556
 Yudakov, Suleiman, 1144
 Yukiévich, Saúl, 709
 Yushchenko, Viktor, 1015
 Yutar, Percy, 499

 Zable, Arnold, 524
 Zacker, John, 137
 Zacuto, Abraham ben Samuel, 352, 495–496
 Zadkine, Ossip, 836
 Zaharia, Mayer, 733
 Zai-Ul-Hak, 1229
 Zaks, Offer, 748
 Zalman, R'Shneur, 998
 Zalman, Shneur, 604, 947, 1043
 Zambia, Jews in, 516–517
 Zamra, David ibn, 35
 Zangwill, Israel, 238
 Zaphenath-paneah. See Joseph
 Zebulun, tribe of, 79, 82, 84
 Zecharia, Isaac, 527–528
 Zechariah, 2
 Zechariah al-Dahir, 798
 Zedekiah, 4
 Zedong, Mao, 1182
 Zeldovich, Yakov, 949
 Zera, 7
 Zera Israel, 471
 Zerner, Elizabeth, 1252
 Zerubbabel, 2
 Zhijun, Wang, 1184
 Zhirinovskiy, Vladimir, 994
 Zhitlowsky, Chaim, 335, 595
 Zidowski, 167
 Zilkha family, 356
 Zimbabwe, Jews in, 518–520
 Zimbabwe African National Union, 519
 Zimbabwe African People's Union, 519
 Zimbabwe Jewish Board of Deputies, 519, 520
 Zimmels, H.J., 26
 Zimmerman, Professor, 348
 Zion, 379–381
 Zion, Amde, 468
 Zionism, 45, 479, 484, 486, 664, 741, 753–754, 771–774, 773
   in Australia, 522
   Christian attitudes toward, 130–131
   growth of, 75
   Israeli presence in Thailand, 1253–1254
   opposition to, 333–340
   Philippines and ties with Israel, 1246
   in the 20th century, 384
   UN resolution equating with racism, 119 youth movements in, 499
 Zionist Council, 518
 Zionist Federation of Australia, 522, 523, 525
 Zionist kollels, international network of, 427–429
 Zionist Organization of America (ZOA), 636–637, 641
 Zipes, Jack, 44
 Zirads, 456
 Zisels, J., 1013
 Zlotowitz, Meir, 611
 Znaimer, Moses, 550
 Zog I, King, 943, 944
 Zohn, Rabbi, 1252
 Zola, Emile, 826
 Zöllner, Louis, 1078
 Zorin, Shalom, 948
 Zuckerman, C., 1098
 Zuckor, Adolph, 239
 Zukas, Simon, 517
 Zunz, Leopold, 25, 50, 230
 Zuwa, Juwa, 454
 Zuwa Alayman, 454
 Zviagils'kyi, E., 1013
 Zweig, Arnold, 43, 45, 47
 Zweig, Stephan, 45–47
 Zwiebach, Barton, 733
 Zwillich, Herman, 733, 736
 Zygmunt I, King, 983, 1008
 Zygmunt III, King, 1009
 Zyskowicz, Ben, 1073, 1074

About the Editor

M. Avrum Ehrlich is a full professor of Judaic studies at the School of Philosophy and Sociology, the Department of Religion, and the Centre of Judaic and Inter-Religious Studies of Shandong University, a government-funded national center for interreligious research in Jinan, the People's Republic of China.

Ehrlich is a theologian, social philosopher, and scholar of classic Jewish texts who is also involved in training Chinese scholars to understand and translate Jewish concepts and classics into Chinese. He teaches text-based courses, including Philosophy of the Hebrew Scriptures, Introductory Studies in Halakha and Talmud, and Readings in Jewish Mysticism.

Ehrlich's research interests include Jewish leadership and transgenerational transfer of authority and ideas, the governing mechanics of religions, and messianism in Judaism and Christianity. His interest in sectarian Jewish and Judaizing groups extends to Chinese thought and religion. He is author of a number of books, including The Jewish Chinese Nexus (Routledge, 2008), Jews and Judaism in Modern China (Routledge, 2008), and Negotiating Minority Religious Identities in Asia (to be published by Brill in 2009). In addition, his earlier works include two books on Hasidic leadership, as well as articles on Jewish mysticism and religious sectarianism, biblical commentaries, and works on ethics and politics.

Born in Sydney, Australia, Ehrlich moved to Israel at age 16 to pursue Talmudic studies in a variety of yeshivas, including Yeshivat Ezion in Alon Shvut, Yehivat Nir in Kiryat Arba, and Yeshivat Tomchei Temimim and Lubavitch at Kfar Chabad, where he was ordained a rabbi. He also studied at the Hartman Institute for Advanced Talmudics in Jerusalem and began his studies in dayanut at the Rumpler Beit Midrash (associated with Satmar Hasidism) and other institutes of focused theological and Talmudic study.

Ehrlich read Jewish philosophy and political science at Bar Ilan University and completed his doctorate on leadership strategies of Hasidic masters at the University of Sydney. He was awarded a Krytman scholarship to conduct research at the Cambridge-based Centre of Jewish-Christian Relations and was awarded a Chevening and British Commonwealth Scholarship to undertake research on religion, law, and government at the University of Cambridge's Department of Social and Political Sciences and later at the Centre for Advanced Religious and Theological Studies. He was a visiting fellow at Clare Hall Cambridge and remains a life member.

Ehrlich is an honorary vice president for special projects at Shandong Yingcai University, Shandong Province, China, and an honorary professor in the Department of Hebrew, Biblical, and Jewish Studies in the School of Languages and Cultures, Faculty of Arts, Sydney University, Australia. He shares his time between China, Australia, and Israel and travels the United States and Europe on lecture tours and conferences.